The author goes on to quote several cases which I think make clear the principle which is laid down. Now, Sir, my hon. friend the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) not only made us acquainted with what many of us knew before but he made us acquainted, and to a certain extent the right hon. the Prime Minister did also, with certain facts which, to my mind, render doubly imperative the demand which we have made for the production of this correspondence, which we have a right to see, not only under the rule which I have just endeavoured to establish pertaining to the constitution of this House, but upon the principle that it is urgent that the correspondence which we now seek for as regards the two matters which are completed, are finished, should be placed in possession of this House in order that we may be in a position to appreciate the action which this government has taken during the proceedings which led up to the conclusions of the treaty abrogating the Clayton-Bulwer arrangement; and also that we should be fully acquainted with what has passed, with what have been the res gestae of this government since the international commission, having under its charge the treatment of several most important subjects of vital interest to this country, has ceased to exist, or has adjourned, according to the statement of these gentlemen already submitted to this House, sine die. It must not be forgotten we have to bear in mind the fact that my hon. friend from Labelle acted throughout the proceedings to which I have referred in laying this resolution before the House, in a special capacity. He was there as the official secretary of the commission, he occupied an official position in which it was open for him to acquire absolute knowledge of a multiplicity of facts with which we are unacquainted, and it is right and proper, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, to give considerable weight to the utterances made in this House the other day by that hon. member as to these facts. Now what do we find ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is referring to a previous debate, which he must know is against the rules of the House.

Mr. MONK. I think, Mr. Speaker, that rule has been considerably modified in England as long as the reference is not an undue one. It is impossible to discuss a question—that is what I believe they have decided in England—without referring to a certain extent to a past debate. We do it every day, and if that reference is simply in order to sustain an argument and is not prolonged, I understand that under the rules of discussion that obtain in England the reference is allowed. If you rule differently, I submit to your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. The position always taken in this House has been that it is not permissible to refer to a previous debate. In some instances we have gone so far as to decide that no reference should be made to answers to questions, and that has also been decided in England. And so far as this parliament is concerned I think it has been the invariable rule that no reference should be made to a previous debate.

Mr. MONK. If you apply the rule rigidly, Mr. Speaker, I think you go further than they do in England at the present time. But I am perfectly prepared to submit to your ruling. Still, it seems to me quite within the rules of this House for me to say that we have had, not only in this House, but time and again outside of this House, public utterances from that hon. gentleman who occupied, as I said, an official and important position during the sittings of this commission; we have had time and again, in the city of Montreal and elsewhere, admissions from him of the utmost value. He has told us there what he has told us here many a time, that during the proceedings which led up to the abolition of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the interests of Canada were insufficiently and improperly guarded by this government, that they failed by acts of omission and by acts of commission in accomplishing what to my mind was a sacred duty, in representing to the British government what was so ably represented by the late Minister of Justice, Hon. David Mills, that Great Britain had unquestionable and unquestioned rights in Central America, and that it was of the utmost importance that those rights should not be sacrificed except we received in exchange something for ourselves; that those rights should not be foresworn until we had obtained from the American government something of what we considered our most just and equitable claims in respect to the Alaskan boundary.

Has this government performed its duty, as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has time and again urged, in representing those claims and our rights to the mother country during the lengthy negotiations which led up to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and are we not entitled to know by the production of the correspondence in reference to the treaty whether the government has accomplished this duty ? If we have a refusal to produce before this House the correspondence which will show that it has really and earnestly taken up the defence of our interests, that it has not been idle and has done nothing, as has been intimated time and again by the hon. member for Labelle, we will be entitled to assume that it has not made the representations which it was its duty to make at the time as to our rights and as to the necessity, in the exercise of the treaty making power, not to sacrifice those rights but to see that they were maintained, when they were unquestionably giving up rights accruing to the empire in Central America. We have had that intimation time and again from the hon. member for Labelle. We have had it stated all over the province of Quebec. It is not necessary for me to refer to what may be considered as his more solemn utterances in this chamber, but it is sufficient for me to say that they more than confirm the arguments and statements of fact he has made everywhere. It is necessary for the honour of this government that it should show to this House that at the time and during these delicate and difficult moments when the British government was negotiating for the abrogation of that treaty, it, here, was not failing in its duty to make proper representations to the British government in regard to our claims in Alaska, or in respect to the boundary of Alaska. It is also important to know if at that time the government was urging upon the home government in respectful but in urgent and proper tones our claims in respect to a variety of other matters of interest to this country and which was its duty to urge upon the home government. Sir, it is an admitted principle in England, and surely we are not going to go back on that principle here, that where a treaty has been concluded, where negotiations are terminated, it belongs to parliament to judge of the acts of the government as to the conduct of those negotiations. It would be impossible for anybody to refute, or even to put in question before the British parliament, that principle. What have we here? We have the known fact, the fact known to the public, the official fact, that the abrogation has taken place and upon what ground can the government refuse to lay before the parliament of this country what undoubtedly has been laid, or can be laid, at any moment, upon the demand of a member, before the House of Commons in England? We are entitled to know what part our government took in these negotiations. It had a part to take, it had a duty to perform, and we are entitled to know how it carried out that duty. In respect to the Alaskan boundary at the time the same arguments were held. We have had the statement of the former Minister of Marine and Fisheries, while in England, to the effect that the commission had sat in Washington without obtaining anything, that he considered the negotiations to be over and terminated for the time-being. We have had the statement of the secretary of that international commission, made time and again, not only in this House but before the public at large at a great variety of meetings, that the commission had been an utter failure, in respect to the Alaskan boundary, that when they had come to the discussion of that subject all further discussion was impeded and had become impossible. We have had his statement and the statement of the participators in that conference also, that it was impossible to obtain the consent of the United States to the proposal which had been made by our own commissioners to submit the question of the Alaskan boundary to a commission of similar composition to the commission which had been proposed by the American authorities themselves to settle the boundary of Venezuela. Therefore, I say we are entitled to consider and the public will consider, as this House ought to consider, that the sittings of that commission are for the present suspended. I submit, under these circumstances, that commission being a distinct body especially created for the settlement of the specific question submitted to it, and that commission having, according to the admission of those who took part in it, on our own behalf, adjourned finally in the face of insurmountable difficulties, that it is the right of this parliament, not, Sir, to pry into the doings of this commission, but it is the right of parliament to know what has passed between our own government and the Imperial authorities since the adjournment of the commission upon the subject of the Alaskan boundary. It is a subject which interests us in the highest degree. We may be wrong, but we live under the belief that a part of that territory belongs to us. It is our property, it is being exploited by a foreign power, and we have the right to know what steps our own government is taking in regard to the authority, which is the only one that can deal with a foreign power and, what have been the doings of this government since that time by correspondence, despatches or otherwise in respect to this most important question. I repeat, Sir, I believe the rule which applies in England, which is a very wise one and which has been applied there with the discretion and moderation which always obtain in the great parliament of that country, should, in this country, receive considerable modification even as to negotiations pending when the desire of this parliament is not to pry into negotiations being carried on by diplomacy between a foreign power and the government of this empire, but when we are asking for documents having reference to our own relations with the British government as to what may be considered, I submit, Sir, an Imperial domestic concern. I submit this motion, Sir.

Mr. SPEAKER. Respecting the question that has been raised, I may call the attention of the House to two decisions I find in Blackmore. In 1862 and 1863 I see this question was decided in England. It was held in 1862 :

It is out of order to read extracts from speeches made in the same session.

And in 1863 :

It is irregular to quote extracts from speeches in a past debate.

I would quote also a decision in reference to the question given in 1880 to the following effect :

An hon. member cannot refer to a late debate; and the same rule applies to the answer to a question as to a debate.

Hon. members will, therefore, see that the rule has gone very far in England.

The PRIME MINISTER. I must express my surprise that my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) should again bring this question before the House, after the debate which took place only a few days ago. I am still more surprised that he should persist in his intention of forcing the motion on the House in view of the quotations which he himself has read from such a standard constitutional authority as Todd. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) must see that the quotations from Todd defeat the very object which he seeks to obtain by his motion. The whole tenor of the hon. gentleman's speech has been to the effect, that while the rule, that papers are not to be communicated to parliament while negotiations are pending, applies in England, that very same rule should not be adhered to in this country. I am at a loss to understand how it is that a rule of parliamentary government in England should not be a rule of parliamentary government in Canada. The only argument which the hon. gentleman made was, that while in England it would not be proper to ask for the production of such papers because it might necessitate the bringing down of secret correspondence with foreign powers, yet this could not occur in Canada with reference to this matter, as it only involved the publication of correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain; no foreign power being in the case. A moment of reflection will convince my hon. friend, or ought to convince him, that his contention is purely gratuitous, and that it would be impossible to bring down the correspondence he seeks without at the same time divulging negotiations which are pending between Great Britain and a foreign power. The very contingency which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) said does not exist, does exist, and it exists in a very aggravated form. I hope that a word or two from me will convince the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) that he is in the wrong. The hon. gentleman says that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is at an end; that therefore there is nothing to conceal; that the treaty negotiated between Lord Lytton and Mr. Clayton has been modified by a recent treaty, and that therefore the papers in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty can be brought down. That reasoning of my hon. friend is fallacious. Canada had no direct interest in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; Canada had no direct interest in the Nicaragua canal. Canada had no more interest in the negotiation of a treaty which affected the Nicaragua canal than she would have in a treaty in reference to the Suez canal, or in any other question between Great Britain and a foreign power in which she was not interested.

Mr. MONK. Had we no interest ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Canada had no direct interest. But why did Canada take any interest in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty ? It was not that we had a direct interest in the matter, but it so happened that we had a difficulty to settle with the United States in the northern part of the continent with regard to the Alaskan boundary, and Great Britain had a difficulty to settle in the Isthmus of Nicaragua in the southern part of the continent, and the suggestion being offered that concessions should be made by one power and the other, it was thought opportune that the two questions should be negotiated together, and that the request for the modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be made the means to an end, in order to obtain our object, which was a settlement of the Alaskan boundary. I would recall to my hon. friend the well known fact, that the only references that were made by the Canadian government at any time with regard to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, were simply with the object of having the Alaskan boundary considered together with the Nicaraguan question. We made representations to that effect and though one branch of this subject has been disposed of, the other has not yet been disposed of, though it is still in a fair way towards settlement, and the negotiations are yet pending. My hon. friend will see that it would be impossible to bring down anything concerning the correspondence with regard to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty except such as concerns the Alaskan boundary question, and we could not bring down these papers unless we were to give at once to the public the negotiations which are still going on with regard to the Alaskan boundary. I now come to another branch of the argument made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk). The hon. gentleman has stated that whether negotiations as to the Alaskan boundary are pending or not, we should bring down the representations which had been made by one government to the other. The hon. gentleman will understand that it would be impossible to bring down that correspondence unless we were to bring down at the same time the protocols exchanged, and the propositions and counter propositions which have been made up to this very moment upon the subject. The hon. gentleman referred to the fact that the Joint High Commission which sat at Quebec and Washington has adjourned sine die, and he says that we should not withhold the correspondence until this commission resumed again. I will at once relieve the apprehension of my hon. friend by telling him, as he knows—because the papers have been placed on the table of the House two years ago—that the Alaskan boundary question has been removed from the commission, and referred by the commission itself to the British government and the United States government, the two interested parties. Since that time, that is to say, since the month of February, 1899, negotiations have been going on between the two governments. Protocols have been exchanged, propositions have been made, counter propositions have been submitted, other propositions have been made again, and the matter has been under consideration and is still under consideration. So that the very argument which my hon. friend has made cannot apply to this matter, for a very obvious reason : that we could not bring down the papers without submitting the very terms of the propositions and counter propositions that have been made. I cannot divulge these secrets to-day ; but it is easy to suppose what has been going on. It is easy to suppose that certain propositions have been made by one government to the other ; that these propositions have been referred to the Canadian government ; that the government have made its comments upon these propositions ; that it has either assented to them or dissented from them. It is easy to suppose that this is the character of the correspondence which has been going on ever since, which has not been concluded, but which is going on at this very moment; and therefore it would be not only impolitic, but a breach of the etiquette which is due by one nation to another, as well as a breach of the most sacred interests of the Canadian people in connection with the Alaska boundary question, if we were to place on the Table of the House to-day the papers for which my hon. friend asks. Does my hon. friend or any other member of the House seriously expect that we could, consistently with the duty we owe to the people of Canada at this very moment, when negotiations are pending, when the British Ambassador at Washington and the American Ambassador at London are exchanging notes, when the two governments are in conference, when we are cognisant of these conferences, when we have submitted our views upon the different propositions which have been made, when the negotiations have reached a certain stage, when it is possible that these negotiations may be completed within a month or so or perhaps longer—does he seriously contemplate that we are going to-day to place on the Table of the House and distribute to the four corners of publicity the negotiations which are still going on, but which I hope may be completed before long? Sir, the matter is a serious one, and I must express my surprise that the hon. gentleman should not have apprehended the nature of the motion he was making, and should still persevere in the demand that we should lay these matters before the public.

I agree with my hon. friend that the procedure and the methods of the British government are very different from what prevails on the continent. The system of government in Great Britain is a system of publicity—a system based on the idea that nothing should be hidden from parliament or the people. But my hon. friend knows that even in Great Britain, which is the mother of that system, there are some matters which even the representatives of the people cannot have laid before them until the time comes when the communication of them can be made with safety to the public interest. In this matter, it is obvious—I have only to state the case to show at once to every man who views the question unbiased—that it would be highly prejudicial to the public interest to bring down this correspondence. As soon as it is completed the government will be only too happy to bring it down. I have only to express my deep sorrow that the matter is not yet concluded, and my deep hope that it will be concluded at an early day. At all events, no efforts of the government will be spared to bring it to a conclusion as speedily as possible.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

But the parliament of Canada will not be surprised if I say that this is a matter with which we have experienced a great deal of difficulty. The United States government is of all governments the one the most difficult with which to carry on international negotiations, owing to their peculiar constitution, which makes the Senate the treaty-ratifying power. Therefore the Senate has all along to be kept more or less advised—if not the whole Senate, leading members of it. For this reason we have not been able, even after years of persevering and continuous effort, to bring the matter to such a point as to enable me—what otherwise I should be only too happy to do—to gratify the legitimate curiosity of hon. gentlemen opposite to have the full particulars laid before them.

My hon. friend has referred to certain statements which have been made by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) outside the House. I might suggest to my hon. friend that it would have been perhaps more appropriate, when he lectured my hon. friend a few days ago on a question much akin to this one, to have brought up the references which he has made to-day. But at all events I never understood my hon. friend from Labelle to make any statement except by way of argument, that we had not pressed sufficiently the claims of Canada upon the British government in connection with the modification of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. He was only acting upon his own inferences. He had no data to go by. As to the fact that he was connected with the Joint Commission, I do not know that that is relevant at all. As to the other fact, that he alluded to certain statements which have not been made, but which Sir Louis Davies is reported to have made, I have in my hand a letter from Sir Louis Davies denying that he made any such statements. I do not intend to read the letter to-day, because the hon. member for Labelle is not in his seat, but I intend to do so at the earliest moment.

Mr. MONK. If the right hon. gentleman refers to the letter of denial, we are entitled to have that letter laid on the Table now.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am afraid that the letter of Sir Louis Davies, a member of the Supreme Court, cannot be treated as a public document to be laid on the Table of the House.

Mr. MONK. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that no minister of the Crown can refer to a document in a statement made by him without depositing that document on the Table of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. The letter is not addressed to me as a minister of the Crown. It is addressed to me as a member of the House, asking me to give to the House his denial of a statement which has been made in the House by a member. I propose to do so, but not to-day, simply on account of the absence of the hon. member for Labelle, whose statement it is intended to contradict.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the right hon. Prime Minister allow me to make a suggestion in all friendliness—and I think I speak with the sympathy of both sides of the House. The most important incident in the matter to which the right hon. gentlemen refers was the innuendo in the speech of the hon. member for Labelle in regard to the position of Lord Herschell; and if the right hon. gentleman could find it proper to give that an emphatic denial, as he could if the facts warranted, and to say that Lord Herschell was not inimical to the claims of Canada, the mind of Canada would be much more easy than in regard to any explanation touching the visit of Sir Louis Davies to Mr. Chamberlain. I think that was really the most serious statement or insinuation that was made.

The PRIME MINISTER. This is apart altogether from the point that has been raised by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). It is a matter which I also intended to speak about; but in the absence of my hon. friend from Labelle, I prefer not to speak of it to-day, and I am sure that the House will appreciate the position I take.

Mr. MONK. If we have the assurance of the Prime Minister that he will lay that letter on the Table, and merely express a desire to see the hon. member for Labelle, I will not insist. But what I draw particularly to the attention of the right hon. gentleman is that the hon. member for Labelle has stated repeatedly that a certain utterance had been made in England by Sir Louis Davies, and that Sir Louis Davies never denied having made that utterance.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier rising to the point of order ?

Mr. MONK. Yes, and I was interrupted by the right hon. gentleman. The point I raise is this, that no minister of the Crown can refer to any document unless he is prepared to lay it on the Table of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to have said a moment ago that he waived his point of order.

Mr. MONK. I would like to have a decision.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point raised was that the Prime Minister had no right to refer to a document unless he were prepared to lay it on the Table. The hon. gentleman afterwards withdrew his point of order, and gave his reason for withdrawing it that he understood and appreciated the motives which actuated the Prime Minister in delaying the production of that document.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the rule laid down a moment ago is to be carried out in its strictness, it would be very difficult for my right hon. friend to lay at a future date the document on the Table or make any reference to it, because he would then be referring to a past debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman to have referred also to a debate outside the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). This is admittedly not a matter which took place outside the House but in the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend is quite in error. It is always allowable to give a personal explanation. Sir Louis Davies simply desires to be allowed to give a personal explanation regarding certain words which have been attributed to him. As regards my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, I am surprised that he should be still unconvinced. I would be only too glad to read the letter at this moment, but I do not think it would be in accord with the fitness of things to read it in the absence of the hon. member for Labelle, whose statement it was caused this letter to be written. I propose, on the first occasion when the hon. member for Labelle is in his seat, to bring this letter to his attention and that of the House on a question of privilege.

Mr. MONK. I ask the ruling of Mr. Speaker upon the point I raised, and if the right hon. gentleman wishes to keep the letter until he sees the hon. member for Labelle, I have no objection. But I am entitled to a ruling.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The point taken by the hon. gentleman does not apply. The Prime Minister has not read any extract from that letter and has not referred to it for the purpose of debate. All he has done is to inform the House that he has the letter and intends to read it at a future day. That cannot be called a reference which brings it within the rule that any document quoted here must be laid on the Table.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule no doubt is when a minister of the Crown refers to a public document, he should be prepared to lay it on the Table. But all the First Minister has done on this occasion was to state that he has a letter in his possession and will produce it later on. And the reason he does not lay it on the Table now is because the hon. member, who was the cause of that letter being written, is not here. I do not think that, under the circumstances, the right hon. the First Minister should be forced to produce now the document, more especially as the hon. gentleman who raised the point of order said he fully appreciated the reason why the First Minister did not lay the letter on the Table to-day.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not propose to say any more on the question. I think I have shown to the House the reasons why this motion cannot be granted and have only to ask that the House do not agree to it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. If the right hon. the leader of the government will bear with me a moment, I think I can show him some difference between the general principle, to which he refers as governing in matters of state, and the peculiar condition of affairs which confront us with regard to these particular negotiations. I would recall to the right hon. gentleman the debate in the session of 1899, and the course then suggested to him by the then leader of the opposition. That suggestion was to this effect, that the unreasonable position taken by the United States authorities made it a matter for serious consideration as to whether the government of Canada should not assume the power of treating American citizens in the admitted portion of British territory in Alaska in a similar manner to that in which British citizens were treated in the admitted portions of the United States territory in that country. If my memory serves me right, the right hon. gentleman considered the proposition worthy of consideration as a possible alternative, without giving expression to any strong opinion one way or the other. Since then the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been abrogated, and we are entitled to know what steps this government took, if any, to see that our interests were consulted before Great Britain consented to that concession. In pressing our right to the fullest information, we are not interrupting any diplomatic negotiations, because—there is no secret about it—for we have it from the lips of the right hon. gentleman—all negotiations concerning the Alaskan boundary were suddenly broken off a long time ago. As Canadians we ought to be extremely jealous and careful as to the manner in which our interests are treated in any negotiations between the United States and Great Britain; and what we want to know now, and are entitled to know, is: What is the position which this government has taken? What are the difficulties that have confronted this government, and in what manner has this government availed itself of the various opportunities that offered? These are questions which we ought to fully discuss.

Take the negotiations concerning the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Was this government prompt to take advantage of the conditions existing previous to the abrogation of that treaty between Great Britain and the United States? At that time the United States desired much at the hands of Great Britain, though extremely niggardly of justice and fair play in their relations with His Majesty's Canadian subjects. Was the opportunity which then offered taken advantage of by this government? Our people are entitled to hold this government responsible. They are entitled to know whether this government kept the home authorities sufficiently advised and sufficiently alive to the importance of seeing that the interests of Canada were not lost sight of.

Now, in regard to what has happened since this extraordinary break off, this stoppage in the diplomatic negotiations touching the Alaskan boundary, surely we are not to wait for ever. It is not a reasonable position for the government to take, that these matters are not finally, finally ended, and that, until they reach an end, be that end good or bad for this country, this country is not to be advised as to the actual position of things touching a matter so vitally important to it. We have had, for instance, statements—I think even reiterated recently—by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) touching that indifference from the mother country to matters purely of Canadian concern, when these matters threatened the relations between the mother country and the United States. I think that since the hon. gentleman became a member of this government he has had the courage to repeat what he said when on this side of the House in regard to how little we owe to Great Britain touching various treaties and matters of Imperial concern where the interests of Canada were involved. Now, we have from another authority these ex cathedra statements of extraordinary and, so far unexplained difficulties that met our representatives at Washington at the hands of a gentleman who was, above all looked upon as the Imperial representative who was to assist and co-operative with the representatives of the Crown from Canada. And, so, not to take up time by relating the whole history of these extraordinary negotiations, we are confronted by a unique condition of affairs, and a condition that—I think, we speak by the book of the late Minister of Justice, now one of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada when we say it is unprecedented, in which it would appear, that the rights and interests of Canada stand a good chance of being absolutely sacrificed. Well, are we to wait until our rights and interests are, beyond question and beyond recall, thrown away, or are we to have a government that will take the people of this country into its confidence? We do not say that the protocols are wanted; we do not say that these private matters require to be placed before parliament—that is not the point. But what the people of Canada, or a great many of the thinking people of Canada who have any regard for these matters of national interest, do want, and, I think, are entitled to, is that such correspondence—whether with the mother country or with other parties—from our own representatives should be laid before parliament as will apprise us of the condition of things that actually exists. It seems to be—I use the word without offence—a disgraceful condition of things that we are only to guess at it from the unguarded statements of a, perhaps, excited and erratic individual who was attached to the Canadian or British commission. It is an awful thing, and against all the proprieties, that any statement of his that may be unfounded in fact should be allowed to go even twenty-four hours without a clear explanation or an absolute contradiction from the First Minister. Any importance given to the statements bruited abroad among the people of Canada and attributed to that gentleman is not due to his individual status or to the fact that he represents a constituency in this House; but what has given them a good deal of importance, and I think excited considerable alarm, is the fact that he made an insinuation with reference to Lord Herschell and made a direct statement in regard to a colleague of the Prime Minister that, if without warrant and truth, would naturally have brought an instant and indignant contradiction from the Prime Minister himself. It seems to me impossible that Lord Herschell should have been hostile to our claim. It seems impossible that Mr. Chamberlain should have trammelled or put any restriction upon the Imperial representative or others on that commission. And a statement of that kind could not have been made in this House without the right hon. gentleman (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) knowing all about it. He was one of that commission, a leading member of it, and he is our Prime Minister; and the very fact that days have elapsed without any authoritative contradiction is, naturally, enough to warrant a motion of this kind. One would have supposed that the right hon. gentleman would have been only too glad to have had this motion or any other suggestion of the kind made in the House of Commons, so that he could have given us the absolute, orthodox statement on all these points. One might reasonably have hoped that he would be able to give the House—without regard to Sir Louis Davies, or without reference to the feelings of a gentleman who, it is quite clear, did not consult his feelings in the matter, and apparently, did not take into consideration the gravity of the case—a statement that we could accept with regard to the views held and the co-operation afforded by Lord Herschell, and also the views of the colonial secretary. For, up to the time of the statements I have referred to, we supposed that we should have derived great advantage from the co-operation of Lord Herschell. And, having regard to the Imperial view of Mr. Chamberlain one would have supposed that no man in the United Kingdom could have better supported our claims than that right hon. gentleman. I hope that is true, but we all anxiously await an authoritative statement in the matter. But, in regard to the point involved in this motion. I would ask the right hon. the premier to reconsider the view he has expressed, and not to fall back on that rigid or technical position which, I think, is justified, only in regard to matters that are actually under treatment and consideration and not those regarding which negotiations are broken off. I do not suppose that the right hon. gentleman pretends that these matters are still under treaty. On the contrary, according to the right hon. gentleman's own explanation the position seems to be this—that Canada has dropped out and that the Alaskan question has been, as he says removed from the management of the government directly concerned——

The PRIME MINISTER. No, but of the Joint Commission.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER—from the management of the Joint Commission, as the right hon. gentleman now puts it, to the hands of the mother country and the United States. I will go this far, and agree with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) that history does not assure us that, if a matter simply remains in the hands of the mother country and the United States, Canada can expect to get her full measure of justice as the result of the negotiations. We want to know, as Canadians, that our own government is most active and persistent in demanding that there shall be no concession—that is no unfair or unreasonable concession—at the hands of the mother country for any consideration like the supposed good will of the United States or any other of these specious excuses that have been used aforetime. How are we to know what is being done ? How are we to judge hon. gentlemen opposite if they retreat behind this barricade and tell us that these matters are absolutely confidential ?

Ordinarily that is true; but when we are face to face with this critical state of affairs, that since 1899, at least, there has been no declaration other than that a most unreasonable attitude has been assumed by the United States, that the government of this country was at that time ready to consider whether retaliatory legislation would be expedient or not, I say the time has come, and more than come, when we should be reasonably informed as to the attitude of this government. The object of this motion, I am sure, is nothing more or less than that we should know what our government has been doing since 1899, whether they have been discharging their responsibilities as the people of this country would expect and require, or whether, according to the position the hon. gentleman takes when he asks the House to vote down this motion, there should be simply a blind confidence in the government, and that the members of this House should not have a reasonable curiosity satisfied, but that in due time, when everything is settled, ended and past, we shall be told what has happened.

Now, there are other matters, too, which suggest all sorts of uneasiness, and, whether they are founded or unfounded, the result will be that in these matters of disquietude will increase rather than decrease, contrary to the prosperity and advantage of this country. I hold in my hands, for instance, a telegraphic information showing that there is an uneasy feeling spreading abroad in this country in regard to other complications which, judged by this correspondence, the government could settle in a moment. My correspondence states :

> Important international communications are passing in reference to this Alaskan boundary question, and the White Pass Railway, that people are agitating in Seattle and district that government action——

That is, I suppose, government action here——

> —compelling fair rates, strikes at independence of operation in regard to American strip.

That is to say, something affecting this modus vivendi in connection with the attitude the government has taken in order to protect the rights of the people of Canada so far as they can from the exorbitant charges that were made by the White Pass Railway. That is only a suggestion as to what will happen, and what will follow on, following not merely from these references, whether accurate or inaccurate, made by a gentleman on the back benches. It seems to me extraordinary not only that the government will not agree to bring down any statement that is in the correspondence, or make any definite statement as to the status of these diplomatic relations, but are not in a position to state on the spot, let alone in a previous debate, but to-day when the matter is before them on a notice, exactly the true state of affairs touching the attitude of the Colonial Secretary and of the British plenipotentiary who was appointed to assist them in the late negotiations at Washington.

One word more with regard to these matters, and that touches a view that I myself ventured to express in 1899. I recall to the right hon. gentleman's memory the remarks I made in a debate when the Minister of the Interior took very strong grounds in this House touching the possessory rights of the United States in Dyea and Skagway. It seems to me a clear inference to assume that the papers, if brought down, would show that one of the insuperable difficulties so far experienced in regard to the settlement of this Alaskan question is due to the admissions made by members of the Canadian government and by the right hon. gentleman in regard to this question, rather than to the attitude of Lord Herschell apart from anything else, and that it was these admissions that bothered and embarrassed the presentation of the Canadian view. The right hon. gentleman will recall the occasion when, for instance, he appealed to history as showing that from 'time immemorial,' as he put it, Dyea and Skagway had been in the possession, first of the Russians and then of the United States, a fact that was combatted as an historical fact, but which certainly was an argument wholly in favour of the United States contention. Now, then, it is possible that if the right hon. gentleman adheres to his decision of giving us no information as to how this hitch has occurred, why it is prolonged, it is possible that the people of this country may come to the conclusion, not unreasonably, under the circumstances, that it was not altogether because of this proclaimed hostility of one of the commissioners to our view, or of the hostility of the Colonial Secretary, according to Sir Louis Davies; but it was because of these inconvenient statements made on solemn occasions by members of the Canadian government. Therefore, in their own interest and in the interest of the people whose servants they are, in the interest of a country whose rights have not always been regarded as absolutely sacred by the mother country, when in contestation between the mother country and the United States, I think the government ought to have the courage of the convictions they professed when in opposition, and take the House into their confidence. Why, when we attempted to negotiate with Newfoundland in the old days, who can forget the attitude of Sir Louis Davies, now gone to a higher place, and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) regarding Tory tyranny on the part of the Liberal-Conservative government, because they, in negotiating with Newfoundland, did not take this House into their confidence from day to day when the House was sitting at the moment these negotiations were going on ? Has the right hon. gentleman forgotten all his professions when in opposition ? While we do not want all the protocol, or the absolutely confidential documents, I do submit again that we are entitled, and that we ought to demand, and the country will demand, a clear and explicit statement, at least a compilation from these state documents, that we may know the exact position of the Canadian government, and the position of this question, whether as regards the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or the United States of America.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright.) My hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) has been a minister himself, and he is also a member of the legal profession, and in both capacities he knows quite well, I think, that there is nothing more prejudicial, as a general rule, to a fair understanding of any important question than the production of some garbled documents relating thereto. He knows also that there are grave and serious questions constantly before a government, and no graver or serious questions can come before this government or any government of Canada than those affecting the relations of Canada and of the whole empire with the adjoining republic, which questions require to be handled with great care and consideration; and that it would be a great injury to the people of Canada, and in no respect a benefit, if, for the sake of gratifying even a legitimate curiosity, we should in any way imperil the permanent interests of the country. Now, the hon. gentleman knows, I think, and if he does not, I think a good many of our friends on this side of the House know, that I myself am in no respect disposed to sacrifice in any degree or shape the interests of the people of Canada to any other consideration whatever. But, Sir, the interests of Canada and the interests of the empire, as I think hon. gentlemen have frequently pointed out to us, are not divisible but are one; and if we believe that it would not be advisable—and of course we are bound to take the responsibility of our utterances at this particular moment—to bring down the details of an intricate negotiation, more especially when, as the hon. gentleman is aware, within a very few weeks, I hope, my right hon. friend beside me will have an opportunity of discussing all these questions vive voce with Mr. Chamberlain and with the advisers of the Crown on the other side of the Atlantic, the hon. gentleman can well understand that we might not desire to bring down an imperfect and garbled correspondence, as I have said, until such time as we can present the whole case unimpaired.

But I rose more especially for another object. I had the pleasure, during the somewhat protracted period over which the negotiations of the Joint High Commission extended, of being on reasonably intimate terms with the late Lord Herschell; and I desire to say here for the benefit of all whom it may concern, that no man could have advocated the interests of Canada more sincerely, more energetically, and more ably than Lord Herschell did on all occasions, and notably with respect to this identical Alaska boundary. For that purpose I rose, and for that purpose I have spoken on the the present occasion. I desire that it should be understood by our people from one end of Canada to the other, that they have no ground, not the slightest or the faintest, to complain of the action of the late Lord Herschell in that respect. I will say this, and I think my colleagues will corroborate me, that I do not believe it would have been possible to present our case under any conceivable circumstances with more lucidity, with more ability, or more cogency, than Lord Herschell presented it on that occasion.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise merely for the purpose of corroborating in the fullest and most unequivocal manner the statement that has been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). I also had the privilege of watching the course of Lord Herschell on the Joint High Commission, and any aspersion on his character as regard his conduct in regard to Canadian interests is most unjust and unfounded. He presented the case of Canada in such a manner as to promote our best interests, he was true to Canadian interests in every respect and the aspersion upon his memory is a cruel and unjust one.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I think that the argument, so far as it has been made for or against the production of the documents, has been very fully made and I would not have thought it was necessary to make any addition to what has been said, if it were not for a remark of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) as I understood him, which strikes me as being one of very considerable importance. If I am not mistaken I understood the Prime Minister, in the course of his speech in dealing with the matter that was under the consideration of the plenipotentiaries, who dealt with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to say that the Nicaragua canal was of no more interest to the people of Canada than would be the Suez canal or any other canal in any part of the world, and that the only importance attaching to it in this connection was the value it possessed as a factor of concession which might be given in lieu of another concession. This is really a most amazing statement to my mind to be made seriously by the Prime Minister of Canada, because it seems to me that the people of Canada have as great, as natural and as complete an interest in the Nicaragua canal and in anything relating to the subject as have the people of the United States. I am not mistaken, I think, in stating that the gentleman who was lately Minister of Justice in the government of the right hon. gentleman enforced that opinion at very great length and with very great ability, and treated the negotiations dealing with the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a matter in respect of which Canada had an interest so deep that no other part of the world could compare with it in respect to its importance. The Nicaragua canal is not within the territory of the United States so that it is not a territorial matter for them. Its interest to them lies in the fact that on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans they have a large extent of coast which would be practically united by the canal penetrating the isthmus. In respect to the matter Canada stands in precisely the same position. We, in Canada, have as large a part of the North America continent as the United States and our interests in the Nicaragua canal, so far as territorial area is concerned, is at least as great as theirs, and looking at the possible extension of our commerce and ship building and the growth of our population on the two coasts of the Atlantic and the Pacific our interest is as deep in the Nicaragua canal as can possibly be that of the United States. Therefore, I feel I am safe in assuming that if the gentlemen who dealt with the interests of Canada in this matter approached the consideration of this subject with no further knowledge of the importance of the matter than that which has been presented to the House by the right hon. Prime Minister, we need not be surprised if the interests of Canada in this matter were not safeguarded to the extent to which they should have been safeguarded.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). I am prepared to vote for the motion made here to-day not only on its merits but in order to enter my protest against the way Canadian interests have been treated in these negotiations. I have in my hand a despatch written by the Marquis of Lansdowne, Foreign Secretary, to Lord Pauncefote, dated February 22 of last year, in which despatch he says :

> At that time the Joint High Commission, over which the late Lord Herschell presided, was still sitting. That commission was appointed in July, 1898, to discuss various questions at issue between Great Britain and the United States, namely, the fur seal fishery, the fisheries off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the Alaskan boundary, alien labour laws, reciprocity, transit of merchandise, mining rights, naval vessels on the great lakes, definition and marking of frontiers, and conveyance of persons in custody. But serious difficulties had arisen in the attempt to arrive at an understanding, and it had become doubtful whether any settlement would be effected.

The third paragraph after this one goes on to say :

> Shortly afterwards Lord Herschell intimated that the difficulties in reard to the question of the Alaskan boundary seemed insuperable, and that he feared it might be necessary to break off the negotiations of which he had hitherto had the charge. Upon this Lord Salisbury informed Mr. White that he did not see how Her Majesty's government could sanction any convention for amending the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as the opinion of this country would hardly support them in making a concession which would be wholly to the benefit of the United States, at a time when they appeared to be so little inclined to come to a satisfactory settlement in regard to the Alaskan frontier.

The whole of the despatch of Lord Lansdowne is an indication of the British position and of our position. He wound up the despatch with this significant sentence :

> It would follow, were His Majesty's government to agree to such an arrangement, that while the United States would have a treaty right to interfere with the canal in time of war, or apprehended war, and while other powers could, with a clear conscience, disregard any of the restrictions imposed by the convention, Great Britain alone, in spite of her enormous possessions on the American continent, in spite of the extent of her Australasian colonies and her interests in the east, would be absolutely precluded from resorting to any such action, or from taking measures to secure her interests in and near the canal.
> I request that Your Excellency will explain to the Secretary of State the reason, as set forth in this despatch, why His Majesty's government feel unable to accept the convention in the shape presented to them by the American ambassador, and why they prefer, as matters stand at present, to retain unmodified the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Lord Lansdowne took that position just one year ago. He took that position because he said it was not in the interests of the empire that the concession which the Americans demanded should be made. He took a very strong position, and he took that position, I believe, on account of his knowledge of Canadian affairs. He had been a Governor General here, he was thoroughly cognizant of our interests and he was prepared to vindicate them and say : This treaty must remain as it is to-day. But, later on, in some way or other, what the Americans wanted was conceded. The canal question was settled, but the very thing in which Canadians were interested, the Alaskan boundary question, and these other questions were stood aside. Why is it that the Americans can get a settlement of their issue and why should that settlement be made at a time, when, according to this very despatch, the Americans :

> Appeared to be so little inclined to come to a satisfactory settlement in regard to the Alaskan frontier.

It is time that this parliament protested against the way in which Canadian interests have been treated in these negotiations, and this is perhaps as good an opportunity as we shall have to enter our protest in this respect. Our interests have not been protected in the way they should have been. For some reason or other they have not been defended as they should have been. When Lord Lansdowne took this strong position and when he declared that Lord Salisbury held that the country would not support the making of a concession wholly to the benefit of the United States at a time when they appeared to be so little inclined to come to a satisfactory settlement in regard to the Alaska frontier—if, I say, at that time, the Canadian government had insisted on Lord Lansdowne standing by her guns, viz., 'to prefer to retain unmodified the provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty,' we should have had the settlement of the Alaskan boundary at the time the final treaty was made. We were told some years ago that sunnyways taken down to Washington would secure us our rights. We now know that the sunnyways can do nothing of the kind, but that Americans can have a settlement of their issues while Canadian issues must always stand over. I am voting for the resolution as a protest of my own against this kind of treatment of Canadian affairs, and I hope and trust that hereafter the government of Canada will represent to the Imperial authorities that when two issues are coupled together, one involving Canada, and one involving the United States, they shall not be uncoupled unless Canadian interests receive the same treatment as is accorded to American interests.

Motion negatived on division.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—PUBLICATION IN PARTS.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk) moved :

That whereas the yearly Report of the Auditor General is made out so that the expenditure under the control of each department appears as a separate and distinct part, be it resolved, that each such part be in future promptly made public in the ordinary way after it has been prepared.

He said : Mr. Speaker, for many years after confederation the departmental reports were not presented to the public until after the assembling of parliament. Some years ago I made a motion requiring these reports to be circulated as soon as they were prepared, in advance of the assembling of parliament; and also requiring monthly statements as to the public debt, revenue, railway receipts, &c. That motion carried, and since then the reports of the various departments have as a rule been placed in the hands of members before the opening of the session. In all cases where this has been done, it has been found productive of good results, because members can come to their duties informed to some extent with regard to public affairs, and possessing the information which enables them to discharge their duties and to take an interest in the transaction of public business. We have on several occasions been delayed in some branches of the work of this House through a delay in presenting the report of the Auditor General, which is very voluminous and which contains information essential to the discussion of various public questions. I now propose that the information compiled by the Auditor General which relates to the various departments of government should be published and placed in the hands of members as soon as it is prepared, without waiting for the completion of the full report. By this means we will get the reports with regard to Customs, Public Works, and other departments of government, without waiting for the entire report, which comes down sometimes late in the session. The advantages that will be secured by the adoption of this motion are, I think, so obvious that I shall not detain the House further than to propose the motion that I have placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The chief complaint of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) is that the delay which sometimes occurs in the bringing down of the Auditor General's Report has been inconvenient to members, and has postponed somewhat the transaction of the business of the House. In that I entirely agree. It is very desirable that the Auditor General's Report should be brought down promptly. This year, however, we have had no reason to complain, because the report was brought down immediately after the opening of parliament. If we could always rely on that, I think the House would have no reason to complain. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I do not think that it is desirable that the Auditor General's Report should be prepared in the piece-meal way he proposes. There are probably as good reasons why other reports dealing with the public service should be divided, but there is a manifest convenience in having the volumes brought down as at present, provided they are brought down promptly and that the business of the House is not delayed. If it were necessary, we might be prepared with an amendment to the legislation, the fixing of the time when the Auditor General shall complete his report and deliver it to the King's Printer, and then we would have a reasonable guarantee that it would be brought down promptly.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the English practice ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think it is somewhat similar to our own, except that I do not think that they distribute documents in advance of the opening of parliament, as we have done in some cases. I think we might provide that the Auditor General should, at a reasonable time before parliament meets, complete his work and deliver his manuscript to the King's Printer, leaving himself, of course, free, if anything should arise later, to make a supplementary report. At present the Auditor General, for very worthy purposes, I am sure, likes to keep matters open, and he is always introducing something into his report in the endeavour to bring it down to the moment when parliament assembles. The consequence is that occasionally very serious delays occur. My own judgment is, that at a date to be fixed by parliament, the Auditor General should complete his report and hand it to the King's Printer, and that no alterations should be made in that volume of the report, but that the printer should publish it and deliver it to members promptly. If anything arises with reference to which the Auditor General wishes to make a further communication to parliament, that might be made the subject of a supplementary return. I would suggest to my hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) that every good purpose would be served if we are able to guarantee the bringing down of the Auditor General's Report promptly as it was brought down this year, and as I hope may be the case in the future.

Mr. W. R. BROCK (Toronto Centre). It is very desirable that the suggestion made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) should be complied with. This country has such a high idea of the Auditor General as one of the most important employees of this parliament, that it would be a retrograde step if his action should be hampered in any way in the direction which the Finance Minister has suggested. This matter should be left entirely in the hands of the Auditor General. If he can see his way, under instructions from this House, to bring down his report after the manner suggested by the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) it would be a very great convenience to us all. That the Auditor General should be hampered by any positive instructions from the House such as the minister has suggested, would be very undesirable. I think that he should be, as he is now, independent of any instructions from the government in this matter.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not propose that he should get any instructions from the government, because he is not an officer of the government. I proposed that whatever instructions we would give him should be incorporated in an Act of parliament, because he is an officer of parliament.

Mr. BROCK. I contend that he should not be hampered either by this House or by the government in any way that might prevent him from making any criticisms he may wish to make on the financial affairs of the country.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). When the financial year is closed, the Auditor General has completed one branch of the subject and his report on that branch is just as complete then as it is when the whole report is presented to parliament. The money has been paid out when the transaction is completed, and the country is interested in knowing how the money was paid. If the motion of the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) were carried, there is no doubt that it would be a great benefit to the country. The transactions referred to in the report would then be fresh in the minds of the representatives of the people when parliament met. We could then take note of the report and digest it far better than under the present system of bringing down the entire report when parliament is in session. We have not time to digest it, the press has not time to go over it, and the result is that although it is a most valuable and important report, there is very little scrutiny of it by parliament, the press or the general public. For these reasons, I do not see any objection to the report being brought down in the way proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk, and therefore I will support his motion.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. R. HOLMES (West Huron). The arguments which have been advanced in support of this motion presuppose that the financial reports are prepared a considerable time before parliament meets. Whether that is the fact or not I do not know; but it seems to me that the Auditor General's Report, in its present form, assuming that it is brought down early, as it has been this year, meets the case better than would a number of volumes. Independent of that, however, the fact is that efforts have been made for some time to facilitate the work in the Printing Bureau. Those who have no technical knowledge of printing will not understand the difficulties which the management of the Bureau have had to contend with in getting out the reports promptly. They have now reached a point at which they are meeting the requirements of the House with great efficiency; and if the Auditor General's Report were divided into sections, it would simply complicate the work of the Bureau, and make it more difficult for them to issue the report promptly than it is at present. I have some practical knowledge of the matter, and, having looked into the work of the Bureau lately, I believe it is better in every way to issue the report in its present form than to divide it into sections.

Mr. SPROULE. Is not the same thing done with the report of the Committee on Agriculture? The evidence of the different witnesses is printed in sections, and at the end they are all bound up together as one report.

Mr. HOLMES. Even so, that means a great deal of work for the Printing Bureau which the hon. member for East Grey knows nothing at all about. To prepare these reports and issue them in supplementary form would be to increase the work of the Bureau instead of facilitating it, without benefit to the members of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Would it not be possible to distribute to members of parliament the various portions of the Auditor General's Report as they are made up and printed? I do not know whether the printing of the report is all done within a short period of time, or whether it is carried on from the 30th of June of one year to the opening of the session of the following year; but if the printing covers a considerable period of time, it seems to me that there could be no objection to doing what I suggest. The advantage of that would be that members could make themselves more familiar with the report than it is possible to do at present.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the Auditor General's practice is to keep his report open in order that he may bring the work down to the latest possible date before the meeting of parliament. That is one of the things of which we have occasionally complained, although of course recognizing the right of the Auditor General to inform parliament fully of everything in relation to his accounts. I quite agree that if the Auditor completed his main report he would have the right to present to the House a supplementary report at any time. Any difficulty that has occurred has not been owing to what is complained of to-day, but simply to an unusually early meeting of parliament or some other cause. But it seems to me that when the Auditor is able to get his work done and the report issued early, as it has been this year, every interest is served.

Mr. CHARLTON. The different portions of the Auditor General's Report are prepared one following the other, and many of these are ready and could be submitted to parliament long before the volume is completed. I can state that the Auditor General himself, who is perhaps as good a judge in this matter as any one else, believes that this would be a very advantageous arrangement, as it would enable him to place before members of parliament information which, if it is withheld until the whole report is completed, must be brought down at a late date, in a vast volume, when members cannot give the amount of attention to the various matters contained in the report that is desirable. For this reason, it would be an advantage to me, and in my belief to other members of parliament who desire information on public questions, to have the different portions of the Auditor General's Report issued when completed—not for public distribution, but to members of the House. It could add but slightly if at all to the cost of issuing the volume, because these parts would be assembled together and issued as a volume afterwards. I must say that I think the objections of the hon. Minister of Finance are not well founded. I have the authority of the Auditor General for saying that in his opinion this would be a very desirable and proper method to adopt.

House divided on the motion.

Bill (No. 15) respecting the River St. Clair Railway Bridge and Tunnel Company.—Mr. Ingram.

Bill (No. 18) to incorporate the Velvet (Rossland) Mine Railway Company.—Mr. Galliher.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman propose to take up government Bills on a private day with a very thin House, and, as he knows, the House is thin for very serious reasons.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not want to press hon. gentlemen opposite, if my hon. friend wants to adjourn.

PENSIONS TO NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that to-morrow the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution :

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that pensions or gratuities may be granted to officers of the North-west mounted police and to the widows and children of such officers, as follows :—

To an officer compulsorily retired, for any cause other than misconduct or inefficiency, after 20 years' service, or retiring voluntarily after 35 years' service, a pension not exceeding one-fiftieth of the pay and allowances of his rank or appointment at the time of his retirement for each year of service ; service beyond 35 years not being reckoned.

Mr. CHARLTON.

To an officer who retires voluntarily after 25 years, but less than 35 years' service, a pension 20 per cent less than is above provided for.

Towards making good the said pensions, 5 per cent to be deducted from the pay of officers.

To an officer retiring on account of infirmity, or retiring to promote efficiency or economy in the service, a gratuity not exceeding one month's pay for each year's service ; if retiring on account of injury received in the discharge of his duties, a gratuity not exceeding three months' pay for every two years' service.

To the widow and children of an officer who had served twenty years, and was at the time of his death on full pay, or in receipt of pension, the following pension or allowance :—in the case of the commissioner, $500 to the widow, and $80 to each child ; the assistant commissioner, a pension of $450 to the widow and a yearly allowance of $80 to each child ; a superintendent or surgeon, $350 to widow, and $70 to each child ; an inspector, assistant surgeon or veterinary surgeon, $250 to widow, and $65 to each child ; it being permissible to double the amount to children if they are motherless and in need ; no allowance to be granted to a son aged eighteen or a daughter aged twenty-one ; and the total amount granted to the family of an officer in one year not to exceed the amount of the pension attached to his rank.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at 8.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 6, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth) moved :

That the time for receiving petitions for private bills be extended to Friday, 28th March, inst., and that the time for presenting private bills to Friday, 4th April next, according to the recommendation contained in the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders.

He said : This corresponds with the time set by the Senate for their adjournment so that it really does not affect the time required for the transaction of the business in respect to these Bills.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Before the motion is adopted, I would like to remind the Prime Minister that he has intimated that this was intended to be a short session. That can only be accomplished by adhering as closely as possible to the rules respecting the reception of private Bills. We have to-day adopted a course which we have pursued in the past, it is true, but which if it is continued this session we cannot hope to make the session reasonably short. I would suggest to the right hon. gentleman that it would be well not to have too many repetitions of this, or otherwise the session cannot be kept within reasonable bounds.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think, Mr. Speaker, we should have no repetition of it at all, after this date.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 29) to incorporate the Sovereign Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Campbell.

Bill (No. 30) to incorporate the Sydney Land and Loan Company, Limited.—Mr. Kendall.

QUESTIONS.

STEEL RAILS—CONTRACT WITH MR. CLERGUE.

Mr. GANONG—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. How many tons of steel rails have been delivered under the contract entered into with F. H. Clergue, of Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, and at what price or prices ?
2. Where were they delivered, on what dates, and in what quantities ?
3. Where were the rails, so delivered, manufactured ?
4. Has delivery been made of all rails contracted for ? If not, how many tons are still to be delivered, at what points are deliveries to be made, and at what price or prices ?
5. Are all future deliveries to be of Canadian manufacture ?

The PRIME MINISTER. That question was answered yesterday.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The same question ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Identically. No rails were delivered by Mr. Clergue.

EASTERN EXTENSION RAILWAY, NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. BELL asked :

Is the government of Nova Scotia urging the government of Canada for a refund to the counties of Pictou, Antigonish and Guysborough of the amounts paid by these counties for right of way of the Eastern Extension Railway ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The matter has been repeatedly brought to the notice of this government by members of the provincial government, but no action has been taken upon it.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—TAX ON COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS.

Mr. KEMP asked :

1. What steps, if any, have the government taken to cancel or render ineffective certain legislation of the government of Prince Edward Island, 'in restraint of the freedom of trade,' popularly known as a 'tax on commercial travellers' from other provinces in the Dominion ?
2. After this question had 'engaged the close attention of the Honourable Minister of Justice,' in accordance with the statement made by the Honourable Minister of Marine and Fisheries (see 'Hansard' report, page 5331—1901), what was his judgment respecting same ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). The legislation in question was reported on by the Minister of Justice; carefully considered by the government and allowed to go into operation.

IMPORTS FROM THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BRODER—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

What was the total value of our imports for home consumption from the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, under the following heads : Mine, fisheries, forests, animals and their produce, agricultural products, manufactures and miscellaneous ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). The answer to this question involves the preparation of a very lengthy special statement, and it is suggested that an Order of the House be asked for a return in this case.

IMPORTATIONS THROUGH WESTERN ONTARIO PORTS.

Mr. SPROULE asked :

1. How many bushels of grain, or other seeds, were shipped through the ports of Depot Harbour, Midland, Collingwood, Meaford, Owen Sound and Sarnia respectively, during the year 1901 ?
2. How many barrels of flour ?
3. How many bags oatmeal ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). The grain and other seeds, and flour and oatmeal, shipped through the undermentioned ports during the calendar year 1901, are reported as follows, viz :

——	Grain and other seeds—Bush.	Flour—Brls.	Oatmeal—Bags.
Depot Harbour	17,524,407	143,262	.....
Midland	7,840,546	.....	.....
Collingwood	222,000	.....	.....
Meaford	1,447,222	.....	.....
Owen Sound	1,576,527	1,963	.....
Sarnia	5,624,520	297,669	.....
Goderich	2,665,420	.....	.....

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY FREIGHT RATES.

Mr. KEMP asked :

What rates per ton does the Intercolonial Railway receive for carrying pig iron from Sydney, Cape Breton, to Montreal and points west of Montreal ? What rates for carrying coal ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The Intercolonial Railway rate for carrying pig iron from Sydney to Montreal is $2.95 per ton.

2. The rate for carrying coal to the same point is $2.55 per ton. Both of these rates are conditional upon returning box cars being used, which would otherwise have to be hauled east empty.

SALE OF FORFEITED GOODS AT SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. Were tenders invited by public advertisement in the spring of 1901 by the collector of customs at North Sydney, N.S., for certain goods forfeited under the customs law ?

2. If so, how many tenders were received, the names of tenderers and amounts of their respective offers for said goods ?

3. Was any tender accepted; and if not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson) :

1. Tenders were invited by public advertisement on the 16th March, 1901, by the collector of customs at North Sydney, N.S., for goods forfeited under the customs laws.

2. Tenders were received from the following persons for the goods advertised, viz : David C. Musgrove, $607; John P. Brennan, $509.32; Charles W. Lavers, for tobacco and cigars, $113.25.

3. None of the tenders were accepted because articles covered by different seizures were not distinguished separately in the advertisement and goods which were not intended to be sold at the time were by error included in the notice for tenders.

Tenders were again invited by public advertisement and the tender of D. C. Musgrave for $591.50 for the forfeited goods (lots 1 to 5, inclusive) was accepted.

EXPENDITURE ON CANALS.

Mr. DAVIS—by Mr. Calvert—asked :

1. How much has been spent by the Dominion government on each of our canals since confederation ?

2. What has been the cost of maintenance in each case ?

3. How much revenue has been derived from same ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). The answer to this involves reading a complicated statement which I would ask the permission of the House to give to 'Hansard.' The answer is as follows :

1. Amount spent by Dominion government on each canal since confederation :

MANITOBA REFERENDUM ACT.

Mr. PUTTEE asked :

1. Has the government received a petition from the Manitoba Prohibition Alliance urging, on constitutional grounds, the disallowance of the Referendum Act of 1902 ?

2. If so, has any decision been arrived at, and what is it ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Hon. H. G. Carroll) :

1. Yes, upon grounds claimed by petitioners to be constitutional.

2. No.

THE ALASKA BOUNDARY.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to say that in looking over the Debates of yesterday, I find that references were made to certain remarks I made some time ago in regard to a declaration made by Sir Louis Davies with reference to the Alaska boundary. I have not with me to-day the papers with which to justify my statement, but I will bring them to-morrow ; and, before the Orders of the Day are called, I will read a letter which I received from Sir Louis Davies to that effect.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL—SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) delivered a message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message as follows :—

MINTO.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, supplementary estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1902, and in accordance with the provisions of ' The British North America Act, 1867,' the Governor General recommends these estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, March 6, 1902.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved :

That the message of His Excellency, together with the estimates accompanying it, be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

COLONIAL TROOPS IN DEFENCE OF THE EMPIRE.

Mr. DOMINIQUE MONET (Laprairie and Napierville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) to a telegram from London, that was published this very morning by the Ottawa ' Citizen,' and which reads as follows :

London, March 5.—The war office scheme mentioned by the war secretary, Mr. Brodrick, in the House of Commons yesterday evening, by which he hoped the colonial forces would become available in the event of war involving the general interests of the empire, is said to-day to contemplate India providing three army corps, South Africa two army corps, Australia two army corps, New Zealand one army corps and Canada four militia army corps.

These in addition to six British army corps would constitute a force for Imperial defence little inferior in numbers to the legions of the continental military powers.

The Montreal ' Gazette,' in its issue of this morning, reproduces this telegram and gives the very words used by Mr. Brodrick on the floor of the English House of Commons. He said :

I trust it may be possible that an arrangement may be made by which the whole forces of the empire would be available in case of war in which the whole of the empire would be involved. An opportunity for conferring with our colonial friends on this subject will occur at the time of the Coronation.

When this telegram is published in the evening papers, I do not think I am wide from the mark when I say that it will arouse the public opinion and create a sensation throughout the country. May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister to tell us whether, in his opinion the information conveyed by this telegram is well founded or not ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the government has had no information whatever up to the present time of the declarations alleged to have been made by the hon. Mr. Brodrick. No communication of any kind with regard to any scheme of military defense to be applied to the empire has been received by us, and I think that when the exact words of Mr. Brodrick are brought to our attention, it will be found that he has been misrepresented. As to the intention said to have been indicated by Mr. Brodrick of taking up this matter of Imperial defence for discussion at the conference which is to take place next summer, the correspondence which will be brought down in a few days, in answer to a motion which was passed by the House some time ago, will show the attitude of this government on that question.

TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York) moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) respecting Telephone Companies.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would ask my hon. friend to allow this to stand, in view of the measure which the government has brought in on the same subject.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, but I would point out, for the information of the hon. leader of the House and the House itself, that my Bill may contain provisions not contained in the government measure, and there should be no objection to my Bill being read the second time and going to the committee, and the two Bills being considered there together. That being the case, I do not intend to take up much of the time of the House to-day in moving the second reading of this Bill. The object of this Bill is to comply with a widespread public expression in favour of some kind of regulation of the telephone companies of this country. It has been found that these companies have not been treating the public fairly, and this parliament has been besieged with petitions from all over the country in favour of some measure of this kind. At the present time they are under no regulation, and they do with the public pretty much as they choose. Just take two or three instances in point. These companies, like other great companies, are incorporated to do a certain business, and are given a great franchise; but there is no compelling clause in their charters to force them to give the public a reasonable service, a cheap service, or a service wherever the public may demand it. It is high time that some means should be adopted for compelling these companies to treat the public fairly.

The Bill which I have introduced provides for the regulation and control of the rates of all telephone companies. It further provides that these companies shall give equal treatment to every section of the community, and that every company shall give the use of its wires to any other company that may desire to use them at tolls to be regulated by the government. In England they have very strict and up-to-date legislation in regard to telephone companies. The charters of all such companies in England cease in 1911. Before they can do business they must be licensed by the Postmaster General, and must have their rates approved by the government; and in every way provision is made by which local or municipal authorities who wish to establish a telephone service of their own, will be enabled to do so. I am looking forward to having provisions of a similar character put into this Bill, so that not only will the rates of every company be regulated, but it will be compelled to give exchange rates to any other telephone company, and will be prevented from discriminating against municipalities which wish to establish their own telephone systems. Mark what has happened in the case of several municipalities in this country which desired to establish local telephone services. Immediately that they announced their intention of doing so, the Bell Telephone Company cut their rates down to $3 or $5 a year in order to close up the local competing company. This Bill provides that if they do that in one locality, they must do it all over the country. In that way they would be prevented from choking off local competition. In Ontario provision has already been made in the Municipal Act whereby municipalities can go into the telephone business, and can borrow money for that purpose; but if any municipality desired to have an exchange over the system of the Bell Telephone Company, it would probably be blocked. My Bill provides that every telephone company shall give equal service to everybody who applies for it. I have been told that this would be interfering with their rights. If we compel them to give the use of their system to local companies, they will be paid for it and are not going to lose anything. The great argument used is that we will be interfering with the Bell Telephone Company by compelling it to give fair treatment to local companies, but it will be very well paid, even though the rates they receive be regulated by the government.

The Bill introduced by the hon. the Minister of Justice proposes to put the control of the telephone companies under the jurisdiction of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. I think it would be better to vest the jurisdiction, as is done in England, in the Postmaster General. In England the Postmaster General has the fullest control over all these telephone companies. He can license them, revise their rates, and compel them all to use the trunk lines which are owned by the government in connection with the post office.

I do not intend to go over the other details of my Bill, as they will be fully threshed out in the committee.

I am told that my Bill will interfere with certain municipal rights. If that be the case, I am prepared to consent to an amendment which will get rid of that objection. However, I do not believe that a Dominion charter can override the municipal right, but it may be better to put in a provision protecting the municipalities, and I am prepared to listen to any recommendation made on their behalf.

I would move the second reading of my Bill, on the understanding that it will go to the Committee of Railways and be considered at the same time as the Bill introduced by the Minister of Justice.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). If my hon. friend really has in view the control by the government of Canada of the telephone companies, his Bill entirely fails to accomplish that object. However, it is idle to spend our time discussing its details. My hon. friend has fully explained his measure, and when it comes before the Railway Committee, its various provisions will be thoroughly discussed. My hon. friend suggests that the control of rates should be within the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General. That suggestion is worthy of being considered. But when he refers to what is done in England, I would remind him that in this country the telegraph companies are not within the control of the Postmaster General as they are in the mother country. In the hon. gentleman's own Bill, he omitted to make any provision for any control by the Postmaster General, so that his suggestion to this effect is evidently one that has occurred to him lately, and no doubt he will explain his change of opinion before the committee.

Mr. MACLEAN. If my Bill does not secure government control of the rates, I hope the Bill of my hon. friend does, and in that case I will make way for him.

Mr. CLARKE. Might I ask the Minister of Justice if both Bills are to be considered at the same time by the Railway Committee ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. That of course is a matter for the Railway Committee to decide, but in my opinion it would be better that they should be.

Mr. CLARKE. I suppose that reasonable time will be given the municipalities, after the hon. gentleman's Bill has been printed and distributed, to give most careful consideration to both Bills and to be heard before the Railway Committee.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am having a hundred additional copies printed of my Bill, and have arranged that hon. gentlemen may be enabled to send them to the municipalities interested.

Mr. CLARKE. That arrangement is quite satisfactory.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would ask that arrangements be made to print extra copies of my Bill also, as a number of municipalities have asked me for copies.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAYS.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin) moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act with respect to drainage. He said: This Bill is of a similar nature to that introduced a few days ago by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan), and I would like to have it sent to the committee at the same time, so that both Bills may be considered together. The farmers in my constituency are very much interested in this measure. There are four different railway corporations doing business there and one which comes within a mile of the place. No doubt railways are of great benefit to the farmers, but they also frequently do considerable injury to the lands through which they pass. Fences, timber and crops on these lands frequently suffer considerable damage from the operations of a railway. Many years ago, when railways were first built, the question of drainage was not given sufficient consideration, and many railway companies have refused to give proper drainage. There is no law compelling them to do so, and I hope that this parliament will see that the farmers get justice in this matter. Last year a similar Bill to this was referred to a sub-committee, composed of eleven members, and that committee reported favourably upon some of the clauses. This year I hope that the whole matter will be taken up again and the farmers satisfied.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

ANGLO-GERMAN COMMERCIAL AGREEMENT.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). I think that, with the permission of the House, I ought to change the wording of the resolution which stands in my name. I gave notice of a motion for :

> Copy of all correspondence, despatches and memoranda which may have passed between the British government and the Canadian government relating to the new Anglo-German Treaty of Commerce.

The arrangement arrived at between Great Britain and Germany in the early part of 1898 was not a new treaty. The treaty of 1865 had been denounced, and went out of course; and in 1898, an agreement was arrived at but not an agreement having the solemnity of a treaty. I would, therefore, with the permission of the House change the wording of this motion to this :

> All correspondence which may have passed between the British government and the Canadian government relating to the new Anglo-German Commercial Agreement of 1898.

This would cover the object I have in view and would avoid describing as a treaty what is, as I understand it, a mere commercial arrangement for a certain time. After what has been decided by this House, I feel that in proposing this arrangement, I and those who join with me in calling for these papers are leading a forlorn hope. It seems evident, under the interpretation of our constitutional usages which has been given, that, in the opinion of the majority of hon. members of this House, the representatives of the people, even though met not merely for the purpose of voting supplies but for the purpose of passing judgment on the administration in general, cannot demand to be put in possession of information which will enable them to form a proper judgment of the doings of the government. I shall not again go over the authorities which I had the honour to quote to you and to this House on a proposition with which, I take it, the members of the House are now absolutely familiar. I believe I am right in stating that the Commons of Canada, as well as the Commons of England, after the final adoption of any act of the government, diplomatic, or otherwise, are entitled to have laid before them the correspondence had by the government, and, as representing the people to judge in the light of that correspondence the acts of the government. This motion addresses itself to just such a series of acts. After the denunciation of the Anglo-German treaty of 1865, negotiations were at once entered into by the British government and the German government for a renewal of commercial relations between those countries.

The public and parliament of England were made aware at an early date after the denunciation of that treaty—one has only to examine the English 'Hansard' to be convinced of the fact—that negotiations were going on. What we desire to know to-day, and what I submit this House has a right to know, is what representations were made to the British government by our own authorities in regard to our interests when the new commercial agreement was arranged and was to come into force. It is evident from the agreement which was arrived at in 1898 that we had a paramount interest, since, as a result of that agreement, Great Britain and, if I mistake not, all the British dependencies were given the advantage of the most-favoured nation clause, and Canada alone was excluded from the benefit of that agreement, thereby causing an appreciable impediment to our grain trade with the German Empire. Since then there has been a falling off instead of an increase in our trade with Germany. It must be evident to every member of this House, as it requires no argument to show, that having been transferred from the tariff as it stood in 1897 to a higher tariff, having been deprived of the most-favoured nation clause under the new agreement of 1898, we in Canada stand to-day in a more unfavourable position than we did previous to the consummation of that agreement.

Now, what have been in the meantime the endeavours made by this government which was so anxious, if we are to take the declarations made a long time ago by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to open up new avenues of trade with every country in the world, if possible? What have been the endeavours made by this government to see, as it was their duty to see, that the interests of this country should be protected? When the time arrived to make the final agreement between England and Germany in 1898, no doubt this government took great pains to make representations to the British government to prevent the unfortunate ending of the negotiations, to prevent this country from being excluded, as it is specially excluded, singled out for exclusion, from the benefits to be derived from the new agreement? Memoranda must have passed between both governments; and it is not only our duty to ourselves to have this memoranda and that correspondence before us, but I submit it is the duty of the government, in face of that agreement as we read it, to disculpate itself, and to show that, having boasted that it has obtained the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties, and made, as they say, of this country a nation, it is their duty to show that they have taken up the role which appertains to a young nation, that they have done their very best to see that our interests were protected at the time the agreement was made to which this motion refers, the agreement of 1898. What conclusion, Mr. Speaker, must we arrive at if the government should refuse to give us that correspondence? There will be but one conclusion throughout the country, and I submit it will be a fair conclusion, namely, that there is no correspondence; that the government have failed in their duty to make those representations to the home government which, if properly made, would have had undoubtedly the effect of assuring to us a continuance of the German market for our agricultural produce, and particularly for our grain. I say that if the government refuses, as it has already done on similiar occasions, to lay before the representatives of the people the correspondence in question, it will produce in the public mind a well-founded conviction, either that those representations were wrongly made, were not made with that insistence with which they should have been made under the circumstances, or else that no representations were made at all; that those gentlemen were so busy arranging their own difficulties amongst themselves that they forgot their duty upon that important point; that they were so busy, like the Macduffs and the Macbeths, in 'laying on' to one another, that they did not cry 'hold! enough!' or take up sufficient time to make in a dignified and firm way to the Imperial government, those representations which I have no doubt would have been listened to if they had been made properly and at the proper time.

Sir, it is a circumstance which I think should be mentioned, that all the correspondence having reference to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been laid before the British parliament, conformably to the usages which obtain in England. Mr. Speaker, the convention by which the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was abrogated was signed at Washington on February 5, 1900; and conformably, as I have said, to the usage which has obtained in England since they have true parliamentary government, since they have responsible government, since ministers are obliged to submit every one of their acts to the judgment of the people's representatives, scarcely a month had passed before the whole correspondence was laid before the British parliament, although we have hitherto vainly sought to obtain it here. Why have we not that correspondence here? It can be obtained for a penny.

But, it seems somewhat strange that in the home of liberty and constitutional practice, the members of the House of Commons, on the 25th of March, and the members of the House of Lords, on the 25th of March, 1901, should have had all that correspondence before them, and that we, in this country, who only participated and could only have participated incidentally in the conclusion of the convention, we British subjects, claiming to have the same rights as they have in England, are deprived of that correspondence which has been laid before the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England, and that we should be obliged to address ourselves to the mother country, to correspond with members of parliament in England, or with friends on the other side to obtain that which had been produced to them, which was laid before the representatives of the people about a month, as I have stated, after the convention of the 5th of February, 1901, abrogating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which had been finally concluded at Washington. I know that it is not the right of any member of this House to criticise the decisions of this House, and I have too much respect for the rules of the House and for the House itself to allow myself to transgress that rule, but I think I am not going too far when I say that the anomalous spectacle of the representatives of the people of England having before them the correspondence in question and our own representatives of the people in this country being deprived of it, may lead some people in this country and in the other country from which we derive our free political institutions, to wonder if we are, to use the language of the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), going forward, or if, in reality, we are not, under this government going backward, and will be obliged to fight for our liberties over again. I appeal, Mr. Speaker, to my colleagues from the province of Quebec, with whom I am perhaps more familiar, more intimate, than with my colleagues from the other provinces, to say whether they are not in favour of the fullest and most entire knowledge being conveyed to the members of this House of each and every act of the government, to say whether we are to return to the old idea of an absolute division between the executive and the legislative power, or whether we are to conform to the principle which without any doubt obtains in England to-day that the executive power, the ministry of the day, constitutes nothing in reality but a committee of the House of Commons, a committee of parliament, and that the parliament of which the administration is only a committee has a right to the amplest and the fullest knowledge of every act of the government. We hear a great deal sometimes from these hon. gentlemen in respect to the rights of parliament, but I appeal to my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Angers), for instance, to say whether he does not support my contention on this point. I feel that in moving for this correspondence I will have the support of my hon. friend from Laprairie (Mr. Monet), and indeed, Sir, the question seems to me to be such a simple one, it seems to me we are so clearly entitled to the communication of every one of the representations made and memoranda written to the British government by this government during the year and a half that elapsed between the denunciation of the treaty and the final making of this new agreement of 1898, that I venture to say that any hon. member of this House who votes against our obtaining communication of this memoranda will be, in reality, denying to this House one of its oldest and most precious privileges.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has displayed a great deal of mock heroics without any adequate cause at all. He knows very well that there is no reason for him on this occasion to say that he is going to fight for the liberties of the people and the rights of parliament. He will not be called upon to go to such extremities as that. He knows very well that there is not even cause for any interference with parliament on this occasion, but the weakness of the position which he has assumed is such that he has made a strong effort to rebuke the House for the decision it took yesterday. If he has not forgotten the authorities which he quoted yesterday he knows that the one exception which is made to the standing rule that parliament is to be placed in possession of every act of the government relates to matters which are still under consideration. My hon. friend says that the parliament of Great Britain has been more favoured than the parliament of Canada because the parliament of Great Britain has had communication of all the correspondence in regard to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The matter is at an end so far as the government of Great Britain is concerned. There was no reason, therefore, why the rule should not apply. But, the matter is still pending so far as Canada and the people of Canada are concerned. If the hon. gentleman looks into this correspondence—I have had no occasion to look into it—but, I am sure that none of the representations which have been made by Canada in regard to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the settlement of the Alaskan boundary will be found in that correspondence, because the matter is still under consideration. And so it is in regard to this very question we have here. We have made representations, we are still negotiating, and I may say to the hon. gentleman that we are not only negotiating with the government of Great Britain, but that, so far as we can, also, although we cannot do it formally, we have made representations to the government of Germany, not officially, of course, because we are not in a position to do so, not having the right to make our own treaties, but so far as we can make representations informally in order to plead our own case with Germany, we have done so. The matter is still pending. The communications which have been addressed by us and which are under the consideration of the government of Germany, have not yet been answered; yet, the hon. gentleman would have us bring down that correspondence and therefore spoil all these negotiations or any effect they could have hereafter. I am surprised at the insistence of my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) in asking to place the House in possession of correspondence which is still pending, and to publish which would therefore be in direct violation of this very rule for which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) is ready to fight and to shed his blood. I have only to make the statement to the House, that the correspondence is still pending and therefore there is no reason why this motion should be granted, and it cannot be granted.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) saw fit to taunt the hon. member (Mr. Monk) with his desire to fight, he might have recalled the days when the right hon. gentleman himself proclaimed that he was ready to shoulder his musket on the banks of the Saskatchewan. I suppose my right hon. friend, on that occasion thought that he was about to shoulder his musket in defence of the constitutional liberties of this country, and therefore I see no reason why he should reproach my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) with being willing to follow the example which he himself has given. If my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has been indulging in mock heroics, what was the right hon. gentleman indulging in when he made that profession to the country on a former occasion. The right hon. gentleman should have a better memory. He has reproached me sometimes with a poor memory, but apparently his own memory has failed to-day and he has not recalled the past quite as vividly as he might have done, or otherwise he would not have used that language in reference to my hon. friend (Mr. Monk).

With regard to the motion itself I think it is highly desirable that this House should have information as to the stand this government has taken on this question. There are several reasons for that. In the first place, we have an illustration of what may have taken place in the past, by comparing the despatch of Lord Lansdowne concerning the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, with the stand which has been taken by members of this government respecting that very matter. Lord Lansdowne, in his despatch, took the ground most clearly and distinctly that the British empire in the right of Canada, was most distinctly especially interested in the question as to whether or not that treaty should be abrogated. I venture to think that we will look in vain for any intimation from the right hon. gentleman himself, or from any member of his government, to show us that this government has ever seen fit to take, with the Imperial government, such a stand as that. Otherwise, how is it that after a stand of that kind was taken by Lord Lansdowne we should find so complete a change of face to have been made by the Imperial government as that which resulted in the abrogation of this treaty without any word of settlement whatever respecting the Alaskan boundary question.

I come more immediately to the question now before the House. In view of the language of the Finance Minister last year when he practically justified the action of Germany, is it not right that we should know whether or not this government in its communications with the Imperial government on that important subject to this country, took the ground that the Minister of Finance took in this House, when he practically justified the action of Germany, because forsooth he said : We have discriminated against Germany and therefore Germany had a right to discriminate against us. I do not pretend to be quoting the words of the Finance Minister exactly, but I venture to think that any hon. gentleman who looks up 'Hansard' will find that is practically the stand which the Finance Minister took last year in this House. Under these circumstances I think it is high time that this House should be informed of the position of the government in regard to this matter. It was brought to the attention of the government during the debate on the Address last year ; it was brought again to the attention of the government in the debate upon the motion to go into Supply when the Minister of Finance delivered his budget speech. Notwithstanding that, the government came down this year with a Speech from the Throne dealing with many matters of the most trivial character and not saying one word to this House or to this country with regard to so important a question as that. That, Sir, would seem to indicate that the government is not seized in this matter with the view which prevails throughout the country as to its importance. If we can judge by the utterances of the ministers, they do not seem to realize that this matter is of the importance which is attached to it throughout the country. In the light of the action of the government with regard to this, in view of the fact that they have taken no action ; that their public utterances seem to indicate that they think that no action is necessary ; it seems to me that the House is justified in asking to have exact information as to the course which has been taken by this government with the Imperial government respecting this most important matter, and that the papers which have been moved for by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), should be brought down for the information of the House.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker. It is quite certain now that the government have not protected the interests of Canada in connection with this German matter. If we want any evidence as to their incompetence to protect the rights of Canada, we need not go further than their conduct with regard to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I wish to direct the House for a moment to one or two of the main points bearing upon that matter. On February 22, 1901, just about a year ago, Lord Lansdowne did write a despatch, and this despatch is, I say, the charter of the liberties of Canada as regards the negotiations conducted by the mother country with outside nations on behalf of this country. There is in that despatch, to be found the charter of Canadian liberty. There never was such a declaration of the right of Canada to be considered in all these negotiations, as there is in that despatch of Lord Lansdowne. For the information of the House I intend to read that despatch to-day. It was in reference to the proposal to establish a new treaty between the United States and Great Britain dealing with the Nicaragua canal, and in his communication to Lord Pauncefote the Marquis of Lansdowne used the following words—and I wish the House to pay particular attention to them :

'So far as Her Majesty's government were concerned, there was no desire to procure a modification of that convention. Some of its provisions had, however, for a long time past been regarded with disfavour by the government of the United States, and in the President's message to congress of December, 1898, it was suggested, with reference to a concession granted by the government of Nicaragua, that some definite action by congress was urgently required if the labours of the past were to be utilized, and the linking of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by a practical waterway to be realized. It was further urged that the construction of such a maritime highway was more than ever indispensable to that intimate and ready intercommunication between the eastern and western seaboards of the United States demanded by the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands and the prospective expansion of American influence and commerce in the Pacific, and that the national policy called more imperatively than ever for the control of the projected highway by the government of the United States.

This passage in the message having excited comment, Your Excellency made inquiries of the Secretary of State in order to elicit some information as to the attitude of the President.

In reply, the views of the United States' government were very frankly and openly explained. You were also most emphatically assured that the President had no intention whatever of ignoring the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and that he would loyally observe treaty stipulations. But in view of the strong national feeling in favour of the construction of the Nicaragua canal, and of the improbability of the work being accomplished by private enterprise, the United States' government were prepared to undertake it themselves upon obtaining the necessary powers from congress. For that purpose, however, they must endeavour, by friendly negotiation, to obtain the consent of Great Britain to such a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as would, without affecting the general principle therein declared, enable the great object in view to be accomplished for the benefit of the commerce of the world. Although the time had hardly arrived for the institution of formal negotiations to that end, congress not having yet legislated, the United States government, nevertheless, were most anxious that Your Excellency should enter at once into pourparlers with a view to preparing, for consideration, a scheme of arrangement.

Her Majesty's government agreed to this proposal, and the discussion which took place in consequence resulted in the draft convention which Mr. Hay handed to Your Excellency on the 11th January, 1899.

At that time the Joint High Commission, over which the late Lord Herschell presided, was still sitting. That commission was appointed in July, 1898, to discuss various questions at issue between Great Britain and the United States, namely, the fur-seal fishery, the fisheries off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, the Alaskan boundary, alien labour laws, reciprocity, transit of merchandise, mining rights, naval vessels on the great lakes, definition and marking of frontiers, and conveyance of persons in custody. But serious difficulties had arisen in the attempt to arrive at an understanding, and it had become doubtful whether any settlement would be affected.

In reply, therefore, to a request for a speedy answer with regard to the convention, the Marquess of Salisbury informed Mr. White, the American chargé d'affaires, that he could not help contrasting the precarious prospects and slowness of the negotiations which were being conducted by Lord Herschell with the rapidity of decision proposed in the matter of the convention. Her Majesty's government might be reproached with having come to a precipitate agreement on a proposal which was exclusively favourable to the United States, while they had come to no agreement at all on the controversy where there was something to be conceded on both sides.

Shortly afterwards Lord Herschell intimated that the difficulties in regard to the question of the Alaskan boundary seemed insuperable, and that he feared it might be necessary to break off the negotiations of which he had hitherto had the charge. Upon this Lord Salisbury informed Mr. White that he did not see how Her Majesty's government could sanction any convention for amending the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as the opinion of this country would hardly support them in making a concession which would be wholly to the benefit of the United States, at a time when they appeared to be so little inclined to come to a satisfactory settlement in regard to the Alaskan frontier.

These two last paragraphs are, as I said before, the charter of the liberties of Canada in the matter of negotiations with outside nations. There is a statement contained in that extract which I have read, quoting the opinion of Lord Salisbury, the former foreign secretary of England, and that opinion is reinforced by the present foreign secretary, Lord Lansdowne, who was a Governor General of Canada ; who was the greatest British statesman ever identified with the government of this country, and who to-day is the equal of any statesman in Europe. He endorsed the doctrine laid down by Lord Salisbury : That no convention should be made unless the rights of Canada in connection with the Alaskan boundary should be discussed and should be settled at the same time.

I say that is the charter of our liberties as regards these negotiations, though it is not contained in an Act of parliament. It happens to be contained in that Imperial despatch ; but many of the great liberties of the British and Canadian people are contained in just such documents as this. When that statement was made, and it was put on record that there should be no settlement of this question until the Alaskan boundary question was settled, a way was opened for securing the rights of Canada. But the rights of Canada were completely ignored ; and why ? Because we had an incompetent government in power in Canada who, when they knew that the British government had taken that stand, failed to insist on the British government maintaining it. They abandoned the whole case of Canada and allowed the Americans to have their own way and get everything they demanded. Nor is it strange, when you investigate the history of hon. gentlemen opposite, to find them neglecting the interests of this country. They are the party of commercial union. They sent the senator from Ontario to go to the Boston meeting to promote commercial union. They preached the doctrine that this is the continent to which we belong. They are the party who throughout their whole history have been ready to abandon the rights of Canada and to allow the United States to ride rough shod over us. That is the charge we make to-day—that they have completely ignored the interests of Canada in connection with this German treaty ; that they failed to put in a proper protest : that they did nothing. They are also the party, who in connection with our trade relations with the mother country, have been ready to give a preference without getting any preference in return. That is not protecting the rights of Canada ; that is not true Canadian statesmanship. They are also the party who were willing to allow their leading man to become a picturesque figure in the jubilee procession, but were not willing to accept the offer of a trade preference to Canada when it was held out to them. In their whole record we find that they have been ever ready to abandon the interests of Canada, and by a side wind to advance the interests of the United States. Now, we are sick and tired of that in this country. We want statesmen like Sir John Macdonald who, in connection with the Washington treaty, made it clear that he would not consent to anything which was against the interests of Canada. He never sacrificed the interests of his country, and he never had such an opportunity as hon. gentlemen opposite had to hold the British government to such a magnificent declaration as that contained in the despatch of Lord Lansdowne. There never was such a declaration made before ; and, by reason of the fact that Lord Lansdowne was then in control of the Foreign Office, and, by reason of his experience in Canada, he had a thorough knowledge of affairs in America, and especially of the interests of Canada, and was prepared to stand by them ; and he had the support of Lord Salisbury in doing so ; but, so far as we know, there is no declaration on the part of any Canadian statesman showing that hon. gentlemen opposite insisted on Lord Lansdowne, Lord Salisbury and the British government standing by that declaration of theirs, or offered any protest when it was abandoned. They allowed it to be swept to the four winds, and the Americans got everything they demanded. They got the right to build that canal and to override every contention which Canada has put forward, while we got nothing, and our case was allowed to stand over. The same thing is happening in connection with this German treaty, and the same thing will continue to happen so long as we have unpatriotic men at the head of the affairs of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MACLEAN. Yes, I say that the affairs of this country are in the hands of unpatriotic men. They are the men who were commercial unionists a few years ago, who had no faith in Canada, who told us that Canada would only succeed by the favour or grace of the United States. They are the men who told us that preferential trade with the mother country did not amount to anything. They are the men who are ready to sacrifice our interests in order to give a preference to the mother country in our markets. That is not the view Canadians hold. They want public men who will insist on their rights, and will defend their rights. If they do not, they will put men in office who will. The reason I say that hon. gentlemen opposite ought to be dispossessed of power, and dispossessed to-day is that, so far as we know, they have failed to protect the rights of Canada when that great opportunity presented itself last August. So far as we know they did nothing. When asked to bring down the papers, they had an opportunity to tell us whether they had done anything or not in connection with the German treaty ; but they have evidently done nothing. That German treaty is a detriment to Canada. It is the outcome of the miserable preference which hon. gentlemen opposite gave two years ago. I repudiate that preference. It is contrary to the interests of Canada. It is contrary to national policy; it is against the interests of Canadian workmen and Canadian factories. It is giving something to the manufacturers and workingmen of England, and to German and other foreign manufacturers, at the expense of the Canadian manufacturer and the Canadian workingman. That is not the way to show your loyalty to the mother country. The way to show your loyalty, as I said before, is by sending troops when she needs them—doing something for the nation, not for individual Englishmen who happen to be manufacturers or workingmen. I say I repudiate that preference; it is unpatriotic and un-Canadian, and this misunderstanding with Germany is the outcome of it. And all this is because hon. gentlemen opposite are wrong in their whole policy. They have always been shilly-shallying with the trade question, and have always been getting into trouble. If they had been honest protectionists, as they profess to be now——

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). No, no.

Mr. MACLEAN. Do I hear the hon. member for South Oxford say that he is not an honest protectionist?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Certainly not.

Mr. MACLEAN. Is he a dishonest one? He sits there as a defender of the national policy.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, by no means.

Mr. MACLEAN. Why has he not repudiated it? Why has he not left the government which is maintaining it?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman does not know the difference between a tariff for revenue and a protective tariff.

Mr. MACLEAN. The hon. Minister of Public Works says it is a protective tariff, but not sufficiently so, and he wants to make it more protective. I gather now that there is a storm coming and that John of Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is to have his jacket warmed in a very few days by Richard of Oxford. When that comes, it will simply be an additional evidence that this government has no fixed or determined policy and is sacrificing the interests of Canada on every possible occasion. It has sacrificed them in the past, and is prepared again to do so, when the greatest opportunity ever yet presented to a Canadian statesman will present itself in June next. This government has been invited to send over a delegate to meet the other colonial representatives and the British authorities with the view of arranging some kind of inter-Imperial trade relation. Can we trust hon. gentlemen opposite to take part in these negotiations in view of the record they have made in connection with the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? They will go over there prepared to be gold bricked, prepared to give a preference and get nothing in return, as they have done already, and will be received in the capital of the world as 'rubes' prepared to give away everything. There is any amount of evidence that hon. gentlemen opposite are not competent to protect our interests in connection with foreign affairs. As a matter of fact they have no defence to offer and cannot show that they have done anything to protect the interests of Canada in connection with the German treaty.

Mr. A. E. KEMP (East Toronto). I presume that, so far as the discussion in relation to the documents pertaining to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is concerned, that incident is now closed. But, if the right hon. the Prime Minister had known yesterday that these documents, or a portion of them, were made public in the Imperial House of Commons nearly two years ago, I think that his attitude would have been entirely different.

As regards the motion now before the House for the correspondence between this government and the government of Great Britain regarding the question of German discrimination, this discrimination has been going on some four or five years, and I do not see that the government is any nearer a settlement of the matter than when it first took it up. It seems to me that sufficient time has elapsed to entitle us to have the documents produced and laid on the Table. The right hon. the Prime Minister has been made aware on many occasions through public bodies in this country, of the situation. In Toronto, in December of 1900, a deputation waited upon him to urge that something should be done. He then described the situation as a German boycott of Canadian products. On July 25, 1901, the Toronto Board of Trade again presented a petition to the government on this question. The Montreal Board of Trade also approached the government as well as the Montreal Corn Exchange, and urged it to do something. In its petition to His Excellency in Council, the Montreal Corn Exchange said:

> Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that Your Excellency in Council will be pleased to take into consideration the matter of said tariff discrimination by Germany against Canada, with a view of adopting the course usually pursued by other nations under like circumstances, i.e., the imposing of such increased duties on German goods imported into Canada as may demonstrate to the German government the inexpediency of continuing to withhold from this country the most-favoured nation treatment it formerly enjoyed.

It has been said by the right hon. the Prime Minister that we have no treaty making power. That being the case, what is our position ? Great Britain, being a free trade country, is unable to make reciprocity treaties with other nations, and can be of no help to us in this matter, so that it becomes a serious question what are we going to do, if other nations besides Germany pursue the same course. The position of our producers is this : When our products were allowed to go into Germany on the same conditions as those of the United States, one of our largest grain exporters in this country exported into Germany, by way of Montreal, in the year 1897-8, 1,767,397 bushels of grain, and by way of Portland, 1,549,842. Since then this same firm has only exported 73,727 bushels from Montreal and 70,000 bushels by way of Portland to Germany. True, after this discrimination took place, a very large amount of Canadian products found their way to Germany through the United States and were classified by the Germans as American products. But the Germans, having discovered this practice, now insist on certificates of the origin of the production so as to show that these are Canadian.

They discriminate against us now to the extent of 50 per cent more duty on wheat, oats and rye, and 40 per cent more duty on peas, than they levy upon the products of the United States. It may be said that our trade was very small with Germany and has not decreased very much. Well, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that in the commodities which we can produce, the United States has increased their exports since 1897 to Germany about 100 per cent. Our position is peculiar in this respect, while we take from Germany about three of four times as much in value as we send there, on the other hand the United States sent to Germany nearly double what they buy. And although we allow German products to come in here at a tariff half that of the United States, yet Germany sees fit to subject us to this humiliating and unfair discrimination. I claim that there should be no pretense of state secret in regard to this correspondence. Four or five years were ample time for the government to do something, and so far it has done nothing. Nor is it at all likely to in the future. The attitude of the German government has been so far that of a bully. Such is practically the description given of it by the London correspondent of the New York 'Tribune.' When these resolutions were passed by the Montreal Board of Trade and the Toronto Board of Trade, that correspondent thus discussed the attitude of the Germans; they threaten that, if the government yields to the demands of the Montreal bodies, they will bring their influence to bear so as to have the general German tariff on Canadian goods increased by 50 per cent.

Now, what position do we occupy ? Suppose that the United States were treated in this way by Germany, how long would Germany be allowed to discriminate against the products of the United States ? I venture to say that they would not discriminate for more than twenty-four hours. Look at the position of Russia at the time when the United States put a duty on Russian petroleum. I do not think there was any danger of petroleum being sent from Russia to the United States—that would be like carrying coals to Newcastle. But, the moment the United States did that, the Russian government at once retaliated in such a way that the Americans saw fit to remove the duty that they had put on. Therefore, I contend that there is only one way for this country to deal with Germany. Our government should take into consideration how they can so arrange the tariff of this country as to protect ourselves in cases of this kind, if we are unable, through the mother country, to get justice. Germany, of all the nations of the world, is the last from which we should accept unjust treatment. What has been the position of Germany with regard to the British Empire for the last two or three years ? What has been her position with regard to British troops in South Africa ? Her position has been one of misrepresentation and abuse. I consider that the attitude of Germany towards Great Britain, and towards the British Empire, of which we form part, has been a most unjust and most unreasonable one. They have looked forward to the downfall of the British Empire, and have considered what portions of the empire might fall to them should that downfall take place. They are the greediest nation on the face of the earth, and their attitude with respect to this discrimination against Canada is their attitude in all trade matters. It is a day of extreme commercialism and extreme materialism in Germany. Their attitude to Great Britain concerning the war in South Africa has been dictated by no higher consideration than their commercial advancement. I hope the government will see fit to lay these documents on the Table of the House.

Motion negatived.

PENSIONS TO NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

House went into committee on the following resolution :—

That it is expedient to provide that pensions or gratuities may be granted to officers of the North-west mounted police and to the widows and children of such officers, as follows :—

To an officer compulsorily retired, for any cause other than misconduct or inefficiency, after 20 years service, or retiring voluntarily after 55 years service, a pension not exceeding one-fiftieth of the pay and allowance of his rank or appointment at the time of his retirement for each year of service ; service beyond 35 years not being reckoned.

To an officer who retires voluntarily after 25 years, but less than 35 years service, a pension 20 per cent less than is above provided for.

Towards making good the said pensions, 5 per cent to be deducted from the pay of officers.

To an officer retiring on account of infirmity, or retiring to promote efficiency or economy in the service, a gratuity not exceeding one month's pay for each years service ; if retiring on account of injury received in the discharge of his duties, a gratuity not exceeding three month's pay for every two years service.

To the widow and children of an officer who had served twenty years, and was at the time of his death on full pay, or in receipt of pension, the following pension or allowance :—In the case of the commissioner, $500 to the widow, and $80 to each child ; the assistant commissioner, a pension of $450 to widow and a yearly allowance of $80 to each child ; a superintendant or surgeon, $350 to widow, and $70 to each child ; an inspector, assistant surgeon or veterinary surgeon, $250 to widow, and $65 to each child ; it being permissible to double the amount to children if they are motherless and in need ; no allowance to be granted to a son aged eighteen or a daughter aged twenty-one ; and the total amount granted to the family of an officer in one year not to exceed the amount of the pension attached to his rank.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Mr. Chairman, I venture to express the hope that the resolutions which are now before you will receive the very favourable consideration of the committee. They are exactly similar to the resolutions that were introduced last year to provide pensions for the militia. By the North-west Mounted Police Act, which has been in force now for many years, constables are allowed a pension, but the officers have been denied that privilege. Last year a Bill was introduced to give pensions to officers of the militia, which Bill, I may say, was received with great favour by the House, and elicited nothing but favourable criticism and the sanction of both sides of the House. Now, without making any invidious comparison, and whilst I do not at all wish to abate from the just praise which is due to the militia, I think that the mounted police are entitled to at least as much consideration. The services of the mounted police do not require to be praised. Those services have been so valuable, especially in recent years, that I am sure the country will feel that we are only giving the North-west mounted police their due when we provide that the officers as well as the men shall receive a pension in their old age. At present the work of the mounted police, far from being restricted, has increased, and is increasing. In the Northwest Territories we now have patrols all the way from the United States frontier of Montana and Minnesota up as far as Mackenzie river. The most northern post we have is on the Great Slave lake. In the west we have one or two posts, certainly one on the Peace river. In the Yukon it is a fact recognized by everybody that the services of the mounted police have been simply invaluable. They have maintained order, and made the Yukon as safe as any other part of Canada. This is saying a great deal in favour of the force, especially when we reflect that the Yukon is of such recent growth, and is settled, as such countries must be settled, by a rather unsteady element.

Provision is made first of all that the officers of the mounted police, like the officers of the militia who are to receive a pension, shall contribute a certain amount thereto, consisting of an abatement of 5 per cent of their salary. Then it is proposed that if an officer of the mounted police is retired after 20 years of service he shall receive a pension equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay for the time he has been in the service. A similar pension is given to other officers who are retired after a service of 25 years. Those who retire voluntarily after 35 years of service are entitled to a pension equal to thirty-five-fiftieths of their income during that time. The number of officers who will be entitled to participate in this fund is 55 : the commander, the assistant commander, 11 superintendents, 35 inspectors, 6 surgeons and 1 veterinary surgeon. Then there is a provision that the wives and children of the officers shall be entitled to a pension in the same way as the officers of the militia.

An hon. MEMBER. Do the provisions apply to those who have retired ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Only to those who are in the service. I think those who have retired would not be entitled, because they have not served the full time of 20 years.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the minister made any calculation of how much money will be required to be added to the 5 per cent to make up this pension ?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, I have not made any calculation, and I do not see how it is possible to make such calculation. We think the country will not be called upon to contribute to any of these pensions for a long time to come, and I will give the reason for thinking so. There are, as I have said, 55 officers who will be entitled to this pension. Of that number 16 have now served under 5 years ; 7 under 10 years ; 11 under 15 years ; 17 under 20 years ; 2 under 25 years, and 2 under 30 years. So there are only 4 who could participate in the fund at an early date. I think only one or two members of the force are likely to take advantage of this fund for a considerable time to come. But the greater number of the force have not yet been 20 years in the service, so it is not probable that for a long time to come the country will be called upon to pay anything towards these pensions.

Mr. SPROULE. Am I right in understanding that this 5 per cent only applies to officers and not to men ?

The PRIME MINISTER. To officers alone. The men, I may say, contribute nothing. Though the force has now been in existence about 27 years, and there have been 4,000 men passing through the force, we only pay at present in pensions to the men less than $2,000 a year. The reason is that a good many of those 4,000 have withdrawn from the force and settled in the North-west, and have thereby renounced their pension.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I understand the officers of the mounted police have been paying into the superannuation fund a great many years, I believe 2 per cent.

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. DAVIS. I was so informed by the controller of the police. However, there is one clause in the resolution which I cannot agree with, that which says that an officer retiring on account of injury received in the discharge of his duties, gets a gratuity not exceeding three months pay for every two years of service. Therefore, if an officer has joined the North-west mounted police and, after two years service, has received some injury in the discharge of his duties necessitating his retirement, he would be entitled to the magnificent sum of $240 on retiring. Now, as the officer might receive injuries that would unfit him from maintaining his family, I think the government should arrange in some way that he should receive something more substantial than that amount of money.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). My attention was drawn to the same clause, which the hon. gentleman has just mentioned. It does seem to me that if it is intended to make some provision for an officer in case of injury in the discharge of his duty, the resolution is hardly in the form in which we should expect it. Possibly it is intended to be an addition to the pension.

The PRIME MINISTER. These resolutions have been copied word for word from the Act which was passed last year in regard to the militia. I will take note of the objection and at a future stage I will be able to give information upon it.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I understand this pension applies to the officers only and not to the men ?

The PRIME MINISTER. To the officers only.

Mr. SPROULE. Undoubtedly we have adopted a somewhat similar principle in the militia branch, but, I have always held that wherever we employ men and give them good compensation in the shape of wage or salary, they have no more reason to expect superannuation or pension if they have served 20, or 25, or 35 years, than hundreds of thousands of people who are discharging service in the country quite as hard, whose occupation is quite as dangerous, whose remuneration is much smaller, and for whom we make no provision whatever.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 7, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the chair at Three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough) moved:

That the first and second reports of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be now concurred in.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). I do not rise to object to this particular motion being adopted only a few minutes after it has been presented to the House. I believe that we should have an opportunity of knowing what these reports contain, and I wish to give notice that I shall object to this procedure in every other case.

Mr. FRASER. My reason for moving the adoption of the report now is, that there are but two small matters referred to in it. The first is the employment of a shorthand reporter, and the second, that certain evidence which was taken before the committee last year be brought down ; and, as the committee may have to meet any day, I did not want it to meet without having this before it. That is the reason I made the motion.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I withdraw the objection in this particular case.

Mr. SPEAKER. Because the point of order was well taken.

The PRIME MINISTER. Before the point of order is taken, I would ask my hon. friend to let the matter stand until Monday or Tuesday, so that we may examine the case. I doubt whether a notice is required to be put on the Order paper in order to make a motion for the adoption of the report.

Mr. FRASER. I certainly agree to that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I have no objection to the motion; but nearly every day, reports of committees are adopted a few minutes after they are read in the House. I think this is irregular, and I simply give notice that after this I hope the rule will be enforced.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved that the House again go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I wish to bring before the House a matter that has been talked of a good deal in this House and outside of it, with reference to a statement which I made some days ago as to declarations made by the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Sir Louis Davies, in relation to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and the settlement of the Alaskan boundary question. A couple of days after I had made that statement I received from Sir Louis Davies the following letter :

February, 21, 1902.

Dear Mr. Bourassa,—My attention has been called to the report of your speech in the House of Commons on your motion for papers in re the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in which you credit me with having made the statement that I 'had spent three months in London trying to get the officers of Mr. Chamberlain to take the part of Canada at the sittings of the Anglo-American Commission.'

May I ask you for your authority for attributing to me such an extraordinary statement ?

Faithfully yours,

L. H. DAVIES.

As I received this letter just before I was leaving for Montreal, I simply dropped a note to Sir Louis Davies, a copy of which I have not kept, telling him that I would try to satisfy his mind on the matter. So, on the 25th I wrote to him the following letter :

House of Commons,

Ottawa, February 25, 1902.

Sir Louis Davies,
Supreme Court,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—In compliance with the promise I made you last week, I send you my authorities for the statement which I made in the House in the following terms :

And here is the exact statement I made as reported in the official report of the Debates :

'One of the Canadian ministers, who was on that occasion one of the British plenipotentiaries, the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Sir Louis Davies, went to London and passed three months there. For what purpose ? He was candid enough to tell us, when he came back from England that—after the Anglo-American Commission had sat for six months, after they were supposed to have at their back the influence of the British government—he, Sir Louis Davies, was obliged to pass three months in London to convince Mr. Chamberlain's officials that they should not side with the American government, but with us.'

I go on :

My authorities for making such a statement—

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not know under what rule or right the hon. member for Labelle brings into the House a controversy between himself and Sir Louis Davies on a particular subject. The most he could possibly do would be to make a personal explanation of something which he said on a particular day, and as to which he was misrepresented or misquoted; but to read letters which have passed between him and Sir Louis Davies is clearly out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood, from what has been said so far, that the hon. member for Labelle wanted to make a personal explanation, and I supposed that the letters he has just quoted were simply his excuse for making the personal explanation which he desired to make. I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that all he can do now is to make a personal explanation, and I would ask him to confine his remarks as much as possible to that.

Mr. BOURASSA. Certainly, it is not my intention to do anything else than make good the statement which I made and which has been challenged in this House and outside of it, and on which Sir Louis Davies asked me to make a personal explanation in this House. Therefore, I do it, in justice to the hon. gentleman, in justice to myself, and in justice to the House; and I think the House will be pleased to have a full explanation of the matter. I think it is my right to explain for what reason I made the statement, and to prove that the statement was accurate.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman wants to make a debate, he should be very cautious about it. He should not go so far as to refer to a past debate. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman is referring to a previous debate, and simply reaffirms the statement he made.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to refer to a past debate. I merely wish to give the explanation which has been asked for by Sir Louis Davies, who was a plenipotentiary on that occasion. My only purpose is to make that point clear, without any reference to what may have happened in this House. The letters I am reading now are necessary to make the whole record complete. I went on :

My authorities for making such a statement are the interviews which you gave on your arrival from England and published in the 'Montreal Gazette' on October 30th, 1899, page 7; in the 'Toronto Globe' of the same date, page 10; in the 'Montreal Herald,' of either of the same day or the next, page 9.

I may have made a mistake as to the length of time you passed in the Old Country. But the substance of my statement is fully justified, I think, by those interviews which, to my knowledge, have never been rectified.

Yours respectfully,
HENRI BOURASSA.

To this I received the following reply:

Supreme Court,
Ottawa, 26th February, 1902.

My Dear Mr. Bourassa,—This morning I received your letter in answer to mine of the 21st instant, in which I asked you for your authority for making the extraordinary statement you were reported in the newspapers to have attributed to me in your speech in the House of Commons on your motion for papers in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This report stated that you 'then went on to credit Sir Louis Davies with making the statement that he had spent three months in London trying to get the officers of Mr. Chamberlain to take the part of Canada at the sitting of the Anglo-American commission.'

I am glad to find that you now repudiate the correctness of this report, and send me as a correct statement of what you did say that I 'was obliged to pass three months in London to convince Mr. Chamberlain's officials that they should not side with the American government, but with us.'

While accepting this statement of what you really did say, I have failed to notice that you have made any public correction of the report of your remarks.

As your authority for making this statement you refer me to certain alleged interviews which, you say, I gave upon my arrival from England, namely, the 'Gazette,' and the 'Herald,' Montreal, and the Toronto 'Globe,' of October, 1899. I have looked up these reports which you gave as your authority, and I am obliged to say that after a careful perusal of them, I am unable to see that they afford just ground for the statement you were reported to have made, or the one you send me as the statement you actually did make.

I gave no 'interview' to any of those newspapers, and the report to which you call my attention do not purport to be in the form of a regular interview; but with respect to the charge you make, you have been entirely and grievously misled. I went to England in 1899, accompanied by Mr. Pope and Mr. King, to lay before the Imperial government a complete statement of the contention of Canada with respect to the Alaska boundary line. Our treatment by the officials of the colonial office on that occasion was most sympathetic, and those gentlemen did everything they could to furnish us with any official documents and information we required. In point of fact, Sir John Anderson, who had charge of this question in the colonial office, did everything that lay in his power to further the object of our mission.

Nothing could have been further from my thoughts than to have attributed to Mr. Chamberlain, or any of his officials, either indifference or hostility to Canada's interests, and if I had done so I certainly would have done violence to the truth.

And here I call the attention of the House to the following paragraph:

The American correspondents of the English papers in Washington and New York had been transmitting during that summer letters and cablegrams to England giving a very perverted and incorrect view of Canada's claims and position, with respect alike to the main contention and the provisional boundary line then being established, and these telegrams would, no doubt, have had the effect of prejudicing Canada's case, if left unanswered. I did what I could to dissipate this prejudice.

I certainly never made any such statement as you are reported to have attributed to me; nor did I ever make any such statement as you in your letter give as the correct report of what you said. I never knew or heard of any officials of Mr. Chamberlain taking any part adverse to Canada during the sittings of the Anglo-American commission or afterwards; on the contrary, as I have stated before, so far as my knowledge went they were ready at all times to do everything they could to further Canada's interests.

As you were one of the secretaries of the Joint High Commission, and sat as a colleague with me for two sessions after this alleged interview took place, and never to my knowledge, made reference to it before, I trust you will take an early opportunity in the House of Commons of correcting your statement, which is certainly a misleading one and unjust to me.

Yours faithfully,
L. H. DAVIES.

The three interviews, or whatever you may choose to call them, were as follows: The first appears in the Toronto 'Globe' of October 30, 1899, page 10. It is a special despatch from Montreal dated October, 29. The despatch first notes the arrival of Sir Louis Davies from London, and after a long story about his difficulties at the customs in New York, it reads as follows:

In London he laid the whole Canadian case regarding Alaska before the British government and cleared away the fog which was raised by American correspondents of London papers, who succeeded to some extent in prejudicing Canada's position. He prepared a lengthy volume on the case, and the whole British government are now thoroughly posted on the matter. As it stands now, a temporary arrangement has been made, pending the settlement of the whole case. To that end, Sir Louis, on behalf of Canada made three propositions, an unconditional arbitration, or a reference similar to the Venezuela case, or, finally, if the United States claimed Skagway and Dyea in any event, Canada should have Pyramid Harbour in any event.

Then the Montreal 'Gazette' of October 30, page 7, had the following:

Sir Louis Davies arrived yesterday from London, Eng., where he had been for some months consulting with the Imperial government regarding the Alaska boundary difficulty. He found that the Americans, and particularly certain American correspondents of London papers had succeeded in prejudicing Canada's case in the eyes of the English authorities, but he had drawn up quite a lengthy volume setting out the position of Canada and through this and personal interviews with the government removed these false impressions. The British government is now thoroughly seized with Canada's contention.

And the Montreal 'Herald' of October 31, 1899, page 9, published the following:

'Sir Louis Davies, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, returned Sunday from London, where he had been for some time past engaged in putting the case for Canada, with regard to the Alaska boundary, before the Imperial authorities. He says he found that the Americans, and particularly certain American correspondents of London papers had succeeded in prejudicing the case for Canada in the eyes of the English authorities, but he had drawn up quite a lengthy volume setting out the position of Canada, and through this and personal interviews with the government, removed these false impressions. The British government is now thoroughly seized with Canada's contentions.

Now, Sir Louis Davies gives those interviews or reports, or whatever you may choose to call them, a denial. The whole thing, he says, was perfectly false. Well, if the whole thing was false, if Sir Louis Davies never gave to the newspapers the information on which they based these reports, if they were not inspired by him, I think it is rather strange that he should have delayed saying so until now. I think it rather singular that a representative of the Canadian government and at the same time a plenipotentiary of the British government, should have waited two years and a half before correcting the report published by three of the most reliable newspapers in Canada—one a Conservative and the other two Liberals—that the hon. gentleman was obliged to go to London to dissipate the prejudices raised by American newspapers in the minds of the British people. The only statement which Sir Louis Davies complains of is that which I made. He does not complain of what may have been reported by this or that newspaper, for whose reports I am not responsible.

Well, all I have to say to-day is this, that for six months the Canadian commissioners, acting as British plenipotentiaries, endeavoured patiently and assiduously, but in vain, to have this question settled between the British and American governments on the same basis of action as the Venezeula dispute. I have been accused in the public press of having been indiscreet because I told the truth. Why, a similar statement was made to this House at least three times by the right hon. the Prime Minister. If therefore I have been indiscreet, the right hon. gentleman has been equally guilty. More than that, the hon. gentleman not only made a statement similar to mine, but on the 5th of June, 1899, he laid before the House protocol 63 of the Anglo-American Commission, in which it is shown that a proposal had been made by the British plenipotentiaries to have the Alaskan boundary dispute settled by an arbitrative tribunal, as was done in the Venezuela dispute, that the American commissioners refused this offer and made a counter proposition, and that when the British plenipotentiaries reported that they could not accept this counter proposal, the whole thing was left in the hands of the American and British governments.

I think the Prime Minister is loyal enough to say that, in this matter, I am not going one iota beyond the statements that have been made by himself, made by common agreement between Mr. Fairbanks, the president of the American commission, and the right hon. gentleman, acting as chairman of the commission, Lord Herschell being sick. Therefore, I am accused of indiscretion, a few gentlemen in this House and a few newspapers want to lay upon my shoulders—that have been accustomed to scuh treatment for two years and a half—the full burden of what is the fault, or rather the alleged fault of others. But I contend that there is no fault. I have always stated, on the only two occasions when I have referred to the Anglo-American Commission, that the Canadian commissioners did the best they could in the interests of Canada; they made the best fight it was possible to make to protect Canadian interests. But what I say, and what I am supported by the testimony of the Prime Minister in saying, is that when they thought it impossible to get any settlement of the question from the commission, they handed it over to the British government. And then what did we see? Three months after it was handed over to the British government, one of the British plenipotentiaries told us that he had been obliged to take means to dissipate prejudices aroused in the minds of the British authorities, to whom our case was committed, by articles appearing in the American press. Sir Louis Davies does not deny that some things were said to the press, but he objects to these being called interviews. I do not care what name is used; what I am interested in is the fact and the result. And in the letter which I have read, Sir Louis Davies makes the admission. He says that the American correspondents in Washington and New York of the English papers transmitted, during that summer, letters and cablegrams giving a very perverted and incorrect view of Canada's claims and position. And he says, 'I did what I could to dissipate this prejudice.' He does not even go so far as to say that he actually dissipated the prejudices, and we have now the proof that this prejudice has not been dissipated. I have said nothing that is not now repeated in the letter written to me by Sir Louis Davies. After the adjournment of the Anglo-American Commission, the whole settlement of this question, so far as Canada's interests were concerned, was put in the hands of gentlemen who preferred being prejudiced by articles written by American correspondents of newspapers rather than take the case laid before them by Lord Herschell and our own Canadian representatives.

It has been said, I do not exactly know where, by some excited or erratic individual, that I calumniated Lord Herschell. Sir, I never uttered a word regarding Lord Herschell but once. In 1899, in the debate on the address, at the opening of the first session following the adjournment of the commision, I spoke about Lord Herschell. This is what I said :

I consider the sad death of Lord Herschell as heavy a loss to Canada, as it is to Great Britain. His very appointment was a great favour and a high compliment to Canada, as well as an acknowledgment of our independence. One of the most eminent jurists of this century, a straight opponent of the present English administration, and therefore out of political office, the presence of Lord Herschell on the commission meant that the whole political direction of the negotiations was left to the Canadian commissioners, who were given the help of a great legal mind and the moral and constitutional support of Great Britain. And the American commissioners understood it ; they saw clearly that in Canadian matters they must deal with the Canadian people, behind which stands the British flag, not as a forced protection to a flock of slaves, but as a free help to free men.

Mr. Speaker, I have changed my mind on some of the things I said then. I was full of hope. I was impressed by the deliberations of that commission, and I had full confidence that, with the good case so ably made by Lord Herschell, and after the energetic efforts made by our own representatives, we could count on the British authorities to show as much zeal in the interests of Britain's loyal colony of Canada as they had shown in the case of Venezuela. I was justified in making that statement then. I have now a good deal to withdraw so far as the British government is concerned. But so far as rendering a testimonial to the ability and zeal and devotedness which were displayed by Lord Herschell, in the case of Canada, I have nothing to withdraw. My opinion of Lord Herschell is the same to-day as it was then. And, if any man says I calumniated Lord Herschell, then it only shows that in the British-Canadian dictionary, there still needs to be retained, as a living and useful expression, the word ' Tupperism.'

It has been stated also—I do not know where, for I have been absent for eight days, but I have been told that it has been stated—that I had been very indiscreet in disclosing the secrets of the Anglo-American Commission ; that, time and again in the province of Quebec, I made declarations about it which showed me to be an excited and erratic individual. I hope I shall always be an excited and erratic individual in that case, for the moment I become composed and judicial, as some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this matter believe themselves to be, I suppose I shall be free to discourse in Tupperisms or Monkeyisms. But, having such a bad reputation as I have, I am bound to remain within the limits of truth and discretion. As a matter of fact, I have never opened my mouth on the subject of the Anglo-American Commission. I acted as secretary to that Commission, and I perfectly understood what my duties were, just as I understand what my duties are to-day. For two years I was perfectly silent, though I was beginning to perceive what was going on. I was waiting for the moment when public facts known to the whole people of Britain, as well as the whole people of Canada, would allow me as a Canadian representative, to state, on the floor of this House—where I have the right to speak in the Canadian interests as well as anybody else—what was the true position of Canada. But, since the case of Canada was handed over to the British authorities, not one inch of progress has been made. What is my authority for this ? Is it taken from the deliberations of the commission ? Not at all; it is taken from the repeated statements of the Prime Minister. And my anticipations as to the betrayal—that may be considered too strong a word, then, if you prefer let us say the abandonment—of our rights by the government of Great Britain, are merely those that were expressed in this parliament by the late leader of the opposition, Sir Charles Tupper. I suppose I am not bound to be more loyal to Great Britain than that hon. gentleman was. On the 22nd of July, 1899, the late leader of the opposition, Sir Charles Tupper, read in this House the announcement that was made of the adjournment of the commission by Mr. Fairbanks and Sir Wilfrid Laurier acting respectively as the American and British presidents of the commission, and added :

Those who have read the American papers, and those who have read the London 'Times,' know that a great deal of misapprehension has existed with regard to this question, and that the steady and persistent efforts of the press of the United States of America to mislead the public mind on the question have been eminently successful in that country, and I regret to say too successful in Great Britain. . . . But I now come to a very important question, and that is the reluctance on the part of Her Majesty's government to do that with the United States that they would do with any other country in the world. I speak from intimate knowledge, and from my personal acquaintance and official association with both the great governing parties in England—because there were many changes of government while I held the position of High Commissioner, and I was necessarily thrown, in relation to these matters, into intimate association with both—when I say that from 1868, when I had occasion to deal with an important question relating to Canadian interests with Her Majesty's government, down to the present hour, I have been struck very forcibly with the unwillingness on the part of Her Majesty's government to allow any circumstance whatever to even threaten a collision with the United States.

And so on. Well, Mr. Speaker, before this day I never uttered a word of blame against the British government in relation to this question, I never uttered a word of criticism upon the conduct of these negotiations. Contrary to what has been stated in this House and outside, I never opened my mouth, either in this House or elsewhere, giving a single word of what passed during the commission upon this question. The only time I referred to it was in 1899, just at the opening of the session, when we were told the deliberations of the commission would begin pretty soon, and I said I felt that in the hands of our commissioners our case was safe, and I hoped also it would be safe in the hands of the British government. Down to this session I have never said a word during all the time that comments were freely made by members on both sides of the House, and in the Canadian press, accusing at one time the British government, at another time the Canadian government, and at another time the United States government. During all that time I remained silent. But when I read this article published under the signature of the late Minister of Justice in the December number of the 'Empire Review,' I felt compelled to speak :

Canada is a great North American State. Her commerce is far greater in proportion to her population than that of the neighbouring republic. The construction of a Central American canal would be as much called for in her interest, as in that of the United States, and we shall never be content to submit to any other rule in respect to such a canal than that of perfect equality. This is what our neighbours asked for at the outset, and this is all they have a right to claim now.

The provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in this regard, are vital to Canada, and the government of the United Kingdom must not, for any political consideration, sacrifice the interests of Canada, and the future of the British Empire upon this continent.

And later on :

To give the United States possession of the canal, is practically to transfer the territory of Central America to that republic, contrary to the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. We shall see by a further examination of the diplomatic correspondence upon this subject, how the principles by which they then claimed to have been governed in the adoption of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and their adherence to a particular construction of that instrument have been departed from in the bolder pretensions which they have recently put forward. These, I think, upon careful examination, will be found to be of such a character that to recognize them would be a greater menace to our security and future progress than any other matter of controversy that now presents itself for solution.

Not fifteen days had elapsed after these lines were written over the signature of an adviser of the Crown in Canada, before we were told that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been sacrificed, that the interests of Canada —to use the words of the late Minister of Justice—had been sacrificed by the British government. Well, Sir, the least I expected was that the British government had done something in the way of securing compensation for Canada in return for the abandonment of its rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Therefore, when I heard the declaration of the Prime Minister that the Alaskan boundary question had not advanced one single iota, when I heard that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been abrogated without any protest having been made in relation to that question, when I remembered that the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries was obliged to admit, what we have now in evidence over his own signature—that it was sufficient for some American correspondents to write to the London papers in order to destroy, in the minds of the British officials, the results of six months' labour under the presidency of such an able and devoted man as Lord Herschell—I said to myself that it was time that we should know a little about it. I am sometimes told that I am an Anglophobe, that I am an anti-Imperialist. I hope the time will come when it will be seen that my love for Great Britain, though perhaps not so bombastic, not so noisy, not so voluble as that of some whose expressions we have heard, still it is true. But I believe we can best prove our attachment and admiration to Great Britain by showing that we have as much national spirit as they have, and that when our interests are sacrificed we see clearly through the game. I think it is very important that this question should be cleared up. Within a few months the Prime Minister will be going to the foot of the Throne, and will lay at the feet of His Majesty a declaration of the unswerving fidelity and loyalty of his Canadian subjects, and in that respect the people of this country are a unit. I hope that in addition to that declaration he will also be able to point out to the British officials that the Canadian representatives understand their duty towards the Canadian people, and if this parliament is ready at any time to vote millions of dollars to assist some English cause elsewhere, at least a majority in this House are disposed to assure the British government that the Canadian people are determined to see their rights respected. I did not expect to go fully into these details ; but in summing up, I think I am justified in saying that the letter I have received from the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries and which I have just read to the House, is a full justification, not of the words I am reported to have used, but of the declaration I actually made, namely, that Sir Louis Davies was obliged to go to London in order to dissipate the prejudices that had been raised in the minds of the British officials by articles in American newspapers. I think it is important that it should be thoroughly known in this country that the American newspapers had more influence with the British government than Lord Herschell had, or the four representatives of the Canadian government.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). When my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) rose a few moments ago, I was under the impression that his object in speaking to the motion now before the Chair, was simply to rectify a statement which had been made by him, and to which exception had been taken by Sir Louis Davies. So far as that matter is concerned I do not propose now to do anything more than confine myself to that issue. A few days ago I received this letter from Sir Louis Davies :

February 28, 1902.

My dear Sir Wilfrid,—I have been obliged to correct a most unjust and misleading statement made by Mr. Bourassa in the House of Commons with respect to my mission to England re the Alaska boundary line in 1899. I inclose you herewith a copy of the last letter I have written him in which I request him to make the necessary correction in the House, so as to put me straight with the country and with the officials in the Colonial Office, if any kind friends were to send them marked newspapers with Mr. Bourassa's statements. May I ask you, if Mr. Bourassa fails to make the proper explanation and correction, to do so for me at some convenient time, and if necessary, to read those passages of my letters giving his statement full contradiction. I have marked in pencil the passages.

Yours faithfully,

L. H. DAVIES.

At the same time Sir Louis Davies showed me a copy of the letter he had addressed to Mr. Bourassa, in which he takes issue, not, I remind the House, with the words which have been attributed to him by the hon. member for Labelle, but with the construction which has been put upon them by the hon. member for Labelle. In that letter Sir Louis Davies writes as follows :

My dear Mr. Bourassa,—This morning I received your letter in answer to mine of the 21st instant, in which I asked you for your authority for making the extraordinary statement you were reported in the newspapers to have attributed to me in your speech in the House of Commons on your motion for papers in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This report stated that you 'then went on to credit Sir Louis Davies with making the statement that he had spent three months in London trying to get the officers of Mr. Chamberlain to take the part of Canada at the sitting of the Anglo-American Commission.

Then Sir Louis Davies goes on to say :

I am glad to find that you now repudiate the correctness of this report and send me as a correct statement of what you did say that 'I was obliged to pass three months in London to convince Mr. Chamberlain's officials that they should not side with the American government but with us.'

That is the statement which the hon. member for Labelle is stated to have made concerning Sir Louis Davies' action. This action was that he had been obliged to pass three months in London to convince Mr. Chamberlain's officials that they should not side with the American government but with us. In regard to this inference Sir Louis Davies says that the hon. member for Labelle is attributing an action to him that he never contemplated and never did. I think it would have been more in accordance with the fitness of things if the hon. member for Labelle had accepted the statement of Sir Louis Davies without any qualification. The hon. member for Labelle, however, thought he was justified in not accepting the correction which was made by Sir Louis Davies. He thought he was justified in persisting in attributing to Sir Louis Davies an action which Sir Louis Davies repudiates altogether. My hon. friend for Labelle stated that he was justified by three interviews which he said were published in the Toronto 'Globe,' the Montreal 'Gazette' and the Montreal 'Herald,' in persisting in attributing to Sir Louis Davies an action which Sir Louis Davies altogether repudiates. Well, I must say to my hon. friend that for my part I think he is not at all justified in taking from these newspaper reports the inference which he has. First of all my hon. friend must admit himself that the report, or the despatch, from which he has quoted, did not purport to be an interview with Sir Louis Davies. I do not know how the newspaper man could have made that report, but at all events, the journalist who sent it to the 'Globe,' to the 'Gazette' and to the 'Herald' does not pretend that he is reporting the words of Sir Louis Davies, but an inference himself, and from that inference another inference is drawn by the hon. member for Labelle. I think that in public life this is hardly fair. My hon. friend says to-day that Sir Louis Davies might have corrected this ; but did not. Well, my hon. friend has been long enough in public life to know that if a public man were to undertake to correct all the misstatements made regarding him in the newspapers, life would hardly be worth the living. This is an age of enterprise, newspapermen are looking for news and we all know that a newspaperman will sometimes build up an argument or a fact out of very little and sometimes out of nothing at all, and I do not think my hon. friend is justified in assuming the correctness of the report because Sir Louis Davies failed to make a correction at the time.

Mr. BOURASSA. I have said that I was basing my holding of that view upon another paragraph of the very letter which the right hon. gentleman has in his hand.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will come to that presently. I must say, at all events, that my hon. friend has no foundation to attribute to Sir Louis Davies a statement which Sir Louis Davies actually contradicts and repudiates. The statement is very flimsy, or no statement whatever. I think my hon. friend would have done better not to have built up any argument upon these newspaper reports. As to the paragraph to which my hon. friend comments upon, it is this :

The American correspondents of the English papers in Washington and New York had been transmitting during that summer letters and cablegrams to England giving a very perverted and incorrect view of Canada's claims and position, with respect alike to the main contention and the provisional boundary line then being established, and these telegrams would, no doubt, have had the effect of prejudicing Canada's case, if left unanswered. I did what I could to dissipate this prejudice.

That Sir Louis Davies should have done what he could to dissipate whatever prejudice might have been caused by the American newspapers was not only within his rights, but a duty which he owed to Canada while he was in England, but, because Sir Louis Davies undertook to contradict and dissipate the impression which might have been created by the American newspapers certainly cannot warrant my hon. friend in stating, as he does in his letter, that Sir Louis Davies was obliged to pass three months in London to convince Mr. Chamberlain's officials that they should not side with the American government, but with us. Certainly, there is no correction, and it is most unfair to Sir Louis Davies to persist in attributing to him statements which he never made. I have no intention of saying anything further upon this matter, but I submit to my hon. friend that in public life, when we are daily called upon to comment upon the actions and sayings of each other, when a public man of the honour and respectability of Sir Louis Davies makes a statement, it ought to be accepted without any further comment upon it, without being qualified at all, and without question.

One word more about another matter. The other day I was quite surprised, if I may be permitted to say so, because it is a matter of some importance, when I heard the reference made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) as to certain allusions which he said had been made by the hon. member for Labelle unfavourable to the memory of the late Lord Herschell. I am bound to say, in the presence of the hon. member for Labelle, and I am sorry I cannot say it also in the presence of the hon. member for Pictou, that to my knowledge the hon. member for Labelle is absolutely guiltless in this matter. I have never heard any statement made by him disparaging to the memory of Lord Herschell. I may say that of the hon. member for Labelle, although it is not necessary for me to offer any defence of him, but since the memory of the late Lord Herschell has been mentioned, I am only too glad to testify for myself, as has also been done by my colleagues, to the great loss which Canada has suffered in the death of Lord Herschell, and to the great service which he rendered to Canada while he was chairman of the British side of the commission. The public do not know, and unfortunately the Canadian public will never know, the extent of the service which he then rendered to Canada, and the ability he displayed in defence of our rights. No Canadian could have shown more zeal than he did for the cause of Canada, and no man, to whatever nationality he might belong, could have done it more effectively than he did at Washington and Quebec.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, in reference to this extraordinary debate, something that I never had the honour of hearing before in this House of parliament, when an hon. member gets up, the rules of the House allowing him to make a personal explanation, and enters into a controversy as to whether a statement made by a gentleman outside of this House, occupying a dignified position, is correct or not, I desire to say a word or two. The right hon. leader of the government, whose duty it is to look after the rules of the House and draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to any breach of these rules, as it is your duty, Sir, to maintain the rules, never stopped that hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) until an hour had elapsed in discussing a question as foreign to the proceedings of this House as anything could be.

The PRIME MINISTER. Will the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) allow me to interrupt him ? I did not interrupt the hon. member for Labelle, because, on a motion to go into Supply, the hon. gentleman was within his rights in discussing anything he wanted to discuss. He might discuss the empire of China, or the empire of Japan, or anything that he might desire to bring to the attention of the House.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I thought the hon. member for Labelle got up to make a personal explanation.

The PRIME MINISTER. He got up on the motion to go into Supply.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Well, if there is a motion to go into Supply I shall discuss the question fully, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Labelle made a statement to this House the other day. He was secretary of a commission appointed by the Imperial authorities for the purpose of considering one of the most important subjects that could have been referred to it, the settlement of disputes between us and the United States, and for the purpose of arranging, if possible, trade relations between these two countries. He was cognisant of the proceedings of that commission. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) shakes his head, but I will quote the words he uttered in this House. He said :

But what happened after that ? One of the Canadian ministers, who was on that occasion one of the British plenipotentiaries, the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Sir Louis Davies, went to London and passed three months there. For what purpose ? He was candid enough to tell us when he came back from England that after the Anglo-American Commission had sat for six months, after they were supposed to have had at their back the influence of the British government, he, Sir Louis Davies, was obliged to pass three months in London to convince Mr. Chamberlain's officials that they should not side with the American government, but with us. Sir, I think that was a most unfortunate statement, but I think it was just as well that it should have been made. It is true that it made known to the public of the United States that in dealing with the government of Canada they were not dealing with the British authorities. But it is just as well that the public of the United States and the public of Canada should know that while profuse compliments were being paid to us in the newspapers of Great Britain and by the speeches of public men in the British parliament, still, when it came to the point of helping the Canadian cause, the British officials sided with a foreign government.

Now, the right hon. Prime Minister was present when the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) made that statement—

Mr. SPEAKER. It is true that we are on a motion to go into Committee of Supply, but the rule applies on that motion as well as on others, that a past debate must not be referred to. I must admit that so far this debate has been conducted somewhat irregularly, and consequently I do not like to interfere with the discussion on which the hon. member (Hon. Mr. Haggart) has entered. I trust, however, that this will not be considered as a precedent.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The statement was made on the floor of this House that six months after this commission met, certain proceedings occurred before that commission, and Sir Louis Davies was sent home for the purpose of pressing Canada's view on the Imperial government, but that Canada was not supported by the Imperial authorities. The hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) says that such a statement was made previously by Sir Louis Davies, and by the right hon. Prime Minister, and we have the fact that the Prime Minister when speaking to-day never denied the charge of the hon. member (Mr. Bourassa), that the action of the commission was not supported by the Imperial government. The hon. member for Labelle told us that in making that statement he was only repeating what Sir Louis Davies and what the Prime Minister had previously said.

Mr. BOURASSA. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I rise to a point of order. I have never stated either in this debate or in any other debate, that the action of the Anglo-American Commission during its sittings was not supported by the British government. Never did I make that statement to-day nor on any other day. What I have stated is, that after the case was laid in the hands of the British government, the British government took such action that one of our commission was obliged to go there to dissipate their prejudices. That was the only statement I have made.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I quite understand the fine point which the hon. gentleman has made. He did not state in this House that anything occurred before the commission, or that the commissioners appointed by the Imperial authorities or any of them, had not supported the contentions of Canada ; but that some things which had been recommended by that commission were pressed upon the British Imperial government by Sir Louis Davies, and had not received the sanction or support of that government.

Mr. BOURASSA. Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Is not that what you said, Sir ?

Mr. BOURASSA. Yes, that is right.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) says that he has not published that for the first time, but he was secretary of that commission, he knew the facts, he knew all the circumstances and whether or not it was the opinion of Sir Louis Davies and the Prime Minister, he had at all events given that statement his imprimatur when he quoted it.

Mr. BOURASSA. I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I must remind him that I was not acting as secretary when that occurred. My action as secretary ceased the day of the adjournment at Washington some time in February, 1899, while the matters which I have been referring to did not happen until six months after.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I am glad to hear the explanation of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) because I thought he was secretary of that commission at this very moment.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am officially, but I mean actually. Since that I have never acted.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Oh.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am the secretary theoretically, if you prefer the word.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. We will not consider it a precedent. I believed myself that the whole discussion was out of order, and I drew attention to it, but the Prime Minister stated that on going into Supply we had a right to discuss all these matters.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not a previous debate.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) was discussing a past debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. We can discuss, even a question which has been previously discussed, on a motion to go into Supply, but we must not refer to a previous debate. I am sorry to have to say that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) went a little too far in that regard. Not only did he give a personal explanation, but he entered into a discussion of the matter. I therefore do not like to stop the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) in his argument, but I would ask that this should not be taken as a precedent.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Oh, am I to understand that you have acted in a dual capacity, first as Imperial secretary and then as Canadian secretary? At present the hon. gentleman is secretary of that commission he tells us, and we would like to know whether he is the Canadian secretary or the Imperial secretary. However, that does not bear on my argument. What I have stated is, that the hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) as secretary of that commission had full knowledge of the proceedings, and the very fact of his repeating what Sir Louis Davies said, gives that statement the imprimatur of the secretary. We should know about this. There is something which was pressed on the Imperial authorities and of which we have no knowledge whatever. Now, what is that? Let us hear of it. We are entirely in the dark as to what contention was made by Sir Louis Davies and the commissioners. The other day the hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) made a statement in this House which was thought so important that a denial was obtained from Sir Louis Davies, one of the Supreme Court judges, and we witnessed the extraordinary spectacle of the Prime Minister, who is a member of the commission, sitting still in his seat and not offering a word of contradiction.

The PRIME MINISTER. Contradict what?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. member for Labelle made the statement that the Imperial government had refused to sanction some of the wishes and some of the aspirations that a majority of the commission had urged upon the commission for the purpose of settling our claim.

The PRIME MINISTER. He never said that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. And, he said that instead of supporting the Canadian view of the case the British authorities took a contrary attitude. That was the statement of the hon. member for Labelle, and that statement was not denied by the Prime Minister. The right hon. gentleman said that Canadian interests were not always safe in Imperial hands, that we had been treated badly in the past, and he hoped we would not be so treated in the future, and he left the inference that as in the past we had been badly treated in our dealings with the United States, there was very little prospect of our receiving better treatment in the future. He led us to believe that it was a question of such importance and that it had reached such a crisis that we had better wait for two or three years for the purpose of having our rights adjudicated upon unless we were disposed to go to war on the subject. He had the despatch of Lord Lansdowne stating: 'We will not consent to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty unless you settle the claims of Canada in regard to the Alaskan boundary.' With that declaration before him, made publicly to the whole world in the despatch of Lord Lansdowne, the right hon. gentleman was silent. But the hon. member for Labelle has let the cat out of the bag. I doubt very much if there was even a protest made. I do not know that our interests were at all represented or that any communication on the subject was sent to the British government; because, if it had been, in view of the remarks of Lord Salisbury and Lord Lansdowne, no government which would consent to the abrogation of that treaty without making some provision for the settlement for the claims of Canada could continue to exist in England. There may be something in the background—I hope there is. It may be that the Imperial government, notwithstanding their consent to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, have had some understanding on the subject. We have no statement from hon. gentlemen opposite whether they made a representation on the subject or not. All we know is from the published statement of their late Minister of Justice in certain magazine articles, on which the London 'Times' commented, commending the contention of the Minister of Justice. But I trust in the justice of the Imperial government. I have great belief in the power of the ægis which that mighty government flings over us, and it may be that they did not consent to the abrogation of such an important treaty as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in which we have such great interests involved, without having some understanding, perhaps not by treaty but only by word of mouth, for the settlement of these difficulties. At any rate, the public of Canada have a right to know our position in reference to these matters, and I hope we may be informed of it in a short time.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, I consider the discussion now before the House a proper time for making a few remarks with regard to the conduct of the Imperial government towards Canada. The idea is liable to go forth that an impression prevails in this House on the part of a considerable portion of its members, and also in this country, that Great Britain has been guilty of neglect of the interests of this Dominion, and has come short of her duty in regard to promoting and maintaining those interests. I consider, Mr. Speaker—and I think I am warranted in making my belief public at this time—that such a charge at this time against the British authorities is entirely unjust. There have been a great many criticisms indulged in, at present and in the past, with regard to England's failure to maintain our interests, and it has been asserted that in many cases she has been outwitted by American diplomats. It is well to bear in mind that Great Britain has world-wide interests. It is a mighty empire with interests in every clime and every hemisphere; and Great Britain is unable to take exclusive cognisance of the interests of one colony alone, but in the management of her policy must be governed by broad considerations. It may be necessary at times for her to take a course which would not be taken if the interests of one special corner of her dominions were alone to be considered. I believe that on the whole England's management of the affairs of Canada has been all that could be expected—has been all that she could maintain for us. I remember when a boy there was an old controversy about our northern boundary. The American contention was for a boundary line on the 54·40th line of latitude. I remember that one of the battle cries of the great presidential contest of 1840, when I was a mere boy, was, '54·40 or fight!' This was inscribed on political banners all over the United States. Well, I consider it a very great triumph of British diplomacy that the boundary was secured at the 49th parallel instead of at 54·40. If the American contention had prevailed at that time, the great Canadian North-west, which is the future hope of this Dominion, would have been worthless to us, because we would have lost nearly 400 miles in width from north to south of the southern portion of that territory. At a previous time we had the boundary line of Maine settled. It has always been asserted that we were beaten on that occasion. Well, the American contention was that they were entitled to the southern shore of the St. Lawrence as their boundary, and the selection of the line which was selected was a compromise. Whether we got all we were entitled to or not, I am quite sure that Lord Ashburton succeeded in getting all that it was possible to get, and that the interests of Canada in that settlement were as fully cared for as possible.

In reference to this Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which has been the subject of discussion here, and about which my hon. friend the late Minister of Justice has furnished communications to British periodicals, that treaty has been abrogated. I believe that the consent of the British authorities to the abrogation of that treaty was good policy. I do not believe it was necessary to keep open a source of irritation which was in danger of bringing the two nations to the verge of war, and I am quite certain that the new treaty is one which in a broad sense is advantageous to British interests. I remember speaking to Lord Pauncefote at Washington the day after the treaty was signed, and that eminent diplomat stated to me that there was no incident in the course of his whole diplomatic life which had afforded him so much gratification as the fact that he had been instrumental in setting at rest difficulties between the two governments which had threatened to lead to the most serious consequences. It has been maintained that we should have special rights in this canal. We have rights which the British government have deemed sufficient for Great Britain. The American people are of course more intimately connected with and more intimately interested in that canal than any other people. It is practically an extension of their coast line from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have not the same intimate interest in the canal which they have, but we have all the advantages which any neutral power has. I believe we are making an unnecessary amount of fuss about the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I believe that the British government has in this matter been governed by broad and high considerations and did what was best under the circumstances. I have no sympathy with these criticisms of the British government. We have no ground for complaint against that government. We have had the protection of its army and navy, and the use of its consular and diplomatic corps without cost, ever since we have had existence as a Dominion. On every occasion the British authorities have shown the most friendly feeling and the most earnest desire to protect our interests, and while Great Britain may not have on all occasions done all that we desired, yet she has done all that it was possible to do in our interest.

So far as this Alaskan boundary question is concerned, it is unnecessary to say that our contentions are well founded and those of the Americans not tenable in our opinion. But that is a matter which is pending now. We cannot open this question. The government are not in a position to take the House and the country into its confidence. If it were to do so, that would have a most pernicious and prejudicial effect on the progress of the negotiations. I think that the position of the government is unassailable. It has pursued the proper policy, and the criticisms levied against it are not well founded.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not understand the contention to be that we are dissatisfied because England abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but because it was abrogated without any settlement of the Alaskan boundary dispute. That was the contention put forward by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), and not that he was dissatisfied with the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He said, what every one will admit, that we have as great interests both on the Atlantic and the Pacific as the United States, because our territory extends to both these oceans, and is quite as large as the United States. Therefore, anything that affects the interests of the one in this matter must also affect the other.

But what I rose to refer to more particularly is the keeping back of papers which ought to have been before us long ago.

The Joint High Commission was appointed in 1898. It carried on its operations from time to time, during six months, and practically, so far as we know—and we glean that information from the remarks of the hon. the First Minister last fall at Montreal—it will never meet again. We are further told by the secretary of that commission that he has long ceased to be its secretary. If the statement of the premier be accurate, then all these papers and correspondence should have been before this House long ago. Without these documents we are unable to judge of what has been done or criticise it intelligently, and yet, on one pretext or another, they are refused. In view of the announcement which was made by the First Minister, it seems to me that these papers should have been before us long ago. Until they are before us neither this House nor the people will be satisfied that Canada's interests have been defended as they should have been.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee.

Dominion public building, Manitoba—Renewal improvements, repairs, &c., $5,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How much has been spent ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. Israel Tarte). Two thousand four hundred and fifty-eight dollars.

Mr. PUTTEE. This is an exceedingly modest item for Manitoba, where there is great necessity for public buildings. The business of the city has increased so much that the public service is hampered through lack of accommodation. Our accommodation has not been increased for a good many years, and I am sure that the Minister of Customs and the Postmaster General will be able to show the Minister of Public Works that the business in their departments has been more than doubled in the last few years. The population of Winnipeg has practically doubled between the two censuses, and the last month's returns from the Customs Department are 30 per cent higher from those of February of last year. This matter has been brought to the attention of the hon. minister several times.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My attention has been called by the board of trade and other people to the position of affairs in Winnipeg. I quite appreciate what my hon. friend has said, but Winnipeg, like Montreal, Toronto and other places, has not so far been able to get all that it requires. We will have to grapple with the situation, which I admit requires a remedy.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does Winnipeg come into the category of those places not entitled to the favour of the government ? That is to say, in regard to the representative of Winnipeg in this House, is he entitled to demand, if not favours, justice, in the way of the expenditure of public money ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have the greatest regard for the representative of Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee). He is one of the representatives of the labour element, and any representations he makes to me are received with the consideration that I always entertain towards the labour element. Now, my hon. friend (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) is altogether wrong in stating his views as mine. I am prepared to stand by what I have said, but I do not like to have him attribute to me things that I have never said and opinions that I do not entertain.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. minister is aware that many of those who sit in this House represent more working people, perhaps, than does the hon. member for Winnipeg. Is it a question of whether one represents working people or whether one supports or opposes the government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. With me, there is no other question than justice and fairness.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then, the hon. gentleman has turned over a new leaf.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The new leaf is not a bad one, neither was the old one.

Mr. PUTTEE. I have placed the position of Winnipeg before the minister purely on the actual demands of the public service. As far as we in the west are concerned, we see that the time that has been talked of for years, the new time with us, is practically dawning. This year has shown that we are entering upon the era of prosperity and incoming population that has been talked of. I am sure the hon. minister will understand that the public service in Winnipeg demands further accommodation in the matter of buildings. As to what the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) says concerning the support and non-support of the government, I believe he understands that, so far as I am concerned, these matters make no difference. I am prepared to deal with this government or any other government solely on their action and their merits.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand that this item is to be expended on public buildings not merely in Winnipeg but in Brandon and other places. Is the hon. minister able to tell us what portion will be spent on the basis of day's labour and what on the basis of public tender and contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It will be all by day's labour, as the amounts are very small.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the largest amount the minister has in view ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. An expenditure on the custom-house, of $933.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will that be by day's labour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Judging by the figures given in the Auditor General's Report, which show only a number of small expenditures, the buildings must be in fairly good repair. The same thing would be indicated by the fact that we see here in the estimates 'appropriations not required for 1902-1903, $17,900.'

Mr. McCREARY. I was rather surprised when I saw this sum of $5,000 in the estimates as the total that was going to be spent in the province of Manitoba next year for Dominion public buildings. When we compared that $5,000 with the amount to be expended in other provinces, even, judging on the basis of population, it will be seen that we are very small potatoes indeed.

An hon. MEMBER. The buildings are in good condition.

Mr. McCREARY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, the buildings are not in good condition. I know the Dominion immigration hall at Winnipeg pretty well, and I know that it is certainly not in good condition. The Dominion immigration hall should be reserved entirely for foreign immigrants, and for British immigrants there should be a new building distinct and apart from it. The best class of immigrants do not care to go into the Dominion immigration hall. I am not afraid to say that, because I know it. Every year, about March or April, there are some contagious diseases, and the building is in such a condition that it is almost impossible to keep it as it should be kept. What I did two years ago, was to rent a building on the edge of the river, which happened to be vacant, and put the British immigrants there, reserving them a place for themselves. The consequence was that we got the best class. Not only the steerage passengers, but the intermediate passengers went to that building, and they were quite content. Why ? Because it was a good place for them to stay. We had it fitted up with beds so that the people could have a rest. As I understand it, the Dominion immigration halls at Quebec, Halifax and other places are fitted up splendidly, with beds provided and every accommodation. Much more is this required in the Dominion immigration hall at Winnipeg. When the immigrant crosses from the seaboard he likes to rest over at Winnipeg for a day or even two or three days. They are weary with their journey, the children are exhausted, and they like to get a good rest. The immigration hall should be fitted up much better than it is. With regard to the post office building at Winnipeg, I know something about that because I live in the city, and a great number of my constituents come to the city for their mail as my constituency touches the city on three sides embracing such parishes as Kildonan and St. James and part of Rockwood. The Winnipeg post office is almost a disgrace. The revenue of that post office makes it the third in the Dominion, yet I have seen, at the general inquiry wicket an average of eight or ten people waiting their turn to ask for mail matter. The first floor of that building is entirely too small. This year land should be bought, even if the building of an extension is not carried on at once. On Main St., property is going up so rapidly that, if it continues at the present rate it will double in a little over a year. Property that was bought by Messrs. Osler, Hammond and Nanton at $600 a foot—50 feet of it, not on a corner—was sold to certain parties for $1,000 a foot almost spot cash, and a building is to be erected upon it fifteen stories high. That land is almost opposite the post office. The banks, wholesale houses and other enterprising institutions are buying real estate and erecting large buildings. I would urge upon the minister that, before the property gets too valuable, a site should be secured either alongside the post office, or in rear of it, and a new building erected, and then remove the custom-house, inland revenue office and the land office and centralize them all in one place. The Dominion government should keep pace with the progress that is being made there and be ready to meet the wishes of the people.

Mr. CLARKE. Has any representation been made to the Minister of Public Works as to the unsatisfactory state of the Dominion immigration building in Winnipeg ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not remember any other representations having been made to me. My hon. friend must not forget that I am only a builder. That immigration building is under the care of the Minister of the Interior. When he wants repairs and applies to me, I make them, but I do not remember having received any application for another building.

Mr. CLARKE. Is a building rented for the accommodation of those immigrants of British origin, or are they herded along with the foreign elements ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I see the hon. gentleman is urging the erection of another building.

Mr. CLARKE. If we want additional accommodation. Has a building been rented for the purpose of providing accommodation for the British immigrants there?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If one has been rented, it was not done by my department. I have none under my charge. I don't know whether my engineer has rented a building.

Mr. SPROULE. If there is any necessity for an additional building or enlargement of a present one, would not application therefor be made by the Minister of the Interior to the Department of Public Works ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. And no application has been made ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not that I remember, and not that my officers remember.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose if new buildings were erected it would devolve on the Department of Public Works to look after them, light them, pay water rates, and so on ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, all that; except that in some cases the Militia Department take care of their own buildings.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who is clerk in Winnipeg ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Cyr is in charge for the province.

Public Works—North-west Territories—Carnduff court-house, $3,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The site has been purchased from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for $440, and a contract has been awarded to a firm in Brandon, Manitoba, for the sum of $5,238.46.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I thought the minister had concluded to do these small works by day labour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I made up my mind it was better in this case to give the contract after tender. I never said I would carry out every work by day labour.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman did not bind himself to do so, but if I remember rightly he expressed sympathy with the views of some hon. gentlemen in this House who were of the opinion that where the amount was small the government could save money by doing the work directly under the supervision of the department.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In this case I thought it was better to call for public tenders. It is a far away place, and I did not know any one there.

Mr. SPROULE. How much is this building likely to cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. With furniture, &c., we expect it will cost $9,000. The item we are now discussing will complete the work. The lowest tender was accepted, and the contract is to be completed on the 15th of July, of the present year.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to know if the minister has adopted any plan or rule as to what work shall be done by day labour, and what work by contract, or whether all new works of construction are to be done by contract ? Are there any particular classes of buildings that the department construct by contracts, and are there any other classes where the department adopts the rule of constructing them by day labour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As a rule we erect all new public buildings by tender and contract. There are very few exceptions. I do not remember any case where a new public building has been erected otherwise than by contract.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In the Department of Marine and Fisheries I think they still continue the practice of building lighthouses by day labour. I think the rule was that where the work cost less than $10,000, that was the better plan of doing the work, and they had an official, Mr. Noble, who had charge of these works in the different provinces. That rule, I understand, has been abandoned in the Department of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Would my hon. friend advocate such a rule ? I would like to have his views.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I practiced that rule, though not absolutely. I referred to the experience of the department, which I think has been continued, and I mentioned the name of the gentleman whose time was wholly occupied in supervising the construction of these lights. My inquiry was as to whether such a rule still obtains. I understand it does not in the Department of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the minister to say the other day that in his experience most public works could be carried out quite as well by day labour as under contract, and he gave as an illustration the building of his dredges at Sorel, and the building and repair of harbours. Now he seems to have come to another conclusion, and he thinks the proper course is to let the work by contract. If it is a proper course to pursue to let the erection of a building by tender, although it may only cost $5,000 or $6,000, surely, by the same parity of reasoning, the same ought to apply to the building of a wharf or a vessel. I can understand why it might not apply in the case of the government operating a shipyard of its own, but in a hundred and one instances the minister has adopted this system of doing work by day's labour, and he defended it the other night on the ground that the contract system, was, in his experience considerable of a failure.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It has not been a failure in every case. Public buildings have been erected by contract. Most of the important works have been constructed by contract also. I am constructing some smaller works by day's labour. I may say in all frankness that doing work by contract gives a minister a good deal less trouble, as all those who have been in office will admit, but there are works that cannot possibly be given by contract and it was while discussing these works a few days ago that I said what the hon. gentleman for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) has alluded to. The repairing of a public building cannot possibly be done by contract because you never know in advance the quantity of work you must carry out. Works of repairs cannot be done by contract.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Small repairs.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, you cannot do them in that way. As to larger works, while I spoke the other day very much from a theoretical standpoint, I would say it is necessary for a prudent man to have a good foreman when he makes up his mind to do work by day's labour. Unless he has a good foreman, I would not advise any one to undertake public work by day's labour.

Mr. CLARKE. It was stated the other day that the practice of some municipalities was to do municipal work by day's labour and that it had been found to work out fairly satisfactorily. I may say frankly that under proper conditions I am very much in favour of work being done by day's labour, but I want to point out that the methods adopted by the government are not such as to enable that system to be tried as fairly and successfully as it ought to be done. The municipalities that I have any knowledge of which have adopted the day's labour system ask for tenders for all the supplies that they require for a municipal work or service that they undertake to do by day's labour. That practice does not apply in the department of the hon. gentleman, or in the department of any of his colleagues. If they desire to strangle the system of doing work by day's labour they will persist in the course they have pursued. If the best possible results are to be obtained, why not take a leaf out of the book of the municipalities, why not ask for public competition to supply the government that purports to do work by day's labour with the best materials procurable at the lowest possible price ? The plan which the hon. Minister of Public Works has adopted in carrying out public works by day's labour is not to call for public tenders for the supplies that are required, but rather to give orders here and there to political friends. And then, in the selection of workmen to do this work, no municipality that I know of would confine the giving of employment to men of one political stripe. Why should workingmen who do not agree with the hon. Minister of Public Works, or who may not agree with any political party, be deprived of the right to receive a reasonable amount of employment on public works ? They will have to contribute their share towards the cost and maintenance of these public works and the plan adopted now is a plan designed to militate against the development of the principle of doing government work by day's labour. If the hon. Minister of Public Works is really sincere, if he is honest in the desire to give a fair trial to that system, he must amend his methods considerably. I take it that the hon. minister is honest in striving to apply that principle to all of these small works, but I would point out to him most respectfully that he is doing that principle or system of doing work a very great injury. If he is really sincere he must in future purchase supplies by public tender and he must not confine the giving of employment to men who are to be engaged to do this work by day's labour, of one political stripe. I ask the hon. minister if he has any plan as to the magnitude of the work to be done by day's labour; that is to say, if works that would cost a certain sum are to be given by contract and works of less magnitude are to be done by day's labour ? There does not seem to be any plan now. Some works costing $3,000 or $4,000 may be done by day's labour and works involving an expenditure of a smaller sum may be done by contract. If the hon. minister would decide as to the magnitude of the work that may be done by day's labour and of that which may be done by contract, ask for supplies by public tender and not give employment to men of one political stripe only in carrying out that work, I am perfectly satisfied that much more satisfactory results would be obtained. I am not in favour of indiscriminately doing public work by day's labour as it has been done, but I am strongly in favour of giving the system of doing government work by day's labour a fair chance, and that is what I claim it has not been given by the hon. Minister of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am in a very peculiar position. The reproach has often been made to me by a good many of my political friends that I am still employing opponents of the present government. My hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) is unfair, though not knowing it, I am sure, when he seems to level at me the reproach of being altogether exclusive. May I be allowed to tell him just now that the addition which has been erected here by day's labour, has been under the control of one of my officers, not a permanent officer, who is a strong opponent of the present government.

An hon. MEMBER. Turn him out.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Turn him out, I am told. That is just the way. On one side the minister is told by his political friends to turn out everybody who is not in sympathy with him, and on the other hand, when he comes to the House, the opposition—it is fair warfare, and I have no complaint to make—tell him : Well, you are in office, but you have no right to exercise patronage in the interest of your own party. When we were in office we did not do anything of the kind, but do not do it now, if you please ! That is my position; between the two I try to be fair. I give a preference to my political friends, and it is my right and duty to do so, but I say that when I leave office I think I will be able to bear the testimony for myself that I have not cut off all the heads that others might have cut off. When an officer does his duty well he has a right to be protected, and he has a right to vote as he pleases. But my hon. friend will admit with me, that in a riding where a public work is going on, the preference has to be given to a large extent to political friends. Nobody would do anything else. As to the supplies, we buy upon quotations, as all firms do, and most of the time we ask for tenders. I suppose it is impossible to lay down a fixed rule in advance as to the works that can be carried out by day's labour. If you find a good foreman and material at hand, you can successfully carry out the work by day's labour.

Mr. CLANCY. The minister has just demonstrated that the contention advanced by this side of the House is well founded. He would have us believe that he does this solely for the interest of the working men, the words are scarcely cold on his lips when he tells us of the insuperable difficulties he encounters. I have no doubt of the hon. gentleman's goodness of heart, but I have very great doubt as to his strength to carry out his intentions. He knows very well that when he starts on the system of day's labour the work will be pounced upon and monopolized by his political friends. He does not pursue his course in the interest of the working men of Canada, but in the interest of the partisans of the government. Under our system that seems to be the rule, and personally I do not complain at it, but I do complain of the hon. gentleman pretending that he has adopted this system in the interest of the working men, when we all know that he has adopted it in the interest of his political friends. The hon. gentleman says that he does his very best, but I can tell him that his best under such circumstances is worthless. When contracts are let every man gets a chance of employment according to his merits, but when the work is done by day's labour it simply amounts to an unfair use of public patronage. The minister tells us that he gave this work to a man in his department who was a Conservative. Would he turn out that man because he was a Conservative ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I could have done it.

Mr. CLANCY. Oh, I suppose the hon. gentleman could, and I suppose he is astounded at his moderation because he did not do it, but I can tell him that if he did so, it would be adding another sin to the many he is guilty of.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not guilty this time anyway.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not complain for one of the patronage going to the Liberals of this country under our present system, but I do complain of the minister claiming that he is benefiting the workingmen of Canada when he is simply benefiting his own partisans.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. On what authority did the Minister of Public Works erect a building costing over $5,000 without letting it out by contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I stated that the building had been erected under the supervision of a man who is a strong political opponent of ours.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. By day's labour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. It could not be done any other way.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The minister must know that the law of the land prevents him from doing that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The statutory law makes it incumbent on you to give a contract for any building costing over $5,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no law of that kind.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. There is an Order in Council which in a sense is higher than a statute, because it has been approved by the government itself. I have heard that principle contended for time and time again when the Liberals were in opposition, but perhaps they have disregarded their principles more in this than even in other matters. I always understood that we asked the minister if the work would be given by contract whenever a vote was taken, but perhaps we did not do so in this case.

SIR CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Here is the Order in Council.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I know the Order in Council very well.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. This Order in Council states :

Order in Council, May 23rd, 1880. On a joint memorandum, dated March 20th, 1880, from the Honourable the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways and Canals, recommending that hereafter all public works involving an expenditure of over $5,000 shall be let by public tender and contract, unless owing to urgency or other cause it be deemed advisable to take different action, and that in all such cases authority be obtained by an Order in Council.

Probably the Minister of Public Works did not even get an Order in Council passed. All expenditures such as this are illegal except in the case of a canal breaking or some work of emergency. The Minister of Public Works disregards Acts of parliament, Orders in Council and everything else. I do not know of any possible way of keeping him within the principles which were so earnestly advocated by his friends when in opposition. An Act of parliament won't do it, an Order in Council won't do it, and I don't suppose we can secure a vote of censure from the House on the conduct of the hon. minister.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think that my hon. friend could get the censure of the House, because there is no ground for it. The hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken in his interpretation of the law. I invite him to read it; it is very clear :

The minister shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of all works, except in cases of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest or in which from the nature of the work it can be more expeditiously and economically executed by the officers in the service of the department.

The minister is perfectly free.

Mr. CLARKE. What are you quoting from ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Public Works Act.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. minister must see, if he reads it again, that it bears no such interpretation as he says. Unless it can be otherwise done better by the department——

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Of which the minister himself is the judge.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly; if not, who is the judge ? But more than that there is an Order in Council, to which my hon. friend probably has meant to allude, which provides that all works costing over $5,000, and done by contract must be advertised. I cannot give a contract for any work costing over $5,000 without advertising for tenders; but if I make up my mind to carry out by day's labour any work, whatever the cost may be, I am perfectly free to do it. Whenever I give a contract for a work costing over $5,000 without tender, I must go to my colleagues; but if I want to carry out any work by day's labour, I am perfectly free to do it, and it was done over and over again by the late administration. For instance, I have often cited the case of the post office and custom-house of St. John, New Brunswick, the work on which cost over $200,000, and was done by day's labour.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It was a case of emergency; the roof was burnt, and it had to be repaired.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Was there an Order in Council for the addition to this building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, there was not, and it was not necessary. I did not give any contract for the work; I carried it out by day's labour, as I had a right to do.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has just said that he has not the right to do it without an Order in Council where the cost exceeds $5,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sorry I have not made myself understood. I cannot give a contract for over $5,000 without an Order in Council, but I can carry out by day's labour any work, whatever the cost may be, without any Order in Council. That is the law.

Mr. CLARKE. I am not finding very particular fault with the Minister of Public Works for doing work by day labour; but I hold that the method he is adopting is not giving that system fair play. As one who desires to see the system of day labour more generally adopted, I protest that the method at present followed in the Public Works Department is not conducive to the continuance of that system. If the day labour system is to be successful, it must be divorced entirely from partisanship ; but that unfortunately has not been the case. If it is germane to this discussion, as we have the Minister of Labour in his seat now, I particularly ask the Minister of Public Works what he has to say of the circular or letter which was sent out by the Postmaster General when acting as Minister of Public Works two years ago to his political friends throughout the country, with regard to doing work by day labour or by contract. I find that a copy of the letter, which was sent by the Postmaster General to his political friends in March, 1900, is spread on 'Hansard' of July 13, 1900.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may say that I never read it.

Mr. CLARKE. I will read two or three lines of it, and I want to know what the minister will do about it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will judge fairly.

Mr. CLARKE. I am sure he will judge fairly between the Minister of Labour and the Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Is it long?

Mr. CLARKE. The letter contains a good many clauses, but I will only read the fifth clause :

In case of any work not now under contract, but authorized by vote of parliament, please state whether you advise its being carried out by contract or by day's labour.

I want to know from the minister whether the advantage that a political party may obtain by work being done by day labour or by contract is the only one to be taken into consideration, or does he think that that method of doing work should be applied ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I want to read the whole letter. I cannot judge an important document of that kind without reading the whole of it.

Mr. CLARKE. The gentleman wanted to know if it was a long letter, and I wished to spare him the reading of the whole of it. But I will read the whole of it. It is to be found in 'Hansard' of 1900, at page 10,110 :

Ottawa, March 13, 1900.

My dear Sir,—During Mr. Tarte's absence I have been requested to take charge of his department for him, and it would be of great service in enabling me to take up his work if you would kindly write me at your earliest convenience with reference to the following subjects :

1. For what works in your constituency has there been a parliamentary vote ?
2. Have these works been begun ? If so, in what state of progress are they ?
3. If not begun, what is your advice as to whether or not they should be begun ?
4. Are you asking for provision being made in supplementary estimates for :
(a) New works ;
(b) Carrying on or completion of works already authorized or begun ?
If so, what are your views :
(a) As to sum required ;
(b) As to what work should be performed ?
5. In case of any work not now under contract, but authorized by vote of parliament, please state whether you advise its being carried out by contract or by day's labour.

Yours faithfully,
WM. MULOCK.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I think it is a document that is worthy of attention. My hon. friend was new to the Department of Public Works; he did not know the work of the department as well as I did, and he wanted information, and I congratulate him on his desire to do right.

Mr. CLARKE. And evidently he could not get any information in the department.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not see anything wrong in that document. My hon. friend the Postmaster General was simply asking for advice, as my hon. friend opposite would have done under similar circumstances.

Mr. CLARKE. Then the idea that has been disseminated most carefully by the hon. gentleman and his friends opposite, that they believe in this system of day labour, is not very well founded. Political exigencies evidently have guided them so far, and judging by the statement of the Minister of Public Works and the letter from the Postmaster General which I have just read, there is not much hope of any reform in that direction.

Mr. GANONG. I had occasion last session to call attention to the manner in which a large public work in the county I have the honour to represent is being conducted. That public work has resolved itself into an immense political job, neither more nor less. This is easy accounted for by the frank statement which the minister has made to-day. He has told us in plain terms that preference would be given on government works to the political friends of the party in power. The hon. gentleman can certainly find no fault with the manner in which that principle is carried out on the work at Wilson's Beach. When an applicant asks for employment on this particular work, he is asked whether he paws with the right foot, and it would be interesting to learn from the hon. minister if that is another of the many graphic phrases which have made his name a household word. Well, if the applicant paws with the right foot, he gets the job. Otherwise he does not. If the hon. minister is responsible for this system of selection, if he has sent out a circular to ascertain how many people down there paw with the right foot, I would ask him to take the House into his confidence and let us know.

There have been considerable purchases of material in connection with this work, and I doubt whether in any single instance tenders have been called for. In the Auditor General's Report, we find one purchase of timber exceeding $8,000 and another exceeding $2,000.

Mr. SPROULE. Were any tenders asked?

Mr. GANONG. Not so far as we know. No doubt the parties who furnished this timber pawed with the right foot. Certainly the firm of T. McAvity & Sons, which furnished supplies to the extent of $1,342, comes within this category. Has the hon. gentleman sent out his mandate that only those who paw with the right foot will be given work on this breakwater ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot gratify my hon. friend's curiosity with regard to pawing by either the right or left foot, but I think the House will find that his indignation is rather out of place when I inform it that we asked for tenders on this work and did not receive any, consequently I had to carry on that work by day labour. I suppose my hon. friend, if he had called for tenders and had not received any, would not have done the work either with his right or left foot. I, however, am doing the work with both feet and both hands.

Mr. GANONG. Were any tenders called for, in the case of the lumber and other supplies ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say. Those are details that were left to the engineer.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The Minister of Public Works put his own interpretation on the Order in Council. He says it only applies to contracts over $5,000 and does not apply to work done by day labour. The hon. gentleman is the first minister to venture to put that interpretation upon it. But what does he care about Orders in Council or Acts of parliament. They are not binding on him. The words in the Order in Council are as clear as possible :

On a joint memo. dated March 20th, 1880, from the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways and Canals, recommending that hereafter all public works involving an expenditure of over $5,000 shall be let for public tender and contract, unless, owing to urgency or other cause, it be deemed advisable to take a different action, and in all such cases authority must be obtained by Order in Council.

The hon. gentleman says he never got such authority, but he puts up the plea that while he could not enter into a contract of over $5,000 without calling for tenders, he could employ day labour to any extent.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the hon. gentleman would read the whole Order in Council, he would find that it deals solely with public tenders and contracts. That is a view which has always been acted upon both by myself and by predecessors. It is no use trying to interpret an Order in Council by quoting only a part of it. The hon. gentleman knows very well that there is no difficulty in any minister carrying on a work by day labour or by contract if he makes up his mind to go to his colleagues.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He gets an Order in Council.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That has never been done.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Always.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Never in the Department of Public Works. At any rate in the present instance, the work has been given by public tender and contract.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What was the deposit ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Ten per cent.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who was the successful contractor ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Harrington.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How were tenders called for ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. By advertisement in the newspapers.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In what newspapers ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say now. If my hon. friend wants to know whether the advertisements were put in the Conservative newspapers, I can tell him they were not.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No, what I want to know is what opportunity was given the public to know that tenders were called for ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We published all our advertisements in the Ottawa papers and in the North-west papers as well.

Mr. CLARKE. With regard to the Wilson's Beach breakwater, the hon. minister has said that he advertised for public tenders and could not get any. Where were these advertisements published ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In many of the newspapers of New Brunswick and also in Ottawa, I have no doubt.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In 'La Patrie' ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, I believe 'La Patrie' has a very large circulation.

Mr. CLARKE. There has been $14,000 to $15,000 expended on that work already. Is it possible that for such a work the hon. minister could not get tenders ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I could not.

Mr. CLARKE. After advertising ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, it has happened to the department several times.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). I would like to say a few words on this public tender and day labour question. We on this side claim that the healthiest way of doing the public work is to advertise for tenders. The Minister of Public Works, on the other hand says that the work will be done more cheaply, by day labour. No doubt there are cases where it is absolutely necessary to do the work by day labour. It seems to me there are many cases in which it would be more economical to do the work by public tender than by day's labour, as it is done now. In five years there has been an increase of $10,000,000 in the cost of the public service, and possibly this system of doing work may account for some of that increase. Let me give the minister a small example in my own county. In 1896, there was a ferry across the Burlington channel. It was operated by hand, one man being in charge. Another man was in charge of the lighthouse. They received, together, about $900. In 1896 or 1897, a swing bridge was built. It now takes four men to operate that swing bridge, although the bridge is moved by power furnished by the Radial Railway, and all a man has to do is to touch a lever. These men are paid by the day. If the contract for working this bridge were let out, as the Postmaster General lets out contracts for carrying mail over short routes, the work could be done for $300 or $400 a year. The bridge is not operated at night, but only from 6 a.m. to 11 p.m. The work of the bridge could be done by one man, while another could attend the lighthouse and might assist at the bridge, as the lighthouse requires not more than two hours labour a day. Yet, it now costs $1,900 to do this work, which is so much less laborious than before, when it cost only $900. Of course, there is one gain to the hon. minister, for all the men employed there vote the hon. gentleman's ticket.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Years ago there was a ferry at Burlington channel. But before I came into office a swing bridge was placed there. I would have been glad to put it there, because there should be a swing bridge over the Burlington channel. But, as a matter of fact, I had nothing to do with putting it there. I suppose that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith, Wentworth) does not understand the work or he would not talk about it as he does. What is the use of talking about one man doing the work ? The bridge must be operated, and there are windy days and there are days when the strength of one man would not be sufficient. And, in any case, this has no bearing upon the question of day's labour.

Mr. GANONG. There is a phase of this question of day's labour which has not yet been spoken of. Take, for instance, the work at Wilson's Beach. I speak of that because it is in my own county. Though that work had not been going on for quite a year, there has been expended for tools and other articles necessary for the workmen between $800 and $900. By the time it is completed probably $1,500 or $2,000 will have been expended in furnishing the necessary tools and other articles for carrying on the work. This will be added to the nominal cost of the work by, perhaps, from five to ten per cent. And the hon. minister knows that when the work is done these axes and adzes and manilla rope and other things will not be in sight.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ganong) is a sound business man, and he will agree that the Department of Public Works cannot carry on works without tools. This work could not be let by tender, and it is not fair to charge to this work all the cost of these tools. We are in the position of a public contractor who has a plant. Though we buy tools for a certain work those tools are used elsewhere. These workmen are electors of my hon. friend (Mr. Ganong), and surely they are honest men and are not going to steal these tools.

Mr. GANONG. I can only say that the hon. gentleman will need to put up a larger building than he has ever put up yet, if he continues to do public work in this manner, because he will have more tools accumulated from works done from the Atlantic to the Pacific than could be stored in any public building so far constructed.

Mr. BLAIN. I understood the hon. minister to say that the new additions to the parliament buildings cost $75,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect, who is within hearing of my hon. friend's (Mr. Blain's) voice, tells me that the cost will amount to about $50,000, and this includes the two elevators. There will be an item in the suplementary estimates for this addition, and when it comes up, I shall be glad to give the hon. gentleman all information.

Mr. BLAIN. One thing I should like to learn is what proportion of this $50,000 will be wages and what proportion will be material ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When this item is before us, I will have the information.

Mr. GANONG. There is another item to which I wish to call attention in connection with this work at Wilson's Beach. I notice there is an item for Foreman Ethelbert Savage—this is during the month of June—and also for Foreman James Johnston. The minister is probably not aware, but I can tell him why it was necessary to have two foremen in doing this work by day's labour. I am well advised that they carried the timber there, dumped it into the water, hauled it up on a lot rented by the government, fitted it, as well as one foreman was able to do it to go into position. Then it was hauled down to the pier, but it was found that it did not fit so that another foreman was needed to fit it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I can only say that the reason we employed two foremen was that there were two different works, the work of repairs and the construction of a new work. My hon. friend knows very well that two foremen would be required, and he is only trying to make a little political capital.

Dominion Public Buildings—N. W. T. Court houses, police accommodation, &c., $1,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Would the minister give us some information about this item of $1,000 for court-house, lock-up and police accommodation, &c.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is for all court-houses and lock-ups in the North-west Territories.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Then it ought to have been 'court-houses' instead of 'court-house'.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, it means court-house accommodation.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. On what principle is that money expended ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Caretakers write to the chief architect that such and such work needs to be done, and the chief architect authorizes it.

Dominion public buildings—Renewals, improvements, repairs, &c., $4,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What did the hon. gentleman spend last year, and in what parts of the Territories ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We spent $1,639.41 up to the month of December.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. For what was the money used ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A great number of items : Calgary court-house, $5 ; Calgary land and registry office, $4.40 ; Calgary post office, $53.74 ; Edmonton post office, $24.25 ; Edmonton immigrant shed, $4.50 ; Edmonton registry office, $74.80; Lethbridge immigrant buildings, $1.57 ; Lethbridge post office, $90.33 ; Land office, $2.50 ; Macleod custom-house, $40 ; Moose-jaw court-house, $20 ; Moosomin, $7.50 ; Moosomin barracks, $6 ; Prince Albert court-house $61 ; Prince Albert land office, $75 ; Regina court-house, $416.70 ; Dominion land office, $2 ; Rossland immigrant house, $149.-60 ; North-west Territories, generally, $288.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What instructions are given to the officers there ? Do they make just such repairs as they see fit ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, they always make requisitions, which are approved by the chief architect.

Edmonton Jail, $10,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have now before Council a report asking to be authorized to purchase a site, and the site has been chosen by the Department of Justice. They see that they will be obliged in the future to have a penitentiary, and they have found a site of 150 acres. It was intended at first to have both a jail and a court-house, but after considering the circumstances the government has concluded to build only a jail. It is badly needed. It will provide accommodation for 40 male prisoners and 10 or 15 female prisoners. I do not intend to spend more than $20,000 or $25,000 on the jail. My officers tell me that we cannot build a jail for that money, exclusive of the site. Of course I do not want to bind myself against the opinion of my chief architect, but it seems to me that with $25,000 we can build a jail.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I understand it was originally proposed to build a court-house, and there was a report as to what that would cost. What was the amount ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot remember. I am informed that no estimate was made of the cost of both a jail and court-house.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. But a vote was taken a few years ago.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. When was the land bought ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The land was negotiated for during last August, I think, from Mr. T. McDougall and Mr. Kenneth McDonald.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How was the value of it settled ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The late Minister of Justice conducted all the negotiations for the purchase of the site. He sent me a report telling me that he had taken an option upon this property.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What did you pay ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $8,950. The late Minister of Justice with whom I discussed the question told me that he thought he had made a great bargain.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That the vendor had made a great bargain ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, he, the Minister of Justice.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the hon. minister to say that in purchasing the site he purchased 150 acres.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. The Department of Justice seeing that they would be obliged to erect a penitentiary and finding a suitable site took an option upon it. It will be for the time being a kind of penitentiary because there will be prisoners incarcerated there.

Mr. SPROULE. I presume the Minister of Justice intends to start a model farm out there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I suppose they will do the same thing there as at other penitentiaries. They will make the prisoners work, and it is a good thing too.

Mr. MORIN. What is the population of Edmonton ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot give the exact population—I think 5,000 or 6,000.

Mr. MORIN. I will tell you the population. It is 2,626.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is the centre of a large district.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that the hon. minister has paid a very high price for that site if he has paid $9,000. From whom did he purchase it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have just said that the site was bought by the late Minister of Justice from Mr. McDougall and Mr. Kenneth McDonald.

Mr. SPROULE. Of Edmonton ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I suppose so. I do not know them. I only know the Minister of Justice in this case.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose the building is to be put up by contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. By contract.

Mr. SPROULE. There were no tenders asked for the site, I presume ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, if we must advertise for sites, I give it up. I cannot do it.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Macleod—Court-house and jail, $12,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have selected a site there on government property so that we did not have to buy it. We have decided to erect a building of the same nature as that at Medicine Hat which has cost $10,000. The people of the town would like something more expensive but we will not go beyond that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the contract been let ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Why are you asking $12,000 for a $10,000 building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The $2,000 extra will be for heating and fittings and so on. I intend to ask for tenders this summer for a $10,000 building and I do not intend to spend more than $12,000.

Red Deer—Court-house, lock-up and land office, $2,300.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have bought a site for $840. The lot is 250 x 178 feet.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. From whom did you buy that land ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My officers have not given me the name but I will get it if the hon. gentleman wishes it.

Mr. SPROULE. Last year the vote was $6,700 and the revote now is $5,700, and you are now asking $2,300. There must be something wrong about that. Do you expect to spend that $5,700 before the first of July ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have spent $840 for a site. We have simply made a mistake in addition.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the estimate for that building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Just the amount voted—$8,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. No advertisements have been published ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, but it will be advertised, and will be given by tender.

Red Deer Valley immigrant building, $1,000.

Mr. GILMOUR. Where is that building to be situated ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On lot 20, block 4, section 16-17, township 30, range 27. That is all I know about it.

Mr. GILMOUR. Is it in the neighbourhood of Red Deer village ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I must plead a certain amount of ignorance. The site has been chosen after consultation with the Minister of the Interior, who has charge of immigration.

Mr. HENDERSON. Where is the Minister of the Interior ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He is ill, I am sorry to say.

Mr. INGRAM. Too much election.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It makes a fellow sick at times.

Mr. SPROULE. Surely this building is in the same place as the court-house and jail ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The court-house is in the town.

Mr. SPROULE. Have you purchased the site ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. What has it cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have paid $75 for it. It was bought from Messrs. Nanton & Munson.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the size ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The size is not indicated.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did the Department of Public Works negotiate the purchase ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, I think so. Sites are bought in this way, since I am asked. The Department of Justice is our agent for all these purchases. We choose a site ; the Department of Justice is then applied to, and they negotiate, examine the title, and pass the deed.

Mr. GILMOUR. Perhaps the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) will be able to tell us where this immigrant building is ?

Mr. OLIVER. The site of the proposed building is in the village of Red Deer, in the southern part of the village, on the east side of the railway track.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In regard to this purchasing of sites, the explanation of the hon. minister did not seem to be altogether satisfactory. This afternoon the hon. gentleman was good enough to state that the late Minister of Justice had undertaken to negotiate the purchase of the site for the Edmonton court-house and jail, which cost $9,000, and the hon. minister could give us no facts on which we might reach a conclusion as to whether that was an exorbitant price or otherwise. Now the hon. gentleman says that the practice is that the Department of Justice is concerned only to search the title and pass the conveyance. That is the ordinary rule. Can the hon. gentleman say how it is that this exceptional course seems to have been adopted of entrusting the Department of Justice with the work of arranging the purchase of the property ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no objection to state what has taken place. Before that purchase was made I had been in consultation with the hon. member for Alberta, and we had come to the conclusion to purchase another site. The late Minister of Justice came before council with another project. He stated that it was his intention, and he thought it was good policy, to prepare for a penitentiary later on. He represented to us that he had found a site that was a very suitable one. He was an experienced gentleman, seventy years old, long in public life, and his colleagues entrusted him with the matter. In point of fact the report of council by which I was authorized to purchase this site was his own. All I had to do in connection with the purchase of the site was to ratify his action.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I think the statement of the minister is unsatisfactory. He says the transaction is the work of his late colleague, and he washes his hands of it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is nothing to wash.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There may be a satisfactory explanation of what at first blush seems to be an exorbitant price, $9,000, for a site of this kind.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. One hundred and fifty acres of land.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I know, an enormous piece of land. There were reasons for that, no doubt, whether good or bad. We have no explanation as to why such a tract of land was required or what the intention of the department is in regard to it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The purpose of the late Minister of Justice was to provide for the penitentiary. No doubt one will soon be required there, and in the meantime the jail will serve for that purpose. The Prince Albert jail is a kind of penitentiary—so much so that I have nothing to do with its administration. Before preparing a report under my own signature, I had a consultation with the hon. gentleman who sits for that riding, and he told me that the transaction was in every way advisable.

Mr. TAYLOR. Where is it located ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A little out of the town. The hon. member for Alberta knows the place and can describe it.

Mr. OLIVER. At the request of the hon. Minister of Public Works, I can only say that the facts are exactly as he has stated them. The Department of Justice sent its trusted official to Edmonton and he decided that the needs for the present and the future were such as to require the purchase of a much larger piece of ground than the minister contemplated. He looked over the ground, and without any assistance from me in that part of the transaction, decided, on his own judgment, that this particular river claim—lot 20, I think—would answer the purpose exactly. He desired to secure a property closer to the town, but I objected because I did not think it desirable to have a penitentiary located too close to the town. He then decided that this property, which was the third river lot to the east of the boundary of the town, was just what was required. There are two coal mines on the property in operation at present. It has a river frontage, and is bounded by the lake in the rear. It belonged to two different parties, and is one of the oldest claims in the settlement. This official purchased the river frontage from the owner who had occupied it some twenty-five or thirty years at the rate of $75 per acre.

Mr. TAYLOR. What is his name ?

Mr. OLIVER. Terence Macdonald. He purchased the rear portion, which was not in occupation, from David McDougal for $50 per acre. Or rather, he secured options on the property at that price. The transfer has not yet been made and the options have expired, and I am not at all sure that the department could get the property at the money now.

Mr. GILMOUR. Does it front on the Saskatchewan river ?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, east of the town.

Mr. GILMOUR. How far from the town ?

Mr. OLIVER. About twenty or thirty chains.

Mr. GILMOUR. Did that option secure the coal mine ?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, subject to the present lessees holding. There are two lessees operating the coal mines, but their leases terminate in one or two years and the coal goes with the land.

Mr. SPROULE. What is land selling at in that vicinity ?

Mr. OLIVER. In some cases it goes from $7 to $10 an acre, at a distance from the town, and up to $100 per foot frontage on the main street.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I suppose the department contemplates utilizing this large acreage for farming purposes ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. For ordinary penitentiary purposes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. And also operating the coal mine ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, the prisoners must be employed in some way.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems a very large piece of ground for a penitentiary, if we take the quantity of land devoted to other penitentiaries. It would appear as if the minister contemplated something out of the ordinary there.

Saskatoon immigrant building, $2,500.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That work is under contract for the amount of $3,300. It was let by public tender on the 27th of October, 1901.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Why does the department not give it by day labour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The labour market at Saskatoon is not very large.

Yorkton—Court-house and jail, $4,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Will the hon. minister please explain this item ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is a mistake there. A mistake of the Department of Finance, I suppose.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Oh, no.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There has been a clerical error. I am blamed so often that I want to blame somebody else now.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the amount ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The amount should be $9,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How has that been spent ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have bought the land. Lots 7, 8, 11 and 12 on Front Street, and lots 42 and 44 on Argyle Avenue have been bought from the Canadian Pacific Railway for $279, and lots 5, 6, 9 and 10 on Front Street, and 42 and 43 on Argyle Avenue from Mr. J. J. Smith, for $279—a total of $588 for the site.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Tenders have not been asked for, I suppose? But this will be done by tender?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It will be by tender, but tenders have not been asked for.

Public Works—chargeable to income—British Columbia—Dominion public buildings—renewal, removements, repairs, &c., $6,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What was spent of last year's vote?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We seem to have spent $114 more than the appropriations.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Where were the expenditures made?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Nanaimo, custom-house; New Westminster, Dominion land's office, fisheries' office; Vancouver, examining warehouse; Victoria, drill hall, Marine hospital, post office, clerk of works' office, old custom-house; Kamloops, post office; William's Head, quarantine building; and general repairs; total $6,114.03.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Concerning the Vancouver public building, which is occupied by the post office and custom-house, has the hon. minister considered any improvement in that building? I believe there is no question but that the building is not large enough. In fact, I understand customs officers have to occupy a different building.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have received a petition stating the facts which my hon. friend has just stated. In this, I am bound to acknowledge that the hon. gentleman is right and that there is not enough accommodation, as in the case of other cities. But he must not lose sight of the fact that we have just completed an armoury and drill hall at Vancouver, a large and extensive building. I do not think I can extend any hope for this year, but I am convinced that either I or whoever may be the minister next year will be in a position to adopt a more progressive policy, not only toward Vancouver, but towards other cities as well.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Has the hon. minister caused any report to be made as to the accommodation there?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The only report I have is that the accommodation is inadequate.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yet, nothing is to be done.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not this year. A new building at Vancouver would involve a very large expenditure. The hon. gentleman lives there, and perhaps could suggest something. I should be glad to have his views.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I can only speak generally of the condition of things, which, I believe is really disgraceful. I have had no communication with any of the officials, but one has only to be there a short time to see that the building is quite inadequate for such a large and growing and busy community. The expression is everywhere among business men that the accommodation is very poor indeed. And, as the trade is increasing at a very rapid rate and the revenues of the country drawn from the community are growing, the people there have been in hopes—pressure, I think, was brought to bear by the board of trade on the department—that the condition of things would be improved. I think there will be universal disappointment, if not surprise, that the minister has not found the means of improving the condition of affairs.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend was a minister for more years than I have been. He knows that a minister cannot do everything. It is a question of policy, a question for the Council. There are demands from all parts of the country for increased accommodation. It takes a great deal of money to carry out all these improvements. In the meantime, if my hon. friend should, later on, have any suggestions to offer, I shall be glad to receive them.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. It struck me that if we could look so far into the future—and I have nothing to say against it—as to acquire an enormous tract of land that we did not immediately need, a community which gives so much into the general revenue would have a right to expect immediate action with regard to the demands which have been so long standing. I believe that this want of better accommodation in Vancouver began to be felt in the days of the old government when our revenues were not as buoyant as they are to-day. The need to-day is all the greater and the ground for dissatisfaction increased by the growth of the business of the city. Seeing that moneys are being voted to provide post office accommodation for communities that at present, whatever may be the hope of the future, are not paying so much into the exchequer as Vancouver is, the matter might well be brought to the attention of the minister.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am thankful to my hon. friend for calling my attention to the case; but he should not forget that we must be prudent—we are a prudent government. At the same time, by looking at the figures, he will be convinced that we have not done so badly for the province that he has adopted as his home—there are pretty large amounts of money in the estimates for public buildings in British Columbia. I have already reminded him that we have just built a large and expensive building in Vancouver. The government will not lose sight of the requirements of Vancouver, and I think the hon. gentleman will agree that we must not spend too much, especially when we have done so well for British Columbia.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must know very well from official communications from the government of that province that they complain that this government is not doing well by British Columbia. This government is receiving enormous contributions from that province, out of all proportion to the expenditure made in it, and out of all proportion to the relative expenditure and receipts in the other provinces. That is a standing grievance in the province of British Columbia to-day, as represented by formal memorial from the local government. But it was not from that point of view that I rose to speak ; it was from a knowledge I had that one of the most enterprising portions of the province was not being well treated in the matter of public institutions. I think there is reason for great complaint. Several times the hon. gentleman has referred to the large expenditures being made, I think, in connection with the drill shed ; but I do not suppose it was ever pretended that the concession of that public building to the community of Burrard, or Vancouver, was meant to delay the accommodation they had long expressed a desire to have for a custom-house and post office.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend may rest assured that I will not delay obtaining any necessary information a prudent minister should have before starting an important work. British Columbia has not failed to recognize lately that we have not done badly by that province. My hon. friend must admit that public opinion has demonstrated that British Columbia appreciates the efforts we have made on her behalf.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I happen to have a lively recollection of the manner in which that question was dealt with. I do not think the gentleman who was successful in the late election in Victoria would altogether endorse the position the Minister of Public Works takes. It is true that the opponents of the government complained against the niggardly treatment the province received at the hands of this government, considering the circumstances, and considering the amount of public money at their disposal. It is true also that the victorious candidate resorted to this method of reasoning : What can you expect if you send to parliament a gentleman who is opposed to the ministers who dole out the public funds ?—that is to say, according to the principles enunciated the other day.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They have not read my speech.

Hon. Mr. TARTE.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The argument that sent that gentleman here was I think not to the credit of the government, but it was one that prevailed, namely, that this crying injustice to the province might be remedied by sending a gentleman here in accord with the government of the day, and by that means they might obtain justice where justice would be denied to a free and independent member of the House who was not giving them a slavish support. That was the argument. It was not that the government had treated Victoria handsomely in the past ; on the contrary, the gentleman who won the election said that practically all that had been given to that constituency was the result of his private conferences with the ministers of the day, though he had not been clothed with authority as a representative. Of course the argument was pressed home that if he were a representative he would obtain a great deal more at the hands of this government than could a free and independent member of the House, and particularly more than a man who did not see eye to eye with them on all public questions. I do not think that any member from the province of British Columbia, judging from what I have heard there, will rise in his place and say that that province is being treated at all fairly or at all generously by the government of the day, in connection with the vast expenditures that are being made in other parts of Canada. They do not complain of these expenditures, but I think the complaint is universal that there has been and there is a shameful neglect of the very pressing interests of the province.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My last argument then is to ask my hon. friend to be kind enough to wait until next year.

Nelson public building, $25,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That work is under contract for the amount of $49,900. The contract is dated January 31st, 1901. Viau & Lemoine are the contractors. Mr. Viau is from Hull, and Mr. Lemoine from Pembroke. Public tenders were asked and they were the lowest.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did you ask for tenders in the press of the province ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How far has the work proceeded ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect tells me there is another story to be put up. They have got till the month of November to complete the work. Mr. J. A. McDonald, of Nelson, is superintending the work.

Rossland public building, $12,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contractor for this work is Mr. Thos. Bradbury, of Vancouver. That was also advertised in the press, and the tender accepted was for $44,050. The inspector is Mr. R. W. Gregor. It is a general public building to accommodate the post office, customs and inland revenue.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. How does that compare with the New Westminster public building in price ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A little higher, I am told.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman include in these contracts made in British Columbia a clause in regard to the employment of oriental labour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, there has never been any complaint.

Public buildings generally—construction of armouries, $37,000.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Would the hon. minister give an explanation in detail of the armouries he proposes building and state what the plan for each may be ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The armouries that we are building now and for the completion of which this $37,000 is asked, are these : Baddeck, Victoria county, N.S., cost $4,222, by contract; Sussex, N.B., $7,095; Dundas, Ont., $3,854; Kaslo, B.C., $9,700 ; Kamloops, B.C., $9,700 ; Nelson B.C., $9,700 ; Revelstoke, B.C., $9,700. The contracts for the armouries at Kaslo, Kamloops and Revelstoke have not yet been given out, but the tenders are in, so my officers tell me, so that the figures I have given in connection with these buildings are estimates and not the actual prices of the contracts. I may give some explanation in regard to the buildings if my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) wants it. The armoury at Baddeck is going to be a wooden, one-storey building, on a stone foundation.

Mr. GANONG. May I ask the hon. minister if this is to be built by day labour?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, the contract for the work has been given out. Mr. J. Treen, of North Sydney, is the contractor. The contract is for $2,250, but there are fittings, and so on, and that is the reason why we are asking for more money.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That will be a very poor affair. What kind of a building is it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is a wooden building. These plans are prepared by the Militia Department and by my own department, the architects of both departments approving of them.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What is the size of the building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Fifty-eight by thirty-four, containing four armouries each 20 x 8, and each having a room for the quartermaster's stores. For the armoury in Sussex the contractors are the Messrs. Wallace Bros. The contract is practically completed there.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What military buildings are there already at Sussex ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say. That I do not know at all. All I know is that this has been applied for and granted and is under contract.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). There are no buildings at Sussex of any consequence. The military property at Sussex had certain farm buildings on it. It was a farm which was purchased some ten or twelve years ago and there was a house and some outbuildings upon it, but there was no building suitable for an armoury such as is being constructed now. This armoury is for the infantry and for the cavalry, a very large cavalry regiment, one of the largest in New Brunswick, and the headquarters of it is at Sussex. The rifle ranges are located there, and the annual training takes place there. It is really the important centre of military affairs in New Brunswick.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What troops are there at Baddeck ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know ; I am only the builder, let the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence answer for the military side of it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The armoury at Baddeck is the central armoury for Cape Breton Island. The regiment there has six companies and is to be increased to an eight company battalion. It was necessary to have some place to take care of the arms and the colonel of the regiment decided, with the approval of the district officer comanding at Halifax, that that was the proper place to have it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Is it the policy of the minister to erect armouries for each battalion in every regimental district in Canada ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is really a question that would be better discussed on the militia estimates. However, I have no hesitation in saying at once that although that policy was decided upon when the new rifle was purchased recently, owing to the very great delay in getting suitable armouries and because the issue of the arms was kept back, it has been decided now, at once, to issue to all the rural battalions the new arms, whether they have central armouries or not.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I presume rural officers will be allowed to keep the new arms at the company headquarters ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Has the minister had under consideration the propriety of erecting company armouries, small, inexpensive buildings, for the care and storage of these arms at the various company headquarters ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No, but I am bound to say that in a great many cases I think it would be a desirable thing to do if it could be done at reasonable expense.

Mr. PRINGLE. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if this item includes the cost of the armoury, which, I understand, has been promised to the town of Cornwall ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. PRINGLE. There has been no provision made for an armoury in Cornwall ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Are there any troops at Sydney, or is there any armoury at Sydney ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A contract has been let to Messrs. J. Bowman & Company for $8,870. The building is 60 x 37 feet, two stories, basement, brick on stone foundation. Dundas is the headquarters of the 77th Wentworth Regiment.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Is it the purpose to spend as large a sum as this on a headquarters armoury for each rural regiment in Canada ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Why is the Wentworth battalion selected for such an expensive armoury as this ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There is no doubt that the cost of this building is beyond what was estimated. Dundas is a very enterprising town and no doubt the battalion there will grow and may in time become a city battalion. It is necessary for us to anticipate the future to some extent and while we are about it, to build an armoury which will be capable of accommodating more companies than it will be necessary to accommodate at the time of erection. I was led to understand that in this section of the country there was some development, which is likely to become greater in military sentiment, and that it would be proper to exceed to some extent the real needs of the moment.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Now that we are discussing this point, I would like to know the views of the House. My hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) with his experience in military matters, tells us that we are erecting a too expensive building.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I have not said so.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman has hinted that $8,000 is too much for an armoury at Dundas. The Minister of Militia and myself are met with constant demands for expensive buildings from military people and when we suggest that $5,000 or $8,000 is sufficient why they are ready to fly to arms. They want not only buildings, but expensive buildings, and on that score the province of Ontario does not come last.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am not opposing the item. I am glad to see Wentworth get the best armoury it can. It will be the largest building in the little village of Dundas. But great as the boom has been in the past, if the government go on for the next one thousand years, Dundas will probably not be entitled to a city battalion. It is toying with the House to talk that way. There are six companies in the Wentworth battalion and this $8,000 armoury will probably be used by perhaps two of these companies. Of course the arms may be stored there, but the armoury will only serve one or two of the companies. Why not give each company an armoury in the different villages throughout the county at a cost of $200 or $300 each. I will undertake to put nice little armouries at a cost of $250 each to hold the arms of each company in the Dominion of Canada. You do not want a parade ground. As a rule the arms are now kept in the captain's bedroom which may be 8 x 10 feet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Who would take care of these small buildings ?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The captain of each company is bound to take care of them under the law.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And heat them ?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). They do not need to be heated.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That would not do at all.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in saying that this armoury will only accommodate one or two companies of the Wentworth battalion. The whole battalion will be accommodated at this armoury and this was arranged before the construction of this building was undertaken.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not say that this armoury will not accommodate the whole battalion, but there are not more than two companies in Dundas, and I think there is only one. Only the local company in Dundas can use the armoury except when the battalion is marching into camp.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Each company will have a room.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). How can they use the rooms when they are twenty or thirty miles from the armoury.

Mr. PRINGLE. I wish to ask the minister if the question of erecting an armoury at Cornwall is under the consideration of the government. I understand from the local military authorities that there is a great necessity for an armoury in Cornwall, and during last session a very important delegation interviewed the minister and came away strongly under the impression that an armoury would be erected in that town. The military men of Cornwall are still under that impression. I understand that they even went so far as to select the site, and have been in communication with the minister on the subject. Is the matter under the consideration of the government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The question is certainly under consideration. We have received petitions and representations. As to the choice of a site I did not do anything of the kind.

Mr. PRINGLE. I do not say that the minister has selected a site, but I understand that the local authorities have recommended certain sites.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Nothing has been done towards the choice of a site. Representations have been made, but I do not know what fate they will meet with. I do not extend any promise.

Mr. BENNETT. I agree with the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) that it is highly desirable to have these armoury buildings in different parts of the counties. Take, for instance, the county of Simcoe, more particularly the east riding. The headquarters of the battalion are at the town of Barrie. I am not able to say who erected the building there, but I assume that it was the Department of Militia and Defence. It is a capacious brick building, and in it are stored the arms not only of the two companies of Barrie, but that of the adjoining township. At a distance of thirty miles is the town of Orillia. It would be unfair to ask that the arms of the Orillia company should be kept at Barrie, and as a matter of fact they are kept at Orillia. Then, at the village of Coldwater, fifteen or sixteen miles from Orillia, I know at one time the arms were stored over a store, a very poor and inaccessible place in case of fire. Further on, at a distance of twenty-five miles, is Penetang, which also has a company. Now, if there is one thing which to my mind tends to make the militia force of Ontario something of a success—and it is not as successful, I say with all due deference to military men, as it might be—it is the fact that a healthy rivalry is engendered in rifle competitions. In order to have successful marksmen it is necessary that they should have access at all times to their arms; but this is impossible if those arms are at a distance, in some cases of fifteen or twenty miles; and I quite agree with the hon. member for North Victoria that it would be desirable to have small armouries built at different parts of the counties. I am not quite so sanguine as to the cost of these buildings as he is, for I fear they would run considerably beyond the figure he has mentioned. I think each of these companies should be made more or less of a social club. Gentlemen who are conversant with the regiments in the cities know that the great success attained by them is due to the fact that to a certain extent they are social clubs. The armoury at the town of Barrie is fitted up as a gymnasium, and during the winter months the two companies of the town make it a place of resort; and if there were provided at the different towns headquarters not only for the storing of the arms of these companies, but with a fairly large sized room which could be used in the winter months for drilling and also as a gymnasium, I believe the success of our military organization would be very much promoted; and I hope the minister will make provision in the supplementary estimates for the establishment in East Simcoe of such armouries as I have mentioned.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask the minister if the architect who designed the Sussex armoury had any previous experience in designing armouries ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The plans of these armouries are prepared by both the architect of the Militia Department and by my architect.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman who designed the Sussex armoury did not understand his business very well, because he made no distinction between the rooms set apart for the infantry company and those for the cavalry squadrons. A cavalry squadron requires a room double the size an infantry company does, because in addition to the clothing and equipment of the men there is the clothing and equipment of the horses to be provided for. I want to bring this to the attention of the minister, so that the necessary changes will be made.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I can only say that we never go on with work of that kind without the plan being approved by the Militia Department; and, as a rule, the military people in a place where the armoury is to be built, see the plans before they are carried out. If there has been a mistake there, it has not been represented to us.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am very glad the hon. gentleman has mentioned the fact. I will make inquiries to-morrow, and see who is responsible for my part of the matter.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to inquire of the hon. minister if in this vote any provision is made for building an armoury at Gananoque. We have a battery of artillery as well as an infantry company there, and I understand that a few years ago the government purchased a site there, and paid a very large price for it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Will the hon. gentleman tell me when it was bought ? I never bought one.

Mr. TAYLOR. Ask the Minister of Militia. You had a drill shed there, but you tore it down and purchased a site to build a new one, but went no further; and to-day the guns belonging to the battery and the arms belonging to the infantry are stored in a lumber yard down near the railway track. I think some provision should be made for taking better care of the government property than you are doing there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. All I know is that my department did not pay for a site. The Minister of Militia and Defence thinks that perhaps a site was bought there.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I would be very pleased to see battalion armouries built as well as company armouries. When I made the estimate of $200 for a company armoury, I had taken the precaution of consulting a good Liberal contractor. I furnished him with the sizes of what I thought would be suitable for a country armoury for forty-two men, in which to store their rifles and equipment, and he said he would undertake to put up nice little brick buildings all over the country for less than $200 each. All that is required is one room, though I would be glad to see the companies provided with such a room as the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) suggests. My object is to get the whole country equipped with armouries as soon as possible; but if it were to cost $8,000 or $9,000 for each battalion, I am afraid that long as the hon. Minister of Public Works is likely to hold his job, some one else will be occupying that place before all the buildings will be completed. Reference has been made to the 77th Battalion getting this $8,000 armoury. That battalion has six companies. No. 1 company is at Dundas; No. 2 company is at Waterdown, to the east; No. 3 company is at Binbrook; No. 4 company is at Ancaster, on the other side of Hamilton; No. 5 company is at Stony Creek, between that and Niagara Falls, and No. 6 company is at Glanford. In other words it was simply a large public building for the town of Dundas. I am not objecting to the expenditure if the country can afford it. I am not opposed to any expenditure on behalf of the militia, but what I do say is that the rural companies should also have their armouries.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I really do not believe, speaking as a layman, that a $200 building would be suitable.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Make it $500.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I could not believe that the country would entertain the idea of erecting $200 buildings and I would not encourage it at all.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I venture to say that more than half the arms in the maritime provinces and Ontario are stored to-day in buildings, the entire cost of which is not $500. I refer to the whole building in which the caretaker and his family live.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That does not prove anything.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It proves that the arms are kept in the back rooms of such buildings and kept in very good condition. We require the armouries, let the cost be what it may, and do not want the battalions to have to wait ten or twenty years for this accommodation.

Mr. SPROULE. As the hon. minister has invited an expression of opinion regarding the desirability of expensive armouries or the incurring of heavy expenditure to erect expensive buildings for the purpose of storing arms, personally my feeling has always been against such expenditure. While I would be disposed to vote any reasonable amount to keep up the efficiency of our militia, I have never felt that it is wise to spend such large sums in building these large armouries and drill halls in different towns and villages. I can understand, of course, the ambition of towns and villages to have fine and expensive buildings. Every town, if it gets a public building, wants to have it as expensive and showy as possible. That may be a praiseworthy ambition, but is it the part of wisdom for us to give way to it ? My opinion always has been that while we should provide suitable accommodation, we should provide it at the least possible outlay to the country, and that while we should do all that is required in the interest of the militia, we should be careful not to be carried away by too great a desire for display.

Mr. CLARKE. Is it intended to spend any part of this money in enlarging the drill shed at Toronto ? Has anything been done since last session to give the additional accommodation so urgently required there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are just now engaged in re-building one of the walls of that drill shed. The wall to which my hon. friend called attention last year is being rebuilt.

Mr. CLARKE. Will that give any additional accommodation ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That question is under discussion now. When the supplementary estimates come down we will know more.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think it would be a great mistake to construct very expensive buildings, in very elaborate style, for the accommodation of the arms and accoutrements of the militia. If that plan were adopted, it would be a long time before we could obtain homes for our different militia battalions. I may be permitted to say that I have endeavoured to set a good example myself in my own county for my own battalion, by having an armoury erected there at an expense of less than $1,000, which is ample to accommodate a battalion of ten companies.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is only $100 a company, and I have suggested $200.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not want to occupy the time of the committee more than is absolutely necessary, but I feel bound to impress again on the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Militia the absolute necessity of giving additional accommodation to the military forces of Toronto in the drill shed. This is not the first time that matter has been drawn to the attention of the hon. minister. I shall not dilate on the subject, but will content myself with reading half a dozen lines from the report of the proceedings of this House on April 16th last. In that report, I quoted a letter from the commanding officer of military district No. 2, Colonel Otter, to the corporation of the city of Toronto. On the 22nd March last, Colonel Otter wrote from Stanley barracks to the chairman of the property committee.

Sir,—I have the honour to make application, on behalf of a portion of the local militia force, for the temporary use of the 'Arcade,' St. Andrew's market, for the purpose of storing guns, wagons and harness.

With the present strength of the city corps, it is impossible to find enough accommodation in the armouries, and pending the providing of such, I am compelled to appeal to the municipal authorities as no place adapted for the purpose in view can be obtained.

I cannot make a stronger appeal to the hon. minister than to read this request from the district officer commanding to the municipal authorities in Toronto for temporary accommodation of guns, stores and ammunition in one of the municipal buildings. Of course the municipal corporation are always very pleased to give accommodation, if they can, to the militia forces and meet the wishes of the officer commanding in that respect, but when I remind the hon. minister that the city of Toronto gave $140,000 for the site, upon which the present drill shed stands, I think it is not unreasonable to ask that the accommodation which has been so loudly demanded by the militia force be provided as soon as possible. I have not sufficient military training to know of the relative value of small armouries erected throughout the country or of a few large ones in cities ; but I do know that in Toronto we have provided a very fine site, as the Minister of Militia knows, and there is a very substantial building on that site, and surely it would be the policy of wisdom, when you have a splendid military organization which is no discredit to the military forces of the Dominion, to provide for it reasonable accommodation. I do not desire to take up the time of the committee pressing this matter. I have done so again and again, but I appeal once more to the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Public Works that, if it be not intended to devote any part of this item, for the purpose of enlarging the drill shed and providing additional accommodation, that a reasonable sum should be provided for that purpose in the supplementaries. I make this appeal as earnestly as I can on behalf of the militia forces in Toronto.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have already given the names of the places where this money is to be spent. The hon. gentleman has stated that the military forces in Toronto would be very glad to have more accommodation. That is the case, not only in Toronto, but elsewhere. In Montreal the militia require a good deal more accommodation. But all that is a question of money, and my hon. friends often complain that our budget is large, that the public works is a spending department, and spends too much. The facts which my hon. friend has stated to the House are not new. Under the late administration, the position of affairs was just about the same.

Mr. CLARKE. No.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The military strength in Toronto is not much greater to-day than it was then, and the demand that is made by my hon. friend was made then. But governments must not spend too much money, even though some of us may be in sympathy with a more expansive policy, the financial position must be considered. The brakes must be applied, and they are often applied by the Finance Minister to-day as they were in the past. The Finance Minister is right, of course, and I cannot complain.

Mr. FRASER. Before all the money of the country is voted to hon. gentlemen opposite, I would like to put in a word on behalf of the best regiment in Canada, the 78th Highlanders.

Mr. CLARKE. The 48th.

Mr. FRASER. No, the 78th. The Minister of Militia knows all about that regiment. They are recruited from the counties of Cumberland, Colchester and Pictou. They have not a public building and never had.

Mr. McISAAC. They have trenches.

Mr. FRASER. But I am willing to come next to the hon. and gallant Colonel (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) who has just spoken. I would commend to the Minister of Militia what the hon. gentleman says, that arms have to be stored in bedrooms. How can one sleep in a room where arms are stored ? But seriously, I hope the hon. minister would take into consideration this splendid regiment and that before all the money for building is voted away, he will do something for this corps, who would be the first in the fray and the last out of it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I shall not attempt to reply to the jocular remarks of my hon. friend from Guysborough, but I want to say that the 78th is a good regiment, and, in that respect it is like 99 per cent of the rural regiments of Canada. I will appeal to those who saw the review in Toronto, where the 'hay-seed' regiments, without an hour's drill from the month of June until they paraded in front of their Royal Highnesses, held their own with the regiments of the city who have fine drill halls in which they can drill every evening. When I point out that these rural regiments who keep their arms in bedrooms and over driving sheds, and do not cost the country a dollar for armouries can hold their own on an occasion such as that, they are entitled to some consideration from the people. I have always supported the claim for armouries for the large cities, believing that the city battalions should have a place not only for the storage of arms but for drilling the men. But I do again suggest to the minister whether it is advisable to give these large sums of money for the headquarters of rural battalions, when, as the minister properly points out—I am afraid the hon. Minister of Public Works does not hear what I say. I wish to catch the ear of the hon. gentleman, for I have great faith in him, and always had. I hope he will convert the whole ministry.

Mr. TAYLOR. Make them protectionists.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Certainly. He is educating them right along. The Minister of Finance himself will come around in time. I would like to impress upon the Minister of Public Works the policy which the Minister of Militia has outlined, of having inexpensive headquarters and armouries which can be provided at half the cost of these large buildings he proposes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In some of our public buildings in Quebec, we have adopted the plan of having a room for the storage of arms. For instance, in Victoriaville, we have an arrangement of that kind, and it is received with great favour.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not wish to take up time, but merely to say that the hon. minister was good enough to grant the regiment which I have the honour to command a room in the public building in Lindsay. I do not think it is larger than ten by twelve, and it contains the arms of the entire regiment. That is the only room which we have in the whole county.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No, I find that the minister has given us items making a total of $53,800, and he is asking for only $37,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have $27,000 in the estimates of last year.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What regiment is represented by this British Columbia armoury ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say; I am only the builder.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Who made the request for the armoury ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. So many requests are sent in—I cannot tell all.

Mr. GALLIHER. I may say to the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) that these four armouries are in my district. I made the request for them, and made it pretty strongly too. You must not forget that the district I represent is nearly equal in area to the province of Ontario. So, if I have four armouries in my district, it does not necessarily follow that they are very close together. We in British Columbia are in a different position from the people of Ontario. A great part of our country is mountainous and we require not only armouries, but places where we can drill summer and winter. I do not think that any hon. gentlemen who have been in British Columbia will say that money spent in armouries in that province is not well invested. We are pretty well in the wilds, but we have a few citizens in that province who like to have reasonable accommodation as well as the people in the east. And the hon. gentleman, (Mr. Hughes) who is a colonel in the militia well knows that we sent from British Columbia to the South African war quite a number of men—probably a larger number in proportion to our population than any other part of Canada.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Good men, too.

Mr. GALLIHER. And good men too. And we want to keep up our credit. When we have men enterprising enough to band together, we want to encourage them to do so. I have been associated with the militia myself for a number of years, and I can speak feelingly in the matter. I know that is necessary, and I agree with the suggestion thrown out by the hon. member for Simcoe that they not only want a place in which to store arms, but a place to drill in, and also a place in which to meet for social intercourse. A place of this latter kind is very taking in a western city, because we have not many places in those little western towns where the men can meet together to read the newspapers and magazines, and have a little social chat after their drill. Now, I am pleased indeed with the generosity of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Militia and Defence in giving us a drill shed in that community. True, we pay very heavily into the Dominion treasury from the province of British Columbia, and we feel in the past that we have not been getting what we were entitled to. I do not know that I would go so far as to say with one member from British Columbia that we are still complaining. We are, however, still saying that in proportion to the revenue we pay into the Federal treasury the expenditure made by the Dominion in that province is very small. However, I have nothing to complain of in connection with these drill halls that are being established in my district. I thank the minister for meeting my request in this matter. I will say this, now while I am on the subject, that in the town of Nelson where I live, the appropriation will not build a drill hall there, even according to the specifications, and I call the special attention of the minister to the fact, because I mean to approach him again for more money in connection with the Nelson drill hall. We have given in the town of Nelson two lots within the fire limits, and you all know there is a law against building a certain class of building within the fire limits. We have given two lots worth $4,000 to $5,000 as a free site to the government for a drill hall. The hall cannot be built of wood, as I believe is the present intention, for the reason that the city will not permit it to be built of wood. I am merely throwing out the suggestion, so that the minister may be prepared to see me come to him again to ask for a sum in the supplementary estimates which will be sufficient to allow us to put up such a building as the city by-laws will require within the fire limits.

Mr. HUGHES (King's, P.E.I.) While this item is under consideration, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Militia and Defence and the Minister of Public Works to the fact that in the town from which I come, Souris, P.E.I., we have no armoury, and yet we have there a very efficient company of artillery. I wish to say to the Minister of Militia and Defence that I think he can build an armoury in connection with the drill shed there for $200 or $250, though it would have to be a wooden building. The minister knows that the Fourth Regiment to which this company belongs has an excellent record, and I hope, now that I have drawn the matter to his attention, he will take the application into consideration and if possible provide us with an armoury. It is a moderate amount, and comes very near the amount mentioned by the member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes). Of course it would be a wooden building, and built as an annex to the present drill shed.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. What my hon. friend says about the artillery regiment there I know to be absolutely true. Certainly his request is a very modest one, and even if it were not as modest as it is, I should think it was one we might deal with promptly. And as there is in the militia vote a sum for repairs and additions of this kind, if my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is not particularly anxious to do this work, I think I may undertake to say that the Militia Department will look after it in the near future.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend is short of money I will do it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Why is it that there is no sum brought down for an armoury for this Rossland company ?

Mr. GALLIHER. I suppose the reason is that apparently in the east the government have been buying sites for armouries, while in the west all these sites are being provided free to the government. If no selection has been made in Rossland, it is the fault of the people and not the fault of the minister; but I can promise that will be attended to.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What is the reason for the distinction between the west and the east in supplying sites ?

Mr. GALLIHER. I do not know whether that distinction is general or not, but in listening to the discussion to-night I understood that sites in the east had been purchased by the government. If that is not the case, then I withdraw that remark. But I know that in British Columbia we are furnishing the sites free, and I may say that we are very glad to do so if we can only get a decent class of buildings put up on them. The only reason Rossland is not mentioned is simply because they have not yet furnished the government that site, although I have requested them to do so. But that will be attended to, and then I shall come to the minister for a grant.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. May I ask what is the rule with regard to sites ? Are they only purchased in certain parts of Canada, and have they to be given free in other parts ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There has never been any fixed rule. It is very far from being the rule in British Columbia that all sites are furnished free, because I have been obliged to pay large sums of money for sites for public buildings.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I trust that the minister, now that the matter has been brought to his attention, will consider this question of company and battalion drill sheds, and if it is possible, to give each company headquarters a room in which the arms may be kept, and also a recreation room where the boys can meet for social intercourse after going through their drill. I would be pleased if the minister were to furnish us with such a building, although I am satisfied the regiment will not even ask that much, but will follow the example which the Minister of Militia and Defence says he has set in his own county.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would be only too glad if the militiamen will change their mind in the direction indicated by my hon. friend, because I am stating gospel truth when I say that these militiamen want very expensive buildings. Every time they come on a deputation, I am frightened, because they want so much money.

Experimental farms—New buildings and renewals, improvements, repairs, &c., in connection with existing buildings, fences, &c., $10,000.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I do not want to discuss this item farther than to urge upon the hon. Minister of Agriculture to look into the advisability of establishing an experimental farm in southern Alberta and one in the vicinity of Edmonton.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That would be a question of the extension of the experimental farm system which should not be lightly undertaken. It has been discussed several times in the House and has nothing to do with this vote which is simply for repairs.

Mr. SPROULE. What repairs do you intend to make ? Is this just a general vote ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, this is a general vote for repairs on all the farms.

Mr. SPROULE. There are some important questions in connection with experimental farms which must be dealt with, but, I presume, they will more properly come up on some other items, on the agricultural vote, or the vote for cold storage. Perhaps the hon. minister will not be prepared to answer questions now on that subject.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This vote has nothing to do with the experimental farms. There is a vote for that purpose. When we take up the vote in connection with experimental farms these questions may be discussed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is simply for repairs at all the farms.

Mr. SPROULE. It must be for repairs to buildings on the experimental farms. It is not properly stated here.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is for general maintenance.

Mr. SPROULE. I must be right, or I must be wrong. If I am right this is a general vote for repairs to buildings, fences and other things on the experimental farms.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Quite true.

Mr. SPROULE. And has no connection with the work carried on at these farms, for instance in the dairy ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Public buildings generally, $5,000.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if he can state whether the Vancouver drill shed has been taken off the contractor's hands ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not yet.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Could the hon. gentleman state the amount of the contract and the amount paid to the contractor ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not the information, but I will bring it down on Monday.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Showing the extras, the amount for which the contract was taken and the amount that will be paid when the building is complete.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My officers will take a note of the question and I will bring the information down.

Salaries to resident clerks of works, assistants, &c., $10,500.

Mr. SPROULE. Where are these resident clerks of works ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is one in New Brunswick, one in Montreal, one in Quebec, one in Ottawa, Mr. Adams, the man who has supervised the work in connection with this building, one in Manitoba, and one in the North-west Territories.

Mr. SPROULE. Who is the one in Manitoba ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Cyr. There is one in the North-west Territories and one in British Columbia.

Mr. SPROULE. We will take, for example, a building going on in Manitoba; I notice that Mr. Cyr is clerk of the work there. Is he not paid out of the estimate for that work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. These clerks of works, for whom this sum of money is asked, are the general officers who supervise the works of the department in all of the provinces. They have special work in cities. For instance, Mr. Desjardins superintends the works in Montreal. Mr. Cyr lives in Winnipeg and supervises the works in Winnipeg and has his eyes open also to any works around Winnipeg. Sometimes we send him into the territories. These are general officers from whom we expect service all around.

Mr. SPROULE. They get a salary, I presume ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. That comes out of this $10,500 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Quite so.

Mr. SPROULE. Then how is it they get their $3 a day over and above that for superintending works ? I will take in Winnipeg, for instance, the repairs going on there :

Some carpets and wall paper, also a flag staff, and ensign were supplied. . . . . Works carried out under the supervision of J. Ernest Cyr, clerk of works, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Then he has been paid out of this appropriation.

Mr. SPROULE. Take the next : Examining warehouse; he is the clerk of works there. Is his pay taken out of this vote ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, he supervised the whole of the work.

Mr. SPROULE. I see that he is employed on the post office as well.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood that in these cases the pay of the clerks of the works came out of the vote for the particular work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, not in these cases.

Mr. SPROULE. It does in regard to harbour works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In that case, we have no general officers. If we build a harbour at Port Hope, for instance, we employ an officer, who is not in the department. In this case Mr. Cyr is a permanent employee just as Mr. Desjardins is in Montreal. That is the reason why the hon. member for East Gray (Mr. Sproule) finds their names where he does find them.

Mr. SPROULE. I know, but you set a man over the building of a post office and he is paid out of the vote for that post office.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He is employed for that purpose.

Mr. SPROULE. If he is paid out of the vote for that building how can you pay him out of this sum ? Will you be paying him a double salary ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, Mr. Cyr is paid only one salary, and that salary is paid out of this appropriation. He is not paid out of any other appropriation. He will supervise three or four works but he is paid his ordinary salary out of this appropriation.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that it is possible to pay them sometimes double salaries. I have had brought to my notice only a short time ago the fact, in regard to which I asked a question and got a reply, that clerks employed in a certain department are employed in another department at the same time and draw pay there also. The answer was that the government has no knowledge of this. I am informed that it is a fact, and that it has been going on during the last few months. I give that as a justification for endeavouring to find out whether such a thing could happen or not without the knowledge of the minister.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In this case it cannot happen.

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the hon. minister to say that there was a clerk of works for New Brunswick. I would like to ask if this is the gentleman who superintended the armoury at Sussex ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, there is a local man at Sussex. Mr. Waterbury is at St. John. He has general supervision over the works in St. John, but at times we send him elsewhere.

Mr. FOWLER. The superintendent at Sussex is a local man ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the minister know the occupation of this man ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very glad this question is asked. Since

I have been in office I have taken very great care to secure the services of a practical man in each case. I may have been deceived on some occasions, but I think I have not been. Every time that a clerk of works is to be appointed I inquire whether he is a practical man or not. When the contract for the Sussex armoury was awarded, the name of a gentleman was suggested to me, and before I apopinted him I wrote to Colonel Domville, ex-M.P. for the riding, who replied that the gentleman he recommended was a practical man. On the strength of Mr. Domville's letter, which is in my office and can be brought down if necessary, that this gentleman was well fitted to be foreman of works and a practical man, I appointed him. No complaint has been made so far as to his competency.

Mr. FOWLER. I may say to the minister that the gentleman in question is a practical man in one sense, as he is a practical tailor, and a good tailor too. But so far as being a carpenter or builder, he is nothing of the sort, and has had no experience whatever along that line. He lives in the town in which I lived for a great many years, and I know whereof I speak when I say that he has no building experience whatever, except that he had a house built for him, and he may have superintended the erecting of that house. It is a very modest though respectable building, but it is not a very extensive one. That is his sole experience in the building line.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sorry that my hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) did not call my attention to this state of affairs before now. I express my deep regret that a practical tailor has been recommended to me as a practical builder of an armoury. I remember distinctly having written to Mr. Domville—I have a copy of my letter and his reply in which he states that the gentleman he recommended to me was a practical man in building——

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Building suits of clothes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What more could I do than appoint him. My hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) should have warned me before. He is guilty and not I. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fowler) knew all about the practical tailor and he should have warned me. In future I suppose I will have to write Mr. Domville twice.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What will you do with the tailor now?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will not make him a present of a suit; I think I shall certainly change him. Before making such appointments I have always taken the greatest care to insure that a practical man gets the position, and my officers have received most positive instructions on that point. I am sorry that I have been deceived by a man from the maritime provinces from whom good things are always expected. My hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) should have warned me, and although he is not so much to blame as Mr. Domville, still he is somewhat to blame.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister must be deceived in all parts of the country, because last year he employed a painter from Toronto to do dredging.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. But dredging is not made by the hand. I would hire a dredge from a medical man or a tailor provided the dredge does good work. That is different from a foreman of works. The profession of a man who owns a horse does not alter the colour of the horse.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a horse of another colour.

Mr. FOWLER. The Minister of Public Works was to some extent not to blame in this matter. As a matter of fact, I know that the minister did write, inquiring as to the occupation of the person who had been recommended to him as clerk of works. However, I am not to blame in the matter, because I was so satisfied of the honesty and integrity of the contractors, that I knew they would not go wrong whether there was a clerk of works over them or not, and it was for that reason I did not interfere, because I knew that the public interests would be well protected by the contractors, even though the clerk of works knew absolutely nothing about the business for which he was selected. I beleive the minister did his duty in the premises, but he was deceived by the gentleman who made the recommendation. In order to relieve the maritime provinces from any blame in the matter, I may say that that gentleman is not a native of the maritime provinces.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I shall inquire further into the matter, and if the man is not competent I will dispense with his services, not because of any ill-will I have towards him, but a minister cannot stand being deceived in that way.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What will you do with Mr. Domville?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot dismiss him now.

Mr. FOWLER. The building is finished, so that the work of the clerk of works is completed. What pay did he receive?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Three dollars a day, which is the ordinary pay to a foreman of work.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, the House adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 10, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the chair at Three o'clock.

CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of Duncan Alexander Stewart, Esq., for the Electoral District of Lisgar.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Duncan Alexander Stewart, Esq., member for the Electoral District of Lisgar, introduced by the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and Mr. W. F. McCreary.

CONCILIATION OF TRADE DISPUTES.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 32) to amend the Conciliation Act of 1900. He said: The object of the Bill is to widen the scope and extend the application of the present Conciliation Act. That Act is restricted to the sphere of voluntary conciliation, but although it has only been in force during the past two years, it has become evident that its scope should be extended. During the past year there have been industrial disturbances which the Act was unable to touch. At present, when differences occur between employers and employees, the minister has power to order an inquiry, and then he may, on the application of either employer or employee, appoint a conciliator, and in addition, on the application of both parties to the dispute, he may appoint an arbitrator, who will proceed with the arbitration and make an award, but acceptance or observance of the award is not compulsory in any respect. The object of my amendment is to broaden the scope of the law by giving a greater initiative to the Labour Department, in the first place, and in the second place by giving the minister power to appoint an arbitrator, on the application of one of the parties to the dispute. This arbitrator will have authority to take evidence under oath, and give a decision, indicating a basis of settlement, a copy of which will be sent to each of the parties and be also published in the 'Labour Gazette.' In the present Act, public opinion and the desire to do justice is what is relied upon to make it operative, and it seems to me that the publication of the award of an independent arbitrator is likely to be more effective.

There is also in my Bill a further provision which I think very necessary, namely, that in no agreement arrived at, either as the result of conciliation or arbitration, must there be any clause compelling an employee to give up membership in any local, national or international trade organization. A provision of this kind has been rendered necessary by cases which have occurred.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

I. C. R.—PURCHASES OF CANADIAN COAL.

Mr. KENDALL asked :

What quantities of Canadian coal have been purchased by the Railway Department during the last four years ; from what companies, at what prices, and at what points of delivery ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). In this case, also I shall be obliged to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kendall) to move for a return.

ST. CATHARINE'S WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. LANCASTER—by Mr. Fowler—asked:

What has been done by the government respecting the St. Catharine's water supply, as promised by the Prime Minister on the 18th February, 1901, as reported in 'Hansard' on page 109 :—

'Mr. Speaker, I cannot inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) if the report distributed of my speech on that occasion is accurate or not, I presume, however, it is substantially correct. The question to which it refers is now undergoing the consideration of the government ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). No action has been taken on the subject referred to.

PROPOSED RAILWAY COMMISSION.

Mr. DAVIS—by Mr. McCreary—asked :

Does the government intend taking action during the present session on the motion of this House, passed in the session of 1901, approving of the appointment of a railway commission ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). My answer to this question is in the affirmative.

I. C. R.—WHEAT HANDLED BY GOVERNMENT ELEVATOR AT ST. JOHN.

Mr. GANONG—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

What amount was received by the Intercolonial Railway as its proportion of freight on the 146,087 bushels of wheat handled by the government elevator at St. John, N.B., during the year ending 31st December, 1901 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). The amount earned by the Intercolonial Railway as its proportion of freight on the 146,087 bushels of wheat handled by the government elevator at St. John, N.B., during the year ended 31st December, 1901, was $6,285.88.

I C. R.—COAL BY CHARTERED STEAMSHIPS.

Mr. BELL—by Hon. Mr. Haggart—asked:

2. The quantity of coal brought by this ship was 15,693 tons.

3. The rate of time charter of steamship 'Aladdin' engaged to carry coal was £1,541 or $7,499.53 per month.

4. The quantity of coal brought by this ship was 17,187 tons.

TRANSFER OF MAILS, ALLANDALE STATION.

Mr. LENNOX—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. Who has been appointed to transfer the mails at the Allandale railway station ?

2. What is the date of appointment ?

3. What remuneration is paid ?

4. Is the employee solely under the control of the Post Office Department, or partly under the control of the Grand Trunk Railway Company ?

5. Is any portion of this employee's salary paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, by arrangement with the government ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Wm. Mulock). Where it can be so arranged, it is found more satisfactory to have the railway companies undertake and be responsible for the efficient and prompt transfer of the mails from one train to another at railway points, and this course is being pursued at Allandale, the Grand Trunk being paid at the rate of four hundred dollars a year for the service. The work in question is done under the direction of the Post Office Department.

3. Were tenders called for each sale, and in what papers or posters did advertisements appear ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). This question covers a series of years, and it would be much more convenient to have the matter dealt with in the form of a motion.

PRICES OF BINDER TWINE FOR 1902.

Mr. BLAIN—by Mr. Ward—asked :

Also the quantity issued for use on each railway during the year, and the prices at which they were charged out.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). The second motion embraces very much of what is contained in the first. I apprehend that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Barker) will be satisfied with one return, if it contains all the information covered by the two motions.

Mr. BARKER. Certainly.

Motion agreed to.

GREAT LAKES AND ST. LAWRENCE—HEIGHT OF WATER.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES (North Victoria) moved :

That in the opinion of this House, in the best interests of the people of Canada, a joint commission should be appointed by the United States and Canada, to examine and report upon the diversion of the waters between the two countries ; and to investigate the conditions, rise and fall, supply and uses of the waters adjacent to the boundary line between the United States and Canada, including all the waters of the lakes and rivers whose waters flow by the St. Lawrence river to the Atlantic ocean.

He said : Mr. Speaker, this is a motion which does not require any lengthy discussion. I believe it has, from time to time, engaged the attention of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States. I am satisfied that it has engaged the attention of the trading public and the commercial men on both sides of the line. The people of Chicago, owing to the difficulty of draining that great city, have seen fit in their wisdom to construct what you may term a large waterway, 200 feet wide and averaging about 24 feet deep, connecting Lake Michigan with the Illinois river ; so that in place of the old Chicago river, as formerly, running down, there is now a strong current running up that river and leading down the Illinois river into the Mississippi. At various points along the line, as at Sault Ste. Marie, we have large locks on both sides of the river; there are also large power improvements projected at each of these points, as well as on the Niagara river. Coming down to the St. Lawrence we find that both this government and the American government have been engaged in dredging operations, undoubtedly affecting the outlet of the lake. Although these may not be important in themselves, and in view of the great volume of water in those lakes, would not materially affect the output at the present time ; yet it is hard to tell what in the near future may be the schemes advanced by business industries on each side of the line which might result in the reducing the water supply in these great lakes. Navigators complain at times of the impossibility of keeping the channel up to the normal level ; and, therefore, I desire to draw the attention of the House and of the country to the necessity of looking into the question at an early date in order that some understanding may be arrived at between the two governments as to the proper control of the waters for other than navigation purposes, and for the maintenance of the waters of the lakes at the normal level, so that navigation may not be interfered with by deepening the channels or reducing the water supply by turning it into other avenues. I shall not take up further time in speaking to the motion. My object is not to embarrass the government, but to draw its attention to this important matter.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. (Hon. J. Israel Tarte). The question to which my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) has drawn the attention of the House is a very important one. I think, however, that before we undertake to obtain the co-operation of the American authorities we should understand our own position a little better, in other words, we should give it more attention than we have perhaps been doing in the past. My department has begun a survey of certain parts of the lakes and rivers, and I intend during the coming season to take some steps in the direction that my hon. friend has indicated. In the meantime, however, I think it would not be advisable to follow the suggestion of my hon. friend, and as he has now called the attention of the House to the subject, I would ask him not to press his motion.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Has there been any information received from the American government on this same line ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. James Sutherland). I may say that an intimation has been made, and my department is observing the proceedings of the American Congress in reference to this matter. I can assure my hon. friend from Victoria that it is receiving the attention of the officers of the department, and it will receive every consideration that is due to so important a question. I think under the circumstances my hon. friend would do well not to press his motion.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). My sole object was to draw the attention of the House and of the country to the question, in order to make sure that the interests of Canada might not be neglected in this all important matter. Inasmuch as the ministers have assured us that the interests of Canada will be carefully guarded, I should consider that the object of my motion has been secured, and I will withdraw it.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the United States have already appointed a commission for this purpose, presumably with the object of co-operating with this government. I presume this government is in possession of some information with regard to that, and will be prepared to act conjointly with the United States authorities.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think any definite action has been taken by the American government as yet.

Mr. SPROULE. They have appointed a commission.

Motion withdrawn.

WHEAT BLOCKADE IN MANITOBA.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS (East Assiniboia) moved for :

Copy of all papers and correspondence relative to the present wheat blockade in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and the incapacity and inability of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to move the crop of last year in such a reasonable period of time as to prevent the grain-growers of the country being subjected to serious financial loss.

He said : I desire to submit to the House some facts in connection with this wheat blockade in the North-west Territories. It so happens that the congestion is largely confined to East Assiniboia, the district between Moosomin and Moosejaw. I desire to submit facts for the information of the House, with the hope that they may lead to the adoption of measures that will relieve the situation for all time to come. A few years ago we were accustomed to read that Manitoba and the North-west Territories were only fit for the buffalo, the Indian and the coyote, that it was not a country fit to be inhabited by white men. We even used to hear men from beyond the seas speaking of it as a blasted country. They came here to make money, and having made it, returned to their old homes to enjoy it with their friends. But that day has passed away. The old settlers have solved the problem, and are now seeking to make permanent homes in the country. There has been a vast increase in their activity in breaking up land and increasing their powers of production. We have had many splendid crops in that country, as the House well knows, but the crop of 1901 surpassed perhaps anything that has ever been produced in any country on the face of the earth. This is a wide statement, but we feel it cannot be contradicted. The crop in Manitoba is the result of an increased acreage, and showed the third largest yield. The crop in the Territories is the result of a large increase in acreage it is true, but chiefly the result of a very large increase in the yield per acre.

The principle underlying the production of wheat on the American continent is an interesting study. There is a principle that seems to come to light in connection with this bonanza crop in the North-west. It is that there is a tendency for the wheat producing area to recede from the south and to go northwards. It is a fact well known to us that the state of Illinois, at one time the greatest wheat producing state in the Union, has ceased to produce wheat and now corn and the hog occupy the soil. Then again, in North and South Dakota, it is found that the production of grain is not always a profitable employment. The principle seems to be that the area is moving from the south and gradually going northward and that the nearer we come to the northern limit of the wheat area, the stronger the grain becomes and the more profitable is its production.

An hon. MEMBER. Why is that ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will explain it in this way. You have a spikelet or bar across the grain of wheat. In Wisconsin and Illinois they were formerly accustomed to produce three grains of perfect wheat, but of late years they can only produce two grains on a spikelet and one imperfect grain. Two grains in this case ceased to be productive. In Manitoba we have always been able to produce three perfect grains and this year the exception has been that we have produced four perfect grains on one bar or spikelet. Whilst in Manitoba we have produced three perfect grains almost every year, to the north, around Prince Albert, in the Saskatchewan district, we have almost invariably produced four perfect grains. The wheat yield in the territories last year ranged from twenty-five to fifty-five bushels per acre. This immense yield has given rise to certain difficulties. These difficulties have arisen in connection with the transportation of the crop. We were assured that up to January the Canadian Pacific Railway moved something like 40,000,000 bushels, while the Canadian Northern moved 11,000,000 bushels. We are informed by the best authority to-day that there are at least 50,000,000 bushels more to be moved before navigation opens, and that will still leave 26,000,000 bushels for bread and seed for the coming year. You can see how far short the railway facility has come of moving the crop so as to secure the highest price in the market to the producer.

Mr. CHARLTON. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) say that the wheat crop is 127,000,000 bushels ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am giving you the statement and I will give you the report of the warehouse commissioner which ought to satisfy every person.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is, all grains.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, all grains. With the view of perfect accuracy I wish to put on record the report of Mr. Castle, warehouse commissioner, who was appointed by this government under the legislation of 1900. The report is dated Winnipeg, January 15th, 1902, and addressed to Mr. Parmelee, deputy minister Trade and Commerce. Waiving the introduction he goes on to make the following statements :

Mr. General Superintendent Leonard of the Canadian Pacific Railway advises me that there are at present in use on the Canadian Pacific Railway western division 7,000 box cars and 256 engines divisable as follows :

Cars for use for carriage of general merchandise	4,000
Cars for use for carriage of grain	3,000
Engines in use, passenger service (ordinary season)	38
Engines in use, grain season	20
Engines in use, freight traffic (grain season)	236

It is stated that all grain has to be hauled on an average of 700 miles on western division while the number of miles an engine runs per day is estimated at 200. Below is given a list of the elevators and their capacity at Fort William and Port Arthur :

Fort William C.P.R. Co.'s. elevator (a).	1,250,000
" " " (b).	1,250,000
" " " (c).	1,500,000
" " " (d).	1,500,000
Port Arthur, King's elevator	350,000
Total	5,850,000

With this equipment worked at highest pressure the following table shows the amount of grain actually delivered by that company into the Canadian Pacific Railway and King's elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, each week from the 1st of September to the 28th December inclusive.

I shall not give the deliveries of each week but simply the largest delivery in one week, being 1,335,414 bushels. The total delivery was 14,281,401.

In addition to this up to the 28th of December last there were delivered at Fort William 289,642 bushels of oats and 34,754 of barley, and flour the product of possibly 3,000,000 bushels of wheat; besides which about 1,000,000 bushels of oats were shipped to Montreal and eastern points, mostly from the Edmonton district, none of which appears in the above weekly elevator reports.

I may state that the facts given us in this report are based upon the condition of things reported to the warehouse commissioner each day and may be regarded as being correct.

From the foregoing it will be seen the Canadian Pacific Railway with their present equipment was unable to deliver at Fort William from Manitoba and Territorial points, more than 1,355,414 bushels of wheat in any one week, while deliveries for the same period at country points were, I should judge, about double that amount. There is not the slightest doubt that had there been proper facilities for handling it, over 3,000,000 bushels of grain would have been marketed weekly at all country points during the last part of October and all of November. Not counting sidings the Canadian Pacific Railway draws grain from 187 points at which there are elevators and warehouses If one and a-half cars per day or nine cars per week (averaging 350 bushels) were supplied to each of the 187 grain points above mentioned, the amount so delivered weekly at Fort William, would be 1,430,550 bushels, that is, nearly 100,000 bushels more than were actually delivered at Fort William and Port Arthur in any one week during the season—exclusive of flour, oats, barley, and flax. In view of the rapid growth of this western country and taking into consideration the large amount of money, time and energy which have been expended by the government in bringing producing settlers into the country, I consider the Canadian Pacific Railway in its own interests and that of Manitoba and the North-west, should at once take steps to provide equipment sufficient to deliver at Fort William at least 2,000,000 bushels per week. Efforts as you are aware, have at various times been made to obtain from the railway companies a ten per cent per hundred freight rate on wheat to the lakes. Even if this were obtained the advantages so accruing would be of little or no value to our producers without adequate transportation facilities; in support of which I would draw your attention to the following facts, viz. :—On the 2nd of November last there were reported to be in store at points on the Canadian Pacific Railway lines 5,306,400 bushels and from the 2nd to the 30th of November there were (exclusive of flour) delivered at Fort William and Port Arthur 5,038,601 bushels or 267,799 bushels less than there were in store at Canadian Pacific Railway country points on the 2nd of November. This clearly proves the lack of proper means of transportation. The following illustrations will show the immense loss this entails to producers. October purchases having been made on basis of lake and rail shipment, it naturally followed that dealers would during that month, place sufficient orders for cars to ship out grain bought by them during the month. However it became apparent on the first of November that it would be impossible to ship out all October purchases in time to reach Fort William before navigation closed (7th December). Therefore November purchases were made subject to 6 cents per bushel carrying charges, as evidently no grain purchased during that month could be shipped out until after the opening of navigation next spring. It costs per month as follows to carry 50 cent wheat :—

Storage ½ cent.

Insurance ¼ cent.

Interest at 6 per cent equal ¼ cent, in all 1 cent per bushel for one month, and 6 cents for six months. Under such circumstances, therefore, the producer selling grain during November would lose almost three times as much money as the government could secure or save for him were the 10 cent rate established.

With reference to the present terminal elevator facilities, I would consider them inadequate, and in my opinion, at least 2,500,000 bushels storage capacity should be added at Fort William at once. Grain traffic will almost be suspended in two or three weeks time, owing to lack of room in terminal elevators at Fort William, and all eastern elevators have been reported to me as filled. While the Canadian Pacific Railway has nominally 5,500,000 bushels storage capacity, their actual working capacity is about 5,000,000 bushels. I do not think that more than 300 cars per day can now be unloaded into elevators at Fort William, while, as I before stated, if on an average of two cars per point per day were delivered at terminals from the 187 grain points along the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's system, it would necessitate the unloading of 374 cars per day, which at 850 bushels per car, would amount to 1,901,400 bushels weekly. With the vast increase in acreage under wheat each year all over the North-west, and the large number of settlers now annually arriving, it is safe to say that from 50 to 70 million bushels of wheat will be exported annually in the immediate future.

My own observations lead me to the conclusion that a scarcity of engines, almost solely, and not box cars as is generally supposed, is the key note to the situation. In the year 1895 there was a large crop. The round trip per car was (I understand) then made in eight days, but the reason that was accomplished was that 15 per cent of cars from Fort William coming west were then returned loaded, while 75 per cent were returned loaded last fall, and that precluded the company providing an eight day service, as Mr. Leonard informed me last July, he expected to be in a position to give. In consequence of this, it took a much longer time to return cars to country points and it has been frequently reported to me that cars were held over for days at a time at sidings after they were loaded, before engines were obtainable to take them eastward.

(That the Canadian Pacific Railway had and have insufficient equipment to handle as much of the present crop as they should have done this fall and winter, cannot well be denied; but on the other hand the immense volume of traffic carried by that company east and west this fall with the present equipment certainly reflects the very greatest credit on all the officials of this road. Everything that it was possible to do in this regard, during that time was done.)

When the present terminal elevators were built some years ago, no one could dispute that they were erected ahead of the then requirements. Elevators 'A' and 'B' can each load out about 25,000 bushels per hour. Elevators 'C' and 'D' about 15,000 bushels per hour. The Duluth terminal elevators can today load out about 60,000 bushels per hour. In my opinion, all terminal elevators built at Fort William should be equal to loading vessels at this rate. It is no uncommon occurrence for boats of 250,000 bushels capacity, to call at Fort William for Manitoba grain, and if this port is to hold its own, it is evident as rapid handling of grain must be there provided as at Duluth.

There is another very important feature of the Manitoba grain traffic which it is well should not be lost sight of, viz., the grain carrying capacity of the lake marine, now available for transportation of western grain.

The port of Buffalo was congested early last fall owing (I am informed) to shortage of cars at that point; therefore any surplus of Manitoba grain that should have been transported by rail to Fort William, above what was actually shipped, would have been required to have been taken out of Canadian vessels.

Query.—Were Canadian boats in a position to take care of this increased traffic if offered? If so, are the present facilities at foot of Lake Superior and Huron on Canadian side, now capable of handling such increased traffic. Further, were there cars available at these points to transport this extra grain to Montreal or seaboard terminals?

It might be well for the government to inquire into the whole question of facilities now available for handling grain between Fort William and the seaboard.

In this report I have not had occasion to refer to the Canadian Northern Railway, as shipments from points along that system have to date gone out via Duluth, which port is out of my jurisdiction.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) CHARLES C. CASTLE,
Warehouse Commissioner.

Now, Sir, from this report of the warehouse commissioner it is perfectly evident that the rolling stock, and especially the motive power of the Canadian Pacific Railway is far short of what is required to-day to get the grain to the seaboard before navigation closes. In consequence of this defect the producers are reported to have been subject to serious loss. Considering that the Canadian Pacific Railway has taken out 40,000,000 bushels, say up to January, and that the producer has lost about ten cents per bushel, here is a loss equal to $4,000,000. Then again the Canadian Northern Railway is reported to have moved about 11,000,000 bushels and the loss sustained by the producers on this quantity is said to be $1,000,000, so that the producers have lost in all $5,000,000 by reason of imperfect transportation. Speaking of Assiniboia where the congestion really exists, there was no competition between the roads there, and naturally business men will try to protect their own business and their own pockets, with the result that cars were sent to those points in Manitoba where there was competition and the Manitoba producers have in this way not suffered to the same extent as the people in the territories. The loss in Assiniboia has been great. I could scarcely give you an idea of the congested state of things between Moosomin and Moosejaw. Any one who looked at the 'Globe' of Saturday last may have noticed photographs showing how things were congested in the town of Wolseley, and the efforts made by the farmers to accommodate the grain they had still on hand. In Assiniboia the total production of grain last year was 15,468,345 bushels. This statement is based on the report of the government, which in turn is based upon reports received from men engaged in threshing the grain. This may be regarded as the quantity reported up to January. It certainly does not represent the total production; but even on this amount there is a loss to the producer of $1,546,834.

The loss on grain still in hand to be shipped cannot be fully estimated. Those who are acquainted with the country know well that very few farmers have proper granaries, fitted to protect the grain against a shower of rain. Then, they are not in a position to keep the grain till the summer; and, indeed, to haul it in the summer would cost so much, necessitating the taking of their horses and men off their farms when they ought to be occupied in the cultivation of the soil, that it would render the production of grain wholly unprofitable.

Then, there is a great loss to the producers who are off the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Many of them cannot have marketed a dozen loads of grain this season. The result is that they have not been able to pay their liabilities in the town or village, and have been obliged to borrow money at 12 per cent interest to pay their hired labour.

There are heavy losses in all these directions—from imperfect storage, from the paying of heavy interest on loans to meet current expenses, and from the expense of temporary buildings. In every town and village you will find every vacant house or warehouse, every implement storehouse, every baker's shop, filled with wheat. You will find wheat piled up against the elevators, on the side-walks, in front of stores, and in every conceivable place, waiting for transportation.

Then, many, of whom I am one, have been forced to build temporary buildings in order to have the grain hauled during the winter and not to draw on the summer, which should be devoted to other work. This involves a great deal of expense.

I remember contending on the floor of this House during the past few years for the necessity of having flat warehouses. I was informed time and again that it was a retrograde movement, that the flat warehouse was antiquated, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were exceedingly liberal when they granted us one flat warehouse at each shipping station. When I tell you that to-day in the town of Wolseley there are 46 flat warehouses, which have been built by private individuals, you will come to realize that there was some point to my argument. Then, at Indian Head, where this season 2,500,000 bushels of grain will be marketed, I personally counted 75 wagons standing waiting to be unloaded, most of them having two loads, while the farmer had been obliged to return to his home with his horses and leave the grain, for days, until it could be unloaded. At Indian Head the people have built 115 small warehouses for their own accommodation, and 35 more are in course of erection. I remember being told on the floor of this House that we would make each Canadian Pacific Railway yard a village of warehouses. Well, what are we doing ? For the very lack of these warehouses a veritable village of temporary graneries is being erected in the neighbourhood of every Canadian Pacific station. And all this indicates that we came far short of realizing that our western country would develop at such a rate as to make the present facilities altogether inadequate. The difference between winter and summer hauling, I do not wish to dwell upon ; but the loss to the country is very great, and will continue to be so.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Are these warehouses erected along the line of the railway ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. As near the railway as they can get. So that you see the elevator system does not meet the needs of the case. I have never opposed the elevator system ; but I hold it to be unjust on the part of any government to force the people to deal through the elevator system exclusively. Let me tell you what took place this year all along the line. When a farmer went to the elevator with No. 1 Hard, he was told, 'We are not buying No. 1 Hard at the elevator.' This was the case, not at one elevator only, but all along the line, as if there were some concocted plan to rob the public. They simply said, 'We are not purchasing No. 1 Hard, we have no means of storing it.' The result was that the producer had to sell his grain as No. 1 Northern, losing on it about 5 cents a bushel. It certainly looked to me like the method of the highwayman.

It is highway robbery. I am sorry indeed to have to make this statement, but the Bill of 1900 provides against such a state of things, and the warehouse commissioner has it in his power to withhold the license from these elevator companies unless they do business along the line of our legislation. Such action as this by the commissioner would have put an end to the difficulty. But the objection I see is that we are putting upon the commissioner a responsibility that is more than any one individual ought to bear, and I would recommend to the House the appointment of a commission, composed of a representative of the farming community, a representative of the trade, a representative of the railway company, and a good solicitor, to sit during the grain season and adjust all irregularities in connection with the administration of the law. I believe it was within the commissioner's power to have notified these elevator people that unless they did business along the line of the legislation of 1900, they would not get a license—that they must either stop doing business or do it in accord with the Act. But such notice was not given, and consequently the farmers were obliged to accept a lower grade, which was a very serious loss, taking into account the large crop.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to tax further the patience of the House by calling attention to certain resolutions adopted by what is now known as the Territorial Grain Growers Association. The congested state of affairs led our people to come together and discuss the situation. They formed an organization and drafted a constitution and held meetings at various points. I have on my desk resolutions from a number of associations, but I shall confine myself to the proceedings of the central association, which met at Indian Head and to which delegates were sent from all over the territory, especially from Moose Jaw down the boundary between Manitoba and the North-west Territories. At this meeting, which was held on the 12th of February, the following resolutions were adopted, and they were forwarded to me by Mr. Miller, the secretary-treasurer, in order that I might bring them to the notice of this House.

Moved by R. J. Phin,—

Whereas the farmers of the North-west Territories have not been able to market their wheat owing to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's refusal to furnish cars to move it.

And that there is still remaining in the farmer's hands one-half of the grain grown during the past year.

And that a large quantity of wheat has been sold to the elevator and milling companies at a less price and on a lower grade that its value, caused by the companies stating that they only have bins to receive wheat of the lower grade, and owing to this the farmers have been forced to take from 7 to 9 cents per bushel less than the value of their wheat at Fort William.

And that there is now an elevator at Port Arthur ready to receive wheat, and also plenty of elevator space at Duluth.

And that it is a well known fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have not at present the motive power sufficient to handle the business of the country.

Therefore, be it resolved that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be asked to furnish sufficient cars to forward the grain as it is offered, and the shipper be allowed to ship to Winnipeg, thence by Canada Northern to their elevator at Port Arthur, and also to ship to Duluth, both via Winnipeg and the Soo line at the rate of freight charged to Fort William; and that a copy of this resolution be sent to Superintendent Leonard of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Minister of Railways, the superintendent of the Canadian Northern and the Department of Inland Revenue.

I might say that I saw a telegram the other day stating that the Canadian Pacific Railway have undertaken to send grain over the 'Soo' line to Duluth, and is thus giving a measure of relief to that congested country.

Moved by W. R. Motherwell, seconded by J. Morrison,—

That the transportation facilities of the Territories has not kept pace with the settlement and productive capacity of the country, with the very natural result that at the present time a complete standstill has been reached in the marketing of our wheat, and with over the half of it yet in our granaries and likely to remain there during the greater part of the coming summer. A tremendous loss to the country even at this date has already been sustained. That never again in the history of our country should such a disastrous occurrence be permitted and that the granting of full provincial powers to the Territories and with it the power to build railways would without doubt be helpful in that direction.

Resolutions passed by the Balcarres and Kenlis local Territorial Grain Growers' Association.

1. That section 43 of the Manitoba Grain Act be amended in such a manner as will empower the warehouse commissioner to compel all railway companies to erect every loading platform, approved of by said commissioner, within thirty days after said approval is given, and in default, the said commissioner shall have the power to impose penalties on such defaulting railway companies and collect same through the courts. And further, that this amendment come into force not later than the first day of May, A.D. 1902, and that height of said platform be level with floor of car.

2. That railway companies be compelled to provide farmers with cars to be loaded direct from vehicles at all stations, irrespective of there being an elevator, warehouse, or loading platform at such station or not. And further, that this amendment come into force the first day of May, A.D. 1902.

I shall not weary the House by reading the further resolutions passed by the different associations at different points in the territories. They all point in the same direction, and deal with the same difficulty. While the Bill of 1900 provided for the loading of cars from the farmer's vehicles, and while a number of these platforms were constructed by the Canadian Pacific Railway; yet when the pressure came the Canadian Pacific Railway seemed unwilling to construct further loading platforms and our farmers were denied the use of cars altogether and have been up to date.

It has produced a state of feeling which is not at all desirable or pleasant. Sometimes we men from the west are said to be breezy. I would not like to say anything very strong or injudicious, but were I to interpret the feeling which exists in the west to-day, I would certainly rend my garments and put ashes on my head. It would be much easier to-day to raise a rebellion than to raise the taxes. But the question is: What remedy do you propose? The Canadian Pacific Railway, we understand, are likely to seek an increase of their stock to the extent of $20,000,000, with the view to increasing their rolling stock, extending branches and doubling their track from Winnipeg to Fort William. That, certainly is all in the right direction. I am not in favour of doubling their main line through the territories, because it would not relieve the settlers who haul grain a great distance or the new settlements that are continually springing up. But if the track be doubled from Winnipeg to the lakes, it will certainly be an advantage. If the North-west Central had been built two or three years ago, as we North-west members struggled so hard to secure its building, but were defeated, the congestion along the main line in Assiniboia would not have occurred, because the new line would have relieved it. I am glad to state that now the company is prepared to build probably one hundred miles as a branch from the main line out to File Hills. This will largely meet the necessities of the case and will relieve the main line through the territory of East Assiniboia. But there must be a large increase in the storage capacity at the 187 points at which the Canadian Pacific Railway loads grain. The storage capacity at country points in Manitoba and the Territories amounts to something a little over 21,000,000 bushels. We are informed by Mr. Castle, the warehouse commissioner, that at least three million bushels capacity ought to be added to the Canadian Pacific Railway storage at the lakes. I am pleased to see by Saturday's paper, that the Canadian Pacific Railway are taking steps to increase their storage capacity from 5,500,000 bushels to 9,000,000 bushels, the cost of which to them will be about $1,000,000. This is in the direction of relief. But I do not know why this government might not consider the propriety of assisting in building storage capacity at the lakes. Certainly it would only be carrying out the same principle that they have adopted in assisting to build elevators at Montreal. Then we want a large increase in the transportation facilities. We want the government to take into consideration as soon as possible, the perfection of a water way to the sea. The sooner the grain can be got to market in the autumn, the greater the value to the country, the greater the price—and I am sure the country is worthy the trouble and the expense. I am satisfied there is more gold in the soil of the prairies than in the rocks of the Yukon, and we ought to be willing to spend some money in providing such transportation facilities as the country demands. Wheat is a cash article ; it will pay its own way to the sea. The farmers are not asking for protection. I would like to say a word to our protectionists in the old provinces. The best protection any government can give to you is to attract a large population to the North-west to produce abundantly and make a market for your products. Moreover, you cannot protect the farmer of the North-west—no government, I do not care what its name may be, can protect the farmer of the North-west. Why ? Because he is out in the wide world of free trade with his products ; he must compete with all comers in a market where he has no artificial advantage. You may protect manufacturers, but there is no protection you can give them that will be better than to fill the North-west country with an industrious population of great producing power whose wants will give a home market for home products. I do not wish to take up longer time, but I thought it most important that the resolution I present, and this report and also the important facts I have given, should be placed on record.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Douglas) one question, for information. I understood him to say that the elevator people told the farmers that they had no bins for hard wheat. Was that because they reserved no bins for No. 1 hard or was it that the bins, though reserved, were full ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No, the answer was : We are not purchasing No. 1 hard.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did they allege as a reason that the bins reserved for No. 1 hard were already full ?

Mr. DOUGLAS. They had no provision made for it. But you can easily understand why. If they can purchase No. 1 hard at the price of No. 1 northern, they can mix it with a lower grade of a less value and still have it grade No 1 northern. If this be done they make money. They have robbed the public, it is true, but they have made money. That is a line of business that is being practiced very largely. A remedy is provided, however, in the legislation of 1900. But if the law had been strictly carried out, this practice might have been stopped and that suddenly. I am glad to say, so far as I know, our legislation of 1900 has been most effective. It needs some additions. I believe some additional power should be given to the warehouse commissioner, for example. This subject will be brought up in due time, before this session closes. What we want is perfect freedom—access to the market independently of the elevators. We want neither legislation nor anything else to say to our people : You must go along this line and not along that line. They have a right to perfect freedom in the presentation of their stuff at the railway station, and they ought to have the facilities which the Dominion Railway Act has ensured to all Canadian citizens. This has become very apparent in the trade of this year. The people have been denied cars. I had a telegram no longer ago than Friday from a man who had bought in considerable quantity in Grenfel. He applied for cars to ship the wheat to Brandon. But he was informed by the Canadian Pacific Railway officials that they could not grant him cars—that the Dealers' Association objected. What does that mean ? I sent the telegram with a note to Montreal asking what it meant, but I have not yet heard the explanation. I know there are gentlemen from Manitoba who know, perhaps, as much about the grain trade as I do, and there are other members also, no doubt, who have given this matter attention and who will address the House. In bringing my remarks to a close, I desire to express the sincere hope that before this session closes the government will take this whole situation into its serious consideration and will manifest such an interest in it as will show the people that it is the country's welfare we seek and its prosperity we desire.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I would like to say a few words on this question that has been brought before the House by the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) with reference to the grain blockade. There is no doubt at all that we have been seriously troubled in that way in the North-west Territories and in Manitoba during the last season. But we must take into consideration that we have during the season that has just passed, raised not only one crop in the North-west Territories, but we have raised something like two crops; and the shortage of cars, I fancy, is not so much due to the neglect of the railway companies as it is to their not being prepared to move two crops in one season. However, I think any person who has listened to the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia must come to the conclusion that it is high time the government of this country did something towards the appointment of a railway commission to settle all these disputes.

Now, my hon. friend has told us this afternoon that the grain Act is very good in itself, but he mentioned some defects in it, and some respects in which he thought it did not meet the wishes of the people of that country. However, so far as I could gather from his speech, he thinks that while the Act itself provided for all the different things he complained of, the commissioner had not enforced the Act. Now, I noticed that in one part of his speech he alluded to the fact that the commissioner might, if he so wished, refuse a license to any person that was desirous of providing a flat warehouse or an elevator. I think if the hon. gentlemen will look over the Act, the Grain Act of 1900, he will find that the commissioner has no power to refuse a license to any one. That Act provides that a license should be granted to any person operating a flat warehouse or an elevator, on the payment of a certain fee, and when the party operating an elevator or a flat warehouse has conformed to all the regulations laid down in this Act. That being the case, if the conditions of the Act have not been fulfilled, we must take it, either that the commissioner has neglected or refused to do his duty as provided in this Act, or that the parties who have a grievance have failed to apply to the commissioner for relief, or to make official complaint to him. It is either the one thing or the other. If the parties had officially complained to him that they were not receiving proper treatment with regard to grades, it would be the duty of the commissioner under this Act to take the matter up and to see that the parties were properly dealt with, because the machinery is here for that purpose.

Now, to my mind this whole matter is closely related to a question that has been discussed in this House for many years, and that is the transportation problem. That is the greatest problem to-day that the people of this country have to deal with. There lies the secret of the whole thing. We have not sufficient railway accommodation in the North-west at the present time. We have this year raised something like a hundred million bushels of grains, and when we take into consideration that about 400,000 people all told have produced 100,000,000 bushels of grain, not to speak of the quantity of other grains they have produced, I think the House will agree with me that it is about time something was done to provide better facilities for carrying our grain to market. We have had this year only one road from the city of Winnipeg, only one railway for taking away that grain, the railway running from Winnipeg to Port Arthur. Of course, the Canadian Northern line was opened up towards the latter end of November, but on account of not having elevators prepared at Port Arthur the people could not take advantage of it, and it was of very little use to the people of the North-west this year. So we had to depend on the one track, and I am not prepared to say that in every case the railroad company have acted in a right spirit with the people, but they have done well in the whole.

Now, with reference to the flat warehouses and the loading platforms my hon. friend speaks of, there is a provision in this Act, which I have under my hand, that if a certain number of farmers wish to have a flat warehouse at any point they may send a petition to the commissioner and the commissioner shall give them permission to build the warehouse, and shall see that the railroad corporation furnishes the necessary facilities in the way of side tracks, &c. If they are not satisfied with one flat warehouse, they can apply again to the commissioner and can get others built, providing they pay 6 per cent on the cost of putting in the sidings and pay for the land on which the warehouse stands. If they had made application to the commissioner, I have no doubt he would have seen that they had the privilege granted them of building these warehouses. However, taking the Act as a whole, while I think there are some things in it that could be amended, it has worked out pretty well indeed. But the fact of the matter is we want more railroad facilities ; we must have more railroads to the lakes.

The hon. gentleman spoke about canals. To my mind this country has been spending enough money on canals. Of course, I am only expressing my own opinion when I say that I think the time has come that we will have to have a quicker mode of transporting our produce to market than by taking it down through the canals. Under present conditions very little of the wheat crop of Manitoba is taken out in the summer months. It has to cross through the lakes to the canals, and as soon as navigation closes we have to depend on storing it at Fort William or some other place. Now we find that grain that is stored at Fort William over winter depreciates in value something like six cents per bushel; in other words, the farmer loses six cents a bushel on account of having to store his grain over winter, including storage charges, insurance, &c. So if we had some means of sending the grain direct to market, direct to an ocean port, we could take advantage of a rise in wheat when such takes place. But we are not able to do that now because it is stored at Fort William or some other place and has to lie there over winter. However, that is a matter that belongs to the discussion of the transportation problem, and that may come up in the House shortly.

I wish to say again that the remarks of the hon. member for East Assiniboia have demonstrated to this House the necessity that exists for the appointment of a railway commission. No matter how good a man you may appoint as grain commissioner in Winnipeg, when the rush is on in the fall it is impossible for him to deal with everything that comes up, like a shortage of cars. That is not his business. His business is to deal between the farmer and the elevator man about grades, &c. With reference to a shortage of cars, the only way you can deal with that is by a railway commission. Over in the United States, I think, in every state in the union, they have at the present time a railway commission, whose duty it is to deal with this matter. Other matters that come up such as cattle guards, would all be dealt with by a railway commission. I hope that the government will take that into consideration, and the sooner they appoint a railway commission to see that all these things are looked after, such as a shortage of cars and everything else, the better it will be for every person interested.

Mr. W. F. McCREARY (Selkirk). Before this discussion closes, as the two hon. gentlemen who have just spoken have not referred to the province of Manitoba, I desire to say a few words. In the first place, an impression would be conveyed from the statement of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) that the car shortage did not affect the province of Manitoba. As a matter of fact, there are now lying in bins in that province 20,000,000 or 25,000,000 bushels of wheat that could not be moved out to the lake ports this fall. I have an important resolution passed by the Winnipeg Board of Trade at a meeting held in January last. It is quite lengthy, and if the House will permit me, I will hand it to the 'Hansard' instead of reading it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I will read a portion of it. It sets out the matter so fully that I think it ought to be brought before this House. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the car shortage and loss that has been occasioned in consequence is one of the most important matters that can be brought up in this House.

The loss in Manitoba alone has been estimated on the car shortage at $7,000,000, sustained by the 250,000 people in that province. If the farmers in the province of Ontario who number ten times those in Manitoba were to make in one year a loss of $7,000,000, we would hear from some hon. members on the other side of the House representing the province of Ontario. I attended a board of trade meeting that was called to deal with this question. On the first day of the meeting a resolution was brought up by three or four gentlemen, one of whom at a former time was a member of this House. It was thought that the resolution had been a little too strongly worded and it was a debatable question. That resolution was subsequently amended by a committee composed of men who are probably among the best citizens of Winnipeg and who are largely interested in the city of Winnipeg and in the province of Manitoba. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was chartered by the Canadian parliament and large grants of money and land were made to that company as an inducement to their undertaking the construction and operation of a line of railroad through Manitoba and the North-west, with a view of the development of the country; and,

Whereas, further large grants either in money and in lands, or both, have been made from time to time for the purpose of securing the construction of branch lines and extensions thereof to the same road; and,

Whereas, a strict monopoly of the carrying trade of this country was for long years secured and has been attempted to be maintained up to the present time; and,

Whereas, under these circumstances the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories and the Dominion have a right to expect that the road will provide and maintain adequate facilities for handling the traffic of this country, and especially of the outgoing produce thereof; and,

Whereas, the said company has failed in the carrying out of the crop of the year 1901 to such an extent that with the elevators at Fort William, as also along the lines of the said road in Manitoba and the North-west full of wheat alone, there yet remains in the farmers' hands over and above the quantity required for consumption and for seed an amount which may be reasonably estimated at the present time at twenty million bushels of wheat.

That is in the province of Manitoba alone.

—which surplus they are unable to market; and,

Whereas, a very large acreage was prepared for cultivation during the year 1901 by new settlers, and the prospect for immigration to Manitoba and the North-west during the year 1902 is extremely good, consequently the area of land broken up and to be broken up and brought under cultivation the coming year will materially add to the grain producing area; and,

Whereas, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company still exclusively possess the carrying trade of a very large proportion of the grain area in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and with a full knowledge of the increase of acreage under crop, did not provide what was reasonably necessary for the crop of the past year;

Therefore, be it resolved——

And here is what I wish the members of the government to observe that is the remedy, proposed at this large meeting:

—that this board in view of the facts call on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to relieve the present situation, so far as is within their power, between this time and the opening of navigation, by carrying grain forward, all rail, from Manitoba and the North-west to eastern points, to the greatest extent possible, and at a rate of freight which shall not exceed the rate charged by lake and rail between the same points;

That with the view of providing against simliar difficulties in the future, they should, during the current year, double track their line from the Red river to Fort William;

That they should materially increase their elevator capacity at Fort William and also afford every facility for the building and operation of elevators at Fort William by private enterprise;

That they should provide ample motive power and cars for use on the western division so as to be in a position to handle the traffic of the country duriag the period of greatest necessity with sufficient expenditure and to get the bulk of the crop out before the close of navigation.

As I said, at this meeting of the Board of Trade of the city of Winnipeg, composed of 200 or 300 of the most prominent commercial men of the west, this question was discussed at great length, in fact, for two entire afternoons. Mr. William Whyte, superintendent of the Canadian Pacific Railway was present and made out a very able case for the Canadian Pacific Railway. He took credit to the Canadian Pacific Railway for having purchased during the previous year 62 new engines and 1,200 new box cars, and for having hauled out 32 per cent more wheat and 125 per cent more oats than in the previous year, and he pointed out that in fact they had taken every possible precaution to meet the new situation and were doing everything possible to provide new rolling stock to take out the crop in the comparatively short time which was given them to move it. It may surprise some hon. gentlemen to know that the wheat crop begins to move about the first of September and keeps on usually until the first of December. But this year on account of having a considerable rain fall the farmers were not able to thresh their grain, and consequently the total number of days that was given to the Canadian Pacific Railway to move the crop out before navigation closed was forty-three days. As a fair minded man I do not know that the Canadian Pacific Railway could be asked to provide rolling stock, engines and box cars, necessary to move that immense quantity of grain in so short a time. I do not know whether, if it had been moved as rapidly as required, there would not have been just as bad a blockade at Fort William and at Buffalo. Touching upon that question, I may say that the Board of Trade of Winnipeg, in their annual report took up that same question, and, Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me, I will read a clause of the report dealing with that phase of the question :

> The tonnage of the Canadian lake vessels is not keeping pace with the annually increasing tonnage handled at Fort William, and it behooves Canadians to move in this matter with despatch, or an unduly increased percentage of Manitoba grain will seek the Atlantic seaboard via Buffalo and American lines. It is doubtful whether, if all the grain offered to the Canadian Pacific Railway last fall had been taken to Fort William, there would have been Canadian vessels to have taken it across the lakes, even when excluding the quantity actually taken to Buffalo in American bottoms. Late in the fall Buffalo was blocked, and owing to the coatsing laws American vessels were not allowed to carry grain from Fort William to another Canadian port. Either the Canadian fleet will have to be largely augmented or the coasting regulations suspended, for Manitoba grain cannot be held back at Fort William or Port Arthur, because Canadian vessel tonnage is inadequate to handle it.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCreary), but may I ask him a question ? I have heard the statement made that when navigation closed there was not a bushel of wheat in the elevators at Fort William to be taken out. I would like to know if that is a fact.

Mr. McCREARY. I dare say that may have been the case.

Mr. CLARKE. That, in fact, two or three vessels went up to Fort William to get cargoes, that they were unable to get them, and that they had to remain there.

Mr. McCREARY. I dare say that may be the case. Owing to the trouble caused by the serious rain fall that we had in Manitoba, the farmers were not able to thresh the grain. If you ask the 20,000 men who went up there to help thresh the grain, they will tell you that they could not get employment when they arrived and that many of them returned home again, but, a very few days after the boats were loaded for the last time at Fort William there was enough grain to fill up these elevators again. The hon. gentleman for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) put the matter in a nutshell when he said that on the 2nd of November there were 5,000,000 bushels of grain in the elevators in our country and that during the entire month of November they had just moved out about 5,000,000 bushels, consequently all the wheat threshed during November must have been bought at six cents anyway a bushel less than it was worth. My own county is not as much affected by this question as some other parts of the province of Manitoba, but during the last two or three weeks before I came down here, I happened to be on a little missionary tour in the county of Lisgar. That is one of the largest grain producing counties in the west. I met with many farmers there and discussed the question with them. I tell you, Sir, it was pretty hard to talk Liberal principles in view of the fact that across the boundary they were getting six to sixteen cents a bushel more for wheat than our farmers were. I endeavoured to find an explanation for this. The explanation is not due entirely to the car shortage. There are many reasons for it. The town of Snowflake where I had a meeting is situated in the southern part of the county and right across the line is the town of Hanna in North Dakota. The price of wheat was six to sixteen cents a bushel more there than it was in Snowflake. I asked a farmer 'how is that '? He said there are different reasons. I said 'What about the rate,' He said 'Well the rate from Snowflake to Port Aruthur on the Canadian Pacific Railway is 16 cents.' 'What is the rate on the Great Northern from Duluth,' I asked. He said : 'the rate is 17 cents.' I said : 'It cannot be the railway.' 'No,' he replied. Well, what is the reason ? One farmer said the reason was that the millers of Minneapolis were booming the price on account of shortage of feed in Nebraska and South Dakota and they were paying $26 a ton for bran, and consequently they wanted to grind the wheat and sell the bran and make a profit that way. Another man said there was no restriction whatever on the farmers selling to them wheat in the United States, and consequently the competition there was more lively. While these may be some of the reasons they still do not explain the great discrepancy in the prices. My own impression is, that before this question is finally settled, we will have to select a body of men who will act as a commission to decide on these matters. They must be men who understand the business, and they will have to study the elevator system at Duluth and follow it up over the branch line of the Canadian Northern and the Northern Pacific throughout this prairie country, in order to ascertain why there is this difference in the price. I think our present Grain Act was not sufficiently considered at the time it was passed, and I believe a good deal of amendments could be made to improve it. The member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) said he thought our grain Act could be worked out all right, but I think the Minister of the Interior when he returns intends to bring down important amendments to this Act. For instance, one clause provides that if a car is placed on a siding for a farmer he can only have a limited time to load that car, and if he exceeds that time it is taken away or there is a charge for demurrage. The time given to the farmer in many cases is not long enough. Another clause of that Act provides that if you make a request to the Canadian Pacific Railway for a loading platform, they are given three months in which to construct that loading platform when it should be constructed in three days. Five men could easily build it in three days and consequently that clause in the Act is of very little use. These are some suggested amendments to the Act which should be looked into carefully. No doubt when the minister (Hon. Mr. Sifton) brings his Bill to amend the Act, all the questions which have been brought up to-day will be discussed at greater length. There is another phase of this question which seriously affects our western country. A large number of these farmers who are now coming into Manitoba and especially along the Sault line in the North-west, are men who have large means and some of whom bring in five or six cars of mules and horses. They are going into the country to raise wheat as a speculation. They have followed that occupation down in Dakota and Minnesota and they have been making money out of the raising of wheat alone. The moment they come in there and see our farmers with from 5,000 to 10,000 bushels of wheat lying in the warehouses and unable to get cars to carry it out, they are at first disposed to treat the matter as a joke. They cannot understand the situation at all. They say: If the Canadian Pacific Railway cannot supply you cars to ship your wheat what is the use of raising it. If some of these men who are possessed of large means get it into their heads that our railway system is such that we cannot get the wheat out, then they will not come into our country at all. It behooves the government of the day to look seriously into this phase of the question, because it is a very important matter to the people of Manitoba and the North-west. I have noticed since I have come to this parliament, that there has been a very lengthy discussion on some occasions on comparatively unimportant questions. Last year the cultivation of beet-root sugar was discussed for one or two days in the House, and it is, I think, a question which need not be seriously discussed in this country. But here is a question of vast importance to this country. We have 100,000,000 bushels of grain raised by 400,000 people, and we have to solve the problem of populating our Great North-west, but I remark how very few of the hon. gentlemen opposite are present in the House to hear the discussion of this vital matter. I regret indeed to say that the seats are very poorly filled on either side of the House. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the question should be very seriously considered by us all, and I trust that the government will do something to relieve the situation.

Mr. N. BOYD (Macdonald). I quite agree with the last speaker (Mr. McCreary) in his statement with regard to the empty seats in this House when such an important matter is being discussed. This is a question of greater importance to the Northwest and Manitoba than anything that has been brought before the House during this session or any session for the past five years, and yet, how many of the ministers of the Crown are in their seats at this moment? Just three. We have only three ministers of the Crown present notwithstanding that their supporters are bringing forward this question which is perhaps the most important that can engage the consideration of the people of this country. And, Sir, the minister who is leading the House to-day is the man who used the words, or who supported the men who used the words quoted by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) when he said that Manitoba and the North-west was a home for buffaloes and coyotes, and that, if the Canadian Pacific Railway was built it would not pay for the axle grease used on the wheels. We cannot expect that any interest will be taken in this question by that kind of men. That is the position we find this government in to-day. This is a question that has engaged for months past the attention of the whole people of Manitoba and the North-west. The papers have been full of it, and nothing has been said on the question to-day that has not been published in the press throughout the country since November last. I thought, judging from the remarks of the member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) that he was paving the way as it were to make it easy for the government to support the Canadian Pacific Railway in their proposition with reference to their $20,000,000 outlay. I will not say that this is the case, nor will I say that it would be wise in the interests of the country as a whole that this should not be done. But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that when I had first the honour to speak in this House in 1893, I remarked to the present Prime Minister who was then in opposition: That if the Liberal party would admit that they had made mistakes about that western country; if they would say that they did not understand the capabilities of that country, and in order to show their repentance propound the policy that they would go so far as to build another railroad into that country; they would retrieve their position a great deal. But the present Prime Minister shook his head, and a number of the Liberal newspapers amongst others the Ottawa 'Free Press' castigated me for suggesting such an outrageous doctrine. We now find, Mr. Speaker, that the foresight of the Conservative leaders who opened up that country has caused them to be regarded as the real benefactors of the North-west, and probably some of the old time Liberals view with regret the fact that the pessimistic prophecies they made with regard to that country have, like some of their other prophecies, turned out to be false. We have to-day the spectacle of the supporters of the Liberal government pointing out to that government that the prophecies of the Conservative leaders made in days past, have already been fulfilled.

The question, as I say, is one of the greatest importance to Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and to the whole of this country, and I regret, beyond words of mine to express, how little interest is being taken in it by the members of this House. If it related to some trifling bridge, or breakwater, or oyster hatchery, of some scandal, the seats would be full, and each ear set so as not to miss the slightest sound. But here is a question involving millions to the people of this country, and there is general indifference. There is no use of this government trying to shirk responsibility in regard to this question, nor the Canadian Pacific Railway Company trying to shirk responsibility in regard to it; because it was well known during the whole of last summer, while the crop was growing, what might be expected, and the Canadian Pacific Railway should have provided—and it was the duty of this government to see that they did provide—the necessary equipment to take the crop out of the country. This government has enacted the Grain Act, and must assume all responsibility for the working of it; and when any man in this House says that that Act has proven a success, and is working satisfactorily, all I can say is that he does not know what he is talking about, because it is working most unsatisfactorily. Whatever idea the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) may have had when he was putting that Act through this House, it has certainly failed to accomplish the object for which it was enacted. It is such an Act as was never applied to any other business. In what other business is a man compelled to take out a license before he can do business? The grain dealers say: In order to protect ourselves we have found it necessary to do as we have done; and what has been the action of the grain men? This government should look into this matter, because when they were in opposition they declared that they would remove all such restrictions and combines. A greater combine never existed than exists in that country to-day, under the very Grain Act passed by this government. It works just as the hon. member for Eastern Assiniboia has described; and, as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. McCreary) has said, some six or seven millions of dollars have been taken out of the pockets of the people of this country in connection with it, and not all on account of the shortage of cars. Wherever there was an independent buyer, the grain combine would send one or two men to raise the price on him to such an extent as to put him out of business unless he was willing to join their exchange. I will cite one case which happened at the town of Douglas, thirty miles west of Carberry, where there was an independent buyer. At that point on a certain day the price of wheat was 61 cents a bushel, while 60 miles nearer to Winnipeg, at a point where there was not an independent buyer, it was 51 cents a bushel. This is the way matters have worked under the grain Act of the government. Flat warehouses are useless to meet the case, because the Act provides that they must be built to hold two or three car loads. The result is that a man must be put at each warehouse to look after it, and there goes your warehouse—the expense will eat it up.

Mr. Speaker, there is one way to get over this difficulty, and if the government will not adopt it, I will introduce a measure into this House, so that we shall have them put on record, and see exactly what they intend to do. That is, that they shall demand of the railway companies that they shall provide cars for the farmers at all times, within a reasonable time. If you compel the railways to do that, and put a penalty on them if they do not do it, you will have no more trouble with elevators, blockades or anything of the kind.

Mr. HEYD. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. How many cars would it be necessary for the Canadian Pacific Railway to have on hand to do as he wants done—to have a car whenever any farmer wants one ?

Mr. BOYD. I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, and when we did prophesy you would not believe us. I am not prophesying the number of bushels of grain that will come out of that country ; but I say that the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway going into that country to move the crops should be prepared to meet the necessities of the case ; and I am not submitting anything unreasonable. The western states, which control matters of that kind, and not the central government, have such laws as I have mentioned, and have solved the grain difficulty in that way, because they compel the railway companies to give the farmers an equal number of cars with the elevators. When that is done, the farmer can sell to whomsoever he pleases ; and I now ask the government—because it is evident that the measure for aiding the Canadian Pacific Railway is coming down—to see to it, before any further concessions are made to that company, that the farmers shall be protected in the way I suggest. When they do that, there will be very little further difficulty in regard to prices or anything else.

The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) spoke of double tracks. If we have to wait for double tracks, it will take longer to double track the road between Winnipeg and Fort William than it would to build a new road. Three years would not see that portion of the road double tracked.

I could give many details to show the iniquitous working of the present grain Act, but I feel that it would be merely taking up the time of an indifferent House—because the indifference of the House is displayed by the empty benches we see to-day—and I will leave the responsibility with the government. It was well known that the abundant crops which we have had was coming ; and you need not suppose that that is the only abundant crop we are going to have. We have had many crops equal to the lact crop ; but the acreage under crop is increasing both in Manitoba and the North-west Territories ; and the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories are going to hold the present government responsible for protecting the farmers.

I want to say a word to the hon. Minister of Public Works in regard to this matter. Instead of talking about spending three hundred millions or so on the Georgian Bay canal, he had better give a little consideration to keeping the Lake Superior ports open. That is something that is being done in other northern countries. One-fourth of the amount of money which it is proposed to expend in some directions, if spent in building the proper kind of vessels, would keep open, probably the whole winter, Fort William and other ports on Lake Superior which can be reached by railroad lines. This is a matter which should engage the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works, and I trust that the members from Manitoba and the North-west will be able to bring such pressure to bear upon him and the government that they will feel obliged to give some attention to that matter.

Mr. TALBOT. Would the hon. gentleman from Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) tell us whether that is not the same speech he made in Lisgar during the last campaign ?

Mr. BOYD. I am not like the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot). I can make more than one speech.

Mr. W. C. EDWARDS (Russell). I have no intention of taking up the time of the House at any length on this question, but as it is one in which we are all interested I wish to give my view of the situation. It is not only gentlemen from the west who are interested in the development and the general welfare of our great western country. We all have a deep interest in its future, for on its development and progress depends in a very large measure the prosperity of the whole country . And in considering this question—which is a very fair one to bring before the House—we should not look merely at one side of it, but discuss it in a reasonable manner from every point of view. The hon. gentleman who last spoke (Mr. Boyd) appears to be under the impression that no matter how great may be our development in any given year, that development should be foreseen by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the other railway companies, and the Canadian government, and every possible preparation made by them to meet it. He seems to think that they should provide every possible facility to meet an extraordinary development of trade without any regard to the risk that their expectations might fail entirely in realization and the requirements be far less than anticipated. What are the conditions to-day not only in Canada but over the entire continent of America ? We are told that in the United States a commission regulates this question. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is no commission in the United States, there is no body of men—

Mr. BOYD. I did not say anything about a commissioner controlling this matter in the United States. I said it was under state law.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well, I say that there is no man or body of men who could have foreseen and been ready for the immense commerce that was developed on the North American continent this past year. Why, two years ago the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, the Canada Atlantic and all the other railway companies went into building cars as rapidly as they could, but the expectations of the railway companies, not only in Canada but in the United States, have been greatly exceeded, and the development had been such as to tax these carriers far beyond their capacity, even with all their preparations. I defy any hon. member of this House to name any railway company on the continent of America which has been able to supply all the cars required of it in the past six or nine months. I have no desire to underrate in the slightest degree the importance and the necessity of attending to the requirements of Manitoba and the North-west to the greatest extent possible, but I wish to point out that while Manitoba and the North-west are a great portion of Canada and the North American continent, they are not the entire country. There are other interests which are also entitled to some consideration.

What has been the position ? Simply this, that great and small shippers have had to wait all the way from one week to months for the car supply they required. That has been the condition throughout the entire breadth, not only of this country, but of the United States. To show the great stress to which our carriers have been reduced, let me point out this one fact. Every car which has gone into the United States from Canada has been coralled there, and our Canadian railways have not been able to get them back. For weeks and weeks and months and months these cars have been kept there by the American companies. That is the position. Manitoba and the North-west having doubled their products, naturally have suffered and they have all our sympathies, but I would like to throw out a suggestion. In the short period of time between the harvesting of the crop in the North-west and the following winter, it is perfectly impossible for any railway system to move all that crop, and it will become more and more necessary, as that country develops, for a very large portion of its grain to be stored there until the following year. One of the great difficulties is that the people of Manitoba and the North-west themselves have not taken the means to take care of their own grain ; but they will have to provide against the inevitable and do this, for it is certainly perfectly impossible that any railway system or government can supply the means of taking care of the whole crop of that country in the short time demanded. It would be just as reasonable to expect them to take care of all the produce of the eastern portion of Canada and supply warehouses for it. While the government and the Canadian Pacific Railway are doing everything possible, the people of that country must do something for themselves. The farmers must provide means for holding their crops until these crops can be shipped. Besides it is an unwise policy, from a business point of view, to insist on the grain being moved into warehouses and forced out of that country so rapidly. The inevitable effect of such a policy would simply be to weaken the price. Let the farmers make some provision to take care of their grain so that they may command the best prices, and they will then be much better off than they could possibly be, even if they had all the facilities they ask to be furnished with by the railway companies and the government. I simply wish to point out the situation as I understand it, as a business man. I know what it means, for I myself have suffered severely. I venture to say that I have suffered to a far greater extent than many farmers put together, but I do not necessarily jump to the conclusion that it is the fault of the government or the railway companies. Not at all. It is in the interests of the railway companies to facilitate, in every way possible, the requirements of the shipper, and they are doing their very best to meet these requirements. They are doing that for their own profit. I know what car building has been going on. Why, in the past two years car building has gone on to an extent that it never did before, and if the business of America develops in the next two years, as it has done in the past two years, it will be perfectly impossible for the railway companies to overtake the business.

Mr. C. B. HEYD (South Brant). I do not pretend to be a practical man on this question but I have listened with a great deal of interest to what has been said, and can approach this subject with an open mind. I think that our farmers, who seem disposed to lay the blame on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the government, are not as reasonable as they would expect other people to be. I do not see how they could have expected either the government or the Canadian Pacific Railway to have prepared facilities for bringing their grain to market as rapidly as they would wish. How can they expect one or two railway companies or a government to move the entire crop of the North-west and Manitoba in the short period of three months. It seems to me that in expecting this, they are very unreasonable. They must give us time to realize what a tremendous country we have in that North-west, and make adequate provisions to remove all that grain. There is a great deal in what was said by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) that the people of Manitoba and the North-west should assist a little more than they are doing, instead of looking to the government to relieve them of the necessity of doing anything to help themselves. The farmer of Ontario has to make provision to take care of his stuff and to sell it when the market is right. But our friends in the North-west want to make no provision at all ; apparently they want everything to be provided by the government or the railway, so that they may be saved the expense of building barns to store their own grain. I think they are a little unreasonable.

Mr. McCREARY. I submit that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) has no justification for any such impression in any speech that has been made here. The statements made were statements of fact—that such a state of affairs existed; and the government is asked to look into that state of affairs and, if possible, provide a remedy. There is not a man in the North-west but gives full credit to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the work it has done this year. I myself cited the figures showing that they had moved 35 per cent more wheat and 125 per cent more oats than up to the same time in 1899. One of the remedies the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) suggests is that the farmers should be encouraged to build granaries for the storage of their wheat. No doubt, that is one of the things that the government would consider, and possibly, recommend. The hon. gentleman should not state that we condemn the Canadian Pacific Railway or that our farmers are unreasonable in their demands, for nothing is intended to be conveyed that would justify such an impression.

Mr. HEYD. I gather from the addresses made here to-day that the Canadian Pacific Railway was condemned because they had not omniscience to foresee the tremendous development that would take place in Manitoba and the North-west and make provision in rolling stock to move the whole crop within three months. But none of these hon. gentlemen told us what the Canadian Pacific Railway would do with this tremendous equipment if, instead of the enormous crop that was gathered, there happened to be a poor crop and no need for these transportation facilities. These are things that must be reconciled. We must not expect too much of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I was out in the North-west country this year. I was in places where wheat fields had extended as far as the eye could see; and it was plain to me that one railway, or two railways, or even six railways, could not move the crop that had been gathered. Our friends must be reasonable. They are anxious that we should provide them with railway and shipping facilities so that their grain may reach distant markets, but they do not want to do what they might do. They want to impress it upon us that they are the country. But they must do a little do not want to do what they might do. They want to bring the money back to Manitoba and then go to the United States and buy their agricultural implements.

Mr. McCREARY. Then, let us ship our grain by Duluth.

Mr. HEYD. The Ontario farmer and the Quebec farmer and the agriculturist in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia do not care two pins whether you move your grain from Manitoba in 3 months or not. They are not interested in that question, for you are competitors with them in the market.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) I beg the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Heyd) pardon—we are interested in the general prosperity of the country.

Mr. HEYD. I am willing to admit that we are all interested in the general prosperity of the country. But I am dealing with a phase of this question which has been presented to us by one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke. He objected, apparently, to any attempt to develop any interest in the country except that of raising grain and building up the North-west, while the interests of Ontario and the North-west are not exactly identical. We are quite willing that they should raise grain in the North-west; we are quite willing that the people of Ontario should be taxed to carry that grain to the European market. But we want the people of the North-west to buy their agricultural implements from the people of Ontario, and not go to the people of the United States to buy them. Therefore, holding the views I do, I think the people of the North-west should modify their expectations considerably. And, I would not be willing to tax the people of Ontario and Quebec to build railways and assist them in marketing their products in Europe, unless they are willing to assist us in securing the Manitoba trade.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) one question. Is it a fact that the manufacturers of Canada can sell agricultural implements at a much lower rate in foreign countries than they do in Manitoba and the North-west Territories ?

Mr. HEYD. I am not in the agricultural implement business, but I do not believe they do.

Mr. Wm. J. ROCHE (Marquette). I do not rise with the hope of adding anything to the debate, as the ground has been pretty well traversed, but to enter a protest against some of the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) who has just taken his seat. He says that the people of the eastern provinces are not interested in the moving of the grain from the North-west. That is a remarkable statement.

Mr. HEYD. I did not say that. I say that we are not interested in the same direction as the people of the North-west.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Not to the same extent, possibly.

Mr. HEYD. Well, to the same extent.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) speaks as he does because we are in the habit of buying a portion of our agricultural implements from the Americans. The hon. gentleman must remember that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) has given a very good reason, and that is that, to-day, the agricultural implement makers of Canada are exporting implements and selling them cheaper in the commonwealth of Australia, than they sell them in the Dominion of Canada. That is a fact that has been stated by the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton), whom the hon. gentleman (Mr. Heyd) is fond of calling one of his leaders. I do not desire to make any unreasonable charges against the Canadian Pacific Railway for their inability to move the crop in the short space of time between harvest and the close of navigation. We know that, with their present facilities, it would be impossible for three Canadian Pacific Railways to move the crop we have there in that length of time. But we say that they could have anticipated the great crop which was gathered as early as the month of July. Our provincial government issues a crop bulletin every month. I have here a copy of the bulletin for July, and in that bulletin it is stated that there was a prospect of fifty or sixty millions bushels of wheat alone being raised in that country. We ask why it was that the Canadian Pacific Railway did not take care, in anticipation of that crop, to prepare the facilities to move the grain and so give the farmers relief ? Now, of course, in one way that is not an unmixed evil. In fact, it is a splendid advertisement for us that we in the province of Manitoba alone have been able to raise 65,000,000 bushels of grain and have harvested far more than the railway can carry away. But, as we look to the future we see the prospect of a rapidly-increasing crop year by year. The hon. gentleman from South Brant (Mr. Heyd) stated that it was unreasonable to expect the Canadian Pacific Railway to load themselves up with rolling stock to move our extra big crop, because in other years, we might not have any grain to move. That condition, I believe, has not arisen in the past, and assuredly it will not arise in the future. Population is flowing into that country, and every year we are bound to require additional facilities, because our crop will be increased each year. To-day we find this condition of affairs—not only are the terminal elevators at the head of navigation full, but so is every elevator in Manitoba and the North-west. Every elevator and flat warehouse, every place where grain can be stored is full to overflowing. And not only that, but we find that at each little station, not only along the main line, but on the branch railways, are piles of grain in bags standing out exposed to the weather for two months past. Had the Canadian Pacific Railway taken precautions, they might have had sufficient rolling stock to relieve this congestion. One portion of our population is dependent on the other, and when the hon. member states that the farmers of the east are not particularly interested in the moving of the wheat from the west, he must remember how far this chain of interdependence runs. If a farmer of the North-west cannot sell his grain, he cannot pay his debts. Then the merchants and other trades people who are doing business with him cannot make their collections and cannot pay the wholesale men. It is largely to the wholesale men of the east that we have to look for our supplies, as the west is not a manufacturing country, and we have to import largely from the manufacturers of eastern Canada. So it is absurd to say that the people of the east are not interested in seeing that the western farmers have facilities for moving their crops, for we are all one people dependent on each other in that respect. Times are not so good in that country this winter as they should be, as they would have been had the farmers been able to dispose of their immense crop. We have found great stringency in the money market, comparatively speaking, in consequence of the farmers having had their grain tied up; indeed much of it is in their hands even at the present time. So that everything that can be done by this government to bring pressure to bear upon the transportation companies to increase their facilities, will be welcomed by the people of the west. At this time especially when the Canadian Pacific Railway is making an application to pariament for a loan, I believe, to assist them in the construction of their lines——

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). To increase their stock, the government should take advantage of the opportunity to bring pressure to bear upon that line before these favours are granted, and they should insist that something more shall be done in the future than has been done in the past to assist the farmer in moving his grain from year to year. So far as the province of Manitoba is concerned, owing to the agreement that was made between the Manitoba government and the Canadian Northern Railway during the past year, we do not expect that in the future we will be tied up to the same extent as we have been during the past year. Notwithstanding the wail and the lament that was made by many who opposed that bargain last year, it has turned out to be one of the most popular measures the Manitoba government has ever undertaken. As a result of that agreement additional facilities have been afforded during the last few weeks by the Canadian Northern elevator at Fort William to an extent of 1,000,000 or 1,500,000 bushels. But the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern will have to quadruple or at any rate treble their rolling stock in order to move the succeeding crops of that country. The Winnipeg Board of Trade, I believe, have recently waited upon the Canadian Pacific Railway authorities and asked them if they would divert some of their grain to the line of the Canadian Northern until this elevator at Fort William was filled up, but the Canadian Pacific Railway have absolutely refused to do so, they have absolutely refused to have any interchange of traffic; but they have declared, I suppose merely for the purpose of putting the people off, that it was their intention to enter into negotiations, and I think they say they have completed negotiations, by which they will divert some of their grain via the Great Northern to Duluth and other American ports. However, we are not very particular at the present time to what port the grain goes so long as we can get it to market in proper time, and the farmer gets his money for it.

I was pleased to hear from the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. McCreary) that it is the intention of the hon. Minister of the Interior, upon his return to the House, to introduce some amendments to the Grain Act. There is no doubt that our farmers have been compelled, because of lack of facilities during the past year, to take very much less for their grain than they would have otherwise received. It has been proved by investigations made by the local legislature of Manitoba during the past few weeks that a combine has existed in the grain trade in that country, and this Grain Act has largely assisted in rendering that combine possible, and as a result the farmers have had to take much less for their grain. I have no doubt that the Minister of the Interior, during his campaign in the constituency of Lisgar, brushed up against many farmers who pointed out to him the great opportunities afforded in the present Grain Act for fraud, and I am pleased to hear that it is his intention to bring in amendments to make this Act more perfect.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT (West Assiniboia). I agree with most of the remarks made by the hon. member (Mr. Roche, Marquette) who has taken his seat, and with the larger portion of the remarks made by other hon. gentlemen this afternoon. But the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) and the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) gave some advice to the people of the North-west, based possibly upon imperfect information. My hon. friend from Russell contended that the farmers of the North-west themselves should provide sufficient warehouses to safeguard their wheat crop.

Mr. EDWARDS. No.

Mr. SCOTT. I am referring now to some advice which was given by the hon. member for Russell, if I recollect his remarks aright.

Mr. EDWARDS. Entirely wrong.

Mr. SCOTT. At all events, who ever made the remark, I think it will have to be admitted by hon. gentlemen who were in the House two or three sessions ago, that the contention the member for East Assiniboia made was that liberty should be given to the farmers of the North-west Territories to build warehouses along the line of railway where they are demanded—

Mr. EDWARDS. May I be allowed to correct the hon. gentleman? I made no suggestion at all about building warehouses. I merely suggested that in view of the short time available for moving the crop in the autumn, it was in my opinion detrimental to the farmers themselves to force their crop upon the market. I said nothing at all about building warehouses. I said I considered it advisable, in the interests of the farmers themselves, to make some provision whereby they could hold at least a portion of their crop for a time, and not force it so rapidly upon the market.

Mr. SCOTT. I may say to the House that in my district one farmer and his six sons last season raised a crop exceeding 70,000 bushels of grain, which is not an unusual thing in that country. This fact I think will be sufficient to convince the House that it is unreasonable to expect that the farmers of that country are going to build granaries and barns on their farms sufficiently extensive to house their crops. That is not done in the western states where the conditions are somewhat similar. In the western prairie states the land is somewhat similar to that in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. The interest of the farmer lies in having as much grain as possible taken directly from the thresher to the elevator on the line of railway. I venture to say that if liberty is given to the farmers to build as many warehouses as they please upon the line of railway, they will take advantage of it to safeguard themselves against such a condition as exists in that country at the present time. The heat, if I may so call it, that has been shown this afternoon by some hon. gentlemen from the west, is in my opinion entirely warranted by the circumstances. The heat exhibited by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) for instance is entirely warranted by the conditions that are found in his district, and would be warranted by the conditions that exist in the district of West Assiniboia, and those conditions are my excuse for speaking on this subject to-day. In one respect, however, I think my hon. friend from Macdonald rather misdirected his remarks. I regretted that he seemed desirous of interjecting a little bit of party discussion into the subject. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that it would benefit the farmer who has five, eight, or ten thousand bushels of grain on his farm unprotected, which he is unable to get out of the country and obtain the price that it is worth—I say I do not know whether it would benefit him very much to know that the gentlemen who were leaders of the Liberal party twenty years ago admitted, as he seems to think they should admit, that they had held mistaken opinions at that time.

Possibly some of the leaders of the Liberal party, 20 years ago, did not realize the great prospects before the North-west Territories and Manitoba, but, during the time intervening from 1878 to 1896 neither the opinions held by the leaders of the Liberal party nor the platform of the Liberal party had very much to do with the government of affairs in that country. It was the opinions of the leaders of hon. gentlemen opposite which governed during the period. I think every person who understands what took place from 1878 to 1896 and who understands thoroughly the conditions in that country, is bound to admit that such a series of blunders in government never was seen in any country under civilized government. These blunders in government and the shackles that were put upon the trade in that country, together with the iniquitous railway bargains that were made, kept progress back so that the prophecies which the leaders of the hon. gentlemen opposite made in 1880 and 1882 were impossible of fulfilment. It is only to-day, after five years of Liberal administration, when some of the shackles have been taken off, when some of the injustices have been removed, not to as large an extent as we had hoped to see, and still hope to see, but even now, when some of the shackles have been removed and some of the injustices cancelled, these prophesies are commencing to be fulfilled. It is perfectly true that the subject which the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) brought before the House this afternoon is exciting a very great deal of interest throughout the country west of Lake Superior. This is undoubtedly the most serious question that has confronted the settlers in that country for a great length of time, and I am sure the House will see the force of the statements made by the hon. member for East Assiniboia and by other hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House on the subject. My hon. friend said in his remarks that probably no country ever had a greater crop than that with which the North-west Territories was blessed last season. I think it cannot be contradicted that in no country in the world, on unfertilized land, was such a crop ever raised as was raised by the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west Territories last season, but, it seems that there can be no ointment without the fly, and the inability of the transportation companies to carry out the crop so as to enable the farmers to reap the full benefit of their industry is the fly that is to be found in the ointment in this case. It is true that the harvest and the threshing were late. There was wet weather following the harvest which delayed threshing somewhat, but it is not my opinion that this handicapped the Canadian Pacific Railway which was practically the only company hauling our grain. It is my opinion that as soon as the company was ready to handle the crop, because as hon. gentlemen will recollect last year there was a long strike on the Canadian Pacific Railway, the trackmen's strike, the grain was ready and had harvesting and threshing gone on at the usual time, it is possible the company would not have been able to begin to handle the crop. At all events, my opinion is that the company's facilities were fully taxed just as soon as they had these facilities ready and commenced to handle the crop. It very soon became apparent that there was going to be some trouble in getting the crop to market. In my opinion we have no very great right to complain against the company on account of its lack of facilities to entirely cope with the conditions of the North-west. Referring to the remarks that fell from one hon. gentleman, I would say that I do not think any company or government or person who had studied the crop conditions realized before the month of September that there was going to be as large a crop as turned out to be the case. Some time in August, I recollect, the Winnipeg 'Free Press,' which had a commissioner around for several weeks, made the estimate that there would be about 50,000,000 bushels of wheat in the whole of the North-west. The actuality was something like 63,000,000 bushels. I recollect, also, that the premier of Manitoba, Mr. Roblin, was in Ontario at the same time as the Manitoba 'Free Press' grain estimate came out. It was his opinion that the 'Free Press' estimate was not too large and some of the Ontario papers, and some of the North-west papers as a matter of fact, drew attention to the position the Manitoba premier was taking and advised him that he should not endeavour to excite expectations that could not be realized. So, I think it may be taken as a fact that there was no person up to the month of September who realized that we were going to have such a large crop.

Mr. BOYD. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) if he is not aware, and if the country is not aware that a month before the date he mentioned, the Manitoba government had advertised for 20,000 men to take that crop out ?

Mr. SCOTT. I believe that is a fact and that of the 20,000 men, or whatever number of men came up, all were required and that more would have got work had they come. Even had everybody known that we would have had that amount of grain, I think it is quite likely that the Canadian Pacific Railway would have found it impossible to provide more facilities than they did when they came to handle the crop. But, this is the complaint we have against the Canadian Pacific Railway ; up to the close of navigation they did the best they could with their facilities. Navigation closed some time about the end of November, or early in December, and before the first of January every terminal elevator and every elevator in the country was full to the brim of wheat and since the first of January the blockade has been complete. Practically everybody in the wheat section, boards of trade, town councils and governments, have been exercised over that question and have been passing resolutions. I have here a large number of these resolutions but I will not detain the House by reading them. In these resolutions it is urged that pressure should be brought upon the Canadian Pacific Railway to do whatever is possible to relieve the situation. One suggestion made by the Minister of Agriculture in the Territorial government was that grain might be taken over the Soo line via Minneapolis and Duluth. At Duluth they had storage capacity open for 10,000,000 bushels during January and February, but the Canadian Pacific Railway refused to take any grain over the Soo line and refused also to hand grain over to the Canada Northern Railway Company, which had space for 1,500,000 bushels at Port Arthur. It might be said that it was open for the farmers to ship over the Soo if they desired to do so, but the grain rate from Moosejaw to Fort William is twenty cents a bushel and to Duluth thirty cents, so that it would be unreasonable to expect farmers on their own account to endeavour to ship their grain over the Soo line. The fact that this suggestion was a feasible one is proved by a telegram which was published in the Toronto Globe' on Saturday last, and which is as follows :

Wheat shipments in the west are again lively. Along the C.P.R. points yesterday there were 110,000 bushels of wheat marketed and the company claim that they will ship from now on, so that wheat can be stored at country points at the rate of over 100,000 bushels a day, or 1,000,000 bushels a week. Shipments are now nearly all being made over the 'Soo' line. The freight department have discovered that it is good policy to allow shipments to go over this route to Duluth. There is an enormous amount of wheat still in western farmers' hands, which will have to be delivered at elevators at stations along the C.P.R.

Had the Canadian Pacific Railway been ready to make shipments to Duluth, during January and February, if this statement is true that from now on they can remove 1,000,000 bushels a week by that route, they might have taken 8,000,000 bushels more wheat out of the country and the congestion would have been relieved to that extent. It is not alone because of the liability of their grain to destruction that the farmers have been losing. They have not of course lost in that way yet, but there is a great likelihood that the farmers will lose very largely by the spoiling of their grain in the spring when wet weather comes, because very much of it is stored in places not weather proof. In several ways there have been serious losses. One of the most serious has been the depression of the price, about which there has been so much discussion this afternoon. There cannot be any doubt at all about this depreciation in price. The existing conditions have enabled a grain combine to be formed there. I quite agree with remarks made by the hon. gentlemen opposite to the effect, that there was this year a hard and fast grain buyers combine in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. I agree in that opinion entirely. There is no question but that this is a fact. The possibilities of a grain combine have been brought about by the congestion, and that of course was because the railway company was unable to take out the grain in proper time. In my own town of Regina, at present, I believe that the conditions are depressing the price to the extent of eight or nine cents a bushel, and that means a tremendous loss indeed. The day before I left Regina, last week, a farmer who lives about four miles from the town and who is one of our largest farmers, growing a considerable amount of wheat, showed me a letter which he had received from a commission dealer in an eastern city, offering him in Regina 58 cents for No. 1 Northern, while the street price in Regina at that time was only 49 cents. There is no question at all but that the difference of nine cents a bushel was brought about directly by a combine among the dealers, and indirectly by the congestion.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the aggregate capacity of the elevators in Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

Mr. SCOTT. It was stated by my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) that it is between 21,000,000 and 22,000,000 bushels. That is in addition to the space in the terminal elevators.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was pointing out the serious losses entailed on farmers of Manitoba and the Territories during the past season by the want of transportation facilities—the loss through the depreciation in price and through the degradation of the grade. This was alluded to by my hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), who stated that the elevator men refused to buy No. 1 hard wheat. At Regina and other points with which I am familiar, I am not aware that the elevator men stated that they were not buying No. 1 hard wheat; but what did occur was this : When a farmer arrived at the elevator with a load of wheat, which would grade No. 1 hard, or possibly No. 1 northern, he was told by the elevator manager that the bin for that grade was filled, but that if he was willing to sell it as a lower grade, it could be taken. For weeks farmers at Regina were obliged to sell No. 1 northern as No. 2 northern, at a loss of three or four cents a bushel. Then, there was serious loss occasioned to the farmers after the middle of December and during the months of January and February by their total inability to sell their grain. A farmer might have 3,000 or 4,000 bushels, and he might be obliged to purchase some articles in town. If he was unable to dispose of his grain, he had to borrow money at a high rate of interest to procure his necessary supplies, or else go into debt to the merchant, in which case he was obliged to pay interest on his debt, and the merchant in turn was obliged to pay interest to the wholesaler. In this way serious loss was occasioned to the whole country; and this condition of things made money tight and business not as good as it would otherwise be.

Whatever the farmers ought to have done, there is no question that up to the present time they have not made provision for storing grain on their farms, and it is my opinion, from what I know of the conditions in our North-west, and from what I have found the conditions to be in the western states, that this will never be feasible in the west, as it is in Ontario. Imagine such an instance as I mentioned this afternoon—that of one family that raised 70,000 bushels of grain. Imagine their making provision for the storing of the grain in the straw, or even the threshed grain, on their farm, some miles from the railway. The conditions of farming in the west are such that to carry on the business the farmers are obliged to get their grain to the nearest railway point as speedily as possible. The usual plan is to draw it from the thresher to the warehouse on the line of railway. Then, there is the liability of loss by destruction of unprotected grain by spring rains, due entirely to the inability of the railway company to carry the grain out. The loss through depreciation in price and the degradation of the grade was due to the operation of the grain-dealers' combine. Some of our hon. friends opposite declared there was a combine, and in my remarks before six o'clock I agreed with that statement. There has been a grain-dealers' combine in operation during the last season, notwithstanding the existence of the Manitoba Grain Act. That combine was made possible through the congestion of the traffic. The Manitoba Grain Act has not yet had a fair trial. In the year 1900 we had a light crop, and the Act worked very well; but in that year it had not a fair test. In 1901 conditions were at the opposite extreme; compared with other years we had two crops in the one season. I believe—and the farmers of my acquaintance with whom I have talked and who are willing to be fair about the matter, believe—that the Manitoba Grain Act in principle is a fair Act, and will under ordinary conditions remove to a large extent the grievances that existed before 1900. Last year there was an absolute congestion of traffic, and the railway company was unable to furnish cars to be loaded by the farmers at their pleasure; so that the farmers had not that freedom which the Manitoba Grain Act contemplated they should have in the disposal of their wheat. I quite agree that some changes in the Grain Act are required to make it more perfect in its operation. While I am quite willing to admit that it would have been totally impossible for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company last season to furnish cars to every farmer who wished to load on the cars, still it is a bad commentary on this government and this parliament that they should pass an express provision declaring that the railway company should furnish cars to certain people on request, and the company should disregard that provision and state openly that they would not obey it. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company last season more than once issued instructions to their agents not to furnish cars to farmers; and these were cases in which they could have done so. For instance, a farmer would go to an agent at a station where cars were standing idle, and the agent would tell him that he had instructions not to allow farmers to load their grain on to the cars. The railway company denied that they had issued such instructions; but I have good reason for stating that at the present time there exists an order issued from the headquarters of the company at Winnipeg to their agents throughout the North-west Territories, not to give a car to a farmer to be loaded with wheat. That being the case, it behooves the government and parliament to take some notice of the matter. Is this railway company strong enough to flaunt its refusal to obey an Act of parliament in the face of the government and parliament?

Contrary to what an hon. gentleman opposite said this afternoon, I have been pleased to see the interest taken by the House in this question. While the views of some gentlemen from Ontario do not coincide with mine or with those of other gentlemen from the North-west, still we are glad to see our friends from the other provinces taking an interest in this very important matter. I was glad to notice this afternoon the interest which the members of the government were evincing in the question. I do not remember that last session on any subject more members of the government occupied their seats for a greater length of time than was the case this afternoon; and I thought it was a little unfair for the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) to choose a moment when the Prime Minister was called out of the Chamber for a few minutes, to call attention to the fact that his seat was vacant. This afternoon nearly every one of the government seats was filled during the discussion of this question. Now the points on which I wish to lay emphasis are these :

First, the grain warehouses for the accommodation of the prairie settlers must necessarily be on the line of railway. This is one respect in which I think it is possible to improve the Manitoba Grain Act. At the present time there is some restriction placed on the farmers in regard to the building of grain warehouses. To be most convenient they should be on the line of railway. My hon. friend from East Assiniboia spoke of the number of warehouses built by farmers in the attempt to relieve the congestion—in Wolseley, 64, and at Indian Head 115. I came through there a little later than my hon. friend, and I was told that at that time there were 127 erected and a number of others in course of construction. These small warehouses or granaries are all off the line of railway, not being permitted by the Grain Act to be built on the line of railway. The result is that the farmers will have to load the wheat on wagons and drive it to the railway and load it on to the cars. I think the Grain Act should be amended so as to remove that restriction, and to permit all needed warehouses to be built on the line of railway, so that farmers will be enabled to load their wheat direct from these granaries to the cars.

Some hon. members say that it is unreasonable to expect the railway companies to have facilities to move the tremendous crop in the short time at their disposal. Now no one expects them to move the entire crop. That tremendous crop will never be all offered for shipment during the season. This year, not more than one-third—certainly not more than one-half—was offered before the close of navigation, and after the close of navigation people do not expect to have their wheat carried away. They do not wish to pay the extra freight necessary to have it carried all rail. This year, however, when a great deal of their wheat is lying unprotected, ready to be spoiled by the first rain, they are willing to pay any price in order to escape from that unfortunate position. They do not expect to have all their wheat moved before the close of navigation, but they expect to have facilities provided so as to enable them to sell sufficient during the season of navigation to give them the money they require to carry on their operations during the winter. That is all they ask, and they can wait until the spring to ship the balance. In the United States the railways have facilities to accept and satisfactorily handle all the wheat offered, and no other condition will be satisfactory to our people or conduce to the progress and prosperity of the country. What is absolutely required is the necessary facilities to handle all the wheat offered and thus avoid the congestion of traffic which has existed during the past season and still exists.

I do not wish my remarks to be misunderstood. I do not wish to be understood as making a complaint—very much of a complaint at least—against the railway companies. I am not complaining of the railway companies for not having had the necessary facilities. I do not think it is reasonable to say that they should have had them. No one of us could have foreseen or did foresee the crop we have had, and even had we foreseen that crop, the conditions were such that no railway company could have procured the equipment required. The unprecedented yield made a car shortage inevitable. I may say the term 'car shortage' is a misnomer. What was lacking was not railway track or cars, but locomotives, motive power. But what I do complain of is the refusal of the Canadian Pacific Railway to send out wheat by the Soo route. According to the despatch I have read, it might have taken out seven million or eight million bushels by that route during January and February.

Nor do I wish to be understood as making any serious complaint against the government. The government were powerless to order the Canadian Pacific Railway to purchase so many cars and locomotives. But when I refer to what a government can do, let me say that a poor weak government did succeed in doing something for the people by exercising what persuasive influence it had and prevailing on the Canadian Pacific Railway, as the Commissioner of Agriculture of the North-west Territories did, to send out wheat by the Soo route. Well, if the Commissioner of Agriculture of the North-west Territories could bring that amount of persuasive influence to bear on the Canadian Pacific Railway, it is just possible that had the powerful influence of this government been exercised, the decision of the Canadian Pacific Railway to carry grain by that route and thus relieve the congestion, might have been reached sooner than it was.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has referred to the condition of things which, I was going to say unhappily—but I will not say unhappily because the reverse is the case—the condition of things which happily existed in Manitoba and the North-west during the past year. It was fortunate for the people of that country that they had such a very large crop, and that the difficulties of which they complain were due to their good fortune. The crop in that country was much larger than expected, and proper provision had not been made for the handling of it as rapidly as the necessities of the country required in order to obtain the best results. There was consequently a congestion in the elevators and a shortage of cars which prevented the railway companies from handling the traffic as effectively and rapidly as the necessities of the case demanded. There was a shortage of elevators, not only in that country but outside as well—in Port Arthur and the various ports on Georgian Bay. At present, however, a vigorous effort is being made to remedy that shortage. We see by the reports in the press, a few days ago that the Canadian Pacific Railway are beginning already to build a very much larger elevator at Port Arthur, and no doubt the various companies are now undertaking the construction of a large additional number of elevators in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, which will help to improve the situation. But the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) endeavoured, at the outset of his remarks, to fasten upon the previous government the responsibility for the unfortunate conditions that exist to-day. In my judgment, he did not succeed very well in his attempt. He said that the previous government had fastened shackles on trade. I would like to ask him what shackles on the trade of that country did the previous government fasten. What would that country be to-day, what would the condition of its farmers be, had it not been for the conduct of the previous government in building the first railway that traversed that country and really the only railway service which it has had practically up to within a few months. There may have been some conditions that prejudicially affected the situation, but the hon. gentleman forgot that his friends had pledged themselves to remove all hampering conditions as soon as they got into power. Well, they have been in power nearly six years, they have had every opportunity to bring their great ability to bear on the situation, and yet we to-day have complaints made on the unfortunate condition of the farmers in that country. Evidently the hon. gentleman's friends have not been very successful in their efforts to remove all evils and all cause of complaint. My hon. friend referred to the Grain Act that was passed a few years ago, and gave this government credit for some important provisions in that Act which have inured to the benefit of the farmers. Well, I believe there are some good provisions in that Act, but when it was under discussion the very provisions which, in the judgment of many members of Manitoba and the North-west—especially the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas)—and which that hon. gentleman endeavoured to get incorporated in to that Act to meet the requirements of the situation, were the very ones which the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) and the present government fought against.

Mr. SCOTT. Was the hon. gentleman not with the Minister of the Interior then ?

Mr. SPROULE. No, I supported the contentions put forward by my hon. friend from Eastern Assiniboia, because I believed they were in the interests of the country. It is the hon. gentleman's own friends who are responsible for the present condition of affairs. It was they who pledged themselves to redress these grievances and give the people the advantage they were entitled to, and it is their failure to carry out this—as they have failed to carry out all their other pledges—to which is due the difficulties now complained of.

Now, could the present government have remedied the situation ? Well, what are the troubles complained of ? The first is that a railway company will not allow to farmers the same use of cars that they allow to the large grain buyers and elevator owners—in fact, the railway, it is said, discriminates against the small buyer, and the small shipper. The government has power to remedy that evil. The Railway Act provides that there shall be no discrimination as between shippers, and the Railway Committee of the Privy Council was especially established to enforce these rights when application was made to it. Had that body fulfilled its duty, we should not hear the complaints we do to-day. The government, then, has the power to remedy the evil and if the evil is not remedied, the government and the government alone, must be held responsible. The hon. member stated, as also did one of the previous speakers—and I believe correctly, that there was some sort of combine or understanding among the grain buyers. Are these hon. gentlemen not aware that the present government asked to be returned to power to fight these combines, and declared that if the people would give them their confidence, they would make it one of their first duties to break the combines and prevent the dangerous results of their operations ? These hon. gentlemen have been in power nearly six years. And have they broken the combines? Not at all ; we have these complaints as much now as we did five years ago. These hon. gentlemen who support this government, and who, I suppose, speak by the book, declare that these combines exist to-day, to the detriment of the farming interest in the North-west. If these grievances are not redressed, the government must be held responsible. The farmers complain that they have not the freedom to load on cars from the platform. Who could give them that right ? The government, certainly, The farmers say that they should have the right to build small elevators along the railway. Who could secure to them that right ? The Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Yet, they have never done it nor, so far as we know have they ever even made the effort to secure this right to the farmer. It is said that the people of the country require more railway facilities. We know they do. That grievance is being remedied very rapidly. Another road has reached that country, and the people of Manitoba and the North-west will soon be in the position of not being obliged to depend upon one road. I have no doubt that both the railways that are operating in that country to-day desire to extend their lines as rapidly as possible so as to enable the people of that country to carry on their operations to advantage, and also to gain success for themselves. The hon. gentleman tells us that the farmers require the same freedom that has been secured to the farmers of the United States. There is no power in this country to secure for the people their rights except the government; and if the farmers still complain, they must hold to responsibility those who have the power to remedy grievances, but do not use it. No doubt the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) will tell us that the great remedy is to make the French river canal and allow the grain to have an outlet by water to North Bay. That would be a remedy, but it is for the minister to show us that it is wise to spend so much to accomplish so little. But that would not directly meet the wants of the farmers of the North-west. No doubt, the operations going on to-day in the ports of Georgian Bay are calculated largely to help the people of the North-west. Take the elevators that are going up at Midland, Owen Sound, Collingwood, Meaford and Kinkardine. All these improvements are designed to assist in handling the products of that country. The number of these elevators is increasing every year. Last year, just before the close of navigation a large elevator was built at Meaford, and a splendid harbour and other facilities provided, and a large amount of trade was actually handled in the short time between the completion of these works and the close of navigation. I say this to show that conditions are changing and that, in the future, large, if not ample provisions will be made to handle the trade which we may expect in a successful year to originate in the North-west. The people of that country require more railway facilities. These, I say, are being rapidly provided. They require greater elevator facilities at Port Arthur—double, or even treble what they have to-day. They require a large number of elevators throughout the country. And they require the greatest freedom to every farmer or combination of farmers to build elevataors along the track, and the right to load their cars from the platform. And, I say that the government should force the railway company to concede that right. They have the power to do it, and if it is not done, it is because the government refuses to exercise the power with which it is clothed. If the government will do their duty in these matters, they will soon relieve the glut and do away with all the trouble that exists. So far as the members from Ontario can assist in accomplishing these reforms they are anxious to do so. For we feel interested, knowing that the progress of Manitoba and the North-west is of great advantage to us. None of us are living for ourselves alone or for the locality alone in which we reside. We have an earnest desire to remove all obstacles from the prosperity of the people of the North-west, knowing that their prosperity will bring the best results for us. So far as these grievances can be remedied, the government of the day must be held responsible for them, for, by an exertion of their power, they could relieve the farmers of the grievances of which they complain.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). The question now occupying attention is one of the most important questions ever discussed in this House; for, it is not too much to say the future of the North-west is the future of the whole Dominion of Canada. The fact must not be lost sight of, Mr. Speaker, that our North-west covers more territory fit for cultivation than even the western states of the Union, and that Manitoba and the North-west will be the grainery of the world before many years are over. Instead of exporting forty or fifty millions of bushels of wheat, we shall, in a few years, export each season hundreds of millions of bushels. Therefore, while discussing this question, we must not base our calculations upon the crop that was raised last year, but must look to the future and to the rapid increase of wealth from that new country. Forty millions last year will mean, perhaps, sixty millions this year and eighty millions next year, and so on. For the acreage is increasing wonderfully every year, and the population, we hope, will increase accordingly. Judging from the accounts we hear now, a large number of people will go into that country this year. In fact, I believe that we will drain some of the western states of the Union in order to populate our vast territories in the North-west. Therefore I say that in dealing with this question we must leave out all these little political harangues that may be made from one side or other of the House; we must treat it from a broader standpoint; we must look upon it from a national standpoint. Whatever may have been the faults of this or of that party, let us forget the past and let us look to the future.

It is said that the railway companies have not been in a position to handle the crops we have had this year. That is true, Mr. Speaker, we have had a crop of 40 million bushels, and it is idle to expect that it can be removed within three or four weeks. It is impossible for any existing system of conveyance to do such a tremendous work in so short a time. Therefore, some other means will have to be found so as to distribute that work, without impeding trade, and so as to procure the largest benefit to the farming community. My hon. friend who has just spoken says we want more railroads. Well, perhaps we do. He says we want more elevators. Indeed we do, Sir, we all say that. But the question is how are we going to get these elevators. I for one would say that it is the duty of the government to step forward and provide them, and handle the grain of the North-west. My Ontario friends will say, Have we got to pay our share of that? Yes, I say, you must pay your share of that, because the wealth of the North-west is your own wealth. If we in the west are called upon to pay bounties for your fishing industries in the east, and for your iron industries in the east, and if we are called upon to pay duty on all the implements we use on our farms in the North-west, why should we not expect you to contribute something in return, in order that we may dispose of that great wealth we are producing in the west? I say that if the industries of the east require to be protected in order to succeed, our grain producing country in the west also requires to be protected. To that end I say let the government take possession of this elevator business—not the railways. I do not go so far as my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean). But let the government take possession of the elevator system; let them establish an independent system of elevators where the farmer may go and deposit his wheat and get a warehouse receipt, and raise money on his receipt if he needs it, or ship his grain when the price is good.

My hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) said this afternoon that it was not prudent for the farmers to carry all their wheat to market at once, because it had the effect of reducing the price of grain. There is some truth in that. But if the government establishes such a system as the one I suggest, then the farmers can afford to wait for fair prices, because they will have a place in which to store it. As to the suggestion made this afternoon that the farmers of the west should do like the farmers of the east and build barns or granaries, the thing is impossible. We cannot do it in the west; it is out of the question. But some of my friends will say, Why should the government build these elevators? Why not let the farmers themselves build them? Well, we must not lose sight of the fact that our farmers in the west are beginners, they have not been settled there many years, they have not had time to become wealthy, they have no money to invest in building elevators or similar buildings. Therefore, I say it is the duty of the government to come to their relief and help them out of the position that they are in to-day. It is a national question. It is in the interest of the whole country that our western farmers should be successful, and that they should get as high a price as possible for the grain that they produce.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte). The discussion in which we are now engaged should be sufficient to prove that we have a great country, that we have a magnificent future before us. We have raised this year 100 million bushels of grain in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. We have a powerful system of railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway in fact is one of the great railway systems of the world. But in spite of its vast resources that system has been unable to grapple with the situation. Before the close of navigation that railway carried to Fort William 12,000,000 bushels of wheat. I am sorry to say that out of that 12,000,000 bushels nearly 5,000,000 bushels were carried to Buffalo, in other words, we have not been able to handle more than 7,000,000 bushels of wheat in Canadian waters and through Canadian channels. Evidently there is something wrong, we are not in it. My hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) has invited me to pay more attention to the situation in the North-west and a little less to a project which, in his estimation, would involve an expenditure of $300,000,000. Sir, where is the crazy man, where is the fool who contemplates an expenditure of $300,000,000? If there is such a man I would like to see his face, either in this parliament or out of it. True, I read in the 'Globe' a few days ago a correspondence signed by Mr. Loughrin to the effect that I contemplated spending $300,000,000. Mr. Loughrin is well known to me. He is an agent of fire extinguishers. But upon my word, I am surprised that such an important paper as the 'Globe' has given so much attention to the ideas of that gentleman. Able as he may be as an agent, I decline altogether to be responsible for the expenditure he wants me to incur on the French river. Nobody thinks of such an expenditure of money. What I said to the House on a former occasion, and what I say now is, that it is my belief that for four or five million dollars the French river could be improved and made a magnificent water way. Sir, I venture to make this prophecy, that before we are very much older that project will impose itself on the enlightened public opinion of this country.

I respect very much the views of the 'Globe'. The 'Globe' is one of the great papers in this country, but, if I may be permitted to say in all deference to my confrere of the 'Globe,' the 'Globe' has always been, to my knowledge, essentially an opposition paper. It is necessary to have opposition papers. I fully recognize the importance of opposition papers. The 'Globe' has opposed nearly every large scheme or project that has been carried out in this country. The Canadian Pacific Railway had not a stronger opponent than the 'Globe' for a time. It was very well then that such a large project should be discussed fully, and the 'Globe' did that work. It was a useful work. The 'Globe' is opposing the French river scheme. I make this prophecy that within a short time the 'Globe' as all men of good faith, will be obliged to come around and recognize that the best policy for this country is, Canada for the Canadians in every possible way and manner. Now, Sir, we have not carried out every large project in the past, not because we have not been willing, but because it has not been possible to do everything at the same time. I have listened with very great attention to the suggestions made this afternoon. Some of our friends from the North-west have invited us to build new railways, but, before making up our minds upon such projects we must think a little. We have already two important railways in Manitoba and the North-west. The Canadian Pacific Railway has done, as must be admitted, all that was possible to expect from a large corporation this year. They have not been able to grapple with the situation in a successful manner, but it is admittedly known that they have done everything they could. They bought as many locomotives as money could buy, they bought as many cars as money could buy. Now, they must add to their elevating power and rolling stock. The government have allowed them, under certain conditions, to issue new stock for $20,000,000 to increase their power all over the country. Our friends from the North-west and Manitoba will derive very large benefit from that increase of capital. It is not a favour that we have granted them. I strongly object to the word that has been used by some hon. gentlemen. It is no favour. The Canadian Pacific Railway have simply asked permission to add to their debt, because, by adding to their debt, they are increasing their power and strength for the benefit of this Canadian nation. Now, our friends in the North-west have a population of 400,000 people in round numbers. That is about the population of Montreal. We expect a great many things from them in the future. Canada is deeply interested in the development of the North-west, but our friends from that section of the country must not forget, as they were told to-day, that they are not the whole country.

Mr. McCREARY. You did not think we were, when you only put $5,000 in your estimates for public works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My estimates have always been fair to Manitoba, the estimates of the country have always been fair to Manitoba, and if I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to other parts of the country it is only in answer to what the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) has said. He has invited us, or a good many of us, to renounce the heresy of protection altogether. Well, I have never tried to hide my views upon that point. I do not intend to do that in future—not by any means. This country is one country. If we are going to be something, if we have confidence in ourselves, and if we have the hope that we will be a nation, we must be one nation from beginning to end, from one end of the country to the other. The country is prepared, I may say, to give to the North-west Territories cheap transportation, as cheap transportation as it is possible to give to them, but, they must not ask us to destroy our cities, or to destroy our national industries to do that. We could not do that. I am sure that I am expressing the feeling, the sentiment and the opinion of the vast majority of the Canadian people in stating the view I am stating here to-night. It is impossible not to admit that cheap transportation and a tariff, in a large national sense, go together. We will carry Manitoba wheat, Manitoba oats, and Manitoba products cheaply. The railways, and the fleets that will carry Manitoba wheat freely and cheaply, will carry to the west, the products of the east. We are not going, I hope, to give up the idea of having winter ports. Portland is a nice port, New York is a fine port, Philadelphia and Boston are very nice ports, but we must have Canadian ports. We must have winter ports as we have summer ports. In other words, this country must be bound together solidly. There is no reason why the manufacturers of this country cannot supply our Manitoba and North-west friends with their products just as cheaply as the Americans will do it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Why do they not ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They do; I am going to take issue on that point with my hon. friend now. He, or some one else has asked the question : Why do not the Canadian manufacturers of agricultural implements sell us just as cheaply as they sell to the foreigner ? The question has been put in that way. My answer is this : The American manufacturer sells outside of his own country, on many and many an occasion, cheaper than he sells in the American market, and the Canadian manufacturer does the same thing on many an occasion. But, I am free to admit that that does not prove that the Canadian manufacturer cannot sell just as cheaply as the American manufacturer can. The Canadian manufacturer, if he wants to compete in a foreign market, must meet his American rival in the foreign market at the same price. It does not prove that if the tariff were lower we would get our goods cheaper. Very far from it. My friend should never lose sight of this fact that if we would allow our Canadian industries to be slaughtered by the Americans, the very day the Americans would be masters of this Canadian market the prices would be raised and I, for one, as long as I have a seat in this parliament, will stand by the doctrine that we must take care of our industries with the same deep attention as we must take care of our transportation. Mr. Speaker, let us be Canadians. As I said a minute ago, we have a great future. What immense possibilities have we not ? When we remember that with a population of less than 400,000 souls in the North-west Territories, we have been able to produce this year 100,000,000 bushels of grain, I say that we have possibilities that it is difficult to foresee or understand now. We must provide for railway facilities; we must provide for elevating facilities. Our elevating power represents only 15,000,000 bushels and it is not available at all seasons of the year. At Fort William, the Canadian Pacific Railway have to-day, if I am well informed, an elevating capacity of but 5,000,000 bushels. I am glad to be able to say to-night that at this very moment the Canadian Pacific Railway authorities at Montreal are engaged in making arrangements for an addition of 4,500,000 bushels to their elevating capacity at Fort William. At this very moment while I am on my feet they are negotiating with a large firm in Buffalo for that addition to their elevating capacity. It will be so much gained. I have great hopes also that the Canadian Northern will bring relief to the situation.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the capacity of the Canadian Northern elevator at Fort William ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not quite sure that their elevator is quite completed there, but it will be in a few days. It is about 2,000,000 bushels. Now, Sir, when our Canadian grain has reached Fort William and Port Arthur, are we to allow it to be carried to American ports ? Once more I call the attention of the House and of the country to that important question. We have no Canadian bottoms to speak of. I have already said in the House, and I say it again, that the Canadian bottoms on the lakes represent only about 4 per cent of the whole tonnage available for grain. I have here the names and number of the boats and they present only 4 per cent of the lake tonnage. What are we going to do ? What is the Canadian North-west asking the country to do ? Hon. gentlemen from the west here have spoken of Duluth and they have reproached the Canadian Pacific Railway for not having sufficient facilities to bring the grain faster and faster and in larger quantities to Duluth. Duluth is not a Canadian port or a Canadian city. I fully recognize that in the present crisis our Canadian friends have to look for an outlet. They are justified in carrying their eyes to Duluth, but I say again that Duluth is not a Canadian port of a Canadian city and it is a standing reproach to all of us here that we have not sooner foreseen the great possibilities of the North-west. Why should Duluth receive 7,000,000 bushels or 8,000,000 bushels or 10,000,000 bushels of Canadian wheat. There is the port of St. John in the winter; there is even Halifax although it is further away, and in the summer months we have Montreal, Three Rivers and Quebec. We have all the ports on the Georgian Bay. I have been accused by some of our friends on the other side, that while I was making a trip on the Georgian Bay I was in favour of everybody. I am for everybody on the Georgian Bay, and for the excellent reason that all the avenues of trade we have there are not too many to handle the immense quantity of traffic there is in store for us. We are only speaking to-night of Canadian grain, but we must remember that nearly all the centres of trade on the lakes—Duluth, Chicago, Milwaukee—are tributary to the St. Lawrence route. I am amazed and surprised; I am scandalized if I may use the word; when I see and when I read that there are Canadians who decline to open their eyes to the great necessity for having all our Canadian avenues of trade exploited. Why, what have we to-day ? We have only our canals. My hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) has invited us to close our canals because he says they are no good. He tells us that we must build railways from the North-west to the sea to carry our grain and that we should have no more waterways. If my hon. friend (Mr. Davis) will pardon me, I invite him not to repeat that statement. Our waterways are essential during the time they are opened. They are not sufficient for the reason that they cannot be opened for the whole year round, but I say that our waterways are the necessary implement of our national trade. All the products of Canada cannot be carried at one and the same time to a winter port. That is out of the question, and so our grain has to be stored somewhere and the great problem is to store it just as near to the seaboard as possible. Fort William is one point and Port Arthur is another. We will have other points. Lake Nipissing will be the next point. We will avail I hope of the harbours on the Georgian Bay.

I am glad to see that the Grand Trunk Railway authorities seem to have changed their views. Hitherto it looked as if they had made up their minds to stand by Portland, first, last and all the time. I am glad to have learned during the last three or four days that the Grand Trunk Railway contemplates a change of policy. Let us welcome that. Let us welcome Mr. Hays. Mr. Reeve who was a Portland man is gone and we wish him all sorts of good things; but let us wish better for Mr. Hays, who I think we may welcome very soon as a Canadian for good. Well, Sir, if the Grand Trunk Railway Company make up their mind to stand by the St. Lawrence route, it will be a great help indeed to our national Canadian transportation. I do not think it is necessary to say much more to-night. I want to raise my voice once more in this parliament to invite our friends from the North-west not to be sectional, but to remember that we wish well by them, and that we understand the great national importance of the vast territory and the magnificent heritage we have in the North-west. But they must belong to this country. They must be Canadians in the broadest sense of the word. We must all be Canadians. Let them remember that we have different conditions existing in different parts of the country, and that we have industries that we cannot possibly sacrifice. My hon. friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Ross)—whom we are all glad to see in good health in spite of his old age—cheered the sentiment that was expressed in favour of free trade. He cheers free trade every time it is mentioned in this House. Well, we all respect him very much indeed. We would all like to be free traders. I would like to trade with the whole world. But the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Ross) must not forget—he does not forget, I am sure—that if his province enters to-day on the path of prosperity and development, it is because we have—I do not say that we have gone back on free trade views—it is because we have not applied these views as severely as he contemplated them in the past.

This country must not stand by any theories. We are a people of business men, let us do what ordinary business communities do. If our American neighbours wanted to trade with us, if they were willing to give us advantages, we would be very glad to try to make some arrangement with them; but they do not want to do so. They would raise their tariff to sixty or seventy per cent, and they would make a slaughter market in Canada. Well, how could we allow them to do so? I would like, I will say it again, to trade with the whole world; but you cannot do it, because the whole world does not want to trade with you. Our friends from the North-west must not forget that the large cities are greatly interested in their future development, and we will stand by them every time. They must stand by us every time also. We will give them cheap transportation both by our summer and our winter ports. We are doing it now. I was very sorry to hear some friends on the other side of the House, especially the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd), telling us that this government had not done anything. I do not think it is a boast in my mouth to say that the present government has given more attention to the transportation question that any other government has done in the past; and we have accomplished and are accomplishing more than any other government has done. I admit that the Conservative government built the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it was a great feat. Who denies it? Nobody does. Now this government is engaged in the solution of the transportation problem. We are solving that problem now. The St. Lawrence is deepened and widened; all the harbours on the lakes are being equipped; the port of Montreal and the port of St. John are being equipped.

Mr. BOYD. No wheat is going that way.

Hon. Mr. TARTE.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Wheat may go there some day. The Canadian Pacific Railway to-day is taking wheat to the port of St. John direct from the west.

Mr. BOYD. Not very much.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, a good deal of it. But why does the Canadian Pacific railway not take more grain there? Because we have not enough elevator accommodation. When the season closed this year there was not one single bushel of wheat in the elevators at Fort William; they were all cleaned out. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway is taking millions of bushels of grain to our winter port; and when the line is improved, as it will be with the additional stock to be issued, it will take more traffic.

Mr. BOYD. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that they are taking millions of bushels this winter to St. John?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, and more than that, they are taking every week over twenty-five cars of American meats, canned goods, and so on. The trade at St. John to-day is larger than it has ever been before, and when the Canadian Pacific Railway is improved, I have no doubt that the port of St. John wil receive an immense amount of trade. Our hon. friends from the North-west should not disparage Canadian ideas. I do not see any reason why the Canadian Pacific Railway should not take to the port of St. John, and even to the port of Halifax, a very large quantity of trade. I say even to Halifax, because my hon. friend the leader of the opposition will admit that the same quantity of trade cannot go to a remote port as to a near port. When the fast line shall be established—and it will be established, it is only a question of time—the port of Halifax will necessarily receive a large amount of perishable traffic, which will be a paying traffic. I wanted to say only a few words. The House indeed owes a good deal to my hon. friend from Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) who has brought to our attention that essentially national problem of transportation. So far as I am concerned, I believe in Canada from that standpoint as from all others. We only need to have enough confidence in ourselves to see the transportation of our products through Canadian channels in both summer and winter. We have only to stand by ourselves also to see our industries develop, so as to be as independent as a nation can be of any foreign nation.

Mr. CLARKE. Before the hon. minister takes his seat, during the course of his speech he referred with satisfaction to a contemplated policy under the new management of the Grand Trunk Railway. May I ask him what winter port the Grand Trunk Railway will use?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know as to the winter port. I was speaking especially as to the summer port. For instance, Midland is one of the ports which I think they intend to develop ; and instead of sending their trade during the summer months to an American port, as they have been doing during the last two years, they will send it through a Canadian port.

Hon. WILLIAM ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) The hon. Minister of Public Works paid a high compliment to me, and expressed pleasure that I was healthy. Well, I am glad to say that I am ; but I want to define my own position on this question. I happened to be in this House when the purchase of the great North-west Territories was under consideration, and I may say frankly that I do not believe that any of those who were in the House at that time could foresee the greatness of the inheritance which we were acquiring. We from the east have as much interest and rejoice as much in the prosperity of the North-west as the people who reside in that great country, and we do not wish it to be said that we have any sectional views on the subject. I am one of those who were present when a platform was laid down by the Liberal convention held in this city, and I have never forgotten the principles of that platform to this day. A strict adherence to those principles, as far as possible, was the means of bringing the present government into power ; and the moment we recede from that platform, we forget what is due to ourselves, and what is due to our constituents. I do not at all despise or undervalue Canadian industries or manufacturers. I am pleased to see them occupying the position of prosperity that they do now, but the moment the present government begins to inflict higher burdens on the people they will do something that will lower them in the estimation and confidence of their friends. I am quite satisfied with the present tariff, because I do not think any one would be sufficiently insane to believe that this country is prepared for free trade pure and simple. A revenue tariff is necessary for the prosperity of this country. I am glad to find that the question of transportation is engaging the attention of the government. If our manufacturers are to increase their output, they must seek foreign markets as well as cater for their own. They must send their goods to South Africa and Australia, they must find out what are suitable for those countries, and be furnished facilities to carry our own products to other markets by means of steamers subsidized by our own government. I have a letter from Sydney, N.S.W., in which my correspondent states that that colony—not the commonwealth but New South Wales itself—is sending out five travellers—one to India, one to China, one to Japan, and to different other places in order to seek new avenues for its surplus products, and that is what our Canadian people and manufacturers should do. They should show more enterprise, and find out what markets can be had for the goods they can supply. I did not intend to speak on this subject at all, because the question will come up in a different way and in more ways than one before the session is over, but I was called to my feet by the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Public Works when I cheered the idea of free trade. Why should the farmers of the North-west be compelled to buy Canadian agricultural implements, if it is in their interest to buy their agricultural implements from the Americans. If they buy from the Americans, it is because they find it more advantageous to do so. It is no doubt because the American manufacturers begin to understand what our people require and give them better terms, because they give them more time to pay and are perhaps not so sharp in their dealings with them as are our Canadian manufacturers. I understand that some Canadian manufacturers have treated some of the earlier settlers in our North-west perhaps not as considerately as they should have done. I am not in the slightest degree alarmed at the amount of American manufactures which come into this Dominion. Our people are simply buying where they can get the goods on the best terms, and will buy from the Canadian manufacturers when they can sell them what they require as cheaply and on as good terms as do the Americans. I am not going to deny my free trade principles, as far as they can be carried out, with due consideration for the revenue we require, and the moment the present government begins to increase the tariff, let me say that it will then be taking a step in the wrong direction.

Mr. W. R. BROCK (Centre Toronto). It is not often that I am able to agree with a member of the present reform government and on this occasion I rise to do so with a great deal of pleasure, for it is really a pleasure to find that common sense will sometimes prevail even in the present Cabinet. I endorse, to a considerable extent, the remarks made by the Minister of Public Works this evening. I endorse those remarks which were distinguished for their common sense. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Hon. Mr. Ross), with the distant voice of the past, remembering old things, forgetting that this country is moving, cannot possibly have listened to the voice we heard this evening from our great North-west. No government can disregard that voice and continue in office. We have heard from the farmers of the North-west. They are making great demands on this country, which we are all very much inclined to meet as far as possible. All we ask of them is, as the hon. Minister of Public Works has done, to be reasonable. We ask of them to remember the other provinces. We ask them to remember the province of Ontario from which many of them have come. We know what were the struggles of the farmers of Ontario for many long years. No government chopped down the trees and cleared the land for them. But the farmers of the North-west have been placed in possession of a country, when a man can plough the ground at once and raise a crop the very next year. Should they forget their predecessors of Ontario, who spent ten, twenty, thirty years of their lives in clearing their land, and who, when their lands were cleared, were, many of them, old rheumatic men. These are the men for whom I have very great respect, and I would ask the North-west to be reasonable in their demands. The farmers of the North-west demand that the duty be taken off farming implements. They are making great demands upon the government, to which the government never can acccede. Let them be reasonable. The North-west is not a poor country. It does not desire to come here as a beggar, and I would ask the people of the North-west to remember that the bankers in the older provinces have done a good deal to assist them in moving their grain. The merchants in Montreal, Toronto and elsewhere are carrying very heavy loads very often for these farmers of the North-west. Do they not receive every day letters of apology from their western customers instead of remittances in cash. Therefore I would ask our farmers in the North-west to be a little reasonable and to remember the very wise words that have fallen from the Minister of Public Works. If you would ruin the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec, do you suppose then that the Americans would sell their goods cheap ? My hon. friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Ross) looks upon the Americans as great friends because they sell cheap. But how long would they sell goods cheap if they did not meet competition on this side. How long will they sell goods cheap here if they are not meeting competition on this side ? I can assure you that at the present time, as a merchant, I can go into the United States and buy goods cheaper there to be delivered in Canada than the American merchant can buy them for consumption in the United States. That is constantly done. Their overplus is thrust on this country continually. And I only regret that the leader of the government, whom we respect so much has not had more commercial training and knowledge that he might be able to see through these matters. We are not endeavouring to impose on the merchants and farmers of the North-west: we know that competition in our own country will, at all events, keep prices not only of farm implements but of everything else at low figures. We have never had, in the history of Canada, such cheap goods as we have to-day. This is due to competition, and that competition comes from our own people. Therefore, the farmers of the North-west have no just cause of complaint, except in so far as the present government have been dilatory in pressing a policy which they have adopted, but which they opposed to the teeth while they were in opposition. If there is one thing that is really disgusting in politics, it is the contemptible position in which politicians will sometimes place themselves. I can understand a man standing up and saying : I have made a mistake; I was wrong. But to quietly put on the clothes of his opponent—well, even that I do not mind so much. But to try to make the public believe—you cannot do it however you may try—that they were your own clothes, that is one of the disgusting things of politics. I did not exactly agree with the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) in his allusion to that friend of the present government, the 'Globe' newspaper. The 'Globe' is a great newspaper. The management of the 'Globe' feels bound to publish in its columns letters that come from any part of the country. A letter appeared in that newspaper not very long ago dealing with the project that the Minister of Public Works seems to have set his heart upon—the French river canal. But that work is only a beginning. If it is to be of any benefit to the farmers of the North-west, that canal must be built through to the city of Montreal. This writer—and he speaks with some authority—calculates that the total cost of that work will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $300,000,000. The Minister of Public Works calls for the fool who is going to put his money into it. I do not believe he will find him. But you have to find a person who is not very wise to find one who will spend $5,000,000 on a little patch of canal that will begin nowhere and leads to nowhere. It would be better for the country if the government could see its way to securing an increase in the number of tracks in our railway system. This is an all-the-year-round country. We cannot bring our grain that is grown in the North-west, if we work only in the summer time. We must hold out inducements to the railway companies and great transportation companies to move the grain all the year round—and it will take the whole year to move it. In the interest not only of the farmers of the North-west, but of the great financial institutions that are putting their money into moving the grain crop, it must be kept moving continually, and not only for the few months of canal navigation. I would therefore ask the government, before they commit themselves to this expenditure of $5,000,000—which may be regarded as a small thing but, like other small expenditures may be the entering wedge to another of the unfortunate investments which this country has already made in the shape of canals—to consider this whole question very carefully. Hon. members from the Northwest seem to wish to gather in a great deal of prosperity at once. They want to make the North-west an enormously wealthy country in a few years. But the only solid prosperity that has ever been known in commerce is that kind that is slowly and steadily built up. Let us not be in too great a hurry. Let us take time and consider what the results of our present investments are going to be. During last session, I urged very strongly that the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of Public Works should come down to this House with some comprehensive scheme of transportation. I did not ask the Minister of Public Works to devise a canal costing $5,000,000 to be built at public expense, and to be used, probably, by a private corporation, but a general, comprehensive scheme, which would take in the whole North-west, and I hoped, carry the grain through by our great waterway, the St. Lawrence. But, so far, we have had only shreds and patches, not a comprehensive scheme. I would strongly urge the government and the country not to spend $5,000,000, unless the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways and Canals, in fact, the whole government, come to us with a comprehensive and reasonable scheme. The Minister of Public Works has made us one of his usual magnificent protection speeches. Here is one of the things we have seen too often in this House and this country, and which, I say, are the disgusting things in politics. I do not doubt that the hon. gentleman is thoroughly and sincerely honest in his expression—I do not say that he says one thing and means another. But he is a member of a government many of whose members are absolutely opposed to his idea. The hon. gentleman himself has stated to what extent they differ. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I might say a word to the hon. members from the North-west who have so ably put their cases to this House I would ask them to apply their great business ability and their capacity for handling important questions, to do what the Minister of Public Works urged upon them—take a broad view of this question, try to take in all Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Let us not regard this question only from the point of view of the wheat grown in the North-west, important as that is, but let us remember that we are endeavouring to make a nation on this northern half of the continent. Let us not accept unquestioningly the views of respectable old gentlemen who have inherited their views from their free trade forefathers. We cannot make a great country in that way. These gentlemen and their ideas pass away, but the North-west remains. If we are to develop that country and make it a means of bringing greatness to Canada, we must take a broader view of these questions, it appears to me, than that which was indicated by the expression we have heard from these hon. gentlemen this evening. Let us not consider only the gentlemen from down by the Atlantic Ocean, and their threats against the present government that in the event of their not accepting the idea of these gentlemen they will withdraw their support. There are greater things in this country than governments. If this country is ever going to be great it must be because you gentlemen from the North-west, representing a great country, which is increasing enormously in population and in wealth, take broad and patriotic views of the questions that come before you. We have discussions in this House brought up by individual members who, though living in this country, and under its protection, we know are not patriotic, and who desire that the great British Empire should be disrupted. But remembering that their influence is infinitesimal, that they are few in numbers, that they are contemptible, I would ask the members of the North-west that they would join the representatives of Ontario and Quebec and the maritime provinces and try to make this country by being united and by thinking of the welfare of all and not by being small and selfish. If the bulk of the manufacturing happens to be done in Ontario at the present time, let these hon. gentlemen look forward to the time when it will be done in the North-west and British Columbia. Join with us, and you will find that from this side of the House we will loyally and patriotically assist you in any policy that is in the best interest of Canada, rather than of any particular section of it.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). It would be uncourteous on the part of the members from the North-west, opportunity being given them, if they did not respond and acknowledge the very kind advice that has been tendered to them as to the attitude they should assume on public questions. I am glad to hear the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Brock) and so many other hon. members, lecture those of us who come from the North-west on the principles of patriotism. Since when did we of the North-west require to be lectured on the principles of patriotism, of Canadian nationalism ? Our presence in the North-west is evidence of our nationalism ? Otherwise we would be along with the million and more of our countrymen who are residents in the United States to-day. Those of us who are in the North-west are there because we are patriotic Canadians, because we are nationalists in the large and complete sense of the term, rather than for any other reason. We do not have to be taught nationalism at the hands of anyone, no matter how highly respected he may be in this House or elsewhere. Particularly let me say that we do not require to be lectured on the duty of holding a broad national view of national questions, when we are dealing with a subject that involves a matter of between $25,000,000 and $50,000,000 of the wealth of this country, produced in one year, we do not need to be lectured by men who to-day are badgering the government for an increase in the duties on woollen goods, a matter that interests a section of the people, a section of the country, something that requires attention possibly, but I ask you, Mr. Speaker, does it bear any proportion, any comparison, to the interest involved in the matter that has been engaging the attention of the House to-night?

We have been discussing a question involving the prosperity, the growth, the welfare of the North-west, and thereby involving the growth, the prosperity and the welfare of the Dominion of Canada. For, I ask you, where else have you an increase of wealth? Where else have you an increase of prosperity, as shown by the census returns, but in that great west? Would not Canada be retrograding in population but for the great North-west? Where does that increase come from of which Canada boasts within the last few years, except from the country west of Lake Superior? I take the liberty of saying that this Canada of ours would be but a poor Canada, would offer but a poor inducement for a man to proclaim himself a Canadian, were it not for the country west of Lake Superior.

Mr. BROCK. That is hard on your political friends who refused to build the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. OLIVER. That is all right. There are to-day over a million people of Canadian birth in the United States, enough to have populated that North-west with loyal Canadians, enough to have furnished a market for your woollen manufacturers and your implement manufactures, and every other manufacture that you have in this country, to have helped pay your taxes, to have helped build up this country, as we hope yet to see it built up. But they are in the States because they did not have faith in this country, because you had not faith in that North-west country. And the proof that you had not faith is the fact that to-night you stand up here in the House; one after another, and express surprise, you are astonished, you marvel at the progress that has taken place, progress that, had this country been true to itself, had the leaders of public thought in Canada been true to Canada, would have occurred fifteen or twenty years ago instead of occurring only now. You are surprised. That is proof that you did not know what was coming, that you did not believe in the future of that country. You put that forward as an apology for a condition of affairs that exists to-day. You say that no one could tell. Well, if no one could tell, everybody should have been able to tell that, with such opportunities and with an energetic people, such a result must come.

I was astonished to hear the hon. member compare the conditions of pioneer life in this country with the conditions in the North-west. The conditions in this country were those of hardship, they were conditions of struggle, but of triumphant struggle, and the result has been creditable to those who took part in that struggle, and will redound to the credit of their children and their children's children for untold generations. But if any man thinks that settlement in the North-west has not been a tragedy, a tragedy repeated year after year, in settlement after settlement, then I say he is badly mistaken. The people who went to the North-west went there with higher hopes, with greater expectations, than the people who settled in this country, and they suffered in many cases greater disappointments. Do not think, because to-day we can boast of a yield of 100,000,000 bushels of grain in the North-west, of having contributed to the wealth of this country between $25,000,000 and $50,000,000, that it has all come about by chance, that it is an accident. Sir, it has come about by hard struggle, by privation, by energetic exertion, by the exhibition of all those qualities that make men strong and a country great.

But I did not get up on this occasion to talk generalities. I did not get up to talk tariff, transportation, or nationalism, or the advancement of special interests. I got up to talk on this fact, that to-day a large part of the products of the North-west, of the wealth of the North-west of last year's production, is lying useless, is to-day lying unused; and if to-day my hon. friend is receiving apologies from the North-west instead of remittances, it is largely because of the condition of affairs that we are complaining of. That condition we seek to have remedied to-day—not to-morrow or next day, or next year, or year after next, but to-day, in this House, and now. That is what is wanted. Certain facts have been brought out in this discussion. One is that there is a wheat blockade, another, that there is a grain combine, another that the people of the North-west have suffered certain serious financial loss already because of that blockade, and because of that combine, and that the loss is not yet ended, that in fact is only begun. What is the loss? It has been said here to-day that wheat is being sold throughout the North-west at about 10 cents a bushel under its value. Now, if that statement is correct, and those who make it speak with authority, on a saleable product of 50,000,000 bushels of wheat, at an average price of 50 cents a bushel, a 20 per cent loss would mean $5,000,000. That means $5,000,000 of a loss on one season's operations of 400,000 people as a result of existing conditions; and that is not by any means the total loss. There is also the loss caused by the fact that about one-half, or one-quarter of the grain is still in the farmers' hands, is still where it cannot be turned over to pay those bills that my hon. friend speaks about, to go into the general circulation of trade in the country. The people of the west are losing it, and the people of the east are losing it, as well. There is still a further loss, the loss of a large part of the grain by actual damage from weather, as it cannot be got forward for shelter and transport. There is still another loss in consequence of the fact that people will have to be hauling grain in the spring when they should be putting in next season's crop.

This, I submit, is a serious condition of affairs. It is a serious condition for you of the east as well as for us of the west, because, if the money does not come from that crop you cannot handle the money; and let me tell you that every dollar that comes from that crop you do handle in one shape or another. That is the difference between the meaning to this eastern country of the crop of the North-west and the yield of gold from the Yukon. Suppose the yield is equal in both cases, $25,000,000 worth of crop in the west and $25,000,000 worth of gold yielded by the Yukon; of the gold from the Yukon possibly not one-quarter of it enters the ordinary trade channels of this country, while, of the $25,000,000 worth of the produce from year to year of the crop of the North-west, every dollar enters the trade of this country and is turned over and over and over again. So that, when it has been pointed out in this House, as it has been, that this loss is occurring this year on the crop to the people of the North-west Territories we point out to you that the loss is occurring to the trade of this eastern country as well as to the western country, and it is not in any spirit of sectionalism but in a spirit of the broadest nationalism that we call upon the House and the government for assistance in this matter.

In regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway and the wheat blockade; I am prepared to admit, as I think we are all prepared to admit, that as soon as the threshing began so soon the Canadian Pacific Railway put forward every effort to send the wheat to market, and that state of affairs continued until some little time after the close of navigation. We have no complaint at all up to that time beyond a complaint that possibly a little more foresight might have been shown by the company. There was no lack of effort on their part, but we do complain that as soon as the lake elevators were full there began an absolute deadlock; and that since that time they have practically not rolled a wheel to carry grain to market. For over two months the grain blockade has existed and there has been no effort to break it on the part of the railway company. While that condition of affairs has existed, and which is the cause of all this loss that is occurring, the company has come to the government and secured authorization for the issue of $20,000,000 more stock. They have raised the price of their land in the North-west Territories by a dollar an acre; by one sweep of the pen they have added $10,000,000 to their capital and added $20,000,000 to their stock. I take the liberty of saying that when they did one or the other of these things—they were allowed to do one, the other they could not be prevented from doing—was the time that means should have been taken to compel them to roll their wheels and break the blockade. It may be said that it was impossible for them to do so. We have information here to-day, that to-day they are doing so. They are doing to-day what they should have done two months ago. We do not know to what extent they are doing it; perhaps it is only in a half-hearted way, but the fact that they are doing it to-day is proof that they could have done it and should have done it two months ago. The fact is this; they said: 'Our elevators are full, the grain is there, it is our meat any way, we will haul it when we get ready and the country can take care of itself.' That is the position, and you say: Why not? The company is an independent corporation and it is not under government control. But a railway company, from the nature of things, is necessarily a monopoly, and being a monopoly, is necessarily brought under government control; and there are, and there must be means taken, to provide that it shall not be in the power of any railway company or any corporation whatever its name may be, to simply sit back and say: 'There is a blockade in trade, in grain, in everything and it can just stay until we get good and ready to lift it.' That is the condition that the North-west Territories have been in for the past two months. It is an intolerable condition, it is a condition that if there is nothing on the statute-books, if there is no precedent for administrative action in regard to it, then, a condition has arisen that requires a precedent to be created, or requires a statute to be put on the books, that will meet that strange condition, that condition which requires something to be done, so that the people of the country shall not simply be thrown backwards for such a large proportion of their earnings during the past year.

It was said by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) that the means of breaking the blockade is by sending the grain by Duluth, but Duluth is not a Canadian city and therefore it is not desirable to break the blockade in that way. I quite agree that it is not desirable to break it in that way if anything better can be done. We would all wish it to be done, in another way, but if nothing better can be done, then we want the blockade broken any way. But, let me say that if it is a business proposition for the farmers of Indian Head, Wolseley and the farmers all over Manitoba and the North-west Territories to build small warehouses to store their own grain in, to hold that grain until spring, it is just as good for the Canadian Pacific Railway to build flat warehouses at Fort William of a sufficient capacity to contain the grain and keep their wheels rolling during January and February filling these warehouses so that the grain shall be shipped through a Canadian port.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) allow me to ask him if the Canadian Pacific Railway has any elevators at Duluth ? Is my friend aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway was in a position to make arrangements at Duluth ?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not say.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is the point.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot say whether the Canadian Pacific Railway was in a position to make arrangements to get elevator capacity at Duluth on the 1st of January, but it has been given here on authority that the Canadian Pacific Railway is in a position now to make arrangements for elevator capacity at Duluth and it is making arrangements.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Very well, that is the point.

Mr. OLIVER. They have made the arrangement quite recently. Now, navigation was closed in Duluth on the 1st of January, just as it was closed at Fort William on the 1st of January. Therefore, it is not reasonable to suppose that they were less able to make arrangements for that elevator capacity on the 1st of January than on the 1st of March. There was no means of relieving any elevating storage there might be in Duluth in the meantime. If the capacity was there on the 1st of March it was there on the 1st of January, and the arrangement was not made simply because it was not wanted to be made. It was quite practicable for the company to have put up flat warehouses at Fort William of sufficient capacity to hold all the grain there is in the North-west, if they had seen fit to do so. It may be said, that would not be a good business proposition, but in passing through Winnipeg I saw that the Northern Elevator Company had a large flat warehouse alongside of their elevator at the station to hold one-quarter of a million bushels. If it paid the Northern Elevator Company to do that at Winnipeg which is not a terminal point, why would it not pay the Canadian Pacific Railway to do it just as well at Fort William, which is a terminal point ? I say that to my mind it is simply a case of dog in the manger. They did not have to and therefore they did not; and they were so shortsighted that they did not see that the country at large and themselves, as well as the North-west farmers would suffer. As long as it was only the farmer who was going to lose—why he could lose. But when it came to their attention that a good many other people were going to lose as well, then the situation was changed and the outlet was secured by way of Duluth.

In regard to the combine and the Grain Bill, let me say this: It has already been said, and I back up what was said, that in order to break the combine it is absolutely necessary to have absolute freedom in the delivery of grain, either to flat warehouses or directly to the railway cars.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no other way whereby the combine can be broken. A combine exists. That combine is skinning the farmers of the North-west to-day to the extent of from three cents to ten cents a bushel on their wheat. I ask you, is that a condition to be submitted to by this parliament and by this country ? Is it a sectional matter ? Is it something that we beg for from this House and from this country ? Is it a thing that is costing somebody else something ? We are only asking for bare justice and that we be not robbed in our own houses. We are asking for nothing but the most ordinary protection to our ordinary rights. The fact that so many small warehouses have been built in the different towns along the line for the temporary holding of the farmers' grain, is all the evidence that is necessary of the propriety of permitting the erecting of such warehouses at switches on the railway right of way, for the prompt loading of the farmers' grain or any other man's grain who desires to load it there. The question at issue in the Grain Bill when it was up, was whether the companys right of way should be taken from them so to speak, for the purposes of allowing these flat warehouses to be built. I say that the company's right of way was given to them for the purpose of carrying on their business as common carriers, and that when and whenever it is necessary that right of way should be used for the purpose of facilitating the business they are engaged in; for the purpose of enabling the better shipment of products on the railroad; then and then always the right of way is entitled to be used for that purpose. There is no confiscation; there is no trespass in the matter.

We ask then that this government shall take such measures as may be necessary, at the present time, and without delay to secure the breaking of the blockade in the grain business of the North-west. We then ask that the grain combine be broken by insisting on the spirit as well as on the letter of the Grain Act, and in compelling the railroad company to permit the erection of flat warehouses on their right of way for direct shipment to the cars, and compelling them to accept grain from anybody who offers it by any means he may choose to offer it. That is the inherent right of the citizen, that is all we ask. As was said by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) matters have got into a very serious state when it is possible for a railroad company, specifically to set aside an Act of parliament as they have done once and again this winter, by issuing orders to their employees to refuse cars to anybody but elevator men in certain cases.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I just want to emphasize the point; that in bringing this matter to the attention of the House, we are doing it not as sectionalists, but as nationalists. We are asking neither money nor favour from anybody. We demand our elementary rights as citizens of this country, and as producers to get the best returns the markets allow from the result of our year's labour.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I have not the local knowledge in regard to these matters in the North-west which is possessed by a great many of the gentlemen who have addressed the House to-day on this subject, and for that reason I do not profess to speak with any authority on the question. I would like to say, further, that while gentlemen on both sides of the House from the North-west very often put their demands emphatically, I do not think that we should necessarily conclude from that, that there are not legitimate grievances in the North-west which should be redressed. In listening to this discussion, I have been impressed by the necessity that some action should be taken by the government of this country with regard to the combine which is said to exist among the men who are engaged in the business of warehousing in the North-west. If the facts are as stated by hon. gentlemen on both sides, I do not think there can be a doubt that it is a situation that urgently demands the action of the government. The sooner we have that action the better. For my part, I hope that action will be taken far more promptly than has been the case in regard to similar matters in the North-west, the delay in reference to which it seems to me has raised a legitimate case for complaint against the government. I might mention by way of illustration, that we have not heard a single word during this session with regard to the question of the taxation of the lands owned by the Canadian Pacific Railway in the North-west. A year ago we were told that that matter would be referred to the courts promptly and would be dealt with. I made a suggestion to the government at that time which seemed to me reasonable, and which I had hoped the government might have seen its way to act upon, namely, that the government should inquire promptly and at once as to what the cost would be to this country of removing these lands from the exemption from taxation to which they are said to be subject. I suggested that the government should investigate the question of what it would cost this country if parliament should at once promptly declare that these lands are not exempt from taxation, in case it should afterwards turn out that under the charter of the Canadian Pacific Railway they are not subject to taxation.

I ventured to suggest to the House last session that I thought it would be a statesmanlike proceeding on the part of this government, in view of the great interest which the whole of the country has in the North-west, to remove that exemption from taxation, to let the whole country bear the cost, and to indemnify the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for any interference with their vested rights which would be occasioned by taking that proceeding. Although I made that suggestion to the government last year, and promised to give any measure in that direction which they might bring down my most favourable consideration, we have not heard this session that any progress whatever has been made towards having that vexed question settled by the courts, or that any action has been taken on the line of the suggestion I made a year ago.

Coming back to the immediate question before the House, I venture to think, as I have said before, that the existence of this alleged combine is a matter which should at once, during the present session, engage the attention of the government. It should not be left, as the matter of taxation has been left, from year to year, to be brought up by members from the North-west each session, and to have these gentlemen answered with some vague promise by the government that the matter would engage their consideration during the recess. If the state of affairs is as these gentlemen allege, it is one that should be dealt with during the present session, and not left over to the recess or to next session.

There is another question which I think might legitimately engage the attention of the government, that is, whether or not, having regard to what these gentlemen state, it would not be advisable for the government to take under their control the system of warehouses in the North-west, deal with them as government warehouses, and put an end to the condition of affairs which, if it be as these gentlemen state, is a disgrace to this country and a great detriment to the development of the North-west.

My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, in the remarks he made to the House to-night, went very far afield. He succeeded, for example, in calling up my hon. friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Ross), on the question of protection; and I presume that if the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) had been in his seat to-night, that hon. gentleman would also have been found protesting against the pronounced protectionist principles enunciated by the hon. Minister of Public Works. We know that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has only recently announced that he is for a revenue tariff only, first, last and all the time; and he could not have retained his seat in the House--possibly he would not have retained his seat in the cabinet—if he had heard the hon. Minister of Public Works announcing on behalf of the government the policy he did to-night.

There is just this to be said about the views which my hon. friend enunciated, that when he talks about a national transportation system for Canada, he announces in a general way a policy which no gentleman in this House would for a moment disagree with. But the difficulty with the propositions of the hon. Minister of Public Works is that they were not definite enough to enable us to judge whether they should receive the support of every man in this House or not. The action of this government in the past has not been such as the hon. gentleman lays down for our guidance to-night. Their action a few years ago with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway did not look in the direction of a Canadian port.

The hon. gentleman speaks highly of the port of St. John, and I for one rejoice that the port of St. John has succeeded to a considerable extent in becoming a winter port of Canada. I was glad to see, in passing through that city in the month of November last, that it was doing a splendid business in the freight coming over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I hope that business will increase from year to year; but I do not know of any action of this government which has contributed to any great extent to that success. I think it is rather due, in the first place, to the enterprise of the people of St. John themselves in putting their own money into their terminal facilities and thus inducing the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to engage in that business; and, in the second place, to the enterprise of the Canadian Pacific Railway in building elevators there and in making an attempt to establish an export trade from Canada through that port. Instead of the railway policy of this government contributing to that result, it has been the very reverse; and when the Minister of Public Works speaks of 'even Halifax' in this connection, I venture to think that that port has some expectations with regard to the export trade which need not be thus qualified. It is true, that port was put aside by the Minister of Railway and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) in dealing with the export trade. It is true, he did not pay much attention to the arguments we presented and the showing we made that by carrying the freight ninety miles further from Moncton to the port of Halifax, it would have the advantage of a splendid harbour and 250 miles of ocean carriage over the port of St. John. It was therefore pointed out that Halifax stood at least on equal terms with St. John in seeking that export trade. But as far as those two cities are concerned, there is not, nor will there ever be in the future, the slightest jealousy. I can say as a Halifax man that we rejoice that St. John is meeting with such splendid success in its enterprise, in establishing itself, to some extent at least, as a winter port for Canada.

It did not seem to me that the hon. Minister of Public Works dealt with the main difficulty in this case when he addressed the House to-night. The difficulty is not so much in regard to the freights over Lake Superior as in moving the grain in the short season of transportation from the harvest fields to the lake ports. There is no use of providing means of transport, on the lakes, unless you provide proper means of transport from the west to Fort William and sufficient elevator accommodation there. When the minister has once accomplished that, and met the difficulties pointed out to-night by the gentlemen from the North-west, it will follow as a corollary that we should provide a means of transport on the lakes, in order that we should retain the transportation over Canadian lines to Canadian ocean ports; and when the hon. gentleman brings down any reasonable scheme for increasing the means of Canadian transportation—any scheme by means of which the grain grown in the Canadian North-west shall be assuredly carried over Canadian lines to Canadian ports and shipped thence to Europe—he will have my support and I believe the support of every other man on this side of the House. But we want something definite; and we want some remedy for the immediate grievance so well placed before this House to-night by the members from the North-west who have spoken. I do not mean by that, that I agree with every idea or suggestion which every one of these gentlemen has put forward; but I do realize most clearly that a great grievance exists there, and I feel as fully, I trust, as any of them does, how great an inheritance Canada has in the North-west, and how absolutely important it is to us all that every grievance of this kind which may put back the settlement and the development of that country should be dealt with, not from any party standpoint, but in a broad national spirit, and dealt with promptly, by the government to-day.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There is no objection whatever to bringing down the papers called for. The discussion we have just had on what is certainly one of the most important questions that can engage our attention, has revealed a condition of things between Lake Superior and the Rocky Mountains which is not at all satisfactory. It has, however, this redeeming feature, that it is due to an excess of prosperity. It is because we have had in the past year in the North-west Territories a two years crop in one, that our transportation facilities have been found inadequate to move that crop to the markets of the world. This is perhaps not at all to be wondered at. We are glad to believe that of recent years the prosperity of the North-west has exceeded all our expectations. Up to last fall there was only one single track from the prairies to Lake Superior, and the government has not been oblivious of the fact that this single track was not sufficient to meet the development expected and which has taken place. My hon. friends from the North-west are aware that three or four years ago the government did not hesitate to subsidize another line of railway which will tap the prairies and bring the crop of the North-west to Lake Superior. The government did not hesitate to subsidize that railway at a very heavy cost, and the money for which we asked parliament was cheerfully given and has been well applied. Unfortunately however that railway was completed too late in the season to be of any advantage to the settlers of the North-west, but it is to be hoped that it will be available for next year's crop, and then we shall have two rival roads competing to Lake Superior. But even this addition will not be sufficient. There has been this year a car shortage in the North-west Territories, and should we have as abundant a crop next year as we had this, even with two competing roads, there may be another car shortage. I would remind my hon. friends in the North-west that they are not alone the sufferers. There is not a portion of Canada which is not clamouring for more cars, and all the resources of Canada at present are inadequate to move the products of the Canadian people. This is indeed very satisfactory in one way, but it renders the duty of government and parliament all the more imperative to try if possible to grapple with the situation and furnish an adequate relief. My hon. friends on both sides will credit us with having done all we could, with the means at our disposal, during the present year. The Canadian Pacific Railway themselves have not been oblivious of the difficulty and intend to remedy the situation as far as they possibly can. They propose to increase their stock by $20,000,000. They propose to raise their present capital of $65,000,000 to $85,000,000. They applied to the government, and the government cheerfully gave their sanction to the proposal, but at the same time stipulated that a large part of that expenditure should be applied in doubling the track from the prairie section to Lake Superior and in providing for a large increase in their rolling stock. This will be done, and done shortly, during the present year, and when it is done, when the Canadian Pacific Railway have doubled their track and perhaps more than doubled their rolling stock, and when there is also the competition of the Canadian Northern, something will have been done to materially relieve the present situation. But I am not sure that even then sufficient will have been done, because I believe that the development of the North-west will continue at such a rate that there will still be a shortage of cars for the removal of the crops. The only method that can be devised to remedy the evil is one rather difficult to grapple with. The only way after all is to provide more transportation facilities—not so much to Lake Superior as to Eastern Canada. The idea has been thrown out by hon. members who addressed the House to-day, that it is not sufficient to have the crop moved to the head of Lake Superior there to remain during the winter, and be shipped the following spring, but that some method should be devised to have it moved to the seaboard in winter as well as in summer. To this proposition every one will readily agree. It is the most practical that has been submitted to-day. If we could possibly have the grain of the North-west removed from the prairie to the seaboard during twelve months, we would do a great deal to relieve the present congestion. But so long as the wheat is only brought down to Lake Superior and there stored until the opening of navigation, there will never be that adequate relief given which must be provided some time or other. If we had a continuous prairie section all the way through from Winnipeg to the seaboard, there would be no difficulty at all, but unfortunately there is a rugged section along the shores of Lake Superior, which hardly admits of wheat being commercially carried through. That is the difficulty. How that is to be overcome is a problem of great magnitude, which I am not prepared to solve at present. No doubt new lines of transportation must be found to bring the wheat down to the seaboard every month in the year. That problem, I am afraid, is not capable of immediate realization, but in the meantime what is to be done ? It has been stated repeatedly that one of the things from which the settlers have suffered most is their unfair treatment by the Canadian Pacific Railway—that there has been a combine which has made it impossible for the Canadian Pacific Railway to ignore the demands of the settlers and leave the wheat where it is to-day. Well, that is a difficulty which ought to be capable of being remedied and which must be dealt with. I am not prepared to say whether that be really the case or not, but if there has been a combine, the result of which has been to prevent the storing of wheat in the elevators along the railway line, this is the first intimation of it which has been officially made to the government.

Nothing has been done yet to acquaint the government of Canada with the condition of things which has been revealed to-day by the discussion. It is therefore for hon. gentleman who have spoken not merely to call attention to this very important condition of things but to suggest a remedy. The great question of grain transportation and of the inspection of grain in the North-west is one which was frequently under discussion in the last parliament. Two years ago an Act was passed, the Manitoba Grain Act, which, I understand, has done a great deal to remove the grievances that existed. And, perhaps, if old conditions had continued, if the crop instead of being phenomenally large, had been an ordinary crop, that Act would have been sufficient to deal with the situation. But, fortunately, Providence has been kind to us; there has been a phenomenal crop. The remedies provided by the Act have been inadequate to meet the circumstances. That being the case, I would ask hon. members from the North-west to suggest a remedy. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) made a speech to-night the tone of which I heartily commend, in which he says that the government should deal with the question. The government is ready to do its share. But the hon. members from the North-west should be ready to admit that, in a matter of this kind, technical knowledge is required, knowledge which they possess, and which we are not supposed to have. At any rate, whatever may be our knowledge it cannot be as complete or as accurate as theirs is. We have, therefore, a right to expect them to point out what the remedy is—whether new elevators should be built, or whether there should be government ownership of railways, or what course should be taken. I have understood also that some complaint has been made as to the working of the Act. I think it was my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) who made the statement that not only the spirit of the Act but the letter of it had been systematically violated by the company. I should imagine that, if that is the case, we ought to be able to find within the terms of the statute itself, a remedy—that is, there ought to be means provided by the statute to compel the company to conform to the law. If the letter and the spirit of the law have been violated, and if that is the only complaint, the remedy is in the hands of the people, because the law provides means of compelling the railway company to comply with its terms.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The right hon. gentleman will pardon me, I hope, but I understood that there was a combination among the warehouse men themselves, and that is what I was dealing with.

The PRIME MINISTER. That may be, but I am dealing with the statement made by my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver). He stated that the letter of the law had been violated, and I am sure that the hon. leader of the opposition will agree with me that if that is the only evil to be complained of, the statute itself will afford a sufficient remedy, and it will only be necessary to compel the company to conform to the terms of the statute. But I imagine that the evil is greater and deeper than a simple violation of the letter of the statute. For, as I understand the case, the provisions of the Act would have been sufficient to cope with the condition of things brought about by the enormous crop we have had in the North-west. But while the yield per acre this year may not be as great, the total yield will probably be as large, because there will be a far larger acreage under cultivation this year than there was last year. Therefore, we must expect the same evil—or rather the same good, for 'evil' is not the proper word to apply to abundance—as we had last year. If, therefore, the Act is not adequate, it is only for our friends from the North-west to point out the remedy and the government will be only too glad to give them every possible assistance to make the Act as effective as it can be made.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask permission to ask a question of the right hon. Premier. I think my friends from the North-west will bear me out in making the statement that the letter of the law has been violated by the company by issuing orders to their subordinates to refuse to allow the farmers to load their cars. That is a violation of the spirit and the letter of the Act as we understand it. We make that statement on our responsibility as members of parliament on the floor of this House. We think—perhaps I should say I think—I have discharged my duty by making that statement. I do not think the responsibility rests upon me of taking the part of a detective or officer of the law in such a case.

The PRIME MINISTER. I have only to say that the moment particulars of this kind are given, it will be the duty of the government to have the fact investigated, and to apply to the Department of Justice, if the facts are so, to see what remedy can be applied.

Mr. BOYD. If I may be permitted, I would like to correct a wrong impression which the House would receive from the remarks of the leader of the government in regard to the Canadian Northern Railway. Speaking of that road the Premier said that it did not help to relieve the grain blockade. Now, there has been no blockade on that road during the season. Any blockade that has taken place has been on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Evidence was produced at the Agriculture Committee at the local legislature to prove that, at all times, the Canadian Northern road, throughout their system, had been able to handle their crop this season.

Mr. McCREARY. Perhaps I may be allowed to explain that that grain did not go over the trunk line to a Canadian port, but to an American port. If the Canadian Pacific Railway were to take to shipping to American ports, they could move a great deal of grain, just as the Canadian Northern has done.

Motion (Mr. Douglas) agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That Government Orders take precedence on Monday next immediately after Questions.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET SPEECH.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I had contemplated delivering the Budget speech this week, but after consultation with the leader of the opposition it has been found more mutually convenient to fix it for Monday next, on the understanding that the debate will continue from day to day until terminated. It is only intended to take next Monday as a government day unless the Budget debate should not finish next week, in which case the following Monday will be taken.

SCHOOL TEACHERS FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (North Victoria). If the right hon. the Prime Minister will be good enough, I would like him to give some information regarding the sending of teachers to South Africa. A great many are anxious to go and would like to be informed as to the procedure, the form of application and the qualifications.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I am sorry to say that I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend on this subject and will have to refresh my memory.

PENSIONS TO NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Resolution (p. 806) respecting pensions to be granted to the officers of the North-west Mounted Police was read the second time and agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 40) respecting pensions to officers of the North-west Mounted Police.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—OFFICIAL REPORTING OF DEBATES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish, for a few moments to direct attention to the 'Hansard' reporting of the House for the present year. In the past I have always recognized that we have had very accurate work on the part of the 'Hansard' staff; but I regret to say that it is not up to its usual efficiency this session. My attention was drawn, a few days ago to a report in 'Hansard' of February 27th. In Committee of Supply the item for 'rewards for saving lives, including life-savings stations' was under consideration, and

I asked a question with regard to it as to what this money was to be used for. I drew attention to it.

I notice an item for life saving in connection with one of the vessels on the upper lakes.

That is what appears in 'Hansard.' But I did not speak of it in that way, but said that, in connection with this item for life-saving service, I desired to draw the attention of the minister to what had happened in the way of life-saving in connection with one of the vessels on the upper lakes, and I asked if anything had been done to reward the captain of the vessel for his meritorious conduct. I asked the list of those to whom awards had been given for saving life, so as to find if this captain's name appeared among them. The minister read the list, and when he had finished, I drew attention to the fact that the name of the captain in the case I have referred to did not appear. I was not, at that time, able to give the name of the steamship, but said it was captain Geo. McDougall, of the steamship 'Athabaska,' who, on the 29th of June, 1901, saved the lives of twelve out of thirteen of the crew of the American barge 'Preston.' I stated that I mentioned the case so as to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to it; that, in the event of deserving men being rewarded, the highly meritorious services of Captain McDougall might receive due recognition. I also stated, at that time, that there had been given to this captain a very handsome testimonial, in the form of a gold watch, by the President of the United States. Now, there is not a word referring to all that in 'Hansard.' I pass on then to the report of next day. I had, on a previous occasion, asked the minister for information with regard to the hydrographic survey chart of Georgian Bay. The minister, referring to my question stated where these maps could be had. And he referred also to the case of Captain McDougall in these words, according to 'Hansard':

With regard to the question put by the hon. member for North Grey—

That is wrong, for it was not the hon. member for North Grey—this is mixed up in every way, it seems to me.

—as to whether any award has been made to Captain McDougall, who had saved a number of lives from an American barge or steamer, and who had been given a very handsome testimonial for his conduct by the United States, I beg to say that I have looked up the records in the department and cannot find record of any application for an award to Captain McDougall.

That was in answer to what I had said in bringing the case to the notice of the hon. minister, for the purpose of having him take note of it so that Captain McDougall might be suitably awarded, but concerning which there is no mention in 'Hansard.' This kind of reporting is unjust to hon. members of this House. And, as this occurred on Friday evening, and I was not in the city on the following day, the necessary correction could not be made in time, and so it appears in this erroneous form in the revised 'Hansard' as well. I draw attention to this in order that there may be more care taken in the reporting, for, otherwise, 'Hansard' will be of little use.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte). Let me say, on behalf of the 'Hansard' reporters, that the difficulty of taking down every word uttered on the floor of the House must be apparent. I have had long experience in that kind of business, and I may say that I do not understand how the reporters can be as accurate as they are, for there is so much noise in the chamber that it is almost impossible for one to hear. I have found errors in 'Hansard,' but, on behalf of a staff which is a meritorious one, I must call the attention of the members of the House to the noise which is going on all the time, which makes it very difficult for any reporters to be accurate.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). On that same subject, I might point out that a number of members have a habit of turning their backs on the 'Hansard' men while speaking, which makes it almost impossible for the reporters to catch what they say.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee.

Rents—Dominion public buildings, Ottawa, $31,000.

Mr. MACLEAN. What is the total amount paid for rents in outside buildings in the city, approximately? I am told to-day it exceeds $43,000. That would pay interest on $2,000,000; and if that is the case, we can get much better value for our money by borrowing that amount of capital cheaply, and putting up proper buildings.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If I mistake not the amount paid for rents in Ottawa is about $15,000.

Mr. MACLEAN. I think it is higher than that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not exactly recollect the amount.

Mr. WILSON. It would be well for the Minister of Public Works to give a list of all the buildings he is renting, and the rent he pays for each.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. With pleasure. Does the hon. gentleman ask for a list of all the public buildings all over the country ?

Mr. WILSON. In Ottawa alone.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Geological Museum, Sussex Street, $600 ; French translators' office, $420. The French translators have been lately moved into the central block here, so that item will disappear. Workshops, Wellington Street, at $140, and taxes at $300 ; Examining Warehouse, Sparks Street, $850 ; Imperial building, Queen Street, $1,800 ; Central Basin, coal shed, Slater Estate, $400 ; Thistle Estate, Wellington Street, Gas Inspection, $500 ; Seybold building, $6,500. The House pronounced last year upon that. New methylated spirits warehouse and laboratory, corner of Queen and Lyon Streets, Department of Inland Revenue, $1,200 ; Marine storehouse, $300 ; Dominion Methodist Church, Queen Street, Militia and Defence, $500. This item will disappear hereafter, as we have a new store building erected. Customs Department, Wellington Street, $1,500 ; Molsons' Bank, Metcalfe Street, for Labour Department, $1,200 ; new building for Surveyor General's staff, corner Metcalfe and Slater Streets, $3,000 ; International Boundary Commission and Astronomical Branch, Interior Department, 26 Wellington Street, $800. That makes an approximate total of $21,000, although two items are to disappear. I do not like that state of affairs. At the same time, it would take a large amount of money to erect all the buildings that would be necessary to give the accommodation for which we now pay rent.

Mr. MACLEAN. But the hon. gentleman belongs to an economical government, and they are charged with the administration of the public affairs to the best interests of the country. If it is wrong, as he confesses it is, to pay this large amount in rents and to have the public affairs administered in this extravagant way, he is guilty of maladministration. He is charged by the people to effect the best possible administration, and if it is necessary, to build new buildings and get better value for our money. We are paying him and we are paying the government for that purpose, and we expect them to conduct the public service in the best possible way for the smallest amount of money. I do not like to hear these confessions that are being repeatedly made by the ministers that they are doing something that is not in the public interest. They should bring forward a proposition that is in the public interest, and they should cease the extravagance under which public affairs are now being administered.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I never intimated that we were doing this against the public interest, I said it was a state of affairs that I did not like. On the other hand, the Minister of Finance and the government must take care not to spend too much money. Now we are going to erect a museum, an observatory and a building for the mint, which will take a large amount of money. When the government have to borrow money as we have, it is necessary to be prudent and careful.

Mr. MACLEAN. Then what the minister is practically justifying is paying extravagant rents to their friends here in Ottawa, where a judicious administration would borrow the money necessary to put up the proper buildings, and get much better buildings for a much smaller rate of interest than the rents they are now paying. I ask him now whether he intends to continue that system. It is not in the public interest, it is not on the lines of econmy, and it is not on the lines of the professions that the hon. gentleman made in former days.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken when he says we are renting from our friends. The former government were paying a good many of these rentals when we took office.

Mr. CLARKE. It would be good policy on the part of the government to buy this whole block on Wellington Street fronting the parliament buildings which would give us in future the additional accommodation that will have to be provided, before land increases any more in value in this part of the city.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Property is becoming scarcer in Ottawa. I would like very much to have some expression of opinion from the House on this proposition of my hon. friend, because it is a very important question indeed. On the other hand, the House must not forget that it will cost money to erect public buildings.

Mr. MACLEAN. As to buying very expensive property for public buildings, I do not quite approve of that. I would rather go in for the system that obtains in Washington where they scatter their public buildings over the city. If you attempt to expropriate this property in front of us on Wellington Street, you will have to pay $1,000 a foot. There are a number of properties that could be got in other portions of the city half a mile from here where you can probably get land for 50 or 75 dollars a foot frontage. But it is the duty of the government to come forward with some plan, and take the responsibility. The House should not find a plan for them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have already been trying to buy property, and have looked over a number of properties, but I find land very dear.

Mr. MACLEAN. Go over in Hull.

Mr. INGRAM. Does the government own Nepean Point now ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend would not like to see that whole point occupied, I am inclined to think, with public buildings. Something can be said for keeping a portion of it free. It is proposed to erect the mint in that vicinity close by the Printing Bureau, but even that has been objected to by the military authorities. Speaking for myself, my sympathies run strongly in the direction of having more public buildings where we can accommodate the business of all the departments in buildings belonging to the government. But I am not prepared to admit that these rents are extravagant, as the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) contends. It is quite possible these rents may represent a reasonable return to the capitalists, and not an extravagant return. We have undertaken the erection of buildings in Ottawa, which, in round numbers will reach doubtless $1,000,000. I do not think I am wrong when I say that taking the proposed new museum, which, necessarily will be a large building, the mint and the observatory, you will find that we are undertaking to add to our buildings in Ottawa to the extent of about $1,000,000, which, I think, is a liberal allowance, and I think it would not be too much to wait a year or two before we add to our obligations for other buildings in Ottawa, although I quite admit it is better to have a number of good public buildings, even if they may be scattered somewhat through the city, than to be compelled to rent a lot of third floors and places of that kind.

Rents, repairs, fuel, lighting water service, janitors, watchmen, charwomen, &c.,—Yukon public buildings, $76,500.

Mr. SPROULE. This is in connection with the Yukon Territory ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to ask the government if they have received any complaints about the Treadgold concession and what they purpose doing about it. Perhaps the hon. Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) would be the proper minister to answer that question. If he is absent through illness, we have nothing but sympathy for him. There is a strong feeling against the government to-day in that country if we can place any reliance upon the information that comes from that distant quarter of the country, and the government do not seem to be doing anything to improve the situation unless they erect more buildings there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Treadgold business has nothing to do with rents, repairs, fuel, lighting and water service in the Yukon. The Minister of the Interior is not here but when he is in his seat no doubt the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) will ask him for an explanation and I have no doubt that his explanation will satisfy the hon. gentleman. In the meantime, I am asking for $76,500 for rents, repairs, fuel, lighting, water service, &c., in the Yukon.

Mr. SPROULE. According to that I take it that the government have not sufficient accommodation for the transaction of public business and are obliged to rent.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, I have a complete list of the buildings that we are obliged to rent, to repair, to heat and so on.

Mr. SPROULE. What buildings were erected last year for the use of the government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The buildings we erected last year and the year before are the post office, court-house, administration building and governor's house.

Mr. SPROULE. What did they cost in the aggregate ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The post office cost $50,246, court-house, $55,299, administration building, which is a large building, $134,244. Government house, the governor's residence, $41,534.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). When the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) speaks of $14,000 for the governor's house, he means the cost of construction ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But this item does not include any of the cost of construction ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No. My hon friend (Mr. Sproule) asks me the cost of construction and I give it to him.

Mr. SPROULE. That will be the gold commissioner's office ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, it is the governor's house.

Mr. SPROULE. Then you have a quasi kind of government there. What I wish to draw attention to is this ; I notice by an item in a Dawson paper that the council use the gold commissioner's office for a court-house ; to which I do not see any reasonable objection, but it means that this country appears to be providing accommodation for the municipal corporation there as well as for the government's requirements, and therefore, it may be that we are spending more money than we otherwise would, so as to be able to provide a building suitable for the accommodation of both. I take it that the municipal corporation pays no rent for the use of this building.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think we are doing that. We are simply providing for the federal administration.

Mr. SPROULE. I merely draw attention to the fact that they are using it and I have in my hand a Dawson paper which says so. I only referred to the fact that I might ask, if, on account of this, we were committing ourselves to a larger expenditure than we otherwise would.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, no.

Mr. MACLEAN. Here is an item of $76,500 for the maintenance of public buildings in the Yukon, a comparatively small place and therefore small administration, and five or six items down we find that the total cost of the maintenance of the Ottawa public buildings is $67,000. This is an extraordinary comparison. We pay $76,500 in the Yukon and $67,000 down in Ottawa. I think we should have a little more detail.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sorry to say that the amount which I am asking for here does not represent the whole amount. These estimates were prepared before Governor Ross came down here and if the committee will give me two minutes of its time it will find that there is no extravagance. I was thunderstruck, so to speak, the first time that these estimates were placed before me. I do not understand why things were so high in the Yukon. Mr. Ross is a prudent man, and I have some officers there who are very able and prudent men. I consulted business men from Dawson city and I have come to the conclusion that there is no extravagance. If my hon. friend will listen to me, I will give him a few details. The expenditure is divided under the following heads : Fuel, lighting, rents, water, scavenging, janitor, nightwatchman, charwomen, repairs to public buildings and furniture. The committee will not ask me to give every detail——

Mr. WILSON. I think the hon. minister might give each item.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am just going to give the amounts now. Fuel, administration building, 350 cords of fire-wood at $20 per cord.

Mr. CLARKE. Only $20 a cord.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, it cannot be got for less. We buy the wood for the government buildings not only in Dawson but all over that country. I have the details here. In all there was $35,000 for fuel. It is a big sum but I cannot help it. It has to be paid.

Mr. CLARKE. Is the fuel purchased by public tender ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They ask for prices.

Mr. CLARKE. By public tender ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand they ask for quotations on lists because there are only a few people who can supply wood there. I may say at once that when Mr. Ross went up I gave him to a very large extent—I will not say carte blanche—but supervision over all my officers. I told him you will have to keep your two eyes open, and if something is going on that you do not approve, wire me.

Mr. CLARKE. Has he wired you ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He has never wired me because things go on all right.

Mr. CLARKE. From whom was the wood purchased ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know. The vouchers are all before the Public Accounts committee. The lighting cost $33,235 for the buildings all over the country and the rents $6,240. We do not pay much rent now. The water service costs $2,580 ; scavanging, $1,000 ; janitors, night watchmen and charwomen, $21,600.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BELL. Is there no reduction in the wages in the Yukon ?

Mr. MACLEAN. Wages are going down.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would like if they would go down. I have consulted business men who have come here and they tell me you cannot get a charwoman for less than $5 a day. I cannot be accused of making jobs there. I do not know what is going on and so I cannot do anything wrong. The money has to be paid.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to read the following statement to show that these buildings are being used as I have said a moment ago. I have here the Dawson 'Daily News' of February 14, and it says :

Arrangements have been made for the city council to hold its first session, March 3, in the gold commissioner's court room. Other sessions of the council likely will also be held there indefinitely.

The city clerk and the mayor's offices, according to an intimation given by Governor Ross some time ago, likely will be in the quarters at present occupied by tax collector E. Ward Smith. It is a large room and easily will accommodate all.

The gold commissioner's court room will be well adapted for the council. The judge's bench will do for the mayor, the court clerk's desk for the city clerk, and the barristers' long table for the six councilmen. All are close together, and on the sides will be ample room for the press reporters tables and the rear will accommodate the public.

It has been deemed much better for the city to accept quarters in the administration building at the outset than to endeavour to provide a building for itself. The expense attendant on getting the young municipality on its feet is the prime cause for accepting the courtesies extended by the Dominion government, and through the efforts of Governor Ross the way was first paved.

I have another issue of the same paper and it refers to a question which I wish to bring to the attention of the minister and to ask him if there is any truth in it. It says:

C. M. Woodworth, the barrister, arrived on the White Pass stage at noon. Mr. Woodworth has been absent several months, and for a portion of the time was in Ottawa. While there he was twice the guest of the Governor General and was entertained by two of the cabinet ministers, and met many of the other ministers and officials.

According to Mr. Woodworth, the Yukon will be granted parliamentary representation the present session of parliament, and may be allowed two members.

I would like to ask the minister if that is in contemplation. If so, we have had no information of it so far.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, well, I do not know anything about that. It is asking me too much. I cannot say about that.

Mr. MACLEAN. The minister was giving us other information.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The two other items are repairs to public buildings $15,000 and furniture $5,000. My deputy minister tells me that that makes $93,000 which is more than I am asking in this vote.

Mr. KEMP. I am afraid that the officers of the department have very extravagant ideas in connection with these Yukon supplies, and certain items in the Auditor General's Report at page V—48 seem to bear that idea out. We have an account for two wine decanters, $10; whisky set, $5; mirror, $25; and there are other supplies of ale, and wine and whisky charged for at page V—47 of the Auditor General's Report. There is also a charge for 12 feet of extra table, $45. I suppose that is an ordinary table. Sheets are charged for at $3 a pair, I am not prepared to say what is the price in this part of the country, but I am informed that they are worth about $1 a pair. I do not wish to be picayune in criticising these things, but if these extravagant prices are paid in the Yukon it is no wonder that the appropriations are so large.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am sure if I had the pleasure of going into my hon. friend's house, I would find more expensive furniture than any that Mr. Ross has bought for himself. I do not believe that my hon. friend can buy decent sheets for a dollar apiece; nor do I think that $25 is an extraordinary price to pay for a mirror. I see gentlemen around me who have more expensive furniture in their houses.

Mr. COCHRANE. They pay for it themselves. They do not pay for it with my money.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is a very small argument. The governor of the Yukon is not bound to pay for his furniture himself. I may say that I placed $5,000 at his disposal to enable him to buy his own furniture. I thought it was only fair to allow him that freedom. I am sure Mr. Ross has acted prudently.

Mr. MACLEAN. I gather, from what I have read in the newspapers, that prices in the Yukon have come down to hard-pan, but I see no evidence of that in the government accounts. The profits of miners, the rates of wages, and I believe the prices of supplies have come down; the government also, I understand, have cut down the rates of transportation; and I think a little care exercised by them would secure hard-pan prices for the government.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I do not think my hon. friend is familiar with the conditions in the Yukon, or he would not say that prices have come down to hard-pan, which I suppose means the same prices that prevail in other parts of the Dominion.

Mr. MACLEAN. No, I mean hard-pan for the Yukon.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I may say that quite recently I had an opportunity to consult judges who reside in the Yukon and others entirely independent of the administration, who have come from there, and, to illustrate the conditions prevailing in that part of the country, I am told that an ordinary maid servant will not hire for less than $100 a month, and you cannot rent the meanest sort of residence for less than $150 a month. If these are the prevailing prices in the country, it is of course impossible to complain of the rates paid by my hon. friend in connection with the Public Works Department.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask the Minister of Justice if he has read recently an interview in one of the newspapers with Mr. Justice Craig, of the Yukon district, who stated in that interview that all sorts of irregularities were being carried on by officers of the government, and that the charges made by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) from his place in the House a few sessions ago, were not a bit overstated. In view of these statements made by Mr. Justice Craig, does the Minister of Justice propose to have an investigation ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I have not had the advantage of reading the interview to which my hon. friend refers; but I have had the advantage of several personal conferences with Mr. Justice Craig, some of them in the presence of the Auditor General, within the last few weeks, and he never suggested anything of the character mentioned by my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT. I can only say that it is remarkable that although this statement has been spread broadcast throughout the press, Mr. Justice Craig has not taken any opportunity of contradicting it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. As this interview came to the knowledge of my hon. friend, and as Mr. Justice Craig was here until a few days ago, I think it would have been better to have had him called before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not suppose every member of the House has time to keep himself instructed as to the movements of Mr. Justice Craig. I would suppose that the Minister of Justice himself, under the circumstances, would have brought him to the Public Accounts Committee, instead of expecting gentlemen on this side of the House to do so.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I never heard of the statement before.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Every one who pays much attention to the public press must have seen it. I saw it myself.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. In that case the hon. gentleman should have brought it to the attention of the House.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I took it for granted that the government were alive. My hon. friend does not deny that it was published in the public press. However, I would like the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Public Works to explain to the House on what principle it is that the officials of the Yukon are now paid on a different basis from other officials. Judges or other officials in other parts of the country do not for the most part receive living allowances apart from their salaries. I am willing to concede that in the Yukon the salaries must be higher ; but what I do not understand is, why our officers there are not paid one lump salary, and left to provide their own living allowances. I think that is a more satisfactory mode of dealing with such matters than the mode that still prevails.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may say that in a day or two there will be only one officer of my department remaining in the Yukon district. We are giving him an allowance of $75 a month. All the others will be recalled. The telegraph line and all our other public works there for the time being are completed.

Mr. WARD. There is an item on page V—57 of the Auditor General's Report, of which I would ask an explanation from the Minister of Public Works. It is 50 head of cattle, 44,000 lbs., at 30 cents, and $100 paid to a man for killing these cattle.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That item has reference to the construction of the telegraph line. It has no connection with this item at all.

Mr. BENNETT. From the Dawson 'Weekly News' of February 14th, I find it stated that a Mr. Woodworth, a barrister of Dawson City, had been east; and, when he returned to Dawson, in an interview with a newspaper man, he said :

> Mr. Sifton, Mr. Woodworth says, keeps in complete touch with the Yukon, and has clippings of all affairs touching his Yukon administration sent to him personally.

Perhaps in the Department of the Interior might be found a clipping containing the statements of Mr. Justice Craig. If the item stood over and the Department of the Interior were communicated with, we might get something in reference to those statements.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Will my hon. friend give me the date of the paper in which that interview was published? I probably will be able to reach Mr. Justice Craig by telegraph in the next day or two.

Mr. BENNETT. I regret that I have mislaid the paper, but I think that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has a copy.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have a copy and will give it to the hon. minister.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the hon. minister say he never saw the clipping ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I never saw or heard of it.

Mr. SPROULE. What control have we over the wood lands ? Are they still in the hands of the parties who tried to get control a few years ago ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have not found any coal there, and I can only answer for the wood supplied me. The Minister of Interior has charge of the land, and there will be ample opportunity to discuss the whole situation in the Yukon. I can only answer for my department.

> Furniture Dominion public buildings, $12,000.
> Dominion immigration buildings—repairs, furniture, &c., $4,000.

Mr. BROCK. What accommodation have we in the shape of immigrant buildings in this country to receive immigrants when they arrive ? We are spending a very large amount to bring them here, and if the accommodation is very poor when they arrive, we lose a good deal of the advantages we would otherwise get from them. I have heard that immigrants who arrived in Winnipeg in the early spring were so badly accommodated that many became discontented with the country and went back to the United States. I would like to ask what accommodation we are providing in this country for those immigrants we are bringing in, not only from Europe but from the United States.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have already a number of buildings for immigration purposes—at Halifax, Quebec, Lévis, Calgary, Edmonton, Lethbridge, Prince Albert, Regina, St. John and other places. I quite agree with my hon. friend that we must treat the immigrants as well as possible. We have endeavoured to do so in the past, but if the immigration continues growing we will be obliged to do more.

Mr. TAYLOR. Where is this $4,000 to be expended ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is the ordinary expenditure on repairs in the buildings all over the country.

Mr. POPE. Are we providing accommodation for immigrants who land here and are going to the United States ? To-day in the city of Montreal, there are more than 200 cases of contagious diseases in the hospitals—all people who came into this country bound for the United States.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is not from my personal knowledge that there are 200 foreigners in our hospitals in Montreal, but that may be the case. We have no immigration building in Montreal. In Lévis, St. John and Quebec we have divisions in our buildings, dividing the immigrants destined for this country from those going to the United States, and we have different arrangements for each. Last year we completed our arrangements in Quebec and are now completing them in St. John.

Mr. POPE. Do we furnish, at our expense, covering for those people who go to the United States ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are simply sheltering them as we shelter foreign trade. The immigration trade here is a very valuable one. There are lots of goods of all kinds that pass through and for which we have to provide accommodation. We provide for immigrants in just the same way. The inspection is not made at our expense at all.

Mr. CLARKE. You provide accommodation for them, whether they intend remaining here or going to the United States.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Suppose the Allan and Dominion steamship lines and the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canada Atlantic will carry American immigrants, are we not bound to shelter them ?

Mr. POPE. No, let the railways shelter them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If we did not shelter them, they would not come to our territory and we would lose that trade.

Mr. McCREARY. You have a lot of Canadian immigrants sheltered in New York city, who arrive there and come to Canada, and a great many of them are in the hospitals there.

Mr. INGRAM. When was the building located at St. John ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is now being completed. We discussed the item a few days ago. It was begun last year.

Mr. INGRAM. I find an item here—not very large, it is true—but it strikes me that legal gentlemen come very high in St. John, much higher than in Ontario :

McAlpine, E. H., barrister, professional services locating premises for building, $8 ; preparing deed, $8 ; search at registry office, 1½ days, $40 ; sundry, $1.41.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have employed some legal gentlemen from Ontario, and I find that they know just as well how to make a charge as those from the maritime provinces. I may add that all the fees are prepared in the Department of Justice, and I have nothing to do with them. The land was given to us.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to ask about this item of furniture. Is it purchased by public tender, and are the local merchants and dealers given an opportunity to tender ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That item of $12,000 covers expenditure for furniture for all the public buildings. If I remember well, we have 185 public buildings under our care, and this small sum is to cover requisitions that may be made upon us by caretakers and others. It is simply to cover petty items of expenditure for furniture.

Mr. CLARKE. Where is it purchased ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is purchased locally. With only $12,000 scattered all over the country, we could not adopt any system of purchase and at any central point.

Mr. CLARKE. Is any of it purchased in Ottawa ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is under another item altogether.

Mr. POPE. I still take objection to our expending Canadian public money for a class of people the whole benefit of whose appearance in Canada goes to the transportation companies. I know of no reason why the railway companies and shipowners should not furnish that accommodation, just as they furnish accommodation for baggage, freight or any other item from which they benefit, and the benefit to the country is only indirect. In this matter of immigration, I am afraid that we are subject not only to great cost, but to great danger because we allow all sorts of people to land in this country. The United States keep an army of officers to inspect the immigration into their country. From such information as I get from the Bureau at Washington, I am inclined to think that a very large percentage—even a very large majority—of the immigrants landing in this country are destined for the United States and that we, under such items as this we are discussing, are furnishing cover for people who intend to become American citizens. If even the large majority of the people, landing on our shores had points in Canada for their destination, that would alter the case. But the statistics of the Washington Bureau are against that belief, and our statistics are not well kept in comparison with theirs. These immigrants are all counted by United States officers as they pass on the trains, and reports sent into the Bureau. Those statistics show that we are furnishing cover to people who do not intend to become Canadian citizens, and that is not just to the tax payer of this country.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would, perhaps agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Pope) to a certain extent if we had erected or were asking parliament for money to erect buildings intended exclusively for foreign immigration. But that is not the case.

Mr. CLARKE. But you do not discriminate.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Here is what we have done and what we are doing. We are putting up an immigration building at St. John. That is our winter port; all our own immigration comes from that port, and we must provide for it. My department has been asked to provide a corner, if I may so say it, in the immigration building. And the same is true of Quebec. I was asked to provide rooms for American officers to inspect American immigration.

Mr. CLARKE. Why should we provide accommodation for American officers ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I take issue with my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke). Though in these matters, I am only a builder, and it is not for me to defend this part of the policy, yet, I take issue with the hon. gentleman. The immigration trade is good trade for us to have. Our navigation companies and railway companies benefit by it and our traders benefit by it also. Why should we not encourage it ? I cannot understand the hon. gentleman's reasons for objecting.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) I am sorry that Halifax is ignored altogether as a port for the arrival of immigrants. We have an immigration agent and we have immigration sheds, women to attend to them, and all the facilities for receiving immigrants. These people are carried to the port of Halifax by ships subsidized by the Dominion government. We have a road from Halifax extending to Montreal and running through our own country. I maintain that the immigrants that come in our own ships to our own port should go by our own railway into the centre of this Dominion. That would prevent them going to the United States. As for those who go to the United States, they are divided at Halifax, because they are on the manifest of the ship which shows so many immigrants going to this port or that port. Those coming to Canada should enter at the first port where the steamer arrives in the Dominion, particularly as that port has all the facilities to handle them; and they should certainly go by our own road into our own country.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may be allowed to remind my hon. friend that St. John is the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which has western connections. Unfortunately, the Intercolonial Railway has not those connections. When an immigrant lands in Canada, he is anxious to get aboard a car that will take him to his destination. That is the reason why St. John has been favoured in connection with that immigration in the past.

Mr. CLARKE. But would it not be a reasonable proposition that the railway companies that bring these immigrants through Canada into the United States and the steamship companies that bring them across the Atlantic should provide the accommodation necessary for these people ? There is no objection to treating them as they ought to be treated, but the question is who ought to bear the expense. For my part I say we ought to imitate the example of our friends of the other side—we should collect from the transportation companies for the inspection and temporary housing of immigrants who are not destined for points in Canada.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We do not pay a dollar for the inspecting. What we have done is simply to allow American officers the use of two or three rooms for the inspection of these immigrants.

Mr. CLARKE. But we should compel the steamship companies or somebody else to provide the accommodation necessary for the inspection, and for housing the immigrants who are merely passing through Canada and whose destination is a foreign country. Surely that is not unreasonable.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not say that it is.

Mr. CLARKE. We have the statement made that, in view of the quality of the immigration coming to Canada, it was found necessary by the United States government, first to send a medical officer to Liverpool to inspect immigrants going to points in the United States through Canada. But that was not found effective, so they had to despatch officers to our own ports. They are inspecting immigrants coming to Canada and determining which shall be allowed to go to the United States. Ought there not to be some provision, not only with these people so that they could be treated rightly, but that, if they are not fit to land, they shall be taken back by the steamship company. Is it not reasonable to ask that the Canadian public should not have the expense placed on its shoulders, an expense which properly belongs to the steamship companies, to the railway companies or to the United States authorities ? I protest against expenditure for that purpose.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We must not fall into exaggeration. Of course, I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) does not mean to exaggerate. There are two immigration sheds used for foreign immigration purposes. One at St. John and one at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) And Halifax.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Halifax, from what the hon. gentleman says, does not receive much immigration.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.). We have ample accommodation.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The accommodation is all right. But there are only two places where foreign immigrants are landed. I make bold to say it does not cost the country $500 a year for that object, because we would be obliged to make provision for our own immigration, and we have made provision for it in point of fact. Foreign immigration is only an incident, if I may say so ; it does not cost anything worth speaking of.

Mr. WILSON. It has been stated in this House that the United States house immigrants at New York coming through that port into Canada. Now, is there any arrangement whereby they are to house our immigrants and we are to house theirs ? That would be reciprocity, and I see no good reason why, if they do that for us, we should not do something in return.

Mr. CLARKE.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not the head of that branch, and cannot say. But I do not share the doubts that are expressed now. My policy would be to give cheap transportation to all kinds of trade, to make provision by land and water for cheap transportation through the country, both of trade and of human beings, provided of course that we do not fall into excess in the way of expenditure.

Mr. WILSON. The hon. gentleman has not answered my question, whether there is an arrangement made between Canada and the United States that they should house our immigrants and we should house theirs?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am obliged to answer that it is not in my branch, and I do not know anything about it.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) I may say, as one having had fourteen years experience with immigration in the port of Halifax, that immigrants are not housed, because the moment they arrive they are inspected by doctors, and the cars are all ready for them to take their passage. Those for the United States take passage for the United States, and those for Canada are carried into the interior. What have we the Intercolonial railway for unless it is to carry our immigrants from the port of their arrival in Canada ?

Dominion quarantine stations—maintenance, &c., $4,000.

Mr. SPROULE. We want some information in connection with this item. In the event of immigrants coming to the country, who land and may be found diseased, do they go into these quarantine stations, and are they kept there and fed, and their expenses paid until they are fit to go on to the United States, and do we bear all that expense ? I think whoever has charge of this quarantine station, whether the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of the Interior, ought to be able to tell us that. If the United States does the same thing the service would be mutual. But we want to know whether such an arrangement has been made. There ought to be some minister able to give us the information.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Minister of Agriculture in whose department——

Mr. MACLEAN. He is in the garden of Eden. He will be back in a little while.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, he should stay there for some time. As soon as he is done, he will give us the information.

Mr. KEMP. I would like to point out an item in the Auditor General's Report, I do not profess to be an authority on the Auditor General's Report. I regret to say

I have very little time to study it. But my study thus far has convinced me that the Department of Public Works is being imposed upon, I do not know to what extent. There is a tendency sometimes for individuals to charge the government two prices for things. If the tender system were adopted, that might be avoided to some extent. Once in a while an item will catch one's eye, and I find on page V—68 in the Auditor General's Report an item of $1,293.61, including a certain article which I know something about, and that is a galvanized iron boiler. It is 120 gallon galvanized iron boiler, and it is charged here at $84, while the value of that article is only $37. I do not know what system prevails in the department of checking prices, I do not know how often that kind of thing occurs. But we are paying out here hundreds of thousands of dollars of public money, in fact, millions of dollars ; and it is possible we are voting away hundreds of thousands of dollars more than we ought to. Certainly we are doing so, if that kind of thing occurs very often.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend states we have paid $84 for an article that he knows is worth $37. Is he sure of that ?

Mr. KEMP. I have no doubt about it, I know the value of it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Having no doubt and being sure, are two different things. There are boilers and boilers. I cannot believe my officers would make a mistake like that. Of course a minister cannot be expected to check all these accounts. But if my officers are guilty of such mistakes they are no good.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I say if they are no good they never have been good, because I inherited nearly all of them. But they are good, and they have not made that mistake.

Mr. KEMP. I may explain to the minister that this is an article carried by all first-class plumbers in stock, and he can inquire the value of it himself.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It depends. I have seen a lot of boilers in my time, and have not seen two that were quite alike. This is not the first time I have been on the floor of the House, and I have heard statements like that on many occasions. But I will look into this immediately. At six o'clock I will wire to the man who paid for it, and if he is incapable enough to be imposed upon, he does not deserve to be in my employ. I am thankful to my hon. friend for drawing my attention to it.

Mr. COCHRANE. I would say to the Minister of Public Works that we have heard that statement for a great many years. It is hoary with age, if not with respectability. I think he knows away down deep in his heart that that job is being perpetrated every day. We have had brought out in the public accounts just such transactions as that. I think his official does it under his instructions, that is my impression in the matter.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not one word to say in answer to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BELL. This item occurs in connection with the expenditure at Grosse Isle. I think if the minister will look into the matter he will find that some very extraordinary prices are paid for things at Grosse Isle. I have been looking over some of the accounts, and I think that establishment is paying nearly 100 per cent more for everything it buys than the regular market price. One item that caught my eye in the Auditor General's Report is eight cents a pound for putty. They are paying over forty cents a gallon for kerosene oil. I assure the Minister of Public Works that he will be well employed if he will make an excursion into these accounts in connection with the quarantine station at Grosse Isle.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is nothing I would like better than to have these accounts brought up before the Public Accounts Committee.

Mr. BELL. Some of them are now before the committee.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am anxious now that the hon. member for Pictou and the hon. member for Toronto have taken up some of these items, to have them brought before the Public Accounts Committee. I shall be delighted.

Mr. BELL. Some of them are before the committee.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No objection at all ; very far from it. Here is the way these accounts are paid ; they are certified first by the clerk of the works on the spot. They are then sent to Ottawa and certified again by the chief architect. I have nothing to do with them. Of course it is not to be expected that a minister could check all of these accounts. He must necessarily trust his chief officers. If he cannot do so, what other course is open to him. I am anxious that all these accounts should be brought up and my hon. friends will find that they are altogether mistaken. I do not pretend to say that a great department cannot be imposed upon as any other business man is. There is not a business man in this parliament who has never been imposed upon, and the department is imposed upon at times. I will be very glad to have all these items investigated.

Mr. BELL. Does the hon. minister wish the House to understand that in passing an account for a galvanized iron boiler his final court of appeal is his chief architect ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. BELL. His architect is supposed to be an authority on galvanized iron boilers.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What am I going to do if the chief architect of a great department is not able to certify as to the purchasing of a boiler ; if he is not able to do that he is unable to do anything.

Mr. BROCK. This is one of the great troubles of this day labour government. It is quite possible to get over the difficulty and the hon. minister knows it. All he has to do is to ask for tenders. He can easily get tenders for boilers. There is not a plumber in Ottawa, or out of Ottawa, who is not willing to tender. As the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) says, these boilers are kept in stock by all first-class plumbers and there is no difficulty in getting them to tender. I think if the hon. minister would adopt business methods and mix less politics in the business of his department he would get better value.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) referred to some items in an account that he saw. The hon. Minister of Public Works said in reply that these accounts are certified to by certain officials. Here is an account for $811 paid to Mr. A. Laberge, Montmagny. It is certified right and signed by Mr. Langlois and Mr. Lapointe. Mr. Lapointe signs it by making his mark. It is certified still further by another gentleman named Martineau. First it is approved by Mr. Jarvis for $848 and Mr. Martineau signs the certificate saying :

I hereby certify that the above account is correct, &c., and that the prices named are fair and just.

It is the standard certificate. These three officers, and I intend to have some of them examined, say that at the city of Quebec, 163 pounds of putty are worth 8 cents a pound and that the price is fair and just and correct. If one of these gentlemen can only make his mark, I do not think he can purchase goods and know the value of them. There is not a man in this House that cannot go down town and buy putty for 2 or 3 cents a pound. There are several barrels of coal oil in this account at 32 cents a gallon and 2 pounds of white lead, Elephant brand, at $2.10 per pound, or $4.50. Surely the hon. minister will know that there is a rake off on goods purchased at these prices. Among the items for the quarantine station at Grosse Isle are two pairs of snow shoes at $3 a pair. Why do these gentlemen want snow shoes furnished by this government at $3 a pair ? So, I might go on. Perhaps, before the session is over, I will read this account in detail showing every item of that $811. There is hardly an item amongst them that will bear a fair comparison——

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) kindly let me have that paper ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Certainly. I have another one certified to in the same way commencing on the 7th July, 1900. Here is a bottle of Hennesy's brandy, and there are eight or nine of them through the account. On the 9th of July there was purchased a ton of chestnut coal for $8.50, eggs 15 and 16 cents a dozen during July when they were worth from 6 to 10 cents at the outside.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Oh.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is correct. In July and August you can buy eggs at 10 cents a dozen. There is a barrel of granulated sugar, 306 pounds, at 6½ cents a pound. Everybody knows the price of sugar. Then, there are 7 barrels of coal oil at 32 cents a gallon for the oil and $1.25 for the barrel besides. This, in my opnion, accounts for the great increase in the public expenditure during the last four or five years. The hon. Minister of Public Works is asking for these items and he assures us that they represent the usual votes, but the fact is that where he is asking for $125,000 to-day, in 1895 and 1896 $90,000 would have been asked for the same services. I find the whole item, No. 163, amounts to $608,500, but if the hon. gentleman will turn to the estimates for 1896, the same item which was numbered 148 then, he will find that while he asks for $608,000, the same services were performed more efficiently in the former year for $436,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. All the services provided for now were not there then.

Mr. TAYLOR. Deduct the Yukon and there is an increase of $95,200. The whole thing is accounted for by these excessive prices as in the case to which my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) referred in which three prices were paid for a galvanized boiler. The hon. Minister of Public Works says there are boilers and boilers. There are not two kinds of galvanized iron boilers.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There are more than two kinds.

Mr. TAYLOR. Every one knows what a galvanized boiler is. My hon. friend (Mr. Kemp) manufactures them, and he knows the price. It is by paying two or three prices to political friends that our money is wasted.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, now, see how a man can be unwillingly unfair. Why, I have nothing to do with that at all. That is a matter which belongs to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is the government all the same.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) says that I did this and I did that, and I am not responsible for this at all, because he will see on the face of it that the account is certified by Mr. Jarvis, Secretary of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. TAYLOR. I know that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) charges me with having bought snowshoes and sugar. It is not a crime to buy snowshoes or sugar, but I have not bought the sugar and have not used the snowshoes. I am not guilty on this occasion, because I have done nothing at all.

Mr. POPE. The Minister of Public Works should not endeavour to get out of the responsibility at the expense of his colleague (Hon. Mr. Fisher). I can quite understand that even the Minister of Public Works would not like to assume responsibility for the Minister of Agriculture. I have no doubt that at this very moment the Minister of Public Works feels somewhat uncomfortable in finding himself on the floor of the House battling for the government while the Minister of Agriculture sits up aloft enjoying these pleasantries that can only be found in the gallery above. The Minister of Public Works undertook the responsibility of crossing the floor of the House to the gentlemen opposite, when he perhaps could have remained on this side in respectable company. But having crossed the floor he must take responsibility for his actions. Now there is a very serious matter connected with this vote. It is for quarantine stations, and it seems to me that we are spending all this money for the purpose of taking care of diseased and rotten immigrants from Europe.

Some hon. MEMBER. Oh.

Mr. POPE. Yes, they are rotten with disease and unfit to associate with the citizens of Canada, and they are shut out of the United States. Here we are spending money trying to cure these miserable specimens of humanity, and when they are cured at our expense they cross over to the United States. Even if they remained in this country, it is a bad policy that we should advertise to the world that any one would be allowed to settle in Canada except a people who are morally and physically healthy. I believe that to a large extent this quarantine expenditure is for the purpose of taking care of these undesirable immigrants who come to Canada trying to find their way to the United States. It behooves the government to see to it that none but desirable immigrants should come here, immigrants who are fit to associate with us and to take their rank as good citizens. We should not advertise that Canada is a rendezvous for the outcasts of Europe.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That question is certainly worthy of consideration, and it can be properly discussed when the immigration vote is before the House.

Ottawa—public buildings—telephone service, $7,000.

Mr. MACLEAN. The Minister of Justice told us the other day that my telephone Bill did not cover the ground and that his did. If his Bill is going to be of any use in decreasing the cost of telephones, why are you taking an extra vote for telephones here ? What rate do you pay ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have a special rate of $35 each instrument.

Mr. MACLEAN. But we have an increase in the vote for telephones here, and that does not carry out the promise that the Minister of Justice made when he told us that his Bill would reduce the cost of telephones to the public.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no increase in the price, but we are obliged to have an increased number of telephones because we have more public buildings than formerly.

Mr. MACLEAN. Does not the Minister of Justice intend to get a reduction of rentals under his Bill ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Minister of Justice has charge of that Bill.

Mr. MACLEAN. I know he has, and the Minister of Justice should be here.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He is not far away, and when the Bill comes up it will be time to discuss it.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the Bill has the effect which the Minister of Justice promised that it would have, this vote should be decreased rather than increased.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the Bill has that effect we will not spend so much money as we do now.

Mr. LEMIEUX. While we are speaking of telephones, I may say that for the last week the telephone in the House of Commons has been out of order.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I draw the attention of the minister to the fact that when a member from room 6 wants to use the telephone he has to come around the building and then he is likely to find the messengers and pages using it. I should like to have a telephone in room 6, or somewhere near there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We should have a telephone in room 6. Is there a telephone in room 16 ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, then, we must have the same thing in room 16.

Mr. BELL. How many additional telephones have you this year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Seventeen or eighteen.

Ottawa public buildings—grounds, $8,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am asking a little more this year. The appropriation my deputy minister informs me, used to be $9,000. If I remember rightly, it was only $5,000 when we took office. The great demonstrations which have been held here have injured the grounds very much, and I am asking $3,000 more this year, because I want to improve the grounds. I hope that next year I shall be able to decrease the amount.

Salaries of engineers, firemen, caretakers,&c. —Dominion public buildings, $88,500.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the hon. minister define the duties of a caretaker of a public building ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The duty of a caretaker of a public building is to take charge of it, to keep it clean and in a state of repair, and to give us notice if anything is wrong.

Mr. INGRAM. Who inspects the public buildings ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief architect and other officers. They do not inspect every building every year, however.

Mr. INGRAM. Some of the caretakers have a holy horror of water. It must be against their principles to use any water.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In what province ?

Mr. INGRAM. In the province of Ontario. If the inspectors were asked to have a little more water used in some of our public buildings, they might be kept a little cleaner.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Would the hon. gentleman tell me what buildings are not kept clean ?

Mr. INGRAM. I would not like to single them out.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend will write me a private letter about them, I shall be thankful to him.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman explain this increase ?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria).

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is due to the fact that we have a larger number of public buildings to look after.

Mr. WILSON. I understand that the caretakers do not take care of the different offices. I think there are some post offices where the postmasters are allowed a percentage of the box rents for keeping the office clean, while the caretaker is only expected to keep the lobbies and the outside parts of the building clean.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think the hon. gentleman is now alluding to buildings which do not belong to us.

Mr. WILSON. No. Take, for instance, the public building in the town of Napanee. If I am correctly informed, it is not the duty of the caretaker to keep the inside of the post office clean, but it is the duty of the postmaster, who for that reason gets half the rent of the boxes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My officers tell me that my hon. friend is wrong—that Mr. Webster's duty is to take care of the public building and keep it clean, for which he gets $400, and if he has not done his duty we have not been notified of the fact.

Mr. WILSON. I think that the minister will find that there are printed instructions to the caretakers, and, if I am correctly informed, they are not obliged to do that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, yes, they are.

Mr. WILSON. Will the hon. gentleman tell us what the postmaster gets half the rent of the boxes for ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The postmaster looks after the collection of the rents, and in all post offices where the postmaster himself owns the building he gets all the rentals of the boxes ; but in the case of a building owned by the government, the postmaster gets an allowance for the trouble of collecting the rents.

Mr. WILSON. It is not a great deal of trouble for the postmaster to collect the rents if they all do it as the postmaster of Napanee does. A printed notice is put in each box that if the rent is not paid within a certain time, the box will be given to some one else. I understand that the postmaster is allowed half the rent ; and, although the building belongs to the country, I know that the postmaster has to clean the inside of it.

Mr. MACLEAN. Before we leave this vote for public buildings, I would like the Minister of Public Works to make an explanation in regard to telephones. The hon. minister says the price in Ottawa is $35.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN. Is there a uniform price charged the government in all other cities ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have made a special arrangement in Ottawa, under which, instead of being charged two prices—one for private residences and the other for business telephones—we are charged the uniform price of $35 per telephone. Does my hon. friend want to know how much we pay elsewhere ?

Mr. MACLEAN. When we are obtaining a uniform price for Ottawa, why not have a uniform charge for the public service throughout the Dominion ? I hope that when we come to regulate the rentals of these telephone companies, as they will be regulated by the Bill going through the House, the public will secure the best possible rate in the same way. If you get a telephone service in Ottawa at $35, the country should not pay much more.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have very few telephones outside of Ottawa. We have discouraged their use as much as possible in our public buildings elsewhere. We have not more than ten or twelve outside of Ottawa, and in Ottawa we have made a special arrangement.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the company not make enormous charges elsewhere ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They charge a great deal, and I am not here to defend them.

Mr. MACLEAN. If the jurisdiction over the telephone companies should fall into the hands of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, I hope that the hon. minister will be assiduous in trying to get the public rates reduced. If the government gets a cheap rate of $35 in Ottawa, the public should get a similar rate all over the country.

Arnold's Breakwater, Nova Scotia, $1,700.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to some matters in connection with public works in Nova Scotia. There is no doubt at all that the harbour and river service in Nova Scotia requires a considerable amount of appropriation, and I am not finding fault with the general principle that our harbours and rivers should be assisted, but from information in my possession, some of the money expended during the past few years has been little better than absolutely wasted. Of course, I have no personal knowledge, but the information given me comes from an entirely unprejudiced source—from political friends of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Finance, in whose constituency—I refer to the Minister of Finance—a good deal of this expenditure has been made. Take the xpenditure for the purpose of cutting a canal between a lake at Black Point in the county of Shelburne or Queen's—I do not know which—and tidal water. The information given me by a gentleman, who has personal knowledge, is that the project was to cut a canal between tide-water and the lake for the purpose of affording shelter to fishermen. The project had been reported on years ago adversely by the engineer in charge, Mr. Dodwell. That is the information given, not by Mr. Dodwell, but by this gentleman to whom I refer.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no Black Point in our books. Is there any other name by which the place is known ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The harbour at Black Point near Lockeport. It seems that afterwards a gentleman by the name of Locke, a civil engineer, who was placed in charge of a portion of the south shore, reported favourably on the construction of this canal. Mr. Dodwell had said it was no use undertaking the work because the bottom of the lake was higher than tide-water, and the construction of the work could not possibly result in any advantage to the fishermen; but under Mr. Locke's report, the canal was cut at considerable expense, and it was found that the bottom of the lake was above tide-water, so that the water simply ran out of the lake and the expenditure was absolutely thrown away. This is worse than waste of public money, and the Minister of Public Works should inform the House whether or not the statement I have made is correct.

I am informed also that the breakwater at Port Latour, on which some $10,000 has been expended, is not of the least service to those it was intended to benefit. The hon. Minister of Finance may have some personal knowledge with regard to these matters. These statements are very widely spread throughout Nova Scotia, particularly along the south shore, and do not tend to increase confidence in the minister of public affairs at Ottawa.

I am also informed that the breakwater near Port Mouton, west of Liverpool, which costs some $20,000, was nearly all washed up on the beach the first winter, and is of no practical service.

Then there is the work at Clark's harbour, in reference to which a very strong supporter of the Minister of Finance broke out into song in a paper called the 'Coast Guard.' I do not know whether his verses have ever been brought to the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, I had the pleasure of reading them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am sure my hon. friend must have been favourably impressed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think my hon. friend might give them to us again.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would not undertake to give the whole of the song, but only a couple of stanzas :

Coast Guard.

Wot's that up thar in Skote P'int Creek,
That good half mile o' stone an' stick ?—
Dear Christian friends pray tell me quick !
Wae that, by golly,
Is wot we call a spes'men brick
O' Fieldin's folly.
* * * * *
The only trade o' any note
That sich a structer can permote
Is catchin' all the ice afloat
W'en tides is swift
An' holdin' every cranky vote
From goin' adrift.

This gentleman, who is said to be a political friend of the Minister of Public Works, seems to have very strong impressions as to the purpose for which this structure was erected.

The wharf at Gunning Cove, which cost upwards of $3,000, is regarded as of such little importance by the people in that vicinity that they have not even taken the trouble to open a road to it from the public highway, and practically do not use it at all. These five public works are works with regard to the expenditure on which there is considerable feeling along the southern coast of Nova Scotia. The opinion is generally held that the money has been wasted to a great extent and that the works have not proved of the slightest public utility.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is very gratifying to me, Mr. Chairman, to find my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax), taking such a warm interest in the affairs of Shelburne and Queen's counties. But it would be more gratifying if he would give us the source of his information. He tells us that he has no knowledge himself of these matters—a very proper observation—and then proceeds to give a statement of what somebody else says. But we are not favoured with the name of that somebody else, and we do not know whether his information is any more than that of the hon. gentleman which, he himself says, is nothing. If the leader of the opposition intends to impugn the propriety of these expenditures on the authority of a witness, he is bound to show the credibility of that witness, to let us know that he proceeds upon something more than mere hearsay statement of some one who is jealous because he did not get a job. We know that that sort of thing may occur in the case of any public work. The first public work that the hon. gentleman mentioned is not shown by that name in the accounts, and therefore I cannot deal with it. As to the work at Port la Tour, I desire to inform the hon. member that Port la Tour is one of the largest and most prosperous fishing settlements in the maritime provinces, and contributes more largely to the statistics of the Fisheries Department than any other settlement, except one, in the lower provinces. The people there wanted a breakwater for the protection of their harbour, and the government entered upon the consideration of the question of providing it. Of course, the breakwater could not be finished at once. The breakwater has not served its full purpose, because it is not completed. Where we can get an opportunity at once to complete the work, the amount is spent and the work completed. But I have been very modest in my demands upon my colleagues for public works in the district I have the honour to represent, and in many of these works we have to be content to construct them piecemeal, doing what we can one year and waiting for a further appropriation. It is, therefore, absurd to speak of a work not being sufficiently useful until the work itself is completed. Another work referred to by the hon. gentleman was that at Clark's Harbour. If there is a settlement that is distinctly a fishing settlement, it is that of Clarke's Harbour on Cape Sable Island. It ranks with Port la Tour as one of the most prosperous in the country. Of course no public work was ever constructed where there was not a difference of opinion as to the location, the engineering arrangements and the people employed on the work. The people in that section sent in a petition asking for the construction of a breakwater. After several years—for this matter was not decided upon in a moment—and after several small appropriations were made and found insufficient, the work was undertaken and carried out by a competent engineer. It is, I believe, a very useful public work, and it can be made more useful still by being extended further. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has spoken of an expenditure of $10,000. I am speaking from memory and subject to correction, but I do not think that $10,000 has been spent on any one public work in my constituency since I entered the government. There have been a number of small appropriations but none so large as this. The hon. gentleman referred to a Mr. Locke. It happens that 'a Mr. Locke' is a very intelligent and capable civil engineer who is in the employ of the Public Works Department. I know him very well. He belongs to one of the best known and the most highly respected families of Nova Scotia, the Locke family of the western part of the province. He was trained in the office of the department of the provincial engineer of Nova Scotia when I was Prime Minister of the province. I know that he is an intelligent and capable young man. He is employed as an assistant engineer in Nova Scotia. I have never heard a question raised throughout the province of Nova Scotia as to the way in which he discharged his duties. That he would permit a dollar to be wasted on any public work under his control, I do not for a moment believe. I must decline to accept my hon. friend's statement. And, in justice to Mr. Locke, I protest against the idea that because some unknown correspondent raises the question whether money is wasted or not, we are to assume that there has been anything of that kind. I challenge the fullest investigation before the Public Accounts Committee as to the expenditure on all these works. In several instances it may be said that the works are not useful, but that is because the works have not been completed as it is intended to be. Every work has been designed to meet the wishes of the people, has been constructed in response to petition sent in, and after proper inquiry by an engineer representing the department. And I state in the fullest and most fearless manner that an investigation, if necessary, will prove that these statements are correct.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I venture to say that the question whether Mr. Locke is a good engineer or not has not much to do with the question before the committee. I was not making an attack on Mr. Locke's capability in respect to other matters. But I say that I have information from two sources—not from sources such as the hon. minister suggests, but from people who have no interest in public works——

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Give the names.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They are not interested in public contracts at all, and one of them is a gentleman who is a political friend and supporter of the hon. minister. I have the authority of that gentleman for saying that the statements I have made are correct. I have given the hon. gentleman the information exactly as it was given to me by him. It does not make the slightest difference what the name of this gentleman may be—the question is whether the statements are true or not. That is it, the point we want to come to. But my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Fielding) desires to shunt this discussion to the question whether or not I am to give the name. I am not going to give the name, because it was given to me in confidence. But I am going to ask the Minister of Public Works to give information before this estimate goes through. And I will not wait for the Public Accounts Committee, as I want the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) to understand. I want information as to the harbour at Black Point, and I want to know whether it is true that the bottom of the lake proved to be above tide water and whether or not the expenditure of a large sum of public money proved to be a mere humbug.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. What money ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The money expended to cut a canal from the lake to tide water.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. How much ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is what I want to know. I do not carry the public accounts in my head. But we have ministers who are here to give us the information, and we will see that they give it. I wish information also concerning the expenditure at Gunning wharf. I wish to know how much that work has cost and also whether it is true, as I have been informed, that this work was of so little use that no public road has been opened to it from the highway near by. Then I desire information concerning the work at Port Mouton—how much that work has cost, and also whether a considerable portion of the work was washed up on the beach the first winter. Then I wish to know how much was expended on Clarke's Harbour. The hon. gentleman says there was no sum of $10,000 expended.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. On any one work.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I wish to know how much has been expended on Clarke's Harbour, how much will be needed to complete it and of what public use it is at the present time. I wish the same information with regard to a harbour I did not mention, Wood's harbour. There is also the breakwater at Port la Tour. If the hon. Minister of Public Works will give us the facts in regard to these various expenditures, it will assist us in judging whether the statements which are freely made in the province of Nova Scotia with regard to these expenditures are correct or not. If they are correct, it is right that we should have the opportunity of criticising them. If they are not correct, it is right that public opinion should be assured on these points. Therefore, I trust that the Minister of Public Works will not find it inconvenient or burdensome, in putting through his estimates, to look into these matters which I have thought it my duty to bring to the attention of the House and to give us the information, so that we may know whether the statements made to me, made in good faith, I am convinced and by a man whose reputation in the province of Nova Scotia is as good as that of any member of this House, bar none, are true or not. If they are not true, I want to know in what particular they are inaccurate.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My officers are taking note of every place that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has referred to and the information concerning these points will be brought down with pleasure. My hon. friend is mistaken in one point, at any rate, when he says that $10,000 have been spent at Clarke's Harbour. That is a large fishing place. I undersand that the fishing industry in 1900 was worth in the vicinity of $450,000. We have spent to improve the harbour in that place the very moderate amount of $6,788, certainly there can be no great waste of public money there. As to that famous Black Point work, my officers do not know anything about it, it must be some other name, as it is certainly not in the estimates. But we will find it somewhere. Let me remind my hon. friend that the coast of Nova Scotia is, so to speak, a fishing coast. I have taken a deep interest in that coast, because I have been around it and have seen the fishermen at their arduous and interesting work. I say it is the duty of any government to take good care of those fishermen, they are one of the most important elements of the country. I invite my hon. friend not to listen to the jealous complaints of people who may not always be pleased with the public works that are being done. I know well how these complaints arise. Suppose you have in the estimates $2,000 for a harbour at Black Point. Well, there are people who live in the eastern portion of Black Point and others who live in the western portion. The eastern people would like to have the work there, and the western people would like to have it on their end, and the consequence is that somebody must be disappointed and displeased. I am free to admit that the works carried on in the maritime provinces are of a most difficult nature. We are working on the Atlantic ocean where the waves are very powerful, more powerful than any minister that I know. Works that are designed with the greatest care are destroyed. It may happen that one of these works has been damaged; it happens every day. I can assure my hon. friend that my staff of engineers in Nova Scotia is one of the best in my employ. Mr. Dodwell is a good, careful man, a capable, painstaking engineer. He has under him as one of the staff, Mr. Locke, who is also a very careful and capable man. While he may have made mistakes, it has not come to my knowledge that he has made any. Any how, I will be glad to bring down any information asked by my hon. friend. My hon. friend is perfectly within his rights in asking for that information, and my officers have taken note of every place in regard to which he wishes to be informed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The leader of the opposition is entitled to every possible information, though it may be a question whether this is the proper form of getting it, when it refers to works that are not under consideration, and for which no appropriation is asked. But we will not stand on that. I do not agree with my hon. friend that it is of no consequence who writes a letter. He says it is of no consequence who writes this letter, that it is only the statements with which we have to do. Well, testimony of every kind is to be considered with some regard to the person who testifies, and if the hon. gentleman brings forward statements here that works have been mismanaged and constructed where they have no value, works some of which are washed away by the first storm, it is of immense importance to know who makes this statement if we are asked to pass judgment upon it before we get any information. My hon. friend properly says he has no knowledge, and therefore he makes no statement on his own responsibility, and he does not give us any information. I say that until the information is obtained, until somebody is in a position to make a statement, it is not fair for my hon. friend to pass judgment on this matter and to say that a wrong has been done. He wants to know among other things whether some of the works have been washed away. I have no doubt it may be found that some parts of these works have been washed away. It happens that upon the Atlantic coast every great storm does some damage to our public works. I am constantly receiving letters from my constituents telling me that a certain work is damaged by the storm, and they hope repairs will be made. Does that prove that the work is useless, or that the engineer was incapable ? Nothing of the sort. I remember one case in the city of Halifax where a structure built by the late government was washed away because they failed to keep trains on it to steady it; an expensive bridge across the narrows was washed away in the storm. In every great storm we have on the Atlantic coast some damage is done to some public work. But the fact that damage has been done does not prove that the work was useless. It doest not even prove that the engineer failed in his duty in constructing the work.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Minister of Public Works suggested that I should have consideration for fishermen on the coast. It is because I have consideration for these fishermen, and regard for them, that I do not want to see public money upon that coast expended in such a manner that it is of no use to them. These men along the coast can only expect a certain amount of public money to be expended for their relief, and if the large sums of money which are voted for that purpose are expended in such a way as to be of no use to them, the fishermen are the very persons who have a right to complain.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If they do complain. Let us know who complains.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Therefore, I submit we are entitled for that reason to have the exact information which I have asked for from the Minister of Public Works. As to what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has said with regard to quoting names,

I still adhere to the opinion that if the information is given to me by a person in whose credibility I have a right to rely, that entirely justifies me in giving it to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, when the proper item is up for discussion, and to ask for information as to whether the statement made to me is correct. That is all I have done to-day.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may add that we have received no complaint from those Black Point people. We will find where that place is.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is said to be near Lockeport.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The only complaint I have heard with reference to public works done in that region, was in the case of one piece of work, though I cannot exactly mention the locality. But I remember in one case where work was done on a sandy beach, and it did not stand a storm that came along. But no one said it could have been done in a different way. It was a small expenditure, a few hundred dollars. With that exception I never heard a complaint of that character in the whole two counties during the five or six years I have represented them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I move that that item be changed to read as follows : 'Little Harbour breakwater, opposite Arnold's Point.'

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Borden) says it is near Lockeport. I think he is mistaken. This is a place between Shelburne and Lockeport, a fishing settlement of thirty or forty families. The engineer has found it more correct to say opposite Arnold's Point.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Arnold's Point is situated on the south-east extremity of Black Point, about 8 miles to the east of Brockport.

Item as amended, agreed to.

Boularderie Centre—wharf, $2,500.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How much will this cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The amount of the contract is $4,850.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the necessity for this expenditure ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It has been asked for by the people of the county of Victoria in the fishing interests. Boularderie is in Victoria county, on the northern side of Boularderie Island, about 8 miles west of the Atlantic and 10 miles to the east of the entrance of Little Bras d'Or lake.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What will be the total expenditure ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $4,850. It is under contract now.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Perhaps the hon. member for Victoria (Hon. Mr. Ross) has some personal knowledge in regard to this. It does not seem a sufficient reason that the people simply petition for it. If there is any commercial reason on account of which this wharf should be built we would like to have it.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) That work is under contract, and will be finished about the end of June. There is a steamer running up and down tri-weekly through the Bras d'Or lakes, and this is a central place to bring the produce of the people to be shipped by the steamer to the markets in Sydney. This wharf is, therefore, for the accommodation of the farming community.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). On Boularderie Island ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) In the central part of Boularderie Island.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The work was applied for in 1899 by Mr. Murray, the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, and a petition was received numerously signed representing that there were pretty large commercial interests at stake. The government authorized me to go on with the work last year. The vote I am applying for this year is only to supplement the vote made by parliament formerly.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Have you a report from any of the officers of your department as to the necessity of the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, before going on with work of this kind, we always have a survey made.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Not a survey, but a report as to the cost of the work, or a report as to whether the work is necessary or not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is a question of policy. The question of necessity is not a question to be decided upon by any public officer. The government are responsible as to the policy of carrying out public works. As to the cost we have in every case a survey made and a report.

Mr. KAULBACH. I would like to ask the hon. minister whether this wharf is completed ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The work is not completed yet.

Mr. KAULBACH. And there is no revenue from it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It will be completed June 30th.

Mr. KAULBACH. Is it intended that tolls shall be collected from the parties who are using the wharf ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As soon as the wharf is completed I transfer it to the Department of Marine and Fisheries and then the law is applied.

Mr. KAULBACH. I know of a number of works that are not giving any revenue at all to the country, and I merely asked the question in order that I might ascertain as to whether a work of this kind, which appears to be important, will give a revenue to the country or not.

Burlington—wharf, $3,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the explanation as to this vote ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Burlington, Hants county is, according to the note which I have placed in my hand, a prosperous farming settlement of 500 people, situated on the River Avon, about half way between Windsor on the south and Summerville on the north. That work was authorized to go on last year. I am asking this year for a revote of $2,000 and a new vote of $1,500 to complete the work. There have been petitions, of course, asking for this vote.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the hon. minister not have any system or principle to go upon in building these wharfs ? I can name him twenty-five places in my own county where they would be very glad to have a wharf built, if there was any money available for the purpose, but I do not know that I would like to press, myself, for this expenditure in these places, because it might not perhaps be in the public interest that the money should be so expended. Is there any principle or system upon which the hon. gentleman goes in making these appropriations and building these wharfs ? Does he build a wharf at any place where a majority of the people send in a petition asking that a wharf shall be built ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Then what is the principle upon which he does go ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A Minister of Public Works receives a great many petitions and if he were willing to grant every one of them, he would have a great deal more trouble than he has now in putting his estimates through. But, my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax), when he has been a minister—it will come some of these days—will know all about it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am anxious to know all about it now.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am just going on to say that to him also. We receive petitions, bundles of them, and they are discussed before council. In every government the different provinces are represented by ministers, men who have the confidence of the people for the time being. The works that are deemed worthy of being granted are granted ; that is all. We discuss the position, we have the information and I supply reports. My duty is to supply reports on surveys, and so on. When I have supplied all the information to my colleagues as to the cost of different public works we grant those works that seem to be the most meritorious. It is a good principle. I do not see what else we could do.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). A very broad and general principle.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, we are men of broad principle. I do not deny that at all.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the hon. minister might do better by giving the reason that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) has given. It is for the purpose of remedying injustices which have been perpetrated on these constituencies by former governments.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have done that at times, and at other times, we have simply administered justice.

Cheticamp Point—wharf, $11,500.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That work is going to be given by contract and it is a very important work.

Cow Bay (Port Morien)—Repairs to breakwater, $10,000.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the total amount expended upon that work. It must be very large.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $221,000 has been spent in the past on that breakwater. Of course it was mostly expended by the former government. When we took office this work was destroyed to a large extent and we are rebuilding it. I am glad to say that there is a revival of the coal industry there and we are carrying on this work to help the trade at that port.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the volume of trade carried on there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There was a coal mine there which was closed and it is being opened up again by a powerful company. When I was there every house was closed up, but I am glad to say that there is a large trade in view now.

Mr. KAULBACH. What amount, is it expected, will be required to complete the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It depends on the part of the work we will rebuild, and on the trade that will develop. This year we will not spend of course more than we are asking for. I have visited the work myself and it can be attended to day by day.

Mr. KENDALL. This breakwater is being built in order to afford necessary protection to the colliery works, and it will certainly require an expenditure of from $50,000 to $75,000 to finish it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the new company ?

Mr. KENDALL. It is an English company, the Newcastle Coal Company.

Mr. KAULBACH. How much does the coal company contribute to the construction of this work. We are told that it is for their benefit and I think they should contribute a large proportion of the cost.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) The breakwater belongs to the government.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It would be the first time companies would be asked to build wharfs.

Mr. MACLEAN. We build our own wharfs in the west.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Does the hon. gentleman say that they build all their own breakwaters in Ontario?

Mr. MACLEAN. The minister spoke of wharfs, not breakwaters.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, we will come to the Ontario items soon, and you will see some large sums voted for that province.

Mr. KENDALL. I may say that this breakwater in Port Morien affords the only place of shelter for vessels all the way from Louisburg to Sydney, a distance of fifty miles, and there is a very large coasting trade in that locality.

Drumhead Breakwater, $2,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where is Drumhead ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Drumhead is in the thriving county of Guysborough so ably represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Fraser).

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What will be the whole expenditure ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is estimated at $7,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the particular purpose of it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is to help the fishermen in their trade. These fishermen are carrying out a very useful and very difficult trade. I did not know much about that trade until I went there, and when I saw twenty boats in a storm not having a harbour, I thought that a few thousand dollars from the government was well invested in protecting the lives and the property and the trade of these men.

Friar's Head boat harbour, $600.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where is Friar's Head ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In Inverness. The total cost is estimated at $2,500.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What do you mean by boat harbour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is just precisely a boat harbour to protect the boats of the fishermen.

Mr. McLENNAN (Inverness). I might explain something with regard to this locality. This is a small harbour formed by a long ledge of rock jutting out in the sea, and at a certain angle with the coast, there is a gap in this ledge which lets the action of the sea in on this small harbour. It is to fill in this gap with cement and stone that this small sum of money is required and the work is being carried on successfully.

Herring Cove Breakwater, $1,500.

Mr. KAULBACH. Where is Herring Cove ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is in the county of Halifax, represented by the hon. leader of the opposition and by another gentleman.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am glad that we have reached Halifax county at last.

Iona wharf, $6,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the commercial purpose to be served by this work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contract price is $7,840, and the contract is expected to expire on the 30th of June, 1902.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there a steamer service ?

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) Yes. When the draw on the Grand Narrows cannot be opened, this work is required so that the mails can be conveyed daily. At present the steamer has sometimes to return to Baddeck, because it is impossible to open the draw bridge.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Harbours and rivers, Nova Scotia—Larry's river—breakwater, $2,000.

Mr. SPROULE. In all these items there is evidence of a practice which has grown up of voting a sum of money year after year without it being spent. I have said before, and I repeat, that I do not think it is a proper practice to continue voting money without a serious intention of spending it. If it is needed and we vote it, it ought to be spent. If it is not needed, this House should not be called on to vote it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On several occasions votes have been placed in the estimates without the department having full information as to the cost of the work to be carried out ; and I must say that that is so in this case.

Mr. SPROULE. Why should it be so ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is a little difficult to say why, to be frank. Petitions are put in asking for works, and then a certain amount is placed in the estimates. Any man who has passed through the Department of Public Works knows that we have so many works that it is quite impossible to have surveys in every case, and I do not like to start a work without having full information with regard to it.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister's explanation is the very strongest argument for my contention. This House should not be asked to vote money, nor should the government put an item in the estimates unless it is done upon intelligent grounds, that is, with a comprehensive knowledge of the locality and its needs, and what expenditure is requisite to give the people the convenience or the accommodation they require. That should always be available before the government asks the House to vote money. Another feature of the case which I have in view is this, that it seems to be too much the custom of the government to put items in the estimates for works in places where no work has been done, and for no better reason, so far as we can learn, than the fact that an application has been made by the member or by the people in the locality ; and then the minister states as a reason why the money is not spent, that he has not adequate knowledge of the locality to justify the expenditure, and he is withholding it until sufficient knowledge is obtained by means of preliminary surveys. I maintain that these preliminary surveys should be made before the money is voted, and then the minister could give the House the information which would justify the voting of the money. When that information is not available, it is a bad practice to put the items in the estimates year after year, because they are too often used as corrupting agencies in the hands of the government when elections are being carried on. I do not apprehend there is any likelihood of that taking place in this case ; but when we see the large number of items of this kind that come down year after year, we are reminded of what use has been made of them in the past, and may be made of them in the future.

Mr. SPROULE.

Mr. FRASER. A word of explanation may be necessary. The engineer went down to this place last year and made certain investigations. Last fall there came a very heavy storm, and the engineer has not been able to make the additional survey that may be necessary ; but I saw him before I left home, and he said that by the spring that investigation might be made. The people are in very great need, and when this investigation is made, it may be necessary to spend the money.

Lingan, N.S.—Beach protection, $600.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is to complete the work.

Little Bras D'Or, N.S.—wharf, $2,500.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is under contract.

Livingstone's Cove, N.S.—to complete wharf, $1,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is in Antigonish and under contract.

Lower Cove, N.S.—breakwater, $3,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is in Cumberland county, on the Bay of Fundy side.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the object of the breakwater ?

Mr. LOGAN. The Atlantic Stone company is developing a big quarry there, and this breakwater is intended to protect the schooners while loading stone.

Minudie, N.S.—wharf, $3,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is in Cumberland county.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What is the necessity of a wharf here ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. To provide the accommodation required by a large population engaged in farming and fishing. They have to drive five miles to market, and this is intended to shorten the distance.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). They will carry their farm produce by water ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly, there are boats and a ferry.

Neil's Harbour—breakwater, $14,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is in Victoria county and under contract.

New Harbour breakwater—repairs, protection slopes, &c., $6,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Last year there was an expenditure of $17,470 on this breakwater, according to the Public Works Report, and the government is now asking for $6,000 more. Two years ago, so unimportant was this harbour that its location was entirely unknown, either to the Minister of Public Works or the hon. member representing the county, and it seems to me very strange that such a large amount should be expended on a place entirely unknown to those who live in that section of the country I think I am not mistaken when I say that up to the 30th June last there was expended, either on the harbour or the breakwater, $17,470. That seems a lot of money to spend at a place which was entirely unknown two years ago, or so little known that we could not get any information as to what part of the country it was in.

Mr. FRASER. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman would wilfully state what is not correct, namely, that the member representing the county did not know where that breakwater was.

Mr. HENDERSON. He could not tell us and he was in his place.

Mr. FRASER. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the 'Hansard,' he will find that when the discussion began I was not in, but that I came in afterwards and explained where the place was. When the vote was first asked for, there was not in the department as much information as I have, but that is easily explained. It was a place where the fishermen had to go ten miles on the one side and seven on the other, with their boats, before they could find shelter if there was a storm, and the work would not have cost so much only for a violent storm which interfered with the top part—the most severe storm, with one exception we have had in Nova Scotia within my recollection. This work has been of great benefit to the fishermen, not only at New Harbour, but on both sides, and when completed will enable them to carry on their fishing industry as they never could do it before. As to the knowledge of the locality, one can very well understand that there might not be much information in the department about a fishing village on the coast of Nova Scotia. But the place is well known in our part of the county as one of the best sections in the county.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for his correction, but I think that perhaps my recollection of the matter is quite as clear as his, and I think it will be in the recollection of the Minister of Public Works that when I drew his attention to this harbour a year ago, the minister rose in his place and exclaimed: We have found it. Now, if it had not been lost, there would have been no occasion for the minister to inform us that he had found it. He well remembered the difficulty he had in trying to locate the harbour the previous year and was glad to announce that he had succeeded in finding it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We had some little doubt about this place a couple of years ago. I must admit that it was difficult for us that night to put our finger on the very point where New Harbour was located. The coast of Nova Scotia is very wide and long and my colleague and myself had some trouble before we could lay our finger on that spot, but we found it easily after the money was voted and spent.

Parker's Cove, N.S.—extension of pier, $4,700.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is in Annapolis county.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why do you want the pier extended?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Because the people complained that they had not sufficient accommodation and insisted on having more.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What part of the county is it in?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is in the Bay of Fundy.

Mr. INGRAM. In the items respecting different breakwaters I find a charge for the wages of a 'conductor' and immediately following for a 'foreman.' What are the duties of a conductor engaged on these works?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Generally we have only one man employed, except where the work is large or there are two kinds of work calling for the services of different men. In some cases the foreman must remain to actually supervise the work, while it was necessary to have another man outside to buy the material. Whether they are called conductors or foremen makes no difference.

Mr. INGRAM. The men who are entered as conductors appeared to have received larger wages than the foremen. Here are conductors whose wages are $3.50 or $2.50 a day, while the foremen are paid $2.50 a day.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. To what works does the hon. member (Mr. Ingram) refer?

Mr. INGRAM. Porter's lake, Nova Scotia, dredging and breakwater, referred to at page V—160 of the Auditor General's Report.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer explains to me that on that work there was cribbing to be carried on and also hand dredging—two different works altogether. That explains the employment of two men.

Mr. CLARKE. Are wages paid to these foremen fixed by the fair wages officer?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. CLARKE. He does not go down that far ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, he has been in that region.

Mr. CLARKE. But he does not fix the wages scale ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On small works that has not been done yet. But there would be no objection.

Harbours and rivers—Nova Scotia—Port George —breakwater, $2,300.

Mr. KAULBACH. I observe quite a number of estimates for different counties in Nova Scotia. Annapolis appears not to have been overlooked. Neither have Richmond, Guysboro, Victoria, Inverness, and other counties. The two counties west and adjoining Lunenburg, not excepted, or in other words all are included on the roll for benefits. But I am afraid that the Minister of Public Works has forgotten the most important part of the entire coast. He says he is very desirous of forwarding the interests of the fishermen. I wish to inform him that there is a county west of Halifax that is greatly in need of protection ; and, as he is a protectionist in other counties I hope he will be a protectionist in this one also. I refer to the county I have the honour to represent, Lunenburg. I wish my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tarte) to be informed on this subject, and I will take the trouble to give him any information possible. I may tell him that there is a long stretch of coast in St. Margaret's Bay where, for twelve or fifteen miles, there is almost a continuous town, house almost against house for that entire distance, with an immense population. I have been asking for a number of years for a breakwater for Mill Cove, St. Margaret's Bay. The property of the fishermen there is in jeopardy every time there is a storm. They have to fish in large boats ; smaller boats would not do because they are exposed to the open ocean. The breakwater would not only afford protection to the fishermen and their products, but it would also be a protection to larger boats coming there for a harbour of safety. I referred this afternoon to Cow Bay. As that is a place that has a large coal interest, and as that interest would be served very considerably, it should contribute to a structure of the kind that was referred to this afternoon. True, it is a harbour of safety for fishermen as well, that is, for fishing vessels. But there are very few that frequent that harbour or use that breakwater or that public wharf, as it may be called, except for the shipment of coal. For that reason, I think it is well worthy the government to ascertain for themselves whether it would not be advisable to call upon the coal interests there or those who have capital in the mines to contribute to that public work. Or, I would not object if the government went further and allowed every vessel going there and getting a cargo of coal to contribute to the revenue by the collection of a certain fee as a port charge. In that way, the exchequer would not be called upon for a very large amount of money. At all events, the fees would pay for keeping up the repairs and other incidental charges that might be occasioned, and thereby relieve the exchequer considerably of a large expenditure. Now, I would ask the minister if he will not take into consideration this important county of Lunenburg and contribute from the exchequer an amount sufficient to put a breakwater at Mill Cove. It is a structure that is much needed. If the hon. gentleman will make inquiries he will find that there is no structure on the coast from Cape North to Cape Sable that is more necessary than this that I refer to. As I have said, it is not only necessary to the safety of the poor fishermen and their property, but also to the safety of vessels going into that bay when, from stress of weather they are prevented from going farther.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think the department has received any petition from Mill Cove so far. I think it is the first time my attention has been drawn to the matter. But I will look into it.

Mr. KAULBACH. Does the hon. minister mean to say that I never made a request for this work to the Department of Public Works ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not remember having received any petition.

Mr. KAULBACH. Petition. They have too much confidence in me to think of sending in a petition.

Mr. TOLMIE. And you forgot.

Mr. KAULBACH. The hon. minister forgets that I am the medium through which all these deals should be made, and it was made by me of his department on repeated occasions.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend is not a bad medium, at the same time, if his constituents feel as keenly as he seems to do about it, I would advise him to get them to send a petition, and it will be carefully considered.

Mr. KAULBACH. If the minister will look through the archives of his department he will see a very long petition signed by nearly every fisherman of the place.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When was that petition signed ?

Mr. KAULBACH. I would not like to say.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would like to know.

Mr. KAULBACH. I would not like to name the particular time I made the appeals of his department.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think it was about ten years ago. I would like to know just now when it was sent.

Mr. KAULBACH. According to the hon. gentleman's own words, there is all the more need for his work being performed now. During the time I represented the county when the other government was in power, I got a very fair proportion of benefits for that country. But this proposed 'Mill Cove' breakwater is greatly needed, and was promised to me before the old government went out of power. Now, I think those works should be carried on according to a certain principle, and I would not like to be too severe upon the hon. gentleman and say that he is making an exception against me in this particular instance. but I will express the hope the hon. gentleman will recognize my appeal in the early future and grant my request.

Washabuck Centre--wharf, $5,500.

Mr. BELL. As this is the last item under the head of harbours and rivers, I would like to call the attention of the minister to the necessity for some work on the wharfs at Pictou island, in Pictou county. During last session I called the attention of the minister to this matter on two occasions, and I understood from him at that time that the matter had been also brought to his attention by other persons. During the recess I wrote him twice, the last time in the fall, and he then promised me that out of the general vote for the lower provinces the necessary work would be done, and that he would send down an engineer and examine it. As I am informed, the wharfs there, which have cost some thousands of dollars, are in such a position that a severe storm would completely destroy them, which would involve an expenditure by the department over which the hon. gentleman presides of some thousands of dollars to replace them, as they must be provided. The wharf in question is situated on an island with a population of about 100 people, who have no other means of communication with the mainland than by their boats, and they must have a wharf in order to enable them to land. I would like the minister to make a note of this matter, and take care to preserve the works from destruction.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I may say that I have authorized an expenditure, if my officers remember right, of $800 for the work to which my hon. friend refers. Mr. Millidge, our engineer, has been authorized to go on with that work. The chief engineer informs me that instructions have been issued to him to procure all the materials that are required, and the work will be done before the 1st of July.

P. E. I.—harbours and rivers—Canoe Cove, breakwater, $1,500.

Mr. KEMP. Last session when the estimates were under consideration for Prince Edward Island, the matter was brought to the attention of the House concerning a tax levied by Prince Edward Island on persons from other provinces who desired to do business there. The matter was very earnestly considered, and I have only to refer to the remarks which fell from some hon. members opposite to show the importance they attached to it. The member for Victoria said :

Hon. WM. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.). I entirely endorse the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Kemp). I believe that there should be no restriction of any kind on trade between one part of the Dominion and another. We who profess to lean towards free trade ought to feel ashamed that there should be a province in the Dominion which would levy a mean tax of this kind. It is not to the credit of Prince Edward Island, that dear little island, that such a tax should exist. I believe that if a proper appeal were made to the proper legislature, they would take steps to have it repealed, because it is a tax that should never have existed and the sooner it is wiped out of existence the better.

The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) said :

Hon. members have spoken of the tax on commercial travellers in Prince Edward Island. I am as much opposed to that tax as any hon. gentleman present. I think it is about as small a piece of legislation as one can imagine, and I am ashamed that a province, which lies next to my own, should pass such a measure. Perhaps the fact that the province of Prince Edward Island did not get what it was entitled to from this parliament created the necessity for this legislation, but that is the only defence that can be set up for it.

Then the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said :

I am not in a position to pronounce any judgment now one way or the other, but the matter is engaging the close attention of the hon. Minister of Justice.

Now I understand that this tax, although illegal and unconstitutional, still exists, though it is within the power of this government to render it ineffective. Suppose the province of Ontario should undertake to enforce a tax of that kind upon those of other provinces, which, according to the amount of business to be done would amount to about $500, it would be almost impossible to enforce it without a regiment of soldiers. Yet this illegal tax has been allowed to exist, the government have not taken the necessary steps to cancel it. It is looked upon by commercial bodies throughout this country as a very obnoxious tax, and I would like to have the views of the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) upon it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am not asked, I suppose, to give my views as to the legislation in question, because I have not had occasion to look into it either at the time the legislation was passed or recently. All I can say about it is that in the ordinary course this legislation, after it was passed, came under the notice of the Governor in Council, and it was examined, as is customary, by officials of the Department of Justice and a report was made by the minister. After that report, the Council thought fit to allow the law to go into operation. But I think my hon. friend should bear in mind that while the law has been allowed to go into operation, it is still open to those interested to bring the matter before the courts. Of course, if the law is ultra vires, the powers of the provincial legislature has not gained anything by the lapse of a year in force or in strength and if the law is ultra vires the courts will pronounce upon that point and declare it to be so.

Mr. KEMP. I may say to the hon. Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) that the right hon. Prime Minister expressed himself thus in regard to bringing this before the courts :

> I will tell my hon. friend this contract is between the province of Prince Edward Island and the Dominion, and we can certainly interpret the contract ourselves and make an agreement upon it. There is no third party concerned. If there were a third party whose interests were affected we could not do it and we would have to go to the courts.

Mr. FARQUHARSON. Mr. Chairman, I know something of the Act referred to, and while perhaps it is not as popular as some other Acts, the legislature of Prince Edward Island thought proper to pass it some years ago. No tax is popular. They have collected that tax for a great many years. I take it that it must be constitutional of else some of the commercial men who are proclaiming against it from time to time would have wiped it out of existence long ago. However, it does not seriously affect the commercial men coming to Charlottetown or to other points in Prince Edward Island. I notice that we have about four hundred a year coming over there and paying in about $20 each, or about $8,000 in all. It may be we should raise the money in some other way, but we have not thought proper to do so, and the tax still remains, and so far as I can see, is likely to remain. I do not know that I can say anything further. The hon. Minister of Justice has spoken and it is open to those who object to say whether or not it is unconstitutional, and if it be so to have it wiped off the statute-book later on.

Mr. HACKETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in connection with this matter, that I think the imposition of this tax on commercial travellers is a disgrace to the province of Prince Edward Island. We desire to trade with the other provinces. We were satisfied when we entered into confederation that we could sell our products in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec or Ontario, without having any tax imposed upon us, and I therefore say that it is extremely wrong that because these commercial travellers come down from the upper provinces to sell their goods in Prince Edward Island they should be taxed for the purpose of raising a revenue for that province. I say it is entirely wrong and from the beginning, although the hon. gentleman (Mr. Farquharson) who has just spoken, is responsible in a large degree for the imposition of this tax, I have believed that it was unconstitutional. I do not think we can place a bar between provinces, one trading with the other. I think it is wrong and unconstitutional and I hope that the hon. Minister of Justice will, in the decision he is about to bring down, show that this tax on commercial travellers is an unconstitutional and wrong tax.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think the statement that the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) so emphatically made that this Act is illegal is probably too strong. The propriety of the Act is one thing, its legality is another thing, and this is just one of those questions upon which prominent lawyers have entertained differences of opinion. Whether the tax comes within the section of the British North America Act respecting taxation, or whether it is an interference with trade and commerce, is just one of those questions on which you might get a very distinguished lawyer from Toronto or Montreal to give you an opinion on either side, and one would have just as much chance of being right as the other. I am not justifying the tax upon its merits, but very distinguished members of the legal profession have held that the Act is entirely legal. That will ultimately have to be determined by the courts. I merely state that there are these two divergent opinions in regard to it.

Mr. CLARKE. Has the Justice Department here given any opinion ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The Act has been allowed to go into operation. It has been deemed inexpedient to disallow it. Similar Acts I think have been in force in other provinces.

Mr. HACKETT. Is the work going on at Canoe Cove ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, it is going on now, and it will be completed in a short time. The vote for which we are now asking will complete the work.

Mr. HACKETT. Is it being done by contract or day labour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Tenders were asked and we received only one, but it was so high that we could not accept it and we went on by day labour, doing the work at a much cheaper rate. The work will be completed out of the vote that we are applying for now.

Mr. HACKETT. In how many papers did the hon. Minister of Public Works publish an advertisement calling for tenders ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say offhand, but we advertised in the usual way, in the papers we usually advertise in in the maritime provinces. I will give my hon. friend later on, if he wishes it, the names of the papers.

Mr. HACKETT. It is a most unusual thing in the province of Prince Edward Island, when you call for tenders for a public work, that you can only receive one tender, and I think that the hon. minister ought to be able to state how many papers he placed the advertisement in and during what time the notice was inserted in these papers. I see by looking in the Auditor General's Report that it cost $100 for this advertising, and I am confident that if the hon. gentleman had advertised in Prince Edward Island and made it known that this work was in contemplation, he would have received more than one tender. Under these circumstances the hon. gentleman ought to state all the facts in connection with this advertising.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no doubt that we advertised in the usual way.

Mr. FARQUHARSON. I can justify the hon. Minister of Public Works in regard to the Canoe Cove Breakwater. He advertised twice and I saw the only tender that came in. It was unreasonably high. The work is being done by day's labour, and it is being done with great care. I think the work is necessary and that later on it will prove to be useful. I am sorry that the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Hackett) is rather opposed to it.

Mr. HACKETT. I fully agree with the last suggestion in connection with the necessity of the work. It is a very necessary work. I know the locality very well, and I know the work is a very necessary one, but what I complain of is that the contractors of Prince Edward Island did not have a fair opportunity of tendering for this work. When the election was pending and when the hon. gentleman who formerly represented West Queen's, was about to be elevated to the Supreme Court bench, it was known that a vacancy would occur and the hon. gentleman who now represents that riding (Mr. Farquharson) has been using that work for the purpose of gaining support and carrying his election.

Cascumpec Harbour—closing opening through beach, $2,000.

Mr. HACKETT. What progress has been made in regard to this work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This work is located in the riding of my hon. friend (Mr. Hackett).

Mr. FRASER. That is throwing money away.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, no; only that the work, I am very much afraid, will involve a large expenditure of money. We have spent a pretty large amount of money there. The total expenditure to December last was $17,561.19. Now the total estimated cost of the proposed work is $3,500. We want $1,500 more to complete the work. Instructions have been given to Mr. Egan to go on with the work, but as on some other occasions, he has not been able to do so. The work will be carried on in the ordinary way.

Mr. HACKETT. The minister has stated that $17,500 had been expended on Cascumpec harbour, but that is altogether apart from the present work. About three years ago, owing to freshets and high tides the sea broke through the sand hill separating Cascumpec bay from the gulf and allowed a great deal of water that should pass through the main channel to go through this inlet. It was necessary that the whole body of water should be concentrated on the main channel because the more water there is concentrated on a sand bar the better will become the channel. It was proposed three years ago in the estimates to take a vote to close up that inlet. That money has never been expended. At election time you will hear the Liberals standing on the platforms and saying that the government is spending a large sum of money for public works, but the people are humbugged. For three years this $2,000 have appeared in the estimates and not a dollar has been spent yet. Recently the Ottawa correspondent of the 'Charlottetown Patriot,' the government organ, telegraphed that $22,000 had been placed in the estimates for improving Cascumpec harbour. How is it that we have only $2,000 here now ? The Ottawa correspondent multiplied the vote by ten, and then added the $2,000 of the actual vote of last year, and so it was an easy thing for him to figure out the $22,000. What is the use of putting appropriations in the estimates unless you expend them. Do not endeavour to mislead the people like that. I trust that the minister will see that the $2,000 is now expended, and expended either under the supervision of a good foreman or let by open tender.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I find myself at times in very embarrassing positions. When I spend money my hon. friend (Mr. Hackett) reproaches me with spending too much, and when I do not spend money he is mad at me. I have always endeavoured to be prudent. When the vote was first placed in the estimates I admit that I had not all the information that was required, but I have the information now, and I can assure my hon. friend that the money will be judiciously expended. Does he object to the expenditure of that money ?

Mr. HACKETT. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If 'not at all' then let the vote pass. I want the vote to go through in order to spend the money in the hon. gentleman's county. I cannot be accused of being a partisan because I am spending the money in the county of my hon. friend (Mr. Hackett) and he is not a strong partisan of ours. I am doing the right thing by him and I hope he will do the right thing by me and not ask any more questions.

Mr. HACKETT. I do not find fault with the minister for expending this money because it is very necessary, but what I do complain of is that it should be put in the estimates and not expended.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, this time it will be expended.

Mr. HACKETT. All right.

Creosoted timber for general repairs to wharfs piers and breakwaters, $2,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Where is this creosote timber prepared ; I do not think it can be procured in this country.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very sorry that we are obliged to import this timber. We have contemplated for some time establishing a creosoting plant, but we have not done so. We may have been wrong in not doing so, but I would like to have an expression of opinion of the House on the subject.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What would it cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It would cost between $35,000 and $40,000.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The reason I am making the inquiry is that there has been a resolution passed recently by the Halifax Board of Trade suggesting that some encouragement might be given to the establishment of a plant for that purpose in one of the maritime provinces. I have not had an opportunity to investigate the subject at all, and I do not know if it would be practicable, but it is the opinion of some of these gentlemen who have considered the subject, that the government should see whether or not it would be in the interest of the country to give encouragement to such an establishment in Canada. Of course, I suppose it would depend very much on the cost of the plant which the minister says would be $35,000 or $40,000. These gentlemen seem to think they have facilities to do the work there, and it is a matter that should have the attention of the government. I know there is a great deal of this timber used in public works around the province of Nova Scotia. It is rendered necessary as I understand by the presence of worms in some of the harbours which destroy in a very few years timber that is not treated in this way ; whereas creosoted timber is impervious to the attacks of worms for a very considerable period. Could the hon. gentleman give us an idea of how much of this timber is used in the public works of Canada in the course of the year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is a great deal in what my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) says. The question has been discussed several times since I have been in office here. Timber of this kind to the value of about $70,000 is used in the Public Works Department. If we had a plant, more than timber would be used. For instance, creosoted railway ties last longer.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax. Is that quantity used by the Public Works Department alone ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There is some used in the construction of piles for railway bridges and possibly there is some used in the other departments of the government.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the minister could tell us how much of this timber is used altogether in the public service of Canada, it might be useful information to those gentlemen who propose to engage in this business.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say how much is used altogether. Speaking for myself, I think we should have an establishment of that kind. There is a large work at Cape Tormentine that has been destroyed because it has been built with timber that was not creosoted. It is a question of money again, but since the leader of the opposition has called my attention to the question, perhaps I will ask my colleagues to look more carefully into the matter when the supplementary estimates are discussed. It is a very important question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What these gentlemen had apparently in mind was the establishment of some such plant by private enterprise. What the minister seems to have in mind is the establishment of a plant under a department of the government. The advantage of doing it by way of private enterprise of course would be that a supply in that case would be available for private operations throughout the country. I suppose that more or less of this timber is used outside of the requirements of the government.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think so.

Mr. KENDALL. There is a considerable quantity used.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would suppose that people who construct wharfs and works of that kind in the maritime provinces would require some of it. Perhaps the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Mr. Kendall would know as to this.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If such a plant be established by private enterprise I would make it my duty to buy in Canada every piece of creosoted timber that we would want. I would only be too glad to do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear,

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) There is not a wharf or breakwater that has been built but that a large quantity of this timber is used. Perhaps the largest wharf in the Dominion is now being built at Sydney by the Nova Scotia Steel Company, and they have imported a whole steamer load of this timber, but it will not be sufficient for them. The only place that this pine can be prepared successfully in the Dominion of Canada, would be, I think, around Quebec, because I do not think that we have the quality and quantity of pine in Nova Scotia that would be sufficiently large for the requirements of timber prepared in this manner. I think the subject is well worthy of the consideration of the Minister of Public Works and the other members of the government as to whether we shall not prepare this timber in our own country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) It would not only be used by the government but by other people who are building wharfs and other works in connection with shipping.

Souris, Knight's Point—strengthening of breakwater, &c., $20,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Under contract.

Summerside Harbour—breakwater, $35,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Under contract ; the work going on.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works what progress is being made with this breakwater. I understood that it was to be completed last year, and I further understand that the plans are not workable, and that in consequence the contractors are having a great deal of difficulty in the construction of the breakwater. I would like to know what is being done, and when the breakwater is likely to be completed ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The plans are all right and workable. The contractors, Messrs. McDonald & Moffat, of Sydney, have not, however, made the progress we hoped they would make. They may be a little slow, but still I feel that they could carry on the work with more activity than they have displayed. We have notified them that they must go on with their work.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Have you any idea when this breakwater will be completed ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer tells me that if the contractors apply the energy they should apply, the work can be completed in one year. Now, these gentlemen must go on with their work. If they do not do so, we might have to have recourse to urgency measures. We might have to take the work from them.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I have in my hand a copy of a memorial, the original of which I understand has been sent to the Department of Public Works ; and copies, I believe, have also been sent to the other Prince Edward Island members. This memorial reads as follows :

To His Excellency the Governor General in Council :

The memorial of the undersigned committee, appointed at a meeting held at Cape Traverse, Prince Edward Island, on January 6th, 1902,

Respectfully showeth, that the meeting above mentioned was largely attended by influential and representative men of Prince and Queen's counties, and after full discussion unanimously adopted the following resolutions :

Moved by Dr. Dougherty, seconded by Major Clark, and resolved, that this meeting do hereby memorialize the Federal government to put a sufficient sum in the estimates of this coming session of parliament for the construction of a pier at some suitable place on the Cape Traverse side of the Straits of Northumberland so that terminal facilities may be had here for the navigation across the straits winter and summer.

Moved by Mr. H. Crockett, seconded by Capt. Thomas Howatt and resolved that parliament be petitioned at once to make provision for the construction of such extra pier work as will thoroughly equip and protect the Tormentine pier for all the purposes of winter and summer navigation.

Your memorialists were instructed by the meeting at which they were appointed to bring to your notice that Prince Edward Island has long suffered greatly from the want of daily steam communication with the mainland to which the island is entitled by the terms of union with Canada :

That the winter routes of communication between the island and mainland, from Georgetown to Pictou where the ss. 'Minto' is now plying, and from Summerside to Cape Tormentine where the 'Stanley' is now at work, have been frequently interrupted, sometimes for a week or more at a time, causing great inconvenience because of the detention of passengers, mails and freight ;

That hence it is especially desirable that another route for one of the winter steamers be tried, and your memorialists, and those for whom they speak, believe that the route from Cape Traverse, Prince Edward Island, to Cape

Tormentine, N. B., being but eight miles in length, and because at or near this place the floating ice separates at the turn of the tides, affords not only the shortest but the most convenient and practicable route for winter navigation between the island and the mainland ;

That because of the want of terminal facilities on the island side this route has never been tried by the government steamers in winter, and has been also left unused in summer, notwithstanding the large outlay made by the Dominion in constructing and improving the pier at Cape Tormentine, and in constructing the Cape Traverse Branch Railway, which important public works in no way fulfil the objects for which they were constructed ;

That, therefore, your memorialists urge upon your Excellency and your honourable council that a sufficient sum be granted to provide the required pier and terminal accommodation on the Cape Traverse side of the straits and for such further improvements at Cape Tormentine as will enable navigation to be opened and continued by this route winter and summer, and as a highway for interprovincial communication.

And as in duty bound your memorialists will ever pray.

EPHRAIM BELL,
DONALD MATHESON.
F. SCHOEFER,
Committee.
W. W. DOUGHERTY,
Secretary.

This document, I believe, was accompanied by a largely signed petition—some 800 signatures, including the names of some of the most influential men in Queen's and Prince counties. The petitioners state that as the Cape Traverse branch of the Prince Edward Island Railway runs through a populous country and serves a prosperous people, the purposes of the railway are to a great extent nullified by the fact that there are no terminal facilities. It is true, a wharf was built at Cape Traverse at considerable expense ; but unfortunately it was put at the wrong place, and for the last few years practically no work has been done on it, except for a week or so before the last election, and the work was stopped a day after the election. However, the best authorities there are of opinion that a suitable place for the construction of a wharf can be had near Cape Traverse, along by Carleton Point, and this petition asks that the minister place a sufficient sum in the supplementary estimates to guarantee this work going on. I think that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries understands that this is the most natural route for steamers in both winter and summer, because they have not the difficulties to overcome that are encountered in going to Georgetown. The distance across the channel to Cape Tormentine is only 8 miles ; but from the nature of the ice on the New Brunswick side, it is almost impossible for a steamer to land, especially in the condition in which the pier is now. The idea of the petitioners is that a suitable wharf should be built at Cape Traverse, for both summer and winter navigation, and that a fery should be established there. A great deal of produce has to be brought down the line to Charlottetown or Summerside to be shipped across, and if the facilities were provided which were contemplated when the Cape Traverse branch was built, there would be a vast improvement in the trade of that section. The minister has no doubt received and considered this memorial, and I would like to have some word from him as to what he intends to do about granting the prayer of this petition by placing a vote in the supplementary estimates.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is asking me, if I understand him correctly, to place in the supplementary estimates an amount of money to provide accommodation at Cape Traverse, I remember receiving a petition to that effect. My hon. friend has spoken of elections. It is very seldom that we do not hear that word elections in connection with any work on Prince Edward Island. What are the facts ? Under the late administration there was about $275,000 spent at Cape Tormentine. That is a large amount of money. The work was built with improper materials, and with timber which was not creosoted. Twelve months after the work was completed it was destroyed. I suppose it was not an election work ; it was not a very good work, at any rate. At Cape Traverse there was another work built under the late regime. I do not recriminate ; I simply state the facts. There has been about $40,000 spent at Cape Traverse on a wharf which my hon. friend has just said was badly located. Now he wants me to put in the supplementary estimates an amount of money to provide accommodation elsewhere. I would like very much to have his views as to the location of the works in the maritime provinces.

I am informed that the steamer 'Stanley' has been trying to do the service during the whole winter of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, but has not worked very well. This very work at Summerside, on which we have embarked, is intended to provide accommodation for that winter service. We are doing our best, and cannot experiment in two or three places at the same time. We cannot carry out experimental work right and left in that way. I would be very glad to do all I can for that interesting island, but we have to spend a pretty large amount on that winter service, and must know exactly where we are before incuring further expenditure.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Two wrongs do not make a right, and the fact that mistakes have been made——

Mr. FARQUHARSON. Hon. members perhaps do not quite understand how the island is situated with regard to this matter. We are separated from the Nova Scotia shore by about eight miles of water. On the Cape Tormentine side a large amount of money has been spent, and it will be necessary to spend more money to complete the work there. On the Cape Traverse side little or nothing has been done. There is no ferry at this crossing but railways on either side and at either terminus. To go to the capital by water from Pictou over the route now followed, or from Cape Tormentine, is a distance of forty or forty-five miles, and the hon. minister will understand how willing we are to have that reduced to eight miles. Many people, especially tourists, do not want to cross so much water, as the crossing is very rough particularly in the fall, and we are anxious to have distance reduced. I am in sympathy with what the hon. member (Mr. Hackett) has said. I believe that in the near future our government must see its way clear to place an amount in the estimates in order to provide for summer and winter ferry at that point. That is absolutely necessary, and when other provinces are receiving benefits which are denied our little province, we have a right to insist on that being done and to combine in forcing our claim on the government, no matter how we may differ in local matters. I am satisfied that in a few years there will be a ferry traversing that eight miles, and thus save the forty miles travel which at present has to be undertaken. Why should we go forty miles when we can shorten the distance to eight, and when there is railway accommodation on either side. We are asking for a wharf at Cape Traverse. Perhaps the hon. minister may not see his way clear to give it to us this session, but it will have to come in the near future no matter what government is in power.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very thankful for the information given me and will give more attention than ever to this important question. If it be true, as I hope it is, that communication between the island and the mainland can be shortened to eight miles, there is no government which can refuse to undertake that work, but there must be some obstacle in the way or it would have been done long ago. However, we are in a century of progress, and I will give my best attention to the statements just made. I will have my officers go again into that important question, and if it can be done, I will pledge myself to do it.

Mr. HACKETT. I am very much pleased indeed to hear the statement of the hon. minister because I know that when he makes a promise of that kind he means to keep it. I believe it will not be very long before government works are constructed at Carleton Point, Prince county, for the purpose of maintaining winter and summer communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I do not want to minimize what the hon. gentleman has done with regard to public works in the island, but to impress upon him the necessity of completing the work he has begun.

We may disagree, and we may say things that are pretty sharp sometimes. But I want to say that when the hon. gentleman tells us that he will do a thing, he will do it. Yesterday, in the discussions in this House we had a gale blowing from the prairies of the North-west; this evening we have a breeze from the east, from the province of Prince Edward Island. I am pleased indeed to find that the hon. minister is paying so much attention to our remarks. We are a small province, but we claim that we are as intelligent and as bright as any people in the Dominion of Canada. We are only asking for our rights as guaranteed us by the terms of confederation. Now, you have two steamships running to keep up communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. They run at times for forty or fifty miles in floating ice. If the government will construct a pier at Carleton Point, it would make it possible to keep up that communication. I trust the hon. minister, if he can not see his way clear at the present time to construct this pier, will keep it in view as his ultimate object. By this means the service will be kept up from Cape Tormentine to Cape Traverse, running to Carleton Point, winter and summer. In that way, you will solve the problem of winter communication and satisfy the people of Prince Edward Island. I am glad that the hon. member for West Queen's (Mr. Farquharson) has, in almost his maiden effort, in this House raised his voice in favour of this route. We call upon him to continue to support us in this matter.

Public Works—chargeable to income—harbours and rivers—New Brunswick—Bay du Vin—to complete reconstruction of wharf, $4,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Has the contract for this work been let ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, the contract was let, on the 27th of May, 1901, to Mr. Charles Ransborough.

Mr. FOWLER. I find certain charges respecting this work noted at page V-172 of the Auditor General's Report. Have these charges been incurred since the contract was given ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer informs me that certain repairs were done outside of the contract, and it may be to these that my hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) refers.

Mr. FOWLER. What is the amount of the contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The amount is $7,745.

Mr. GANONG. Referring to page V-172, of the Auditor General's Report, I see that the last items referred in this Bay du Vin work are $31.31 for the King's Printer and $146.84 for advertising, making a total of $178.15. What do these two items of King's Printer and advertising refer to ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand that they refer to the printing and advertising the specifications.

Black Brook (Logieville)—wharf, $1,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is under contract.

Cape Tormentine—repairs to breakwater, &c., $15,000.

Mr. WILSON. There should be some explanation of so large an item as this.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have already said—perhaps my hon. friend was not in the House—that this work has cost a large amount of money. Unfortunately, material was used in the construction of this wharf, years ago, that should not have been used. Creosoted timber was not employed as it should have been. Now, we have to rebuild the work using rip rap to keep it from falling to pieces. We seek in this way to save a large work which has cost a great deal of money and which we hope will be used as one of the piers in connection with the winter service between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. WILSON. Could not the hon. gentleman give us some idea what portion of this vote is for material and what portion is for labour ? There should be some explanation beyond the mere statement the hon. minister has given.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Superintendence will cost about $1,500. The balance will be spent in buying material. We are simply buying big stone and ripraping the whole work.

Mr. HACKETT. I am not going to criticise this vote, as I know how necessary the work proposed is. But I would like to call the attention of the hon. minister to the need for dredging along the outside of the pier in order that the winter boats may come up alongside the wharf. Is it the hon. minister's intention to do that work also ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have tried in vain to get a dredge for this and other works. Unfortunately, in the maritime provinces, we are short of dredges. We should have some dredging done there in order to allow the steamer to come alongside the pier. I understand every word the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hackett) has said.

Caraquet—wharf, $20,000.

Mr. FOWLER. We would like some explanation of this.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That work is practically under contract now. We have asked for tenders, and have accepted the tender of Simmons & Burpee as the lowest. That work is of great importance. I may say that since it became known that we were going to do this work at that point, several lumber industries have been established there.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the land on which this wharf is to be erected the property of the government or of private individuals ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The engineer informs me we have not bought any land yet, but the work is on land belonging to the government.

Mr. FOWLER. Who owns the land at the inland end of the wharf ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am thankful for the suggestion of my hon. friend. I have given most positive instructions to all my officers not to begin any work without having made arrangements with the owners of the land. There is an understanding about the land, but not in writing. I will say that before doing anything further I will see that we get a deed of the land, because we have trouble every time unless that is done. In this case, however, I do not think there is going to be any trouble.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the site located yet ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, the work is located, but there will not be any trouble about the land, because the work is just on the shore.

Mr. FOWLER. The minister says there have been some verbal negotiations going on; what is the price ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I understand the price is about $20 for the right of landing there. I suppose the insignificance of the price is the reason why a written deed has not been made.

Mr. FOWLER. Perhaps the price will be raised now that the site is taken.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Before the contract is awarded I will see that the deed is in my hands. A tender has been accepted, but the contract has not been signed.

Mr. GANONG. Who is the owner of the land ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. James Blackhall.

Chance harbour—breakwater, $4,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I move that that item be struck out.

Mr. FOWLER. I notice in the Auditor General's Report that $190 have been expended on that for advertising. Why advertise if it was not intended to build ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have since found out that the work was too expensive to do this year.

Mr. FOWLER. Then the $190 is lost.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not lost, because it has given us information that will be useful later on.

Mr. FOWLER. Could not that same information have been obtained without the expense of advertising ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Perhaps so. But it is better to have that item struck out, that work would cost about $40,000.

Motion agreed to.

Dipper harbour—breakwater, $3,250.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I move that that item be struck out.

Mr. GANONG. We find another advertising bill here for $224.44 in connection with this. In looking over these advertising accounts it seems to me that they run a little irregularly. The other night the Minister of Public Works said that he had advertised for building that breakwater down near Wilson's Beach. I am not surprised when I look over this list that he did not get any tenders. I regret that the Grit papers in our county were not better paid for advertising. I see in this Wilson's Beach matter, which will be a work costing from $25,000 to $35,000, he only paid $64.76 for advertising. Now, both these items are struck out after advertising for tenders. We also find some that run higher than that. It is evident the minister was not very anxious to have Wilson's Beach breakwater let by tender, or he would have put it in the hands of other newspapers so that it would have been more thoroughly advertised.

Motion agreed to.

Grande Anse—extension and repairs to breakwater, $9,000.

Mr. FOWLER. There was a lot of expenditure in connection with Grande Anse last year. Is this the same breakwater ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is the same breakwater. This year we are only taking a revote to complete the work.

Mr. FOWLER. But this work is evidently done by day's work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There have been some repairs, I am informed, to the old breakwater; but the work mentioned in this vote is under contract. It is an extension of the breakwater 250 feet long and 12½ feet wide.

Motion agreed to.

Point Wolfe—breakwater, $2,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Who has charge there ? Who located it ? As I understand it at Point Wolfe there has been considerable money expended and parties who live in the vicinity say that some of it has not been very well expended. They claim that the fault lies with the engineer in not knowing exactly what he was about. I suppose the money is being expended under the direction of Mr. Shewen, who is the engineer of the department in that locality ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to know whether the hon. minister has ascertained the views of the people in that neighbourhood who are well acquainted with the tides and the movements of the currents there and who know just where this breakwater should be located.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not now remember that we have received any complaints as to the manner in which the work has been carried out. It was carried out under Mr. Shewen's supervision. I would be very glad to receive any information at the hands of my hon. friend (Mr. Fowler) if he thinks something was done that should not have been done.

Mr. FOWLER. There have been complaints as to the Point Wolfe and Alma expenditure, more particularly in regard to the Alma expenditure.

Richibucto—reconstruction of north pier and groynes, &c., $20,000.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like some information as to this Richibucto matter. This seems a very large vote. I notice the hon. member for Kent (Mr. LeBlanc) in his place and perhaps he may have some information upon the subject.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is an old work that has cost a large amount of money, and it was in a very bad state of repair. I visited the place a couple of years ago. The work was simply in the worst possible state. We started repairing the work by day's labour. We had a good deal of trouble and I finally made up my mind that the best way of ending my worry was to ask for tenders. We have done so. The tenders are in, but I have not had time as yet to pronounce upon them. The work will be given to the lowest tenderer if there is nothing to prevent me from doing so.

Mr. FOWLER. I see that you spent nearly $17,000 last year. Is this vote in addition to that ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. That will be about $37,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The work has cost a large amount of money. The original work that we are repairing to-day cost about $150,000. My hon. friend knows the amount of work there is to do. It is a long pier that forms the entrance to the bay. It is a necessary work.

Mr. FOWLER. While we are at these estimates, I would like to call the attention of the hon. minister to the fact that there is a great variation in the prices of lumber supplied at these different works. I notice here, page V-173, Auditor General's Report, in connection with the repairs to the breakwater at Campobello (Wilson's Beach) that in some cases hemlock is charged for at $11 a thousand which would be a fair price. This is one of our cheapest woods, but I find that in another place another contractor charged for hemlock $19.50 a thousand.

An hon. MEMBER. The same work?

Mr. FOWLER. It is the same work but not the same man.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Not on the same day and not from the same place either.

Mr. FOWLER. There has never been in the history of the lumber business, as far as I am acquainted with it, and I think I know something about it, such a variation in the price as that during the same season, or in fact any season—a difference of $8.50 a thousand. I see that Messrs. John Dewar & Sons supplied hemlock at $11 a thousand and that for the same work Mr. F. E. Sayre supplied hemlock at $19.50 a thousand, and birch hewn timber at $17.50 a thousand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I know my hon. friend does not want to be unfair, but he has only to look at the statement and he will see that it is not the same kind of timber at all. There is sawn timber, log timber and hewn timber, and these are not the same classes of timber at all. It may be hemlock, but it is hemlock prepared in a different way. I may say that my officers have received and are receiving the most positive instructions to buy material at the lowest possible prices in the market, and I do not think that any member of parliament will be able to prove before the Public Accounts Committee that I have done anything other than that. My officers are always instructed to buy material at the lowest possible prices, and on this occasion the hon. gentleman will find that this is not the same material at all.

Mr. FOWLER. No, it should be cheaper in the one case than in the other. The smaller the size a log is cut into and the more sawing you do the higher the price will be. But here, this timber is simply squared. Hewn hemlock was charged for at the rate of $17.50 a thousand by Mr. Sayre and the other at $19.50 a thousand while the other man sells his timber at $11 a thousand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is round timber.

Mr. FOWLER. Supposing that is the case, it is altogether too high a price. Seven dollars would be a good price for hemlock round. It is only a question of towage. Suppose you towed it from the mouth of the St. John river it would not cost more than $1.25 a thousand, and here is a charge besides for towage in Mr. Sayre's bill.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am informed that the timber came from the county of Albert.

Mr. FOWLER. No, that timber came from up the River St. John. That is where Mr. Sayre's timber lands are located. He is a merchant living in the city of St. John. This timber would come down the St. John river, either from Mr. Sayre's own lands on the Salmon river, a tributary of the St. John, or from the lands on the upper waters of the St. John river. If it were squared timber, it certainly should not cost as much as boards, and the very highest price of hemlock boards is $9 a thousand. Here we have a charge of $17.50 a thousand. That is from $6 to $7 a thousand out of the way.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend is right, my officers are wrong, and on the other hand, if my officers are right my hon. friend is wrong. It is all very well to state on the floor of parliament that the price of this and that article is too high. Conditions are not always the same. In New Brunswick I have had at times some little trouble here and there, but I have never found that any extraordinary charge has been made. However, my chief engineer will take a note of what my hon. friend says and inquire as to the reason why there is that difference. I understand that the timber is long timber, specially long, 45 feet long. It is pretty difficult to judge of these matters on the floor of the House. It is easier to speak than to buy cheaply.

Mr. FOWLER. Hemlock grows very tall in our country, and it is the cheapest lumber we have in our country. Therefore, it is no excuse or argument to say that it is long timber, because long timber would be nearly as cheap as short timber. It sells by the thousand feet and there is no argument in that. I may say, no matter how much confidence the hon. minister may have in his officers, that they are clearly wrong in this instance. This man has received from $6 to $7 a thousand too much for his lumber, and I am giving you the benefit of the doubts.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I would be very sorry to find out that my hon. friend is right. I will find out tomorrow whether he is right or wrong. I have discovered no information that has come to me on that point. I will find out the reason for the price he paid. If my hon. friend is wrong, I will ask him to say that he is wrong.

Mr. FOWLER. I will be very glad to do so.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, I will make that bargain with him.

Mr. FOWLER. I am quite agreeable, but I shall expect that my hon. friend will be reciprocal and will acknowledge it if he is wrong.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My chief engineer is instructed to wire to Mr. Shewen to know why he has paid that price, because his hands have always been free. He, like all my other officers, are ordered to buy at the lowest market price. I challenge any member of parliament on either side to say that I have given any other order than that. Mr. Shewen will be wired immediately and I will communicate the answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Fowler). That is fair, I suppose.

Mr. FOWLER. Not exactly fair and for this reason: That you are wiring to get your information from the same man who made the mistake, which I do not think is fair at all. It is not necessary for the minister to get heated over the matter because I am not imputing the slightest blame directly to him. I only say that his officers have deceived him in this matter, as his friend deceived him the other day about the appointment of a clerk of works at the Sussex armoury. I do say that there are gentlemen supporting the minister on the other side of the House who know something about the price of lumber in the province from which we come, and if they state what they know to be the fact, they will state that this is an excessive price for any hemlock lumber; and not only for hemlock, but he has charged $17.50 a thousand for birch, which is a very high price. The ordinary rough pine and not clear pine would be used for the purpose of a breakwater. If this were clear pine the price would not be excessive, but for the class of pine that would go into a breakwater it is an excessive price—that pine is worth $7 or $8 a thousand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If Mr. Shewen paid too much I would be surprised because he is one of the hardest men I have met in my life.

Mr. FOWLER. Then get your information from another source than Mr. Shewen and you will be surprised.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will ask my officer why he paid that much and from whom he asked quotations, because I am sure he did ask for quotations. If my hon. friend gives me any other source of information I am prepared to accept it. I do not desire to shield any one of my officers. I cannot be held responsible directly if too high prices are paid, but I am always anxious to get information.

Mr. FOWLER. If the minister will communicate with his officer and get the reasons that his officer gives for these high prices, then if these reasons do not appear satisfactory to me I will give him the names of persons with whom he can communicate, and who are experts in the lumber business.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will be very glad to receive the information.

River St. John, including tributaries, $16,000.

Mr. WILMOT. How does the minister propose to spend that appropriation of $16,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have not yet decided on the work to be done. Last year we spent very little of that appropriation. There are works of several kinds to be carried out there. We have works at Oromocto, at Tobique, at St. Francis, at Bear Island and at Topaz. This vote is for clearing the river generally. It is a very changeable river as the hon. gentleman knows and it contains snags and sandbars of all kinds, so that it is very difficult to name the particular places at which the work will be caried on.

Mr. WILMOT. I am very well acquainted with the river and I know where the works have been carried out. I would urge on the attention of the minister the importance of making an effort to clear that channel. Last year, under the direction of Mr. Shewen, the resident engineer, dredging was commenced where the water was sufficiently deep, and quite unnecessary work was carried on for some time.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. At what place?

Mr. WILMOT. At Oromocto. There was a good deal of criticism on the work, and it was said that the engineer was not going about it properly. He should have commenced directly on the shoal. At a period when the water was at a proper depth the work could have been carried on properly. At all events they had to discontinue the work which they commenced. I would urge upon the minister the necessity of directing his attention to that particular point on the river, namely the Oromocto shoals.

River St. John—wharf at Oromocto, $1,500.

Mr. WILMOT. Does the minister propose to make any other appropriation for that wharf?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was represented to me that the work would cost a large amount of money and then I paused. Later on we had another estimate based on a new survey and we found the work would cost $6,000. We are now preparing plans and asking for tenders for that work.

Mr. WILMOT. The work will be gone on with ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

St. John harbour—Negro Point breakwater, $20,000.

Mr. FOWLER. What is being done there?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That work has cost a large amount of money, but the waves are so big there that every year we are obliged to make repairs. This vote is to lay down large blocks of concrete to complete the work.

Upper Salmon river (Alma Pier), $5,700.

Mr. FOWLER. Will this work be let by contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, we have asked for tenders but the contract has not yet been awarded.

Grande Vallee—pier, $25,000.

Mr. GANONG. I would like to know something about that $25,000 for a pier at Grande Vallee. What business is there, to warrant this expenditure ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There are large lumber operations carried on in that part of the country, and it was to help that trade that the money was voted last year. The contract for the work has been awarded and I am simply asking parliament to give me the money to pay for that contract which was commenced on the vote of last year.

Mr. GANONG. That is just the understanding I have in regard to this matter—that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Lovell) owns large timber properties in that section of the country, and that this wharf is virtually being built in the interest of a lumber company in which that hon. gentleman is largely interested—that it is wholly an electioneering matter.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman has not been elected there ; he has been elected elsewhere, where he will be elected again. So this is not an electioneering work. The money for this work was voted last year, and it is being voted again this year, and it is rather late for the hon. gentleman to object to that work now.

Mr. GANONG. I have had information that that is the sole purpose of this pier—to make the lumber property of the hon. member for Stanstead valuable. What is the population of the locality ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have just stated that the work has been undertaken in view of large lumbering operations—not because there is a town there ; and I may add that there is no other harbour on the north shore. So that the wharf will be used for lumbering operations, for trade purposes, and for shelter for the fishermen.

Mr. GANONG. It is a most excellent advertisement for any man who has a good lumber property. All he has to do, if he votes right, is to come to this government and ask for an appropriation to increase the value of his lumber property. Will the hon. minister tell us whether the site for this pier has been purchased and paid for, and if so, from whom ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It has not. The fact that the hon. gentleman who represents Stanstead may have property there is no reason why the government should not make any improvements. My hon. friend from Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) has large properties in his riding, and I am carrying out improvements there. My hon. friend will not be accused of serving his own interests when he is insisting on money being spent in his riding. This is no argument.

Mr. GANONG. Not if the money is spent for general purposes ; but when it is spent for the special purpose of increasing the value of a lumber property, I claim it is wrong.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no doubt that any public works improve the value of property, and if a member of parliament happens to have property in a place where these works are going on, so much the better for him. It does not injure the county.

Mr. GANONG. Will the hon. minister be kind enough to tell us from whom the site was purchased and the price ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There has been no land purchased. The wharf is built on the shore.

Mr. GANONG. It must front on some one's land.

Mr. BENNETT. This seems to be an extraordinary proposition. From what has dropped, it would appear that there is a saw-mill situated at this place, and unfortunately there is no proper dock for a large lumbering business. The minister asks the House to vote this large sum for the construction of this dock, and he cannot tell whether a site has been purchased, or if so what the price of the site is. Before the item goes through, I think the minister should state the population of the place, whether the municipality is giving the land lot and the water lot adjoining, and whether there is any contribution by the municipality towards the construction of the dock.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The municipality has not given any contribution—not more than the municipality of Midland will give us, I suppose, for works which we will build there. This dock is being built in the province of Quebec under the ordinary rules which are applied in all the provinces. No site has been purchased, because it was not necessary to purchase a site. An amount was voted in the estimates last year for this work ; I have been notified to go on with it, and it is rather late now for hon. gentlemen to complain that we are going on because my hon. friend has property there, hon. gentlemen opposite begrudge the expenditure of the money. I do not think it is fair. The work is being built on a rocky point that does not belong to anybody.

Mr. FOWLER. It must belong to somebody. It is Crown land ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I suppose it is Crown lands.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the work commenced ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, yes. I am simply asking for a vote to supplement the vote of last year. The contract is let, and the work is going on.

Mr. FOWLER. How much was voted last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Last year I had a vote of $15,000. I have been fully authorized to go on with the work.

Mr. FOWLER. If this work was going to cost $40,000, how is it you had only an estimate of $15,000 last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My department asks each year for the amount we expect will be spent during the year, and afterwards we ask what is necessary to supplement the vote.

Mr. FOWLER. What was your engineer's estimate of the whole cost of the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The amount of the contract is $53,000.

Mr. FOWLER. And this work is begun without your having any title to the land on which it is built.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Because it is not necessary to have one. The work is built in the water.

Mr. FOWLER. It must be built on land.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is built on a rocky point which belongs to the Crown.

Mr. FOWLER. It does not matter whether it is a rock or not. It must belong to a private party or to the Crown. If it belongs to the Crown, it belongs, I suppose, to the province of Quebec. The minister, it seems to me, has placed himself in a very peculiar position. He is spending $53,000 on property to which he has no title whatever. What sort of an arrangement can you make if this property really belongs to a private individual ? If it belongs to the gentleman who owns these vast lumber lands in that district, you should have got a deed from him before you began the improvements.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In this case it was not necessary to buy the site because the work is built on a point which does not seem to belong to anybody unless to the Crown.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it all wilderness there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is a good deal of wilderness there.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there not a village or town or any inhabitants ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is a small village.

Mr. FOWLER. About what is the population ? It has a very elaborate name.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. According to the last reports, the population was 370.

Mr. FOWLER. What are the industries ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Lumber and fishing.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there a saw-mill there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. How many hands does it employ ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say.

Mr. FOWLER. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Agriculture, who looks after the census, can tell ?

Mr. BENNETT. The strength of the Minister of Public Works is certainly shown in the vote now being taken. He presumes so much on his followers that he lets a contract for $53,000 for the construction of a dock, for which he only asked an appropriation of $15,000, and relies on his followers to support him in making the balance of the grant good.

Mr. FOWLER. And they will.

Mr. BENNETT. What is the position ? The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Lovell) owns a saw-mill at this point, and taking advantage of his position as a supporter of the government, applied to the Minister of Public Works to have a dock constructed there for the purpose of carrying on his own business. This is on all fours with the vote last year of $75,000 for the construction of a dock at Depot Harbour for the sole benefit of Mr. Booth. The hon. minister last year made a present of $75,000 worth of dockage to Mr. Booth, which that gentleman is today about to dispose of to another corporation. In other words, we increased the value of Mr. Booth's assets to the tune of $75,000, and the minister did this, knowing that his followers would blindly vote it through. Surely there must be some hon. gentlemen on that side, who, if they feel no moral responsibility themselves, must feel that they are responsible to the people who sent them here. Will they not protest against expenditures of this kind ? I submit that the hon. minister had no right to enter into a contract for $53,000 until he had got the assent of the House. I do not recall last year's vote on this particular question, but I believe that a reference to 'Hansard' will not prove that the hon. minister stated then that there would be an expenditure of $53,000. If the rule is to be laid down that any hon. gentleman who has the requisite political leverage can have his own private property improved at the expense of the country, it would be well that the country should know it at once. I must congratulate the Minister of Public Works on this fact, that he has not the slightest fear that his followers will not vote through any appropriation he chooses to bring down. This is another tribute to the strong position he holds in the cabinet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let me say to my hon. friend that I am not alone in this government and that no contract of this kind can be carried out unless it is approved by my colleagues. I stand here responsible for what I have done just as I am for what they do, and just as they are for what both they and I have done. I am very much surprised that some of my friends in the other provinces, where much larger works have been carried out, find so much fault with a work of this kind carried on elsewhere. I gave the House the figures the other day to show that in Ontario there has been a large amount of money expended. In Southampton, for instance, there has been spent a quarter of a million dollars, and I make bold to say that in a few years there will be as much trade in this Grand Vallee as there is in Southampton. I admit that it is a pretty large amount to expend but I did not deceive the House. Last year, if my hon. friend had asked me how much the work would cost, I would have told him. The House granted me $15,000 to build the work and it is now under contract. Do hon. gentlemen want me to repudiate my obligations ? I have never entered into any contract without their consent. I have not deceived anybody. My colleagues know perfectly well what I have done. I can sign no contract, and have no desire to do so, without going before my colleagues. But because the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Lovell) has mills in that vicinity, my hon. friend raises a row. I cannot help that. The work has to be paid for because the contract is signed, and no doubt it will prove a very useful work.

Mr. BENNETT. The point I make is this, that the vote is not for a work of public utility, but solely in favour of a private interest, namely, a saw-mill owned by the hon. member for Stanstead. Let the expenditure be large or small, the question for us is whether it is for the public utility or simply for the benefit of one private individual. The hon. minister referred to grants in Ontario. Well, in the riding I have the honour to represent I was pleased to see that he has made grants. But under what circumstances ? At the town of Midland there are large industries and a good harbour, and if by the receding of the water, the elevators cannot be approached, is it not the bounden duty of the government to step in and do the necessary dredging ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. And we did it.

Mr. BENNETT. But if the hon. minister were asked to make a grant for the benefit of any saw-mill owner in East Simcoe—as he has done in this matter—I should object to that expenditure, whether it were in my riding or not. I have objected to expenditures made by the hon. gentleman in my riding. I objected notably to the construction of a dock at a village called Hawkestone. I do not hold the minister accountable for all these expenditures, because his colleagues are equally culpable; and in the case of the dock at Hawkestone, the recommendation came from the Postmaster General. But I can tell the hon. minister that I look with pleasure on expenditures such as are made at Hawkestone, for this reason, that they show the people how the public money is being frittered away in the attempt to make some petty political capital. But this expenditure recoils on the hon. gentleman. The whole thing was a political job. The man in charge of the work was a hotel-keeper, who lived a mile or so away, and was charging three dollars a day for superintending the work. The question is not whether the expenditure is large or small, but whether it is simply aiding the promotion of a private enterprise, and the private enterprise of a gentleman who happens to hold a seat in this House, supporting hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MONK. How much was spent on that work last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have not given any estimate yet, but——

Mr. MONK. There is only a couple hundred dollars, according to the Auditor General's Report—$233.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Since the close of that report, the work has been going on.

Mr. MONK. Who is the contractor ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Messrs. Heney & Smith, Ottawa.

Mr. MONK. How much has been spent since the 30th of June, the time to which the Auditor General's Report carries us ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have not given an estimate, but I am sure there must be a pretty large amount They are wealthy men, and they are going on with the work.

Mr. MONK. I find the information given with regard to this work very scanty. We do not know how much has been spent. We only know that we are called upon to spend about $50,000 at a place, that in itself does not appear to be very important—its population being about 350. And we have the statement made and repeated that this work is undertaken to satisfy the political urgings of a gentleman who sits in this House and who is largely interested in lumbering operations in that distant part of the province. We have the statement of the Minister of Public Works that he has not purchased any site for this wharf. But we have no statement as to the representations that have been made to the department of the need for this work. Have the steamboat companies asked for this wharf ? Have the inhabitants joined together to send in a petition for it? Has anything been shown to the government to make it appear that there is any necessity for it outside the private necessity that has been mentioned two or three times this evening ? It is not fair for the Minister of Public Works to say that he has executed large works elsewhere and that members who happen to come from other provinces, but who take part in the work that it is the duty of us all to perform, that of criticising the government, shall not be allowed to ask such simple questions as those that I have asked. I can say for my own part, that I think the hon. minister appreciates what I say that it is a pity, if it be true that we are spending such amounts as are provided in this resolution largely, as appears so far in this short discussion, for the private benefit of individuals of some people engaged in lumbering operations when, at present, as a matter of fact, we have the proof before us since last year at the beginning of the session, that that part of the St. Lawrence navigation which interests the people of the province of Quebec so deeply, is absolutely neglected—neglected at least to this extent, that as the Minister of Public Works knows better than anybody else, there is not a sufficient amount spent on that navigation of the St. Lawrence to remove the objections put before the government last year in reference to the dangers of that navigation, in reference to the cost of freights, in reference to cost of insurance. And we have the statement made here tonight, unrebuked, uncontradicted, not disproved by the department, that this large amount of money is being spent to forward the interest of one individual or one company in which a member of this House is largely interested. And we have no statement on the other hand from the Minister of Public Works, or from other quarters that facts have been brought forward to show need of this wharf or to show that the people of the place demanded it. I know that, in the province of Quebec as elsewhere great pressure is brought to bear upon the government to carry on local works. They are of some use to somebody—nobody will deny that. But can we afford to spend large amounts of money on local works when the general scheme of the improvement of the navigation of the St. Lawrence from Montreal to the sea is not being done justice to ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The improvement of the St. Lawrence is one thing and the erection of the wharf at Grande Vallee is another thing. We are attending to the improvement of the St. Lawrence better than it has ever been done in the past. It is of no use to make so much fuss—for it is fuss that is being made now and nothing else. The hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Lemieux) is not in his seat at the moment. He is one of those who came to the government and represented to us that, if there was a wharf built there large lumbering interests would be fostered and developed. We considered the case and came to the conclusion that it was a meritorious work. Now it is not fair and it is not good policy to say that improvements must always be made at places where there is a large population. If by the erection of this work, you help population to settle there, that will be a good thing. Why, we are spending half a million dollars a year to bring population over from the other side.

Mr. MONK. And wasting a lot of it too.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Because this government has thought proper, has thought it was good policy to foster a large industry in that part of the country—a very interesting part of the province and which has vast resources—we are denounced. I say it again, I know the reason ; it is because the hon. member for Stanstead happens to have property there. If that hon. gentleman had not happened to have property there, nothing would have been heard of the matter. But, because an hon. member for this House has lumbering property in that locality, I have done wrong. But whether I have done wrong or right—I am sure I have done right as usual—the faith of the country is pledged, the contract is signed and I must pay ; there is no escape now. And permit me to add that there have been a good many cases worse than this. This is not a bad case. Let my hon. friends await the developments of the trade there—they are too impatient. We must give time for the trade to develop which this work is intended to promote.

Mr. MONK. It is the Minister of Public Works who is making the fuss. I am not aware that anybody denounced this undertaking or said that it would not foster trade. But the Minister of Public Works has admitted that he has spent this sum of $50,000——

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, $53,000.

Mr. MONK. Oh, I have no doubt it will be $60,000 before the hon. gentleman gets through. He is spending this money to develop trade. Now, does he not think, when this vast work is being executed purely for the future, that it would be better to erect there a wharf at a cost of $10,000 or of $15,000 and spend the balance to do justice to what seems to me the extremely fair representation made last year by Major Bond, speaking on behalf of the underwriters of Montreal with respect to such general improvements to the navigation of the St. Lawrence either through the Marine Department or through the Public Works Department as to remove from the shoulders of the merchants and exporters of Montreal the heavy burden of the extra premiums they have to pay.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The little money we are spending for the benefit of the trade and of the fishermen in Gaspe will not prevent this country from carrying out the necessary improvements in the St. Lawrence. My hon. friend the leader of a party understands that. The expenditure of $20,000 or $25,000 in Gaspe will not prevent us from carrying out the necessary works in the St. Lawrence. We are attending to the St. Lawrence, and at the same time we are endeavouring to attend to the requirements of the trade and of the population of Gaspe. This is a very interesting part of the country, and great developments are expected by those who are acquainted with it. Now, if we do not show a spirit of progress, if we do not occasionally move in advance of the times, if we do not force progress, we will be accused of being slow. I do not like to be accused of being slow.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I was not present, unfortunately when my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) made his speech against Grande Vallee.

Mr. MONK. I did not make a speech against Grande Vallee at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may say to my hon. friend that the work at Grande Vallee is a most important one. As a result of this work an improvement is already manifest in that locality. In 1896 when I ran for the first time in that county and visited Grande Vallee, I found that fifty electors resided there. Yesterday I was consulting the census returns, and I found that as a result of this work, the population has increased to 352 souls.

Mr. MONK. But we only spent up to the 30th of June last, $233 there, according to the Auditor General's Report.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, but the prospective expenditure has already brought to that place a great enterprise. The name of the Messrs. Lovell has been mentioned. They have there perhaps the most extensive lumber mills in the lower portion of the St. Lawrence. The name of the county of Gaspe is frequently mentioned in the estimates. It is true that the government has spent many thousands in that county during the last few years. But we must not forget that there are no railways in the county of Gaspe, that no subsidies have been paid there, and these are the only improvements that have yet been made so far as breakwaters and wharfs are concerned. Now my learned friend speaks of navigation, and the improvements which should be made in the lower portion of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Prior to 1896 there was no steam communication between Quebec and Montreal, and the different ports and harbours on the coast of Gaspe. As a result of these works at Cape Chat, at Grande Vallee, at Gaspe Basin, at Percé, at Fox river, at Anse à Beaufils, giving facilities and accommodations to the travelling public, a line of steamers has been established between the large centres and the coast. Previous to that period, no steamer would have gone to that coast. But to-day we have several harbours and safe shelters, and as a result, a regular steamship's service. The fishermen of that coast have been treated like slaves for the last century. I have met fishermen on the coast of Gaspe who had not seen a red cent during their whole life. They used to sell their fish to the merchants on the coast and were paid in trade. Since the establishment of that line, and as a result of the improvements which were made by the Department of Public Works, to-day the fishermen of Gaspe are trading with Montreal and Quebec, and even with the province of Ontario, as Mr. Flavelle, one of the most important merchants and manufacturers of Lindsay, told me a fortnight ago. Therefore, I think my learned friend should not criticise these small amounts, because this is the first time since the county of Gaspe has been represented in this House that any grants have been made to it by parliament. The county of Gaspe is the oldest county in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. INGRAM. Is the hon. gentleman talking about other works than this one, or is he confining his remarks to the vote we are now discussing ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am speaking of the works which have been constructed at Grande Vallee, at Cape Chat, at Fox river, at Percé, at Anse à Beaufils, and at Newport.

Mr. MONK. What work favourable to steam navigation did my hon. friend refer to as having been executed at Anse à Beaufils? I thought that was specially for fishermen and not for steamers.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is for fishermen. At Fox river, for instance, a work was constructed last year and the year previous.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. At Amherst.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I did not speak of the Magdalen Islands, that is another question. But on the coast of Gaspe, whenever a steamer was caught by a storm, she had to cross the St. Lawrence on the north coast to get shelter. To-day, owing to the works done at Grande Vallee, at Cape Chat and at Fox river, this is avoided. They are most useful works, and nobody would criticise them, on the coast of Gaspe.

Mr. AVERY. Since the hon. gentleman is so well acquainted with that place where there are 350 souls, can he not tell us who owns the land that this dock is to be built on?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Grande Vallee is in a seigniory, and it belongs to the firm of the Messrs. Lovell.

Mr. MONK. Then this is built on the Lovells' property?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, it is built for the general advantage of the people there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Even if it was.

Mr. MONK. Well, we would like to own it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, so would I.

Mr. FOWLER. I would ask the minister whether, in view of all the information he has with respect to the ownership of this property, he intends to get a deed of the land that will be occupied by this wharf?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, although I do not believe it is necessary. I have just reproved my chief engineer for having gone on with that work without a deed, but he tells me it is on a rocky point that is not supposed to belong to anybody.

Mr. FOWLER. But the hon. member for Gaspe says it belongs to the Messrs. Lovell.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, the seigniory. This is a shore.

Mr. FOWLER. But the less must be included in the greater. Certainly this property belongs to the Lovells. If the minister was building a house for his own use, he would scarcely build it upon another man's property. He would find there would be some question raised about the title if he wanted to sell the property. Now, I understand this wharf has been built by parliament, therefore it belongs to the country. But we find now it belongs to a company, and the government have been building upon their land. Surely it is the intention of the minister to see that the Messrs. Lovell give a deed. They should make it a free gift to the department.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not expect that there will be any trouble as to the ownership but even if there were any trouble we can always expropriate.

Mr. MONK. There is nothing before us but what has been told us by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), that we are expending $60,000 upon a wharf that is being built on the property of Mr. Lovell.

Mr. LEMIEUX. In tidal waters.

Mr. MONK. If he is the owner of the seigniory he is the owner of the foreshore, If it is on Mr. Lovell's property we would be justified in making this vote conditional upon the government being entitled to a deed of the property.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There will be no trouble as to the ownership of the land.

Mr. FOWLER. This is the second instance that has come to our notice to-night in which the title has not been obtained to a property where wharfs are to be erected. I think that the hon. minister should bring his officers up with a pretty sharp turn in connection with this matter, and instruct them that in all cases they shall see that no public money is expended on property without obtaining a title to that property.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have given written instructions which I will bring before the House, to every one of my officers to do in each case, that which has been alluded to here to-night. In the Caraquet case it is a question of $20, and it has been verbally arranged. The deed has not been executed. It has been overlooked. All the same I agree that it should have been arranged because I have had trouble over little things like that. There are certain properties to which we did not obtain titles in the past. I quite agree that we should have titles in every case, and my officers have received positive instructions on that point. They are within hearing of my voice and they know that I have given them the most positive and severe instructions.

Mr. FOWLER. That very fact might tend to shake the confidence of the minister in his officers obeying his instructions in other matters.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOWLER. The hon. gentleman said that he had given instructions in respect to the purchase of supplies to these officers and that he had absolute confidence that these gentlemen had not exceeded his instructions. In this case he has given just as positive and severe instructions and they have not obeyed his instructions. In this case two new wharfs have been built and in neither case have the title deeds been obtained. I think the hon. gentleman will find that they have neglected his directions in other matters as well as this.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is a case in which there is much ado about nothing. In one case there is $20 involved, and you cannot hang a man for $20.

Mr. FOWLER. It is not the amount of money.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Where is the big firm in which similar transactions will not happen ? I grant it should have been done.

Mr. FOWLER. Where is the big firm that would build on property without getting the title to it ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. There are not many big firms in this country possessing the rights which are conferred upon the hon. Minister of Public Works by the Act respecting the Expropriation of Lands, Chapter 39 of the Revised Statutes, which permits the minister to enter upon and take possession of property for the purpose of constructing public works. All that is necessary for him to do is to deposit his plan, and that plan being deposited, he may proceed with the expropriation. He can do it now, and if he can do it now what is all the row about ?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes, but he will have to pay a great deal more for that land if he puts a work upon it before he gets the title.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It is a remarkable statement to say that the Minister of Public Works, after he has entered upon a property to make improvements, as he is authorized by law to do, will be obliged to take into consideration these improvements in the expropriation.

Mr. FOWLER. But you will find that a jury will award a much larger amount.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The jury has nothing to do with it at all. It is the arbitrators who will settle it.

Mr. FOWLER. It is the same thing.

Mr. INGRAM. When the statement is made that the hon. Minister of Public Works is expending $53,000 in building a pier facing the water front, that the country has no deed for, I will tell the hon. Minister of Justice where all the fuss will come in. In Ontario and in other provinces throughout the Dominion, there are municipalities and private individuals who own wharfs facing water fronts and I venture to say that these corporations and persons have come to the hon. Minister of Public Works and asked for assistance towards the maintenance of these wharfs, and that the minister has refused to grant them money. What position is the minister in ? He has told us that he has granted this money without any deed or any claim on the property facing the water front, and he has refused the request that deputations have brought before him, on the ground that the government did not own these properties I say it is a very improper course and it is a course which was not pursued years ago by the government of this country. Heretofore, the government, before they undertook to expend any money on works of that kind, insisted first on the private owners transferring their harbour to the government. This has been the practise in the past, and a proper practise I think. If that practise had been followed out it would not be necessary to impress upon the Minister of Public Works the necessity of building public harbours or piers at these points. To-night we have not had a single bit of information as to what will be done at this harbour other than in the general statements made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), and these statements have reference to five other harbours in addition to this one. If the hon. gentleman had confined his remarks to the subject under discussion the committee could have discussed this matter more intelligently. He should be in a position to tell us the exact condition of affairs at this harbour. He has not given us that information, and therefore we should not pass this item until we do get it.

Mr. AVERY. How much money has already been spent on this wharf ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The work is going on. We have not yet given any estimate. The two contractors are carrying out their work. Now, while I am on my feet, I may say that in a fortnight I will lay on the Table of the House deeds for these two properties. There is not much in it, but I grant that the property should have been secured by deed beforehand. My officers, I say in their presence, should have done it. It has been overlooked, not because they meant to do wrong, but because they thought it was not necessary. The hon. Minister of Justice tells me that it is better to have the deed and we will have it. At Caraquet it is a matter of $20 and a verbal arrangement. We will have it in writing.

Mr. FOWLER. It seems to me that there is something of a disagreement between the hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Minister of Public Works. The hon. Minister of Justice informed us a few minutes ago that everything was all right, and if so, he asked, what is all this row about. All that the Minister of Public Works had to do was to expropriate. Let us look at this for a moment. The Minister of Public Works says he can obtain the deed of the Caraquet property for $20. He goes on with the work without getting that deed, and suppose the property changes its owner in the meantime and the new owner refuses to give him the deed, then we take expropriation proceedings, and I would like to ask the Minister of Justice what under the circumstances, the total cost of that land would bear to the $20 that it now can be obtained for ? The Minister of Justice knows that the cost would be more than ten times; yes, more than twenty-five times the amount.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If Caraquet costs more than $20 then I will pay it.

Mr. FOWLER. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman does not propose to follow the suggestion of the Minister of Justice, and that he intends to get the title of that property.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the member for Gaspe say what is the nearest harbour to Grande Vallee ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is about forty miles.

Mr. INGRAM. Surely the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) must have given some good reasons in the first instance as to why this money should be expended.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He has given me the best reasons possible.

Mr. INGRAM. What are they ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman was not in the House, as he should have been, or he would have heard what I said.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, I was in the House.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will repeat the useful information I gave before. There are large lumbering operations in sight.

Mr. MONK. Oh, we heard that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There was a large increase of population in sight also. If that population increased on the mere hopes of building the wharf what must we expect when the wharf is built ?

Mr. INGRAM. It is a very funny matter to spend this $53,000. I can tell the Minister of Public Works that I have been in the House during the whole discussion, and I can say that if all his appropriations are based on the enlightened information he has given to the House in this case, then God help the country. As to the increased population, the member for Gaspe said there were fifty electors in 1896, and that the population had increased to 350 souls. Will the hon. gentleman multiply the families of the electors in 1896 by the usual rule——

An hon. MEMBER. The French rule.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, and I venture to say that he will get 350 souls in 1896. He counted the electors in the one case and the souls in the other. Will he tell us how many souls there were in 1896 ?

Mr. MONK. Did I understand the minister to say that there was a contract for $53,000 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, signed and sealed.

Mr. MONK. Who is the contractor ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Messrs. Heney & Smith, from Ottawa.

Hudson wharf, $1,000.

Mr. MONK. Have any representations been made to the department as to that wharf not being located where it would be of most use ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My chief engineer tells me that we have not received any such representations.

Isle au Coudre—addition to wharf, $6,000.

Mr. MORIN. Is that wharf built at Isle au Coudre for steam boats or sail boats ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is for steamboats and for sail boats also. I am in hopes that Isle au Coudre will become a summer resort of great importance as all the other places on the St. Lawrence are becoming year after year.

Mr. MORIN. The minister says he has hopes, but I do not think it pays the government or anybody else to build wharfs on hopes. If there was any public interest to be served I would like to see a wharf built there, but no steamers go to that place and there is no traffic there at all.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman is quite mistaken. Steamers stop there. That wharf has been built twenty-five years and we are only adding to it. There is a population on Isle au Coudre of 1,500, and it is increasing rapidly. The climate is fine there. There is a larger number of summer tourists visiting this place than formerly, and there is large fishing and farming interests. Isle au Coudre is one of the most fertile parts of the province of Quebec.

Mr. MORIN. The minister speaks very highly of the island, and I do myself, too. That island has been inhabited for about 250 years and it has a population of about 1,100. If it is such a nice place and such a good place it must have been since last month, because for 250 years it has been growing to a population of 1,100.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They are doing much better now.

Mr. MORIN. Where will the steamer start from and where will she go to Isle au Coudre ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend knows very well that there are steamers starting from Montreal and Quebec, and visiting all these places. This is one of the most thriving parishes of the lower part of the St. Lawrence, and this work is just for the purpose of helping the trade. Two steamers stop there.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Twice a week all summer.

Mr. MORIN. I have been on the boats up and down, and they have never stopped there.

Isle aux Grues—repairs to wharf, $3,500.

Mr. MORIN. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works again what is the use of a wharf at that island ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That island is populated by good loyal citizens who want to have communication with other parts of the world, and for that purpose they must have a wharf. They have no railway ; this is an island, and steamers and sailing boats stop at that port. If my hon. friend were located there he would like to have some communication with us.

Mr. MORIN. I believe the Minister of Public Works does not understand exactly the meaning of steamers and steamboats. There never was and there never will be a steamer to stop there; but steamboats may. I never knew more than one steamboat, and a small one at that, to leave Quebec in the fall of the year and go there. Many sailboats come from there, but no line of sailboats or steamboats stop there at all.

Lake Temiscamingue—improvements, $10,000.

Mr. MONK. What are these improvements?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We intend starting the construction of a dredge with the amount of money for which we are applying. We have hesitated a good deal as to what we should do. As my hon. friend knows, there is a large current of immigration towards that part of the country, and we have been considering whether we should raise the level of the lake by building a dam or whether we should dredge. After careful investigation, we have come to the conclusion that it is better to have a small dredge for the purpose of dredging the mouth of the river.

Lower St. Lawrence—removal of rocks, &c., $3,000.

Mr. MONK. Where is this removal to take place ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This vote is intended to help the fishermen to land their boats. If my hon. friend has visited the coast of Gaspé and Bonaventure, he knows that there are rocks carried by the waves and storms, which often prevent the fishermen landing their boats when seeking shelter; and part of this vote will be used to remove the rocks to help the fishermen to land their boats and prevent them being drowned.

Mr. MONK. I think that is very good, but where are these rocks ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This vote is a general one, just as we might ask for $10,000 for repairs. Our engineers will report to us that there are rocks to be removed at one place or another. A similar vote is taken every year for the same purpose.

Mr. MONK. I think the minister himself will see that, small as this sum is, it is a pity that we have not something to show us where the rocks are that are to be removed. Not one of the employees of the department can tell us where there is a demand for the removal of rocks.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend is altogether wrong. We could bring more demands than we have money to comply with. When we apply for a general vote for repairs, we cannot say in advance at what points it will be spent. This vote is similar. We know that we have a large fishing trade on the coast, and that every year we are obliged to remove rocks, and they are removed at such places as are pointed out to us. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him not to begrudge the vote of a small amount of money for the benefit of the fishermen ?

Mr. MONK. I am not opposing it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I know that. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right in asking for information. I just call his attention to the great importance of protecting these poor fishermen in the gulf. When a storm arises, if they cannot find shelter and land their boats easily, they will not only at times lose their boats, but also lose their lives. At page 100 of my report my hon. friend will find full information as to the places where rocks were removed last year.

Mr. MONK. I do not like the minister to be under the impression that I am opposed to any assistance being given to the fishermen—far from it; but I think that on votes of this kind we should have satisfactory information as to where the money is to be spent. For my own part, I do not pretend to know the Gaspé peninsula perfectly, but I made a trip there and went along the coast from Dalhousie to Gaspé basin and back, and met a great many people connected with the district, and although the building of wharfs is of great use, I am bound to say frankly that from the people of the district and the people on the boat I heard that in many instances these expenditures on public works were used to oblige political friends, and that you could spend the money to much greater advantage in the interior, improving its agricultural condition and giving roads and railway communication, because once you leave the coast and go to the interior of the peninsula you find room for an immense population and a country comparatively deserted.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The government cannot build roads.

Mr. MONK. It can build railways.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That would cost a large amount of money. That is a horse of another colour. We are now discussing a small vote for the removal of rocks, and I have given all the information I can. If the hon. gentleman will look at my report, page 100, he will get further particulars.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This grant is voted but not expended every year. Its expenditure depends on the petitions sent to the department, and in some years a greater amount is required than in others. For instance, two or three years ago about 200 or 250 boats were lost on the coast, and it became necessary to take means to prevent a recurrence of such loss. My learned friend has not visited the worst part of the coast of Gaspe. The portion between Dalhousie and Gaspe Basin, which he visited, does not require such an expenditure, but from Grand Greve, at the head of Gaspe Bay, down to St. Anne Des Monts, a good deal of expenditure is necessary because that part of the coast is not protected against the ocean; and in fact is known by travellers and sailors as the graveyard of the Atlantic. This amount of money is generally spent, as the hon. minister has explained, in removing rocks and boulders from the small harbours where the fishermen get shelter. At Cape Rosier, which is the most dangerous place in the gulf, sometimes $200 and $300 have to be expended. This vote is a most useful one, and I should be very sorry to have the item struck out. It really affords the only protection these people have. In some of the harbours $25 is spent; in others $200. In some places there are no rocks one year, and the next year the harbour will be full of rocks. This money is also spent not only in the county of Gaspe, but in Rimouski, and a small portion of it in Bonaventure.

My hon. friend has told us that more useful expenditure could be made by providing railways. Well, I may say that ever since I have been elected, I have been continually struggling to get better railway accommodation, but have been hampered by the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Company of Armstrong fame. It has been the misfortune of the peninsula of Gaspe to have had Mr. Armstrong as the promoter of railway accommodation in that part of the country. He did build a railway from Metapedia to New Carlisle, but the work has stopped there, and to-day the rest of the peninsula is deprived of railway communications. Two years ago, I presented to this House a Bill to incorporate a railway company, composed of the best railway men in the Dominion, among whom were Messrs. Macrae & Ross, the gentlemen who built the Great Northern from Quebec to Hawkesbury. They were ready to take up the construction of a railway, but the Bill, after passing this House, was defeated in the Senate through the Armstrong influence. These men were prepared to build a railway from Gaspé Basin to New Carlisle, and even into the interior, striking a point somewhere near Causapscal, in the county of Rimouski.

At my request, the government put into the estimates in 1898 a subsidy amounting to about a quarter of a million dollars to build that line, but no company would undertake the project on account of the opposition of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. The subsidy is still in the estimates, and I hope, the day is not far distant when a new railway line will be built as far as Gaspe Basin.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend must not think that because we ask for some explanation we desire to have the item struck. When we have such a desire, we will make a move in that direction. But we are entitled to some explanation. What my hon. friend says about Mr. Armstrong I would not like to let go entirely unchallenged. He is more familiar with the facts than I, but there are two sides to every story, and possibly there is another version besides the one he has given the House. If Mr. Armstrong has the powerful influence which my hon. friend says he has—sufficient to prevent the peninsula of Gaspe from having the benefit of railway accommodation—he has much greater influence than I have credited him with.

My hon. friend will bear me out when I say that outside the wharfs down there, the cry is for railway communication, and when we come to spend money in that peninsula we ought to see that it is spent for the greatest benefit of the people. I would ask my hon. friend whether there are any works projected this year from Percé, around the extremity of the peninsula, into the estuary of the St. Lawrence, which is the most dangerous part ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. A wharf was built at Cape Chat three or four years ago, and there is now the Grande Vallee pier, which we are providing for. The works at Fox river are going on and a few days ago tenders have been advertised for in the newspapers to build a breakwater at Point St. Peter, between Percé and the Bay of Gaspe. At Point St. Peter there was two years ago a loss of sixty boats, and I think the expenditure there, is a very wise one. That is the only new work I know of this year.

Murray Bay—increasing height of wharf and extending same, $6,000.

Mr. MONK. Was there not work done there last year to a considerable amount ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, and this is to complete the raising and enlarging of the wharf.

Mr. MORIN. I do not see why the government should not compel the Richelieu Company to build their own wharfs, at Murray Bay or anywhere else, which is touched by their line of steamers. It is ridiculous for the government to build wharfs for a company like the Richelieu Navigation Company. Why cannot this company build their own wharfs ? The hon. Minister of Public Works may think that I am rising just to find fault, but that is not the case. I am not in the habit of getting up very often, but I have the right to see what becomes of the people's money. That money goes and is not divided equally. Now, there is the St. Lawrence river. The people that live along that stream have all the facilities people could ask for. They have the waterway, they have the railway, and the wharfs to assist them to use the waterway are built for them. But the people who live in the back counties, such as the one I represent, cannot get help to the extent of one cent. I have heard members of parliament from the west complain about having to haul their grain fifteen miles to market. I have heard them say : We have been living in the west fifteen or sixteen years, and do you think we are going to haul our grain fifteen miles to market ? It is ridiculous ; we must have a railroad. Just think—the county of Dorchester was opened by my grandfather in 1797 ; and I would like to see the man in this House or out of it who could show where the government has ever spent one cent in that county. Now, I will give you time to reply to that. Some three or four years ago there was a bridge carried away, the fourth bridge at that place. I came here and asked the Minister of Public Works to have a donation of $200 towards a new bridge. I did not get it, but I suppose I was to blame. If I had asked the hon. gentleman for $20,000 I might have got $1,000. But I was reasonable, and asked for only $200—and did not get one cent.

An hon. MEMBER. That was a local work.

Mr. MORIN. Why, if you will look at these estimates, you will see where this parliament is asked to vote money to build bridges right here in Ottawa. Has not a bridge been built across the canal ? Is that a local work or not ? But this is the way we are treated. Because we live back from the St. Lawrence, away from civilization, as you say, we must get along without encouragement and without help. There was a bridge across the Etchemin river——

Mr. LEMIEUX. That was the Quebec government.

Mr. MORIN. Quebec or Ontario, it was a bridge, just the same. An hon. gentleman this evening quoted some of the prices paid by the Minister of Public Works for timber. The Minister of Public Works does not understand prices and qualities and quantities of timber. I must say I understand these matters very well. The Minister had some doubts about the prices paid. I can say to the hon. gentleman that I have no doubts at all. I can give him a case. I do not speak from hearsay, but what I say—it is so. There was a man near Quebec—I do not propose to mention his name in this House, he was a strong Tory. Remember that. As he was a strong man, the Grit party bought him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MORIN. Yes, Sir. And after they had bought him, they had to feed him, or he would slip away from them. And what did that gentleman do ? Some three years ago, he came to me and said : I have the contract to furnish the government with some timber, round timber and hewn timber. He asked me if I would help him to get it. I said : 'No, I am out of that business.' 'Well,' he said, 'will you help me by telling me where I can get it ?' I said I would. I went home and saw the men who live about me and told them of the matter, and they said they would hew some timber. The gentleman came down, and I took him around, told him this man would get some timber for him, and the other would get him some more, and so on. They made a bargain before me. The price that this man gave to them was 6 cents for round timber. Bear that in mind. The Auditor General's Report shows that the government paid that man 12 cents for that same timber. For another class of timber, he agreed to pay these people 12 cents a foot—the report shows that the government paid 18 cents a foot. Do not you tell me I am mistaken, for it won't do. This gentleman never bought an ax, he never bought a cant hook, he never bought a tree. The people did all the work, and, as the government paid him he paid them. Now, the lumberman has to send his men up to the timber limits, cut the logs, drive them, saw them, put the lumber away for a year and then sell it. He is out of his money for two or three years.

And if he gets two or three or four dollars a thousand profit, he is well satisfied. So, if a gentleman can clear six cents a foot without doing anything and without risk, why should he not be satisfied. This shows just what I say—first you bought him, and then you had to feed him or he would slip away from you. Now that is all.

Riviere St. Maurice—channel between Grandes Piles and La Tuque, $8,000.

Mr. MONK. How is that work being done ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have a small dredge of our own, which will do the work.

Mr. MONK. It is not under contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, this is a small dredge we have built ourselves, and we are working it in the usual way.

Riviere St. Maurice—dredging, $6,000.

Mr. MONK. Has that dredging been asked for by the people ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is a large trade. No part of the country is developing more rapidly than that.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What is the payment per day for a dredge on work like this ? The reason I ask is that I see figures down here for dredges at the rate of $65 per day.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When we reach the item for dredging I will be glad to give all the information available.

St. Alexis—Baie des Ha ! Ha ! $4,000.

Mr. MONK. There was a pier built there last year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is to complete the same pier; we have not enough money.

Mr. MONK. It was done last year by day work. Does the minister not think he might have gained something by calling for tenders ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In that district the work has been nearly all done by day labour with great success.

Sorel—deep water wharf, $170,000.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the minister give us an explanation of this most extraordinary item ? I heard a startling statement made a little time ago by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Morin), although it was not new to me. It was that the government from time to time are constructing along the St. Lawrence river these docks for the accommodation of steamboat companies. Let me tell the Minister of Public Works that the Richelieu and Navigation line, if I am not mistaken, ply into the city of Toronto. The government does not build docks for them in Toronto. They go into the province of Ontario where business is done on business principles, and where the thing would be nothing short of an outrageous scandal were it exposed. Consequently the Richelieu and Navigation Company go to some private individuals who own a dock in the city of Toronto, and make an arrangement by the year for the use of the dock, paying rent therefor. Yet here to-night—I suppose this may be news to some hon. gentlemen opposite. I am astounded that some of those gentlemen from Ontario do not rise up and ask any questions in reference to these matters. I see the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) sitting before me. I will be bound to say that had he attempted to defend any one of these items in the riding of West Durham when he was there a few weeks ago, his friends would have got a worse black eye in the rural districts than they did get there. The whole province of Ontario, the whole Dominion, know that the government down in the St. Lawrence river are taking the money of the people of Canada by thousands and thousands to construct docks for the purpose of affording accommodation to a wealthy company. Now, may I ask the minister this question in connection with this dock at Sorel ? What is the expenditure intended on the construction of this dock, has the contract been let, and is the dock to be constructed on property already acquired by the Crown?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The dock is being constructed now on property acquired, a deed of which we have in our possession. Let me tell my hon. friend that the Richelieu Company has nothing at all to do with that work, it will not be used by them. They have their own wharfs in the Richelieu river. This work is at the junction of the Richelieu and the St. Lawrence, and is being built for the accommodation of trade. My hon. friend may happen to know that the New York Central interests have bought lately the South Shore Railway. There are two railway companies at Sorel. The work we are doing there is for the accommodation of trade, for the same purpose for which we have built and are building to-day, wharfs, piers and harbours in every province, Ontario included. It is useless for my hon. friend to say that we are doing that work in Quebec while we are neglecting Ontario. He has only to look at the figures in the estimates to find that Ontario has the lion's share. We have done in the past, all governments have done in the past, large harbour improvements in every province, Ontario included. Meaford, Owen Sound, Collingwood, all these harbours have cost a large amount of money. In Collingwood the government has spent over $400,000. The money is well invested, we do not complain. Collingwood is not more important than Sorel, Owen Sound is not more important than Sorel.

Mr. KEMP. Are you building a wharf in Collingwood ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are doing dredging operations there.

Mr. KEMP. We are talking about a wharf.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Harbour works are of different kinds. Sometimes they require a dredge. There is a good deal of dredging on that work. My hon. friend will not tell me there have been no works done in Ontario. There are dozens of harbours, wharfs and breakwaters that we have built in the past in Ontario, and we shall continue to build wharfs and breakwaters there in the future. I may say that the harbours of Montreal, Sorel, Three Rivers and Quebec will be largely used for trade purposes, they are being already largely used for that purpose. Trade is increasing every day. If we are going to have that current of trade that we expect, we must provide for it. The works at Sorel, at Three Rivers, at Quebec, at Montreal are just the same kind of works that are being constructed elsewhere.

Mr. BENNETT. I made no complaint on the score that this was a local work, and that it was being done in the province of Quebec. I tell the minister that there are items in Ontario more disgraceful even than some of these that have been mentioned. Three years ago he constructed a dock in the riding I represent that was a disgrace, so far as the expenditure of public money went. It was at a place called Hawkestone, under the direction of the Postmaster General, and the people there reprobated it. It cost three or four thousand dollars, and the people there reprobated it even though they did get a little profit out of it. I had a better majority at that point than I ever had, because the people said, if this is a sample of the dissipation of the public money of this country, then we propose to condemn it. I am prepared to support the principle of constructing harbours at any place where they are required by reason of receding water or by reason of deeper vessels plying there. I believe it is proper to do necessary dredging. So far as the expenditure goes that is a matter for the minister and the government to decide.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. At Goderich, how much have we spent in the past ? $600,000. Not this government alone, but past governments.

Mr. BENNETT. These are matters for the people of the country to decide, whether or not the government should do as they are doing, spending hundreds of thousands of dollars at places that never have become ports and never will become ports, but simply to meet political exigencies.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that Sorel is not an important port.

Mr. BENNETT. If the minister will give the House this assurance, that they are going to construct docks at Sorel and charge the steamboats which may use those docks a reasonable sum for such use, and that he has reason to believe the revenue derived will be a fair return for the investment, then there is something to be said in favour of it. But, I have this to say to the hon. minister when he takes that stand, that, if it would pay the government to invest in docks and harbours, why are not private parties justified in going into similar enterprises as they do in Toronto ? Why does not the government go to Toronto and construct docks ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Have we not spent $1,000,000 in Toronto ?

Mr. BENNETT. My hon. friend cannot point to where a dollar has been spent in Toronto on docks. True, where private parties have built docks you have spent money in dredging, and you have also expended money in constructing piers and rip-rap works to prevent filling in by sand. As far as Owen Sound goes, I do not think this, or the preceding government, has spent a single dollar on docks.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, on wharfs.

Mr. BENNETT. Well, I say it was wrong to spend money there for the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway or anywhere else, but if the hon. minister will explain to us what this Sorel dock is, we will understand what is proposed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not hesitate to say that any country that tried to get along on the principle enunciated by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) would not get along very fast. If you wait for private enterprise to provide accommodation for trade, you will have to wait a long time before such a system is carried out, and in a young country where we have an immense quantity of trade in prospect, if we do not provide for it, we will never secure it. I say as a matter of general policy, that it is the duty of any government to provide for the accommodation of trade by building wharfs and elevators. If I have a free hand I would not hesitate to erect elevators——

Mr. MONK. In Montreal.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In Montreal and elsewhere, because, in this century, governments must move on. But, we are doing a great deal and we cannot do everything we would like to do. As to the erection of works at Sorel, as at Goderich and elsewhere, we have to do it. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has started his criticism under the wrong impression that these works were created for the benefit of the Richelieu Company. It is nothing of the kind. These are deep water wharfs for the accommodation of the deep draught vessels that will certainly visit that port when these works are completed. As soon as these works are completed by my department they are transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and, as I have stated in connection with some other works, the law then applies and the ordinary dues are charged.

Mr. MORIN. I would like to say to the hon. minister that, as we have been informed, the New York Central Railway Company have bought the Canada Atlantic Railway, and according to what the hon. minister says, they have bought the road from Montreal to Sorel. Before they bought these roads it appears there were wharfs enough at Sorel. At least, we heard no complaint about any scarcity of wharf accommodation. How is it that as soon as these American people come in here and buy our railways we must jump right up and build wharfs for them ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. These works were given out by contract long before the New York Central bought the South Shore Railway, in fact, a year or two ago. An appropriation was voted by the House before the South Shore passed into the hands of that syndicate.

Mr. MORIN. That may all be, but I was just referring to what the hon. minister said. He said that the New York Central had bought the South Shore Railway and required these wharfs.

Mr. KEMP. As this is a very large item, I think we ought to consider it a little more fully. May I inquire what amount of money it is intended to expend on the wharf at Sorel ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. For that work ?

Mr. KEMP. Altogether.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is the only expenditure of money that has ever been asked by parliament for any works at Sorel.

Mr. MACLEAN. Will that complete the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, the amount of the contract is $255,000.

Mr. KEMP. Do I understand that it is intended to make Sorel an ocean terminal, the same as Montreal and Quebec ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. KEMP. Montreal has harbour dues and Montreal does not ask the government to build wharfs. I do not understand on what principle the government are embarking on this enterprise. If they are going to make an ocean terminal of Sorel, this is the first I have heard of the intention to cultivate a trade of that kind at that place. Do I understand that it is the intention of the New York Central to carry grain down the South Shore and transfer it at Sorel to ocean vessels to be carried thence to Europe ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Sorel is a large centre of trade already. There will be a large quantity of products that are shipped perhaps from Montreal now which will be shipped from Sorel. All that large district from St. Hyacinthe on the Richelieu river will certainly ship its produce through Sorel. This is one of the wealthiest parts of the province of Quebec and of the country. My hon. friend has just stated that the government does not vote money directly for the port of Montreal. It is true the trade has paid so far for the works that have been carried on in Montreal. I do not know whether it is the best policy that can be followed, because if we are to compete with American ports, we will be obliged to be progressive, and it may come to pass that public opinion will insist that the government shall do for Montreal what we are doing elsewhere; that is to say, carry out works at the public expense. But, so far the trade of the country that is passing through the port of Montreal is paying the interest on the money that is being expended there. It is about the only port that is supporting itself in that way.

Mr. KEMP. I do not suppose there is much difference between the opinions of my hon. friend and myself in reference to the port of Montreal. Probably if we understood each other we would agree. But, in reference to making Sorel an ocean port, it is a new proposition, and I question very much the practicability of the scheme.

The PRIME MINISTER. This question is not at all a new one. Within a short time this proposal has come before the House. In 1899, I think it was, or, in 1900, when the Minister of Public Works was away, an appropriation of $25,000 was taken. It was rather a tentative appropriation and was found to be insufficient. Nothing was done upon it. Last year, after having had complete surveys made, an appropriation of $100,000 was asked from parliament and then it was stated that these works, which were intended to be constructed at Sorel, would cost anywhere from $150,000 to $175,000. Now, the intention is to make Sorel an ocean port. This seems to surprise the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Kemp). There is really nothing in it that should surprise him. Sorel is at the confluence of the Richelieu river and the St. Lawrence, and from time immemorial it has been the great artery of communication for the whole interior of the country south of Montreal. But railways are taking the place of waterways, and two railways are now converging at Sorel, the south shore which has been constructed from Montreal to Sorel and beyond Sorel to Nicolet, and will be completed this year probably to Lotbinière. There is the United Counties Railway also which became the Rutland Railway, and which I believe now belongs to the New York Central, and it comes from the New York Central railway system at Lake Champlain to the town of Sorel. The traffic of a very wealthy section of the country, of eight or ten of the most wealthy counties in Quebec—Richelieu, St. Hyacinthe, Yamaska, St. John, Iberville—and others will come to this harbour. It is not possible to doubt that a very large trade will be brought there and this work is contemplated in order to accommodate that trade. I was surprised to hear my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) make some comparison between the expenditure in the province of Quebec and the expenditure in the province of Ontario. It does not matter in what province we make the expenditure, if it is to accommodate the trade of the country at large, which is coming more and more to the valley of the St. Lawrence, and nobody will grudge money spent for that purpose. This is not only for Sorel, but it is a part of the system to equip the harbours of Montreal, Three Rivers and Quebec. I am sure that my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Kemp) has no doubt whatever that before many years, there will be enough trade coming from Ontario and the west to supply all those harbours, of which Sorel is one.

Mr. KEMP. I am glad to have this information. I was not a member of the House when the vote was first taken in 1899 and I did not hear the discussion. In fact until now I never heard of Sorel as a prospective port for ocean vessels. When we consider how long Quebec has been stagnant and how few of the ocean vessels have called there of recent years—in fact only the Leyland line is coming here this summer after years of waiting—we may reasonably come to the conclusion that Montreal and Quebec will be for years the principal ports of the St. Lawrence. I confess that I do not see how Sorel is to become an ocean port. I quite agree with the Prime Minister that the valley of the Richelieu is very fertile but the agricultural products of that district are not sufficient to afford trade for this large harbour.

So far as the Rutland road is concerned it will bring no traffic to Sorel for export, because its terminal at one end is practically in New York, a sea port, and Sorel would be the other. It will be many years, and Montreal and Quebec will have to develop to an enormous extent, before Sorel will get any trade as an ocean port. My impression is that the wharf at Sorel at present is sufficient for the trade of that fertile valley to which the Prime Minister has referred.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Who are the contractors for this work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Messrs. Poupore & Malone.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Did the contract call for hemlock or pine.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not the specifications at hand, but I will lay them on the Table.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I would like to see them.

Mr. MONK. Will the minister lay on the Table a copy of the contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. With pleasure.

Mr. MONK. Have the works proceeded so far ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Oh, yes, they will be completed at the end of the season. Poupore and Malone have a splendid equipment, perhaps the best of all the contractors I have.

Mr. MONK. How much was spent last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. $86,000.

Mr. MONK. The minister tells us that this extension of trade is expected from the new railway companies that are interested in Sorel. Have any steps been taken by the government to find out if these railway companies would contribute any to this expenditure.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contract was awarded before the present syndicate owned these roads.

Mr. MONK. Of course it presents a very great anomaly, because if you spend such a large amount as that in towns which have a great deal of promise, the fact remains that in the city of Montreal where our harbours are still unimproved, the trade has to bear the charges of the improvements that are being made there. It is a very regrettable fact, as Mr. Reeve stated last year when he visited Montreal harbour with the Harbour Commissioners, that it was not possible immediately to put that harbour on a proper footing without any further delay. I would not begrudge any improvements that are being made at Sorel. Of course Three Rivers has a very important harbour, and Quebec I need not speak of, but you have this great difference that what is being done at these places is being done at the expense of the government, and all that is being done in Montreal is done at the expense of the trade. Under these circumstances it is a pity that this expenditure cannot be slightly reduced.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is not altogether right to say that all the work that is being carried on at Montreal is carried on at the expense of the trade. Most of the work, nearly the whole of the work is carried on that way, but my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) will not forget that the government is carrying on in the eastern portion of the harbour a very large work, the contract for which is over $600,000. The same contractors, Messrs. Poupore & Malone are proceeding with that work actively. I have been fortunate enough to be able to convince my colleagues and parliament two years ago of the necessity of starting works in the eastern portion of the Montreal harbour. One of the results has been that the Canadian Pacific Railway are locating an immense establishment in that part of the harbour.

Mr. MONK. That has nothing to do with it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, the facts are there. The Canadian Pacific Railway knew they would have accommodation. Of course the Harbour Commissioners have already built two low level wharfs, but we are building a magnificent high level wharf that will accommodate the trade. I altogether share the views of my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) that it is a great pity that the port of Montreal has not been equipped sooner, but we are now making up for lost time. I am bound to say that the works are progressing, though perhaps not as fast as I would like them to progress. I hope and trust that these improvements will be completed in the centre of the harbour, the main works, at the close of the present season. Then the equipment of the wharfs will have to be attended to.

Mr. MONK. I would only ask my hon. friend if it would be possible, in bringing down the contract for the wharf at Sorel, to bring down a copy of the contract for this work at Maisonneuve.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. With pleasure.

Valleyfield—dredging channel in Valleyfield Bay, &c., $4,000.

Mr. MONK. Where is that dredging to be done exactly ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In the harbour at Valleyfield. We started the work last year. We have done a good deal of it, and we must go on with it. Valleyfield is becoming every day a more important harbour, and we shall have to do a good deal of work there in the future, in order to accommodate the large trade centreing there.

Mr. MONK. Is there any estimate in the department of what it will cost to terminate the work begun last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer tells me that this $4,000 will complete the work in that part of the harbour where it was begun last year ; but there is a channel to be dredged 12 feet at the entrance to the harbour. I have a complete survey of this work to be done, but I cannot state just now what the cost of that additional work will be.

Mr. MONK. Is it the case that a portion of this dredging is to allow a free approach of water to the mills ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is to give a greater depth of water to the trade generally. As my hon. friend knows, Valleyfield has a population of 12,000 souls, and I anticipate that in the next few years it will have a much larger population, and we intend improving that harbour, as we do all the harbours where trade is developing.

Mr. MONK. Is any of that dredging to be done in the dam of the mills ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the minister be good enough to lay on the Table a list of the works to be done by public contract, together with a list of those to be done by day labour, out of this vote of $422,900, at some future time ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no objection. I prepared such a list last year, and I will have another prepared this year, and will lay it on the Table with pleasure.

Mr. INGRAM. Is that elevator built at Sorel, which the hon. minister promised last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not promise an elevator last year.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman stated that as a reason why he was spending so much money.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no doubt that when that work is completed, there will be an elevator built.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. gentleman made the statement last year that that was one of the reasons, and I am simply asking him whether anything more was done with that elevator.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was represented to us last year that an elevator would be built. It is not built yet, because our work is not yet above water.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS —AMENDMENTS.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I beg to introduce Bill (No. 41) in amendment of the Supreme and Exchequer Courts. The object of this Bill is to constitute the Supreme Court into a mere federal court, having jurisdiction in all civil and criminal matters, in all cases relating to the constitution, to the laws of the Dominion, to admiralty matters and to navigation laws. Further, in all suits to which the Dominion government will be a party ; in all cases between two or more provinces ; between a province and a private individual living in another province ; between private individuals from different provinces ; between private individuals claiming some real estate, in virtue of claims emanating from different provinces ; and between a province and private individuals belonging to another province or private individuals of the same province.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Bill (No. 42) to amend the Railway Act of 1888.—Mr. Scott.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—COMMISSION ON OUTLAY.

Mr. SPROULE—by Mr. Maclean—asked :

Has the government had any communication with, or from the Colonial Office, or the War Department of the Imperial government with reference to the 3 per cent commission said to be granted to certain Australian colonies on outlay in connection with expenditure for the war in South Africa ? If so, has any conclusion been arrived at in the matter, and if so, what, and will the papers be brought down at an early date ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). No such communication has been received from the Colonial Office or from the War Office.

THE CENSUS—COST OF ENUMERATION.

Mr. SPROULE—by Mr. Maclean—asked :

1. What was the cost of the enumeration of the census in 1891 and 1901, respectively ?
2. What was the cost of the work in the county of Grey for 1891 and 1901, respectively ?
3. How were the enumerators paid, whether by the day or for each name or family, also factory ?
4. If by the day, how many hours were to constitute a day, and was overtime paid for at some proportionate rate ?
5. If paid so much per name or family and industrial establishment, what was the rate for each ?
6. How many enumerators were employed for census of 1891 and 1901, respectively ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) to move for a return of the information sought in this question.

CASCUMPEC HARBOUR, P. E. I.—RANGE LIGHTS AT THE SANDHILLS.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. Did the Department of Marine and Fisheries instruct Mr. Lord, the agent at Charlottetown, to remove the range lights at the Sandhills, Cascumpec Harbour, Prince county, Prince Edward Island, on or about the first day of May, 1901 ?
2. If so, were those instructions given because the lights were in a wrong position and dangerous to mariners frequenting the harbour ?
3. On what date was the change made ?
4. Was the department aware that the lights were in a wrong position from the date of the instructions to Mr. Lord until the change was made ?
5. Were the lights in operation from the first of May until the change was made, and was the keeper paid his salary during that time ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. James Sutherland) :

1. Instructions were given to Mr. Lord, on the 19th June, 1901, to remove the range lights from the Sandhills to Sandy Island.

2. These instructions were given because a change in the channel necessitated a removal of the range as explained to the hon. member for West Prince last year. Frequent changes in this range are necessitated by constant changes in the channel over the bar at the mouth of the harbour.

3. 11th July, 1901.

4. The range lights previously maintained on the Sand Heads had been put out in the autumn of 1900. The change was made in the summer of 1901, as soon as the position of the new channel had been accurately defined.

5. The lights were not in operation from the 1st of May until the change was made. The keeper was paid salary for maintaining the main sea-coast light which was under his charge. His salary was increased $40 per annum from the 1st of December last, in consequence of the extra work involved in maintaining the range lights on Sandy Island.

CHICKEN-FATTENING STATIONS, P.E.I.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. Where are the chicken-fattening stations in West Prince, Prince Edward Island, situated ?
2. Who are the persons in charge of same ?
3. What number of chickens was purchased for these stations last year ?
4. What was the price paid ?
5. In what market were the fattened chickens sold, and what were the prices realized ?
6. What was the expense of each station, and the amount paid in wages and expenses to the parties in charge, giving names and amounts for each station, respectively ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher) :

1. There is one station in West Prince, P.E.I., situated at Alberton.
2. Mr. Henry J. Matthews.
3. 204 chickens.
4. $52.50.
5. Shipped to England, account sales not yet received.
6. Wages to Henry J. Matthews, $50; other labour, $10.20; crates and feed, $49.48

FISHING LICENSES, PRINCE COUNTY, P.E.I.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. How many fishing licenses were issued by Edmund Matthews, fishery guardian at Alberton, Prince County, Prince Edward Island, in the years 1900 and 1901, respectively ?
2. What are the names of parties to whom licenses were granted, and the kinds of fish for which such licenses were given ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. James Sutherland) :

1. Local guardians do not issue licenses.
2. I would be much pleased to bring down the information. It is a very voluminous document, and if my hon. friend will move for a return, I will see that it is brought down.

COMMISSION ON DISBURSEMENTS FOR IMPERIAL AUTHORITIES.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria) asked :

1. Has the government received from the Imperial War Office or Colonial Office, a circular announcing that three (3) per cent commission will be allowed to the Canadian government on disbursements made on behalf of the Imperial authorities ?
2. If not three (3) per cent commission, what commission was named ?
3. Is it the purpose or intention of the government to accept such commission ?
4. Has such commission been charged the Imperial authorities by the Canadian government, or by any agents recommended or appointed by the Canadian government ?
5. What agents or inspectors for Imperial purchases in Canada were recommended directly or indirectly by the Canadian government, or by any member thereof ? What commissions did these receive ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) :

1. No communication of that nature has been received, as already stated, from the War Office or from the Colonial Office.
4. No commissions have been charged.
5. Officers of the Inspectors' Department have generally been acting, but without any commission.

CENSUS ENUMERATORS, SOUTH WATERLOO.

Mr. CLARE—by Mr. Lennox—asked :

1. Who were the enumerators for the electoral division of South Waterloo in the taking of the recent census ?
2. What was the amount paid to each for his services ?
3. By whom were the enumerators recommended ?
4. Was there any special enumerator assigned for securing information as to manufacturing interests in the said riding, or in any part thereof ?
5. If so, who was the special enumerator, and what amount was paid to him for his services ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher) :

PROPERTY AND CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. B. RUSSELL (Hants) moved :

That in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived when steps should be taken to carry out the provisions of section 94 of the British North America Act, for securing the uniformity of the laws relating to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and in such other provinces as have been brought within the scope of the section since the passing of the British North America Act.

He said : The motion that I desire to commend to the favourable consideration of the House, was placed on the Order paper at the last session of parliament, but no favourable opportunity was presented for its discussion. I regard it as one of the most interesting and important subjects that could be brought to the attention of this Chamber, although I am well aware that it is not in the smallest degree of an exciting or sensational character, and I do not venture to hope that it will make so strong an appeal to the consideration of the general public as many others with which this House is called upon to deal. It relates to a provision of the British North America Act for securing such a degree of uniformity in the laws of the various provinces of the Dominion as may be found acceptable and advantageous to the legislatures and people of those provinces. This provision in substantially similar terms to those appearing in the British North America Act, was embodied in the resolutions of the Quebec Conference on which our Constitutional Act is founded, and I think it may be fairly presented as a compromise between the views of those members of the Conference who favoured a legislative union of the provinces, and those who opposed such a union. Or perhaps I shall speak with greater accuracy if I say that it was adopted as a solution of the difficulty that presented itself to those members of the Conference who, while they leaned towards the project of a legislative union, realized that under the conditions that surrounded them it would be undesirable and in fact impossible for the various provinces to make such a sacrifice of their autonomy as the consummation of a legislative union would involve.

It is well known to those of us who are old enough to recall the proceedings of that historic assembly, or who have had occasion to peruse the debates to which its proceedings gave rise, that some of the most renowned and able political leaders and publicists who took part in the discussions of that period looked with great favour upon the project of a legislative union. Sir John A. Macdonald made no secret of his preference for such a union, assuming that there had been no practical difficulties in the way of the consummation. But there were difficulties which the practical wisdom of the Conference was obliged to frankly recognize. I think it is very widely and generally assumed that such difficulties had reference solely to the peculiar conditions of language, laws and institutions prevailing in what is now the province of Quebec. No doubt the institutions of Lower Canada, guarded and guaranteed by an inviolable treaty, had much to do with the ultimate decision of the Conference, but Quebec did not stand alone in its preference for a federal union. A perusal of the debates that occurred in the legislative assembly of United Canada on the adoption of the resolutions of the Quebec Conference, and still more a knowledge of the discussions that took place throughout New Brunswick and Nova Scotia would, I am sure, convince any impartial man that even if there had been no province of Quebec to be incorporated in the proposed union, had the objections to a legislative union presented by the conditions in Lower Canada been wholly eliminated, it would nevertheless have been impossible to secure the assent of the remaining provinces to a surrender of their provincial autonomy. You will find in those discussions references to the enormous extent of the territory to be administered and the immense variety of subjects with which its legislature, under such a union, would be called upon to deal, you will find arguments against a legislative union drawn from the experience of the parliament of the United Kingdom, where an assembly wielding the sovereignty and dealing with the interests of a world-wide empire is absurdly called upon from time to time to pass laws for the regulation of gas works or a tram service in some obscure town in a remote corner of the island. You will find, moreover, in those discussions evidence of the sensitiveness of some of the smaller provinces to an apprehension lest under a legislative union they would forfeit the right of immediate and direct control over matters that they regarded as of vital importance to their happiness and welfare. These considerations, let me repeat, even apart from any special desire on the part of Lower Canada would have made it impossible to adopt a legislative union. But in addition to all these arguments which in themselves would have been conclusive, the Conference had to take into its account the deep and fond attachment naturally and properly felt by the people of Lower Canada for the laws and institutions inherited from their forefathers and guaranteed to them by treaty which will be forever held sacred, so long as truth and justice and national good faith remain the stable foundations of British sovereignty. We may differ upon many questions of public policy in this House, and we may differ in our judgments as to many of the great questions that have arisen from time to time during the period that has passed since the Act of Confederation was adopted, but I take it that there are no two opinions in this House as to the wisdom of the conclusion that was arrived at by the Conference at Quebec when the project of a legislative union in so far as it had ever been mooted at all, was definitively set aside as impracticable and the federal principle was frankly and unreservedly adopted as the basis of our union. I should ask for no support and expect no support for this resolution if I supposed that it could be justly objected to as menacing in the faintest degree the fundamental principle of federalism upon which this confederation stands. It contains no such menace. It is open to no such objection.

What is the essence of the federal principle in so far as it relates to the question in hand ? The essence of that principle is that in regard to all matters upon which it may be conceived that the several provinces composing the union may have different views and cherish different ideals as to what is just and expedient in their legislation, the exclusive authority to legislate shall be vested in the provincial legislature. That is one proposition and one that is of the utmost importance to the well-being of the Dominion. But that proposition connotes another which is equally important and equally necessary to the adequate statement of the principle, namely, that in all matters upon which it is for the general good that a uniform system of legislation should prevail throughout the Dominion, the legislative authority should be committed to a central parliament having power to make its edicts binding upon all. It would not be pardonable in me to occupy the time of the House with proofs or illustrations of such an obvious and palpable truism. A comparison of the subjects of legislation assigned to the central parliament and to the provincial legislatures respectively would be simply a pretentious presentation of that with which every hon. gentleman is already familiar. But one single illustration may perhaps be permitted for the reason that it lies so directly in the path that this discussion is bound to follow. The subject of property and civil rights has been assigned to the provincial legislatures. Why ? Because in one at least of the provinces that compose the union and perhaps to a certain degree in more than one province different views prevail from those that find acceptance in other provinces as to what is just and expedient in the laws that govern the ownership, the enjoyment, the transfer and the devolution of property, either real or personal. The law of contract has been held to come within the definition that covers the general subject of property and civil rights, and there were at the time the Confederation Act was adopted variant provisions in the several provinces as to the validity and authentication of contracts and variant provisions as to the evidence by which they should be proved in courts of justice. And yet one most important class of contracts, one most important species of property was committed to the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of this Dominion parliament. Why? Because bills of exchange and promissory notes are of such a cosmopolitan character, they travel so freely and so widely from province to province, drawn in one province, payable in another, indorsed in still another and perhaps in others more than one, that it was above all things desirable that the rights arising out of their creation or resulting from their dishonour, should be determined by a uniform body of principles, no matter in which of the various provinces the contract happened to be made, or in which of them it should happen to be broken. Furthermore, the laws of the various provinces in regard to bills and notes were substantially uniform already and no possible reason could be suggested for withholding from the central parliament the authority to legislate upon the subject. On other species of property and as to other descriptions of contract, the case was entirely different. Had they been assigned to the parliament of the Dominion the apprehension was a perfectly reasonable one that legislation might be adopted that would revolutionize in one of the provinces the system with which the people of that province were familiar, to which they were greatly attached and which they regard as being founded on more equitable principles and developed according to more logical and scientific methods than the laws prevailing in other parts of the Dominion. It is no part of my undertaking to-day to pass judgment upon this preference. I am not sure that any claim of superiority is made on the part of our friends from Quebec for the system of law that they have inherited and developed. It is sufficient for all purposes to know that they prefer it and that they have an absolute and undisputed right to be the sole and final judges in the matter. If a claim of superiority is made we may for the purposes of this argument without hesitation concede it. Possibly a fuller knowledge of the matter and a greater freedom from prepossessions than is possible to those of us who have been trained in a different system would dispose us to make the concession for all purposes whatever. But whether such a claim is made or not, whether we concede the claim or not, it must still remain true, that as to the other provinces of the Dominion, or most of them, there are many subjects, and that more especially among those falling within the definition of property and civil rights, upon which a uniform body of legislation would be as great a blessing as the uniformity of our legislation on bills of exchange and promissory notes has been found to be to the Dominion as a whole. The law that regulates the sale of personal property presents as favourable a field for assimilation throughout the provinces in which the common law prevails as the law of bills and notes presented for assimilation throughout the Dominion at large. The principles applicable to the formation, operation and discharge of contracts generally present precisely the same conditions. Of the provisions of the statutes of Elizabeth against fraudulent conveyances and voluntary conveyances to the prejudice of bona fide purchasers, the same thing is to be said. So as to the principles that govern the validity and authentication of the contracts of incorporated bodies, so as to the rules of evidence in civil cases. So for the most part of the laws that govern the mutual rights and obligations arising out of family relationship, including the rights of the husband and the wife in the property of each other. So as to the devolution of real estate and the succession to personalty. There is even now in respect to all these and many other subjects that might be named, a large degree of uniformity in the legislation that has been adopted by the various provinces of the Dominion, so great a degree in fact that it is a matter of wonderment that it has not long ago been deemed advisable to consider whether an actual and absolute uniformity should not prevail in all the provinces whose system is founded upon the common law.

I have referred to these subjects only in the most cursory manner and I have done so merely by way of preface to the observations that I propose to quote from the speech of Sir John A. Macdonald in moving the ratification of the Quebec resolutions in the parliament of United Canada. All that I have been saying was obvious to the clear-headed and far-seeing statesmen who constituted that Conference at Quebec, and with a view of providing for such a uniformity as was desirable in the legal systems of the provinces governed by the common law they had embodied among the powers to be exercised by the Federal parliament the following, which was numbered 33 :

> Rendering uniform all or any of the laws relative to property and civil rights in Upper Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, and rendering uniform the procedure of all or any of the courts in these provinces; but any statute for this purpose shall have no force or authority in any province until sanctioned by the legislature thereof.

Referring to this resolution, Sir John A. Macdonald said :

> The 33rd provision is of very great importance to the future well-being of these colonies. It commits to the general parliament the rendering uniform all or any of the laws relating to property and civil rights in Upper Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, and rendering uniform the procedure of all or any of the courts of these provinces. The great principles that govern the laws of all the provinces with the single exception of Lower Canada are the same, although there may be divergence in details, and it is gratifying to find on the part of the lower provinces a general desire to join together with Upper Canada in the matter and to procure as soon as possible an assimilation of the statutory laws and the procedure of the courts of all those provinces. At present there is a good deal of diversity. In one of the colonies, for instance, they have no municipal system at all. In another the municipal system is merely permissive and has not been adopted to any extent. Although, therefore, a legislative union was found to be almost impracticable it was understood, so far as we could influence the future, that the first act of the future government should be to procure an assimilation of the statutory law of all those provinces which has as its root and foundation the common law of England. But to prevent local institutions from being over ridden, the same section makes provision that while power is given to the general legislature to deal with this subject, no change in this respect should have the force and authority of law in any province until sanctioned by the legislature of that province.

If I had any fear that the project outlined in the motion now before the House should seem to any hon. member to wear an utopian aspect, that the discussion of such a motion should seem to have an air of unreality and visionariness, I should point to these words of a statesman, who, whatever may have been thought his failings and shortcomings, was never accused by his bitterest enemy of the crime of visionariness or undue ideality. Far from it, Sir, he was a politician of a practical character, as we all know, and, that, in the intenser meaning of the term. When so practical a statesman as Sir John A. Macdonald used the language I have quoted, he most undoubtedly anticipated that among the very first measures of the Federal parliament would be an Act to carry into effect the wise provisions of this section for securing the uniformity of our provincial laws. These were no mere idle words inserted in the statute to indulge the fad of some visionary dreamer, nor was this provision intended or expected to remain upon the statute-book sterile and unproductive for more than thirty years. Sir John A. Macdonald expected to see it acted upon among the first enterprises of the newly constituted union. Why has it remained for so many years a mere unrealized dream ? Why, is it that, so far from seeing it fructify in a useful and serviceable body of legislation, we have seen it remaining for so many years—the good third of a century—as lifeless in appearance, yet, happily as capable of being clothed with life and vigour, as those seeds we have all heard of that were found in the hands of the Egyptian mummy.

Well, it may be that the reasons are not so difficult to find. During the earlier years of our history as a union, there were many problems to challenge the attention of our public men and many tasks awaiting their busy and weary brains. There were sectional claims and aspirations to be satisfied or appeased. There was a recalcitrant province to be pacified. If there were not racial antagonisms to be reconciled there were racial suspicions to be removed. There were vast material interests clamouring for recognition, an Intercolonial Railway, the seal and bond of union, to be constructed, canals and waterways to be deepened and enlarged, conflicting views of fiscal policy to be adjusted, and all the vast and varied concerns of a nascent political community to be harmoniously regulated and directed to a common issue in the welfare of the new Dominion. No very great effort of the historical imagination is required to enable us to understand why this subject was under such circumstances allowed for the moment to sleep. But I venture to hope that the time has at length arrived when we may at least begin to think seriously about the matter, and to that end I will ask the House to permit me to set forth in order the advantages that in my judgment may be expected to follow the accomplishment of this task. I may not enumerate them in their logical order or even in the order of their importance. I will present them in the order in which they have occurred to my own mind.

First, then, by rendering our legislation uniform we may avail ourselves to the fullest possible extent and on the widest possible scale of the improvements in legislation that have been effected by the mother country in recent years. Let me amplify this proposition by reference to an illustration that has been already used for another purpose. A number of years ago Mr. M. D. Chalmers, as he then was, attempted to draw out and present in the form of a digest, a series of plain, perspicuous, intelligible propositions, embodying the legal doctrines and principles relating to the subject of bills of exchange and promissory notes—principles and doctrines which he deduced from the decisions of the courts extending over several centuries, running up into the hundreds and covering pages in the law reports that might be numbered by the thousand. In fact he has told us himself in an article in the 'Law Quarterly Review' that for the purposes of his work, whether the digest or the code that was subsequently founded upon it, I am not quite certain which, he read twenty-five hundred cases in the law reports and seventeen statutory enactments. His digest was subjected to the fire of professional criticism and was found to be an adequate and satisfactory statement of the law on the various points with which it dealt. After a trial of several years its various propositions were embodied in the form of an Act entitled 'An Act to codify the law relating to bills of exchange and promissory notes.' This was passed by the English parliament in 1882. It was, I believe, the first experiment in codification ever made by the Imperial parliament. It was not absolutely perfect. It did not even approach as nearly to perfection as legal knowledge and skill in the lucid expression of legal principles might have made it. It had to run the gauntlet of two Houses of parliament, each containing a number of members who considered themselves better authorities on the matter than Mr. Chalmers, who had made the subject his specialty. But nobody could deny that it made the law more accessible and more certain, that it set at rest a number of debated questions and was on the whole a luminous exposition of the legal doctrines and principles relating to the subject with which it dealt. That it was not perfect has been admitted. It must be confessed that one of its sections gave rise to a protracted litigation that could not have arisen if it had never been passed, but the amount involved was enormous, the litigants were wealthy and the result of the litigation established a general principle applicable not only to this piece of legislation but to all similar codifying statutes that may from time to time be adopted in any part of the empire. It was as to the particular section in question in the case referred to that the draftsman of the statute was frank enough to quote against himself the remark attributed to Lessing when one of his disciples questioned him as to the meaning of a passage in one of his lectures. 'My young friend' said the great philosopher, 'when I penned that passage, only God and myself knew what it meant, and now only God knows.'

The Bills and Notes Act was passed in England in 1882. Some years after it had been in force in the old country attention was directed to it in a series of letters in the 'Toronto Mail,'—the parentage of which modesty forbids me to disclose—and the government of Canada was urged to simplify and clarify the law for us in this country by enacting the statute here. The inference from post hoc to propter hoc is not always conclusive and I have no means of knowing whether it would have any validity in this particular case. It is sufficient to say, and it is the only material thing for us to know that within a twelvemonth from the appearance of this publication the statute was introduced here and passed in 1890, with some very slight modifications to make it more in accord with the mercantile and banking usages that had grown up in this country. It has been accepted by the banking institutions as a great boon and the public spirit and unselfish scientific instinct of the legal profession has welcomed it with equal cordiality, although rendering the law more simple, ascertainable and accessible it has to that extent taken away their usefulness and reduced their emoluments.

Since the passing of the Bills and Notes Act, other experiments in codification have been made by the Imperial parliament. The law relating to Partnership and the law relating to the Sale of Goods have been embodied in codifying statutes drawn by the most competent hands, and which before being adopted by parliament have gone through very much the same ordeal by which the Bills and Notes Act was tested and proved. The Sale of Goods Act was introduced in the Imperial parliament in 1888. It remained in process of incubation for five years and was not enacted as a statute until 1893. It also is not perfect. One of the most competent judges pronounces the Act as in parts by no means easy to interpret, and occasionally very obscure, but in justice to the learned draftsman he adds that the difficulties for the most part if not in all cases have sprung from additions and emendations introduced into the Bill in its passage through parliament. But in spite of its defects, which this parliament, with the ten years experience of the working of the statute could very easily avoid, it remains a useful and convenient statement of an important branch of the law of personal property. Now there are precisely the same reasons for the enactment of this statute in all those portions of the Dominion where the common law prevails that there was for the enactment of the Bills and Notes Act for the Dominion as a whole. None of the provincial legislatures, so far as I am aware, has yet adopted this enactment. It may be confidently predicted that several of them will sooner or later do so, and it may be eventually accepted by them all. Let us anticipate for a moment what in that case is most likely to happen. In every legislature there will be found some hon. members who deem themselves competent to improve upon the work of Mr. Chalmers. Some will amend one set of provisions, some another, and some a third. In place of a uniform code of law applicable to all the provinces in which the common law prevails and in relation to a contract as to which no conceivable reason can be suggested for any differences in treatment in any of those provinces, we may expect to see a variety of different statutes creating wholly unnecessary confusion in respect to a body of legal principles which might throughout the greater part of the Dominion so easily be made uniform, simple, intelligible and accessible to all who have occasion to apply them to the transactions of daily life.

My friends from the province of Quebec will, I know, be the first to realize the importance of the considerations that I have just referred to. Their studies enable them, better than many of us can, to understand the inconveniences of an anomalous jurisprudence and to appreciate the advantages that flow from its uniformity and simplicity. Their ancestors in the old land enjoyed in fullest measure the blessings of a jurisprudence untouched by the meddlesome fingers of the law reformer. They will recall the conditions described with such amplitude of learning by my hon. friend the member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) in his work 'Sur les Origines du Droit Franco-Canadien.' They will remember that Voltaire, referring to those conditions remarked, in his accustomed vein of satire that the traveller in France had to change his laws as often as he changed his horses. Sir Henry Maine has told us that at that time 'France was smitten with the curse of an anomalous and dissonant jurisprudence beyond every other country in Europe. One great division ran through the country and separated it into 'Pays de Droit Ecrit' and 'Pays du Droit Coutumier,' the first acknowledging the written Roman law as the basis of their jurisprudence, the last admitting it only so far as it supplied general forms of expression and courses of judicial reasoning which were reconcilable with local usages. The sections thus formed were again variously subdivided. In the 'Pays du Droit Coutumier,' province differed from province, county from county, municipality from municipality in the nature of its customs. In the 'Pays de Droit Ecrit' the stratum of feudal rules which overlay the Roman law was of the most miscellaneous composition.' I hope my friend (Mr. Lemieux) will, in the course of this discussion, show us how this condition of things has been improved upon by the labours of French jurists in the old country and in this, for I am well assured that such an exposition will powerfully reinforce the argument that I have been endeavouring to present. I cannot imagine that our friends from that province who have been lifted out of the horrible pit and out of the miry clay of an unreformed jurisprudence will permit their neighbours to continue floundering in the same Serbonain bog of 'anomaly and dissonance.' They will sympathize with our aspirations after uniformity, consistency and simplicity and when we call for so easily accessible a boon as a law to regulate throughout our provinces the formation, authentication proof, operation and discharge of a contract of such every day occurrence as the contract for the sale of goods, I will be surprised and disappointed if we do not have their cordial assistance and co-operation.

But the Acts that I have mentioned, the Bills of Exchange Act, the Partnership Act, and the Sale of Goods Act, do not exhaust the possibilities of improvement in the form of English law. A bill has been introduced for the purpose of codifying the law relating to marine insurance. It has not yet been passed and it ought not to be passed without the most mature consideration, but we may be well assured that a bill on this subject from the hand of Judge Chalmers or some other equally competent will eventually be enacted and that other branches of the law will from time to time be taken in hand and subjected to the same treatment that has been applied to the subjects that have already been so dealt with. Now, it is of the highest importance in the interest of scientific jurisprudence, it is of the highest importance in the interest of simplicity, lucidity and certainty in the statement of the law that we should be in the best position possible to avail ourselves of the labours of the jurists of the mother country in this field, and that wherever a codifying statute has been proved by experience to present a lucid, correct and orderly statement of the law, we should be in a position to make it applicable to all those portions of the Dominion to the circumstances of which it is adapted.

But there are subjects upon which we do not need to await the action of the British parliament or to be dependent upon the labours of old country jurists. Consider such a matter as the constitution of joint stock companies, the rights of their individual members, the powers of the governing body, the protection of minorities, the authentication and proof of their contracts, the provisions for putting them out of business when they should no longer be cumbering the ground, in other words their winding up and the distribution of their assets among their creditors or stockholders as the case may be. Let me ask the House if it would not be an inestimable boon to this country that upon these subjects there should be one simple, just and uniform series of provisions applicable not merely to companies incorporated under Dominion legislation, but to all companies throughout the Dominion so far as legislation by the combined action of federal and provincial authority can be adapted to the accomplishment of that result. On this and other subjects to which I shall not refer in detail I am entirely unable to anticipate what possible objection can be made to the proposal.

I have dwelt long enough on this aspect of the question. Let me refer to another of the advantages to flow from the adoption of this resolution. The wider the area over which a statute is operative the sooner its meaning becomes settled and understood. No matter with what degree of precision the terms of a statute are drawn, its provisions must of necessity be more or less in need of interpretation. It is impossible for the draftsman of a statute to foresee all the possible cases to which its provisions are meant to be applicable, and equally impossible to anticipate with certainty the meanings that will be attributed to the form of words he has used. The meaning of those terms can only be settled by the results of the litigation in which the statute is invoked. Doubtless the original framers of the statute for the prevention of frauds and perjuries imagined that they were passing an Act the terms of which were plain, clear and intelligible, drawn up in language which, if not understanded of the people would be easily comprehended by the class of trained interpreters who would be called upon to advise upon or interpret its provisions. If these were indeed their expectations, how have they not been falsified by the event. If it was no exaggerated praise of that statute to say as one luminary whose name I cannot at the moment recall is reported to have said, that every line of it was worth a subsidy, it was certainly a valid retort to answer that every line of it had cost a subsidy.

If you will examine such a work as Professor Langdell's selection of cases on the sale of goods, a subject to which one of the sections of this famous statute specially refers, you will find, what I believe is equally applicable to every other important section of the statute, that there is not a single significant praise contained in it that has not given rise to at least a score of cases in the courts, and that some of its terms have required for their interpretation not less than sixty or seventy cases. It is upon facts like this that the objectors to codification base their arguments in opposition to that project. But in the absence of a statute the case is to say the least no better. The law of contract in its general outlines has been more free from the operations of the legislature whether for good or evil than any other branch of the law. Examine then if you please, some such work as Langdell's select cases on contract, and note how many years of litigation it required; how many decisions of the courts were necessary to settle so apparently simple a question as the precise point of time at which a contract by correspondence becomes complete and binding on both parties by the communication of an offer, and its acceptance. You will find no less than twenty-nine cases massed by that learned writer upon this one topic. Those cases range over a period from 1789 to 1876, and after a hundred years of litigation Mr. Langdell was unable to answer one of the most obvious questions that could be asked and a question with reference to a contingency that might be expected to happen any day in the week. Even at this day, although one question that he could not answer has been settled since his publication by a later decision, two of the simplest questions that could be asked remain unsettled yet. It is not, according to the best text writer on the subject, regarded as absolutely certain that the rules developed for the regulation of contracts by correspondence apply in their entirety to communication by the telegraph, and two of the most widely accepted and authoritative text books present diametrically opposite opinions on the question whether the acceptance of an offer once committed to the post office can be recalled and cancelled by telegram before its actual communication to the person to whom it has been addressed. It is difficult to see on what grounds such a method of constructing a legal system can claim any very clear superiority over the much abused expedient of codification. But the advocacy of this motion does not necessarily involve the difficult question of codification, and I should be sorry to have its success dependent upon my convincing the House of the feasibility and utility of codification. The point is that whether you depend for the development of your system of jurisprudence upon its evolution by the unaided operations of the judiciary or seek to hasten and give direction to its development by wise and sane legislation, you are still dependent to a greater or less degree upon the accidents of litigation for the principles of law that it will embody. The debt that jurisprudence owes to the individual litigant has never been adequately acknowledged. The quarrelsome citizen who goes to law with his neighbour may imagine that it is for himself, that he is spending his own money and destroying his neighbour's peace. Let that be his delusion. Or to speak more wisely, let him console himself whether successful or not in the immediate object that he may have in view with the consciousness that he has done the state some service, and more especially if he is a defeated litigant let him pocket his disappointment and allow his lawyer to pocket his fees, well knowing that he has made a contribution to the jurisprudence of his country, that far outweighs in its importance any momentary disappointment to which he has been subjected. In the vivisection controversy I remember having seen somewhere a reflection on the satisfaction that it might be conceived to afford to a dog that was being stretched upon the table of the vivisector were he only rational enough to understand and altruistic enough to appreciate the boon that his torments were destined to confer upon the human race in the alleviation of suffering and the prolongation of human life. The litigant who is stretched upon the table of the vivisector in this case is rational if not always altruistic and he should know the full extent of the consolations of which he may avail himself. The blood of the martyrs we are told is the seed of the church. In the same manner may we not say that the tears shed and the taxed costs paid by successive generations of suitors have been the gentle showers and stimulating manurance that have enriched and beautified that admirable jurisprudence in whose shadow we securely dwell.

But, perhaps the subject does not lend itself to either humorous or poetic treatment. Let me return to plain prose and cold-blooded common sense. The point I am endeavouring to make is that the wider the field over which a statute is operative, the more frequent the cases that arise calling for the interpretation of its terms, the more quickly the meaning of those terms is reduced to certainty, obscurities are cleared up, ambiguities are removed, and amendments adopted where found to be necessary for the elimination of inelegancies and the removal of inconsistencies. Instead of each little jurisdiction groping about in darkness and uncertainty because of the variant provisions of the statutes and the impossibility of borrowing light from one another, you have the light of all concentrated upon the same difficulty, the learning and the wisdom of all directed to the same problem and a jurisprudence evolved which must of necessity be characterized by higher wisdom, broader learning and more perfect consistency and lucidity than it would be possible to attain in the absence of the uniformity of legislation towards which this resolution is directed.

Let me refer to one more advantage that I contemplate from the adoption of this proposal. A large part of the body of positive law actually operative in this country and administered by our courts of justice consists of principles of the common law of England which as colonists we are supposed to have brought with us to this country, and statutes passed by the Imperial parliament before we had legislatures of our own. But all the common law of England has not come with us to this country. Some of it has been ad judged unsuitable for exportation whether because it was too good for us, or because it was not good enough, it is not necessary now to inquire. And so as to the old statute law of England, while some of it has been held to be in force in the colonies, some of it has been held to be inoperative here. Conflicting decisions have been made in different provinces as to the extent to which it is operative on this side of the ocean. In my own province it has been decided that while the whole common law of England is in force there, excepting such parts as are obviously inconsistent with the circumstances of the country, no part of the old statute law will be received unless it is obviously applicable and necessary. Other provinces have adopted substantially the same criterion. But the question must always present itself how are you to determine and by what lights are you to determine whether a given statute is or is not obviously applicable to the conditions of a province of the empire. Every ten years or thereabouts some enterprising practitioner makes discovery of some ancient statute of the realm which he contends is applicable to the circumstances of the province and the rights of suitors are thrown into a state of uncertainty until the merits of the contention are determined. Let me be permitted to say that this condition of things is not worthy to be dignified with the name of law. It is not law. It is the absence, the direct negation, of law; nay, more, it is the antithesis of law. It is not cosmos but chaos. In the province of Ontario they have done better. They settled the question once for all by a statute, 32 George III., and I observe that a compilation has been recently issued under the authority of the Ontario government, presenting among other things in black and white in authoritative terms all the statutes of the parent country which are in force in the province of Ontario. In so far as these statutes relate to property and civil rights, I see no reason why the other provinces should not gladly follow the lead of Ontario. I am convinced that so far as my own province is concerned we would thus clear up many doubts and solve some questions that have hitherto been simply insoluble puzzles.

A still further advantage that would without doubt result from the adoption of this resolution would be the removal of anomalies and the correction of mistakes that occur to a greater or less extent in the laws of all the provinces. I would not care to detain the House with details in illustration of this point. I have had occasion in an essay that has been in print a number of years, to mention some illustrations under this head, and it will not be necessary to elaborate the matter further. It must be perfectly obvious that the moment a serious attempt is made to enact in the form of a statute a body of laws relating to property and civil rights for any considerable group of provinces, errors and anomalies must be brought to light which under our present system may go undiscovered for many years until some unfortunate suitor makes shipwreck of his estate and property because of their accidental discovery. The law relating to the consolidation of mortgages, for example, as settled by the jurisprudence of the equity courts, presented a case of possible injustice and surprise which called for the intervention of the Imperial parliament in the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act of 1881. This amending Act has therefore been in force in England for over twenty years, but some of the provincial legislatures have not yet discovered the fact of its having been passed, or if they have discovered the statute have thus far failed to realize the dangers against which it was meant to provide. There are without doubt similar cases in several of the provinces that would be brought to light the moment a serious attempt was made to grapple with the subject.

One further consideration and I shall have concluded my presentation of the case. I should consider it far from being the least of the benefits that would flow from the adoption of this resolution, that it would help to eliminate from our jurisprudence one cause of conflict between Federal and provincial authority. The cases on the British North America Act are full of instances which go to show how difficult it is to draw the line with precision between the legislation with reference to property and civil rights which is within the competence of the provincial legislatures and that which trenches upon the legislative authority of this parliament. Several of our provincial legislatures have undertaken to pass laws which seem for all the world to resemble a bankrupt law. They have certainly been sailing very close to the wind, and although the statute has been sustained by the Court of Appeal in Ontario, it is not absolutely certain that the last word has been said. A generation that has witnessed the game of see-saw that has been played between the courts on this side and on the other side of the Atlantic on such subjects as the Manitoba school law, the liquor license question and the question of the fisheries, will not be too sanguine as to the finality of any settlement until the highest court has spoken, and after the last word has been spoken by the highest court it seems that the services of the interpreter may still be called for. In any event, it would surely be an obvious advantage that in as many cases as possible where the legislative authority is debateable the question should be set at rest, as it would be under the provisions of this section by the combined action of the Federal and provincial legislatures on all questions of property and civil rights throughout the provinces to which the provision applies.

I trust I have been able to convince the House that there is at least something to be said in favour of the motion of which I have given notice. I have not exhausted the subject, whatever effect I may have produced in that kind upon the House. I have not stated even in outline all the arguments that could be presented in favour of the motion. To sum up the question in a few words, there were, speaking broadly, three classes of subjects of legislation which by the British North America Act were to be parcelled out between the Federal parliament and the various provincial legislatures. On one of these classes of subjects the requirements of all the provinces are precisely the same, the legislation is properly uniform, and for that reason the authority to legislate is committed exclusively to this parliament, saving, of course, the veto of the sovereign. As to another class of subjects, it is conceivable that each and every province may require provisions peculiar to itself, either because of exceptional conditions or for the reason that in respect to them it is deemed advantageous to the public good that the direct and immediate control by the provincial legislatures should be retained. As to this class of subjects the plenary authority to legislate has for one or other of these reasons been committed, subject to the right of disallowance, to the provinical legislatures.

Between these extreme classes there is a middle class of subjects with respect to which one province and possibly more than one may call for exceptional treatment, while as to all the others there is no reason whatever in the nature of things why their legislation should not be precisely the same. It is to this class of subjects that the provisions of section 94 refer, under which power is given to this parliament to legislate for the purpose of rendering the system of laws of those provinces uniform, with the proviso that no such legislation shall be operative in any province until it has been ratified by the legislature of that province. The exercise of this power was confidently anticipated and assumed as a matter of course by some of leading spirits in the conference at Quebec. It was desired more especially, Sir John A. Macdonald has told us, by the lower provinces, which are the smaller provinces, and which one might have been inclined to fear would be a little jealous of their independence and inclined to retain it. The exercise of the power would, as I have shown, improve the body of our laws by giving us the benefit of those enactments upon which the law-reforming zeal and intelligence of the mother country have been engaged. It would render our system more certain, more intelligible and more accessible than it can ever otherwise become. It would result in the correction of dangerous mistakes and the removal of awkward anomalies. It would obviate a number of embarrassing questions of conflicting constitutional authority, and finally by conducing to the production of a harmonious and consistent body of jurisprudence, it would tend to realize that fitness for universal application which is the essential characteristic of anything that can be properly dignified with the name of law.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). It was originally expected that the hon. member for New Westminister (Mr. Morrison) would second the resolution of the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) and bring forward a few observations probably from the standpoint of British Columbia. That hon. gentleman, not being well this afternoon, asked me if I would take his place as the seconder of this resolution. I do not profess to be so thoroughly enthusiastic over the prospect of the uniformity of the legislation of the Dominion and the various provinces as the hon. mover of the resolution, but I think it will be admitted by every one who has heard the admirable and well chosen observations of that hon. gentleman that he is entitled to the thanks and congratulations of this House for the able manner in which he has represented a case, perhaps not of overwhelming importance, but one of great general interest and one which may become important from time to time. If any steps are taken in this legislature for promoting uniformity in any branch of legislation appertaining to property or civil rights, or to the procedure of the courts, no doubt that hon. gentleman will receive a great deal of credit for his early advocacy of, in some respects, so desirable a consummation. It is easy to see, when you read between the lines of the debates and conferences on the British North America Act and the proceedings which led up to the adoption of that Act, that clauses 94 and 97 are largely the results of compromise upon some important questions. The statesmen who came forward to promote the union of the provinces might be described as consisting of two classes, one favourable to legislative union with one parliament for the whole Dominion, legislating upon all the subjects which are now divided between the various parliaments, and another favouring the present constitution. But it was early seen and admitted by the most sagacious of these statesmen that the difficulties were enormous in the way of such a consummation not only because of the peculiar history and juridicsal system of the province of Quebec but owing to the difference in the early trend of affairs in the various provinces which form the union as well as to the new circumstances arising from the introduction of new provinces into the union. Therefore, I think it will be generally admitted that the clauses in question were inserted rather as saving clauses, or as suggestions of what was hoped for at some future time than as a serious attempt at constitutional legislation. The late Sir John A. Macdonald, who has been alluded to, and whose remarks in part, have been quoted, practically describes the situation as I have laid it down in some of his observations when the resolutions were being adopted by the parliament of old Canada. I will only quote a few words in order to show the view which that statesman took of this question and the reasons which animated him in supporting the placing of these clauses in the British North America Act. After describing the movement which led up to confederation and the difficulties in the way of a uniform system of laws for the whole of the provinces, he says :—

> So that those who were like myself in favour of a legislative union, were obliged to modify their views and accept the project of a federal union . . . . . because, although the law of those provinces is founded on the common law of England, yet every one of them has a large amount of law of its own. Colonial law framed by itself and affecting every relation of life . . . . . We found in short that the statutory law of the different provinces was so varied and diversified that it was almost impossible to weld them into a legislative union at once . . . . . And when we consider that every one of the colonies has a body of law of this kind and that it will take years before these laws can be assimilated, it was felt that at first, at all events any united legislation would be almost impossible. . . I am happy to state—and indeed it appears on the face of the resolutions themselves—that as regards the lower provinces, a great desire was evinced for the final assimilation of our laws. One of the resolutions provides that an attempt shall be made to assimilate the laws of the maritime provinces and those of Upper Canada, for the purpose of eventually establishing one body of statutory law, founded on the common law of England, the parent of the laws of all those provinces.

The clauses have been referred to in the resolution of the hon. member for Hants are the clauses which in new form were subsequently placed in the Act. Clause 94 is peculiar in one aspect, to which I will call the attention of the House, one well worthy of the consideration of those who anticipate legislating upon any of the subjects mentioned by my hon. friend or upon any other subjects of a cognate character. Section 94 is as follows :—

Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the parliament of Canada may make provision for the uniformity of all or any of the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and of the procedure of all or any of the courts in those three provinces, and from and after the passing of any Act in that behalf, the power of the parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to any matter comprised in any such Act shall, notwithstanding anything in this Act, be unrestricted; but any Act of the parliament of Canada making provision for such uniformity shall not have effect in any province unless and until it is adopted and enacted as law by the legislature thereof.

Later, when the conference came to consider the appointment of judges, looking back to section 94, they adopted section 97 along the same lines. It provided that :—

Until the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and the procedure of the courts in those provinces, are made uniform, the judges of the courts of those provinces appointed by the Governor General shall be selected from the respective bars of those provinces.

I quote this section to show that the time may possibly come, with the enactment of laws under the programme laid down by my hon. friend, when the judges will be selected indifferently from any of these provinces for the Bench of either of the three provinces. But, the point to which I wish to call the attention of the House at this juncture is that the powers, with their wide and far reaching effects which were laid down by my hon. friend might not possibly affect other provinces. I speak with diffidence, but it appears to me that no legislation that this parliament has power to pass without an amendment to the British North America Act can affect other than the three provinces named, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario. Therefore, I think when the time comes the new provinces in the west, and Prince Edward Island as well as British Columbia, would be outside of the pale of the legislation suggested by the hon. mover of the resolution. How, either of these provinces in which it would be desirable and advisable to apply such legislation—because they inherit the same system of laws and present none of the difficulties which meets us in the province of Quebec—how, they ever can be made amenable to that constitutional system, I do not see. I do not think that the provisions of the Act by which these provinces were admitted into the union would redeem the case at all, because of the peculiar wording of the clause which provides that in all other Acts which by necessary intendment would apply to these provinces, this parliament would have power to legislate. In the Manitoba Act, the wording of that clause which is well known to most of us, is somewhat different from the wording of what is intended to be the same clause in the British Columbia Act. The provisions as regards British Columbia is a general clause of this kind :

10. The provisions of the 'British North America Act, 1867,' shall (except those parts thereof which are in terms made, or by reasonable intendment may be held to be specially applicable to and only effect one and not the whole of the provinces comprising the Dominion, and, except so far as the same may be varied by this minute) be applicable to British Columbia in the same way and to the like extent as they apply to the other provinces of the Dominion, and as if the colony of British Columbia had been one of the provinces originally united by the said Act.

The Manitoba Act of union contains a clause the wording of which is slightly different from that, and what the effect of that difference would be, might perhaps require a great deal of consideration. I call attention to it, and it will probably strike our minds as being a little odd. In the Manitoba Act the clause reads :—

2. On, from and after the said day on which the order of the Queen in Council shall take effect as aforesaid, the provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, shall, except those parts thereof which are in terms made, or by reasonable intendment, may be held to be specially applicable to, only to effect one or more, but not the whole of the provinces now composing the Dominion, and except so far as the same may be varied by this Act, be applicable to the province of Manitoba, in the same way, and to the like extent as they apply to the several provinces of Canada, and as if the province of Manitoba had been one of the provinces originally united by the said Act.

The only point I wish to make at this juncture is, that as I conceive the application of the bearings of the British North America Act on this point, uniform legislation would not be possible without further legislation, except as affecting Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario, and based upon that presumption my few further remarks shall be made.

While no doubt it would be eminently desirable that a uniformity of laws should characterize our legislation upon many of the more important subjects comprised under property and civil rights, and even in the procedure of the courts in these provinces ; yet let us look at the extraordinary and peculiar character of the tribunal which is set to create or adopt this legislation. I venture to say that in no constitution upon the face of the earth, is there a legislature so extensive and peculiar as the legislature brought into force to enact such a law. In the first place the parliament of Canada must select one or more of the subjects upon which it deems a uniformity of legislation eminently desirable. In the second place, after having in its own opinion adopted such a law as would be desirable to affect operations in the territory comprising those three provinces, the promotor of this legislation—the government or the private individual—must proceed to deal with three separate legislative bodies and induce them to accept the view of the desirability of the legislation as it has been accepted by the Dominion parliament. The legislatures could not be deprived of the fullest and amplest right of discussion, and one can easily see that the slightest variation upon any detail or technicality of the proposed law would be sufficient to destroy it. However, after the legislation has been adopted by the legislatures of the provinces—and I assume it must be adopted by all of the three legislatures to be effective—then the power of amendment or change is completely taken away from the local legislature and vested in the Dominion parliament. Thus, the constitution of the country as regards that special feature of property and civil rights, or procedure in the courts becomes henceforth one of the fundamental items of jurisdiction in the parliament of the Dominion of Canada. It in fact creates a complete change in the constitution. The only scheme of legislation at all similar to it is that in the neighbouring republic, where any amendment of the constitution of the United States must be first passed by congress and subsequently adopted by a certain proportion of the various state legislatures. Now, Sir, I need not call attention to the anomaly, and to the difficulty of obtaining legislation under these circumstances. If this Federal parliament were vested with power of legislation without conference with any other independent or sovereign powers, the difficulties in the way would still be very great. Many illustrations of this are in the minds of hon. members. Let us take the subject of bankruptcy; a subject with reference to which in its general scope and aspect, nine men out of ten are convinced there ought to be some kind of legislation by the Dominion parliament, and that it would be eminently advisable that either complete bankruptcy legislation as respects the status of the bankrupt or as affects the distribution of the property of the bankrupt, would be highly desirable in the interests of the trade and commerce of the Dominion. That is so much the case that several of the provinces, notably, Nova Scotia and Ontario, have adopted legislation dealing with the assets and the distribution of the affects of the insolvent. Yet, Sir, we know of the cold reception, the almost impossible reception which any proposal for that sort of legislation has received in this parliament. I simply point out these, and circumstances of a similar character to show the vast difficulties which would attend any attempt at legislating along the lines sketched by clause 94 and the succeeding clause.

Mr. FLINT.

It is well known that in order to carry any important phase of legislation through this parliament, or in fact through any parliament, there must be very strong pressure brought from some quarter upon the legislature. Where would the necessary pressure be obtained to operate simultaneously upon this parliament and upon the local parliaments to systematically enact, and to follow up these enactments in connection with such a variety of subjects. The local legislatures are peculiarly adapted to attend to these matters on account of the small number of subjects under their jurisdiction; on account of the small number of members dealing with these questions, and on account of their more intimate knowledge of the local circumstances. Of course, I do not suppose that even my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) would go so far as to advocate that laws relating to the devolution of intestate estates; and that the laws relating to the distribution of real estate should be dealt with by the Federal parliament, because these are peculiarly local questions. The habits and customs and feelings of a people who have been accustomed to certain modes of dealing with real estate, have grown up in different ways, and they become, so to speak, an ingrained portion of the characteristics of the people. It would be almost impossible for this parliament to deal with matters of that kind. I do admit that upon several questions to which my hon. friend (Mr. Russell) has referred it might be possible for this parliament to enact wise and satisfactory legislation. Still another difficulty presents itself to our minds—not an absolutely irremovable difficulty, but one which it is necessary for us to face honestly. It is this. In dealing with so many legislative bodies, there must necessarily be conferences between them. There must grow up out of any elaborate system calculated to carry out clauses 94 and 97, a conference between the Dominion parliament and the different provincial legislatures through the various governments; or there must be appointed a commission by the governments of the different provinces and by this government, in order that this parliament could deal properly with any preliminary legislation.

I only indicate a few of the difficulties—not to imply that they are insuperable, but to show with what caution and prudence we must approach this subject. Certainly, Sir, it is a most inviting one. Legislation in regard to property and civil rights reaches out in so many directions and touches so many interests that if this parliament is to assume the duty of legislation upon those subjects, we must expect an enormous increase of the business of this parliament. There must be some branch of the government, probably the Department of Justice, specially charged with the duty of following up and studying the various questions which may be presented to parliament for consideration with any reasonable hope of their being carried to a successful issue. There is, however, one way, which I trust some hon. members may within the next few years take, to bring this question to an issue. It is not necessary that any law, in order to take advantage of section 94, should be introduced by the government. No one in this House is better fitted than my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) himself to prepare a Bill on one of the numerous and important subjects which he has referred to. With his experience, his ability, his knowledge, as a student of practical law, and his enthusiasm, I believe no hon. gentleman could present a measure dealing with some aspect of trade and commerce, or property or civil rights, with better prospects of its successful passage through this legislature, than my hon. friend himself; and I would like to see the experiment tried of sending such a measure to some of the local legislatures for their ratification. But we must bring our minds to this conclusion, that once having taken any of these subjects out of the control of the local legislatures, this parliament will be charged with the responsibility of legislation on that subject for all future time. The difficulty of this, as I said before, is manifest, and is very great.

The terms of the hon. gentleman's resolution are that the time has arrived when steps should be taken to carry out this provision of the British North America Act; and if he has not proved, that the time has arrived to pass legislation of that kind, he has abundantly proved that the time has arrived when fuller attention should be given to the powers of this parliament in that respect and to the importance of some of these questions to the general welfare of the country. The attention which has been called to this subject by my hon. friend may induce some of our enthusiastic legislators to take up some of the questions to which he has alluded, and present to this parliament Bills dealing with those questions in the hope that after they pass this parliament they may be ratified by the local legislatures and become part of the laws of the Dominion, and effect to that extent a change in the constitution of the country. I have great pleasure in seconding the resolution.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words on the important subject which the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) has brought before the House. It is a subject which to me has more interest than any other that has been introduced this session. The hon. gentleman suggests that something should be done, under clauses 94 and 97 of the British North America Act, to further the views of the men who drew up that Act, and who were the founders of confederation. First of all, we have to consider, as the hon. gentleman did, what were the opinions of those gentlemen when they framed that Act. He has entered into that question pretty fully, quoting from resolutions and protocols adopted at Charlottetown and elsewhere. As to the opinion of my old leader, I think the hon. gentleman has stated it fairly correctly. He was in favour of a legislative union of all the provinces. That fact meets the view in the British North America Act. He thought that by the decisions of a court to be formed, the Supreme Court, confirmed by the Privy Council, larger powers would be given to the Federal government than appeared in the British North America Act; and clause 94 was incorporated in the Act for the purpose of assimilating the laws of the different English speaking portions of the country. The hon. gentleman who has seconded the resolution (Mr. Flint) showed a difficulty. He said that this proposal to assimilate the laws only applied to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Ontario. That is true; but that is a very slight difficulty and could easily be got over by an amendment to the British North America Act. Now, what is the object of every English speaking person in this country? It is to have as nearly as possible a legislative union of the English speaking portions of the country. We do not wish to interfere with the laws of Quebec; but we hope to show, by an assimilation of the laws and a legislative union of the rest of the Dominion, that it would be of advantage, even to Quebec, to be included. As the introducer and the seconder of the resolution stated, there is no intention on the part of the rest of the Dominion to interfere with the right of local self-government in regard to property and civil rights which that province at present possesses. Now, what is the best way to accomplish the object in view? I know the idea has occurred to other members of this House. The first thing that ought to be done—and if I were a young man belonging to the maritime provinces, it would be the primary purpose of my politics—is to bring about a union of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. That is the first thing to be done in order to have common laws for the English speaking portion of the Dominion. It is absurd for these three provinces to have three separate legislatures and three separate systems of local government. If they were united, a great many of the difficulties suggested by the seconder of the resolution would disappear. In any conference between the different provinces, three of them would then be united into one.

I know that it was the opinion of my former leader, the late Sir John Macdonald—I do not know whether he ever stated it in public or not—that the ultimate result of confederation would be the accomplishment of that design. That would give the three disunited provinces a power in the Dominion which they had not before, and eventually bring about legislative union. But although we may entertain the hope of reaching that goal of legislative union in the future, at present we have to do the best we can under the British North America Act; and until there is a far more serious agitation in the country than now exists, there is no probability of any change in the direction I suggest. I merely wish to explain what, in my opinion, was the view of the founders of confederation when they passed the British North America Act. I have not any doubt that, so far as the English portion of them was concerned, their object was a legislative union of the different provinces. Such a union would, I believe, be the best thing for the Dominion. I believe it to be the goal which we should all desire to reach. But at present there is no agitation in the country for any change, and we may look upon the idea as utopian—as a subject for academic discussion rather than any immediate practical solution.

I listened with pleasure to the remarks of my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) in introducing his resolution. He has given us a striking picture of the difficulties under the present system and of the necessity of assimilating the laws of the different provinces. There are hundreds of provincial laws which might be assimilated by this federal parliament, without any objection on the part of the provincial authorities, and the assimilation of which the different provinces would have no hesitation in adopting. Among all members of our English speaking population, there is a strong desire for an assimilation of the various laws in the different provinces affecting civil rights and property, and which are in a different class altogether from municipal laws that affect only particular localities. I do not think that any insuperable difficulty lies in the way, but still nothing is done. As my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) has said, it was the general hope and expectation that as soon as our first parliament met, a step would have been taken in that direction, but instead we have followed the policy of drift until we have reached the present stage, when that confusion exists among these various laws which the hon. member has so well described.

What effect this discussion may have I do not know, but the first thing to be accomplished is an assimilation of the laws in the maritime provinces. If that were effected, you would have virtually legislative union, to all intents and purposes, between the maritime provinces, and then legislative union between them and the province of Ontario would be easily accomplished. That would be greatly in the interests of the country, and would be a step towards the end which the man, who framed primarily the British North America Act, had in view, namely, the legislative union of this Dominion. He thought that would have been gradually brought about, even under the present British North America Act. He thought that the decisions of our courts, licked into shape by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, would have had the effect of giving us legislative union, but unfortunately, although our Supreme Court understood the opinion and wishes, not only of the framers of the British North America Act, but of the community generally, the Privy Council of England had a different opinion. Home Rule was then in the air, and instead of giving us decisions tending to legislative union, we had decisions affirming to the utmost provincial rights.

There is another reason why jurisdiction over the interpretation of our own laws should be final in this Dominion. Our own courts understand the wishes and hopes of the Dominion, and if the final jurisdiction over constitutional questions lay with these courts our jurisprudence would be so gradually licked into shape that the process of assimilation would be gradually and naturally accomplished, and the aspirations of the fathers of confederation become realized.

The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) has taken the place in this House formerly held by his old opponent, Mr. Weldon. Gradually gliding from the constitutional question to the question whether a codification of all the laws was better than leaving the laws as they are and construing them by the decisions of the different courts—whether it was better to have the laws codified or let them be licked into shape by the decision of the judges—he gave us one of those lectures with which no doubt he is wont to instruct his students. He pointed out the advantages of the one system and the advantages of the other, just as Mr. Weldon used to do when treating this House to lectures, previously delivered at Dalhousie college, and which, no doubt were very instructive. But after the dissertation of my hon. friend from Hants on the subject, whether a codification of the laws or laws licked into shape by the decisions of the courts is the better way, I am still in doubt. However, the House is to be congratulated on the introduction of the subject by my hon. friend. It is the most interesting one which has come before the House this session, and I am sorry I have not given it more study so that I might be able to do it justice. I merely listened to the remarks of my hon. friend, and have given expression to the few of the suggestions which occurred to me while he was speaking.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I have not very much to add to what has been said with regard to this subject this afternoon, except to say that the movement seems to me one, which, in order to be successful, must emanate from the provinces themselves. The parliament of Canada has the right, under section 94, to pass laws relating to property and civil rights, for the purpose of obtaining uniformity with regard to this subject in the three provinces that have been named. But, as has been pointed out by previous speakers, these laws cannot come into force until they have been passed by the legislatures of the several provinces. It seems to me it would be idle for this parliament to undertake a work of that kind until the provinces had got together and ascertained whether there was any basis upon which they could agree on any subject coming within the definition of property and civil rights. And until that is done, any work that this House might perform in that direction would not be of much account. I do not wish to deny the ability that my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) and my hon, friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) have shown in presenting this subject to the House and to the country at this time. But I would like to suggest that not only the Supreme Court of Canada, but the Privy Council as well have had a great deal of difficulty in the past in exactly defining what is intended by the expression 'property and civil rights' in the British North America Act, and we might have difficulty in framing legislation which would come within the 94th section. We have had various opinions and speculations in the Privy Council and the Supreme Court as to whether this or that subject came within the description of property and civil rights, or of some other subject as to which the provincial legislatures have jurisdiction under the British North America Act.

As far as the question of legislative union of the maritime provinces is concerned, I should say to my hon. friend from Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) that that is a subject which, from time to time during the last thirty years, has engaged public attention in the maritime provinces. At times, there has been a very strong feeling in the province of Nova Scotia, and, I believe, in some other provinces, in favour of that union. I believe that, on some occasions there have even been conferences between the public men of the different provinces looking to the union of that kind. At the present time, however, I think there is no agitation in any of the provinces for that purpose, and the accomplishment of maritime union seems to be as far from realization as ever. There is another suggestion which my hon. friend from Hants made, and it is an important suggestion. He says that if what he suggests were accomplished, it might lead to the enactment in this country of measures which have been placed in the form of a code in the mother country, and might, in that way, simplify the law of the provinces which would be made subject to such an Act. I do not think that the provinces really need a measure of that kind for the purpose of enabling them to adopt British legislation—and I do not think that my hon. friend intends that. But I would like to make the suggestion to him that the very aim he has in view, might, to some extent, be furthered by the fact that, in many of the provinces of Canada at this time, measures of that kind passed in England are being enacted by the legislatures of the several provinces with such alterations as the circumstances of each province demand. For example, while listenig to my hon. friend, I looked over the statutes of my own province, and I see that we have enacted in Nova Scotia many measures which have been enacted in the form of a code in England during the last ten, fifteen or twenty years. We have the Arbitration Act, the Married Woman's Property Act——

Mr. RUSSELL. Do you consider that a model ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think our own is the same as the English one.

Mr. RUSSELL. Perhaps I may be allowed to mention that I pointed out the difficulty in the way of such a course. Each province would think it was able to do a little better than the British parliament.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I understand that there is that difficulty. We have passed also an Act relating to conveyances by married women, a Joint Stock Company's Act, and an Act relating to factors and agents, all based on English measures, I think. Then, there is the Judicature Act and rules which are in force in our province. These are practically the same as the English, and they have been enacted, practically in the same form in Ontario, British Columbia and Manitoba, as I understand. There are also various other measures which have been taken from recent English legislation. Now, the fact that these measures have been passed in my own province, and some, I believe, in other provinces, may lead to a certain uniformity of the statute law in the different provinces, which, will have the same practical effect in some measure as the legislative union which my hon. friend has so ably advocated this afternoon. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I might say that any person who is interested in the question of codification, either in this country or the mother country can gain a great deal of information from the recent work of Sir Courtenay Ilbert, which describes the difficulties that have accompanied any progress in regard to this matter in the mother country. In mentioning this work, I might say, as a very practical matter, that the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice might very well be directed towards a better and more perfect system of drafting statutes in this country. It is supposed by a great many people that any gentleman who is well versed in the laws of this country, and who is engaged in practising in the courts, is, by the very nature of his experience, capable of properly drafting a statute. We who have investigated the subject know that that is a very great fallacy indeed. A lawyer, even a lawyer of great eminence, is often a very poor person to whom to entrust the drafting of a statute. That work requires one who is not only familar with the laws of the country but who, by training, experience and the bent of his intellect is specially fitted for work of that kind. Without desiring to cast the slightest reflection upon the condition of affairs under the present administration, without seeking to make it appear that the work done under this administration is different from that under any former administration, I venture to say that the drafting of the statutes in Canada for the past thirty years has not been at all up to the mark. I believe that this matter might well engage the attention of the government, and particularly the attention of the Minister of Justice. I think also that, as a practical matter for this parliament and this government, the attention of the government and especially of the Department of Justice might well be turned to the framing of general laws, more particularly with regard to companies. I have in mind especially legislation with regard to railway companies. A great deal of the time of this House both in committee and in the House itself is now spent in dealing with matters that might well be governed by general provisions. With such general provisions enacted, the time of parliament could be more profitably employed in dealing with more important matters. Now, just one further remark I have to make with regard to the codification which has been spoken of by my hon. friend from Hants. I appreciate everything that the hon. gentleman has said with regard to the advantages of having codification. But I must point out to him that, under the English system, no matter how clear and definite a code may be made, it must follow from the very nature of our judicial system that that code will, from time to time, be overgrown. We cannot remove all the difficulties that will meet us by simply framing a code. The constitution of this country, the British North America Act, is in the form of a code, yet I venture to say that no lawyer in the House will disagree with me when I state that more than the half of the British North America Act, so far as any provisions which require construction at the present time are concerned, is in the shape of the decisions of the court, and not in the British North America Act itself. We may make codes in this country as long as we like, but we cannot get rid of the difficulty that these codes will become overgrown with legal decisions. Therefore, the making of a code once is not enough; the code when made must be revised from time to time; and the decisions passed upon it will require to be embodied in the new Act, if we wish to bring about the state of things that my hon. friend from Hants so much desires to see. I am in sympathy with the motive which he had in view in addressing the House to-day; but at the same time I venture to think that any action which will be productive of definite results must come from the provinces themselves, and that the only effect of my learned friend's motion to-day will be to arouse the attention of the different provinces in pointing out to them the good results which might follow if a measure such as proposed were eventually passed by this parliament and by the legislatures of the different provinces.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). With what has fallen from the lips of the leader of the opposition with respect to drafting, I agree entirely. I think it is an absolute necessity that we should endeavour to have better drafting in connection with our statutes. I firmly believe in the statement which I think was made by Lord Chief Justice Fitzjames Stephens, at the time he prepared the Evidence Act in England—that it is as impossible for a committee of men to draft a law as it is impossible for a committee of artists to paint a picture. There must be unity so far as possible, and when our statutes go through committees it is important that they should pass into the hands of a competent draftsman so as to be put in proper shape before finally becoming law.

With what has been said on the subject of codes, I cannot of course be expected to agree. I myself come from the land of codes, from the province of Quebec, where we have a civil code, and where we have a code of procedure; and I believe myself in the words of the quotation that Smith adopted in relation to his volume of leading cases. 'Melius est petere fontes quam sectare rivulos.' Now, we must bear in mind that all the laws which have ever survived in this world are those that took the form of codes. To-day the Roman empire has passed away, but the Institutes of Justinian are a living force in all civilized countries. The name of Napoleon is growing more and more to be a tradition, but the Napoleonic Code is a necessity in all civilized countries.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My hon. friend should not understand that I was opposed to codification. I was only pointing out the result of the codification of statutes in England and in Nova Scotia, with which I am more particularly familiar, respecting a body of judicial decisions.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Of course, notwithstanding that we in Quebec have our code. That code is construed by the courts, and the construction put upon articles of the code by the courts ought naturally to have great force with us. They have not force of law, but they certainly have force of reason. Now, let us come to the motion my hon. friend has proposed. My hon. friend from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) said that this motion is not one of very great importance. I am disposed to think myself that the subject is one rather of academical importance than of real practical importance. But my learned friend asks us by his motion to declare that the time has arrived when we should have uniformity of legislation in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Ontario. Now, I think this motion is not of very great importance because, as pointed out by the leader of the opposition, section 94 of the British North America Act provides that before legislation which would be passed here could become operative as a law, it would be necessary for us to have that legislation approved by the local legislatures. Therefore, I think that the practical way to proceed in this matter would be to ask the local legislatures how soon they are going to be disposed to commit suicide, because the effect of this legislation would be to deprive them of power to legislate with respect to those subjects which warrants their continued existence. If you take from out of the jurisdiction of the local legislatures the laws affecting property and civil rights, then you have taken from them all those subjects which make their continued existence justifiable.

Mr. MACLEAN. So much the better.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am glad to hear my hon. friend say so much the better, because he evidently agrees with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart). The hon. member for Lanark says that the intention of the fathers of confederation was that we should have, not a federal but a legislative union. Now, if he will pardon me for saying so, I think he is entirely mistaken in making that statement. Undoubtedly the intention of Sir John A. Macdonald and of those who followed him at that time was to have legislative union. But if he will read the speech made by George Brown, which he will find reported in the debates on confederation, if he will read the speech made by D'Arcy McGee—and I claim that no man took a greater part nor contributed in larger measure to bring about confederation than D'Arcy McGee—if my hon. friend will read the speeches made by George Brown and D'Arcy McGee, he will find that they both declared at that time—and they were not French Canadians, Brown was not from the province of Quebec—that they were in favour of a Federal union. It is, however, well for us to know that Sir John A. Macdonald desired to have a legislative union; and it is also well for us to note the admissions that fell from the hon. member for Lanark, to the effect that, having failed to get the principle of legislative union consecrated by the British North America Act, Sir John still fondly hoped that he might rely upon the Supreme Court, and upon the Privy Council, to defeat the intentions of those who brought about confederation, and to bring about a legislative union by means of judicial construction, It is well we should know that, and while I admit with the hon. member for Yarmouth that the debate is in itself not very important, the admissions which we have from the trusted lieutenant of Sir John A. Macdonald are exceedingly important.

Speaking now, not as a representative from the province of Quebec, but merely as a Liberal, I say that I stand for local self-government. My hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Russell) says we all stand for local self-government. He stands for local self-government, and he preaches legislative union; because after all, as I said a moment ago, if you take away from the provinces the power to deal with these questions of property and civil rights, you are taking away from them all those things which have been assigned to them as subjects of legislation and without which they would no longer have any reason to exist. Therefore, I say as a Liberal that I stand for local self-government, and I will tell you why. I remember reading not many years ago a speech of Mr. Gladstone in which he said, speaking to a meeting of Liberals, that we should cherish municipal, local and even parochial liberties, not only as nursery grounds for the production here and there of able men, but for the general training of public virtue and independent spirit. Those should be the views and the desire of the Liberal party. We do not want centralization, because centralization leads to paternalism in government. We want decentralization, because we want the development of the individual. I say more, we want our laws made by those men who are immediately under the control of public opinion, of the public opinion of the localities to be affected by those laws. In a country of this sort, where we have got a variety of races, with such a variety of interests, with such a variety of climatic conditions, laws affecting property and civil rights which, in the maritime provinces or in Ontario, would be acceptable, could not be made applicable in the altered conditions which exist in British Columbia and Manitoba. So I say it is in the interests of the people themselves that they should have local legislatures working under their immediate control, in order that the members of those legislatures may be in closer touch with public opinion and more amenable to that public opinion.

Now I do not know that it is necessary for me to have made this digression. But perhaps I ought to mention that this is not a new movement. When the hon. member for Lanark said that it was the intention of Sir John Macdonald to have a legislative union, and also that he hoped that the courts would help him to defeat the object of the fathers of confederation when they gave their assent to a federal union, he omitted to tell us that before the Supreme Court was established he had attempted that which the hon. member for Hants says we ought to do to-day. As far back as 1868, Col. Gray, then a member of this House, representing the city of St. John, was requested by Sir John Macdonald to make a report on the condition of the existing laws in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario, in order to see how far it would be possible to bring about that which my hon. friend says is so desirable—that is to say, to provide uniformity in legislation. I remember reading in a book published by Col. Gray, a great many of the arguments—I do not say they were in the same form, and I do not suggest at all that they came from the same source as that from which my hon. friend drew his arguments—but they were on a line with a great many of the contentions we heard to-day. They were arguments to show the advantages of uniformity of legislation. But, when the question came up in this House, and was discussed here, Dorion, Blake, Mills, and other leading men of the day were found opposing the proposed motion, and as a result the whole matter was allowed to drop. The debates of that day do not contain any reference to what took place in the House. There was then no 'Hansard,' and I have had but a few moments to look through what is known as the scrap book 'Hansard' of the time and I have found no reference to the debate. But, the matter may be found discussed editorially in the newspapers of the day. Now, I am not speaking now as coming from the province of Quebec, but I say it is impossible for a Liberal to favour action of this sort, because the necessary tendency is to break down those barriers which are essential to the maintenance of a federal union. At the present time there can be no reason why we should move in that direction. We have had a good many years experience of the British North America Act, which would enable us to point out any inconveniences that might result from the operation of that Act, but, to-day we have had very few instances of such inconveniences pointed out to us. But, I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to this, that after the experience we have had, and after the experience that they have had in the United States, we find the Australian Commonwealth not only asking for legislation on the lines of our Federation Act, but going farther in the direction of decentralization, in the direction of giving power to the provinces, or to the states as they are called. You will find that under the Act adopted by the Australian Commonwealth, the residuary power is in the states. Let me say in conclusion, that I want to put it again to the House that I do not speak as a member coming from the province of Quebec. But of course, I cannot help feeling that this action would be a menace in so far as Quebec is concerned. We are happy in the possession and enjoyment of privileges which we cherish, and I say here and now that in so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, we have to realize that those privileges that we enjoy came to us through the British North America Act, which was enacted by the Imperial legislature; and that the people of that province should bear in mind, as I am sure they do bear in mind, that they must look for the maintenance of these privileges to the Imperial connection, and the more we realize that here, the better it will be for ourselves. So long as we maintain the British connection, so long as we maintain our right to go to His Majesty, to the foot of the Throne, to maintain those privileges, so long will they be respected. I say this Confederation Act is a covenant between the British people and the people of Canada, that the British people respect their covenants, and that any lessening of the tie between us and Great Britain must be detrimental to the province of Quebec, in a greater degree than to any of the other provinces of the Dominion.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Hon. H. G. Carroll). Mr. Speaker, I would not have considered it necessary to address the House on the subject now under discussion if it had not been for the remarks of the hon. member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) and for the interjection of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean). Those who carried out the idea of the union of the provinces, thought that a day would come, perhaps, when it would be desirable to make uniform the civil laws of the three provinces, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which were then coming into the union, and section 94 of the British North America Act was enacted. I need not quote the whole of the clause, but I shall quote the concluding part:

> But any Act of the parliament of Canada, making provision for such uniformity, shall not have effect in any province unless it is adopted and enacted as law by the legislature thereof.

I wish to draw attention to the last part of this clause, 'unless it is adopted and enacted as law by the legislature thereof.' This shows us what the intention of the fathers of confederation was; it was that the questions relating to property and civil rights were within the domain of the provinces and that it was only with the consent of such provinces that these laws could be changed or modified. This being so, what is the position to-day? Each one of these three provinces has since its very inception, preserved its civil laws, with the addition of the amendments made thereto by the legislatures. I will ask this question of the hon. member: Is there a real and serious grievance existing now which would necessitate the intervention of the Federal parliament in order to make uniform these laws? In a country like ours where so many important questions occupy the attention of the Federal parliament, the latter would not be justified in interfering unless it was at the formal request of each of the provinces. If the grievances are well founded, how is it that the voice of the legislatures has not been heard? It strikes me that they would be the first to interfere, and it has not been shown in any way that it was the wish of the provinces to change the actual state of things. It is said that there is no difference between these three provinces. They use the same language, have the same customs and the same aspirations, and as this, to a certain extent, is true, the proposed reform offers fewer obstacles than would result in an attempt to legislate for a class of people who, by their temperament, their customs, their habits, their tendencies and aspirations differ from others; but the question here is to change a system which has been tested by the experience of time and against which there is no serious complaints. If the grievances are well founded, there is a very simple way to apply a remedy. Let the local legislatures undertake themselves the task of making these laws uniform, and let them agree between themselves, in order that the various dispositions of their laws be made uniform. The hon. gentleman has enumerated what subjects could be made uniform, but I submit that these could be remedied by an understanding between the different legislatures. The resolution which the hon. member has moved, has a tint of centralization, which may have serious consequences. It is asked that the parliament of Canada should intervene to make laws uniform in these various provinces; but, then it will be necessary to leave a gap between Ontario and New Brunswick, and agitators will ask the question, why this break in the continuity from the Ottawa river to the limits of the lower provinces, and then men not so well advised as the hon. member is, will ask why not uniformity in the laws of the whole Dominion. But the hon. gentleman will answer that there is our constitutional charter. Well it is better not to lay temptations in the way of those who are susceptible of yielding to temptation.

Though I entertain these views, I would not oppose the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) if it were proven that it was the wish of these three provinces that their laws be made uniform, because section 94 forms part of our constitution and that constitution we have accepted and are ready to abide by it. This is not the first time that this question has been agitated. During the Quebec Conference, as the hon. member (Hon. Mr. Haggart)has said, the question was at issue. It was agitated in this parliament during the discussion on confederation. It was agitated in 1871, and as the Minister of Justice has said, parliament voted an appropriation, and the Hon. J. H. Gray was entrusted with the task of making a preliminary report to the then Minister of Justice. What was the conclusion of that report ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. Solicitor General think that I ever argued that we could pass a law here which would be effectual, without the consent of the provinces ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am not saying that at all. Here is the conclusion of the report of the Hon. J. H. Gray in 1871 :

> But there can be no doubt that an excellent practical code of law, simple in its language, easily understood, expeditious and economical in its administration, could be found by a judicious selection of the best of the laws of each of the provinces, by men who were severally acquainted with them.'

In this preliminary report to the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Gray sets forth the essential differences which exist between the statutory laws of these three provinces. The hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution has expressed his surprise that since that date no serious effort has been made to bring about uniformity, and he attributes that—not in this House, but in a lecture he delivered before the Dominion Bar Association—he attributes that to what he calls the vis inertiae of our parliamentary system. I would attribute it rather to the fact that no serious inconvenience, no real grievance existed. When I use the word 'grievance,' I do not mean the embarrassment which must result to the members of the Bar in the exercise of their profession, but I refer to grievances which result to the provinces themselves. I am confident that those provinces are jealous of their civil laws, and rightly so. They form part of the customs of the people, and as the Minister of Justice has said, if any legislation would give over to this parliament the control of the civil laws in the provinces, then the usefulness of the provinces would be at an end.

There is another consideration. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) has said that section 94 would apply only to the provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Therefore, if the other provinces did not come under the provisions of section 94, we would have the western provinces, Manitoba and British Columbia—and later on the North-west Territories—and we would have in the east Prince Edward Island and Quebec with their different laws. Therefore, from a geographical point of view, at any rate, the uniformity which the hon. gentleman aims at could not be obtained. There is a still further consideration. Supposing that the parliament of Canada would enact uniform laws for these three provinces and that the provinces would sanction these laws, then the local requirements in each province would require amendments to be made. These amendments may meet the requirements of one province only and not of the other two provinces. What would the parliament of Canada then do, and what would become of the uniformity of civil laws in the three provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) in his able lecture has quoted: 'Non erit alia lex Romæ alia Athenis,' &c., &c. From the Roman point of view, I am sure there could be no objection to that, but I would be very much surprised if Athens were satisfied. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) is a distinguished linguist, I will quote to him in the original what Mr. De Lasteyrie, an able French writer, said of the government and constitution of Rome:

(Translation):

The principle upon which the government of Rome rested, was the destruction of individuals for the benefit of the state; it was the destruction of the provinces, for the benefit of Rome; it was the destruction of everything for the benefit of the Emperor. Each government should be allowed their own share of responsibility and they should assume no more of it than is necessary.

And then, this other quotation which I take from Burke:

There are in nature springs of justice whence are derived and flow like rivulets, all civil laws; and that their waters should take the different hues and flavour of the various soils through which they run is but natural.

These being my views, Mr. Speaker, and not having before me the proof that the provinces desire this change, I think it is well to let well enough alone.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). The Minister of Justice when he addressed the House, professed to be a Liberal and he held up Mr. Gladstone—as his colleagues always do—as the great type of a Liberal. But if Mr. Gladstone was anything he was an advocate of the doctrine of British constitutional progress. He believed that the constitution had not come to an end; he believed that it could develop; and if there is anything that places the British constitution before every other constitution in the world it is, that it has not become stereotyped, and it does grow and does progress, and under it they have the best laws in the world. Let me say that while I accept the Federal constitution as it exists, I am sorry we have it. I would very much prefer the government of Canada to be a free parliamentary one, as in England, with power to make a uniform law for this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The trouble with the Federal constitution of the United States is, that under it they have not got uniform laws, and so there is a strong agitation in the United States for uniformity, even if the constitution has to be revised. I am free to say that I am enough of a liberal and enough of a progressist to be in favour of constitutional revision, and I am sorry to hear hon. gentlemen on the other side say that the constitution of Canada is absolutely perfect and must for ever remain as it is. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) there is even under the constitution as we have it, provision for constitutional progress in this respect, and if so the motion of the hon. gentleman is a constitutional one, and it does away in no sense with the laws of the provinces. Speaking of the provinces, I have not a moment's hesitation in saying that the result of provincial government in Canada has been detrimental to the progress of the country. I say that the interpretation of the law that has been given by the English Privy Council in regard to the distribution of rights as between the provinces and the Federal power, has been against the interests of the country as a whole. That I regret. I agree with the hon. member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) that some day we will have the whole jurisdiction in this parliament, and in some way we will work it out, and in some way we will increase the Federal power and wipe out gradually the provincial power. I take issue directly with hon. gentlemen who oppose that view. I say that provincial government, and the enlargement of provincial rights, has not been in the interest of this country, and I say that Sir John A. Macdonald was right, and was a most farseeing statesman if he believed in a legislative union and desired it carried out in this country.

We can say that without for one moment being chargeable with trying in any way to destroy the rights of the province of Quebec, I respect whatever rights that province has; but there is in our constitution as we have it to-day provision for constitutional progress and a unification of our laws; and notwithstanding what the Solicitor General says, the initiation of that matter is in this parliament more than in the provincial legislatures. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that they are Liberals. Are they? I have heard their leaders say that there is nothing to reform in this country. There is reform possible under that very British North America Act, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) to-day, and his statement has not been contradicted; and there is need of reform on the lines pointed out by the hon. leader of the opposition. Yet we are told that there is no hope of progress, that the main thing is to uphold local rights. That is the doctrine of the Minister of Justice of Canada. I take issue with him there. The thing which the Conservative party of this country committed itself to was to build up a nation, with a unification of laws, if that was possible, and that this country should in some way try to recover the federal power which has been lost to the provinces in the last few years. Although the Solicitor General quoted the instance of Australia, which has adopted a federal constitution, I say that federal constitutions have not justified themselves in the way the free parliamentary system of Great Britain has justified itself. England to-day, by reason of her free parliament, can do anything, and can deal with any question, and deal with it immediately in one week. In the United States, under their federal system, where they are governed by men who have been in the cemetery over a hundred years, they can do nothing, and they have a multiplicity of laws that are directly against the public interest. The two great questions in the United States are how to secure a uniformity of laws and how to handle the great trusts which have grown up, and which the lack of federal law seems to prevent them dealing with effectually. So that what has been said on the other side of the House to-day in regard to constitutions, is not borne out by the facts. The federal system, as we know, is not perfect, and it is the duty of a parliament to try to be progressive and to try to improve things. There is in our constitution, as we have it, room for progressive legislation on the lines suggested by the hon. member for Hants, and I hope that hon. gentleman will be more than academic, and will bring forward a measure in that direction. If he does, I will give him my support. That, is a much better way of dealing with questions of this kind than discussing them in an academic way. At the same time, I compliment the hon. gentleman on the step he has taken. For one thing, he has raised the question in the public mind, and has shown that constitutional revision is a live question in this country. I am not afraid to say that I am ready to see the constitution of this country revised. It has got to be revised; it is over thirty years of age. The British constitution changes every day. The time has arrived when public attention must be directed to this subject, and when it cannot be dismissed as hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to dismiss it to-day ; and the proof is that an hon. gentleman who is a supporter of the government has brought it up. The question being up, it will not down; and one reason is that the constitution may be strained too much in the province of Quebec. I say that in all friendliness—and perhaps it is being too much strained to-day by a Bill which has been introduced in regard to the Supreme Court.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Which Bill was introduced in 1880 by one of the present judges of the Supreme Court.

Mr. MACLEAN. I am not disputing that; but I say it is an argument for constitutional revision coming from the province of Quebec. Does the Minister of Justice deny that ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not at all. The Bill is on the lines of what was suggested at the time the Supreme Court Act was introduced.

Mr. MACLEAN. It is a straining of the constitution under the British North America Act. But the question of constitutional revision is in the air, and it must be settled in some way, and cannot be dismissed by saying that we have a stereotyped constitution. Above all things, men who call themselves Liberals and say they are living under a British constitutional system entirely ignore the spirit of that constitution when they ignore its progressive character.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, according to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean), who has just spoken, our constitution, which is hardly thirty years old, is in sore need of being revised. Why, Sir, one would think from what he said that he was just hailing from France, where they talk of nothing else but constitutional revision.

I think that if there is anything which places the British constitution before every other constitution in the world, it is that it progresses very little and in an almost imperceptible way. Clearly, my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) does not share on that point the ideas of the great English parliamentarians. But it seems he would fain import his ideas from France, a country whose law-makers, when they are not busy with framing a new constitution, which occurs every twenty years, make up for it by agitating every year the question of constitutional revision, so as to keep abreast of the times.

The hon. member from East York (Mr. Maclean) in his comments upon the Bill I have introduced this afternoon, stated that I was aiming at the overthrow of our constitution. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that I have no such ambition, as I am perfectly satisfied with the constitution as it is now. This Bill aims at restricting appeals to federal matters. The constitution provides for the constitution of a Court of Appeal and of lower courts for construing the laws of Canada.

All legal authorities agree that it was open to doubt whether, under our constitution appeals could be heard by the Supreme Court in matters coming under provincial civil law ; and yet, that point was decided in the affirmative by the Supreme Court.

The object of the Bill which I have introduced is not to amend the constitution, but merely to constitute the Supreme Court into an exclusively federal court ; or in other words, as a tribunal which would pronounce judgments on all matters except such as did not come under the civil laws of the provinces. In all cases where the Dominion government or the provincial legislatures, or again, private individuals bringing an action against a province were the interested parties, this court could hear such appeals. Therefore it is not contemplated by this Bill to change the constitution of Canada.

The hon. member for East York has made references which are far from bolstering up his claims. There was a time when people used to sneer at the United States. And no less an authority than the illustrious Joseph de Maistre once said that the United States of America was yet a child in swaddling clothes, and that it must be allowed to grow and develop, before pronouncing upon the merits of its constitution. But later events have given the lie to Joseph de Maistre, and all the European powers agree that the American Republic is now occupying one of strongest positions in the eyes of the world. Through their federal system of government, and through their own exertions, they have reached one of the proudest positions as a nation, not only in the new world, but in the whole world.

My hon. friend has also scornfully referred to federation. Why, Sir, does the hon. gentleman forget that the Imperial parliament, which is the embodiment of the ideas and feelings of the English people, which is perhaps the most practical and the wisest of all peoples, has just granted to the Australian colonies a federative constitution, and that parliament did so, in the light of the experience of the working of the Canadian constitution ? And yet, the nation they had to deal with was a perfectly homogeneous people. Unless you should pretend that we are to be treated as outlanders in this country of ours, you will agree that it is necessary that our laws should not be interfered with.

But, Sir, England is not the only country in Europe from which we may take an object lesson in this matter. And that lessou, we learn it from a country which successfully competes with the United States and Great Britain herself ; a country, I say, that has taken the lead in literature, in science, in political economy, and that country, Sir, is Germany. Since Germany has evolved into a confederation, she has reached the status of one of the greatest world-powers. From the example of Germany we may gather that the fate of Canada is not so much to be pitied after all, and that there is no reason why we should hasten to do away with the covenant entered into by our fathers in 1867, by which the French minority has been guaranteed the rights secured under the treaties.

2. Does the government propose to take action in this matter this session; and if so, in what way ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. Yes, a resolution of the Georgian Bay Fruit-growers' Association has been received calling attention to alleged excessive charges by railway companies for transportation of agricultural produce generally and on fruit in particular, and urging the appointment of a transportation commission to remedy this grievance.

2. The intention is to introduce a Bill dealing with the regulation and control of railway freight rates at the present session.

FENIAN RAID MEDALS.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria) asked :

Is it the intention to issue Fenian Raid medals to those volunteers who, in 1869, in anticipation of the Fenian Raid, were ordered by the Canadian government to man the gunboat 'Prince Alfred,' and patrol the waters of Lake Huron ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). General order 63 of July, 1898, which prescribes the conditions under which these medals may be granted, does not authorize their being issued for the year 1869, but I will cause further inquiry to be made to ascertain whether the order should be amended in the direction indicated in the question.

And if not is it the intention of the government to take any action with respect to the matter during the present session of parliament ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I believe that such a petition has been received from the Maritime Baptist Convention and that two similar petitions have also been received. The matter is now receiving the consideration of the government.

Order allowed to stand.

MEDICAL COUNCIL IN CANADA.

Mr. T. G. RODDICK (Montreal, St. Antoine) moved second reading of Bill (No. 11) to provide for the establishment of a medical council in Canada. He said : Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of the Bill for the establishment of a medical council in Canada it is my desire to be brief, because I had an opportunity last session in this House of explaining this measure very fully, and besides, I understand several hon. gentlemen wish to speak upon this subject. My main object for framing this Bill for the establishment of a medical council in Canada is for the purpose of establishing a qualification for medical men which would be acknowledged and accepted in all parts of the Dominion of Canada. As you are doubtless aware, Sir, we have at present no fewer than eight examining and licensing medical bodies in this country. Some of these are doubtless doing good work and keeping up, or at any rate, assisting in keeping up the standard of medical education, but their usefulness is limited to the territories over which they have special control. Barriers have been erected, as you are doubtless also aware, Sir, around these eight territories so that it is practically impossible for a medical man, for a graduate in medicine, to receive a qualification to practice in more than one of the provinces. The barriers are so marked, so strong and so high, that very few indeed have the opportunity of representing the profession of medicine in more than one province. The frontiers are so closely watched, Sir, that we constantly hear of medical men being fined, and in cases where this fine has not been paid, imprisonment has been threatened for crossing a boundary river, or an imaginary line between two provinces, in order to serve and probably to save the lives of citizens of this Canada of ours. Therefore, Sir, I contend that there is reason for interference on the part of this parliament. I believe, Sir, that section 91 of the British North America Act can well be evoked by this parliament in meeting cases such as I have mentioned. Section 91, which refers to the peace, order and good government of Canada, I contend, might well be brought into operation by this parliament in cases such as those I have cited. Such a state of affairs exists in no other country probably in the world. Even between the countries of France and Germany, I am credibly informed, a neutral territory of 15 miles has been marked out over which medical men may travel in the discharge of their professional duties so as to be able to assist the sick and wounded of either nationality. Therefore, I think it is time something was done in Canada in order to remedy so serious an evil. It may be asked why these unfortunate men who have been fined do not take steps to procure licenses in the neighbouring provinces to which they are obliged constantly to travel. The reason is that it may be absolutely impossible for a man to receive a license in more than one province. If he has begun the study of medicine in one province and if he matriculates in that province, he never can receive a license to practice in any of the other provinces. For instance, if an Ontario graduate, having changed his mind as to his domicile, having passed his examinations, wishes to practice in the province of Quebec, he cannot do so simply for the reason that the medical board of the province of Quebec insist that he shall begin by passing the matriculation examination of that board. Some of the ablest men in our profession to-day have been shut out from practising in Quebec and in Ontario where they might be very useful in hospital and professorial work.

Another object which I had in framing this Bill and in bringing it before the House, was to obtain reciprocity with Great Britain. That, Sir, can be done so soon as we have a central examining board for the Dominion. In 1886 the British Medical Council enacted that :

> On and after the prescribed day where a person shows to the satisfaction of the registrar of the general council that he holds some recognized colonial medical diploma or diplomas (as hereinafter defined), granted to him in a British possession to which this Act applies, and that he is of good character, and that he is by law entitled to practice medicine, surgery and midwifery in such British possession, he shall, on application to the said registrar, and on payment of such fee (not exceeding five pounds), as the general council may from time to time determine, be entitled, without examination in the United Kingdom, to be registered as a colonial practitioner in the medical register.

The definition states :

> The expression 'British possession' means any part of Her Majesty's dominions exclusive of the United Kingdom, but inclusive of the Isle of Man and the Channel Islands; and where parts of such dominions are under both a central and a local legislature, all parts under one central legislature are for the purposes of this definition deemed to be one British possession.

That means that so long as the provinces are separate parts of the confederation, we cannot register in Great Britain as provinces. The British Medical Council will not undertake to look after the education of the various provinces, but I do state positively that so soon as we have a central examining board in the Dominion of Canada, the British Medical Council will at once accept the licenses from that board and allow our men to register immediately in Great Britain, or in any part of the empire over which the British Medical Council has control. That is a very important matter. It means that we would have open to our young Canadian medical men, the army and navy of Great Britain, as well as colonial appointments, many of which are very lucrative, especially in the East and West Indias. It will also open to Canadian medical men appointments under the British Board of Trade, so that ships surgeons may be appointed directly from this side whereas now our young men have to go to England to first receive a license in one of the colleges of Great Britain before they can take a steamer across the Atlantic. I have here some letters from the management of the Elder-Dempser line which bears on the subject, and which I will ask the permission of the House to read :

> Liverpool, February 27th, 1901.
> Messrs. Elder, Dempster & Co.,
> Montreal, Que.
> Dear Sirs,—We are most anxious to have Canadian doctors on board our Canadian steamers, and we want you to arrange it so. If we have an English doctor on any of the ships, we want you to put a Canadian doctor alongside him to come to this end so that he may take charge of the ship from here.
> Yours truly,
> (Sgd.) ELDER, DEMPSTER & CO.

> Liverpool, February 22nd, 1901.
> Messrs. Elder, Dempster & Co.,
> Montreal, Que.
> Dear Sirs,—Canadian doctors. From what we have seen of these gentlemen we have the highest respect for them, and we are most anxious they should become practitioners on board our West African and West Indian steamers. Would see no reason whatever why Canadian doctors should not be allowed to sail with their Canadian diplomas on equal terms with English doctors. What is the next step to take? You will see we have written to the High Commissioner here and he says the only thing to do is to get the doctors to come to England for examination. What does this mean ?
> Yours truly,
> (Sgd.) ELDER, DEMPSTER & CO.

Mr. Colmer, secretary to the High Commissioner, writing to Mr. Jones, of the Elder-Dempster line says :

February 21st, 1901.

Alfred Jones, Esq.,
African House,
6 Water Street,
Liverpool.

Dear Mr. Jones,—I duly received your letter of the 13th inst., in reference to the question of Candian medical men being registered in this country.

The difficulty is, as your medical superintendant points out, that while the Medical Act of 1886 leaves the door open to Canadians, providing the medical authorities in the Dominion offer similar facilities, the provisions of the statute have not yet been applied to the Dominion.

The only course for a Canadian doctor, therefore, is to come to England for an examination which, if passed, will entitle him to registration.

I return the inclosures to your letter herewith.

I am, dear Mr. Jones,
Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) J. E. COLMER,
Secretary.

This correspondence indicates how unfairly our medical men are treated, but we have the remedy in our own hands, and that remedy is simply the establishment of a Dominion medical council and a central examining board in order to meet the requirements of the British Medical Act of 1886. We have had numerous opportunities of testing the disabilities under which Canadian medical men labour during this present South African war, and we have constantly heard of how medical men attached to Canadian battalions were not allowed to attend Tommy Atkins. It was in fact thought, that they were good enough to attend Canadian soldiers, but not good enough to look after English soldiers. That is a positive fact. Several of those gentlemen who have returned from South Africa have cited instances to me, and I have correspondence bearing on it which I could produce if time would permit, showing that a great injustice had been done to our Canadian medical men, and done probably to force our hand. Knowing as I do several members of the British Medical Council, I am satisfied that nothing would give them greater pleasure than that we should arrange in Canada here a scheme which would meet them half way. Other objects of this Bill of a minor character might be referred to, but I shall not touch on them at this particular time.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in arranging a scheme of this kind, there is no intention; nor is there any necessity for any interference with the autonomy of the provinces. I am aware that the fear of such interference is the great objection which has been offered to this measure of mine. It is not intended to do away with the provincial boards in any way. They will still continue to exist as they have existed hitherto. They must exist for certain purposes. They must exist for the purpose of taxation and discipline. With the provincial boards will be left the question of taxation and all matters relating to the discipline of the profession. They will not be disturbed. Their autonomy will not be interfered with in the least degree. I would be the last man in this House to seek in any way to override the provisions of the British North America Act. I have the greatest respect for that piece of constitutional machinery, and I believe that any interference with the autonomy of the provinces is unnecessary and uncalled for in any way. Where the provinces wish to continue an examining board, as now, they can do so. I have no doubt at all that the larger provinces, that is Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and Manitoba at any rate, will each continue to have an examining board for the purpose of examining and licensing men who wish to practice in a particular province only. For instance, a man who goes up before the Ontario Medical Council, when this Act comes into force, as I hope it will, may be examined by them as he is now. They will undertake to examine him and give him a license to practice in the province of Ontario only, and he cannot go outside of the limits of that province on that certificate. It will be the same in the province of Quebec. I think that for a great many years to come the system in Quebec will continue as it is now, but I have it on good authority that the smaller provinces will probably discontinue the examining of candidates who come before them. I state without hesitation, and without any detriment to the smaller provinces, that in the light of the present progress in medicine—judging from the rapidity with which some of the subjects at any rate are progressing—it is impossible for a man who is not a teacher connected with a university to keep up sufficiently well to be able to examine in these subjects. Among the provinces there are four which have no university—British Columbia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and the North-west Territories; as they have as yet no teaching body, their men are not able to keep up sufficiently well to examine. On that account, and for the reason I have given, there is no necessity, I repeat again, for disturbing the provincial board and its present methods; so it will continue as before.

This Bill, then, is a purely permissive Bill. It is necessary, in order that it may come into operation, to have the consent and co-operation of all the provinces. It is necessary for the medical board in each province to go before the local legislature and ask for a short clause to be tacked on to the present Act. Every province has its medical Act, and it will be simply necessary to add to that Act something like the following—though it need not be in exactly the same words :—

When there shall have been established under the authority of the parliament of Canada a medical register for Canada, under the control of a medical council for Canada, then, notwithstanding anything contained in any of the Acts hereby amended, any person duly registered in the said register as a medical and surgical practitioner, or as a student of medicine and surgery, shall, without any further or other evidence of qualification, be entitled to be registered in the medical register of this province as a duly qualified medical and surgical practitioner, or as a duly qualified student of medicine and surgery, as the case may be, upon production of a certificate under the hand of the registrar of the said medical council for Canada, certifying that such person is so duly registered upon satisfactory proof of the identity of such person, and upon payment of such fee as may be prescribed by the medical council of the province in that behalf.

A short amendment of that kind, tacked on to the medical Act of each province, is all that is required to bring into effect the measure I am advocating.

Now, as to the scheme itself. How is this Act to be put into operation? It is necessary, first, to have a medical council, which may be called the Dominion Medical Council or the Medical Council of Canada, which I think would probably be a better term. The composition of this council has been a great puzzle to those of us who have had to do with the framing of this Bill. It has occasioned me personally a great deal of thought and consideration. We have tried two or three schemes, which have all given more or less satisfaction, but which have not quite met the requirements. When I addressed this House a year ago, I stated that the plan which seemed to satisfy all the provinces was that three members of the council should be taken from each province —one appointed by the Governor General in Council, one elected by each provincial medical council, and, the president of each provincial medical council. That, we found, gave dissatisfaction in the larger provinces. The province of Ontario, with its 2,300 odd doctors, said, 'It is unfair to us to give us the same number only as the little province of Prince Edward Island with something like 96 doctors.' Pressure was brought to bear so strongly that I looked for another scheme, and I think I have found one which will give general satisfaction. It is, that for the first 100 or fraction of 100 practitioners in each province, there shall be one member. That will let in Prince Edward Island, and will also let in the Yukon when it has a central board established. For the second 100 or fraction thereof over 50, there will be one member; and for every 600 above that, one member. That principle can be continued ad infinitum. Then there will be appointed members—one appointed by the Governor in Council from each province. There will also be university representatives, each university having a teaching medical faculty being entitled to send one, and there will be three homeopathic representatives from the entire Dominion.

Mr. RODDICK.

Now, it may be said: Why ask the government to appoint one from each province? I have been constantly met with the objection that this would bring politics into the organization. I do not think so. I think the ablest men in our country will be selected, very often at any rate, by wise governments for a purpose of this kind. But, Sir, there are two other reasons, cogent reasons, why the government of the country should have a voice in the composition of this council. Doubtless some day, when it gets thoroughly into operation, this body will be used by the Dominion government as an advisory body, having, as it will undoubtedly have, the best men in our country upon it, on great questions of quarantine, or concerning epidemics or pestilences that may reach our shores, in order that it may back up the authorities who are dealing with such matters in the Dominion and in the various provinces. This use is made today of the British Medical Council by the government of Great Britain, and its meetings and investigations have been exceedingly useful and practical. Another reason —it is a sordid one, perhaps, but one of considerable practical interest—is that having eight representatives of the government of the day upon it, this council may well come to the government and ask for some assistance, in the form of a grant for a certain number of years, which I feel satisfied my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) will be able to arrange for us, because he has been in the past—I take this opportunity of saying—exceedingly kind to the medical profession. In 1897, when the British Association visited this country, he came forward, and without hesitation presented the profession in Canada the sum of $5,000 for the purpose of entertaining their distinguished visitors. For these two reasons, which I have given, I do not think that the provision for the appointment by the Governor General in Council of one member will receive much opposition.

Each university in Canada, which has a teaching medical faculty, will be represented by one member. There are nine such universities in Canada to-day. There are ten active teaching medical faculties, but one of these, the Trinity school, is not attached strictly to any university. We hope, however, that arrangements may be made to take that body into the composition of the council. It is possible that owing to the fact that the universities of Quebec and Montreal are practically separate and distinct, Laval might claim another representative. That will give to the province of Ontario a total of nine; to the province of Quebec eight, to Nova Scotia four, to Manitoba four, to New Brunswick three, to British Columbia three, to the North-west Territories three, and to Prince Edward Island two, making altogether thirty-six, besides three homeopathic representatives, which brings the number to thirty-nine. It may be thought that this council is too large, but we must not forget that it represents the whole Dominion. In the province of Quebec alone there are forty members on the local board and in Toronto thirty members, so that there will be fewer in reality on this committee for the whole Dominion than there now is on the board of one single province. These figures of course will have to be constantly altered. A year ago, on the very day I addressed the House, I received a telegram from the North-west Territories, stating that there were 110 medical men there. Yesterday I received another telegram, stating that the number had increased to 211, which doubtless is an evidence of the increase of population in the Territories.

The homeopathic representatives will be elected by the homeopathists themselves, from ocean to ocean, by ballot. That is their own proposition. Dr. Campbell, of London, who is one of the leading homeopathists in Canada, said that they would undertake the election themselves and send three representatives to the council. These gentlemen will serve a certain number of years. The appointees of the Governor General will be named for four years. Those who are elected from the profession or by the various councils will serve during the life of the council. The university representatives and the homeopathists will be retained for four years. The whole scheme will, at the start, be under the supervision of the Minister of Agriculture who will call the first meeting, preside at it, and arrange to have the council put into business shape. The first meeting will be held in Ottawa, and it is possible that all the meetings will be held there.

This council will elect from time to time an examining board, to be composed of English and French examiners, and every candidate may elect to be examined in either the English or French language. Examinations will be held in the centres where hospital facilities are the greatest and the students most numerous, so that it will not be necessary to disturb the students. As a rule the students in this country are to be found in five different places—Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg, and in these centres the examinations will be held.

It will be necessary to exact a five years course of all students in the various universities in Canada, because that is now exacted by the Ontario Medical Council and also by the British Medical Council. The final year of the course will be purely a practical one, having to do with the practical subjects which the practitioner really deals with in his daily life.

There is in the Bill a retrospective or retroactive clause intended to admit those members of the profession who have been a number of years in practice. It is thought that every medical man who has been five or seven years in practice—the time has not been decided upon, but will be in the committee when we meet the delegates of the various provinces—should have the privilege of taking advantage of this Act. These practitioners will be registered and allowed to move from one province to another or change their domicile for the purpose of practising, but the chances are that when a man has been anchored five or seven years in the one place he is likely to remain there, so that there will be no stampede of these gentlemen towards any of the newer provinces. By making the limit five or seven years, any danger of such a stampede will be avoided.

There will also be a board of arbitration in order to meet difficulties which may arise in the early meetings of the council. It might occur that a representative of a province might indicate that the standard was not kept up, as promised originally, and that standard must of course be at least as high as anything in existence at present. In this event, the board of arbitration will meet and be composed of three members—one to be appointed by the Governor General from the Supreme Court of Canada, the second will be appointed by the council; and the third will be a member of the council from the aggrieved province. These three will sit upon the case, as it were, and find out exactly where the grievance is, whether it should be considered, and what remedy should be applied. It is a very important part of the machinery, and, while I hope it will never need to be brought into operation, I think that, if it becomes necessary, it will be found useful. It was thought that a judge of the Supreme Court would not be influenced by any prejudices of a local character.

Now, the advantages in connection with this Bill are that we shall have a more uniform standard of education and examination in this country ; we shall have the barriers broken down which at present exist on the frontiers of provinces ; and medical men will be able to get a license to practice on both sides of the Ottawa river, on both sides of the imaginary line between any two provinces. I believe, Sir, that it will lead to removing, or, at any rate, lessening the congestion which at present exists in the medical profession in some of the provinces. Medical practitioners will be more generally distributed, and it will allow a number of our young men to roam, as it were, in any part of the empire. By registering in Great Britain, as I said before, they will be able to practice in any place where the British flag flies. The Bill will thus have the effect of encouraging that spirit of Imperialism which is rife at the present time, and which should permeate. to the very marrow, every true Canadian. I beg leave, Mr. Speaker, to move the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Peter Macdonald, East Huron). I agree very largely with the promoter as to the value of this Bill to the medical profession. It is a Bill that is agreed to, I believe, by the six thousand medical men of the Dominion of Canada almost unanimously. We have been, ever since confederation, under disabilities in the various provinces, on account of the education of medical men by the provinces. In my opinion, it was an error to place the education of medical men under the provinces ; but with this I do not intend to deal. The education that is necessary for a medical man qualifies one that has received that education to practice his profession in any part of the world. We are not exactly in the same position as lawyers in this respect. Law differs in different countries, and even in different provinces ; and thus a person who may be qualified to practice law in one country or one province may not have the education to fit him for the practice of it in another. But, our profession being based upon the same principles, and our practice being the same, one who has received the necessary education is fitted to practice it anywhere. We are placed under disabilities in regard to our rights in the respective provinces of this Dominion. When we receive our diploma and license, these only permit us to practice in the province in which we obtain them. And if a young man—or an old man, for that matter—wishes to remove from one province to another, he is met with the laws of the other province, which exact from him, in most cases, an examination and the payment of a large fee. We believe that that is contrary to the spirit of the constitution of Canada ; we believe that when we spend four or five years of the best period of our lives, and pay also a little fortune, in order to acquire a profession, the license or diploma obtained should carry us a little further than the locality in which we live. Let me point out to you the difficulties which we experience at times. A large number of our young men go to our new western country to assist one another in developing that country. Among others is a certain proportion of young medical men who go. But as soon as they go they find themselves forbidden to practice until after they have complied with the regulations of the province in which they wish to settle. For instance, if a young man has received his diploma, let us say, from one of the Toronto medical schools, which require four years of actual study, and has also passed his examination before the medical council of Ontario—a very high examination—yet, when he enters the province of British Columbia, where they have no teaching body, and where they are willing to accept a three years course, he must pass an examination and pay a fee of $100. Now, we think that a hardship. Let me give you instances. There were two young men of my own town who graduated in medicine a few years ago. One of them was a graduate of Trinity, who was the winner of a silver medal. He passed his examination before the medical council in due course. He decided to go out to the new country to practice his profession, and help, with others to develop that new country. He arrived in British Columbia a few days after the examination had been held. He could not go up for examination for six months. It was impossible for him to remain in British Columbia spending money and doing nothing for that length of time, so he concluded that it would be better for him to return to Ontario, which he did, and he is practising in Ontario to-day. Another young man in my town was thoroughly equipped in the medical department of Toronto University, having taken a high place in the examinations there. He passed the medical council's examination. He, like the other man, went to British Columbia. Being met with the same difficulty, he also decided that he could not wait for the examination, and, in any case, he had not $100 to pay his fee. This result was that he went to California and established himself there. He is practising in California to-day, and Canada has lost a very good citizen. In order to overcome these disabilities, Canadian medical practitioners wish to establish the Dominion Medical Council before which any person who wishes to practice in any of the provinces outside of the one in which he has taken his diploma may come and obtain a diploma which will give him the right to practice in any province of the Dominion. As the promoter of the Bill has very truly pointed out, when medical practitioners are living near the border line between provinces, they may be called in cases of emergencies to treat persons on the other side of the provincial line. And, medical men have actually been fined for going across the border to treat persons in cases of emergency. Such a case happened within a few miles of this very city of Ottawa. A medical man of the city of Ottawa, no matter how high his qualifications, cannot cross the interprovincial bridge at the Chaudiere to treat a person on the other side of the river. Now, such anomalies, I think, should not prevail in a country where we have such large views of nationality.

Then, again, we are hampered, as the doctor has pointed out, by our position in the British possessions. Medical men from Australia, and from its various divisions previous to the establishment of the Commonwealth, were permitted to register under the General Medical Act of Great Britain, and therefore could qualify themselves to occupy any position they might receive in the civil service, the navy, the militia, or the service of the East Indian Company ; in fact, any position in the gift of the British government, could be bestowed upon those gentlemen living in Australia, British India, the British West Indies, South Africa, and New Zealand. But the graduates from Canada were denied that privilege because they were not graduates of a British possession as defined in the British Medical Act. My hon. friend from Montreal made reference to this matter, but allow me to read the clause under which the graduates of other colonies register in Britain, and the one under which the graduates of Canada wish, under this Bill, to register. This is the article in the Medical Act passed in 1896 by the British parliament, which relates to that matter :

On and after the prescribed day where a person shows to the satisfaction of the registrar of the General Council that he holds some recognized colonial medical diploma or diplomas (as hereinafter defined) granted to him in a British possession——

Now, note the expression 'British possession.'

——to which this Act applies, and that he is of good character, and that he is by law entitled to practice medicine, surgery and midwifery in such British possessions, he shall, on application to the said registrar, and on payment of such fee not exceeding five pounds as the General Council may from time to time determine, be entitled, without examination in the United Kingdom, to be registered as a colonial practitioner in the medical register.

Now, that is the privilege extended by this Act to medical graduates in a British possession. But if we turn to section 17 of this Act, we see the definition of a British possession and by that definition Canadian graduates are shut out from the right to register under the British Medical Act. This is the definition in the clause that shuts us out :

The expression 'British possession' means any part of Her Majesty's Dominions exclusive of the United Kingdom, but inclusive of the Isle of Man and the channel islands ; and where parts of such dominions are under both a central and a local legislature—

Notice, that is the position we occupy.

—all parts under one central legislature are for the purpose of this definition deemed to be one British possession.

Now, Canada is a British possession in the meaning of that expression, but Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, any or all of them are not British possessions; and consequently, as we are graduates of one or other of the provinces, we cannot say that our diploma is from a British possession, and therefore we are excluded from being registered under the British General Medical Act, and are excluded consequently from all those courtesies and advantages which would otherwise come to us. Now, for these reasons the general profession in Canada is unanimous in asking the parliament of Canada to remove these disabilities so that our practitioners may have the same opportunities of obtaining these positions in Great Britain as have graduates from the other colonies of that great empire. If this Bill is passed and crystallized into law it will be accepted almost unanimously by every member of the profession. There is nothing in the Bill from the preamble down to the last clause which compromises the interests of any party inside or outside the profession; and therefore I think that parliament would act wisely and judiciously, would act in the interest not only of the profession but of all those who call the profession to their assistance, by passing this law and enabling us to establish a Dominion Medical Council before which students and practitioners might come to receive a diploma from a British possession, and thus they would be eligible to advantages from which they are now excluded.

Then again, as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Montreal, this medical council is to be so composed as to be of great value as a consulting body to the government of Canada. The Governor in Council is to appoint one of its members from each province ; the members of the council from each province of the Dominion are to appoint one more ; then the universities which are engaged in teaching are to have the right of appointing one, and the medical profession will appoint the balance. So you see it is to be fully representative of the various classes of practitioners throughout the Dominion. It is representative of the Dominion; and because each province in the Dominion is to be represented on this council, therefore it will be representative of the provinces. When the advice of such a consulting body is required in regard to general health, epidemics or diseases, the government can call to their assistance these eminent men, who will be members of the council, and in this way the public at large will receive great advantage from the constitution of that body, a body the like of which does not now exist, representative of such large areas or of so many classes in all the provinces.

In view of all these facts, I am sure the House will agree, as I believe it is proposed to do, to submit this matter to a special committee, who will go over the various clauses of the Bill and see that each one is put into such a shape as not to affect prejudicially any class of the community. When the committee reports, and the Bill comes back to the House, and is submitted to a Committee of the Whole, any changes can be made which may be deemed necessary to make the Bill perfect and in the interest of the profession as well as of the community as a whole. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, it is necessary for me to say any more. I think the considerations I have placed before the House are sufficient to convince hon. members that some change of this kind is necessary, and in the interest of the great profession which has given so much time and so much skill, without fee or reward, to promote the health and prosperity of this country.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). The Bill which is now engaging the attention of the House is one that meets with my hearty support, and one which I think will meet with the approbation of every hon. gentleman in this House, whether he is a member of the profession or not. The hon. gentleman who has introduced this Bill and who has judiciously, during the last two years, held it over from session to session in order to have it perfected, is deserving, in my opinion, of great credit for the expenditure of time, of labour and of trouble which he has made in educating the profession to take the very progressive step the Bill is intended to accomplish. The subject matter of the Bill is one of considerable delicacy, and requires a good deal of diplomacy in its proper handling in order to harmonize the varied interests. Our educational affairs being under the jurisdiction of the local legislatures, the members of the profession in the various provinces have been jealous of their rights and privileges. The colleges and universities, the degree-conferring institutions, have been anxious to safeguard their present privileges. The various provinces have local laws which practically debar members of the profession in other provinces from invading their field unless they comply with these local laws, which are in many instances onerous and difficult to comply with.

Now Ontario is justly proud of the high standard and excellence of its medical education. For a long time the profession of that province stood out against entering into any arrangement for a system of Dominion registration unless their particular standard and regulations, or similarly high ones, were adopted by the other provinces of the Dominion. On the other hand the other provinces of the Dominion had laws which they considered useful to themselves and which they considered equally applicable to their particular part of the Dominion and they also took the same ground. The colleges and other degree conferring institutions looked at first with suspicion upon this movement fearing that their vested rights might be tampered with. All these difficulties had to be met and overcome. It has required years of agitation and education until now all the varied interests are practically a unit in assisting to secure the passage of this Bill. Viewed from a selfish standpoint, we, the medical men in the west, are not so anxious that this legislation should be crystallized into law as those from the east. In fact, in many respects, looking at it from a selfish standpoint, it will be a detriment to us, but I am glad to say that the medical men of the west are not animated by any sectional feeling, and that they will join in any movement for the good of the medical profession at large and for the good of the public at large. The profession in the west is not at the present time in a congested state, although in the North-west Territories alone, according to the report presented by the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Roddick), there have been more than one hundred practitioners who have gone into the North-west Territories during the last twelve months. That is a new country which is opening up and developing and population is flowing in so rapidly every year that we have not more medical men than the demand requires. However, in the east the supply more than equals the demand and new graduates must seek new fields in which to practise their profession and if they desire to practise under the British flag in the Dominion of Canada they must seek new homes for themselves on the prairies of the west. It is therefore of more importance to the practitioners of the east that this Bill should become law than it is to the practitioners of the west.

What an anomaly it is, as has been pointed out by both speakers who have preceded me, that a gentleman holding one of the best university degrees in the province of Ontario, probably a graduate of Toronto University, possessing special knowledge and ability, practising his profession in Ottawa, is unable to cross the boundary line, to cross the Ottawa river without being subjected to fine or imprisonment by incurring the penalties imposed by the province of Quebec? And, vice versa graduates of McGill University, which is now turning out some of the best medical men on the American continent, men of standing in the practise of their profession, cannot cross an imaginary boundary line without being subjected to the penalties imposed upon them by the laws of other provinces. If it were a fact that the standard of medical education were so very much inferior in one province than in another there might be some excuse for such a law as this, but, the day has gone by when such a contention can be set out. It is not like it was in some of the states a few years ago when medical men were turned out by whole sale as goods are turned out of a factory. On the contrary, to-day, the standard is very high in each of the provinces of the Dominion and there is no possible excuse why such a law should be in existence at the present time.

Another feature that has been adverted to by the hon. member for Montreal is, that at the present time graduates from the different provinces of the Dominion are not placed on the same footing in the motherland as are graduates from the other colonies of His Majesty's dominions. For instance, a medical man who graduates in the commonwealth of Australia is allowed by simply paying his fee to obtain his license and practise his profession in the old country, while a practitioner from the province of Quebec, or the province of Ontario, must spend a certain length of time in the old country before he can go up for examination and then he must pass his examination and pay his fee before he can secure registration entitling him to practise. It is not because the standard is so very much higher in Australia than it is in Canada. I think we have as good colleges, if not better, in Canada than they have in Australia, but it is simply because of the lack of uniformity in our degrees in Canada. We cannot expect the motherland to recognize our degrees from the different provinces when we do not recognize them between the provinces in our own Dominion, but, by having a Dominion registration board and allowing any graduate of any province to appear before that board, pass his examination and secure medical registration for the Dominion it will not only allow him to practise in any portion of the Dominion but to practise in the motherland as well.

By the passage of this Bill no vested rights are assailed; there is no proposal to take away from any of the colleges or universities any existing rights or privileges. The Act is not a compulsory one to compel any one to pass the examination before the Dominion board. Any person graduating and desiring to practise his profession in a particular province has simply to comply with the laws of that province, but should he desire to place himself in a better position so that he will be able to practise in any of the provinces of the Dominion he may do so by appearing before the Dominion board, passing his examination, and securing the privilege of practising in any portion of the Dominion. There are one or two features in this Bill different from those contained in the Bill introduced during the preceding session to meet objections raised principally in the province of Ontario. One of these is in regard to the basis of representation and another in regard to the re-registration on a provincial degree. It was considered at first by the promoter of the Bill that representation on the basis of population would make the Bill too cumbersome and too unwieldy and it was proposed to allow each province the same number of representatives. To this there was objection made by the older and larger provinces that it would not give a fair show to the larger number of medical men in the larger provinces compared with the smaller number in the smaller provinces and a change has been made in the proposed Bill by which the profession according to population, as laid down by the hon. member from Montreal, are allowed representation. This, I think, will be satisfactory to the smaller provinces as well as to the larger ones. The other objection that has been made is owing to the fact that in Ontario, where the Medical Council is the examining board, they do not allow a graduate from, say Toronto University, to practise unless he appears before the Ontario Medical Council and obtains a license from that body. It is a very strict examination and they consider that a graduate coming from Manitoba, having a degree from Manitoba University, should not be allowed to register before this Dominion board and go into the province of Ontario to practise his profession. A clause has been inserted, subsection 3 of clause 10, to meet this objection which reads as follows:—

> The possession of a Canadian university degree alone, or of a certificate of provincial registration founded on such possession, shall not entitle the possessor thereof to be registered under this Act.

These are the two principal objections that were made to last year's Bill, and they have been remedied in the Bill as it now appears before the House. It is scarcely necessary to enter into a discussion of the various details of this Bill. I trust it will be referred to the committee that will be moved later on and that it will be thoroughly threshed out, where delegates from the various provinces will meet with the members of that committee. I believe that if this Bill becomes law it will not only be in the interests of the profession but also in the interests of the public.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the Bill introduced by the hon. member from West Montreal (Mr. Roddick), now under consideration, being referred to a special committee of the House, provided the principle of the Bill be not adopted now. Interested as we are in the welfare of the medical profession, we are still more anxious to uphold the constitution.

I believe that the most serious objection that can be offered to this Bill, is that it is unconstitutional. It is provided by the constitution that in each province, the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects assigned to that legislature. If we except agriculture and immigration, both of which subjects come within the jurisdiction of both the Dominion and the Provincial governments, I submit that, as regards all the other subjects, this parliament has no jurisdiction; and that were we to pass into law the Bill introduced by the hon. gentleman, we should be encroaching upon provincial autonomy. And even should this Bill be made to apply to the Dominion at large; even were we to enlarge the geographical area of its operation, it does not follow that it would thereby become constitutional.

Let me call the attention of my hon. friend to Lefroy's work, 'Legislative Power in Canada,' and to the following quotation from Judge Burton's judgment:

> I think the principle must be clear that neither the Dominion parliament nor the local legislature can attract to itself a jurisdiction in matters assigned exclusively to the other power by the mere device of enlarging the geographical area so as to include the whole of the provinces, nor in the other case of restricting the area in which the power is to be exercised.

And Sir Oliver Mowat is quoted as follows:

> It is clear that an alleged or supposed expediency of the law being uniform throughout the Dominion on any subject which is otherwise within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures does not give jurisdiction to the federal parliament to create uniformity.

Further on, the Hon. Edward Blake is quoted as saying:

We must recognize as an inconvenience inseparable from the federal system a lack of power anywhere to make uniform regulations, co-extensive with the whole Dominion, on subjects relegated to provincial authority.

Now, if we return to the British North America Act, we see that under clause 92, subsection 13, the legislature is empowered to exclusively make laws in relation to property and civil rights in the province ; surely, the right of practising medicine in another province is a civil right, and therefore, the parliament of Canada cannot pass into law such a Bill as is now under consideration.

Under clause 3976 of the Revised Consolidated Statutes of the province of Quebec—and I have no doubt that similar provisions are in force in all the other provinces—it is provided that no person shall be entitled to practise medicine in the province of Quebec, unless such person has first secured a diploma from the Medical and Surgical Board of the province of Quebec.

Should we adopt this Bill, does it not stand to reason that it would conflict with the existing provincial laws ? So, if all civil matters, with the exception of agriculture and immigration, are relegated to the provincial authority, we are forced to the conclusion that the Bill of my hon. friend, desirable as it may be in other respects—and I agree that it would be much more convenient for medical men to have the right to practise in any one of the provinces—cannot be adopted. Moreover, another thing which clearly shows that this Bill is not within the purview of the powers of this parliament is that it contemplates the establishment of a central examining board and a uniform standard of education and examination. Now, is it not true that all subjects relating to education are relegated to the provincial legislatures ? At all events, only in such exceptional cases as are mentioned in the constitution is the federal parliament free to interfere. On these several grounds I say that parliament should not undertake to pass this Bill, as this is not the proper place to deal with such matters. After all, it seems to me that the various medical bodies of the Dominion could easily come to an understanding and form into an association, with a view to promoting their interests throughout the different provinces, without going to the length of having this association recognized by the federal parliament. With this end in view, they could bring their combined influence to bear upon the provincial legislatures, so as to secure some reciprocity in the practise of their profession. Such a reciprocity, for instance, has been brought about by the bar of the province of Ontario and the bar of the province of Quebec. We have in our respective statute-books provincial Acts under which barristers from the one or the other province are allowed to practise their profession, upon payment of the usual fee. For instance, not long ago, the solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was admitted to the bar of the province of Quebec, without having had to pass any examination, and upon payment of the customary fee.

Such a reciprocity existing between the two provinces, I say that it ought to be no difficult matter for the medical bodies to exert their influence, so as to secure from the provincial legislatures a similar privilege.

The main argument urged by the hon. member from Montreal, in support of his Bill, was that medical men cannot get a license to practise throughout the British empire. I think that on this point my hon. friend is also mistaken, and that he is putting a wrong construction on the British General Medical Act. As a matter of fact, under this Act medical practitioners in the British possessions, as well as medical men from foreign countries, are entitled to practise medicine and surgery in the United Kingdom.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I think Molière's aphorism : 'A door must either be open or shut,' applies here. Now, one of two things : we either belong to a foreign country or we form part of the British possessions ; there is no getting out of that dilemma. The British Act applies to all countries, and my hon. friend is wrong when he says that it does not apply to the province of Ontario. Moreover, if we turn to clause 27 of the British General Medical Act, incorporated in our statutes, 50-51 Vic., we see the definition of the words 'a British possession and foreign countries.' If Ontario were not a British possession, it would rank as a foreign country, and even then, under clause 27 of said Act, medical men from Ontario would enjoy similar privileges. Clause 27 reads as follows :—

The expression 'British possession' means any part of Her Majesty's Dominions exclusive of the United Kingdom, but inclusive of the Isle of Man and the channel islands ; and where parts of such dominions are under both a central and a local legislature, all parts under one central legislature are for the purpose of this definition deemed to be one British possession.

In my view, this means the very reverse of the construction put upon the clause by the hon. gentleman. Is it not true that the province of Ontario is a British possession ? under the control of a central legislature ? To my mind there is not even a shadow of a doubt about it, and the hon. member for Montreal West has put a wrong construction upon that clause. Besides, as I said, if Ontario were not a British possession, within the meaning of the Act, then it would be a foreign country, and in that case medical men from foreign countries are entitled to the same privileges as are enjoyed by medical practitioners in the British possessions.

On these several grounds, Sir, although I do not object to this Bill being referred to a special committee, I do object to the principle of the Bill being now affirmed by the House.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). (Translation.) Would the hon. gentleman kindly inform me whether he has received any communication from the authorities of Laval university in connection with this Bill ? I ask this question because I was not in my seat when the hon. gentleman rose to address the House. A few days ago I got several copies of this Bill—and I may say that I have not had time to thoroughly examine it—and I sent them to the dean of the faculty of Laval university. As I have received no answer yet, it occurred to me that perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Demers) was speaking on behalf of the faculty.

Mr. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) I do not belong to the faculty of Laval university.

Mr. R. LEMIEUX (Gaspé). (Translation.) I may say that I have inquired, in a general way, of the hon. member from Montreal (Mr. Roddick) whether the members of the faculty of Laval university, were in favour of this Bill or not. From what I was told, I gather that the faculty has not taken a positive stand on the matter. I am further informed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roddick) that Dr. Lachapelle, the chairman of the Provincial Board of Health, and one of the members of the faculty, is a supporter of this Bill, but I have reason to believe that the faculty of Laval university is opposed to this measure.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I asked the hon. gentleman that question because, having sent the Bill to the faculty without receiving any answer, I wished to inquire of him about the position taken by the Laval professors.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). There seems to be considerable doubt as to whether or not this Bill is within the purview of the powers of this parliament. The authority which has been cited by my hon. friend from Iberville (Mr. Demers) would tend to show that this parliament has no jurisdiction. At all events, even if this parliament had jurisdiction over this matter, yet in view of the fact that we know there is a good deal of jealousy on the part of the provinces which are at present exercising the same jurisdiction, I doubt if it would be well for us to legislate contrary to their wishes. As to the merits of the Bill, I understand from the discussion which has taken place to-day, that there seems to be some difference of opinion even amongst professional medical men. It is an old saying that doctors differ even in the exercise of their profession, and therefore it is not to be wondered at that they differ as regards legislation. I understand from my hon. friend (Mr. Roddick) that the only thing he has in view to-day is to refer the Bill to a special committee with the object of looking into its merits, and the law as well. It is a recognized principle that when the House gives a second reading it approves of the principle of the measure, and but for the fact that my hon. friend (Mr. Roddick) has stated that his only intention is to refer this Bill to a Committee of the House; for my part I would not feel justified in supporting the second reading. But with the qualification which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roddick) has made, and with the object of further having the matter investigated and reported on later, I think the House will do well to consent to the second reading, reserving to itself the privilege of judging on the principle of the Bill when it comes before us for its third reading, if it should come to that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I wish to say that so far as I am concerned, that I do not share the doubts of certain hon. gentlemen as to the power of this parliament to pass this Bill. It is a statute which creates a corporation not having provincial objects, and on that ground alone I think that this parliament has jurisdiction to enact it. It is not an absolute test it is true, but would any of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the subject, venture to say that any provincial legislature in Canada would have the power to pass a statute of this character. I venture to think not. I believe that this parliament is the only legislative body in Canada that has power to pass such a Bill. A great many illustrations might be given from the very work that was cited by my hon. friend (Mr. Demers) to indicate that the weight of authority at the present time is not in favour of the principle which I understood him to enunciate. However, that question is not being debated just at present because the right hon. gentleman has consented that the Bill shall be referred to a committee for the purpose of being discussed there, and I suppose the question of its constitutionality, if we desire to discuss it, can be dealt with later on. So far as the merits of the Bill are concerned, I have not examined it very carefully, but there is one feature in it that appeals to me very much, and that is the principle of giving to the medical men of Canada a national standing which they do not seem to have at present. I am somewhat surprised to learn that an Imperial statute of the character referred to by the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Macdonald) has been permitted to exist so long, and that on account of it, medical men in Canada; men qualified to practise medicine in Canada have not been able to take the standing to which they certainly are entitled, in other countries, and particularly among our troops in South Africa. It seems to me that we ought to feel ashamed that medical men going from Canada; having the right to practise in any one of the great provinces of Canada; should in South Africa be submitted to the humiliation of not being allowed to attend the wounded among the Imperial troops, simply for the reason that they have no standing among medical men in England. If I understood the statement of my hon. friend (Mr. Roddick) that is the position our medical men serving in South Africa were compelled to assume. I, for one, as a Canadian, feel ashamed of that state of things, and I am prepared to advocate any reasonable legislation which will obviate so disgraceful a condition of affairs. As the Bill is going to a special committee and is to be considered there much more carefully than it can be considered in this House, I will not now take the time of the House stating further the reasons on account of which I am in favour of this Bill. I have not sufficiently examined it to say that I am in favour of all its provisions, and so I am confining myself entirely to the principle involved.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES (North Victoria). I was not in the House when the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Roddick) and the hon. Deputy Speaker spoke, but if, as I understand they made the statement that Canadian medical men were not allowed to treat the wounded in South Africa, I think there is a mistake somewhere. I certainly saw Canadian doctors treating the wounded on many occasions.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a second time.

Mr. RODDICK. I beg to move, seconded by Dr. Macdonald :

That the said Bill be referred to a Select Committee to be composed of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, Messrs. Geoffrion, Casgrain, Belcourt, Bell, Morrison, Ganong, Oliver, Boyd, MacKinnon, and Drs. Macdonald, Sproule, Christie, Ross (Rimouski), Mignault, Kendall, Reid (Grenville), Johnston (Lambton), Roche (Marquette) Bourbonnais, McLennan, Lewis, Vrooman, Horsey, Beland and the mover, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time, and that rule 78 be suspended as regards limiting the number to serve on said committee.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney A. Fisher). I think the name of the Minister of Militia ought to be added to that committee. He is a doctor, and would be a very useful member.

Mr. RODDICK. I had intended that the hon. minister should be on the committee, but I think he has some objection. I would be very glad if he would serve.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I think some objection might be offered to the committee as it is now composed. As that committee will be called upon to consider whether this Bill is constitutional or not, I think the names of a few lawyers might be added to it. There are too many medical men on the committee in proportion to the number of lawyers.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). (Translation.) Should there not be a sufficient number of lawyers on the committee to kill the Bill, then the names of a few lawyers might be added to it.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) Is the name of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence to be added ?

The PRIME MINISTER. With the permission of the House, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Roddick) has no objection, I would suggest that the name of Dr. Borden should also be added to the committee.

Mr. RODDICK. I should be very much pleased.

Motion as amended agreed to.

DOMINION ELECTION ACT.—1900. AMENDMENT.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell) moved second reading of Bill (No. 27) to further amend the Dominion Election Act, 1900. He said : Mr. Speaker, I introduced a similar Bill last session, and as I then explained, the object of the measure is to prevent as far as possible a new and very dangerous system of intimidating voters at the polls. The object of the Bill is to prevent persons who have an interest in promoting the election of a candidate from going about circulating the report that the present ballot and mode of voting is not secret. It is no answer to say that the present ballot is perfectly secret, and that the voting is secret, because the persons who circulate that report know that it is secret, and therefore their crime commences the moment they set their statement afloat. I know nothing of more far-reaching influence than for persons to be permitted, at the time of an election, to go about saying to voters that the mode of voting and the ballot is not secret, and that it can be discovered how any person has voted who votes against a candidate who may be an employer of labour or is supported by an employer of labour. I will not take up the time of the House discussing this measure further, because it seems to me so perfectly obvious that it is necessary in the public interest. If we are to have anything like pure or fair elections on either side, we must meet these difficulties as they occur. The ingenuity of people in discovering new means of evading the law is so great and so frequently exercised, that we are constantly called on in this House to pass restrictive measures to meet such cases. To show that this Bill goes no further than we have already gone in protecting candidates and maintaining purity of elections, I will read section 118 of the Elections Act :

Any person who before or during an election knowingly publishes a false statement of the withdrawal of a candidate at such election, for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of another candidate, is guilty of an unlawful act, and shall also forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars to any person who sues therefor, with costs.

I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the person who circulates a report which he knows to be false uses a weapon for the purpose of intimidating voters. Now, all voters do not know that the ballot is a perfectly secret one, and it would be utterly impossible to convince some of them that there would be no danger of their losing their position if they voted in a certain way. I hope the House will see its way to accept this Bill as a proper measure for the protection of both sides, to guard against an evil which experience has shown to be one of the worst and most insidious forms of intimidation. I beg therefore to move the second reading of the Bill.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). I would ask my hon. friend not to press this matter further at the present time. There are on the Order paper, some other amendments suggested to the Elections Act, and there are some others not yet introduced which we have to consider later, and I would ask the hon. gentleman to suspend his motion for the second reading of this Bill until we have time to consider all the amendments together. My hon. friend will bear in mind that this measure was proposed last year, and I think also the year before, and the House rejected it.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid the hon. minister rejected it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I would not like to assume that my objection was the only one. At any rate, I want to consider the matter further in connection with these other matters, and I would therefore ask my hon. friend to let his Bill stand for the present.

Mr. CLANCY. I have no objection to let it stand, with the understanding of course, that it will be considered with the other Bills.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Certainly.

Debate adjourned.

MOTION AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply :

Militia—Pay and allowances, $392,100.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Will the hon. minister explain the reasons for this increase of $2,491 over last year ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). One thousand four hundred and ninety-one dollars of it is due to increased lodging allowance for district officers commanding in Toronto, London and British Columbia. The amount provided was too small. A $1,000 of the increase was required to pay the guards of honour.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What increase in the number of officers of the permanent corps has been made during the past year ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There has been no increase above the establishment. During the time the contingents were serving in South Africa, a considerable number of permanent corps officers were in that country and had to be temporarily replaced. Now, however, nearly all the permanent force officers have returned, and we have not at all increased the establishment. It is precisely as it has been.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Would the minister be good enough to explain why a number of the officers of the permanent corps who are the juniors of many men in the militia—men of greater experience—have been promoted to the rank of colonel over their seniors ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The officers of the permanent corps who have been gazetted colonel are Otter, Lessard, Drury and Evans. They had served in command in South Africa, and were specially mentioned by the War Office and recommended in regular course by the general officer commanding. I was very ready and glad to approve of the recommendation.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I agree with the hon. minister that these were proper cases for promotion to the rank of colonel, on account of their services, whether they were senior or junior. Could the hon. gentleman give me a list of all the promotions, including these gentlemen ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will bring it down. I understand that it is to include honorary colonels as well.

Mr. INGRAM. From whom could I find out the items of back pay given to those who served in South Africa ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think there is a statement of the amounts in the blue-book which was issued last year as a supplement to the militia report. If the information is not to be found in that book, I shall be glad to get it and bring it here ; or if the hon. gentleman will come to the department—if he does not desire the information publicly given—he can get the facts at any time from the accountant, who has an account with every one of the officers and the men who served in South Africa.

Mr. INGRAM. I did go to the department. The officers were very obliging and gave me all the information they could. But they could not give me these items, but recommended me to a certain officer who had paid some of these soldiers. However, I have not been able to get word from that gentleman either personally, by telephone or by letter.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Who was the officer ?

Mr. INGRAM. He was not a departmental officer, but it was his duty to pay out the money. If the hon. minister has any means of getting the information, I shall be glad to have it. I will apply for it privately.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). As I understood the hon. minister those officers who had been mentioned in the despatches of the British general were given the rank of colonel. But why were not all officers who were equally creditably mentioned in these despatches given the rank of colonel ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. So far as I am aware, they were—that is, I will not say they were given the rank of colonel; but they were given additional rank to that which they held.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Were all officers who were mentioned promoted ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think so.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I know they were not.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I understand the minister to say that all officers who were recommended for the position were appointed—not all officers who were mentioned.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. And all officers who held positions of command in South Africa.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) to ask whether there were any who were mentioned in despatches and who held command, yet were not appointed.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am not aware of any, but I will inquire.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I must enter my emphatic protest against the attempt that is being made—I shall not blame the minister for it—but the department, the red-tapeism of the department to give undue prominence to the permanent corps. It was so when those who are now in opposition in this House were in power, and I presume it will be so until the end of the chapter. Ever since the establishment of the permanent corps, there has been an attempt on the part of the gentlemen in that corps to place it superior to the active militia. There is a fear—a well-grounded, properly-grounded fear—not only on the part of the active militia, but on the part of the men on the side lines who pay the taxes of this country, against what they are pleased to term the spirit of militarism. They dread anything in the shape of an active militia regiment being established in their locality for fear of strengthening that spirit. Now, we have fought for years—I fought when my own friends were in office—against giving prominence to this permanent corps. We were told : These gentlemen will understand the drill-book and drill better than an ordinary militiaman. Why, there is not a school boy, there is not a page on this floor, but could read in a week all the books that these gentlemen have to read. And, for a man of ordinary intelligence holding a position in the active militia of Canada to become perfect in the book knowledge that is required to command a permant corp or a militia corp in this country is a very easy and a very simple matter. There are scores of men throughout the length and breadth of this country who are infinitely better posted than the men of the permanent corps. I can tell you, Sir, that some of the gentlemen whom this government has been pleased to create full colonels, when proceeding to active service in South Africa did not know the difference between a hired ship and a regular military transport. Further, officers in command en route to Africa—permanent corps officers, of course, for no man who was not a permanent corps man had any chance; officers of the militia, captains, and even men of higher rank could enlist as privates and have the privates of the permanent corps placed over them as non-commission officers, but when it came to commanding, all the positions of command were given to officers of the permanent corps—actually undertook to try the stewards of the ship, men in the pay of the captain of the ship. Why, they actually thought that they were the superiors of the captain of the ship. They did not seem to know that the captain could place the officer in command in irons if he chose—and the mystery to me is that, in some cases, that was not done. Yet we are told that these men are much superior to the men of the active militia of this country. I want to point out to-day, as I have pointed out on many occasions in this House and out of it, that, from the earliest times in Canada until the present day, the irregulars, what you may term the active militia man, given as good arms and ammunition—in short, given equal opportunities with the regular—has trimmed the regular to a finish on every occasion. Take the history of the world, and it repeats the same thing over and over again. The defeat of regulars by irregulars in South Africa is only repeating the same story. The boys of the French Revolution period defeated the picked troops of Europe in every engagement. In India, at the close of the eighteenth century, Britain had to find her Clive in a civilians office, and he it was who led her troops to victory. Again, at the time of the mutiny, she found her Nicholson, in the civil employment of the empire, and he also organized victory for British arms. It was so in the United States during the civil war. Though the big positions were given to the regulars, the permanent corp men, the greatest success were due to the men from the farms. And even to-day the American nation finds in a farmer, a man who, three years ago was tilling the soil of Kansas, the man who in the Philippine war has brought it out of the wilderness, while the regulars, the permanent corps men of the United States have not proven equal to the occasion. So history everywhere proves that the irregular, the militiaman, given half a chance with the other, his individuality comes to the front and he proves himself a better man on every occasion.

I am free to say that the permanent corps men who will be able to tell off a drunkard may be a little better than an ordinary active militia man. He may be able to manage what is termed office affairs. He may be able to require the men to salute and go through the little etiquette, so to speak, of the service to better advantage than the men of the ordinary active militia. But that he is a better fighting unit for the defence of his country than the other, I am here to deny. I need not point to officers in this House who are fit to take their place in the command of men side by side with the best colonels in the militia of Canada to-day. I need not point to scores of officers in this country who are fit to lead their men in active service, or who are fit to lead their men in ordinary brigade parade, side by side with the officers of the permanent corps, and do it infinitely better than they. Let me relate what took place on a field day in the city of Toronto a few years ago. An officer, I think it was an officer of the Grenadiers, or of a Hamilton battalion, detached two companies in order to guard the other flanks. The attacking force came on, and the umpires, who were largely permanent corps officers, happened to see these companies detached at the flanks and they ruled them off the field. The only sensible move of the whole day was to put these companies there, yet they were ruled out of action by the permanent corps men, one of them an officer with the rank of Lt. Colonel in His Majesty's Imperial service. On being remonstrated with, it was pointed out that these companies would have been cut off instantly had they been in an actual engagement. Let me point out, Sir, that the magnificent Guards brigade at the battle of Magersfontein was held in check for more than half a day by seventy-two men of the Scandinavian brigade, although they did not occupy a position at all to be compared with the position held by these two infantry companies of Toronto and Hamilton ; the magnificent Guards brigade were held in check for upwards of half a day by 72 men, about half the number that were detached from this Hamilton and Toronto regiment in that sham fight ; and, Sir, they held a position nothing like as strong as the position held by these people here. Again, I may point to an incident at Queenston Heights, where a permanent corps officer was in command, and where an ordinary hayseed brigade full of ordinary hayseed commanding officers——

Mr. THOMPSON. Order, order.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). My hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Thompson) was not present.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) was present.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes, I was. I make no claim to be any better than an ordinary officer commanding a hayseed regiment. But this permanent corps officer, after having made dispositions for defence, found himself suddenly surrounded with two battalions and a half of men on the Heights, within a hundred yards, although neither he nor one of his men had seen them go there. Again I can point to an incident in the past season where two permanent corps officers were acting as umpires to watch some companies occupying an impregnable position, much stronger than that held by the Scandinavian detachment at Magersfontein, and the companies were ruled out of order, although there were one hundred and there were only a hundred men opposed to them, by these permanent corps officers.

I would not bring these matters up were it not for a deliberate attempt that is continued year after year to put permanent corps officers in senior positions. I am not blaming the minister, it was begun long before he ever became Minister of Militia and Defence, and these evils then, I believe, were much more patent than they are to-day. But a constant attempt is made on the part of those interested in upbuilding the permanent corps in this country to place them superior to the ordinary militia force of Canada. I say that permanent force was created, not as a standing army, not as a police force, but it was created as an educational institution. Now, Sir, I stand here to-day to say that that permanent corps to-day does not perform the functions expected of it ; and if it does perform the functions of an educational institution, then, as a matter of mere arithmetic, if you take the cost of that force and divide it by the number of certificates issued, you will find every certificate issued to a young fellow from the country costs this country away up in the thousands of dollars—a rather expensive education. Now I wish to point out here in connection with the permanent corps that they should be there as an educational force. I shall not discuss that matter any further at the present time, because I have a motion on the paper relating to it, and intend to discuss it at length when that motion comes up.

But I wish to point out to the minister that the militia of this country and the people of this country will not consent to see these gentlemen placed as seniors over men who have borne the brunt of the work of upbuilding the militia force of Canada and bringing it to the position it occupies to-day. There are scores of men in the militia force of this country who were in it almost before some of the men were born who are full colonels to-day. I am not saying anything against these gentlemen, but they are placed senior to the militia men, and I want to know what they have done for it. I may as well take up the question of military schools in connection with these permanent corps, although it will come up under another item. I may say that I took the same lines when the Liberal-Conservative party were in power on this question that I am taking to-day. I had the privilege of pointing out to a Conservative Minister of Militia and Defence in those days what I am pointing out to the Liberal minister to-day. I contended that the schools of those permanent corps as an educational institution, do not perform the functions that the people expect of them.

How does a young fellow get into the schools to-day ? I will give you an instance of a young fellow from a clean honest farmer's home, who becomes an officer in one of our militia companies. He wishes to attend the schools. He makes his application, but not being able to attend at the time fixed, he names another day when he wishes to attend. For instance, one young officer applied to go on the 1st of January. He was notified that he must attend on the 1st of November, or some date in that neighbourhood. It was absolutely impossible for him to go then, and as a consequence his transport was sent back. Two days before the 1st of January, when he had heard nothing whatever about the possibility of such an arrangement, two days before that date he received notice that he could attend school on the 1st of January. But the young fellow had made other arrangements. He had been refused admission previously for the 1st of January, and had made other disposition of his time, and it was absolutely impossible for him to go then. Now supposing he had gone to the school, what would have been the routine procedure ? He would have had to purchase a little uniform. I am pleased to say that under the present minister and his predecessors there has been a little improvement—because after a few years of hammering away I did get our Conservative minister to relax a little on the red tape of the proceeding, but it took session after session of effort in this House and in the country to get the rule removed so that these boys from the country would not require to procure not only a full dress but a mess uniform before going to Toronto. We have got it down finally to something that is not very burdensome, but nevertheless they have got to buy a sword and a uniform, and they go down to Toronto, young fellows who know little or nothing about military work, and they are rushed into the ante room. There are certain little points of etiquette there that they have to follow. But these boys are not, many of them, in the habit of treating, or 'setting it up,' as it is termed. They are led innocently into violating this or that rule in connection with the routine of the ante room, and very frequently they are led into violating these rules by officers of the school, by officers of the permanent corps of this country, and then the punishment is 'setting it up' for the boys. I can give you instances of young fellows whose fathers are rather averse, as a rule, to their boys entering into the corps, because there is a dread on the part of parents to see their sons rushed into this sort of thing. A young fellow has to haul out three, or four, or five dollars, as the case may be, and pay for 'setting it up,' in other words, for his little mistake in the ante room.

Little things like that should be obliterated from every military school. I do not see that any advantage would be gained by a man going to the military schools of this country and living in the barracks. What is he going to learn by living in the barracks ? Our young men can go to the universities and medical colleges of the country and board wherever they choose throughout the city. Why should not a man in the military service be permitted to do the same thing ? The best men in the military service to-day were allowed to do this when they attended the old military schools. They were not obliged to go into the barracks and room with some fellow, possibly a decent fellow and possibly not. They were treated as self-reliant and responsible beings. To-day there is the old discipline of repression, the old spirit of dark ageism, and I shall discuss that point at more length on another occasion. The old spirit of repression is still in force. If we examine into the military systems of the nations of the world we find in them the remnants of dark age repression, of slavery, and of the discipline of the prison instead of the discipline of free men. Take our soldiers in the permanent corps to-day ; they are treated as children and not as men. I am glad to say the conditions are improving but improving slowly. I am sorry to say that the improvement is not making as fast progress as is the improvement in prison discipline. In the armies of France and Germany and the armies of other nations the discipline is being strengthened and an attempt is being made in this country at the present moment to fasten upon it the tyranny of a British military system. I stand here to say that that will never succeed with a people living in a free country like Canada. Instead of the discipline being made more repressive, or continuing along repressive lines, it should be relaxed and men should be made freer. The discipline should be such as to promote freedom and individuality with the object of developing individuality rather than repressing it by enforcing the discipline of the slave and of the prison. I shall not take up the time of the House now, but on another occasion I purpose discussing this whole question of the training of officers and I shall then enter into the subject at greater length. Mark you, however, the present hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Hon. Mr. Borden) deserves credit for having wiped out some of these objectionable features from time to time as they have been brought before him, or as soon as he possibly could. I am free to say that he has done a good deal in that line, but I would point out to him that there are a great many more reforms to be made in the permanent corps if we want the militia of Canada to be what it should be. I maintain that the militia of this country must always be the backbone especially in modern times with long range rifles. I shall not take up the time of the House by pointing out that long before the present war occurred I stated in this House that standing armies had to vanish. They must vanish under modern long range rifle practise and the only safeguard of any nation is to have the whole body of the people trained to the use of arms and possessing sufficient discipline to manage themselves so that they could easily get their positions. In that way the whole fighting population of the country could attend to business in time of peace and in time of war shoulder their rifles and march to the front, and by their expert marksmanship and overwhelming power, they would make a short, sharp war something that would only be possible in a country that has a great militia force. I shall not say anything more on this item until I hear from some other hon. gentleman.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) are certainly entitled to consideration always. What he says on military subjects is entitled to consideration, and, I think, in view of his remarks in condemnation of the permanent force, he is entitled to receive from me some answer, if an answer is possible. I am glad to be able to agree with the hon. gentleman in all the good things he says of the active militia of Canada. I believe we have, in Canada, elements from which can be made as efficient a fighting force as can be found in any country in the world. The arguments, or statements, which my hon. friend has used against the permanent force, if they mean anything, seem to me to mean that the permanent force should be immediately abolished. That is the only logical conclusion——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Why not reform them ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The only logical conclusion to be drawn from my hon. friend's statements is that, as at present constituted and with the personnel which we find to-day in the permanent force, it is utterly useless, and of course, if useless, is really worse than useless if any strain were put upon the forces of this country in the way of demanding a defence. Now, I beg to differ entirely from my hon. friend. I cannot say that I am particularly in love with a standing army. I have said more than once that it is opposed, and I agree with my hon. friend that it is opposed, to the ideas and the wishes of the people of this country to have a standing army as such. But, we must have the nucleus of an army for the purpose of defence. We must have in certain permanent places garrisons, especially now when we are left entirely to depend upon ourselves. We must have teachers to instruct——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. To instruct the officers and non-commissioned officers of the militia force of this country.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That is just what we want.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Very well. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that we have, taking it all in all, a good average set of men as officers of our permanent force, that they have done their work fairly well and that they are doing their work fairly well to-day. I found, when I came into office, a certain condition of things existing in the militia, the result of development during some thirty years. I did not, after looking over the field, consider it to be my duty to wipe away all I found, although there were some things which I found which I did not approve of. I believed then, and I am more strongly convinced to-day than I was then, that the condition of things in the militia of Canada at the time I took office was fairly good, as good as could be expected in view of the money which had been voted from time to time and the attention which had been given to the militia. I have endeavoured, not to tear down or destroy, but improve, to build up and to add to the condition of things which I then found. Now, I most positively deny that the officers of the permanent force are men who are not entitled to the confidence of the people of this country.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Does the hon. minister say that I said the officers were not entitled to the confidence of the people?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What I said was that they were not more entitled than scores, I would say hundreds, of the active militia men.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Quite so, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) must remember that I have been trying to point out that we must have a permanent force in this country.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The minister will be good enough not to place words in my mouth that I have never uttered.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I fail to see the point of the hon. gentleman's argument. He stated that on the occasion of certain military evolutions at certain points, the permanent force officers were not capable of commanding a brigade even.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I say so.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That is exactly what I thought the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I say so.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Then, if we have in the permanent force of Canada officers so ignorant that they are not able to fulfil the ordinary duties of an officer—to come back to the point I started with—the argument of the hon. gentleman means that we should sweep the whole force away as it exists to-day. The hon. gentleman has made comparisons between the active militia and the permanent force, and he said the Militia Department had shown undue favours to the permanent force. To use his own words, he said: No man had any chance unless he belonged to the permanent force. My hon. friend knows, that of the officers that were sent to South Africa fully nineteen-twentieths of them belonged to the active militia. But perhaps my hon. friend will say that positions of command were given to permanent force officers. That is true. Positions of command were given to permanent force officers because it was thought necessary to place over the other officers and over the men sent to South Africa, men who had had experience, scientific and educated soldiers, men who had had the opportunity of being taught in the schools in England; men who had had the opportunity—in time of peace, it may be—but whether in time of peace or not, had had an opportunity of continuous command in this country, and therefore should be more familiar with the duties required of them. These were the men who were selected. I selected them on the recommendation of the general officer commanding. I have had no reason in any one case to regret the selection made. These officers went to South Africa and they did their duty with distinction to themselves and with credit to their country. Then as to the active militia does my hon. friend forget the record of the active militia officers who served in South Africa? Does he forget Colonel Turner, who won the Victoria Cross and the D.S.O.; does he forget Captain Cockburn of Toronto——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). And Morrison of Ottawa.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. Does he forget Colonel Hurdman of this city, who was in a position of command? Does he forget all those men who distinguished themselves?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Certainly not.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The argument of the hon. gentleman against the permanent force is not well founded. I think the House will agree with me, that we must continue our permanent force. While it is not perfect it is a fairly good force, and it is in the interest of the militia of this country that we should maintain it. As to the schools, the hon. gentleman has said that the principal object of the permanent force is education.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There is no question about that. But the hon. gentleman has said that there are some difficulties found at the schools, and he objects to our insisting upon the officers from the active militia to be required to live in barracks.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The minister has misunderstood me. My chief objection to the officers living in barracks is this: That you can only pass a very few officers at very great expense. I am not specially objecting to men living in barracks, although I have yet to see the advantage of a man living in barracks over a man living outside.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. There would be I suppose the same advantage as in the case of a student attending a university, who has the advantage of living within the walls of the college. He has an advantage over the student who lives outside. When a man lives in barracks there is a military atmosphere pervading——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Pretty thick sometimes.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. However that may be, there is the advantage of lectures, there is the advantage of constant association with military officers, there is the advantage of the officers being attached for duty, as they are in many cases, so that they may learn their duties by actual experience. I agree with the hon. gentleman in the main, that it is desirable to give much wider opportunities to the officers of the active militia to acquire knowledge, and that we should when possible carry the schools to the officers at certain centres. That we have done.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Yes, I know.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. That was done by the former government and we have continued it so far as possible, but the staff of the permanent force is limited, and it is difficult to carry on the schools at the depots and at the same time detail the necessary officers to carry on the schools elsewhere. But it is being done at all events to the utmost extent possible. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) spoke with regard to treating. Whatever might have been the case as to treating in the past, I believe that to-day, at the depots, treating is discountenanced altogether and it is against the rules.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am glad to hear it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. An officer of the active militia who is attending the school is forbidden to treat, so that there ought be no objection on that score at the present time. When the hon. gentleman brings the question up on his motion, I shall be very glad to discuss the matter with him as fully as may be necessary.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The hon. gentleman seems to be under a misapprehension as to what I have said. The minister told us that one of the advantages of a man living in residence was that he would be attached for duty. Can the minister or any one else point out one duty that a residental officer performs which under the old system was not performed by an officer boarding outside. I have had a military school experience and experience elsewhere, and I must say that the system of boarding outside the barracks was infinitely better both in a disciplinary sense and in the sense of being attached for duty. We had to get up in the morning and walk a mile or so and be in our places at 6 o'clock, and that in itself was good discipline. Then, every man had to be attached as a non-commission officer on guard duty, or canteen duty, or ration duty, or some other duty. There is no duty which an officer or non-commissioned officer performs in residence that he would not perform if he boarded outside. The minister certainly labours under a misapprehension when he supposes that I would sweep the whole force away. I would sweep it away as a standing army, but I would increase it as a teaching body. I would entirely do away with the red tape and the standing guard. Why should you require to have a man standing sentry at the gate of your barracks, night and day, as if he were guarding the gate of a prison? This is a free country. Our camping experience shows that those camps which have no guards are the orderly camps, while those which have guards at every tent door, hedging the men in, are the camps where there is disorder and where discipline fails. I do not believe in repressive discipline; I believe in educational. I purpose taking up this subject on another motion, when I will show that the training of officers is not being carried on at the present time in this country. We are not even keeping pace with the number of officers who are leaving the regiments. I venture the statement that there are fewer qualified officers in the force to-day, excepting those who have been qualified by their service in South Africa, than there were twelve months ago, and that there were fewer twelve months ago than there were twelve months before that. They are gradually falling off, and it is next to impossible to get an officer into the schools. But I intend to take this whole question up on another motion, and to enter into it at length.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Is the minister's report down yet?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. No.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I do not wish to stop the passage of these items; but I would not like to have the large items passed without seeing what the general and the officers say on the whole subject.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I expected to lay the report on the Table to-day. Would it do, as we have often done, to reserve one item for the general discussion?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). That means that it may pass some night at 12 o'clock when there is nobody here.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. We will practically pass the items to-night, and we will agree not to discuss them over again unless the report contains something that makes it necessary to do so. I am sure we are most anxious to go on; but I do not think it would be proper to be placed in the position of having passed all these items without seeing the report.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is almost six o'clock, but I would like to occupy two or three minutes to say a word in favour of the permanent schools which my hon. friend has attacked, it seems to me, with rather undue severity. As a friend of the active militia, I take a second place to no one; but I believe that the permanent force also is a most useful force. While it may be improved, and I believe it will be in the future, it is giving valuable service to this country. Last session the minister introduced a pension system which will have the effect of inducing better men to enter the permanent force, because their old age is provided for. My hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) spoke of the incompetence of those men in South Africa for active warfare. I think that if that war has demonstrated anything, it has demonstrated this, that war alone is the test of a soldier's efficiency. A man may be trained ever so well, and may yet show in the field of battle an incompetence for war. But among the officers who distinguished themselves in South Africa were Colonel Otter, Colonel Buchan, Colonel Lessard and Colonel Evans, every one of them permanent officers.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). And Colonel Durie.

Mr. THOMPSON. And Colonel Durie—I have not time to mention them all.

An hon. MEMBER. He is not a permanent officer.

Mr. THOMPSON. These men did good service in South Africa. The hon. member for Victoria did extremely good work there too—I have heard that from many men—and he is not a permanent officer. I wish to pay him that tribute. I have been told that there was no more efficient free lance in South Africa than Col. Hughes. My hon. friend left the impression on the mind of the House that these permanent schools were places where young men learned bad habits—where they spent a great deal of time in drinking. I have had three courses at Stanley Barracks in Toronto, and I can assure my hon. friend that we had no time for hard drinking, even if we had the inclination, which we had not; and the rule against treating in the ante-room was rigidly enforced. There may be occasionally a young man who, in the words of Kipling, sometimes 'goes wide a bit;' but that is not the fault of the place, but only the result of youth and foolishness.

At Six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Excise—salaries of officers and inspectors of excise, &c., to provide for increases depending upon the result of excise examination, $327,429,37.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Hon. M. E. Bernier). There is an increase of $5,530, composed as follows: Regular increases, $4,882.50; increases due to change in classification of division, $850; increases due to promotion and promotion examination, $1,405; total, $7,137.50; less decrease resulting in filling positions vacant by deaths, superannuation and resignation, $1,607.50, leaving a net increase of $5,530.

Mr. MONK. How does the minister grant the regular increases? Does the clerk get his increase on the recommendation of the chief?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The increase is regulated or fixed by Order in Council, five per cent on their minimum salary.

Mr. BELL. Has the statutory increase been granted to every member of the staff?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. MONK. There are no exceptions, granted to all?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No exceptions.

Mr. BOYD. Does that item include inspectors of coal oil?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have no special officer of that class. The ordinary officials are performing the duties of inspecting coal oil.

Mr. BOYD. I wished to know if the inspector of coal oil at Fort William comes under this head.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I may state to the hon. gentleman that we have no special inspector of coal oil. Our regular officers of the excise perform these duties.

Mr. BOYD. Who inspected the coal oil last summer coming into Fort William from the United States?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The collector of customs at Port Arthur.

Mr. BOYD. Has there been any complaint made to the department regarding that coal oil.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, we have had complaints.

Mr. BOYD. Who did you find was to blame in regard to it?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have had some complaints, and we are now investigating them.

Mr. BOYD. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that there is a matter that has caused widespread dissatisfaction throughout Manitoba and the North-west. During the last season there came into that country from the United States quantities of coal oil that was simply abominable. It was distributed throughout Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and in many cases it was found so unfit for use that it was thrown away, or destroyed. Now, I believe and the people of that country believe, that this government, and the department who has charge of it, are directly responsible for the admission of that coal oil. We know that since this government took charge of the affairs of this country they have made alterations in the coal oil inspection, they have made regulations in regard to importation of coal oil by permitting it to come into this country in tank vessels, and by certain other changes they have put the whole of the coal oil business into the hands of the American or Standard Oil Company. That is pretty well established throughout Canada at the present time. The coal oil that I speak of is brought in by that company, and as I say, was distributed throughout the west. Certain complaints were made, in fact the whole press of that country was ringing with complaints about that oil, I may say from Calgary to the Red river. At first the Liberal press claimed that the government were in no way responsible for it, and the manager of the Standard Oil Company explained it in a way, saying that they had brought it in in large quantities, had stored it in large tanks, and that by reason of storing it in these large tanks and drawing it from the top or the bottom, I forget which, a certain sediment had formed in it, and in consequence the oil turned out to be bad. But he claimed they were not to blame, that they were looking into it, and were going to ascertain what bad oil was in the country and have it returned. But as I say, the Liberal press of the country claimed the department was in no way responsible. Afterwards, however, I understand that the department began to recognize their responsibility, and directed their officers to inquire into it and ascertain if an inferior oil was being sold. They were to examine the oil that was being offered for sale after giving the company, as we believe, ample time to remove the inferior oil from the hands of the merchants. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a very serious state of affairs, and I expect that the minister is prepared to give us a full explanation.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I may state to the hon. member that there are two ways by which that oil is inspected. When it is Canadian oil it is inspected at the refinery ; when it is imported it is inspected by the customs officer. We had some complaints made during the fall. We ordered an analysis made of oil from Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and after such analysis it was found that this oil was in conformity with the law as it stands now, and as it has stood for the last eight or ten years. Afterwards we had another complaint, and we ordered a collection of samples to be made in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and that oil is now being analysed by Mr. Kenrick, of Winnipeg, and we are waiting for the result of his analysis.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). The minister states that samples that were examined were found to be all right according to the law of the past ten years.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Has the law been changed in any respect during the last ten years ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, not with regard to the gravity or flash of the oil.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). I think the minister is mistaken. Has there not been some omission with regard to testing as to quality?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. BOYD. Did the minister take any samples from the tanks at Fort William in consequence of this complaint ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. BOYD. Was it not known to the department that the company had taken samples of this oil, and had taken it to their headquarters at Chicago in order to ascertain if it was of inferior quality ? Is the government aware of that ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The department is not aware of that.

Mr. MONK. Who is specially charged in Montreal with the inspection of oil ? I do not know if the minister is aware that there have been a great many complaints in all the counties surrounding Montreal in respect to the quality of the oil imported. Have these complaints reached the department ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. None from the district of Montreal.

Mr. MONK. Was there an inspector appointed specially for the inspection of oils in the district of Montreal ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. MONK. Is there no inspection then of oils coming into Montreal ? There is a large consumption there.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is inspected by the customs officer, as I have already stated. We have no special officer for that purpose. Some of the officers of my department perform that duty when required.

Mr. MONK. Have there been any analyses of these oils arriving in Montreal ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Not since I have been in the department.

Mr. BOYD. I understood the minister to say that there had been no changes made. I find the old Act reads this way :

The quantity and quality of imported naphtha or petroleum in each package should be ascertained by weighing and measuring, by the inspector.

The new Act says :

The quantity of petroleum or naphtha should be ascertained by weighing or measuring.

Nothing about quality.

Mr. MONK. I understand from the minister that the inspection by the customs officer does not cover the quality of the oil. Is there any report made to the government as to the quality of the oil imported into Montreal ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. BOYD. I do not think the minister has explained this matter satisfactorily to the committee. If that oil was properly inspected, as it should have been, it would have been impossible for such a large quantity to be sent broadcast over the country to be sold. It was one of the leading planks in the Liberal party, when they were asking to be returned to power that the people were charged too much for their coal oil. I remember that the present leader of the government shed tears—an hon. friend suggests that they were crocodile tears, but that is a matter of course—when he condoled with the women of Selkirk over the enormous price they had to pay for coal oil, a necessary of life, in the long winter evenings, when better coal oil could be bought on the other side of the boundary for very much less money. We find the coal oil is the same price in Manitoba and the North-west Territories to-day as it was then. But, owing to the changes that have been made, the coal oil is not so good. There was an inspection in those days for quality as well as quantity. The government is certainly responsible for the change, and the mere fact that the coal oil comes in in small packages, or large packages, in vessels or in tank cars, does not exonerate the government in the least. And, if it is for the payment of these officers and the continuation of this system that the government are asking for this money, it is well that the public should understand it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My department has only to comply with the law which requires that oil should be tested for its flash and gravity. As I have stated, the inspection of oil coming from the United States is made by the customs officers, while the test of the Canadian oil is made at the place where it is refined. We did not refuse to act upon the complaints that were received. As I have stated, we analyzed samples and found that they complied with the law, with regard to flash and gravity. But, the complaints having been repeated, we ordered a collection of new samples and these are now undergoing chemical analysis. If the law is defective, the government or the department may be held responsible for the necessary changes. But I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that it would be better to await the result of the analysis before changing the law. Except for the changes that the hon. gentleman has stated, the terms are the same. The department will always be ready to hear complaints and to remedy any evils that are found to exist. As to the payment of the officers, I think my hon. friend (Mr. Boyd) is going a little too far. I have already stated that we have no special officer to inspect coal oil. That work is done by the regular excise officers. But these officers are the same men who occupied the positions before the advent to power of the present government. I do not think the criticism is fair to these gentlemen. I have been associated with them for two years, and, with a few exceptions, they have fulfilled their duties faithfully.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand that the same inspection of coal oil coming into this country in small barrels is practiced as was formerly practiced ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, there has been no change. What the officers used to do in the past they are doing now.

Mr. BLAIN. In the past, when coal oil was brought in in small barrels, a stamp was put on the end of the barrel, so that the retailer selling the oil had an opportunity to understand the test that had been made. How is that arranged now ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I understand that the law requiring a mark on the package was done away with in order that the oil might be shipped in in tank cars. The amendment was made in 1898 or 1899.

Mr. MONK. We are asked to vote this large sum of $490,000; and I see on the next page of the estimates a vote of $122,000 for the inspection of weights, measures, gas and electric light. I understand that the immense quantity of coal oil that comes into Montreal now, for which we pay a higher price than we did before the present government came into power, and as to which there has been complaints, is left absolutely without inspection as to quality.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. If I repeat myself, it is only that I may be well understood. There is no special inspection of such oil by the excise officers of the Inland Revenue Department. That inspection is made by the customs officers.

Mr. MONK. As to quantity, not as to quality, I understand.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. As to the test required by law.

Mr. OLIVER. For the information of the minister, I wish to speak on behalf of the section of the country I represent, but I understand that the case is common over the whole country. During the past winter, consumers of coal oil have been practically robbed by having sold to them an oil of quite inferior quality. This is a condition of affairs that has not hitherto prevailed. I do not know, and it is not material as I understand the present discussion, whether the law provides for such a case or not. The point I want to make is that the condition exists and that it is absolutely necessary to provide fully for that condition at this session of parliament, so that, if an effort should be made to again impose upon the public, effectual means will have been provided against that imposition.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not pretend to say that the experience of the past year or two will not make necessary changes in the law. But my hon. friend must await, as I do, the result of the analysis that is now going on, and which, I claim, will be completed in time to enable us to change the law if it is found necessary. We have done what we thought was our duty to do, and the government cannot be held responsible for the importation of that oil. All we have to do is to comply with the law as it is. If it is proven that the law is insufficient, then it will be the duty of the government to change it in order to remedy these evils.

Mr. BLAIN. What qualifications has the officer at Fort William to inspect oil ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He is not an officer of my department, but a customs officer. I cannot vouch for his qualifications. I do not know the gentleman who has charge of that duty.

Mr. OLIVER. Might I take a position to some extent opposed to the minister when he says that we must await the result of the analysis before we change the law ? I say the analysis which the consumers of coal oil have been compelled to make during the last six months is sufficient evidence that action is required. If the law as it is now does not cover the case, then it should—I will go so far as to say that it must—be made to cover that case for the future, irrespective of any chemical analysis. The analysis may be necessary to decide just exactly the terms in which the law should provide for the future, but it is clear either that the law has not been maintained or that it does not properly provide for the protection of the public.

Mr. MONK. I would like to know what this law is. For it seems to me that under this government the Standard Oil Company has been allowed to import oil in tank steamers, and we have been deprived of the certificate which was on the package which formerly was necessary. Under the law, the Department of Inland Revenue has power of inspection. There is nothing in the law to prevent the Department of Inland Revenue from inspecting coal oil coming in without any mark as to quality. And surely it is impossible, I do not say for the minister, but for the officers of the department, to ignore the fact that there have been complaints. Complaints are rife throughout the country—I know they exist in my own section—as to the great deterioration of the quality of the oil imported for three or four years past. This is all the more remarkable as there has been an increase in the prices.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When the law was changed in 1899 it was at the request of the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories who wanted to have the price of oil reduced. In order to reach that end the law was changed and it was made permissible to carry coal oil in large tanks to be distributed at a cheaper rate. But, in regard to the inspection of oil, there was no change and the only way to deal with the matter that I see at the present moment is that when the analysis is made, if anything is wrong, or if any other oil or mixture enters into the oil which is imported or sold, then, we might change the law, or enact a law, in order to have a closer inspection. But, just now, we cannot exceed the power we have as to the test of the oil, and in that respect I understand that the law was not changed.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman accounted for some of the increases that appear here by stating that there were some changes made in the inspectoral divisions. Will the hon. gentleman state where these changes were made and what is the effect of them ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) knows that we have six classes of Inland Revenue divisions. When the business of a division which belongs to, say, class 4, is such as to entitle that division to be changed from the 4th to the 3rd, or 2nd class, the salaries of the officers of the division are thereby increased according to a certain schedule of salaries of collectors, deputy collectors, excise men and clerks.

Mr. CLANCY. Were not some changes made in the Windsor division within the last few months ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. CLANCY. No changes ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Not in regard to a change in the classification of that division.

Mr. CLANCY. I mean in the personnel.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There were changes in the personnel of the staff.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman state what the changes were ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Perhaps my hon. friend will give me another opportunity. There are changes contemplated and suggested, but I am not open now to say what these are because they require the signature of His Excellency. In a week, perhaps sooner, I will be in a position to state to the hon. gentleman what these changes are.

Mr. CLANCY. Have there been any changes yet made in the personnel of the staff ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. None, except the superannuation of Mr. Gow.

Mr. CLANCY. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will state the reason for superannuating Mr. Gow ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. He is 70 years of age and he, himself, asked for his superannuation.

Mr. CLANCY. His age is his crime, I suppose?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We were very anxious to retain his services, but, he himself pressed us to grant him superannuation.

Mr. CLANCY. I fancy that there are not many men pressing for superannuation. I fancy that when we look over the records, and if the newspapers are to be credited, we will find that hon. gentlemen are dropping heads into the basket either by superannuation or dismissal. I suppose Mr. Gow did not want to go to the guillotine and he asked, rather than suffer a worse fate, to be superannuated ? Was that the case with this gentleman ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I can tell the hon. gentleman that he had better rely on what I say and not on the newspapers. I am perfectly sure of what I say. He asked for his superannuation and we granted his request. He pressed us because he was sick as the hon. gentleman must know and he could no longer fulfil the duties of his office.

Mr. CLANCY. Was there any marked increase in the business of that division ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No marked increase for a year or two past, except perhaps that caused by the establishment of one or two tobacco manufactories.

Mr. BOYD. I would like to know a little more in regard to this question of coal oil. I find on looking over the coal oil inspection matter that the date referred to by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) regarding the complaints was between the 20th and 30th of November. It seems that it took from that time until about the 24th of January before the cry which was broadcast, as has been stated by the hon. member and myself, throughout the country, could reach the ears of the department here. The papers, as I have already remarked, were full of it, and now, on the 15th March, the minister comes to this House and asks us to defer judgment until such time as the department is able to ascertain something further in regard to the complaints that have been made. There is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, about this at all. It is a scandal and there is no use in the government trying to get away from their responsibility by asking us to defer judgment, because they have had since the 24th of November last to find out about the quality of this coal oil. I would like to know the name of the man who inspected that oil and who permitted oil of that kind to come into the country. The Standard Oil Company have said that it was owing to the large tanks they stored it in, but we have learned that the same class of oil has been sold by that company to the people of North Dakota on the boundary line adjoining Manitoba, showing, beyond doubt, that the same class of oil was being supplied by that company to the purchasers of oil in the adjoining districts. I think the least the hon. gentleman could do is to let the items stand until such time as he is able to give us more information than he has yet given us regarding this matter.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not think I can give more information to the hon. gentleman than I can give tonight. I have already stated that I was not aware of the complaints in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. The first intimation we had in the department that there were complaints was about six weeks ago. A sample of the oil was sent down to the department and was analyzed and in order to give satisfaction to the people who had complained we ordered our inspector at Winnipeg, Mr. Barrett, to make a collection of samples of the oil throughout Manitoba and the North-west Territories, the said samples of oil to be analyzed by Mr. Kenrick, and we are now waiting for the result of this analysis.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Is this analysis in regard to quality of the oil ? The law does not call for a test of quality. Is it not so that the present law does not demand an analysis so far as quality is concerned ? I think the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) has read the old law and the new law, and as he read it, in the new law there is no tests of quality.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. There was no test for quality in any law beyond a test for flash and gravity.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). The hon. member for Macdonald read the old law as he thought it appeared and it certainly called for a test of lighting quality. The hon. minister states that this law was changed at the instigation of the people of Manitoba in order that they should secure cheaper coal oil. They certainly did not get what they asked for. They are paying just as much for their oil to-day as they were before the change. I think the hon. minister is wrong in stating that there has been no change in the law so far as the test as to quality is concerned. It is because of the change that inferior oil is coming into this country. The Standard Oil Company have admitted that the quality was inferior although they say it was limited to one or two tanks that were admitted at the port of Emerson. The oil has been of the most inferior character and a great outcry has been raised through the west irrespective of politics. I may say that if the people asked for a change in the law for the sake of getting good oil at a reasonable price, they have failed in their purpose because they have got inferior oil.

Mr. PUTTEE. May I ask the hon. minister if it is possible that oil may pass the inspection for flash and gravity and still be ferior for illuminating purposes ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It may be.

Mr. PUTTEE. So that the law in no way protects us as to the burning quality of the oil ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is the same as in the past.

Mr. OLIVER. It seems a remarkable thing that when oil exists for the purpose of giving illumination the question of the illuminating quality of the oil is not provided for in any test that is made. We do not care so much about the flash test, or the gravity of the oil ; what we want to know is whether it will give light when it burns. As a matter of fact, a large part of the oil that was supplied in Manitoba and the North-west Territories during the past winter would not give light and some of it would not even burn.

I actually have seen my lamp go out. It does not make any difference to us what the flash test is, or what the gravity is so long as the illuminating power of the oil is not there. I am astonished to hear the Minister of Inland Revenue say that this condition of affairs did not come to the knowledge of his department until six weeks ago. If that is the fact it is high time that the Inland Revenue staff in Manitoba and the North-west should be changed from beginning to end; from top to bottom. We want men in the employ of the Inland Revenue Department and in the other departments of the government as well, who are aware of the facts that are transpiring around them and who understand what their responsibility is to the public, as well as to the department itself. If they think that their only business is to draw their salaries I would like them wakened up from that idea. The grounds on which we vote their salaries here at any rate is, that their business is to look after the protection of the public and if they have not informed the head of the department of this condition of affairs which has been a matter of universal comment throughout Manitoba and the North-west Territories for the last five months, it seems to me they should be called sharply to account.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Carried.

Mr. BOYD. Not yet. It seems that the department has no information on this matter and so we will try to supply them with some. They do not seem to know anything about it, so it is just as well to tell the minister all we know about it. I wish to ascertain if it is true, that the Standard Oil Company, now that they are permitted to import oil in tank vessels and otherwise control the oil business of this country ; is it true that they are selling their best refined oil to-day in foreign countries where they have to meet competition, and that they are passing off on the people of the North-west a quality of illuminating oil that some years ago they sold as fuel oil. That is what they are doing. They are sending their best oil to Europe to compete with the Russian oil, but as they completely control the markets of Manitoba and the North-west they are selling us their worst quality of oil, and they are allowed to do this under the inspection of the government, and with the approval of the government officers. We have shown here to-night that the people of the west have been imposed on and have been robbed in this connection.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is under the impression evidently, that there has been a change in the regulations concerning the quality of oil. The officers of the department state that there has been no such change, and certainly I am not aware of such a change. It has not been the policy of any government, as I understand it, to determine the quality of the oil in the sense in which the word has been used here. The safeguards are against oil of a dangerous character being used. That has been the main purpose of the checks surrounding the sale of petroleum.

Mr. BOYD. I do not think the Minister of Finance would say that if he had the old Act at hand, and read the clause——

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have not the Act, but my hon. friend has, and if he will read it he will find it is quite consistent with what I say. I am informed that the only place where the word quality is used is with reference to the marks on the barrels; that the quality and quantity shall correspond with the marks on the barrel and the marks on the barrel allude to the quantity, the specific gravity and the flash test. The essence of the whole question is, whether there has been a change in the law respecting the quality of the oil, and the officers who are well informed on the subject say there has been no change whatever, and that it was not the policy of any previous administration to determine the illuminating power of the oil. There are thousands of things sold in Canada which are not up to the standard, nor always up to sample even, but they are not in all cases inspected by the government. If a man buys an inferior article and pays a high price for it he is wronged, but that is not the fault of the government. It may be that there should be some wider law on the subject; it may be that the illuminating power should be guaranteed; it may be that the quality of flour and fish and various things which are inspected only in a limited way, should be guaranteed; but whether or not that be the case, the point is that there has been no change in the law with respect to the quality of the oil.

Mr. MONK. How is it then, that bulletins are frequently issued by the Department of Inland Revenue giving the results of the examinations of such articles as pickles, butter, cheese, mustard, &c. It is possible that under the present law the power does not exist in the department to cause an inspection to be made of this illuminating oil. I understood from the Minister of Inland Revenue that that inspection had not been made once in the district of Montreal, and I understand further that he maintains that it cannot be made under the law as it at present exists. Is there a law governing the inspection of the articles which I have mentioned, but which restricts the department from inspecting coal oil?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The articles mentioned by the hon. gentleman are articles of food, and there is a law with respect to the adulteration of food.

Mr. OSLER. Let me read this clause from the old Act, and I think that you will find that it contradicts what the Minister of Finance has said:

> The quantity and quality of imported petroleum so imported in each package shall be ascertained by weighing and testing by the inspector.

That does not mean that the inspection is merely to ascertain what marks are on the package, but it says that the oil itself is to be inspected as to its quality.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am informed that the word 'quality' there as read in connection with another section has reference to the marks on the barrel.

Mr. OSLER. That surely cannot be the meaning of the clause.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend has the Act there and I have not. I am assured by the officers who are supposed to know all about it, that there has been no change whatever in the Act with regard to the inspection as to the quality of the oil. It has not been the practice to do more than to ascertain that the oil was of the gravity and flash test required. Whether or not there should be the power to further inspect as to quality is a fair question for discussion.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand the Minister of Finance to say that at no time has there been a test made to determine the illuminating power of the oil?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It has not been the practice of the department to guarantee the illuminating power of the oil, and there has been no change in the law in that respect in recent years.

Mr. BLAIN. Prior to the introduction of the new law, tests were made and these tests were stamped at the end of the barrel. Could the minister tell the House what these stamps indicated?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The usual marks for quantity and the test for specific gravity and safety are on the barrel, but there is no mark certifying to the illuminating power.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). In the investigation which is now going on by the department, are you testing the illuminating power of the oil?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR. In view of the statements made by the members from the North-west Territories and Manitoba, will the minister make a regulation or have the Act so amended as to prevent people from selling an adulterated article.

Mr. SCOTT. The remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Taylor), strike the nail on the head. It seems to be somewhat an academic question whether any change has been made in the regulations, or whether it is possible under the present law to remedy the defect. If it is not possible to apply the present law for the protecetion of the people in this matter, would it not be possible for this House to confer upon the government, power to apply a remedy? With regard to many articles of merchandise, which are not subject to inspection, the public are protected by competition; but there is not competition in coal oil in the North-west. A monopoly has control of the whole market, and if the government cannot afford protection to the people against the poor article which without any shadow of doubt has been fraudulently sold to them during the past few months, then they are without any protection whatever.

Mr. BLAIN. It seems to be very difficult for the members to understand the change which has been made in the law. Will the hon. minister be good enough to read to the House the old law and the new clause, so that the House will understand the change that has been made ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I will have the law in a few minutes ; but in the meantime, in answer to my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), I may say that the moment the department heard that there were complaints, we instructed our officer in Manitoba to collect samples in order to ascertain the quality of the oil, and I think it is only just and fair to await the result of that investigation, when the law, if necessary, will be amended.

Mr. TAYLOR. I presume my hon. friend will have the result of that investigation before the House rises—in time to amend the law.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, within a couple of weeks.

Mr. BOYD. I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that it was about three months after the complaints commenced that we are told the department took action. The manager of the Standard Oil Company stated in an interview with the press that instructions had been given by their company to withdraw all the inferior oil. Now, the government proposes to take samples of the oil offered for sale after giving the company, as it would seem, plenty of time to withdraw all the inferior oil from the market. I asked the minister to-night if samples were taken from the tanks, and he answered me no. That shows the untenable position the government occupy in this matter.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). I would like to ask the minister how long it is since the investigation began, who conducted it, and how soon it is expected to be ended and the report handed in ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have already stated that about six weeks ago we received some complaints. Immediately we ordered that a sample of the oil be sent to the department. A sample was sent. We heard something further about the matter, and we immediately instructed our officer in Winnipeg, Mr. Barrett, to collect samples, and have an analysis made by Mr. Kenrick. Under these circumstances, I think it would not be fair to the officers of the department to act as if they had not done their duty. I regret that the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) says that these officers should be dismissed. What would be the use of dismissing them and replacing them with men of less experience, who would be in the same position, that is, prevented from doing what my hon. friend asks us to do, bearing in mind that the law does not permit us to go any further at present.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). The minister states that it is only right that we should await the report of this investigation before we have any amendment made to the Act. I do not think that is necessary at all. That is equivalent to saying that he does not know whether there has been spurious oil sent into the country or not. Surely it is not a spurious agitation which has taken place all over the North-west. The Standard Oil Company themselves admit that they have sent in inferior oil. What better proof do you want than that ? They say only a limited quantity was sent in ; but I think they underestimate the quantity. The oil sent in during the last few months has been spurious without any doubt, and I think it is not necessary to await the report of this investigation before amending the Act. The Act should be amended right away, without waiting for the report of Mr. Barrett or any one else, because it has been stated here by members on both sides of the House that the oil is inferior in illuminating power.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think my hon. friend has misunderstood me. I have positively stated that we expect the report of the analysis within two weeks, and then we shall be ready to take action. I think the House will be still sitting at that time, and we shall have ample time to change the law, if it is found necessary. With regard to these complaints in the North-west, there was no complaint made except at the time I have already stated. It may be that the hon. gentlemen who represent Manitoba and the Territories may have heard more than I heard myself ; but that is no fault of the department, and we acted as soon as any complaint reached us, which was about six weeks ago.

Mr. MONK. I would like to ask the minister if the Act, Chapter 102 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, 'an Act for the Inspection of Petroleum,' has been changed?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, it has been.

Mr. MONK. If it has been changed, it can only have been changed in such a manner as to extend the powers of inspection of the department. I have not read the Act over with attention, but I have no doubt that the fire test has not been changed.

The expression fire test or burning means the ignition and continuous burning of any fluid hereinafter referred to, on the application of a light or spark under regulations established by this Act.

That has not been changed, and with such a statutory condition as that, there is no doubt that the department itself possesses power to make regulations for the naming of an inspector to remedy the evil mentioned by the hon. members from the North-west. If that is the case, then the department is at fault, and the suggestion made by one of the hon. minister's own friends, that the whole staff ought to be dismissed, including the head—because he said from top to bottom—should be carried out.

Mr. SCOTT. It seems from the statements made by the minister so far that action on the part of the government depends on the report that may be made by the officers after their investigation of certain samples which they have collected. If it should turn out, however, as the hon. member from Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) suggested, that the officers procured samples of good oil, then we have to take it that the department will feel justified in not taking any action at all. It seems to me that the evidence given by several members on the floor of the House to-night should be sufficient for the department. I can give the hon. minister my own word, from painful personal experience, as to the very bad character of some of the coal oil that was sold in the North-west during the last few months. I have attempted to read newspapers by lamp light produced by some of this oil, and it was almost totally impossible to do so. I believe the stuff would freeze readily at zero, and I believe that more profanity has been caused in western Canada by this bad oil during the last few months than was caused even by the grain blockade we were talking about on Monday. I know that nothing less will satisfy the people of that country than a definite statement by the government that they intend to protect the public in this matter. As I have said, the coal oil trade there is in the hands of a monopoly; there is no competition to protect the people, and the conditions during the past season have shown the necessity for the inspection going farther than it has gone, so that the purchaser may know that the article he buys will give the expected light.

Mr. BARKER. I think that if the minister had complied with the request made to him to read the clause, as to the inspection under the old Act, and the new clause we might have been saved some time and discussion. Is the minister prepared to do that now? If the two Acts are as stated in the paper that has been read from on this side, then, it is quite clear that the old Act was sufficient for the purpose. When you are testing illuminating oil, I presume the first thing is to test its illuminating qualities.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. There is another paragraph in the clause.

Mr. BARKER. That is the reason that I am asking that the old section shall be read as well as the new one. If the old section is as quoted on this side, it seems sufficient, and the new clause is not sufficient for the purpose.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That there may be no misapprehension in the mind of any hon. member, I will read the whole of section 7:

> The quantity and quality of imported petroleum or naphtha in each package shall be ascertained by weighing and testing by the inspector, and the allowance of the tare of the package shall be in accordance with the departmental regulation in that behalf.

And section 14 provides:

> Every refiner, manufacturer or importer of petroleum or naphtha, and every person who deals in or keeps or offers any petroleum or naphtha for sale shall be responsible as to its quality and as to the quantity contained in each package that the same shall not be inferior to the quality nor less than the quantity designated by the marks and descriptions then on the packages in which it is contained. All of which marks and descriptions the person in whose possession it is shall maintain in a perfectly legible state.

The last part was amended.

Mr. BARKER. Will the hon. minister read the last part in section 7 after the word 'inspector'?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I will read it all:

> The quantity and quality of imported petroleum or naphtha in each package shall be ascertained by weighing and testing by the inspector, and the allowance for the tare of the package shall be in accordance with the departmental regulations in that behalf.

Mr. BLAIN. What is the departmental regulations in that behalf?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It is the regulation which was in force before the law was amended.

Mr. BARKER. Can the hon. minister tell us what they were?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It was that it should be inspected by weighing and testing by the instruments that were described in the regulation.

Mr. BARKER. It seems to me that the request made by some hon. gentleman from the North-west that this matter should be allowed to stand until we have an opportunity to look further into the question is a reasonable one. In view of the difficulty we have had in ascertaining what the law is, I think we ought to be granted that grace.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not see how allowing the item to stand can affect the general question which has been raised as to the desirability of a better inspection law. That is a fair question for discussion, but I do not see how it can be affected by this item or how a good purpose can be saved by having the item stand.

Mr. BARKER. The question is not so much what the law is, as it is whether the department has been at fault in not making a proper inspection in that, in inspecting illuminating oil, the one point they did not inspect was its illuminating quality. Before this money is voted for the department, we want to see whether the department is at fault or not.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. minister has made a very positive statement—and I believe that there is no dispute about the fact—that there has never been an inspection of that particular character. The question is somewhat technical, and I do not offer any opinion of my own upon it. But I am informed by those who ought to know that the marks upon the package showing the gravity and the flash test are enough to enable those who understand these matters to work out the illuminating power. But, if the illuminating power does not result, there is some defect somewhere.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. minister seems to think that because a thing was never done before complaint was made, that is a reason why it should not be done after complaint has been made.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Not at all.

Mr. BARKER. That is the result of the hon. gentleman's argument. I do not understand that, in times past, the people of the North-west have had oil which would not burn or would not give light. A few months ago they got that kind of oil and complaints were made. And, those complaints having been made, the department should have ascertained the grounds for them.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think it would be of no use to have the item stand. For, if it takes two weeks before we can ascertain what kind of oil is used in the North-west, the House will have no opportunity of discussing this question any more. I have already stated that, since the law was first enacted that law was found workable. About six weeks ago we heard complaints. Were we derelict in our duty? No, we acted as soon as we heard those complaints. They may have reached members of this House from the North-west before they reached us. I do not say those hon. gentlemen were derelict in their duty, but I do say that if we had been sooner informed of their complaints we could have taken action sooner. But, the moment we were informed that complaints were made in the North-west, we took action and had samples sent here to be tested, and I immediately ordered that samples should be collected for analysis. How can we change the law if we do not know in what sense it should be changed? It is very well for these gentlemen to say—and I do not say that their information is inaccurate—that the oil sold is of inferior quality, but we want to have the evidence by way of a more strict inspection. I have already said, and I repeat, that, as soon as we see that a change in that law is necessary in order to protect the people in Manitoba and the North-west, with the assistance of the hon. gentlemen from the North-west, we will make the law to meet the case and give satisfaction to the people. I cannot say more. I have no objection to the discussion of the item. But I regret that, not being master of the English language, I do not seem to make myself well understood. If I cannot convince my hon. friends by using their language, perhaps I shall be obliged to use my native French.

Mr. TAYLOR. The minister assured us that if he ascertained that it is necessary, he will have the law amended. But I think he went just a little too far when he said that the law would be so amended as to give the people satisfaction. That I do not think he can do, because our friends from the North-west say just what we on this side said in 1897. I spoke pretty strongly on that myself. When the government came down with a Bill to amend the law as it then stood permitting the Standard Oil Company to come into this country with their tank vessels and tank ships, we opposed it; and when a gentleman from that side of the House who was interested in the Canadian oil industry—I refer to the late Judge Lister—got up and threatened to oppose the government if they went on with the legislation, it was dropped. I said then that the Standard Oil Company were just getting what they had paid for, because they had made a large contribution to the election fund in 1896.

Mr. CALVERT. You ought to know.

Mr. TAYLOR. To my hon. friends opposite, who promised the legislation. However, the government withdrew the measure that year. By the next year the late Judge Lister had been removed to the bench, he was not in the House to make any opposition, and then the government came down and carried out the bargain they had made with the Standard Oil Company previous to the election. They introduced and put through that Bill that we said would give the monopoly that our friends in the North-west say now they have got. They got just what the government had bargained for. We told them when they changed that law and let the Standard Oil Company into this country, that it would drive out the Canadian industry, and that they would get control of our market. They have got it, and they are getting now just what they bargained for when this government sold the country to the Standard Oil Company.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand the minister to say that under the old system of inspection and stamping on the end of the barrel, one of those stamps indicated the quantity of oil in the barrel ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Under the old system, then, all the coal oil that was brought in from the United States to Canada came in small barrels holding about 40 gallons. On the end of each barrel were these stamps, one stamp indicating the quantity of oil contained in the barrel. As I understand now, since the change has been made, most of the oil coming in from the United States comes in large tanks. For illustration, it comes into the city of Toronto in large tanks. There are many towns within a radius of 50 miles of Toronto where there is no distributing tanks going through the town. When these towns get their oil which is sent from Toronto by the Standard Oil Company in small barrels, the same kind of barrels as was used before the change in the law, will the minister be good enough to tell us what system of inspection they now have, so that the retail merchants may know the quantity of oil contained in the barrel that he now gets under the new regulations ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. On one point the hon. gentleman is mistaken, in saying that prior to that change in the law all oil was brought in in barrels. The oil was brought in under the old system in tank cars as well as in barrels, but not in tank steamers. There were other minor matters, but the material change in the law was to the effect that if you could bring in oil in tank cars in the western part of the Dominion, you might be allowed to bring it in in tank ships in the eastern part of the Dominion.

Mr. BLAIN. The effect was that every gallon of oil used in the western part of the province of Ontario was brought in in small barrels.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, it was brought in in tank cars, largely.

Mr. BLAIN. Brought in in tank cars prior to the change of the law in 1899 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was brought in in tank cars in large quantities, and was only put in barrels after it was imported into the country.

Mr. BLAIN. There was an inspection, then, and the inspection was stamped upon the end of the barrel, and now there is no inspection. That is the change, is it ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. There is an inspection, but it is not stamped.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Why is it not stamped ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I am not an expert in coal oil, but I have just read the statute, and here is the conclusion to which I have come with respect to the requirements of the statute. Under the old system all coal oil was brought into the country either in small packages, in barrels, or it was brought in in tank cars. The oil brought in in tank cars, before it could be sold, had to be barrelled. When barrelled it was inspected, and the result of the inspection with respect to the flash test and the gravity was stamped on the end of the barrel. Under the new law which is in force since 1899, oil may be imported in tank cars, or in barrels, and in tank ships. The difference between the old law and the present law is that, instead of insisting upon the oil being barrelled before it is offered for sale, it is now permissible to sell the oil by the gallon from the tank car, or from the tank ship, or from the barrel. The inspection is made, but the result of the inspection is not stamped on the barrel. That is the difference, as I understand it, reading the two statutes.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am not familiar with the statute, but it seems to me a rather singular provision that there should be an inspection of the oil in barrels, and that the result should not be stamped upon the barrel.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The inspection would be made before the oil is put in the barrel.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But here you have a barrel containing a certain measureable article that has undergone inspection. I am not at all suggesting that the Minister of Justice was wrong about it, but merely suggesting that it seems to me a remarkable provision that there should be an inspection, and that the public should not be made aware, by some mark upon the package containing the article, that there has been an inspection and what the results are. I do not know when such a measure passed the House, but I am bound to say I do not think it is a very wise provision of this legislature or of any other legislature, to have an inspection without announcing the result upon the package.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The inspection we have now is absolutely the same inspection as that which was in force previous to 1899—the one inspection, both as to flash test and gravity.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There is a difference in this respect, that formerly the result was on the package and now it is not.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Yes, we have to assume that to be the case, that there is no information conveyed to the public in respect to the result of the inspection. Of course the inspection has taken place in order to ensure the safety of the public. The inspection by the customs official is ample for the purpose.

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). It is very distressing to hear the complaints from the North-west regarding coal oil, and I am sure we are all extremely sorry that they are in the dark up there. I would suggest that the western members move down to Ontario where we have good coal oil. I happen to be a dealer in coal oil, among other things, and can vouch for the quality of the oil that is delivered in Ontario. We used to buy it altogether for retail use in barrels, now it is delivered in tanks, and we have to take the word of the wholesale dealer who sells it to us. His wagon comes around to our shops, and he fills up our tank, and we suppose it to be of the proper gravity, and flash, and everything of proper quality. We have no complaints regarding it. Our people are well satisfied with regard to the quality of the coal oil ; and I think in that respect, at any rate, the matter is quite satisfactory to the people of Ontario. I can well understand though that if a dealer chose to be dishonest, if he took coal oil from the tank and put it in the barrel without having it properly marked by an inspector, there might be an invasion of the law there. I rose to say that the present mode of delivery of coal oil in Ontario is quite satisfactory to the dealers and to the public.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that now the system is that tank wagons come around and deliver the coal oil ?

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). Yes, they come around our way.

Mr. BLAIN The hon. member lives at Port Perry ; does the tank call at his town?

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. And at other towns in the riding of South Ontario ?

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. All the other towns ?

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). I do not know that.

Mr. BLAIN. All I have to say is that the town in which I live is very much larger in population than Port Perry It is marvellous how much these hon. gentlemen know about population, and how little about coal oil. Although the town of Brampton where I live has a very much larger population than Port Perry, every gallon of oil sold in that town comes in in barrels the same as it did for the last 20 years.

Mr. HOLMES. You are behind the age.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) knows as much about coal oil as he does about binder twine. I had occasion to hear his observations on binder twine a few weeks ago and I think it would enlighten the House very much if he would repeat his discourse upon that very important subject before the hon. members of this House. There seems to be some fault found with the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue and with the department because coal oil is not tested for its illuminating qualities. It is well understood that the quality of oil depends upon two conditions, first, on its specific gravity, and second, on the flash test. Upon the specific gravity depends the illuminating quality of the oil and on the flash test depends safety from explosion. When you have these two tests, as was mentioned by the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), you certainly have an assurance of the illuminating quality of the oil, because, having the specific gravity and flash test, you will find in these the illuminating qualities of the oil. I may say that the test of Canadian oil as to specific gravity is 794 as compared with water at 1,000, while the test of American oil is, for its specific gravity, 784 as compared with 1,000 of water.

Mr. MONK. May I ask the hon. member (Mr. Campbell) what he is reading from ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. What does it matter to you ?

Mr. MONK. I ask the hon. gentleman to state what he is reading from ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Are you prepared to state that what I am reading is not correct ?

Mr. MONK. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that we have a right to know what the hon. gentleman is reading from ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am reading from notes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Order. I think an hon. gentleman is allowed to read from the notes he has before him without having to tell the committee what he is reading, just as any hon. gentleman can read the notes which he has prepared containing any figures that he has put down, and therefore, if he says these figures are before him in the form of notes, he has a perfect right to read them.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman, it is not the rule of the House ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was interrupted——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. No hon. gentleman can be interrupted against his will.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). He may rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am only making these statements to show that the best samples of Canadian oil are superior to those of American oil at the present time. There has been a very great improvement in the quality of oil in the last few years and now the best quality of Canadian oil is equal to and better than the best quality of American oil. It may be that there was poor oil sent into the North-west Territories.

Mr. BOYD. It was not Canadian oil at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am not prepared to say whether it was Canadian or American oil, but I am sure the position taken by the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue ought to satisfy the committee, inasmuch as he has now under investigation the complaints that were made to his department and as he assures the committee that within two weeks the result of this investigation will be known and that upon the result being known action will be taken. Surely, to my mind, that ought to satisfy the committee that the department is alive to its duty and has the interest of the public at heart.

Mr. BLAIN. I did not quite understand the hon. gentleman's figures in respect to the flash test, &c. Would he be good enough to repeat them again to the committee ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I gave you a comparison as between Canadian and American oils.

Mr. BLAIN. It is then in respect to the flash test ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The specific gravity.

Mr. BLAIN. Oh, the specific gravity. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he referred to the illuminating qualities of the oil. Was that correct ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. On the specific gravity depends the illuminating quality of the oil.

Mr. BLAIN. Then, I understood him correctly. Now the hon. gentleman tells the committee that the specific gravity that was formerly stamped on the end of the barrel indicated the illuminating quality of the oil. The hon. Minister of Finance has told the committee that there never was any inspection in respect to the illuminating quality of the oil.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say anything of the sort.

Mr. BLAIN. What did the hon. gentleman say ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say that the illuminating power of the oil, in these terms, was stamped on the barrel, but I did say that when you get specific gravity and the flash test both correctly, I was informed that they produce the illuminating power, and that any one who understood it might have indicated to him the illuminating power of the oil, but there was no specific mark in these terms that the illuminating power of the oil was so much. It had to be deduced from these figures, as I have been informed.

Mr. BLAIN. The fact is that at this present time, under the new regulations, there is no test for the reason that there is nothing stamped on the end of the barrel. The changed regulations do not give an opportunity for the dealer or the consumer to know anything at all of the illuminating quality of the oil. The hon. member for West York has been good enough to read myself a lecture in respect to binder twine. I wish he would be good enough to read the House a lecture in respect to counting ballots of voters who voted four or five times in his last election. I was delighted with his remarks in his county in his recent election in respect to what an ardent protectionist he was, and with his promise that the minute he reached the House he would enter a complaint against the government for their failure to give more protection and that he would ask them to put the tariff up higher.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) where that was ?

Mr. BLAIN. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman asks that question, because he changes his policy so quickly that he does not remember. It depends entirely on where he made the statement, as to what the statement would be. We understand that very well. He was a free trader at one time and now he is a high protectionist.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As each hon. member has departed from the rules of order and as each has had his way, I hope both will be good enough to come now to the consideration of the item under discussion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It would be just as well to stop it at the beginning and not at this juncture.

Mr. OLIVER. I understood two hon. members to say, the hon. Minister of Finance, and the hon. member for West York, as with authority, that the flash test ensured safety and the specific gravity ensured illuminating power, or if I am not stating it correctly, that the two tests together, the flash test and the specific gravity test, ensured illuminating power. Am I right ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not state it as on authority. I said I was informed.

Mr. OLIVER. I understand the hon. member for West York said it as an authority. Am I right ? I am right. Then, this oil sold in the North-west Territories during the past five months did not have the illuminating power; therefore, it could not have passed these tests properly if the statement made by the hon. member for West York is correct. Now, I wish, as a member representing the west, this point to be tried out here and now. If it is a fact as stated that the flash test and the specific gravity test do give the illuminating power, then, the officers of the Department of Inland Revenue have been greatly at fault and this country has suffered consequently. If the flash test and the specific gravity test do not necessarily give the illuminating power, and I believe they do not, then, we require legislation along the lines of the evidence that has been placed before the House here to-night without regard to what may be the result of the special analysis made by the officers of the department. We members representing the country affected by the sales of this unilluminating oil ask to be understood as making the charge on the floor of this House on our responsibility as members, that the oil did not have its proper illuminating power. We do not care who says it has. We do not care what officer applies what tests he pleases. We make the statement and on behalf of our constituents we demand redress.

Mr. CLANCY. I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Campbell) that you have been asked to take the chair at this moment because I was left in a very painful state of uncertainty.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) read carefully from a paper, and even though he would not disclose his authority, the statement was a very important one. I remember when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) held a very different view as to the quality of Canadian coal oil. He told us to-night that the specific gravity and the flash test of the Canadian oil was much higher than that of the American oil and that therefore Canadian oil was better. It is not very long since the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) went about the country contending that the American oil was infinitely superior to the Canadian oil, that our people were slaves paying tribute to the oil kings of Canada and that the duty should be taken off oil. I am not quite sure that he did not even carry a gallon of coal oil in his hand to demonstrate his contention. Well, it is a good thing if the hon. gentleman has been converted, and we are glad to know now from him that the American oil was never as good as Canadian oil, and that he was all wrong about that in the past. Whether the law has been changed or not, enough has been said here to-night to warrant this matter receiving the serious attention of the government. I am glad to hear from the Minister of Inland Revenue that it is the intention of the government after full inquiry to see that no inferior oil is put on the market so far as it is possible for the department to guard against it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have already given that assurance.

Mr. HOLMES. I understood the hon. member (Mr. Blain) to argue that the oil which was supplied in Western Ontario came in in small barrels as it formerly did. Although the town of Brampton may be in darkness to the extent of receiving oil in barrels at the present day, it is a fact that generally throughout Western Ontario, the oil is delivered in tank wagons from tank supply centres. I cannot speak for the consumers, because I do not use oil myself, but so far as the retail dealers are concerned in the counties of Huron and Bruce with which I am most familiar, they endorse very cordially the present system and speak of the law as being thoroughly satisfactory.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the minister inform the House what flash light specific gravity means in respect to illuminating quality. Surely the minister in charge of the department should understand that.

An hon. MEMBER. That has been asked a dozen times.

Mr. BLAIN. Some hon. gentleman says that question has been asked a dozen times and I agree ; but the point is that we have not had an answer to the question.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I must confess that I have not very extensive practical knowledge on the question of coal oil, and even my theories do not go very far. When I took charge of the department a certain law had been in force for eight years, and that law has not been altered since with regard to the quality of the oil. Let that be well understood. I may know a great many other things, but I cannot speak with 'connaissance de cause' in regard to the quality of oil. What I have said, I repeat now, and that is, that after an experience of eight or ten years under different governments, if we find that the law is not sufficient to protect the public then we are prepared to change or amend the law in that respect. I think that should be sufficient. It is not to be expected from me that I should enter into a scientific discussion of the quality or the purity of coal oil ; but if I be in default on that I perhaps will have some one to teach me. Even if I have to repeat myself ten times, I think it is sufficient for the House that I should say that I took the law as it was ; the law which was operated by the same officer for ten years, and the very moment that we perceived that under the existing law we could not give satisfaction to the public, we took means to ascertain to what extent the public are suffering and we are prepared to remedy the defect. I cannot say more.

Mr. BLAIN. A very large quantity of American oil comes to Toronto for distribution in Ontario. Would the minister tell us who inspects that oil ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When it is imported to this country it is inspected by the customs officer, and when it is manufactured in Canada it is inspected by the inland revenue officer.

Mr. BLAIN. When is it inspected ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When it crosses the frontier I suppose.

Mr. BLAIN. Is there a stamp put on the tank ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do not the Minister of Finance, as well as the Minister of Inland Revenue, think that it is a defect in the legislation that there should be that inspection without any mark on the package to indicate that there has been inspection and the result of the inspection? I am not sufficiently familar to the trade to know the details, but looking at the question in a general way it seems to me that the legislation is defective in that respect.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The oil is imported in large packages and does not reach the consumer in that state. Though you put a stamp on the tank car it would be of very little value to the consumer, for he never gets it in a tank car. There is a heavy penalty on any person who sells coal oil in Canada which has not been inspected in the manner prescribed, and that is the protection which the public enjoys. I have been informed that until this recent matter cropped up in the North-west, there has been no complaint sent to the department.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). How would it be possible to show under such a system, that any particular barrel of coal oil has or has not been inspected. If you mark the tank when you inspect it, and indicate the result of the inspection, then when that tank is emptied into barrels the proper officer could mark the barrels. It seems to me such a provision would afford better protection.

Mr. McCARTHY. What will happen to the man who buys a gallon ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am speaking of the process until you get to the retail dealer. Of course every gallon measure cannot be inspected. My hon. friend (Mr. McCarthy) will see that an objection of that kind is absurd.

Mr. McCARTHY. My objection is not at all factious. I simply recall the fact that it is the consumer that causes all the trouble about the inferior oil.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am speaking of the inspection for the man who sells, and you must have marks of inspection on the packages so that the person who buys will have something to rely upon. It would be extremely difficult under the present system to prove that a single barrel of coal oil which bears no marks had been inspected.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is something in that, but the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) will see that he would have to follow it out down to the last gallon. The oil which is imported in tank cars or in tank ships does not always pass into barrels. There are large standing tanks in certain places into which it is passed, and then it is passed out again into other vessels. I am told that when oil is sold from a tank wagon which is the practice in western Ontario, a standard can is used which is of certified size and therefore there is protection as to quantity. However, the theory of the law is that any coal oil sold here shall not be unsafe. Of course if there is defective inspection as it has been suggested, that is another matter, but the theory of the law is that there shall be effective inspection in regard to what the law prescribes. If the oil be found on sale in Canada, the presumption is, in the absence of anything to the contrary, that it is safe and of the quality required by law; and I am afraid, though I can see the criticism which my hon. friend has applied to a particular case, that you have to risk the quality of the oil as you have that of any other article of sale, when it comes up to the requirements of the law as to the flash test and the specific gravity.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask the minister if tank cars are allowed to come into every town in the province of Ontario ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, at every port or out-port of entry in Canada.

Mr. BOYD. I would like to ask the minister, in case the report of his officers should be that the oil they have taken for inspection from the several merchants in Manitoba is good, whether he will take any action with regard to this matter ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It will be within two weeks, the minister says, when that report will be before the House. If we were to-night to introduce a Bill to amend the Inland Revenue Act in that respect, we would not have it enacted within two weeks.

Mr. BOYD. That is not the question I asked at all.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Allow me. If the attention of the House be drawn to a defect in any law, the members of the government are bound to consider it and provide a remedy ; and while this analysis will be one element in the case, even if on other evidence it can be shown that the law is defective, the government will be bound to provide a remedy.

Mr. BOYD. The question I asked was whether any action would be taken if the report of the officers was that the oil was good.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It is time enough to consider that when we have the evidence before us.

Mr. BOYD. The evidence given by the members from the North-west proves conclusively that bad oil was sold through that country. There is no question about it, and I have stated upon the floor of this House that the agent of the Standard Oil Company himself admitted that the oil was bad, and that they were withdrawing it from sale ; and about a month or six weeks after that an order was issued by the Department of Inland Revenue instructing their officers to inspect oil offered for sale. They are not likely to find any thing wrong with the oil offered for sale now.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand that the oil must come up to a certain test, whether it is in tanks or in barrels ; and if it comes up to this test, it makes no difference whether the stamp is on the barrel or not. It comes to a town in a car tank, and is pumped from that into a wagon tank carrying 200 or 300 gallons, and this is taken to the stores and is delivered to the dealers in 5-gallon or 10-gallon tanks belonging to them. I cannot see how the oil could get into the North-west without being properly inspected. It may have been that after crossing the border a dishonest dealer put water into it and then sold it to the farmers. I understand that the law to-day is as it always has been; but the usage is different, the oil being taken to the dealers in tank wagons instead of in barrels.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman is not right in supposing that the oil is subject to any test on crossing the border. I have the tariff item before me, and in it no test is provided for. The Minister of Inland Revenue stated that the customs collector inspected the oil. There is no evidence of that in the tariff ; he only collects the duty on the number of gallons brought in.

Mr. STEPHENS. I may state that I myself have purchased oil on more than one occasion, and before I could get it delivered, it had to be inspected by the customs officer, and I got from him a certificate stating that the oil was equal to the flash and the gravity test required by law. He had an instrument to test the oil himself.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. In answer to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) I may say that according to section 16 of the Act, all imported oils must be inspected by the customs officer at the port of entry designated by the Governor in Council.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the minister give us a list of the ports in the province of Ontario that are so designated ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Every port where there is a customs officer.

Mr. BOYD. I would like the hon. minister to answer the question I put to him, whether he is going to take action on the report of his officers or on the evidence brought before this House by the members from the North-west ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not understand how it is possible to trace a quantity of oil which proves not to be up to the test, and which may cause loss of life—to trace it to the proper officer and punish him for his neglect in not making a proper test.

Mr. EMMERSON. Is that not an incident of the modern method of carrying on the oil business ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I dare say it may be, if you call this the modern method ; but I do not know that that is a very conclusive answer to what I am suggesting to the committee. I do not suppose that my hon. friend from Westmoreland, if he happened to be blown through the roof, and came down minus an arm or a leg, would imagine that that was a satisfactory answer when he brought an action against the inspector. Of course, my hon. friend is very philosophic in regard to others, but I desire to make a personal application of the matter to himself. It seems to me that if we have an inspection, we should have such safeguards as to enable us to fix the responsibility for non-inspection on the officers of this government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Granting that that is the question, is it not almost inevitable ? It would be the same if it were a case of inspection of food, a man having been poisoned. It would be no great comfort to him to know that there had been inspection, which had been evaded. Yet, the inspection of food is on the whole, a good thing; and so the inspection of oil, on the whole, is a good thing. Each, in the main, works out its purpose, but there may be instances of failure, as is alleged in this case.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But the hon. minister does not understand my point. When you had a system of compulsory inspection of fish in Nova Scotia—it is not compulsory now—when a dealer bought a barrel of fish, he had the stamp of the officer upon it. The person who bought it had a remedy against the officer, if the fish was not up to the standard. But that is a circumstance which seems wanting here. I am not prepared to say that it cannot be overcome, but I suggest that it is a difficulty that some effort ought to be made to overcome.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But, to carry that out, you would have to deal with barrels and even with smaller parcels. These would be useful checks if it is possible to carry them out, but it may not be possible. The main purpose of the change, not as regards inspection test or specific gravity, but as regards handling the oil, was that it could be more cheaply transported and the necessity of barrelling it would be avoided—allowing it to be carried in tank cars instead of in small parcels. It was supposed that adequate inspection at the port of entry for imported oil, and at the refinery for Canadian oil, would amply protect the public interest.

Mr. OSLER. Is oil admitted at every port in Canada ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. At every warehousing port. At first, there was a list of ports, but it was afterwards enlarged so as to include all warehousing imports.

Mr. OSLER. As I understand it, there is an inspector at every port in Canada where coal oil is imported ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The inspection, I am informed is not a difficult matter. The officer has to weigh the oil, and an instrument is supplied for making the flash test.

Mr. OSLER. That is the case in every port of entry where oil comes into Canada now ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. So the officer of the department informs me.

Mr. OSLER. I am informed that Wallaceburg is a port of entry and that it receives oil, yet there is no one but the customs-house officer there, and there is no inspection.

Mr. STEPHENS. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) is wrong. That is not a customs port.

Mr. OSLER. I understand that oil is received there constantly.

Mr. STEPHENS. Not direct.

Mr. BLAIN. As I understand the Minister of Finance, oil is admitted at every port where there is a warehouse.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. At every port which is known in the department as a warehousing port.

Mr. BLAIN. Is Brampton, Ontario, a warehousing port ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I could not say. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) himself is probably aware.

Mr. BLAIN. I did not ask the question of the Minister of Finance.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I beg your pardon.

Mr. BLAIN. I asked it of the minister of the department.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question. I have stated more than once that the customs officer has charge of the inspection of imported oil; my department has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the minister give the House a list of the warehousing ports in Ontario where oil is received by tank ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I will ask the Minister of Customs to supply that.

Hon. Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. BLAIN. There is a dispute among some of the members with respect to this matter. I understand that Port Perry and Clinton, which were mentioned by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) are not included among these ports. I think I am correct in that. Brampton, I understand, is not in this list of warehousing ports, and oil comes to that place in barrels, as under the old Act. But I think it is only fair to the committee that we should be supplied with a list of the ports for Ontario or for the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That will be brought down.

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). I suppose the hon. member (Mr. Blain) will take my word for it that tank wagons visit Port Perry ?

Mr. BLAIN. Yes.

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). As I understand, we have been talking about oil imported from the United States. It is not against the law to bring oil from the United States in barrels, and it is still brought in that way, as well as in tanks. Dealers bring it in tanks to avoid the cost of transportation and leakage. Oil in tanks would be inspected to see that it is all right. The dealer would be responsible if it were reduced by adulteration. On the other hand, if an importer brought oil in barrels, it would be the duty of the inspector to stamp the barrel. But it would be impossible to put a stamp on every gallon in a tank car. The tank car comes to a place where they have a large receiving tank, and, from this it is taken into the tank wagons and distributed throughout the country.

Mr. BLAIN. Is Port Perry a port of entry ?

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). No, Whitby is our port.

Mr. BLAIN. Would the hon. gentleman state where this wagon gets its supply to take to Port Perry ?

Mr. ROSS (Ontario). I think it comes from Toronto or from Whitby.

Mr. MONK. If the special test ordered by the minister of the oil from the North-west does not disclose the fact that the oil submitted to the test is faulty, then there will be no legislation, I suppose ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I did not say that. We will deal with the matter when the report comes in.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) struck the nail upon the head. It is clear that a large quantity of petroleum was imported into the North-west which was not an illuminating oil. It is clear that that oil should not have entered this country for the purpose for which it was imported unless it could stand a certain test. It must be equally clear that the department passed that oil.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Not at all.

Mr. BARKER. This is not a solitary case. This oil that would neither burn nor give light was distributed over a large territory. There is a clause in the old Act, and, I presume, of the new, that the oil shall be inspected when it enters the country. This oil was undoubtedly inspected by the officer of the department, yet, it is clear that it could not stand the test required of an illuminating oil. What does he do ? He puts on the package certain figures, a certain flash test, a specific gravity ; and he knows whether the figures show that it is good illuminating oil. But the public do not know, they only see certain figures there. The inspector may send forward to the public oil that, on the face of it, is bad, and yet the public, unless they could get the hon. member for West York to travel around with his little paper and define to them whether the figures show good oil or not, are in perfect ignorance. If that is the effect of the statute, it ought to be altered, so that an inspector shall not pass any oil that does not stand the test for a good illuminating oil.

Mr. OSLER. Regarding the statement I made just now, I am correct. Oil is brought into Wallaceburg in barrels and landed on the wharf without inspection. It pays customs duty, and is then free to be sent all over this country, no matter what the character of the oil may be. There is no inspection, there is no means of inspection. I understand the oil that is used in the North-west is almost entirely supplied in barrels and not in tanks. Now it is quite possible there may be many ports like Wallaceburg where oil is delivered by boat, not tank oil but barrel oil, brought into this country and simply dumped on the wharf, where it pays duty, and is passed. It is passed now without any brand on the barrel. I understand in this way it is quite possible that large quantities of very inferior oil may be delivered in Canada and find its way to the North-west. I do not know that that is the case, but it is quite possible, and exceedingly probable ; I think I am quite safe in saying that as regards this one port there is no inspection of oil delivered there in barrels.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman's statement is correct it needs investigation, and I shall call the attention of the Minister of Customs to it. It is not the intention of the law, and it should not happen. Since the hon. gentleman makes the statement as a matter coming within his knowledge, the Minister of Customs will be bound to look into it and see what is the answer, if there be one.

Mr. STEPHENS. The hon. member for Bothwell knows that Wallaceburg is not a port of entry, and that the oil supplied at Wallaceburg is either entered at some other port probably Chatham, or is smuggled in. If entered at any other port it is inspected the same as it would be if it were in tanks.

Mr. CLANCY. I am surprised that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Stephens) does not know that Wallaceburg is a port of entry. It is an astounding revelation to me. Wallaceburg has been a port of entry for more than 30 years, I venture to say for 40 years. There are several outports at Wallaceburg. The village of Sombra and the village of Port Lambton are outports, and Wallaceburg is just as much a port of entry as the city of Chatham. If it is anything to boast of, it is quite as great as Chatham. What has been stated by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Osler) is perfectly true. I am not prepared to say whether instructions have been given the collector of customs there to make an inspection. But I have personal knowledge that oil is brought in from the United States, from Detroit and from little towns on the border, is entered with the collector of customs, and duty paid, and no attempt made at inspection. I am not now making a charge against the collector there, I do not know whether he had such instructions, but that has been the experience at that port, no doubt about it.

Mr. STEPHENS. What I meant to say was that Wallaceburg was not a warehousing port. As the inspection of oil comes under the Customs Department, it could not be inspected at Wallaceburg.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like to ask the minister if that regulation regarding stamps to go on the end of the barrel, has been abolished ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Then will the hon. gentleman state, when coal oil comes from the United States in small barrels, if it is tested, and by whom ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. When it is imported in tanks, either in barrals or otherwise—I have already read the law—it must be inspected by the customs officer.

Mr. OLIVER. In order to relieve a part of the strain that appears to exist in regard to the regulations as to the inspection of oil from the United States, I beg to say that according to my best information the principal part of the oil of which complaint was made in the North-west, was Canadian oil ; it was brought in tank vessels to Port William, was placed in large tanks and barrelled there for distribution throughout Manitoba and the North-west.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the hon. gentleman knowledge of that ? The hon. gentleman has made a very serious charge against the refiners of oil in Canada. I may tell him that they would have to send it in by tank cars, probably to the town of Sarnia in the first place, for shipment, and then they would have to re-ship it in tank vessels. Unless the hon. gentleman has personal knowledge of the accuracy of that statement, it is unfair to the oil producers in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no hesitation in taking the responsibility of stating that a large part of the oil complained of in the North-west during the past five months was sold as Canadian oil.

Mr. CLANCY. That is another thing.

Mr. OLIVER. I did not follow the oil from the well to the lamp. But I can assure the hon. member that it was Canadian oil, and for the information of other hon. members I may say that Canadian oil holds a very bad pre-eminence in reputation in the North-west. It is not considered to be as good as American oil. As a matter of fact, however, the oil brought to Fort William was there placed in large tanks and there barrelled for distribution throughout the North-west. That is the history of the greater part of the oil trade of the west.

Mr. CLANCY. I can tell the hon. gentleman that his information is entirely wrong. There is not a tank vessel owned by a single individual in Canada. When the hon. gentleman states that it has a bad reputation, I am afraid that it is owing entirely to his conduct in the past. He and his party decried Canadian oil for the purpose of making capital out of it as against American oil. The hon. gentleman, I am afraid, has given it a bad reputation and circulated the reputation throughout the country. I want to say to him that it is utterly unfair for the hon. gentleman to make the statement in this House that Canadian oil is sent in tank vessels to the upper lakes and then reshipped to the North-west. I think the hon. gentleman is utterly without a tittle of foundation for his statement, and I hope that he will soon acquire the necessary information and make the correction.

Mr. OLIVER. I will take the responsibility of stating here in this House, and now, that from Lake Superior to the Pacific Ocean, now and heretofore, the reputation of Canadian oil is absolutely inferior to that of American oil.

Mr. BOYD. In regard to the matter that has been referred to by the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver), I have this to say, that Mr. Sharpe, the present manager of the Standard Oil Company, certainly stated in his interview in the paper, as may be seen in the 'Telegram' of about the 20th of November, and I heard his son on a public platform assert, that it was American oil. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is rather amusing to listen to the flippant remarks of some hon. members from Ontario referring to us as being in the dark. We certainly were in the dark in 1896, and previously, regarding the party and the government that have had charge of the coal oil legislation for the past few years. I would like that my hon. friend had been with the premier when he traversed that country from the Red River to the Rocky Mountains, as no doubt the member for Alberta was, and had seen the placards on every wall where he spoke, and where he bewailed the position of the people of that country with regard to the coal oil tax, that he promised to wipe out immediately, and which he has so enormously reduced by one cent a gallon. Then certain arrangements were made whereby the Standard Oil Company was permitted to come into this country and get control of the market, as has been shown by members from both sides of the House, and that, Mr. Chairman, after the government was warned from this side of the House, warned, if I mistake not, by the late member for West York (Mr. Wallace), that what has happened would happen.

To provide for extra duty pay at large distilleries and other factories, $6,000.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. This vote is the same as last year, and for three or four years preceding.

Mr. CLANCY. How much of that vote of last year was spent ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Last year, out of that vote of $6,000, we expended $5,701.02.

Salaries of officers, inspectors and assistant inspectors of weights and measures, $55,100.

Mr. CLANCY. I think it is time now that we should have some explanation from the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue as to the conduct of his officers, because I fear, from the results we have had, that they have disobeyed the orders sent out by the department. Either the inspectors have been remiss in their duty or the hon. gentleman has modified the instructions that I am informed were sent to the inspectors throughout the country in regard to the use of what is known as the grain tester. I understand that a deputation waited on the hon. gentleman from the grain section of the board of trade of the city of Toronto and remonstrated against what they called a departmental regulation, but which, of course, was a statute instead of a departmental regulation. The hon. gentleman has not, apparently, taken great trouble to see that his officers have discharged their duty. I would like some declaration on the hon. gentleman's part making it perfectly plain, either that he is, as minister, utterly helpless to enforce the law by reason of the inspectors being remiss in their duty, or that the hon. gentleman is disposed to give a willing ear to those who are contending against the operation of such a law. I shall await the hon. gentleman's explanation of what is to me and to the whole country a very extraordinary state of affairs, namely, that there has been a law on the statute-book for something over five years, that the inspector who was instructed to enforce that law has not done so, and that so far as the inspection is concerned, it is absolutely and utterly a dead letter. I never knew a case where the law has been so completely ignored and I am sure the committee and the country will be delighted to know what are the underlying reasons for such an extraordinary state of affairs.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I think I had better, in order that the committee may be in a position to discuss the matter more fully and with perfect knowledge, give a short history in regard to the question referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). Grain testers were admitted to verification by Order in Council of August 20th, 1881. See circular No. 238. The Department of Justice decided in 1889 that grain testers were liable to inspection under the Weights and Measures Act. See circular G, 306, and copy of opinion of Department of Justice attached. In the spring of 1890, the department decided owing to the pressure from all points, to ask for the repeal of the Order in Council, permitting their verification. The farmers, on the one hand, urged that verification be not permitted, while boards of trade desired them to be admitted to inspection. By an Order in Council of June 7th, 1890, the previous order admitting grain testers to verification was repealed. See circular G 324. By 61 Vic., chap. 30, section 6, subsection 2, it was provided that 'no weighing machine used for weighing or determining the weights of any of the articles mentioned in section 16 of the Weights and Measures Act shall be of less certified capacity than one bushel.' See circular G 588, calling attention to the above quoted amendment and directing inspectors to acquaint persons who are using those measures, of the penalties attached for not complying with the law.

A circular was again issued by the department in September, 1901, calling attention, a further time, to the provisions of the Act 61 Vic., chap. 30. See circular G 623. The grain tester is used only to determine the weight of grain per bushel, not the actual weight of a given quantity offered for sale. It is, in fact, a test of quality, not of quantity, the grain so tested as to quality having subsequently to be weighed on verified scales when bought and sold. Until the amendment of 1898, the department took the stand that, as the grain, in respect of which the quality is determined by the tester, is sold by actual weight on legalized scales it had no right to interfere with the use of the tester, as the seller can decline to accept the tester as an arbiter. It thus being an unrecognized weighing machine no contract could be determined by it, but that nothing could prevent millers and others using it for their own information.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman state that the law does not interfere with any persons attempting to make a test in any vessels of less than one bushel certified capacity ? The reading of the statute is just what the hon. gentleman said, but the hon. gentleman has expressed some view outside of the statute that I am not quite clear about.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Until the amendment of 1898, the department took the stand that as the grain in respect of which the quality is determined by the tester is sold by actual weight on legalized scales it had no right to interfere with the use of the tester as the seller can decline to accept the tester as an arbiter.

Mr. CLANCY. Do I understand that to be a departmental regulation ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. CLANCY. How does the hon. gentleman arrive at the conclusion that since the grain is sold subject to being weighed on legalized scales the department could not prevent the use of the tester under such circumstances, because the seller might decline to have it tested. I want to say that there is no complaint against the test. The complaint is against the use of a tester of less certified capacity than one bushel. I do not understand that there has been any amendment of the Act of 1898 affecting that part of it :

> No weighing machine used for weighing or determining the weights of any of the articles mentioned in section 16 of the Weights and Measures Act shall be of less certified capacity than one bushel.

The test is made so as to see that the wheat is standard, and if the wheat is below standard there is a scale fixed by which an arbitrary reduction is made on the price of each bushel. Whether grain is bought or sold, the person has absolutely no right to make a test with any tester of less certified capacity than one bushel. Judging by the remarks of the minister, I can well understand why the law has been absolutely ignored.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Grain testers are used by the buyers to test the quality, and the seller is not bound to accept the decision of the buyer even after that test.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, he is. At every mill door and warehouse door he had to accept it or turn his team back and take it home. In theory the minister is right, but as a matter of practice he is wrong.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I was always of the opinion, and I still hold the same opinion, that the least we intervene in private business the better.

Mr. CLANCY. Now, the country will understand for the first time the position of the minister.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. These tests were not the exact measure by which the quality or quantity was to be returned. I cannot understand why the seller would be bound to accept the terms of the buyer even if he had to take his grain home.

Mr. CLANCY. Quite so; no hardship in that.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not understand how trade is conducted in the province of Ontario, but I know something of that matter in the province of Quebec. We use what we call a half bushel. If a farmer has 500 or 600 bushels of oats or peas for sale, he goes to the buyer and he says to him: I am ready to sell you 500 bushels of oats to be delivered within a month or two. When he has delivered the oats or peas the value is determined, not by the bushel, but by the weight according to law. That is the rule in the province of Quebec, and it is not to my knowledge that any lawsuit was ever instituted because there was a misunderstanding between the parties. If the facts are as represented by my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) I suppose it remains that we should change the law.

Mr. CLANCY. No. Enforce it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Perhaps it would be in order that a Bill should be introduced so that we may test the sentiment of the House and of the country.

Mr. CLANCY. The people who complain do not ask that the law should be altered, but they ask that it should be enforced. The minister proposes now to submit a Bill to the House to test public opinion on the question as to whether the present law should be enforced or not. I cannot understand what the hon. gentleman means. I tell the minister that there is absolutely no complaint against the law, which is efficient; but there is a complaint that the law is not enforced. The minister says that he does not care to interfere with private transactions, but I tell him that this is a public transaction. So far as my knowledge goes, there is no such a thing as grain tests in the United States or in any other province of the Dominion except Ontario. I am not opposed to the test. If I were engaged in the grain business I think I should want to determine the value of grain by a tester. What I am asking is that if a grain tester is to be used at all, and I do not say it should not, that grain tester shall not be of a less capacity than one certified bushel. We simply ask the minister to have backbone enough to enforce the law. When he suggests a change in the law I am afraid that he is giving a willing ear to the deputation that thundered at the door of his office recently asking that the law should be repealed. If the minister wants to tinker with the law now, it is only for the purpose of crippling it so that it may be of no use to the farmer. I hope that I have made myself clear as to the views of the farmers of Ontario generally on this question.

Mr. STEPHENS. In the town I come from, most of the grain buyers if not all of them, are using bushel measures to test the grain.

Mr. CLANCY. When did the hon. gentleman get that information?

Mr. STEPHENS. My firm has made a good many good dozens of these measures for the grain buyers, for at least the last year.

Mr. CLANCY. If the hon. gentleman will wire to the principal buyers in this town I venture to say he will find that is not the case. I have it from the farmers themselves.

Mr. STEPHENS. Well, whether the hon. member (Mr. Clancy) says it is the case or not, that will not alter the fact. I say that when the farmer sells his grain he brings it to the buyer, and the buyer tests with the bushel measure as I have seen myself, and our firm have made that measure, and we have been selling it for the last year. The farmer can make his bargain in selling his grain just as he does in selling his cattle. He can say to the buyer: I will sell you a thousand bushels of wheat, but you are to take this wheat at its actual weight; you are to use no tester. If the man says he wants it tested the farmer can say that he will not have it, and so the farmer can make a bargain when selling his grain the same as he can when selling his stock or any product of the farm.

Mr. CLANCY. I hear some hon. gentlemen cheering, and they seem to make it their business behind there to chatter out 'Hear, Hear,' on every occasion. I do not wish to be offensive to these gentlemen, but I wish to say to the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Stephens) that notwithstanding he makes his measures, and sells them, the fact remains that gentlemen of quite as reputable character as his—and his character is a good one—have stated to me within the last two months that the tester was being used as formerly. If the hon. gentleman denies that, he casts a reflection on the statement made to me by most reputable farmers. I am sure that if the farmers in his constituency read his statement in the press to-morrow that for the last year nothing but the bushel test has been used, it will be a great surprise to them. I have not seen the small tester used, but I have scarcely been a day in the city of Chatham, that farmers of reputation and truth and respectability have not told me within the last two or three months, that the old tester of one-sixteenth of a bushel is being used. I have no hesitation in accepting the statement of gentlemen who are just as respectable and just as truthful as any member in this House.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have sold grain myself during the last year, and it was not tested.

Mr. CLANCY. That might be.

Mr. STEPHENS. There was no bargain as to test when I sold the grain. They weighed it in and gave me so much per bushel on that weight. I have been among the farmers probably as much as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) has been, and I have yet to hear one recent complaint that the small tester is being used in the city of Chatham.

Mr. CLANCY. I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that, and I hope it will appear in the newspapers to-morrow.

Mr. McEWEN. I happen to be a grain merchant, and I know that in our locality the inspector sent a circular to the grain men and also to the millers forbidding them to use the tester, and since then I have put away mine. I do not know how many others have done the same thing. The grain inspector also said, that if he came around and found any in use he would confiscate them. I believe they are done away with in our section. At all events they are forbidden and liable to be confiscated.

Mr. CLANCY. I am very glad to hear that statement, and I hope it will apply generally, but my information is that it does not. I am aware that the minister has sent out a circular, but the annoying part of it is that in some localities at least there has been no attention paid to it. I am told that in my own town the small tester is in use still.

Mr. BLAIN. I would like to ask the hon. member for Kent what material is used in the manufacture of those bushel measures ?

Mr. STEPHENS. Light steel.

Mr. BLAIN. Are they stamped ?

Mr. STEPHENS. Yes, by the government inspector.

Mr. BLAIN. What kind of a bottom ?

Mr. STEPHENS. Wood or iron, or any other material, so long as it is of the right size.

Mr. McEWEN. I consider this bushel measure a great mistake. On a cold winter day, when half a dozen or more teams are waiting to be unloaded, you have to take a bushel and fill it out of every man's sleigh, and weigh it. I can assure you it is a very great hardship. The majority of grain men would rather trust their eyes than go to that trouble. The men who find the most fault with these small grain testers are those with light grain ; these are the men who make the loudest noise. The grain tester is a good thing for both the grain men and the grain merchant, and I think that is the proper thing to use.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cardwell). As a grain producer and seller, I can say that it is the small measure which was used in Cardwell, Charleston, Caledon East, Mono Road and Bolton last fall.

Mr. CLANCY. Before we vote the salaries for these inspectors, I think we might now ask for some declaration on the part of the minister as to whether he still adheres to the statement he made a moment ago that he did not care to interfere, as he thought it would be an interference with trade. We might reasonably expect a statement from the hon. gentleman that he will see that the Act is enforced rather than propose any amendments to it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I may say to my hon. friend that in order to have the law carried out, and perhaps at his own instance, we issued on the 10th of September, 1901, the following circular :

Department of Inland Revenue.

Sir,—Complaint has been made to the department that notwithstanding the provision of subsection 2 of section 6 of 61 Victoria, chapter 30, the law is being contravened (already brought to your notice by circular sheet 588 of March 9, 1900.) This section reads as follows :

'No weighing machine used for weighing or determining the weights of any of the articles mentioned in section 16 of the Weights and Measures Act shall be of less capacity than one bushel.'

Therefore, any use made of any weighing machine (having a less capacity than one bushel) for the purpose of charging for or ascertaining the amount or price to be paid for any of the articles referred to in section 16, is illegal. It is the duty of all inspectors and assistant inspectors of weights and measures to so advise all persons offending, and to notify them that the further illegal use of such weighing machines shall lead to their confiscation and to the institution of proceedings for the collection of the penalties fixed by section 29 of said Act.

This is the circular that was issued last year. I may add that I was not in a position to judge of the merits or demerits of that grain tester. Some of the dealers are in favour of using it, and I cannot perceive now why, in face of the law and our circular, a farmer should be bound to sell his grain to a man who uses a grain tester. On the one hand, we have the representation of the hon. member for Bothwell, who may be sustained by the opinion of some other gentlemen ; but, on the other hand, we have the boards of trade, representing the buyers and shippers, who want us to maintain the use of the grain tester.

Mr. CLANCY. The small one ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes. I may say to my hon. friend, en passant, that I was never approached by any deputation. We have received resolutions passed by the boards of trade in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, and perhaps some other places ; but, without entering into the merits of the use of the grain tester, would my hon. friend say that it would be in the interest of the farmers of Manitoba ?

Mr. CLANCY. They are not interfered with at all, because it is not used there. They have their grain standards, which are fixed by persons whose business it is to establish the qualities of the grain. There is no such thing as this small grain tester used anywhere in Canada outside of the province of Ontario.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. What is the hon. gentleman asking us to do ? We have issued a circular according to the law as amended in 1901, and we have told our officers that they should inform people using those testers that if they continue doing so the penalties enacted by the law will be imposed. The hon. gentleman now wants us to take legal proceedings ; but if that grain tester is not illegal, how can we succeed ?

Mr. CLANCY. Has any one contended that it is a legal measure ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. It cannot be legal, because the clause of the Act which I have already read says that no measure less than a bushel shall be used. Suppose we were to take an action, what would be the result of it ? The man would say. 'I may use a grain tester or any other kind of measure.' It is not the fact that the little instrument bears the name of grain tester that makes it legal. You can use any other vessel.

Mr. CLANCY. That law declares that any other cannot be used.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, but that it is a matter of private bargain between the buyer and seller.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, because they agree upon a certain measure not to determine the weight or the quality, but to form a basis for arranging the price. That is a matter of private bargain.

Mr. CLANCY. It is not often that we find a minister of the Crown declaring his utter helplessness to enforce the law. Any tester less than a bushel is false weight or measure—it is a false instrument for the purpose under the law, and it is the duty of the hon. minister, at any cost, to see that the law is enforced in this case as in any other. The hon. gentleman need not enter into any question of testing it in the courts. He has only to say to his officers to see to it that there are none of these instruments in use, and that any that are found in use shall be confiscated and any who use them fined. Would the hon. gentleman have the farmer bring before the courts a man whom he found using one of these instruments, entering upon a lawsuit that would probably cost him his farm in fighting a great corporation like the Millers' Association ? Or is he prepared to take the course, the only course that is open to a minister, particularly when he has asked the House to vote money to pay the officers to enforce the law, and that is to enforce that law fairly. There is no need to bandy words about it. It is as plain as anything could be made that there is a law in the statute-book which forbids the use of such an instrument. I will do the hon. minister the credit of saying that he is making laudable efforts to carry out the law. But he tells us that they are fruitless, and that seems to end his inclination to carry out the law. It is not a matter of private bargain, because there is no bargain made. Suppose that the hon. minister is a grain buyer. I go to his warehouse with a load of grain. I make no bargain, except to sell for 75 cents a bushel, subject to a test which may either increase or lower the price. This is not a matter of private bargain, but an appeal to the law where there is no bargain, and where no bargain need to be made. If I said I would sell my grain at 75 cents per bushel, regardless of what the tester might make it, whether above or below the standard, that might fairly be called a matter of bargain. But where the price may be varied according to the results shown by the tester under the rules of the Millers' Association, that is a different matter. I repeat what I have often said, that I do not object to the grain-buyer having a means of testing the grain he is buying from the farmer. But I venture to repeat that it is clear that it is not for the minister to inquire whether the farmer has made a bargain or not where this tester has been used. The fact is a false weight or measure prohibited by the law has been used, and it is the duty of the officers to take cognizance of that fact. I would ask the hon. minister if he is preparing to follow up the efforts he has made for the enforcement of the present law ? I had some information that the inspectors are not sent out especially for this business as a rule. I do not know whether they are sent out specially in any case or not, but, no doubt the minister will be able to inform us. I understand that the inspection is not made oftener than once a year. If no inspector is sent out, I can understand that the law will be ignored, because this matter will never come under the notice of the inspectors whose special duty it is to inspect weights and measures, but whose additional duty it is to look after this tester. I think the hon. minister has made a laudable effort. I think he took the only step that could be taken by a minister—he tried to enforce the law. I think I ought to have some declaration from him whether he will, if necessary, send out inspectors especially to see to this matter and enforce the law. Anything short of that means that the law will not be enforced.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before the minister answers my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) I would like to ask both the minister and my hon. friend how the law would be enforced in such a case ? I have been in the grain business for thirty years. This tester, as my hon. friend calls it, was purchased by the grain-buyers some years ago, when we dealt largely in barley to export to the United States. If, according to the tester, that barley weighed forty-six pounds a bushel, it was worth so much; if it weighed forty-eight or 50 pounds, it would be worth so much more. In order to be able to get our barley graded we invested in these American weighing machines.

Mr. CLANCY. They are not American.

Mr. TAYLOR. I bought mine in the United States. The instrument consisted of a funnel, and the grain filtered down into a two-quart measure that hung on a scale. When it was filled through the funnel, you struck it off level with a ruler, and you were then able to see what the barley weighed per bushel. The farmers, of course, objected, that if they filled the bushel measure and then struck the side of the measure, it would contain more and show a greater weight per bushel. This raised a cry against these machines, and this regulation was adopted. I have one of those machines in my warehouse. A man comes to me with a load of grain, and we bargain as to the price. What is to prevent me taking a sample of that grain into my office to examine it and ascertain its value. I fill my two-quart measure and come to the conclusion that the grain is worth 70 cents per bushel. I offer that price to the farmer, and he is free to take it or not, as he pleases. I deny the right of the government or anybody else to take that instrument, which is my property, out of my warehouse and smash it. I am not buying or selling by it. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, the grain is bought on an examination of a sample held in the hand. But, sometimes a case arises when we want to know the weight per bushel, and that is what the tester is used for. It is not used as a test between buyer and seller, but it is used by the buyer as a means of ascertaining what the grain is worth.

Mr. CLANCY. Then, why does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) object to this ?

Mr. TAYLOR. It is my property, and I am not using it in any illegal way. Therefore, I deny the right of this government or anybody else to take it from me.

Mr. CLANCY. I am afraid the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has convicted himself. He says he does not buy or sell by this instrument. Yet he says also that he uses this test before he tells the farmers what he will give them for the grain. Now, there is no gentleman would dare to assume the responsibility of defending a measure that is found to be false. I am not accusing the grain men of endeavouring to cheat. But if the hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to go to the Department of Inland Revenue when the test was made by the minister and deputy minister with wheat weighing 62¾ pounds per bushel, he would have seen that after the test had been made of a bushel by the small tester, that there was still ten and one-half ounces left. Why? Because it was dribbled through that little funnel, the air was allowed to get in, and the vessel was too small, and it turned out to be a false test. What was that test, as it would have operated on the farmer ? There were only five out of sixteen tests that went to 62 pounds, although it was 62¾ pounds by actual weight in a bushel tester, and in a bushel measure. Now, eleven of those farmers would have to take 61 pounds out of the sixteen tests. I think that my hon. friend, although a very just man, has been on one side of the question all his life. He had better read again what the law declares. The section reads :

> No weighing machine used for weighing or determining the weight of any articles mentioned in section 16 of the Weights and Measures Act, shall be of less certified capacity than one bushel.

The hon. gentleman uses one-sixteenth of a bushel. Now it has been found by actual experience—and I make no charge against those who use it—that it is so small that it is not a fair tester. The farmers do not ask that the men who purchase their grain should be deprived of the means of ascertaining the value of that grain by putting it into the test of a bushel. We all concede that it is not so convenient ; but it cannot be urged that on the ground of convenience a measure should be used that is not fair to the farmer.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand that the only measure that can be used in the province of Ontario between the buyer and seller of grain is a one-bushel measure ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The legal measure, the law says so.

Mr. BLAIN. And only a bushel measure?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Suppose a farmer went into his neighbour's granary and purchased 30 bushels of wheat, would he be compelled to use a one-bushel measure to measure that wheat ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. They are bound to use it. They have always to go to the legal weight. I mentioned the practice in Quebec. There we use the term bushel in speaking of 400 bushels, 500 bushels, 600 bushels or any other quantity. But when we come to deliver the grain it is always by weight according to the agreement between seller and buyer. The buyer will say, I will give you 25 cents, or 30 cents, for 32, 34 or 36 pounds of oats. That is the condition of sale, always understood.

Mr. MONK. Not always in Montreal, for weight.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. They may change it in Montreal. Sometimes they say 40 pounds or 42 pounds. It depends on the weight of the oats, which is not always the same. In some years the oats are heavier than in other years. But I cannot understand, in face of the law as it is to-day, how far we can go, and I call the attention of the legal profession here to that point.

Mr. CLANCY. Cannot the hon. gentleman see that the instructions are carried out ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes, but then we will be face to face with the argument used by the hon member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) : Can you deprive me of my measure ? The government has no business to interfere.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not use this tester in buying grain by any means. I have a two-quart measure, I fill that two-quart measure, and I set it on the scales to see how much it will weigh. That is what a grain man does. One load of oats may weigh 40 pounds to the bushel, another load 32 pounds ; that which weighs 40 pounds is worth more than that which weighs but 32 pounds, and this instrument will indicate it to me.

Mr. CLANCY. Why not use a bushel ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Because it is not so convenient. Ninety-nine loads out of 100 are bought by the purchaser merely looking at the grain in his hand. There is not a grain man in Ontario but has one of these instruments in his warehouse.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman says he does not set the law at defiance. The hon. member for Leeds says he just uses it when he likes. If he uses it at all the law declares it shall be a bushel. He is not obliged to use it, but the farmer ought to be protected when he does use it, and know that it has a certified capacity of one bushel. Yet the hon. gentleman declares that he cannot be prevented from using a tester. Unless the tester is of the certified capacity of one bushel he is using it illegally, because the measure is his own it gives him no right to use it. The hon. gentleman is not obliged to use a tester, but if he does use one, the law steps in and says, for the protection of the farmer, that it must be one bushel.

Mr. TAYLOR. And that is all right. My hon. friend comes to me and says, I want to sell you 500 bushels of pease, or wheat, and if your wheat weighs 60 pounds a bushel I will give you 80 cents a bushel. He comes in with his wheat and I must then take a bushel measure and put it on the scales and test it. But if he comes in with his load of grain and says : How much will you give me for that load of grain, without saying anything about the weight, I look at it, and if I am not satisfied as to what it will weigh, I take two quarts of it and weigh it and make the calculation to see how much a bushel will weigh, and I pay for it accordingly. But if I buy from a man and he guarantees me that his oats will weigh 34 pounds a bushel, I must, by the law, use a one-bushel measure.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. I say yes. You come to me to sell me 500 bushels of oats, and I say I will give you 30 cents a bushel if they weigh 34 pounds to the bushel. Then I must weigh a bushel. But if I am buying these from you and nothing said about the quantity, or the quality, I look at the oats, and I may be deceived, I may think these oats will not weigh over 30 pounds. I will take two quarts and test them for my satisfaction, and the result will tell me whether they will weigh 30 or 32 or 34 pounds to the bushel. That is all we use it for. But if I buy oats at a price of so much per bushel provided they weigh 34 pounds, I must weigh one bushel to see how much they will weigh. But in the case of every load of grain that comes in after we make the bargain, it is put on the platform scales and the quantity is thus determined.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon, gentleman need not try to confuse the question. A man brings in a load of grain. The hon. gentleman wants to be sure that it is up to a certain standard, and he takes his two quart measure and by that he makes the test. The complaint of the farmer is not that he takes grain without a test, because he will be glad to sell it and to take so much for his grain to be weighed on the scale and no test. But the buyer insists upon the test, he asks that it shall be made in a vessel, namely, a bushel measure, and it has been demonstrated time and again that nothing else than that is fair. Now, I want to ask the hon. minister to declare to the House whether he intends to continue in his efforts to enforce the Act as it now stands.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS. It seems to me this question resolves itself into ascertaining whether the minister has power or not to take these vessels away from the grain buyers. I myself have made some inquiry, and I believe he has not that power, and that the grain buyer can use this tester to satisfy himself the same as he can use his eyes to satisfy himself. He does not use it for the purpose of buying grain from the farmer, but to satisfy himself as to its value. I believe that a tester is a good thing, but it should be a bushel measure. I think if the minister has the power he should do away with the smaller measure altogether, but I do not believe that he has power to do that. I believe that the buyer can use the tester the same as he can use his eyes.

Mr. McGOWAN. As I understand the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) he proposes that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue should destroy all the testing machines of less than one bushel capacity.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

Mr. McGOWAN. I thought the hon. gentleman said that. If the minister were to do that it would inflict a very great hardship on a great many people. I buy a carload of flax seed, for instance, and I test it with a machine very much smaller than one bushel capacity. We have to ascertain how much dirt there is in that flax, and it is understood in the trade that it shall be sold subject to that test. It would be a very great hardship to adopt a bushel measure for this purpose. I hope the hon. member will not destroy all of these machines that are of a less capacity than one bushel.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend (Mr. McGowan) misunderstands me. I can assure him that I am not so belligerent as he suspects. All I ask the hon. gentleman to do is to put that machine aside and buy a new one of a bushel capacity.

Mr. McGOWAN. Well, I will not do that.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not hear what the hon. member said in response to my question a moment ago.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I said that I would endeavour to have the law carried out.

Mr. CLANCY. Has the hon. gentleman any special inspection for this purpose ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No, except that the officers will have to comply with the circular that I have already read.

Mr. CLANCY. I had a promise from the hon. gentleman's department that inspectors at least within a limited area would go out for this purpose, I want to ask the hon. gentleman if this promise has been carried out.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That was done.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cardwell). The grievance that the farmer feels against the use of a smaller measure than one bushel is this : You go in with your load of grain and the merchant tells you he will give you so much if it comes up to such a test and he shows you a sample of grain which is sent to him as a standard to go by. The farmer thinks that the grain should be tested in a larger vessel than is used so that the balance would have to be counted upon when weighing because it always takes something to balance the beam in weighing a quantity short of a bushel. I think it would be fairer that there should be one bushel weighed because the merchant has an advantage in weighing a little at a time instead of a whole bushel. We all know very well that it takes something to balance the beam always and whilst you weigh oftener it will count that when you come up to the amount of a bushel. I do not know whether the department will be able to confiscate these small machines or not. I believe there is no use in attempting it unless it can compel each buyer to test the grain in a bushel measure.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Chairman, there is a matter I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue with the object of getting his views upon it. It is the matter of the weighing of grain coming through threshing machines. I do not know whether this question has reached the attention of the hon. minister or not, but it is a matter of a great deal of importance to the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories. According to the way in which the Weights and Measures Act has been interpreted I understand that the owners of grain have to pay for their threshing by the bushel measure. Most of the threshing machines in Manitoba and the North-west Territories have bushellers that put the grain into a bag and the bags are counted, or they have automatic weighers that weigh the grain as it is threshed, and passed up through an elevator. I am told by men engaged in the business that they have a great deal of trouble with some dishonest people in collecting the amount of their threshing bills, because, after threshing has been done, in some cases, they have refused to pay for it, claiming that, according to the regulation of the Department of Inland Revenue, they are not called upon to pay for any grain which is not measured through a bushel measure. If that is the correct interpretation of the Act, I think it is decidedly a great hardship to the men engaged in the threshing business. I understand there have been some cases before the courts in the province of Manitoba and that decisions such as I have referred to against the grain threshers have been given in the manner which I have mentioned. I would like to have the opinion of the hon. minister in regard to it.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We have already had a reference of the matter to the department. There were complaints that a dispute had arisen between the proprietors of these threshing machines and some farmers, but this is one of those cases with which we cannot interfere. Our answer was that we were not prepared to devise a machine by which an apparatus might be provided to be attached to a threshing machine for the purpose of weighing grain. Let the farmers and the men who manage these machines agree upon some kind of a measure or weighing machine which we can inspect. All we can do is to inspect that measure or weighing machine. The manufacturer of these machines cannot expect the department to devise a means by which an apparatus can be attached to a machine such as a weighing machine or some kind of a measure. That is not our business. I cannot understand why the owners of threshing machines and the farmers cannot agree as to that. We have, in the province of Quebec, threshing machines, perhaps not so powerful as these, and I never heard that there was any dispute in regard to the payment to the owners of those machines. This is a question that they must settle for themselves. We cannot inspect unless we are called upon to inspect a measure.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). The hon. minister states that he does not see any reason why the threshers and the farmers cannot have some measure that they can mutually agree upon. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) has referred to the fact that by some decisions of the courts they cannot do this. I am in receipt of some communications from threshers, amongst them is one from the secretary of the Threshers Protective Association in which they state they are not permitted to do that. I will read one letter I have received :

> I beg leave to call your attention to the bearing the Weights and Measures Act has on threshermen. According to a late decision a thresherman cannot collect unless he uses a standard measure which must be stricken, a thing it is almost impossible to do. As a thresher does not buy grain but only bestows a certain amount of labour upon it in preparing it for market he should be allowed to contract by bag or any way that will be mutally agreeable the same as any other labourers who take part in its production. Mr. Sifton was interviewed at Brandon, and promised to look into the matter and we would ask you to give your aid and assistance when it comes up.

The hon. gentleman will see that the secretary of the Threshers Protective Association is under the impression that they cannot enter into an agreement that will be mutually satisfactory on account of this decision.

Mr. BOYD.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Let these men agree among themselves on a measure and we are ready to inspect that measure. But, we cannot go further. They want us to devise some means by way of an apparatus attached to the threshing machine. We cannot do that. It is only our duty to inspect weights or measures under the law.

Mr. BOYD. Do I understand the hon. minister to say that they will not inspect this measure that is on the machine ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. No. We cannot inspect a measure attached to the threshing machine unless it comes under the terms of the law. If it does, then of course we are bound to inspect it. Any machine which falls under the terms of the law we are bound to inspect.

Mr. BOYD. I think that would be a contradiction of the judgment which has been given by the courts if I understand it aright. I want to point out the hardship that these men are labouring under. These machines thresh from 2,000 up to 2,700 bushels in a day. How is it possible for wheat in quantities like that to be handled in any other way than the way in which it is now handled, either through a bagger, or through an automatic weigher ? We think the government should test these automatic weighing machines, or that some means should be devised whereby these men would be able to collect their charges for threshing grain.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). I have not heard any explanation from the hon. minister as to why this increase of 10 per cent over the vote for last year is asked for. Is it caused by an increase in the number of officers or, have the salaries been increased ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I will give the information to my hon. friend. There is an increase of $4,950, made up as follows : It is in the first place to provide for the inspection of weights and measures in the Yukon, where we have no inspection now, and there is pressure brought to bear that we should appoint an officer, which I think we should do.

Mr. CLANCY. Will he do his duty ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I expect so. To appoint an inspector in St. Hyacinthe, $800; to appoint Thomas Parker, assistant inspector, British Columbia mainland, $600; to provide an assistant inspector, Nova Scotia, $800; to appoint F. H. Prefontaine, assistant inspector, Quebec, $500; to appoint J. E. Bernier, assistant inspector, St. John, N.B., $600—I may say he is no relation of mine—increase to officers, $450; to transfer W. J. Labelle from inside service to outside service, $1,100, making $6,350, less $1,400, leaving $4,950.

Metrical instruments, $500.

Mr. TAYLOR. I had an application from the head master of the Gananoque High School a few days ago, for one of those metrical systems. I interviewed the minister in reference to the matter, and he told me that he had given a great many out to schools and that he had none on hand. The letter sent to me by the master of the Gananoque school says that this would be very useful to the pupils. In view of this, I believe that the minister should make provision in the supplementary estimates to secure a supply for the high schools of the Dominion. There are only one or two in each county. The government do very little for our schools, and I do not think they could spend money better than in furnishing all the high schools with these metrical charts.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. As soon as the metric systems which have been ordered from France arrive here, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) will receive one for the academy for which he has applied. Since 1897-98 we have expended $1,750 for these metric systems. We have already given out 167 and we have application for 43 more. Formerly we kept no record, but for two years we have a record giving the name of each institution to which they have been sent, and since I have been in the department they have been distributed to colleges, seminaries, convents, normal schools and high schools. It is the intention of the department to order some more to satisfy the demands.

Salaries of inspectors of gas and electric light, $21,450.

Mr. BLAIN. Do these inspectors travel through country towns for the purpose of inspecting the electric light systems ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The increase of $750 is for what may be called statutory increases, $400, and to appoint an inspector in Charlottetown, $300. The inspection of electricity in done by the gas inspector in the town or locality when there is such an officer, and when there is no such officer in the town the inspector of the next town makes the inspection.

Mr. BLAIN. Is it the duty of one of these inspectors to visit a country town where they have an electric light system at certain intervals during the year ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. Whenever they are called for. The Act of last session provides that after the meters are fixed they remain untouched for five years except there is a disagreement between the user and the company. In that case the inspector is called in to examine the meter and he must do it in the presence of the owner or user. If there is no inspector in the locality, the parties interested or the company may call upon the officer in charge of the inspection in that district.

Mr. BLAIN. I refer more particularly to the towns in which there are no meters in use.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. We inspect meters and not electric plant.

Mr. BLAIN. This item speaks of electric light inspectors.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That is the general term.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand that there is no electric light inspection in towns where no meters are used ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. They have to register in the department, and that is all.

Mr. MONK. This amount is considerable, and I do not want to refer to the discussion in respect to coal oil, which has occupied the greater part of the evening.

Mr. TALBOT. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. It seems to be the particular function of the hon. member for Bellechasse to cry out 'hear, hear.' We are voting this evening over $600,000, a large part of which is for the inspection of gas and electric light. There is no doubt that a much larger proportion of the population use coal oil than use either of these illuminants. There have been complaints in the west and there have been great complaints around Montreal as to the quality of the coal oil sold. I believe the minister was right when he stated that as a matter of fact there is no inspection of coal oil, but I believe that he was wrong when he stated that the law does not authorize his department to inspect the illuminating power of coal oil. We have had a divergence of views on that. We have had the Minister of Finance say that the law did authorize the inspection, but I did not understand from the Minister of Justice that the law did authorize that inspection. My own idea, looking at the Act as I find it, is that your department has the power to make regulations which would enable you to inspect coal oil in the way we desire it should be inspected. Here is a company that has an immense sale of oil in Canada; it is a monopoly that carries out of the country over $2,000,000 a year in unfair profits, to my mind. It seems to me that we are entitled to know what the policy of the government is before we close this question. Is it the intention of the government to provide for such an inspection of coal oil as will ensure us a satisfactory quality ? If the government refuse to tell us what they are going to do in that respect, it is a proof that that gigantic company has even greater influence than we imagine it has.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. I do not think so, and I do not think that my hon. friend is convinced of what he has said, that the company may have some power over the government or over myself. What I have said is that I will see how we can remidy the evils complained of in Manitoba, the North-west or any other part of the Dominion ; and before proposing any change in the law, I will ascertain through the Department of Justice how far we can go under the law as it now stands. My hon. friend and myself might discuss the interpretation of the law, but that would have no practical result. What I have stated, and what I repeat, is that as soon as the report from Manitoba reaches us, which will be within two weeks, I shall have the whole question examined, to see what we can do to protect the public. I cannot say any more.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the result of the test of the first sample of coal oil brought from Manitoba ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. The result was that it was good oil.

Mr. JOHNSTON (West Lambton). Before this discussion is closed, I would like to say a few words. It seems to me that the mere presence of coal oil on the market is an indication that it has passed inspection by the government.

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE. That is the assumption.

Mr. JOHNSTON (West Lambton). To thoroughly get over the difference it would be necessary to examine specimens of coal oil under the Adulteration of Food Act. There is no doubt whatever that it passes inspection in the first place, and if any manipulation takes place, it is while it is in transit to the retail dealer, or at all events before it reaches the consumer. As to Canadian oil being inferior to American oil, the suggestion is perfectly absurd. The best coal oil made on the continent to-day is Canadian oil. That is borne out by every possible test. Canadian water white oil is the best and most economical oil made. Its specific gravity is greater than that of American oil, it has less volatile matter, it burns as clearly, and lasts longer.

Mr. BOYD. We certainly did not have that kind of oil in Manitoba last fall.

Mr. JOHNSTON (West Lambton). You said it was American oil.

Mr. BLAIN. If the hon. gentleman's statement be correct, it is very strange that the consumers in the province of Ontario will pay from two to five cents a gallon more for American oil than for Canadian oil.

Mr. JOHNSTON (West Lambton). It is beyond dispute that a great deal of Canadian water white oil is sold in Ontario as American oil.

Mr. BLAIN. If that is true, do you not think it requires some inspection ?

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. Friday.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 14, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the chair at Three o'clock.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk) presented the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of the House during the present session as follows :

Friday, March 14, 1902.

The select committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of this House during the present session beg leave to present the following as their second report : Your committee recommend that Mr. Wilfrid Gascon, who has been employed in a temporary capacity on the staff of translators of the official report of the debates from the beginning of the present session, be appointed to the position on the said staff rendered vacant by the death of the late Emile Tremblay, and that his appointment and remuneration, viz., $1,000 per session date from the 13th ult.

All which is respectfully submitted.

(Sgd.) JOHN CHARLTON,
Chairman, pro tem.

He moved :

That the second report of the select committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of this House during the present session be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I must raise the objection that I did before to the adoption of reports the same day as they are presented.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the objection is quite proper and this will be considered a notice of motion.

Motion allowed to stand.

Bill (No. 47) to incorporate the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.—Mr. Campbell.

Bill (No 48) to incorporate the Montreal and St. Lawrence Bridge Company.—Mr. Madore.

Bill (No. 49) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of John Westren.—Mr. Campbell.

Bill (No. 50) respecting the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway Company. —Mr. Calvert.

Bill (No. 51) to incorporate the Dyment Banking, Loan and Savings Company.—Mr. McCarthy.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. U. WILSON (Lennox). Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to inquire from the government when I may expect that return in reference to immigration ?

An order of the House was passed on the 19th of last month and I do not see why the return has not been brought down.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I shall have inquiries made at once, and give the information to my hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. A. E. KEMP (East Toronto). In the absence of the Minister of Railways, the acting minister promised us some time ago that Mr. Maclean's report on freight rates would be brought down. Is the report ready ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). There are two reports and they are now being printed. I hope to be able to bring them down perhaps some day next week.

REGINA LAW LIBRARY.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved second reading of Bill (No. 19) respecting the Regina Law Library.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). What is this Bill about ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The law library at Regina was created by the government for the use of the judges of the North-west Territories. The territories have now sufficiently developed to have a Bar Association of their own. The intention of the Bill is to relieve the government of any further obligation with reference to the maintenance of that library and to hand it over to the Bar Association. This is done at the request of the association itself.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Are you going to get anything for the library ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. No. The library has been maintained up to the present at the expense of the government, and this Bill is passed with a view that it shall hereafter be maintained at the expense of the Law Association.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You take power for the Governor in Council to hand over the library absolutely upon such terms as they may see fit. I thought perhaps the terms include some payment.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. It would be useless to do that, because, if we did maintain the library the Bar would have it for nothing. It is thought better to let the Bar have it and be done with it.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It would be foolish to try to get anything out of the lawyers at any rate.

Bill considered in committee, reported, read a third time and passed.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE COMPANIES.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE moved second reading of Bill (No. 28) respecting Telegraph and Telephone Companies.

Motion agreed to and Bill read a second time.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. When I introduced this Bill I stated that the intention was to have it referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines. I now move that the Bill be referred to that committee.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Very good.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—DUTY ON HORSES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved that the House go again into Committee of Supply.

Mr. N. BOYD (Macdonald). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House, and more particularly the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Minister of Customs to the law that we think is working most unfairly against the horse breeders of Manitoba and the North-west particularly, and also against the interest of the horse breeders throughout western Canada. I refer to the very low rate of the customs valuation at which horses are permitted to come into this country. The minimum value at which a horse may be imported is $15 and at the rate of 20 per cent the duty amounts only to the $3 which is practically nothing. In consequence a very inferior breed of horses has been admitted into the North-west Territories and Manitoba. This practice has a most injurious effect upon the breed of horses. The horse breeders of Manitoba and the North-west Territories have gone to enormous expense in introducing from England, from Scotland, from Ireland and from the United States some of the very best blood to be procured in these countries. The effect has been to produce animals that are a credit to any country. But this has been seriously interfered with during the past few years by permitting cheap, low grade animals to come in at a valuation of $15, or on payment of a duty of $3 per animal. The House will see the injurious effect that this must have on the breeding of horses in Canada. I understand that the evil has reached Ontario, and that car loads and even train loads of horses of this very inferior quality have been brought into that province during the last year or two.

Now, Sir, if there is anything that Canada is capable of producing within its own borders, it certainly is horses, because they will winter out in Manitoba and the North-west Territories and do exceedingly well. I think it is only necessary to draw the attention of the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) to this matter to show him that it is really in the interest of the horse breeders and agriculturists of Canada that a stop should be put to this practice. Indian ponies, some of the most miserable scrubs to be found anywhere, are being imported, and nearly all the disease that has broken out in Manitoba and the North-west, such as glanders and a low kind of fever, has been traceable to these inferior animals. The Horse Breeders' Association of the Territories and the Horse Breeders' Association of Manitoba have passed very strong resolutions on this subject. I believe the general sentiment is that the valuation of imported horses should be increased to at least $75 or $100. A horse that is not worth that much should not be permitted to come into the country. Any man who has had any practical experience of horse breeding knows that he always falls short of producing what he expects and hopes for—that for every animal that comes up to his expectations there will be nine or ten that will fail to do so. So that we are always able to procure within our own bounds sufficient of the inferior grades of animals; and what we need is a larger number of the higher grade. Therefore, I trust that the government, having had an expression from those who are interested in this matter, not alone in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, but in Ontario, will see their way clear to meet their wishes by raising the valuation to a reasonable rate, which I think should be between $75 and $100.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, I have heard a great many complaints in Western Ontario from those engaged in the breeding of horses and in farming operations about the evil which my hon. friend complains of. The introduction of this miserable class of cayuses, as they are termed—western ponies—which cost practically nothing, will have the effect of greatly deteriorating the quality of the stock in the country if it is not speedily put an end to. It is really a calamity to the agricultural classes of Canada that this trade is permitted, and I beg to ask the government to take the matter into their serious consideration. I think they will find, upon investigation, that it would be a public benefit to prevent the introduction of this class of horses into the country, either by the imposition of high duties or by some effective regulation. We have a good reputation for the character of the horses raised in Canada; and, though that business has been to some degree depressed for a number of years past, it is again becoming a prosperous one. Our horses, especially our fast trotting and our carriage horses, are in good demand in the United States, and our farmers should be encouraged in the production of high grade animals. I can only add my protest to that of the hon. member who has spoken as to the impropriety of permitting this trade in cayuses to continue.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT (Western Assiniboia). Mr. Speaker, in support of the case which has been presented by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd), I do not know that I can do better than read to the House an extract from the last report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the Territories, which is as follows :—

> Although the territories, particularly the western portion thereof, are plentifully supplied with native horses of a very low standard of excellence, for which it is practically an impossibility to find a market, the importation of scrub horses is still going on, thus materially aggravating the unfavourable market conditions for the above mentioned class of horses. The United States supplied us with some 6,000 horses during the past year at an average value per head of about $20. Representations have in the past been made to the Dominion government by agricultural societies in the territories, the Western Stock Growers' Association and the Horse Breeders' Association of Manitoba with a view to having the valuation of horses brought in from the United States placed on a reasonable basis. At the present time the minimum valuation is placed at $15. It would appear that no hardship would be inflicted upon dealers and purchasers if this amount were raised to $40 or $50. It may safely be taken for granted that any horse worth less than $50 is not required in this country, either for breeding purposes or for actual use.

I may say that it is not from the point of view of a protectionist in the ordinary tariff sense that I support the plea of my hon. friend. We ask that the change be made for the purpose of protecting the country from the importation of an undesirable class of horses. Nor do the Horse Breeders' Association make the request in the usual protectionist spirit. In a document issued some time ago by that Association, I find the following, written by the secretary. After stating the matter, he goes on to say :

> In submitting the above I am directed by my Executive Committee to point out as emphatically as lies in my power, that the object territorial horse breeders have in view in agitating for the imposition of a minimum valuation on importations of horses, somewhat in keeping with the necessities of the case, is not to secure the benefits of a protective tariff, which such a restriction would naturally amount to were the supply of horses now in the west insufficient to fill the local requirements and the value inflated. What the territorial breeders particularly ask protection against is the importation of inferior stock, which must inevitably lower the standard of horses in this country, already much too low, and consequently the reputation of the territories as a horse producing country.

The idea which I think should prevail in this matter is something similar to that which prevails in regard to the importation of pernicious literature. I do not know that I would wish to go farther than the association; I do not know that I would wish to go as far as my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Boyd), who asks that the valuation be raised to $75 or $100. At the last meeting of the association held in Calgary, a little less than a year ago, a motion was proposed to ask the government to make the valuation $40. An amendment was submitted asking that the valuation be made $35, and an amendment to the amendment was proposed and adopted asking for the fixing of the amount at $50. That is what the association asks, and that is as far as I would ask the government to go.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is pretty good protection.

Mr. SCOTT. That would, I think, fairly and satisfactorily protect the country from animals which may be termed 'scrubs.' I might quote further from a letter which I received from the secretary of the association :

> Our members, who represent every portion of the west, have no desire for protection, as the word is generally applied.
> The general idea of urging upon the authorities to have the change in question made is, that in the opinion of the association, horses worth less than $50 each, are not required in this country either for breeding purposes or for actual use.

I hope the government will find that a clear enough case has been made out to warrant their acceding to the request of the association.

Mr. JAMES GILMOUR (East Middlesex). I am glad this matter has been brought up as I myself had intended to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to it. I am personally convinced that there is a great deal of need for raising the valuation of horses brought into this country. There is no doubt that there is considerable disease among the poorer class of horses now brought in from the other side of the line, and some steps should be taken to put a stop to the evil. Dealers bring those small horses in droves north through Alberta up towards Edmonton, selling as they go, and spreading them over the country. I have here the report of Mr. Perry, Commissioner of the North-west Mounted Police, from which I take the following :

> There is one subject that demands attention, and that is the importation of a worthless class of horses, half-breeds and Indians. They go south of the line and acquire a certain number of ponies which they smuggle into the territories. Apart from these being an undesirable class of animal, they are not inspected by any veterinary surgeon, and as a consequence the glanders or other infectious or contagious diseases can be introduced.

It would appear further that even when the smugglers referred to in this report are caught, they are not punished and thus are encouraged to carry on their nefarious traffic. Here is what Mr. Perry says on this point :

> During the past years several seizures of such stock have been made, and in every case the owners have been allowed to regain possession of their horses on paying duty and expenses. In one case where the horses had been brought in by half-breeds some had actually been sold, still they were allowed to pay the duty and go scot free. Until more severe measures are taken Indians and half-breeds will continue to smuggle in horses and take their chances of being caught. If they are caught, it means just paying duty and if not caught they are that much ahead.

These worthless horses range the southern country in large numbers, and but little attention is paid to disease among them. They are extensively smuggled across, and disease is thus spread broadcast throughout our country. I hope that the Ministers of Agriculture and Customs will do something to put a stop to this evil.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). I wish we could invent some word that would mean protection, as we all want it, and yet would not spell it, because every man in this country wants protection, but a great many want it under some other name. Some want it so that they may be on equal terms with their opponents, but disclaim the word 'protection.' I heard a ship builder say : We want to be put on as favourable terms as our opponents so that they will not be able to sell ships cheaper to Canada than we can build them for. Our hon. friends in the west disclaim wanting protection, but they want a horse which is worth $5 in the states valued at $50 here, and have the duty charged on that extra value. But, of course, they don't want protection. Well, it is a protection that will suit us.

Mr. POPE. Make it $100.

Mr. OSLER. That would be better and carry out protection to its full extent. I speak as a western man, interested for many years in horse breeding in the North-west, in which business unfortunately I have lost a good many hundreds and thousands of dollars. We imported high class animals from Scotland, and for fifteen or more years have been breeding stock, and our experience is that the low grade stock which comes into the North-west competes with our high grade stock. In connection with my own case, we suffered to such an extent from that competition that we went out of business last year. As an instance of the extent of that competition I may mention that near Edmonton, three years ago, I saw a band of least 500 horses which had been driven across from Wyoming, about a thousand miles distant. Those horses were being sold, from the boundary up to Edmonton, as low, some of them, as $5 a head. It would have been better for Canada to have paid the value of these horses and shot them as they crossed the border. It is a great temptation to the farmers, who have great difficulty in getting ready money, to buy horses at $10 or $20 a piece, although in a few years time they realize that they have done themselves great injury. If a farmer can get a horse for $10 or $20, he is strongly tempted to buy it, trusting that no matter how poor and miserable it is, it will be able to do the work for a year or two. It is a great pity that the government should allow that class of horses to come into the country. I do not know whether they are inspected as they come over the border or not, but there is no doubt that the evil effects of allowing such poor stock to come in will be felt twenty years hence, and the thanks of the House are due to the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) for having brought this matter to our attention.

Mr. ROBERT HOLMES (West Huron). The amusing candor of the hon. members representing the North-west Territories is shown in the fact that they are so exceedingly anxious to have the lowest possible duty on agricultural implements and things pertaining thereto, but the highest possible duty on horses and other animals that are raised there. It shows the insincerity of the protectionist, who changes his attitude according to the interest he considers.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. We raise horses, but we do not make agricultural implements.

Mr. HOLMES. I happen to represent a county in the province of Ontario that claims to raise the best horses in the Dominion, and I have not heard from the consumers of horses, if I may use the term, any special protest against these American horses coming in, the number which is comparatively small. I think that if a party wants to buy a cheap horse, he ought to be allowed to do so. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) gives away the whole case in the admission he makes that the introduction of these horses to the North-west is a serious temptation to the farmer there. The farmer is struggling against the difficulties that he encounters in the North-west, and it may be that he feels like buying a low-price horse. Of course, you do not put on a duty to increase the price, but you put some sort of hindrance in his way, so that this farmer struggling in adversity may not buy the cheap horse, but will be compelled to buy the higher-priced animal. The moment you admit the spirit of paternalism you cannot deal with one interest alone, but must consider the effect upon industry generally. It seems to me that the wise course is, while we have regard to Canadian interests as far as possible—and I am glad to see the development of all Canadian interests—to leave this industry as free from embarrassing conditions as possible.

Mr. OSLER.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). There is a great tendency in the House to run from special cases to generalities. It is impossible to bring up any question, let it be great or small, but forthwith the general politics of the country must be tagged on to it on one side or the other. This question of a proposed minimum valuation of horses certainly has two sides. It is brought up by those who are interested in breeding horses, as distinguished from those who are using horses. It is a question for the House to consider whether the interests of the country at large are to be best served by conforming to the idea of the rearer of horses or of the user of horses. We cannot be on both sides—at least all of us cannot be on both sides of every question all the time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Speak for yourselves, please. We cannot be on both sides of this question at once, but must take sides either with the rearers of horses or the users of horses. Now, as representing probably the largest and most populous agricultural constituency in this Dominion, I have no hesitation on this occasion, in taking sides with the rearers of horses as against the users of inferior horses. Hon. gentlemen who have seen fit to tag on an argument of free trade or protection to this question, who think they have rather struck oil in making an attack on those who are attempting to forward a particular interest of this great country, let me suggest that, while we ask that a minimum valuation be placed upon horses, we are not only willing but we are anxious that horses above a certain valuation shall be admitted free. I think every horse rearer in the country will agree to that proposition. Those who framed the tariff which is in force at the present time saw fit to admit certain valuable horses free, and everybody who is interested in the horse business in this country, agrees that that is a sound business proposition. Then, just as it is reasonable and desirable to admit certain superior classes of horses free of duty into this country, it is reasonable and desirable to exclude, as far as possible, certain inferior classes of horses from this country. Every practical agriculturist thoroughly understands that a good horse is good for the country and a poor horse is bad for the country. The less we have of the poorer class of horses the better. If we are going to great expense, as we are in all parts of the country, individually, municipally, provincially and nationally, to improve our stock of horses; and if we recognize, as we do, the great necessity of that improvement to the highest degree all over the country, then I ask hon. gentlemen, is it common sense to leave the bars down, to allow these efforts that we are making to improve our horses to be destroyed by the influx of an undesirable class of horses? It has been pointed out that it is this class of horses of low valuation, which, because they are of low valuation do not receive the attention that is given to horses of greater value, that are really the cause of the introduction of diseases of various kinds into our country. These are the horses which frustrate the efforts which we are making to improve our stock both directly and indirectly. I repeat, it is not a question of improving the horse stock of this country by a simple manipulation of the tariff; it is a question of taking such means as may be reasonable and as are necessary to prevent the deterioration of our horse stock by certain means within our knowledge under our control. The suggestion is made that one way of doing this would be to place a minimum valuation on horses brought in from the United States. Any other means that will gain the same end will be entirely acceptable. If any better means can be suggested by any hon. member, I am safe in saying that those who are interested will be glad to accept them. We are not particularly anxious that the improvement shall be brought about by a minimum valuation. That seems a ready and easy means of arriving at this necessary result, to save the pasture of our prairie for valuable stock, to conserve the efforts we are making to improve our horses, to place the horse-raising industry of this country upon the highest level of the whole world, which is what we ought to endeavour to achieve, and what we can achieve, I believe, if reasonable measures are taken. It is quite possible that the country may prosper, and that the horse industry may prosper, whether the present minimum valuation increased or not. But we take the liberty of placing before this House of Commons the facts of the case as practical men, representing a practical question, and we ask for practical action by the House with regard to mere theories.

Mr. C. B. HEYD (South Brant). I rise to express my sympathy with the efforts that our western friends are putting forth to increase the quality of the Canadian horse. I do not object at all to the attitude they have taken. I believe the precautions that they desire are in the interests of the country. I rise for the purpose of drawing to the attention of the House an exactly similar state of affairs that happens to exist in Ontario. Last week the carriage makers of the Dominion of Canada came down here in a very strong deputation representing nearly $5,000,000 in capital, and they told the government that they were being subjected to unfair competition from the United States. They said, with the excellency of our work we have completely captured the Canadian carriage, cutter and buggy trade. The importations from the outside world are only $39,000 worth, only enough carriages to employ 25 men in their production. We can compete against the United States in their own market, we are willing to put down the bars and let American carriages come in if they will take down the bars and let Canadian carriages go in. We can beat them in neutral markets, we can beat them in their own markets, we can beat them in Canadian markets, because we make a first-class carriage, out of the best material, of the best workmanship, and durable to a high degree. But what troubles us now is, not the importation of a high grade of American carriages, or horses, as our friends from the west might say, but an inferior class of slop work that is being made in the United States, where a factory in Michigan is turning out about 70,000 carriages per annum, made from the refuse of other factories, against which the Canadian manufacturer cannot compete. We say therefore, as our friends say, that we don't want you to raise the duty. The duty is high enough. We can fight against fair competition, but we cannot compete against the scrub horses or shoddy carriages. What we want you to do is to raise the minimum price of a carriage to $50, just as these gentlemen want the minimum price of a horse raised to $50 to keep out the scrub horses. Keep out this American slop work, and allow Canadians to have first-class carriages. Now, we are anxious to keep up the high quality of our horses in Canada. So are we also anxious to keep up the quality of our carriages, so that when a gentleman takes his lady out, or when a more reverend senior goes to church, he can travel in safety without fear of breaking down through being the owner of a slop made buggy. I approve the efforts our friends are making, I hope the government will listen to their request, and that when they raise the scale of horses to $50, they will also raise the scale of scrub carriages to $50.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I hope the House will not think we are all protectionists in the North-west Territories because several hon. gentlemen from that country have advocated the raising of the valuation of a horse coming in from the other side of the line. One of the arguments used has been that we want to improve the stock. I do not understand how raising the valuation of a horse from $15 to $50 is going to have any effect in improving the stock in the North-west Territories, more particularly as we have thousands of the very same class of horses running all over the plains, belonging to the Blood Indians and other tribes. So I do not think that is any argument. Now, with reference to the horses that are coming in. I understand the Territorial Horse Breeders' Association have passed resolutions, which they have sent to every member from the North-west Territories, asking to have the valuation raised. My hon. friend from Toronto, who a moment ago said that he was interested in the horse raising business up there, admitted that there was a certain amount of benefit to the poorer classes of the community in the North-west by letting these same horses come in at the price they were coming in to-day. He said that farmers going in without much money would be able to buy a cheap team of horses. We know that we are getting into that country at the present time a good class of settlers, and I am pleased to say a great many of them are a better class of people, and are bringing in a better class of horses with them. Still there are parties coming in that cannot afford to buy expensive horses ; and if they need to be able to buy a cheap team of horses to do their work, I think they should be considered just as much as the Territorial Horse Breeders' Association, or the ranchers.

Mr. POPE. Can you break sod with one of these ?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes. If you cannot break sod with one of them, you can break sod with three of them, if not with three, with four. Then again, as has been pointed out, you want horses for other purposes besides breaking sod. We have creameries in the North-west Territories, and people who live at a distance from them and who want to take their cream to a factory, cannot take a team of heavy Clydesdales for that purpose ; they have to have driving horses, and they get these horses very cheap. I think the government should make haste slowly in raising the valuation of horses, more particularly as I do not see that it is going to have the effect of improving the stock in the Territories, inasmuch as we have the same class of horses up there ourselves. It is a well known fact that in Alberta to-day you can buy horses for $3 a piece, and they are not imported from the United States, they are raised by Indians up there. I may say it would not be a bad thing if the Indian Department were to take some action with reference to horses running round through the west, belonging to the Indians. It would have a better effect than raising the valuation of the few horses that are brought in from the United States.

Now, with reference to the remarks of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Heyd). I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to go into a budget debate, or to deal with questions outside the one that is before the Chair. But I must say that when my hon. friend talks about a duty on buggies and that sort of thing, I want him to understand that so far as I am concerned, I have not gone back on the faith at all. We do not manufacture anything at all in the North-west Territories, we have to buy our produce from the outside, and we get no benefit from protection at all ; though we are quite willing to bear our share of the heat and burden of the day and to pay a reasonable amount so long as it is a duty for revenue. But when any person commences to talk about imposing taxes, or doing anything else for the purpose of protecting any industry, whether a horse industry, or a cow industry, or any other industry, then I shall certainly oppose it at every opportunity.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) There is one view of this subject that I think is entirely wrong, and that is to place a fictitious value upon anything coming into this country, greater than the article has in the country from which it is exported. I think that principle is wrong from the very outset. I would suggest that those who want to keep these scrub horses out of the Dominion should adopt the American tariff, because no horses are admitted into the United States, so far as I can ascertain, at less than 30 per cent. If you put a specific duty on these horses you would get clear of the trouble.

Mr. R. JOHNSTON (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker, as a producer of horses in the province of Ontario, I may say that the farmers in my part of the country feel very keenly the injury that is being inflicted upon them by the importation of scrub horses from the United States. These horses are taking the place of our own horses and greatly lessening the demand for good horses. You can get these imported horses in droves, yet, the hon. gentleman who spoke last tried to make out that the people of Canada wanted to import horses from the United States although there are thousands of Canadian horses running on the prairies of the west. These inferior horses, which are brought into the country and which are useless for all ordinary purposes, displace a great many of our own animals. On the same principle as those who are asking for protection in horses and carriages, we, as farmers, want a tax put on corn, because the free corn imported from the United States displaces a great deal of our Ontario coarse grains. When they want protection for their horses, we want protection for our grain, and I do not care whether they call it tariff, or whether they put a fraudulent valuation on their horses ; as long as they put a high duty on these scrub horses it will satisfy the farmers in Ontario. If the western people are not satisfied with the tariff let them put a fraudulent value on their horses and let the duty be collected accordingly. I am very much pleased that this important question has been brought to the attention of the hon. members of this House. I think, without taking politics into consideration at all, that it will be only fair on the part of the government to impose a higher tariff on the horses which are shipped across the line and which are selling in towns all over the country all the way from $11 up to $30, and which are taking the places of home bred horses that we have gone to such expense to produce. I am glad to hear hon. members of this House calling for protection, or fraudulent valuation, I care not which it may be.

Mr. BOYD. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to say a word——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyd) has already spoken.

Mr. POPE. I think it is in order that some harness maker should speak. We have the horse and buggy but we have no harness.

Motion agreed to, and House went into committee.

Barrie, wharfs—reconstruction and repairs, $3,000.

Mr. BENNETT. May I ask the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) if he has received a recommendation yet as to where this dock is to be placed in Barrie, and if so, whose recommendation and on what site does he intend to build it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. Israel Tarte). The chief engineer tells me that it will be at the foot of Bayfield street, although I am not quite sure. We have not carried out the work so far because we have no deed of the wharf property. This is a new one.

Mr. TAYLOR. This item is for reconstruction and repairs.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I move that the word be 'construction' instead of 'reconstruction and repairs.'

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You have fixed the place where the wharf is to be built ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It is to be in the place the hon. minister says ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Bayfield—extension of south pier, $3,600.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This work is under contract and this sum is to complete the work.

Mr. INGRAM. Who recommended this expenditure in the first place ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was, I think, the late lamented Mr. McMillan. The work is under contract, the contractor being Mr. Clark, of Goderich.

Mr. OSLER. Is that the total cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The total cost.

Mr. INGRAM. Is this work approved by the present representative of South Huron (Mr. McEwen) ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not ask his approval. I had no need to do it because the work was under contract.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to know whether the hon. member for South Huron approves of this work. It seems to me that it is an unnecessary work and a useless waste of money. I can see no object in spending this sum of money at Bayfield at all. Perhaps the hon. member for South Huron could give us some information.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This work is now under contract. It is a work that has been in existence for years and one on which the late administration have spent over $70,000. There is nothing new in it. We are simply extending and repairing an old work.

Mr. INGRAM. Years ago, when money was expended on Bayfield harbour, it was really necessary to have a harbour there, but the hon. gentleman has not discovered that the circumstances have changed since then, and I would like to know what use will be made of this harbour. Would boats come in there, or is there a railway that runs to that place ? Is it for the accommodation of a few fishing boats ? I doubt very much whether there are any fishing boats at that port.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I never knew that it was necessary to have a railway running to a wharf to make a work of this kind necessary. Very far from it. When there is no railway people are more in need of harbour accommodation.

Mr. INGRAM. What about the boats ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not own any boat there.

Mr. HOLMES. Bayfield has been a port for a considerable length of time, and the hon. member (Mr. Ingram) knows it as well as I do. There is not a great deal of shipping done there now but there is a great deal of fishing, and boats call there just the same.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to hear from the hon. gentleman for South Huron who is well posted as to this work, and he knows that what I say is perfectly true.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram) want ? This work was constructed years ago and it cost the late government $70,000. I am not going to remove that work, am I ? This vote is simply to keep it in repair and to extend it a little.

Mr. INGRAM. I will tell the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) what I want. We have a large number of public works in this country on which it is necessary to expend public money, and there are other works on which public money was expended in the past because it was necessary to do so, but on which it is not necessary to expend any more money. In the case of this harbour circumstances have changed, and it is not necessary now to spend public money on it. What good is there to be gained if there are no boats going to the harbour. It is simply a useless waste of money. Does it follow because a useless expenditure of money has been made one year, that the government is going to continue that useless expenditure for ever. I say we should call a halt in cases like this. I am in favour of spending public money on public works which are necessary, but when it is shown that public works are not necessary I am opposed to spending money on them.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot believe that the late government would have spent $70,000 on this work if there was no use for it. Last year I was authorized by this parliament to let the contract and the money was voted. I think objection should have been taken then.

Mr. INGRAM. Last year this item escaped without any discussion, but inquiries have since shown that this is a useless waste of money and I would be negligent in my duty if I did not draw attention to it. I agree with the minister that the expenditure of $70,000 in days gone by was justifiable, but the time has now arrived when a further expenditure on that harbour is not justifiable.

Mr. McEWEN. If hon. gentlemen on the other side object to this work they should have done so last year when the vote was taken. This is not the time to raise a row about this small item. The money was voted last year and the contract let, and this is simply a revote. It is true that money was expended on this harbour years ago, but it must be remembered that large boats called there and that not so long ago either. I remember that the 'Asia' and 'Sovereign' used to call there some years ago, and there is no good reason why when that harbour is finished large steamers will not call there again. Bayfield has no railway and there is consequently all the more necessity for boats calling there. Besides that fact, there is a large number of fishermen at Bayfield, We see that in the lower provinces they build harbours for their fishing fleets, and there is no good reason why Bayfield should not have the same treatment. During the Conservative regime the harbour was allowed to get out of repair ; the sand drifted across a break, and the fishermen could not get in or out. This was not fair. The late government spent money on that harbour on two occasions and the work was swept away. The work done by the present government remains there and is in good shape and what money is being expended now will make the harbour useful.

Mr. CLANCY. It is curious to know the guiding principle of the Minister of Public Works in these expenditures. The hon. gentleman has told us frankly that the late government spent $70,000 on the harbour and that they would not do so if it was not a useful expenditure. It is pertinent to ask the Minister of Public Works now if he ever uses his own judgment. Has he any knowleedge of the present utility of the work. He is not asking money for repairs but to make an extension of an old work and he should produce some report from his engineers as to the necessity for this new work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was represented to me by the late Mr. McMillan, the respected member for that riding, whom we are all sorry is not sitting in his seat in this House—that this was a work of some importance. I find from the records that the late government were so impressed with this, that they bought that work from private owners and spent $70,000 on it. Before reaching a conclusion on this matter I naturally asked for a report from Major Gray, the resident engineer, and in his report dated 27th of April, 1900, he states that he consulted several vessel men of the port with regard to the extension of the pier and they were all of opinion, that the north pier running so much in a southerly direction nearly closes the mouth of the harbour, and that if vessels by any chance miss the southern pier they are at once on shore. Major Gray states that he has himself seen two vessels ashore on that account. It was reported to me officially by an able engineer that the extension of one of the piers was necessary to protect life and property. I do not understand why my hon. friends on the other side from Ontario, object so much to a work for which their own government paid $70,000, and which I am only improving. I cannot understand the position they take unless of course they are acting as they have a right to do—well for political motives, which is not after all very wrong. However, the country will judge of the facts. Here was a work on which $70,000 had been spent by our predecessors, having been bought from private owners, and I cannot understand why there is so much opposition to this vote, especially when a sum of money was voted last year.

Mr. BLAIN. When was the last public money spent on this wharf ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not all the dates here.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Perhaps I can give the House the explanation of the matter. This work is in a constituency which I once had the honour to represent, and I recollect tolerably well the circumstances under which, even when I was in opposition, and when I was not much of a favourite of the government, the late government did spend some money there. The coast of Lake Huron, as most hon. gentlemen who have ever crossed that lake know, is an exceedingly dangerous coast, and very scantily provided with harbours. I think that from Goderich to Sarnia there are hardly any natural harbours. The consequence is that any vessels, small or large, that miss Goderich in a gale, find it very difficult to get any shelter. The late government thought that it was desirable to establish a small harbour of refuge at Bayfield. That was the reason they gave for the expenditure they entered into. That harbour had, I think, very little trade proper, but it was supposed by the late government, and also by the vessel owners of Goderich, to be of use as a harbour of refuge under certain conditions. The sum demanded by my hon. friend, $3,600, for the extension of the south pier is, I understand, to ensure the harbour being useful for the purpose for which the original expenditure was incurred. These are the circumstances, and they appear to perfectly justify my hon. friend in asking for this vote.

Mr. INGRAM. If the water were deep enough and it were possible for vessels in distress to go into the harbour, there would be some justification for the argument of the hon. gentleman; but there is not a sufficient depth of water, even with the extension of the pier, and that is why I say that this is a useless expenditure. The hon. gentleman knows very well the vessel trade to-day at this point is very different to what it was years ago, when the pier was first built. At that time there were a large number of small vessels, but there are very few to-day.

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps I might read a word or two from the debate which took place when this matter was up in 1891. Here is what was said by Mr. Cameron, who then represented that county :

> The hon. gentleman knows that $50,000 has been expended by the government at Bayfield, and I tell him that money has been practically thrown away.

If the expenditure was wrong under the late government, surely at this advanced time it cannot be proper not only to repair the wharf, but to extend it. Perhaps the minister will be good enough to say what is the population of that place to-day, as compared with ten years ago ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I really cannot say what the population is.

Mr. HOLMES. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) is wrong in saying that Mr. Cameron represented that constituency at that time. He did not represent it in 1891.

Mr. BENNETT. Yes, he did.

Mr. HOLMES. Well, I will accept that. Bayfield is a small incorporated village. It is true, the trade of the place is not very large, but I think it is necessary that a certain amount of money should be spent there in order to retain the work already done. To dredge out the harbour and make it an absolutely safe harbour of refuge would require the expenditure of several thousand dollars. The money now being spent will, I understand, make it a harbour of refuge for smaller vessels. During the last few years the place has come into prominence as a summer resort, and even many Americans come there.

Mr. McEWEN. The reason this harbour went out of use was because it was out of repair for a number of years, the lake having washed away a part of the pier and covered it with sand. For this reason the vessels could not get in, and the trade fell off. The present government has repaired the pier, and it is now fit for vessels to come in, and consequently the trade will come back.

Mr. BLAIN. Did I understand the hon. member for West Huron to say that the population was now about 1,000 ?

Mr. HOLMES. No, I said the place was an incorporated village, which I understood required 1,000 to be incorporated. I do not know what the population is now.

Mr. BLAIN. The hon. gentleman lives within a few miles of the place. What is its population ?

Mr. HOLMES. I suppose the population is 800 or 900.

Mr. BLAIN. The fact is that its population is less than it was ten years ago It stands now at 559.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is not the fault of the wharf.

Mr. INGRAM. Does the minister intend to dredge this harbour this year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think we have yet made up our minds to dredge it. I will look into the question carefully, to see whether it is necessary to have dredging done; but to-day I am only applying for money to extend the pier.

Mr. INGRAM. But the hon. gentleman must see that it is a useless expenditure of money, because even with the extension of the pier the water is not deep enough. If the hon. gentleman is expending the money for the purpose of benefiting the fishermen, half this sum is sufficient, because it would not be necessary to extend the pier, but only to repair it. But, outside of that, this expenditure is a pure waste of money.

Mr. SHERRITT. Who has charge of this work, superintending it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Jonas Marks, who has been recommended by my hon. friend, will have charge of the work.

Blind river—wharf, $6,000.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Where is this Blind river ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On the north channel of the lake leading to Georgian Bay. It is in the district of Algoma, on the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a lumbering village, situated eight miles west of Algoma, and about eighty miles east of Sault Ste. Marie. The business consists principaly of lumbering. There are two large mills. This is a very thriving farming community. The population at the last census was 600. We have chosen a site, but the deeds are not yet in our possession. The plans are ready and tenders will be called for.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What will be the total cost ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Eleven thousand dollars.

Mr. BLAIN. How much for the site ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have not purchased a site yet, and that is why we have not asked for tenders.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I may be misinformed, but I understand that this is purely a wharf for some American lumbering company who have mills there—that it is solely for their convenience.

Mr. DYMENT. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways has been altogether misinformed. Some years ago there was an old wharf in use there by the Blind River Lumber Company, but that company went out of existence and a new American concern bought out the property, and fitted up this old wharf for their own use. They will not allow other people's boats to tie up at it. Their refusal to allow steamboats from Owen Sound and Collingwood to tie up there obliges the merchants to have their goods landed at Algoma Mills, some seven or eight miles east of Blind river, and thence tranship them at considerable expense by the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is a very good agricultural and farming country back of Blind river—one of the many places in my county which have a very bright future indeed. I can assure the House that this work is absolutely necessary.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Why did not private individuals build the wharf ?

Mr. DYMENT. I do not know that there is anybody there really able to build it.

Mr. BLAIN. On whose property is the money to be expended ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. A site is being selected but not bought. There are two sites, and we have chosen one.

Mr. TAYLOR. From whom ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have not bought it yet. We have made our choice, as far as the engineer is concerned. We approve that site because it is one on which the work will cost the least.

Mr. CLANCY. It might be fitting for me to call attention to an expenditure that appears on page V—218 of the Auditor General's Report relating to the Sarnia dredging. I asked the hon. gentleman to lay the progress estimates, the advertisements for tenders, and the tenders themselves, on the Table. Can the hon. gentleman now give me the information ? In the meantime, I would like to ask him what the nature of that work is, who owns the dredging plant, if the property on which the work is being done is private property or belongs to the government, the extent of the work, and if the sum expended exceeds the amount first contemplated ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When my hon. friend spoke privately to me, I thought he was referring to the dredging done at Point Edward, but I see now that I did not understand him. My engineer informs me that the work to which he alludes was let by public tender to Mr. O'Leary, and is completed. It was a piece of dredging which was given two years ago. I was away when that piece of work was given out. When my hon. friend spoke to me a day or two ago, I thought he was alluding to the new work carried out at Point Edward. If he wants more information, as to the particular work he now asks about, I will bring it down with pleasure. I will bring down the whole cost.

Mr. CLANCY. Did the hon. gentleman make any inquiry as to whether the work was done on private property or on property which belongs to the government ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My chief engineer says that the dredging was done in the channel of the river, as far as he can remember. He will take note of what my hon. friend wants and furnish the information required.

Mr. CLANCY. Another thing I would like him to take note of is this : My information is that this work was done entirely on the property of some American mill owners. I am not finding fault because they are Americans, for we all welcome American capital as we do any other capital, but the minister would be entirely without justification in spending public money on private property. My information is that it has been spent entirely on private property, and that the owners of the property were doing the work with their own dredges—American dredges and American workmen—when Mr. O'Leary stepped in to be rewarded for party services and got the contract and used the dredge belonging to an American company. The dredge is owned by the mill owners who were doing the work themselves before the hon. gentleman stepped in to give Mr. O'Leary some little solace for his disappointment in not getting a certain office. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can explain whether the plant belongs to Mr. O'Leary, and if not, to whom ? Also, whether the dredging was not being done before by the mill owners, in whose interests this work is being done now ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I can only repeat what I said a minute ago. The work was given by public tender to Mr. O'Leary, who was the successful tenderer. As to whether the dredge was an American dredge or not, I cannot say now. I was not in the country when that work was awarded. I shall inquire and give the hon. gentleman the information he desires. Perhaps I may be allowed to state that on two or three occasions, if not more, during last year, I was obliged to have recourse to American dredges, because I could not secure Canadian ones. The question was whether an elevator was to be built on Canadian soil or American soil at Port Huron, and we had to make up our minds pretty quick. The Grand Trunk people came to see me, and also the interested parties. The member for the riding represented that the elevator was to be located on the American side unless we did the dredging. We could not secure a Canadian dredge for love or money, so I engaged an American dredge.

Mr. CLANCY. I suppose the hon. minister is not giving this as a justification in the case I referred to.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. In that case, I was not here, and knew nothing about it personally.

Mr. CLANCY. I hope the hon. gentleman will inform himself and give us the facts later on.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. With pleasure.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the work in the River Sydenham completed ? There is no item in the estimate this year. How much of the vote of last year was expended ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the hon. gentleman will repeat his question when the items for dredging are before us I shall be glad to give him information.

Mr. BLAIN. I understood the minister to say that a site had been selected at Blind river, but not purchased. On whose recommendation was it selected, and who owns the property ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It was selected on the recommendation of the chief engineer.

Mr. BLAIN. What was the price ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The estimate placed upon the site by the engineer is $250.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the minister select the site and afterwards fix a price ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We make a survey with a view to choosing a site, and when we have ascertained the best site, we try to buy it. What else can we do ? We have confidential reports from the engineer, and we do not make public where we wish to buy.

Mr. BLAIN. Who owns the property selected ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I really do not remember.

Bronte—harbour improvements, $3,000.

Mr. HENDERSON. Last year $7,000 was voted for this work. Would the minister please state how much of that has been expended, also whether this $3,000 now asked for is likely to complete the work. I might say that it is very desirable that this work should be completed—not only the docks but the dredging. The people are hoping for this, and they expect it. I trust the work will be fully completed during the coming summer.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Out of the $7,000 voted last session, $6,209 was spent. The balance will be spent as soon as the season opens. I am glad to say that the $3,000 that I am now asking for will complete the work, and the work will be finished during the present year.

Burlington channel—repairs to pier, $50,000.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). There was a large vote for this purpose last year. How much of it was expended.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We did not spend very much, because the contractor has only been gathering materials, so far, and has not done much work. We have not given the estimates. The amount spent up to the 15th of December was $1,122.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). That would be for material, I suppose.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). On which side of the channel is the work to be done ? Is the entire pier to be rebuilt ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We are rebuilding the pier on the south side. At first we were not very successful, and had to take the work from the contractor. We are renovating the pier, making it 991 feet long.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). What is the amount of the contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is $96,000.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). Are there to be any repairs on the north side of the channel ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). Will this complete the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). What time has the contractor for the completion of the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contract is to be completed on the 10th of April, 1903. Practically, this means that it will have to be completed next fall.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). Who has the contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. James Clarke, of Goderich, the lowest tenderer.

Collingwood—harbour improvements, $40,000.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The minister will please give us a full statement of the expenditure there, the depth of water in the harbour, the time when he expects to complete the work and the estimated total cost. I suppose he has had some marine surveyors to survey the channel and will be able to give us all necessary information. I do not object to an expenditure on Collingwood. I think that, perhaps, it is one of the harbours on the lakes that ought to be made a good harbour. When I was in office there was a report in the marine department from Commander Bolton, who had made a survey of the Georgian Bay, and who reported that it would be almost impossible to make a harbour out of Collingwood. He gave a detail of the harbour and his reasons for the conclusions he had reached. What is the width of the channel that the hon. minister is making leading into the harbour

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have dredged a channel 110 feet wide, giving a depth of 20 feet for the whole length from open water to the inside harbour.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the length of the trench, or whatever you call it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The length of channel that we have dredged so far is 2,350 feet.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. To complete it, how much will it require ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We want to give it a width of 110 feet and a length of 200 feet. The mouth of that channel is not wide enough. My hon. friend knows that Collingwood, since we have given it that accommodation, has grown a good deal. There is a large ship yard in which two large ships have already been built ; a large saw-mill has been erected during the last year or two, there is a large packing factory, in fact, Collingwood is one of the most thriving towns on the Georgian Bay. Collingwood, Midland, Owen Sound, Meaford, all these towns are getting along very nicely indeed. The width of the channel is not sufficient, because boats navigating those waters are being built of a larger size constantly. A large trade is being done there, and it will be necessary to enlarge that channel. But we do not intend to do a large amount of additional work all at once. This money is especially to enlarge the entrance to the harbour. I have heard about the same statement that my hon. friend has heard, namely, that Collingwood is a difficult port to make. But the fact that there is already a large fleet of steamers visiting that port proves that after all it is not so bad as other ports. I am sorry to add that perhaps there is a little jealousy among certain harbours. But there is no reason for jealousy, because there is trade for them all.

Mr. BLAIN. If that be correct, I would like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that some few years ago an application was made from Port Credit for an expenditure of money to repair and keep up the present pier and dock. At that time it was not definitely promised, but the minister promised the deputation, or the hon. gentleman representing the county at the time, that he would give it his favourable consideration. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could now tell the House, as he has already stated there is plenty for all, that we will come in under that general term.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I must say that the word 'all' does not cover what my hon. friend has just suggested. I do not remember at all the fact he has referred to about Port Credit.

Mr. HENDERSON. No doubt the hon. gentleman remembered it pretty well a few years ago, when that county chanced to be represented by an hon. member who supported the present government. He tells us that this harbour does not come under the designation of 'all.' I assume it is because circumstances have changed, and that the county, instead of being represented by a supporter of the government, as it was at the time the deputation waited upon the Minister of Public Works, is now represented by an hon. member sitting on the side of the opposition. I listened to the remarks of the Minister of Public Works, and it certainly struck me in his definite statement that this harbour did not come under the designation that he referred to, and that he intends to perpetuate the policy of assisting only those counties that give the government support. That seems to be the fixed policy of the government ; otherwise I think the hon. gentleman would meet the wishes of my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) as fairly as he promised he would meet the wishes of the former representative of that riding.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not intend in my remarks to convey any such meaning as my hon. friend gathered from them. What I meant to say by the word 'all' was that I did not remember the harbour to which my hon. friend referred. The best evidence that I am not as wicked as my hon. friend thinks, is that I am at this moment carrying on a public work in his own riding.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is just what I was finding fault with. The hon. gentleman is adopting one policy in one riding and another policy in another. Now I do not suppose that it is through any friendliness towards myself that the hon. gentleman is expending public money in my riding. I assume that he has some other motive, that he must consider the work a necessary work. Surely nothing else would induce him to spend public money in a riding that for the last ten or twelve years has been represented by a member opposed politically to him. I have found no fault whatever with the expenditure that he has made in my riding; I thank him very kindly for it. I know that it was not on account of my request alone that he spent that money. Requests came from other sources as well and as long as the money was spent there I have certainly accorded my hearty support to the Minister of Public Works, so far as that item was concerned. I feel grateful to him, and I hope that work will not be the last. The fact is that the Liberal party, or the party represented by the hon. gentleman, has expended more money in the riding I represent than was ever spent by the party that I have the honour to belong to. But I do not know why they should not apply the same principle to the riding of my neighbour, the hon. member for Peel. Why should I get any preference? Have I treated the government with more leniency? Have I failed to criticise the minister in his administration of the department as strongly as my hon. friend has done? I do not know why he should make fish of one and flesh of another. These are both fishing stations, and if Bronte is entitled to an expenditure of $17,000, I think Port Credit is fairly entitled to some consideration as well.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not said that I would never pay any attention to Port Credit. During the last two days I have received I suppose 25 or 30 petitions for work that I have not been able to accede to, and my hon. friend must not be surprised if, on the spur of the moment, I am not prepared to say that I will do any work at Port Credit.

Mr. BLAIN. Perhaps the hon. minister will promise the House to put something in the supplementary estimates.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is the council, I have no right to go ahead of my colleagues.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. My hon. friend has as good as a promise from the Minister of Public Works that the matter is under his consideration, and probably there will be an item in the supplementary estimates for him. However, in reference to Collingwood harbour, if I understand the minister aright, he intends to expend this $40,000 which he is asking us for now, to widen the prism from 110 to 200 feet. A great part of it is for that purpose. I quite concede the necessity of the work. Fancy a vessel coming into the port of Collingwood with a side wind, passing down 2,300 feet, as the hon. gentleman says this canal is in length, and keeping in a channel 110 feet wide! It would be a pretty difficult thing to do in day time, especially when a vessel was passing out, but at night I do not see how it is possible even with a breadth of channel of 200 feet. I suppose the hon. gentleman has the whole channel lighted with electricity from the commencement to the end, so that ships would be able to use the channel at night.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That does not come under my charge. There is already at Collingwood a large fleet of steamers. The Great Northern Navigation Company have a large fleet, and all their boats call at Collingwood. Collingwood is one of the most important points on the Georgian bay now.

Mr. OSLER. Collingwood is a very prosperous town. A very large fleet of boats is now laid up there for the winter, and Collingwood is probably one of the largest grain shipping points on the lake. Nature never intended it for such a port, because, I suppose it is about as difficult and bad a harbour as we could find on the lakes; yet, the business has grown up there and shipping has made that a port to an extent not equalled by any other port on the lakes. I suppose, that being the case, the government must go on spending money, but it is going to cost a million dollars before they can make it a port such as it ought to be to accommodate the trade. Increased shipping must come there if the shipping continues to increase on the great lakes as it has done during the last three years. An enormous amount of money must be expended, because this is probably the most important shipping point on the great lakes.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The report of the engineer, after a very careful examination into the matter, is to the effect that with $120,000 of an expenditure we will be able to give a width to the whole channel of 200 feet.

Mr. INGRAM. Last year there was $202,000 expended on the Collingwood harbour, there was $25,000 in the ordinary estimates and $8,000 in the supplementary estimates besides $40,000 this year which would make a total of $275,000 expended on the Collingwood harbour. Would the hon. gentleman tell us if these figures are correct, how much more he will require to complete Collingwood harbour and also what success the shipyard is meeting with there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have just stated in discussing the position with my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Osler) that the estimate of the engineer of the department, after a careful examination, is that with $120,000 we would be able to provide a channel 200 feet wide and 20 feet deep in Collingwood harbour. Besides this $40,000, if we want to go on with the widening of the channel, we will have to ask parliament to vote an additional sum of $80,000 to complete the channel to a width of 200 feet.

Depot Harbour—breakwater, $65,000.

Mr. INGRAM. There was an item last year for Depot harbour which the hon. minister will see, if he will look at page V—209, of the Auditor General's Report. I notice that for advertising, $629.61 was expended, and on King's Printer's account, $49.72. The money we are asked for here is for work to be done at Depot harbour. How was this money expended for advertising ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Tenders were asked for the work, and the reason why the money was paid is that when tenders are asked for works of that importance, we, of course, advertise in more papers than we do when calling for tenders for smaller works. Tenders were asked and received, the lowest being that of Mr. J. T. Davis for $157,500. After the tenders were received, we discovered that soundings and borings had not been taken in a sufficient manner. Perhaps the committee will understand me better if I am able to show a plan of the harbour. If some of the hon. gentlemen who take an interest in this work will come to the Table, they may have a look at the plan. Here is the harbour and here is Mr. Booth's elevator. Here is an island. Mr. Booth has built all of that harbour with his own money. He is about the only man in the country who has built a harbour with his own cash, his own money and credit.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Where do you intend to spend the money ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Here is the island. The entrance to the harbour is not sufficiently protected and it is intended to build this breakwater here.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What will it cost?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The lowest tender put in was for $157,500, but my engineers, taking for granted that the examination and survey made by Mr. Booth's engineer were right, did not make the borings here, which they should have made. My hon. friend has been in the department and he knows what takes place often. When the tenders were received, I was warned by somebody that borings should be made. I went up myself with a boat, I had borings made and I find that instead of there being hard material in the bottom of the harbour such as we had supposed, there was silt carried in by the water. We had provided for only four feet of settling in the crib-work, but instead of four feet, we discovered that the settling would be about fifteen feet. But, before discovering that, thinking that there would be only a few feet of settling, I had agreed with the contractor to give him so much per cubic yard to throw stone into the cribwork there, but I found out afterwards that it would settle fifteen feet and then I stopped the whole thing because the additional work necessary to make it safe would cost about $30,000. The whole matter is now before my colleagues.

Mr. KEMP. Did Mr. Booth build a dock there at all ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, he has built the whole thing himself. Mr. Booth spent $750,000 of his own money, and we thought it was about time that the government should do its share of the work.

Goderich harbour—dredging, $10,000.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Let us hear about Goderich harbour. We have not heard of it before.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Goderich harbour is one of the most important harbours on Lake Huron. There is a large trade at that point. There are two elevators, and a new one has been built during the last two years. Unfortunately that harbour is one of those on the lakes that fills. The piers were in a very bad condition, we had to repair them, and we had to dredge a good deal. If we were going to listen to all the demands made upon us, we would have built a large breakwater. It may have to come later on if the trade develops. For the time being we are bound to give a little more accommodation by dredging.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Was there not a plan adopted by your department some time ago, by which this silting of the sand would be prevented. There will be an eternal expenditure if you are going to dredge every time after a storm.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have received a petition which states that if there was a breakwater it would prevent the silting, but I doubt that very much. It would cost a large amount of money and I have not yet made up my mind to grant the petition.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I understand there was a plan recommended in regard to Port Dover and Goderich and a harbour in Prince Edward Island, in which the sand silts in a similar manner.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Toronto harbour is in the very same position. This silting of the sand is one of the most difficult problems we have to solve.

Mr. INGRAM. Are Martin & Co. doing the dredging there ? How are they getting on ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. They are getting on very well.

Mr. INGRAM. Were they the only contractors ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. INGRAM. Did Mr. McGillicudy have anything to do with that work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. McGillicudy had nothing to do with the dredging to my knowledge. He was the lowest tenderer on another contract and my hon. friend (Mr. Ingram) might get work to-morrow if he does me the pleasure of tendering, and if he is the lowest tenderer.

Mr. INGRAM. If the minister's statement is correct, he cannot refer to the original contract.

Mr. HOLMES. That was a newspaper mistake. Mr. McGillicudy never got a contract for dredging although the papers said he did. He had a contract for the breakwater.

Mr. INGRAM. I never heard the report contradicted that he got a dredging contract.

Mr. HOLMES. It was contradicted in this House.

Mr. INGRAM. This work is done at the rate of $8 an hour. Have they taken out the number of yards required ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer explains that in certain parts of the work there was rock and hard pan, and of course they could not take out the 600 yards a day in that kind of work.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). Is this the usual way of letting dredging contracts ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I hope the time is not distant when the department will have enough dredges to do its own work. Dredging is now paid for at the rate of $8 an hour, 600 yards a day, making 13⅓ cents a yard, and we have found no means of doing it cheaper unless we do it ourselves with modern dredges. That is the reason why I ask parliament for money to build dredges because they will do cheaper and quicker work.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the minister explain why he is paying 13⅓ cents a yard here, when he is getting it done in Sarnia at 9½ cents a yard ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer explains that the work to which my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) objects——

Mr. CLANCY. The minister had better not put words in my mouth. I am simply asking for information and he has no right to say that I am objecting.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very glad my hon. friend does not object to the work. I was not here when that contract was given. There is dredging which costs less, but it all depends on the material which is dredged.

Mr. CLANCY. The minister has not yet explained why he paid 9½ cents a yard in Sarnia and a larger sum at other places.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer explains that that was a lump sum contract and it worked out in that way.

Mr. CLANCY. I hope the minister will lay on the Table after dinner the papers I asked for, namely. the contract, the tenders, the progress estimates, and so on.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That cannot be done to-day.

Mr. CLANCY. Then you had better let the item stand.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am asking $75,000 for general dredging and we will discuss it on that vote. I pledge myself to bring down the papers. It is nearly six o'clock now and the employees have left their offices. I cannot get the papers to-night. I will bring them down with pleasure on Monday.

Mr. CLANCY. This item does not come under the vote for general dredging. There was a specific sum voted for it last year, and it has appeared in the estimates many years. The hon. gentleman had not the courage of his convictions, to spend the money until after the elections ; but as he repented and spent it some time, I am not disposed to raise objections to the work. I simply inquired whether it was to be continued.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not understand what my hon. friend wanted. I pledge myself to bring down the papers on Monday, and lay them on the Table of the House.

Mr. KEMP. I notice that the principle of paying $8 an hour for dredging is in vogue in different parts of the country. I would like to ask the minister if the dredges which are paid at that rate are of the same capacity, and is there an officer of the government on the dredges to check the time ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. All the dredges are not of the same capacity, but we exact from them 600 yards a day. There is an officer on board each dredge, and at the end of the month we make up the figures, and we only pay according to that rate.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). It seems to me the work would be done much more cheaply if the contract were at so much a yard. I can understand that a dredge working by the hour, even if there were a government officer around, would do less work than if working by the yard. What is the objection to doing it by the yard ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Because we have tried it, and it has always cost more. I hope the House will agree with me that it is time for us to do our own dredging at a cheap rate. With a modern dredge you can always be sure to do the work for three or four cents a yard. We are now paying thirteen cents a yard. I am proud to say that we are doing it at much less than other departments, although I do not find any fault with them.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman ever expect to have dredges enough at his disposal to go from one end of Canada to the other and do these small parcels of work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, I expect, within two years, at the beginning of the season following the coming season, to be able to carry on our work in Ontario, or most of it. We are building at Sorel one large dredge, and we are beginning to build another one. We have in British Columbia a small suction dredge, which dredges about 12,000 yards a day, and I am building one for Ontario on the same lines. There is a vast difference between that and the small dredges which do only 600 yards a day.

Mr. KAULBACH. Will the hon. minister inform me how many dredges the government claims to own ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My officers tell me that we own nineteen.

Mr. KAULBACH. How many more does he think the government will require in order to meet the calls on his department for dredging ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The number would be sufficient, in my opinion, if all the dredges were up to date. For instance, the large dredge which we are building at Sorel for the maritime provinces will alone do more work than all the dredges we have in those provinces at present.

Mr. KAULBACH. The hon. gentleman has frequently told me that he has been unable for the want of dredges to complete some work I have applied for time and again in my county. Will the hon. minister come under a contract with me to employ dredges which I will build, and pay me the same amount of money that he is now paying to other parties for doing that service ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If the hon. member were unwise enough to enter into such a contract, he would lose his seat, and I would not like to see him leave the House.

Mr. KAULBACH. I would run that risk.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman might adopt the plan followed by a member of parliament who owns a dredge on the Georgian bay, but keeps it in the name of some friends.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not do anything of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman misunderstands me. I did not say he did it. He knows the case I refer to, because it is notorious.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is a bad case if it is true.

Kingsville—repairs to wharf and breakwater piers and extension of western piers, $15,000.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Explain this ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is composed of a revote of $5,000 and a new vote of $10,000 to complete the work. Kingsville is in Essex county. Governments past and present have spent a pretty large sum of money on this harbour. The total expenditure up to the 31st December last was $85,951. I spent up to the 31st December, $7,836, and I expect to spend up to the 30th June, $7,000 additional, to complete the work, that is, to extend one pier, to make repairs to the piers, and to dredge a little.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the hon. gentleman give us an idea of the number of boats that run in and out there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have in my hand a note to this effect, that this harbour is much resorted to for shelter by vessels of small tonnage and light draught. There is a regular line of steamers running between Windsor and Pelee Island, which calls at that place.

Meaford Harbour, Ont.—dredging and pile works, $30,000.

Mr. SPROULE. In what condition is the dredging ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The contractor, Mr. Piggott, is going on fairly well now—better than in the past—and we expect the work to be completed shortly. There is not only dredging but an extension of the pier and some sheet piling work. The work will be completed, I hope, in the month of September.

Mr. SPROULE. About how much dredging remains to be done ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About half the dredging has been done.

Mr. SPROULE. Has there been any application made for piling on the west side of the harbour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not remember, but no doubt some applications will be made. I remember now that there has been a verbal application.

Mr. SPROULE. How far was the breakwater extended out ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Three hundred feet.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the dredging along the wharf and the elevator finished.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The dredging has been carried out the whole way in deep water. Meaford is one of the harbours in which I have great confidence indeed. There is a large trade there, and the Grand Trunk Railway is encouraging them to build a large elevator.

Mr. SPROULE. I am glad to know that the hon. minister hopes to finish this work at an early date. Some more important work will still be needed on the west side, but the work so far as it has gone, has given great satisfaction. The dredging done so far enables the largest vessels to reach the elevator. And although the dredging was only completed late in the fall, over a million and a half bushels of grain were handled in that elevator last fall. And as the road from there to Collingwood is very level, it is one of the points where the Grand Trunk railway can handle grain very easily. There is deep enough water close to the end of the dock to float the largest vessels that sail on the lake. What is most urgently needed now is dredging, and the people are grateful for what the hon. minister has done so far.

Midland Harbour--dredging, $8,000.

Mr. BENNETT. How much was expended last year and what was paid for the dredging per hour ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not got that information under my hand, but will bring it down Monday.

Mr. BENNETT. In what part of the bay was the money expended ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have deepened the channel just at the entrance, as my hon. friend knows, leading to the large smelting mill. I have spent the money where the Grand Trunk Railway and the smelting people asked me to spend it, and tried to guide my action by the requirements of the large interests concerned in Midland. Midland, like Collingwood, is one of the most thriving ports on the Georgian Bay, and if the Grand Trunk Railway do what I understand some of their people intend doing, we may have pretty large results there. If the Grand Trunk Railway make up their minds to double their track from Midland to the city of Montreal, we will have a large amount of traffic at that port.

Mr. BENNETT. I have no objection to the expenditure on dredging last year, but the dredging has not been done in what is known as the harbour proper. The harbour is one and a half mile wide, and some years ago docks were built there by the Grand Trunk Railway, but the receding waters necessitated dredging in front of these docks. I think that considerable of the money has been expended in that way.

We have from time to time vessels carrying a quarter of a million bushels of grain and even of greater capacity, so that a very considerable depth of water is required. As to the money expended at the smelter, that expenditure is a commendable one. That concern is one of very considerable proportions, with a pay roll of $13,000 a month. These docks were not built in sufficiently deep water, and the money was spent last year in dredging opposite the smelter, so as to give two or three feet more water and accommodate larger vessels.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The Grand Trunk is asking us to give a depth of 20 feet.

Mr. BENNETT. That is necessary.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Up to the 30th November last we spent during the last two years $15,000 in dredging. I am just now giving more attention to this port in view of the statements made to me by the railway companies, and I cannot say what will be the result of the information that is conveyed to me. I cannot say what we may do in the supplementary estimates, but I must state once more my firm hope that we will not lose sight of the necessity of doing everything to improve our St. Lawrence route. If the railway companies want to work with us from a Canadian standpoint, I have no doubt that the government and the House of Commons will understand the position and do the right thing at the right time.

Mr. BENNETT. I think that the proposed expenditure during the coming season will commend itself to the citizens of the town. These two large elevators had originally twenty feet of water. But within the last ten years, the waters of the Georgian Bay have receded three or four feet. I think it is quite right to restore the depth of twenty feet, as proposed.

Mr. ROBINSON (Elgin). Is it possible that Midland requires $8,000 for dredging ? I always understood that there was plenty of water there.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. To do the dredging that ought to be done there would require about $50,000.

Mr. ROBINSON (Elgin). Perhaps it would be as well for the minister to tell us where Midland is. I have heard a great deal about it but never saw it. It is proposed to expend $8,000, but the minister says it will require $50,000. If this harbour is necessary and the expenditure is necessary to the harbour, by all means do the work well while you are at it.

Mr. DYMENT. Where is Midland ?

Mr. ROBINSON (Elgin). That is what I want to know. I will get there if I live.

Oakville—repairs to east pier, &c., $4,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is to complete the work.

Owen Sound Harbour—dredging and pile protection to works, $24,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is under contract.

Port Hope—repairs to piers, $5,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is to complete the work.

Presqu'Isle—purchase of wharf and repairs, $2,500.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I move that that item be struck out.

Mr. HALLIDAY. There was a grant last year of $5,000 for Presqu'Isle harbour. Was any of that spent ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No. And I am moving to strike out this item.

Mr. TAYLOR. Why was the item put in ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Because I thought it could be used. I went to negotiate for the purchase, but the price was too high, so I made up my mind not to do it at all.

Motion agreed to.

River Ottawa—improvement of narrows at Petewawa, above Pembroke, $4,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is an old contract which was in existence when we took office. It is a work of dredging in the Ottawa, by Mr. Poupore.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Mr. Poupore is the contractor ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, Mr. George Poupore.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. How much has been expended, and for what object ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have paid no money. It is a bulk contract for $7,000. It is not completed, and we have not paid a cent. The work is going on now. I saw it when I was up there last year.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What navigation can there be on the Petawawa ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is certainly navigation there. I passed there in a steamer last season.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. We should concentrate our efforts upon the Ottawa river and the Georgian Bay canal and not upon these smaller streams.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My hon. friend is mistaken. This is for the removal of shoal in the Ottawa river. The contract was given in 1895. But, on account of a mistake which Mr. Poupore said he made, he found that, instead of sand, he had to take out stone and hard-pan. So you can see he is not going very fast.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. This, then, is for the improvement of the navigation of the Ottawa opposite the entrance of the Petawawa ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Will the improvement of this particular portion come in useful if we build the Georgian Bay canal ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is no doubt about it being built, is there ?

Mr. INGRAM. If I may be permitted, I would like to ask a question concerning the item about Presqu'Isle. Would the hon. minister tell us why no money has been spent and the item is now dropped ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. So far, not a cent has been spent, I believe.

Mr. INGRAM. Last year, when the hon. minister asked for this sum of money he said that hundreds of Liberals and Conservatives had sought to have this work done. He said this was a very fine country and the work was really necessary. Why did he drop it ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I tried to purchase the work but they asked too much. Is the hon. gentleman displeased that I did not buy it ? He was displeased last year when I proposed to buy it, and now I understand he is displeased that I have decided not to buy it. I do not know exactly what I am to do to satisfy the hon. gentleman.

Mr. INGRAM. Instead of being displeased I am very much pleased, and I commend the course the hon. minister has taken. This is in accordance with what I told him, that when he is right I am ready to stand up and declare my approval, just as I am ready to condemn him when he deserves it. I do not seek to make party capital out of this matter—there are plenty of chances beside this.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to call the attention of the hon. minister to a promise he made last summer in the riding of East

Simcoe. I would like to read an item from a newspaper, and after he has heard it read, I hope he will devote the money he at first intended for Presqu'Isle to this dock which he promised at Orillia. The Orillia 'News Letter' says :

You will remember the beautiful summer evening last July when the Hon. J. Israel Tarte stopped off here for an hour or so, and incidentally took a jaunt down to Couchiching Beach along with the mayor and some of the councillors. The band was at the park on this particular evening, as were also about 1,500 townspeople composed mostly of Orillia's gayly dressed fair sex. It was just the usual Friday night at the park, but to the minister the scene was a revelation. In fact, so enchanting was it he immediately promised us, as he stood on the shore and waved his hand along the beach, a new $3,000 wharf right away. 'I make this bequest on account of the many beautiful ladies,' said the Honourable Israel. This was very gallant, indeed, and the ladies all appreciated it, as did also the rest of the townspeople as we thought the long-felt want would be at last fulfilled. We failed to write it on a card and attach the same to his person so he has forgotten. And to think he would go back on the ladies ! Barrie is to get $3,000 for its new wharf. Oh! Israel.

In view of the solemn and gallant promise made to the ladies, I hope the hon. minister will put in the supplementary estimates the money he intended for Presqu'Isle, and devote it to the wharf at Orillia.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. On a beautiful evening in the month of August last I had the pleasure of calling at Orillia. It is a fine town, with a beautiful park, and I must confess——

An hon. MEMBER. You were seduced.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I was seduced by the beauty of the ladies of that town, by their elegance, and by the great kindness they showed to a poor little French Canadian Minister who was travelling into those parts of the country. Well, I did not make a formal promise, but I went pretty far. I spoke of $3,000—yes, I think I mentioned the figure. I said if a vote of $3,000 will build a wharf, I will ask my colleagues to allow me to do so. There were splendid yachts on the lake. Really, it is one of the most beautiful lakes, one of the most beautiful places, in the country. I expect to fulfil my promise. I try not to go back on the ladies. I have never been accused of that so far.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

River St. Lawrence—dredging steamboat channel through shoal at foot of Wolf Island, $10,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The object of this work is to dredge a channel at the foot of Wolf Island to allow steamers to call at Kingston, and then go over to the American waters. I have made a complete survey of the whole work. It is to allow American boats to take supplies at Canadian ports.

Mr. SPROULE. Does this cover the whole of the dredging ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. At the foot of the island, yes.

Sault Ste. Marie—harbour improvements, including dredging of approaches, $25,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Every one knows that we have not enough water to allow Canadian boats to go to our wharfs. Canadian boats passing through the Canadian, Sault Ste. Marie canal, are obliged to go to the American side to load and unload. I am going to give an additional depth of water so as to allow them to go to the wharfs on the Canadian side.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the amount which will be required to finish the work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. About $50,000.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Has this been let by contract, and if so, who has the contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have not given any contract as yet.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You have not expended any money as yet ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Well then, I want a promise from the hon. minister that he will let it by contract unless he has a dredge of his own.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Very well, I have no objection to do that.

I am perfectly ready to ask for tenders. If my hon. friend will allow me, perhaps, I will make a promise that is not in the right direction. I have had a long experience in the House. I will ask for tenders and make a test. It is quite possible that the man who will be the lowest tenderer will not have the plant necessary to perform the work. I will make a test of it. It has happened before, often and often since I have been in office, that a man who has put in the lowest tender has not the equipment necessary to do the work.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. We must insist that the Order in Council shall be carried out which provides that where there is an expenditure over a certain amount, tenders shall be asked for and the contract given to the lowest tenderer. If the hon. minister has a dredge of his own which he can use for the purpose it is all right, but if not, we must insist upon tenders being asked for.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have a perfect right to do otherwise, but I will ask for tenders in this case just to make a test of it. Let us not discuss the Order in Council now; I will make a test of it.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Suppose it costs a higher amount, it is better in the public interest and it is better in the interests of public morality that a contract should be given although it costs a higher amount unless the department has a dredge available for the purpose.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I will do it this time.

Mr. SPROULE. There seem to be conflicting rumors as to the depth of water in the Sault Ste. Marie canal. I would like to ask the hon. minister what is the depth of water in the Soo canal on the mitre sill, and how much money would be required to complete the dredging sufficient to give a uniform depth of water. It was put at 19 or 20 feet before.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot speak as to the depth of water in the canal myself. That is not in my charge, and I do not like to speak of a matter in another department. I speak only of the dredging in the harbour itself. When my hon. colleague, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) is in his seat, if the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) renews his question, I am sure he will get the information he desires.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. Minister of Public Works is asking for authority to spend money in the harbour, and the approaches to the Soo canal so as to improve them for the purposes of navigation. He should have some plans before him showing the depth of water there, and how much dredging is required to give the uniform depth of water that he requires for navigation.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have a plan and a survey of the work I am going to carry out, but I must ask the hon. gentleman not to say that I should give information in regard to a matter that does not belong to me. My hon. friend is asking me to give him the depth of water on the mitre sill of the canal. The canal is not under my control; it is under the control of my colleague the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals. As to the harbour it is of an unequal depth. There are spots where there are 15 feet of water and there are other places where there are 18 feet. We are going to give a uniform depth of 20 feet.

Mr. SPROULE. At the approaches as well as in the canal?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The canal I do not want to speak of. My colleague the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals knows more about it than I do.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The depth of water on the mitre sill of the lock of the Sault Ste. Marie canal is the same as that of the canal on the American side, namely, 20 feet. In order to have a 20 foot navigation you want to dredge the approaches to the wharfs and to the locks and to provide more than 20 feet of water. You require to provide for a 21 foot navigation.

Mr. SPROULE. In the canal, I take it, there is 20 feet of water, and the hon. Minister of Public Works will endeavour to have a uniform depth of 20 feet in the harbour.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. You want to go one foot deeper.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer reminds me that when I say 20 feet, I mean 20 feet clear. If I am not mistaken we have only 19½ feet on the mitre sill of the Canadian canal.

Mr. SPROULE. Are there only 19½ feet on the mitre sill ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is only my information; it is not in my department.

Mr. SPROULE. We want to settle this question. The member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) says the depth is 20 feet, but I have heard it emphatically denied that it is 20 feet. We ought to have a statement from somebody who is able to state authoritatively what the depth is.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. My colleague, the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, has in his estimates an item for dredging the approaches to the canal, and when that item is under consideration the hon. member for East Grey can get an answer to that question. I do not want him to insist upon me giving an answer in regard to a matter which belongs to another department.

Mr. SPROULE. Where is this dredging to be done ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is in the harbour; it is not in the canal at all.

Mr. SPROULE. It says 'dredging of approaches.'

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It does not mean the approaches to the canal. The harbours are under my care and the canals and their approaches are under the control of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Except from Nipissing to the Georgian Bay.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is not a canal. The improvement of rivers is not under the care of the Department of Railways and Canals although they have done a good deal in the past which they had no right to do. The lakes are not under the charge of the Railway Department. There is no doubt as to that. I have secured legal opinion upon that point, but in this case the question does not arise because it is purely and simply a harbour work.

Mr. SPROULE. I misunderstood that. I thought it meant the approaches to the canal.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The control of the rivers, or the deepening of them, depends entirely on whether the hon. minister is able to impress his individuality on the rest of the government or not.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not think it depends on that at all, because the law is perfectly clear. The rivers and lakes are under the Public Works Department, but I may say that in the past the individuality of the Minister of Railways and Canals impressed itself a little too much. I certainly would not allow that now for this excellent reason that the Railways and Canals constitute one department and the Public Works another department. I feel quite able to carry out the work that is under my care, as my colleague, I have no doubt, feels quite able to carry out the work under his care.

Southampton—improvement of harbour, $10,000.

Mr. SPROULE. What is going to be done here ? For how many years will we find this item appearing in the estimates before it is used ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The item is only here for one year, and that is not so long. We are preparing the contract now. Southampton is an important port especially in view of the fact that Mr. Clergue is going to build the Algoma Central Railway, and Southampton is expected to be one of its terminals. The contract is under way. It is an extension of the landing pier so as to stop the filling up of the harbour. When that extension is made, a little dredging will make it a very good harbour indeed.

Mr. SPROULE. What dredging has been done this year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have not dredged this year in that part of the harbour. We have dredged in the river.

Mr. SPROULE. What kind of an improvement is this ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is an extension of the pier so as to form a kind of closed harbour with an entrance. We will dredge inside the harbour when that extension is completed, and it will not fill up again.

Mr. SPROULE. How much will this work cost when finished ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The whole thing, extension and dredging, will cost in the neighbourhood of $50,000.

Mr. SPROULE. And you are commencing an undertaking here which means $50,000 ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Which may mean $50,000.

Mr. SPROULE. But the minister must have some definite data to justify him in asking this vote.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When completed the work will cost in the neighbourhood of $50,000.

Mr. SPROULE. It will be let by contract ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. HALLIDAY. Before this vote is adopted, I would like to ask the minister a question or two. This is the harbour to which Mr. Clergue is building his railroad, but there is before the government a petition asking that certain improvements should be made in Tobermory harbour. Tobermory is one of the most important harbours on the lake, and I think myself that it is probably the best harbour on Lake Huron. At times you will find fifteen or twenty vessels in that harbour. They have no dock to tie up to and the government has never expended any money there. It would be of very great public utility if improvements were made at Tobermory harbour to facilitate the shipping on the lake.

I trust that when the supplementary estimates come down the minister will see fit to include an appropriation for the building of a dock at Tobermory harbour.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have received a request for harbour works at that place. The chief engineer tells me that we have given instructions that a complete survey shall be made. When that survey has been completed I will be in a position to say more than I can now in reference to Tobermory harbour.

Mr. BENNETT. In addition to what my hon. friend from North Bruce (Mr. Halliday) has said, I would point out that Tobermory, or 'the Tub,' as it is familiarly called, is one of the most wonderful harbours to be found on the continent. It would seem as though nature herself had planted it there as a refuge for sailors in stress of weather. I have never understood that there was particular necessity for docks there, but there is certainly a great necessity for having proper iron hooks and things of that kind placed in the rocks so that boats may be tied up. I would not say that docks are not necessary, and my hon. friend (Mr. Halliday) can speak with very great authority on that point. Those who are conversant with the shipping on the lakes know that Tobermory harbour is a perfect Godsend to mariners, and the department could not do better than direct its attention to improving that place.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The next time I go up there I will see that harbour.

St. Joseph, Lake Huron—wharf, $5,000.

Mr. SHERRITT. Might I ask the Minister of Public Works what will be the total cost of that wharf when it is completed ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Even if no question had been asked, I would have given some explanation as to that work. St. Joseph is on Lake Huron, between Goderich and Bayfield. Two years ago, two deputations came to see me, one from Montreal and one from the county of Huron. It was represented to me that French Canadians had been induced to come from Chicago and settle there in large numbers. Mr. Cantin and the priest headed that deputation. They represented to me that they had organized a plan of immigration, that there was a saw-mill to be established, and that there was a brick yard with a large trade.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Is the saw-mill there at present ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes, there is a small saw-mill and a brick yard there also, though not a very large one. I will place myself in the hands of the House and state the case fully. That argument was advanced to me by the people who had already settled there. A gentleman by the name of Cantin was at the head of the whole thing. Mr. Macmillan, the then member for the riding, was favourable to the project. I had a preliminary survey made. Then a deputation came from Montreal. Mr. Vallee, who I am sorry is dead now, was at the head of that deputation. I knew him very well. He was a large hotel owner, and an enterprising man, and a man of substance. He represented to me that he had formed a company to build a large summer resort hotel. This was two years ago, and the hotel has been undertaken but not completed. I placed an amount in the estimates on these representations that I submitted to my colleagues. On the representations that were made in Chicago and which were, I suppose, the same as made to me, a certain number of families, I believe about twenty-five families, came from Chicago and settled there. The brick yard was started; the hotel was started, and so on. I may say that the village has not made a great deal of progress. I think there are about 150 people who have left Chicago to settle there, and the priest who lives there came to see me again three or four weeks ago. I did not know whether to ask my colleagues and the House to leave this item in the estimates or not. This gentleman with two or three others came to me and represented to me that if we did not discourage them, there would be a considerable immigration from Chicago and other American centres to that place. On the strength of these statements I have allowed the item to remain in the estimates. There is the whole thing in two words.

Mr. SHERRITT. The hon. gentleman has not answered my question, what is this harbour going to cost when finished ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am not going to spend more than $8,000 there. There was $5,000 given already, and I ask for $3,000 more. My engineers have given special attention to that harbour, especially Mr. Roy, whom I sent there, and they state that $8,000 will be sufficient for the requirements of the work. They say that a small brick yard which is there at present will develop, and will do an export trade in brick to Chicago. Those people are settled there rightly or wrongly. I state the case as it has been represented to me, and I leave it in the hands of the House.

Mr. SHERRITT. What depth of water will this wharf give ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Between eight and ten feet.

Mr. SHERRITT. Have you purchased the land ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I have not. I have not done anything yet, except survey the place carefully.

Mr. SPROULE. Who owns the land ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not know. In point of fact, I have done nothing. There has been a stoppage of the whole thing. I think it is an interesting place. I believe there will be a large immigration there. We are paying large sums of money to bring people from Russia, Poland, and all parts of the world, and I thought it would be a good thing to bring a few dozen French Canadians to invade Ontario.

Mr. SHERRITT. How much will this work cost when completed ? What is the enterprise that will bring them there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have just stated that there is a saw mill and a small brick yard.

Mr. SHERRITT. It seems to me that this is a very extraordinary state of affairs. While I have the honour to represent North Middlesex, I live in the county of Huron. I have lived from a boy in the township in which this work is going on, and know this place very well, and I can assure the House that this hotel, which the hon. gentleman says was not finished four years ago, is not finished to-day.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I admit that.

Mr. SHERRITT. I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the hon. minister has been misled. I am not aware that there is any such immigration there as he speaks of. I live within a few miles of the place, and have been through it, and I would not like to say that there are twenty-five families there altogether. It is true, it has a post office and a saw-mill, and a dock would be necessary to enable the mill to get logs, because there is no timber in that part of the country to supply a saw-mill. It is an old and settled part of the country. There are a few French families there who came from Lower Canada.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. From Chicago.

Mr. SHERRITT. I beg pardon. You can hardly find a family there that came from Chicago. There are French Canadians who came from Lower Canada forty or fifty years ago and settled in that part of the country. The gentleman whom the hon. minister has referred to came there a few years ago and started a hotel and built the saw-mill. There are a few respectable dwellings there, but most are not completed. I believe Mr. Cantin owns them. I can assure the hon. minister that the people of that section of the country do not look on an expenditure at this place as being a proper expenditure of public money. I have here a paper from which I might read a short extract. This paper is edited by a leading Reformer, who holds the position of county councillor, and who has always taken an active part in the affairs of the Liberal party. This is the 'Brussels Post.'

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Is Brussels far from that place ?

Mr. SHERRITT. It is in the county of Huron. I do not know exactly how far it is.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. About thirty miles.

Mr. SHERRITT. Perhaps it is. This paper says :

> We notice that a delegation of big and little politicians recently visited St. Joseph, on the shores of Lake Huron, with the intent of the expenditure of money for harbour or dock purposes. St. Joseph's needs a harbour as badly as a goose requires side pockets, and any such expenditure is just that much money thrown away as far as serving the public. A harbour is not required there, nor is there any probability of it ever being used if it were there. Surely there has been money enough squandered by both political parties in the past in breakwaters, docks, harbours, &c., without continuing this nonsensical work any longer. No person can object to legitimate expenditure in necessary public works, but why members do not protest against the misuse of moneys that should be applied to other purposes, we fail to make out. If 'wilful waste makes woeful want' then it is about time that somebody called a halt, and the 'Post' for one says somebody should be brought sharply to time if this kind of work is continued. We could mention so-called harbours on which thousands of dollars were spent and they are in worse shape to-day than 10 years ago, and do not nor never did even begin to pay a tithe of the interest on the money foolishly spent, nor serve any practical purpose.

Now, this is what a friend of the government has said. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is not in his place to-night ; for he had the honour at one time as he stated this afternoon, of representing the riding in which this place is situated, and he knows the extent of the public sentiment which the minister speaks of. He knows that it was from the province of Quebec that these gentlemen came. One thing I am pleased with is that the Chairman of this Committee (Mr. Macdonald, East Huron) is a member for the county where this work is going on. I am satisfied that the hon. members of this House are too conscientious to advocate expenditure of this kind, and I think the government should have some fixed principle on which to proceed in their expenditure of the public money, instead of doing, as they are in this item, voting an expenditure of $7,000 or $8,000, to favour some political friends.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not see what there is in the plea that in this case we are giving money to friends. Why, there is scarcely an elector in the place, so that there cannot be any political object in this vote. I have stated the facts, as I think very frankly. It was represented to me, when the item was placed in the estimates, that this was a good beginning of a settlement. And $5,000 is not a large amount of money. It makes one smile rather to see people like my hon. friend making a big mountain out of this expenditure of $5,000, when much larger expenditures in Ontario and the other provinces are voted by them without a word or the slightest hint of scandal. That is not the kind of conduct that is likely to impress me very much. The question is whether in this case we should go on with the expenditure or not. The government were right, and the House was right in placing this item in the estimates, but I must admit that our expectations have not yet materialized. And what I ask the House now is to vote the item, and I pledge myself to visit the place personally, and if I am not satisfied that there is justification for this expenditure, I will not make it. I pledge myself that if there is no public good to be served by this expenditure, it will not be made. In the meantime, I shall not spend a dollar before examining into the thing myself. I do not suppose that I can be asked to do more than that.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. This is a new idea of responsibility. The hon. minister asks the House to vote the amount and then tells us that if, after personal visit and examination, he finds it is not required, he pledges his honour not to spend it. But he should know the whole circumstances before asking for the money. That is the principle of ministerial responsibility. He has no right to ask us to vote the item after the statement he has just made. He should be frank enough now to tell the House that as he is not fully informed of the circumstances he will withdraw the item. For what purpose does he ask the vote? For the purpose of inducing settlement from Chicago into a section of country which has been settled in every part of it, for forty years. That was the reason given by him, and now that he admits it he was not fully informed, he ought to withdraw the item.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot do that, for the excellent reason that I have taken every possible precaution against any unnecessary expenditure being made. I am fully prepared to take my share of the responsibility. I pledge myself to the House to go there personally and investigate the whole matter. My hon. friend says that I should know all the circumstances now. Well, I sent a special engineer up there, Mr. Roy, and he gave me the report I have stated. Of course I am now in a rather difficult position from a certain standpoint. Here is a French Canadian settlement, and I am a French Canadian minister, and I will be accused in the press of asking the House to vote a special sum in favour of a French settlement.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPROULE. Nobody else but the hon. minister has mentioned anything of the kind.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is just as well to go straight to the point in a case like this. I have nothing to gain in this business. Do I understand hon. gentlemen opposite to say that I should withdraw the vote?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Yes, from the statement the hon. minister has made.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What statement?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. His statement that he pledged himself to the House to make inquiries afterwards.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Personal inquiries.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. That he would make inquiries afterwards, and if he found the circumstances did not warrant the expenditure he would not make it. When a minister asks the House to vote an expenditure, he thereby assures the House that he has made thorough inquiries; but from the statement of the Minister of Public Works, he has not the necessary information to justify his asking the House to vote this money.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Half of the votes placed in the estimates are placed there before there is even a survey made. In this case there has been a survey made and full examination, but in view of the fact that Mr. Cantin does not seem to have realized all the expectations he held out with regard to certain people, I shall not spend the money before making a personal visit myself. I have some other business to bring me there, and I shall be there in a month or so after the House adjourns, and I say that I will not spend a dollar of the money unless I find that there is a good scheme of immigration under way. If there is a scheme to have families come in from the United States or elsewhere to settle there on a pretty large scale, I shall ask my colleagues to allow me to spend the money, but if there is not I shall not. I think that that is a fair statement.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It is not a constitutional manner of treating the question at all. Besides who was it raised the question of prejudice or of opposition to the vote on account of twenty-five French families being there? Why is it that in a little matter of this kind, the Minister of Public Works should descend to racial prejudice ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not do it.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is the only person who mentioned at all the fact of twenty-five French families being there, and he ascribed our opposition to the vote to that fact, and to his intention to induce other French families to emigrate into that section. Why does he make an appeal of that kind on a little question of voting a few thousand dollars for a harbour, which he can justify on no other ground ? It is the smallest kind of political manoeuvring that I ever witnessed in the House, and the Minister of Public Works will have to rise above that kind of tactics. He may appeal to racial prejudices on other questions, but it is perfectly absurd to appeal to them on a vote for a little harbour that no one in that section has heard of or requires. It is the smallest kind of parish politics that I ever heard introduced into this House.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Parish politics is not the kind of politics that I resort to. I do not see that my hon. friend is in any way justified in talking as he has done. I have not a word to take back of what I said.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Make an apology, and do not do it again.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not a word to take back. I say that I shall not spend the money until I make myself personally acquainted with all the facts and circumstances, and we will see now whether or not I shall not be accused—I do not say that I will be accused here—I know that my hon. friend is above that kind of thing; I know him too well to believe for one moment that anything of the kind will come to his mind. Permit me to say that I have not the slightest intention of ascribing anything of the kind to him. I have been accused in the press about different affairs. This time, I must plead 'not guilty,' because there is no ground to commit anything of the kind.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Don't do it again.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot do it again, because I have not done it at all. I repeat that, when the amount was placed in the estimates last year, there was not a word of opposition. I have been told that, on account of that amount in the estimates, a certain number of families had settled there. I wish to ascertain whether that is true or not. If there is no genuine immigration. I shall not spend the money. Surely the House has enough confidence in any minister, whoever he may be, to grant him this amount under such circumstances.

Mr. CLANCY. The minister says that the fact of the item being in the estimates has induced some people to settle there, and that this is a reason for putting the item in the estimates this year. What then, induced the hon. gentleman to put it in in the first place ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have already stated that two deputations came to me, one of them from Montreal, composed of people I know very well. Unfortunately one of these gentlemen is dead. Mr. Vallee, who was a well known man among the members of parliament, and a man of means. They told me that they wished to establish a summer resort and build a hotel. The proof that such a scheme was a genuine one, is that the hotel has been started—a large structure. Unfortunately, as I have said, Mr. Vallee died. Among the gentlemen who accompanied him when he came to see me were a number of men of substance from Montreal, men I knew very well. Afterwards Mr. Cantin, the parish priest and half a dozen other people represented that they had organized an immigration scheme and that Chicago families were going to come in. These deputations induced us to place the item in the estimates. I simply ask to be allowed to investigate the case before doing anything more. If there is not an expectation of any large settlement there I will not spend the money.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. minister gives as his reason why this item should pass that there was no objection to it last year. On that basis of reasoning, why did he move to strike out an item—as he did just before six o'clock—which had passed last year ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have already explained the case of Presqu'Isle.

Mr. INGRAM. Not satisfactorily to this opposition.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend is not pleased, perhaps I could put the item back again in the estimates.

Mr. INGRAM. The hon. minister said that it is the duty of the opposition to criticise these items.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not complain.

Mr. INGRAM. Now we feel that the hon. minister has not given us sufficient information to justify us in supporting this item. One of the reasons against it is that a paper published in the riding in which the money was to be expended has denounced it, and the editor of that paper is a supporter of this government. We also find that an hon. gentleman who represents part of the territory contained within Huron county, denounced this item. And the minister himself gives us no good reason for supporting it, but tells us to pass the item and he will investigate the item. It would be better to investigate first and be ready to give information to the committee to justify them in passing the item. The hon. minister also sneered at the House on account of the French families living there. I wish to point out to him the delicate position we would be in if we accepted his advice. He says that there are twenty-five French families there. He has been accused as he says himself in the public press of favouring the French element in this country. If he goes to investigate the case, is it not the fact that they will expect more from him than they would from an English speaking minister, and might unduly influence him to expend this money, or perhaps, even a larger sum. If he does not want to be put in this position, all he has to do is to allow the item to stand, or withdraw it. He can then investigate. And, if the expenditure is justified, he can come and ask it from the House next session.

Mr. SPROULE. This is an extraordinary proposition that the hon. minister makes to us. I confess that I admire his sterling enterprise when he wishes to do a good thing. But I am afraid he sometimes shows the same zeal when he wishes to do a bad thing. And I am afraid he has stumbled upon something like that to-night. In the first place, the principle of asking the House to vote money without giving reasons for it, is wrong. To vote money first and investigate afterwards is hardly the way parliament should do business. The plea is raised that a certain enterprising gentleman, who, I believe, has a paper town to sell there, is bringing in immigration. For what purpose ? We are told that a mill is to be put up there. But, on the other hand, we hear that there is no timber to supply a mill. They are going to establish a brick yard, we are told, and there will be no possibility of vessels coming in to carry the brick to Chicago. But to start brickmaking in Canada, with a view to sending the product several hundreds of miles to Chicago and putting them on the market there against a heavy duty, and, in importing immigrants for that purpose—is that the object aimed at in building this breakwater ? The hon. gentleman can spend this amount of money much better in some other way. This is an old settled country—it has been settled for fifty years anyway. There is nothing there to start an enterprise. It is said it will become a summer resort. Why, there is not a decent grove there for a summer resort. You have to start it on a bare shore. It is said there is a hotel there. A hotel has been in the course of construction for several years, but it is not finished, because there has been no inducement to finish it; as lawyers sometimes say of their cases, it is in statu quo. The minister says : Vote this money, and I will go on and make inquiry. He thinks that is sufficient excuse for voting the money. I want to ask the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McEwen), who lives in that county, whether he advises the expenditure of this money ?

This is a proposition to throw so much money away, or else to help some person. The minister does not even know who owns the land upon which it is proposed to build this dock. So far as we are told, it is the same man who has tried to build up a summer resort, it is the same man who is trying to sell his lot, the same man who is trying to make the public believe that the place can be built up by means of a brickyard. The idea of starting a brickyard there to make bricks for export to Chicago seems to be the wildest scheme I ever heard proposed to this House. There is nothing to support a saw-mill. There are no manufacturing establishments, nothing to begin a village. There are a few families there. and that is all the information we have. I would like to ask you, Mr. Chairman, who knows the locality well, will you get up and defend it ? I would ask the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McEwen) if he will get up and defend it. Let this House know if they think it is desirable that that money should be spent.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There has not been one dollar spent yet. I am surprised that the members of the opposition become excited at this paltry sum of money. In the days of Sir John A. Macdonald I remember that we did not get excited at a little thing like that, we were looking for bigger things. Here is my position. I have not spent a dollar of that money, and my hon. friend talks as if I had pledged the country to an expenditure of a million dollars. I pledge myself not to spend one dollar before I look carefully and personally into that case. But on the faith of that vote, for which my hon. friends are just as responsible as I am, the people have settled there. Is it not a reasonable proposition ? I think that the standpoint taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite is altogether wrong. I have not spent one dollar, and do not propose to, unless I am convinced that it is useful, and unless my colleagues to whom I must appeal are convinced that it will be a wise expenditure of money. For it is a question of confidence, after all, whether this House will trust me with that small amount of money. If I am not going to be trusted for that amount of money, I might just as well pass to the other side.

Mr. SHERRITT. The hon. minister seems to look upon it as a very small amount, but I do not think that this country can afford to let a minister run round through the country with these small amounts. I do not think it is fair that we should be asked to authorize him to do a work of that kind. But the matter may not be as small as it appears. I am not an expert in harbour building, but I may mention that it is a shallow beach, a person can easily wade out into it ten or twelve rods. The minister this afternoon told us about a sum of $70,000 spent in Bayfield for a harbour. But this is a much harder place in which to build a harbour than was Bayfield. I think that $5,000 or even $8,000 will not accomplish the end that he mentions here. Indeed I do not think there is anything at this place to warrant such an undertaking. I am of the same opinion as that gentleman who is in the county council, a leading Reformer, who stated in his paper that there was no use for the work. It is about ten miles from Bayfield, perhaps a little more. I have no idea that that dock will ever be used if it is built. It seems to me the minister is very easily convinced when he wants to construct a public work in any place. Even though it is a paltry amount of $5,000 or $8,000, he seems to be easily convinced that it is a proper expenditure, although the only argument he can make for it is that the town is a good place for a brickyard. We all know what a brickyard is. The place at present is only a little one horse affair. the brickyard will not develop it. It is a farming country, in fact one of the best in Ontario. We are told there will be a sawmill. It has been said that there was no timber there; perhaps that is rather a strong statement. I think nearly every farmer there has five or six acres of bush for his own use, that is all the timber there is for a saw mill. I may say to the minister that he will not be accused there of favouring the French people, because the French people there are as much opposed to this expenditure as anybody else. The French people in our part of the country are intelligent business men, and can easily see when money is being wasted. That French settlement I refer to is some ten miles long, and has been settled for forty or fifty years with French people from Lower Canada. I noticed this afternoon the minister, in referring to Bayfield, made comparisons. I do not object so much to the item for Bayfield, but the arguments that were brought forward to justify the present vote I think were very frivilous. He referred to the money spent in Bayfield thirty years ago. Well, those of us who knew that country thirty years ago know that there were no railroads when Bayfield harbour was built, and perhaps it was a proper expenditure. The grain in that portion of the country was all shipped from Bayfield, but to-day that Bayfield harbour is a dead letter. I am not objecting to this vote, because the place may become a summer resort, it is growing in popularity ; but I am objecting to the argument advanced by the minister for this vote when he refers to Bayfield, a work that has been useless for a number of years.

Mr. GANONG. One would suppose from listening to the hon. Minister of Public Works that he was really indignant. Well now, he would have some right to be indignant if any person in this country were filching his pocket book the way he is filching the pocket book of the country. We have had two or three samples of that this session. This is only a small affair, he said; it is only a small amount that is involved. It is not a matter of principle with this hon, gentleman at all. It is merely a question of the amount that it is proposed to expend. If the hon. gentleman is hunting for places to put money up for summer hotels, we can give him a job in the maritime provinces that will take him the rest of his life. If it has come to the point in this country that private enterprises are to be subsidized, as we have had them subsidized during the last few years by the hon. Minister of Public Works, I think it is time that the public called a halt. Brickyards, saw-mills, summer resorts ! A similar case came up the other night and how admirably the hon. minister parried the point as to who owned the Lovell seigneury when it was proposed to give $53,000 to a private enterprise in Gaspe county. Last session we had some concessions made to the maritime provinces. They were going to make a magnificent harbour on a magnificent lake but when they made it the lake drained dry. That is how these hon. gentlemen are making themselves solid in the country perhaps, but are frittering away the money of the people. These private enterprises, I have no doubt, will take notice from the hon. minister's action this year, and probably next year Ottawa will hardly be able to hold the huge delegations that will be up to interview the minister and endeavour to persuade him to assist in their enterprises. Perhaps the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) could give us a good deal of information in regard to this particular matter. He is surely here to represent that constituency. If he is here I am certain the committee would be very much gratified to hear him explain the matter.

Mr. OSLER. I think it is in one of Marryatt's novels that a discussion arises as to what we will call an item in dispute and the excuse given, which, I think, was accepted, was that it was a very little one. I dare say there are many hon. members present who will remember what that refers to. This item in dispute is a very little one compared to most of the expenditures and items in dispute in this department. If we leave it, as the hon. minister suggests, I would say that it would facilitate the business of the committee to pass the whole estimates under this head, amounting to $354,100, if the hon. minister will give us his word that he will personally investigate each one of the works that it is proposed to expend this sum on in detail. It will take him a considerable time to do it, but if he will promise not to spend any money until he has first investigated all the items in this list, probably it would be better for us to pass them in a lump, taking the hon. minister's word that unless he finds there are brick-yards, town site exploiters or boomsters involved, or something that would justify the expenditure in each case, he will cancel the items and next year we will come here with a clean sheet and with no expenditure.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the hon. Minister of Public Works to say that we are accusing him of a crime because he proposes to spend this money in this way. I did not think that any one on this side of the House went so far as that, but we do pretend to say that he is committing a grave indiscretion. We do pretend to say that he is violating well understood principles of parliamentary government and asking the opposition to abandon the functions of an opposition, because he, himself, told us the other night that it was our duty, which we were expected to perform, to criticise every item according to the intelligence we possessed and the information we had, and to say whether it was right or wrong. We have accepted that invitation and we reply to him to-night that from our inquiry, our investigation and our information he is not justified in spending this money, nor are we justified in voting it. For that reason we oppose it. We also oppose it because we believe that a well understood principle of parliamentary government is that when a minister of the Crown asks the House to consider the advisability or otherwise of voting public money he is prepared to lay before it such information or data as he has acquired and collected with a statement to the House that will convince it that this expenditure should be made and therefore it will vote that it be made. But, he wants us to vote the money beforehand and give him a free hand to go and spend it after investigation if he likes, or to do the reverse. This is the most amusing proposition that I ever heard presented before this committee. It is the most Utopian proposition that I have ever heard presented to the committee for a long time. I am quite sure there is no hon. member of this committee who would more intensely oppose it than the hon. Minister of Public Works himself if he were in opposition. I know the hon. gentleman too well not to believe that he would be the first man to condemn it. He would show up, not the iniquity exactly, but the impropriety of parliament voting public money on such a ground. The defence that it is a small item is no excuse whatever. It is the principle involved in the matter; it is not the amount of money involved.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What principle?

Mr. SPROULE. The principle of asking parliament to vote money without having the data to justify it in voting that money. We are asking him for the verdict of his own friends but there is not a single hon. member of this House who will get up to say one word in defence of this proposition. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) was in the House when this discussion commenced. Where is he now? The hon. gentleman should tell the House what he thinks about it. He is not here to do it. He has found it convenient to get out of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He is there.

Mr. SPROULE. Is he there?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman is present he should make a statement and let the committee know what he thinks about it. For these reasons we oppose it. If the hon. minister is prepared to give me his ear, I am prepared to go on with the discussion. We oppose it on another principle, and it is this: We think the principle of spending money on private property is wrong. It is not a government dock; he told the committee that he does not know who owns the land, yet he makes that expenditure and after a while we will probably find out that we have to do as we have done in the past few years, when, after having spent money to enhance the value of private property we have been obliged to turn round and buy a dock for $10,000, or may be $20,000, the same as we had to do at Bruce Mines or in some other places. There is no public demand for this dock and there is no purpose in building it other than the booming of an imaginary townsite and the helping of a private individual to sell his land. That is the purpose. The brick yard business would be laughed at if you talked in the west about establishing a brick yard to export bricks to Chicago. And talk about building a harbour there. Why, only yesterday I happened to be in that section of the county, and met a gentleman who told me that he could roll up his pants and walk out twenty rods without wetting them. Yet the minister is going to give ten feet of water with an expenditure of $5,000. I have it on reliable authority that all that is moonshine. This gentleman whom I met said to me: The minister must have been very badly imposed upon; I admit that he is a man of a great deal of intelligence and if he was on the shore and looked at the exposed and shallow beach he would not require to be there fifteen seconds until he saw the folly of trying to build a dock there to accommodate, what he says, are the needs of the country. The minister promises that he will go up and see that place, but what we object to is the principle of voting money upon such flimsy excuses. It is our duty here to vote away public money only when it is absolutely needed, and only when the minister convinces the House that there is sufficient trade in the locality to justify the expenditure.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The late John McMillan was a much respected member of this parliament. He was a farmer ; he was an old man and had been for twenty-five years a member of the House. In the month of May and in the month of September, 1900, he transmitted to the department with his approval letters and petitions asking that a wharf be built there.

Mr. SPROULE. Perhaps if I ask the hon. minister how long it was before the general elections, it may explain the whole thing.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Well, that is a horse of another colour. I will not deviate from my argument. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) says that I have no ground to ask this parliament to vote this money, and I refer him to the authority of a member of parliament of twenty-five years' standing, who represented that riding, and who asked that a wharf should be built there. Of course, I take the full responsibility for what has been done in this matter, but I was away in 1900, and in my absence my colleagues ordered a survey and an examination. It was on the representation of a much-respected member of the Liberal party and of the House of Commons that this little enterprise was started. There were very great hopes then that a settlement would be made in that place. I have heard with surprise the statement of several members on the other side that there are no lands available for settlement there, because I understand that there is a large tract of land available and that already at least twenty-five families have settled there who were not there two years ago. We expected more. I repeat that a deputation of the Montreal business men and capitalists represented to me that they wanted to build a large hotel. The hotel has been started and there is the beginning of a settlement. What mistake have I committed in the face of all these statements ?

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. minister allow me to ask him if he is aware of the fact, that the very respectable member who recommended that and got him to put the item in the estimates, was defeated at the elections ? Will the minister also tell me, if he does not know that this very thing helped to defeat Mr. Macmillan ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Without one word of opposition from the other side, this small amount was voted in the estimates, and on the faith of that vote I am told that a pretty large settlement has taken place there. All that I am asking is that the House shall not ask me to withdraw this amount from the estimates. I have not spent a dollar and I shall not spend a dollar until I have investigated the matter more fully. It is the privilege of gentlemen opposite to criticise this vote; and I have never complained of their criticism. I fully recognize the importance of being criticized, and I fully recognize the right of the opposition to do so. At the same time I believe that I am within my right and duty in insisting that the item should pass.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister told us that he sent an engineer to get a report on this work. Will he be good enough to place that report on the Table ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend moves for that report he will get it with pleasure.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The Minister of Public Works seems anxious to avoid the peculiar position he has placed himself in. He tells us that he will not expend this money until he inquires whether the expenditure is justifiable or not. I misunderstand the duties of a minister, responsible to this parliament and under a responsible government, if such a plea should prevail. The hon. gentleman must see the ridiculous position he is in. He asks the House to have perfect confidence in him; he tells us that he may not make the expenditure, but he wants us to vote a sum of money without his being able to justify the expenditure. What an extraordinary and absurd position ? I venture to say that such an exhibition was never made by a minister before. Under responsible government, the minister cannot ask a vote from this House without first being convinced himself of the absolute necessity of the expenditure; then he must convince his colleagues that the vote should be submitted to the House, and then he must have the approval of the Governor General on the ground that the expenditure is in the public interest. But the minister now asks us that the money shall be granted to him in trust, and he pledges his honour to the House that if the expenditure is not justifiable he will not make it. Why do we not vote all appropriations in the same manner ? Why do we not give a lump sum to the minister and trust to his honour and judgment as to the expediency of the expenditure ? That is not our form of government at all; that is not ministerial responsibility. That is the position of the Minister of Public Works.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is not the position.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It is exactly the position of the Minister of Public Works. A more absurd and ridiculous position a minister never occupied in this House at all. Why does he not come out manfully and say, I am responsible for the expenditure, and I ask this House to vote the money, instead of asking us to trust to his honour and his knowledge and experience, to decide whether the expenditure is justifiable or not. I will venture to say that such a request was never presented to a constitutional assembly before this evening.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. What is the use of my hon. friend trying to lecture me on constitutional law, which I know just as well as he does, if not better? The amount was placed in the estimates when my hon. friend was in the House, and he did not object to it or say one word against it. If it were a new vote altogether, my position would not be as clear as it is; but it is not a new vote; the amount has been in the estimates for years, and I simply ask that it be allowed to remain there until I get further information. My hon. friend's lecture is not in the right direction. I do not profess to be infallible on constitutional law, but in this case I do not believe I am making a mistake, in taking the position that this amount having been placed in the estimates, I do not want to withdraw it without more information. I think that is a fair position, and if our hon. friends opposite cannot agree with us, I am very sorry.

Mr. OSLER. It seems to me that the minister has not improved his position at all. He says this is partly a revote. That shows that he has had a year or two to ascertain whether it is a proper vote or not; but he does not know now any more than he did twelve months ago whether there is any necessity for a harbour at this place. That being the case, there is no need of putting this vote through to-night, and it may continue to rest in the imagination of the hon. minister without doing any harm to anybody. I do not think the minister's statement that it was voted before is any reason why he should revote it. Surely when it comes before parliament it is a new vote, and should be considered without regard to the past, if the work has not been commenced. Evidently it is a useless expenditure, or the minister would be able to give some reason why the money was not expended. The opposition know more of the matter now than they did when the item was in the estimates last year, and they know that it is one that should not pass the House.

Mr. HEYD. Our friends on the other side have been so exceedingly good to the hon. Minister of Public Works in allowing so many items to pass that they appear to have arranged a little tilt to-night in order to have a little amusement. I am not familar with this particular work. I have obtained my information of it from what has been said to-night by the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. gentlemen on the other side; and if I were on the other side, animated with a desire to make a little political capital out of this matter, I could convince myself that our friends over there are probably adopting the right course; but if we look at it as a business proposition, I think the attitude of the minister is quite reasonable. He says that on the representations of an influential committee of gentlemen from Montreal, and also at the request of a number of people who live in the district, and under the advice of the late Mr. McMillan, a gentleman whom we all respected, he was induced to place a sum in the estimates for this work. This year renewed pressure was brought upon him to go on with this work, and in good faith he puts the item in the estimates. He is not to suppose that conditions have changed; he expects that the matter will be treated as a business proposition; and for the first time he hears objections to the scheme which he was not aware of before. He is not satisfied, however, and I am not satisfied, that all the statements made on the other side of the House are correct. We hear so many statements emanating from that source that on subsequent investigation we find to be inaccurate that we feel quite justified sometimes in taking the statements that are made by our hon. friends opposite with a little grain of suspicion. I am on this occasion with the minister. I say that he was justified, upon the information he had, in putting this item in the estimates, and he is not willing to withdraw it upon the statements made by our friends on the other side. But at the same time they have created enough suspicion in his mind to induce him to satisfy himself as to their accuracy, and if he finds them to be true, he is willing that this particular sum shall not be expended. That is quite sufficient for me as a supporter of the hon. minister, and I am quite willing, if the opposition insist on that item standing, to support the minister with my vote. I have learned, after four or five years experience in this House, not to believe everything that emanates from the other side of the Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down is no doubt very much in touch with the Minister of Public Works, because the Minister of Public Works announces himself to be an out-and-out protectionist; and in these days, when my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Heyd) is losing so much sleep looking after the interests of his political sponsors, the Massey-Harris Company, and asking for additional protection for them, I can readily understand why he rushes to the help of the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. HEYD. That is not in his department.

Mr. BENNETT. No, but my hon. friend from South Brant will acknowledge the great prestige and power which the hon. Minister of Public Works possesses in the Cabinet. Now, what is the first statement made by the hon. member for South Brant to justify his position? He says that a deputation from Montreal waited on the Minister of Public Works and asked that this work be proceeded with. Now, who were the gentlemen who waited on the Minister of Public Works? It was a gentleman who was building a summer hotel, and wanted a dock to lead up to it. Surely my hon. friend does not contend that the money of this country should be used to build docks for people who wish to build summer hotels? My hon. friend from South Brant poses as a business man in this House, and yet he stands up and says that if a gentleman desires to build a summer hotel at any point in the Dominion, all he needs to do, in his opinion, is to apply to the people of this country for a wharf to be built at the public expense, to be used in conjunction with his hotel. I am surprised that my hon. friend is not asking the Minister of Public Works to build a livery stable for some gentleman who wishes to start one and hire out horses. Surely, if it is right to build a wharf to accommodate a man who is building a summer hotel, it is equally right to build a livery stable for any one who wants to engage in that business. Now, there are two principles involved in this matter, and it is immaterial whether the vote is $5,000 or $50,000. What did we have in this House the other night? The Minister of Public Works made the statement that the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Lovell), having a large timber tract in the county of Gaspé, desired to establish mills there, and in order to save expenditure in connection with his mill, he wanted the government of the country, or the people—because it is the people's money—to build a $50,000 dock for him. Nobody disputed that that was the case, and the hon. gentleman stated that the building of a saw-mill was contingent on the government building the dock. The hon. member for South Brant, if in the House, I presume, acquiesced in that. The hon. gentleman now attacks the statements made by my hon. friend from North Middlesex (Mr. Sherritt). I think he is very unfair to my hon. friend, who does not obtrude himself very much on the House; and when he makes statements of fact in this House, living as he does a few miles from the place, it is bad grace on the part of the hon. member for South Brant to suggest that those statements are not true. I will be bound to say that every statement the hon. member for North Middlesex makes is true.

The gentleman who represents the riding where this work is to be done left the chamber as soon as it was mentioned. That cannot be denied. He was sitting in the House immediately before this item was called and then left the chamber. Why did he leave? Because he knew he could not make any statement of facts that would at all justify it. The statement of the Minister of Public Works itself makes out a case, which could not be possibly stronger, for any one attacking this expenditure. He said that the demand for this work came first from a gentleman who owned the land, that this gentleman intended constructing a summer hotel at that point, and that there is a saw-mill there. No one denies these facts, but the mill has no connection with the dock because it is not even built on the water's edge. It is a small mill intended to cut up logs that are now standing timber in that part of the country. It is not built near the water edge at all. Then as regards the brickyard, it is absurd to talk of building a dock in order that brick may be exported to the United States. Every one knows that brick is not exported to the United States from this country. But in order to get this vote through, the minister makes this novel pledge, which has been commented on by my hon. friends from North Lanark (Mr. Haggart) and West Toronto (Mr. Osler). He gives the House his word that if on inquiry he finds that the circumstances do not justify the expenditure, the money will not be spent. Well, he need not have waited to make a personal visit for he could have got all the information he required from the hon. member in whose riding this work is to be done. And the fact that that hon. gentleman deliberately went out of the chamber as soon as the item was called is pretty clear evidence that there is no justification for it. Or the hon. minister could have called on Mr. Deputy Speaker, who might have left the Chair, and attempted some justification of this vote. But neither of these two gentlemen ventured to defend it.

I was surprised to find the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) rising to support this vote. I thought at first that this was the last straw breaking the camel's back, and that the hon. gentleman was really rising in his place in protest. Then there is the hon. member for South Perth, who went out against the government on the Yukon deal. That was a question of principle with the hon. gentleman. Is he going to stulify the reputation for independence which he made on that occasion? Is he going to sit here and vote for a proposition, which the minister himself says he is not now in a position to justify. Is he going to vote for expenditure on a work which is of no public utility at all, but which, as the Minister of Public of Works has himself said, was taken up by the government on the request of a private individual, who asked to have his private property improved at the expense of the public.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have seen a good many tempests in a teapot, but this is the smallest kind of a tempest and the smallest kind of a pot I ever saw. Whether the hon. gentleman who represents one of the Hurons is or is not in the House or whether our Chairman did not leave the Chair in order to address the House, does not affect the case. Why should the Minister of Public Works or of any other department withdraw an item at the dictation of the opposition? This item was placed in the estimates, with the consent of the House, and because two or three of my hon. friends on the other side have thought proper to rise in their might and tell me that I am not to be trusted with this wonderful sum of money, I am forsooth to drop the item. They threaten us with a vote. Well, if we have nothing more to fear than a division on a question like this, we will be very long on this side of the House. I repeat that this item was placed in the estimates with the consent of hon. gentlemen opposite. Circumstances justified the government in placing it in the estimates, and because I do not now eat humble pie, because I do not make up my mind to be lectured by my hon. friend's opposite, we are going to have a vote. We have had votes in the past and have not been killed by them, and I do not think we stand much danger of being slaughtered on this occasion. We will see whether the country will support hon. gentlemen opposite in their demands that I should withdraw this item without being given the chance of looking into it myself. This is a most unreasonable position for the opposition to take. I hope that my hon. friends have no other motive than to vindicate constitutional law, and the country will judge whether it is any such high motive which animates them on this occasion. I have nothing more to add except to call the attention of my hon. friend who has just sat down, to the unfairness of his statement. I do not suppose that he meant to be unfair but what is the use of his saying that the sum was placed in the estimates at the exclusive demand of gentlemen from Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT. I understood the hon. minister to say that Mr. Cantin and another gentleman had asked for the grant in the first instance.

The PRIME MINISTER. We have devoted a good deal of time to this item, and if we are to take a vote, we might as well take it now. I do not think anything more can be said which would throw any additional light on this subject. The position is this. A couple of years ago a sum was placed in the estimates for the building of a wharf at the place in question. There was some business representations made to my hon. colleague, the Minister of Public Works, on behalf of this expenditure, and he acceded. This appears this year to have shocked the sense of my hon. friend from Simcoe in particular among others. But he ought not to be so very particular. Why, this very afternoon he asked the hon. Minister of Public Works to put an item in the estimates of $3,000 for an expenditure at Orillia, and for no other reason than that the Minister of Public Works had paid a visit to Orillia last summer, and that on that occasion my hon. friend had brought all the pretty girls of that town in a deputation to ask him to have a wharf built there. There were no business reasons, but simply this appeal to my hon. colleague who, having French blood in his veins, is very susceptible and could not resist the blandishments of the fair sex of that charming little town. But my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) and the opposition had no fault to find with my hon. colleague for his susceptibility on that occasion. On the contrary they invited the Minister of Public Works to accede to that appeal of the fair maidens of Orillia. I do not think therefore that it lies in the mouth of my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) to blame the Minister of Public Works for following this precedent.

Mr. SPROULE. The tenor of the hon. minister's defence is simply this, that the item was put in last year and the opposition did not object. But at the time there did not happen to be among hon. members on this side any one who knew the locality well enough to express an intelligent opinion on the expenditure, and we accepted it on the strength of the statement of the Minister of Public Works that it was needed. But, this year, we tell him we have the information and that he is not justified in asking for this vote. The only defence he has is that we did not object last year. It may have been wrong, he tells us, but the fact that we did it last year is the reason why we should do it this year.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is a reason for looking into the matter.

Mr. SPROULE. Two wrongs do not make a right. Though, for want of information, we let it pass last year, yet now that we have acquired information we tell him it is wrong. That is a reason why he should refrain from pushing it. He said that an hon. member in this House, who is not now in the House, recommended this vote. And that gentleman went to the country two months afterwards and was defeated. That was not a very strong argument in favour of the expenditure. The hon. gentleman says that he sent an engineer and got a report. If that report justifies the expenditure, why not give it to the House and convince the House that the money should be voted ? The hon. gentleman keeps back the report and tells us to move for it, and it will be brought down. That is, vote the money first and see the report afterwards. We want that report now, so that we may know whether it justifies us in voting this money or not. The very fact that he says he will not spend a dollar of this money until he sends another engineer to report discredits the engineer he sent in the first place.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cardwell). The Minister of Public Works tells us that he was recommended by the late member for the county to build the dock. He laid great stress upon that. I would ask him if he has asked the opinion of the hon. gentleman now representing the county ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cardwell). Does not the hon. gentleman think that the hon. member who now represents the county, now that this thing has been noised abroad, would be able to give valuable suggestions ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman who represents the county never asked me to withdraw the item. I will act in this case as I acted in the Presqu'Isle case. I looked into that matter carefully, and this year I asked to withdraw the vote. If, on investigating this matter, I find that I have been misinformed, I will do what I did in the Presqu'Isle case. More than that, I must not be asked to; more than that, I will not do.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cardwell). Has the present member for the county never made any suggestion on the point ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cardwell). If I do not mistake, I see the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McCreary) standing in the entrance to this chamber. Perhaps he will come in and give his opinion upon this matter.

Mr. GANONG. We have heard from the minister several times that we are as much responsible as are the occupants of the government benches for some of these items. I can only say that if the minister will be frank with us when he attempts to fly his kite, we will acknowledge our responsibility. But a case arose the other night. Last year he had flown a small kite of $15,000; this year he comes with the tail to the kite in the form of an additional $38,000. If the minister wants us to be responsible, let him give us the absolute facts when these items come before us, so that we may know whether we are going to spend $5,000 or $100,000. A vote of $15,000 last year hardly justified him in making a contract for $53,000. But that is what he did. Then he comes to us and says I have thrown this little sop to a supporter of the government, and we want you to ladle out the rest of the money so as to keep this gentleman quiet. The sooner the members of the opposition and the people of the country generally understand this system, the better it will be for all. The hon. minister has been remarkably considerate of one of his friends in the cabinet, the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Mulock). You will remember that the Postmaster General issued a circular, and not only that, but he issued it when the hon. Minister of Public Works was in Europe. This is one of these ill-omened birds that sometimes come home to roost. I have no doubt that the minister has on file the application for this vote. Probably those who made it gave as one of their reasons for making it this circular of the Postmaster General. Perhaps there are other applications of a similar nature on file, and it might be well for the minister to bring them down. It would be interesting to know how many applications have arisen from that circular of the Postmaster General. That circular probably had about as much good effect as the Labour Bureau that we are paying for. The hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) gave a wonderful justification of this vote. That justification was that the hon. member said so, and that was enough. The Postmaster General's circular led to the asking for it, the Minister of Public Works granted it, and the hon. member for South Brant is willing to support it. There has been a considerable exhibition this evening of a sort of weakness of the knees. I have noticed it several times in the case of the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes). He was in a back seat and he partly rose, but dropped back again—his heart failed him. He has come down a seat or two and has tried to get on his feet. I hope he will have strength enough to get up and either defend this vote, or do as he ought to do, move that it would be struck out.

Mr. HOLMES. It is not in my riding.

Mr. INGRAM. I think we need no further evidence than the refusal of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Holmes) to see that this item is not a good one. I wish to point out the dangerous character of the doctrine laid down by the Minister of Public Works when he says that the opposition, by consenting to this item last year, gave up their right to object to it this year. If that is followed up to its logical conclusion, then, every new item that is placed in the estimates should be objected to by the opposition whether they have any knowledge in the matter or not, whether they believe the item to be reasonable or not. As a member of the opposition, I object to taking that stand. I do not think it would be in the interest of the country or in the interest of the members of this House. The course the opposition is taking on this occasion is, in my judgment, the only proper course to take, namely, that if they know of no reasonable objection to an item, then the item should be allowed to pass the House. But if they find there are objections to an item, then they would be neglectful of their duty if they did not rise and object to it. I want to tell the Minister of Public Works that so far as I am concerned, I care not when an item appears in the estimates, if it is ten years hence, and I should be then a member of this House, and it was again submitted to the House, I would take the opportunity of rising in my place and objecting to it.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I wish to say a few words with reference to the statement of the Minister of Public Works as to a duty of the opposition in criticising items which appear in the estimates. I would not have paid much attention to it were it not that I notice that the same argument was used by the Minister of Finance when addressing the electors in one of the Ontario constituencies. He argued that because the opposition had not challenged an item in the estimates by their vote, that therefore they consented to it. A more absurd statement was never made by any minister. Let the Minister of Public Works read the statement of the hon. Joseph Chamberlain when he was criticised in the same direction. He said the government was responsible for every item that was put in the estimates, and that the duty of the opposition was confined to fair criticism. Their duty is, not to divide the House upon an estimate they object to, but to state their objections and leave it there. And yet we are told by the Minister of Finance of this country that because the opposition did not divide the House on an estimate, therefore they consented to it. Let him read the speech of Mr. Chamberlain where he shows the absurdity of such an argument, let him read the speeches of leading statesmen in England on the same subject, and he will find that they hold the principle that the duty of an opposition is merely criticism, not to divide the House on an item, but to leave the entire responsibility with the government who propose it. If we do not divide the House upon it, that is no reason why we should be accused of supporting the vote. The Prime Minister says we may as well have a division at once upon the subject. Let me answer that we do not divide the House in committee where the votes are not registered.

The PRIME MINISTER. One of the hon. gentleman's friends has just moved to have the vote struck out.

Mr. INGRAM.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I have not heard anything of the kind.

The PRIME MINISTER. The member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) just moved it.

Mr. GANONG. No.

The PRIME MINISTER. I beg his pardon then, I misunderstood him.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. We do not divide the House where the votes are not registered, as it would be useless to do so. Our opposition is not so much for the purpose of influencing the government as for the purpose of influencing the country, because we know we are in a minority in this House, and when we divide the House we want our votes to appear to the public throughout the Dominion to show whether we support an item or not. The Minister of Public Works taunts the opposition with having made no objection to the vote last year. The position we ocupy as a party is that for every item in the estimates the government of the day are responsible, and that our functions are confined to criticising an item we object to. That is the principle laid down by English statesmen, as I have just mentioned.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I fully agree with the constitutional views which the hon. member for Lanark has just expressed. Let the hon. gentleman understand me well. I stated that last year there was no opposition to this item, but in saying that I did not mean to argue that our friends opposite have no right to oppose the item this year. But I say that having raised no opposition last year, it is too late for them to expect that I will withdraw the item now when, for the first time they raise an opposition.

Mr. INGRAM. You have not spent a dollar yet.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Let our friends opposite understand me well. They did not oppose this item last year, and they have not since then shown sufficient reason to induce me to withdraw it this year. I quite understand that the opposition have every right to criticise the items in the estimates, whether they were placed there last year or this year. When the Minister of Finance argued in the country that the opposition consented to votes by not dividing the House upon them, he meant to convey the idea, which is a true one, that the opposition are every day asking us to spend money for public works in their ridings; still, when they discuss the Budget, either in the House or in the country, they complain that we are spending too much. I claim that they are not fair, and that the Minister of Finance was perfectly right in saying what he did.

Mr. SHERRITT. I am perfectly satisfied that if the minister will go down and look over this place as he has promised to do, he will be convinced that the proposed expenditure is not a proper one to make. I understood him to say there was a lot of land available that could be got for settlers. That is true in a sense, but the country is an old settled country. I think land there is worth $40 an acre. There is no wild land there available for settlers. I wish the Chairman was in a position to rise and give us his opinion upon this proposition. The country has been settled ever since I was a boy. The farmers own, perhaps, five or six acres of timber each. I am perfectly satisfied that if the minister goes down there and examines the situation he will be convinced that he has been misled, and he will not spend this money, because I think the hon. gentleman will not break faith with the House nor go back on his promise. I wish to say now, in answer to the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd), that I think he was a little too harsh in accusing me of making statements that are not absolutely correct. I feel that my actions in the House do not justify him in making such a statement as that about me. I have not taken up very much of the time of the House.

Mr. HEYD. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sherritt) thinks that I made a reflection upon anything he said, I can assure him that such was very far from my intention. I have not the slightest doubt but that everything he said was true in connection with this matter.

Mr. SHERRITT. I am glad to accept that apology, but I can tell the hon. gentleman that I am in a position to know a little of what I am talking about. There are some questions in reference to this matter, particularly as to the number of people there, that I do not feel inclined to answer, but I make this statement that a few years ago this locality was an open field used for farming purposes. A gentleman came there and started a summer hotel, and commenced the erection of some other buildings. There are a number of proposed buildings with nothing but the foundations completed. This gentleman undertook to make a city, but he failed in that effort and the hotel stands there to-day unfinished. There is no business man in that part of the country but considers that the time is coming when the hotel will be torn down and the brick used for the erection of bank barns. It is an agricultural country. There is not a tree near the place to provide the shade necessary for a summer resort. It has been suggested that this gentleman is going to bring trees there and make a grove. This man has failed to do as he contemplated, and he comes with a deputation to the minister. I know if the hon. minister goes down there and examines the place for himself he will return to this House and say that he will not go on with this expenditure. The late Mr. McMillan has been referred to, a gentleman that I knew for many years, and one in whom I have had every confidence. If it is in accordance with the rules of the House, I would like the hon. Minister of Public Works to bring down the letter which he says he received from the late Mr. McMillan and show it to the House because, having every confidence in the late Mr. McMillan, I cannot believe that he ever considered this a proper place in which to spend money for the making of a harbour. I hope, if it is not contrary to the rules of the House, the hon. minister will have that letter brought down that we may have an opportunity of reading it.

Toronto harbour—works at eastern entrance, &c., $8,090.

Mr. OSLER. The vote in the estimates for Toronto harbour is rather infinitesimal when we consider the amount we have just been discussing. We have had a vote of $5,000 for a village supposed to contain twenty-five families. Estimating that each of these families contains ten members apiece that would be 250 people, the proportionate vote would be about $5,000,000 for Toronto containing about 250,000 people. While I am a strong objector to spending public money except judiciously, and where it will result for the general good of the community, I do think that the amount the hon. Minister of Public Works and the government have been devoting to the most important harbour in Canada, practically, a harbour where there has been more business done than in any other harbour in the Dominion, is so absurd that there can be only one explanation for it and this explanation appears to be, that, do what they can, the government cannot get supporters of their own returned for Toronto. Perhaps it is unfortunate that Toronto should be such a Conservative city, but the fact remains that practically no public money is being expended on the most important harbour in Canada. I agree, I must say, with the position that the hon. Minister of Public Works has taken in connection with the main expenditure on the harbour that the government should not expend money there until the city of Toronto takes charge of its own drainage. I agree with the hon. minister there entirely. In regard to the question of the straightening of the Don, or preventing the silt which comes down from the Don and is filling up the harbour, it is entirely another matter, and it is one which should be taken charge of by the government. The government should take charge of the silt which comes down from that river and should prevent the harbour from being filled up as it has been with this silt. The money that is voted for the improvement of Toronto harbour is simply absurd.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. If my hon. friend (Mr. Osler) will allow me, I will not enter into a discussion of the question from the standpoint that he has just adopted. This small amount of money is applied for to pay the balance of the contract which is going on. I must have the money to pay it and to erect three groynes that were asked from me the last time I had the pleasure of being in Toronto. As to the larger question it will be discussed in the supplementary estimates. The main estimates contain nothing at all for new works.

Mr. OSLER. All right.

Mr. KEMP. There will be an appropriation in the supplementary estimates for the diversion of the Don river ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. When the supplementary estimates come down my hon. friend (Mr. Kemp) will find whether there is an amount or not. I am not free to say now. I have never given any definite answer to any member of parliament no matter to which side he might belong. The supplementary estimates have not yet been decided upon.

Mr. KEMP. The hour is late, and I do not wish to have the discussion just now, but I want to let the hon. minister know that on the supplementary estimates we desire to have a full discussion of the Toronto harbour and the diversion of the Don.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. BARKER. On this question of the supplementary estimates, I wish to say a word or two in regard to this particular vote. It seems to me very objectionable that estimates should be brought down piecemeal when the minister knows there are going to be supplementary estimates. I think that when a supplementary estimate is intended by the minister the main vote should be postponed until the supplementary estimate is brought down.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It has never been done in that way here.

Mr. BARKER. It may not have been. I do not understand how a body of men can intelligently decide upon whether they will vote any sum whatever when they know a further sum is going to be asked for. The fact that a further sum is likely to be asked for might influence the minds of hon. gentlemen as to whether they would grant any sum at all.

Manitoba—general repairs and improvements to harbour, river and bridge works, $3,000.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is the usual vote.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if he has done anything since last session to improve the mouth of the Mossey river ? He will remember that last session I drew his attention to the fact that there was a bar across the mouth of that river, and that he promised to send an officer to look into the matter. He had a dredge on Lake Manitoba and he proposed to send it up there to do this work.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The chief engineer tells me that he has instructed our resident engineer in Manitoba to make a survey, but he is not sure whether he has received his report or not. We will look into the question, if my hon. friend (Mr. Roche) will be good enough to call at the office we will show him the report if it is there.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). Where is this particular vote to be expended ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. It is a general vote to be expended all over the province.

Columbia river—improvements in narrows between upper and lower Arrow lakes, $10,000.

Mr. SPROULE. What improvements do you intend to make there ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have given a contract for a small dredge to carry on the improvements.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this for a dredge ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Then, the wording of your item is wrong. It speaks of the improvements in the channel.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The best way of making these improvements is to build a dredge there.

Mr. SPROULE. Then you should ask for money to build the dredge. The wording of the item is misleading. I do not think the minister will try to justify that.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I believe it is all right. We are doing the same thing at Lake Temiscamingue. Suppose instead of building a dredge I should buy shovels and things like that to make the improvements. I think I am justified in getting the dredge.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister may be quite justified in building a dredge, but he cannot take the money for that purpose from a vote to improve the channel. The Auditor General would not allow that to pass if he was looking after it, because one of his duties is to see that the money voted by parliament for a specific purpose is spent for that purpose.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I think it is all right. I do not hide anything, I am stating the facts.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not say that you are not stating the facts, but I complain of the impropriety of voting money for one purpose and spending it on another.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no objection to changing the wording of the item if the hon. gentleman wishes. I move to add the words 'to include the building of a dredge.'

Mr. SPROULE. That is all right then.

Item, as amended, agreed to.

Skeena river, $7,500.

Mr. SPROULE. What are you doing on the Skeena river ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. This is one of the great salmon rivers and there is a great deal of trade there, and we are removing snags and obstacles of all kinds.

Mr. BLAIN. Have you a government dredge in British Columbia ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We have two dredges there ?

Mr. BLAIN. Do you use these dredges on that work ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. We do not always use dredges; we use implements of all kinds to do the work.

Dredge vessels—repairs, $30,000.

Mr. SPROULE. There is over half a million dollars involved in the item before the House, and I would suggest that you do not go on with it to-night, as some of our friends may have something to say about it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no objection to that.

Some resolutions reported.

On motion of the Minister of Public Works, House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 7) An Act respecting the Canada Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Ingram.

On section 1.

Mr. SPROULE. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the points for the commencement and termination of these branches should be more definitely set forth in the Bill. Is there not an additional clause to be proposed covering this point?

Mr. INGRAM. I may explain that the Bill was laid over for a time in order to allow opportunity for full consideration. It was taken up at a time, when, I believe, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) was absent, and passed in its present form by the unanimous vote of the committee.

Mr. CHARLTON. It was explained that the Canada Southern Railway Company were unable to fix definitely the terminal points of their proposed branches on the Niagara river, because bridges which it was designed to use had not yet been located. One is expected to cross at Grand Island, and another to be built in the neighbourhood of Queenston. The branches will not be constructed until the bridges are located, and, in the meantime, they cannot define the point exactly to which the lines are intended to run. The description is as definite as it can be made at the present time.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved:

That the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my happy privilege to present to the House to-day another chapter in the continued story of Canada's prosperity. A year ago, when speaking on an occasion similar to this, and congratulating the House on the then happy state of affairs, I expressed the opinion that the country had about reached the crest of the wave of business activity. I did not anticipate any immediate depression or any severe depression at all. What I suggested was that we might look forward to a period of check, a period during which we would not continue the rapid advance of the past—a period of rest after which the Dominion would again go forward by leaps and bounds. Some hon. gentlemen opposite thought that my view was too hopeful. Their observation of the signs of the times led them to believe that we had already entered upon a period of depression. In view of the operations of the year which has since passed and of the present outlook for the future we are able to see that my own anticipations and those of my hon. friends opposite have both been agreeably disappointed. The business condition of the country has proved very satisfactory, better than my own expectations, much better than the less hopeful views of my hon. friends on the other side. In a country so vast as ours, with such varied conditions, it would be too much to expect that every section and every industry would be able to make the same gratifying report of prosperity. But I think I can truly say that during the past few years we have approached as near to that happy condition as could reasonably be hoped for. In nearly all the great branches of industry, the past year has been one of activity and prosperity. In the paramount industry of agriculture, which must long continue to be the very foundation of our prosperity, the results of the year have been most gratifying, especially in Manitoba and the North-west Territories, where increased acreage under cultivation and a most bountiful harvest gave us vast stores of grain which have taxed our facilities of transportation to the utmost, and warned us that larger provision must be made for the handling of the treasures of the great west.

The one disappointing feature of the year's affairs has been the census returns, which show a growth of population somewhat less than many had hoped for. But while these returns are for the moment disappointing, they are by no means discouraging. It is well known that during the first part of the ten years term there was comparatively little development of our country. But for the last five years Canada has been making very rapid advance. If it were possible to discriminate in the census between the two periods, it would probably be seen that practically the whole increase of population has taken place within the last five years, and viewed in that light the returns are encouraging. Fortunately, the condition of Canada in recent years has been such that no statistics have been needed to prove its progress. The activity that has prevailed in all parts of the Dominion, the large enterprises that have been undertaken, the continued demand for labour—all these prove beyond question that Canada has recently been developing rapidly and give us every reason to believe that when the next census is taken the result will be satisfactory.

From the financial point of view, Mr. Speaker, the results of the year were exceedingly satisfactory. We had a revenue of $52,514,701.13, a little less than my anticipations, but considerably greater than the revenue of the previous year. It will be interesting to know that this increase in revenue comes to us from all the different classes into which we divide our receipts, as appears by the following statement:

These increases are all interesting, but some of them are worthy of special note. The excise duties are always interesting, not only because of the amount of duty involved in them, but because they show the consumption of certain articles which enlist a good deal of attention in the country. Whether or not it will be gratifying to make the statement, the fact must be stated that there has been an increase during the year in the receipts in all branches of the excise duties, as appears from this table:

I give these figures because, as I have stated, the growth of trade in these articles is always a matter of interest, whether or not it meets with general approval. There are one or two other items in the revenue which are worthy of special note. I think my hon. friend the Postmaster General has reason to congratulate himself on the state of the post office revenue. There was an increase of $235,969.77 in the revenue of that department. The post office receipts as shown in the books of the Finance Department amounted to $3,441,504.93. The expenditure, by the same account, was $3,939,446.01, showing a deficit of $489,941.08, according to the books of the Finance Department. My hon. friend the Postmaster General has in his own report drawn attention to the different services performed as compared with the services of former years, and in that light has made out a more favourable statement. But I give the figures as they appear in the books of the Finance Department, and they represent a deficit for the year of $489,941.08. It is of course quite a large sum; but when we remember that only a few years ago the deficits of the Post Office Department were $700,000 and $800,000 per annum, if there was nothing else to explain the matter, this reduction down to $489,000 would be a remarkable reduction on which my hon. friend the Postmaster General might well congratulate himself. But when we are able to go further and show that in the meantime my hon. friend has more than cut the English postage in two, and that he has reduced the Canadian postage one-third, that he has practically cut off what somebody else has described as a million dollars in the charges upon the people, and still has reduced the deficit from $700,000 and $800,000 to $489,000, I think it will be agreed that this is a very gratifying statement, and in the highest degree creditable to the government, and especially to the minister in charge of that department.

I am glad to be able to say that the post office returns for the present year indicate that we shall have at the next Budget a still more gratifying statement to make concerning that department. I find that for the eight months of the present fiscal year the sales of stamps, which of course is the chief source of revenue, have amounted to $3,172,931. Last year for the corresponding period they were $2,909,128. In 1898, before the reduction of postage, the receipts for eight months were $2,946,513. So that to-day, with a three cent rate reduced to two cents, and with the English rate reduced from five cents to two cents, we are able to show receipts in the eight months of $3,172,000, against $2,946,000 when the higher rate prevailed. Looking at the operations of the present eight months in another form, the increased expenditure of the Post Office Department during these eight months amounts to $45,000; but the increased revenue for these eight months amounts to $260,000 ; so that in the operations of these eight months the Post Office Department shows a betterment of $215,000. I have every reason to anticipate that when the Postmaster General prepares his next report he will have a very gratifying statement to present indeed.

Then, Sir, I think the receipts from railways are worthy of special notice. We hear very much about the expenditures on railways, because our outlay has been large. We hear very much of a deficit on railways when one occurs; but we are sometimes apt to overlook the large increase which has taken place in the receipts of those roads. I find that in 1896 the receipts for railways were $3,140,678.47; last year, the receipts were $5,213,381.24, an increase in five years of $2,072,702.77. So that if my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals makes large demands upon us, he is at all events able to show that we receive very large returns for them. In connection with the statement of last year, I would invite attention also to the operations of the railways for a period of seven months, as we have only returns to the end of January. I find that for the seven months of last year there was a loss on the operation of the Intercolonial Railway of $537,479.40. But in the corresponding period of seven months in this year the loss on the Intercolonial Railway operation is only $89,787.17, which would seem to indicate that at the close of the present fiscal year my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals will have a fairly satisfactory statement to present as against the one for the past year, which showed a deficit of $488,000.

Our expenditure on consolidated fund for the year past was $46,866,367.84, as against, in the previous year, $42,975,279.51, showing an increase in expenditure on consolidated fund for the year of $3,891,088.33.

There have been some increases in many of the departments. In legislation there was an increase of $342,424 an item due to circumstances which are probably generally understood. In arts, agriculture and statistics, which includes the census, there was an increase of $235,645. In militia there was an increase of $215,495 ; in railways and canals, collection—that is the working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway—there was an increase of $1,133,660 but, as I have shown before, that outlay comes back by way of increased receipts. In public works there was a large increase of $1,096,743 ; in the government of the North-west Territories $150,177 and in the the post office department $173,431, which, however, comes back to us, as I have already shown, very handsomely.

I have prepared a statement of comparison for the two years showing the expenditure on the consolidated fund account and several items which make up what are called capital and special charges. The word 'capital' is used in the books of the department in a technical sense. It refers to a certain class of works. There are certain others which are nominally not capital charges but which are really special charges, as railway subsidies, for example. They do not appear as capital charges, but special charges. But for the purpose of our discussion these may all be called capital charges inasmuch as they are not charges to income. This comparison shows that on consolidated fund as I have already stated, there was an increase of $3,891,088.33. For railways, on capital account, there was an expenditure in 1901, of $3,914,010.50, an increase of $605,116.19 ; for canals, $2,360,569.89 ; a decrease of $278,995.04 ; public works, $1,006,983.39 ; a decrease of $82,843.90 ; Dominion lands, $269,060.90, an increase of $69,590,81 ; militia, $135,884,79, a decrease of $94,965.72 ; and Canadian Pacific Railway, a small item of $8,978.87, an increase of $8,742.76. The total expenditure for the year 1900-1 was $7,695,488.34, showing an increase of $226,645.10. Then there are the special expenditures that I have described, as follows : Railway subsidies, $2,512,328.86 as against $725,720.35 for 1899-1900, an increase in that item alone of $1,786,608.51. For the South African war and Halifax garrison we spent $908,681.42, which shows a decrease of $638,942.32. If we take the total capital and special expenditures, which, practically we treat as capital in our discussions, we find that the expenditure was in 1901, $11,116,498.62 against $9,742,187.33, an increase under these heads of $1,374,311.29. If we take the aggregate expenditures, that is consolidated fund, capital, special and all classes, the total expenditure for the year 1900-1 was $57,982,866.46, an increase in the total expenditures of all classes of $5,265,399.62.

It will be noticed that the largest item of increase in this statement is on account of railway subsidies. As I have pointed out we spent last year $2,512,328.86 on railway subsidies as against $725,720.35 in the previous year. It may be interesting that I should place in the budget a statement of these various railways which received this large amount of money. It is as follows:

I come now to the question of the public debt. The net debt on the 30th of June, 1901, was $268,480,003.69, while the corresponding debt of the preceding year was $265,493,806.89, making an increase in the net debt of $2,986,196.80. I have here a statement of the increase in the net debt for several years and I find in going over the items of the net debt, the increases for each year and the decrease which occurred in one year, we have this result, that in five years the net increase of the debt has been $9,982,570.92, being an average of $1,996,514.18 as against an average for the previous eighteen years of $6,563,075. The increase in the net debt is accounted for in the following manner: Capital expenditure on railways and canals, public works, including Canadian Pacific Railway, $7,290,542.65; Dominion lands, $269,060.90; militia, $135,884.79; railway subsidies, $2,512,328.86; South African contingent and Halifax garrison, $908,681.42, making a total of $11,116,498.62. Deduct from this the surplus of $5,648,333.29, sinking fund $2,480,336.90 and a small refund in connection with the North-west Territory Rebellion of $1,631.63, or a deduction altogether of $8,130,301.82, and there is an increase in the net debt of $2,986,196.80.

I have spoken in this statement of the surplus received during the past year amounting to $5,648,333.29. I am sure it will be gratifying to know that we are able from year to year to present these statements of satisfactory surpluses. I am aware that there is some criticism on this subject from year to year as to whether or not we do present a surplus. There was a tendency to represent that there was some change in the methods of keeping the accounts, and that the surplus that we represented was somewhat different from the surpluses of former years. That contention has now been abandoned because we have shown from time to time that there has been no change in the method of keeping the accounts. The methods are the same, the officials who keep the accounts are the same, and when we show a surplus in the public accounts we reach it in precisely the same manner as in former years.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the iron bounties which are now charged to capital ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That cannot affect the question of the debt in any way at all.

Mr. SPROULE. You are talking about a surplus ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The iron bounties have hitherto amounted each year to a comparatively small sum. I presented to the House last year, the reasons why we are now proposing to charge the iron bounties to capital. Let me tell my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) that as respects the operations of the past year which I am speaking of, we had not begun to charge these bounties to capital, but the old method continued. I think, however, that this old method was a very mistaken one. I impute nothing but the best of motives to the gentlemen who preceded me in charge of the department. What they did was to treat these iron bounties as a drawback, and to be paid as such by the Customs Department. I do not see how you can pay a drawback when no money has been paid into the revenue, and I think the idea of treating this as a drawback and simply deducting it from the customs duty, and making the customs duty appear a good deal less than it really was, was a mistake. From the 1st of July last, we have changed that method. But up to that date and covering the period of which I am now speaking, as regards the surpluses, we continued the old method, and therefore the suggestion of my hon. friend is not important.

As I have said, some hon. gentlemen have made the criticism that these surpluses were brought about by some peculiar method of bookkeeping, but more recently I have noticed in some of the papers, a tendency to argue that even if the method was an old one, it was a bad one, and we had better get rid of it altogether. I entirely dissent from that. I think, in a country like Canada, we shall always, certainly for a long time, require for the construction of public works and things of that kind, special sums of money which cannot be obtained from the ordinary revenue, and there is every reason in the world why these should be charged to capital account. There is just the same reason that would obtain with a man in his private affairs. If a man were paying rent he would charge the rent against the income for the year, but if he bought a house he would not expect to charge it against income, but would open a special account and make some provision for paying for the house. What is fair with the individual is fair with regard to the affairs of the nation. There is a proper distinction between the ordinary expenses of the government and special expenses for public works, or some special or exceptional charge which should be set apart and treated in a different way. I am therefore defending not only my own method, but I am defending the method of all the illustrious men who have preceded me in the Department of Finance when I claim that this is a proper distinction to make and a proper way to treat the accounts.

Having thus shown, as I hope I have, that that method is correct, and that we have had surpluses just precisely as our opponents in some cases had them, I now invite your attention to this record of surpluses.

For the first year of this government, we had a deficit of $519,981.44; but the next year we entered upon the era of surpluses which is not yet ended. The following table will show the surpluses for each year from 1897 down to the present:

	Surplus.	Deficit.
	$ cts.	$ cts.
1896-7		519,981 44

For the 18 years 1st July, 1878, to 30th June, 1896, the total surpluses were	$27,862,361 68
And total deficits	18,060,648 55
Leaving net surplus	$ 9,801,713 13
Or an average of	544,539 61

For the eighteen years from the 1st of July, 1878, to the 30th of June, 1896, the total surpluses were $27,862,361.68, and the total deficits for these eighteen years amounted to $18,060,648.55. Deducting the deficits from the surpluses we find that during these eighteen years the gentlemen then managing the public affairs had a net surplus of $9,801,713.13, or an average surplus per year of $554,539.61; while we have had an average yearly surplus during our term of office, amounting to $3,948,705.53.

Hitherto I have spoken of the financial affairs of the past year. Coming now to the affairs of the current year; there is a considerable increase in the revenue and a corresponding increase in the expenditure.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friends say 'Hear, hear.' Well, we are lucky people when we can make the two go hand in hand. We have received for the current year to the 10th of March, this present month as revenue $38,047,685.82. Having regard to the receipts of the corresponding period a year ago; to the amount which was received from this date to the end of that fiscal year, and to the anticipation in which I indulge that there will be some increase; I am of opinion that we shall have at the close of this current year a revenue of $56,800,000 (in round numbers) as against an actual revenue last year of $52,514,701. There will thus be a probable increase in our revenue this year to the amount of $4,285,298.

Now with regard to the expenditure. We have expended this year up to the 10th of March, $30,133,502.76; and taking into account the amount which we expended last year from this date to the 30th of June, and making allowances for a probable increase during the present year—because there will be some increase—I am of opinion that at the close of the year we shall have an expenditure in all, probably of nearly $51,000,000 in round numbers. I make it a shade below that, but for convenience we may call it $51,000,000. That will be an increase in the expenditure, over the expenditure on consolidated account for the past year, of $4,133,632. It will be observed that I estimate an increase of revenue of $4,285,298, and an increase of expenditure of $4,133,632. The two sums would nearly balance one another. If they exactly balanced one another they would leave us with the same surplus as last year, namely, $5,648,333; but as the increase of revenue is a little more than the increase of expenditure, I think I am warranted in saying that the surplus for the current year will be a little larger than that of last year and will amount to $5,800,000.

As to the capital expenditure of the present year, it is exceptionally large; the largest we have had for some years. I anticipate that at the close of the year, we shall have a charge for capital and special expenditure of $14,250,000, as against $11,116,000 last year.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I got the estimated expenditure as $51,000,000 in round numbers; is that right?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That is correct. We have this year very special charges to swell the capital account. Our railway subsidies will be considerable, as they were last year. The House is aware that railway operations have been going on throughout the Dominion pretty largely. We shall have to pay for bounties this year, chargeable for the first time to capital account, about $700,000. There are large sums chargeable to capital for the equipment of the Intercolonial Railway with rolling stock and with new rails. There are large sums for transportation in the Public Works Department. There is a very considerable sum amounting to $950,000, representing the awards to two provinces on certain questions which were dealt with last session. For these and other expenditures we shall have, as I have already stated, a total of about $14,000,000 on capital account; and the result will be that we shall be obliged to make this year a larger addition to our public debt than we have done in any previous year in the history of this government.

Mr. SPROULE. Notwithstanding the surpluses.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Notwithstanding the surpluses. On that point I am going to endeavour to satisfy my hon. friend that we have a most admirable record; and if, by and by, in the dim and distant future, he is to stand in my place, and shall be as lucky as I am, and I should be on the other side of the House, I will congratulate him from the bottom of my heart.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. A gross expenditure of $65,250,000 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. About that. The amount which I anticipate we shall have to add to the debt of the Dominion for the current year will be close upon $6,000,000. This will be, as I have stated, the largest addition to the public debt under the present administration, and will be almost in line with, though a shade above, the addition made to the public debt in the last year of the late government, when the addition was $5,422,000. You see it has taken us five years to catch up to them in that one matter. But even with this large increase to the public debt for the current year, we shall still be able to present a very gratifying statement, as to the average annual increase to the public debt—and hon. gentlemen opposite are much fonder of averages than we are.

Mr. WILSON. Will you average the income ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, we ought to be very glad to know that under a tariff which takes out of the pockets of the people $4,000,000 a year less than the old tariff would, if it had remained in operation—under a tariff which has been reduced so much that hon. gentlemen opposite complain that our taxation is too low—we are still in the happy position of having a largely increased income. Even with this considerable addition to the public debt of the current year, we shall have a very satisfactory statement of averages to present; for when we have added the $6,000,000, if it shall prove to be that, to the public debt this year, we shall have made an average yearly increase of $2,793,000, as against $6,563,000 for all the years of our predecessors.

Now, in a country like Canada, I think that about all we could be expected to do would be to provide out of taxation for our ordinary expenditure; and if perchance we needed important works of a permanent character, or if there were some exceptional charge, such as bounties, railway subsidies, or the South African war, it would not be entirely wrong if we were to charge every penny of the cost to the public debt. A young country like Canada might be placed in that position without being regarded as going behind. But if she is able to do something better than that, if she is able to provide not only for her ordinary expenditure but also for a considerable part of her capital expenditure out of the revenue, then she makes a very fair showing. I have prepared a statement for the purpose of showing what these capital and special charges have been. I am taking periods of six years, from 1879 to 1884, from 1885 to 1890, from 1891 to 1896, and from 1897 to 1902. My object is to ascertain what were these capital or special charges in each of these terms, and what proportion of them was borne out of revenue, and what proportion passed into the public debt. I find that in the first period, from 1879 to 1884, these capital and special expenditures amounted to $72,339,172, of which $41,799,780 was added to the public debt; so that the government of that day were able to provide for these capital and special charges out of revenue to the extent of 42 per cent. In the next period, from 1885 to 1890, these capital and special charges amounted to $63,520,739, and during that period there was added to the public debt $55,371,361, showing that in that period only 13 per cent of these capital charges was paid out of revenue, and all the rest was added to the public debt. In the period from 1891 to 1896, $31,306,340 was expended on these capital and special charges, of which $20,964,221 was added to the public debt; in other words 33 per cent of these charges was paid out of revenue and the balance was added to the public debt. In the last six years, from 1897 to 1902, assuming that we spend the amount on capital which I estimate, and add to the public debt $6,000,000, at the close of this year we shall have spent $55,872,572 on these capital and special charges above ordinary expenditure, and we shall have added to the public debt only $15,982,570; so that we shall have provided for these capital and special expenditures out of revenue to the extent of no less that 71 per cent.

* Estimated.

With respect to the year which will begin on the first of July next, it is much too early to attempt anything like close calculations. I see no reason why we should not look forward to a very hopeful year. If I may use the words of Mr. Clouston, the president of the Canadian Bankers' Association, all the outward and visible signs still indicate that we are in prosperous times. Still, much will depend on the harvest for the coming year, and it is too far away for us to make any guess about that. If we should be so fortunate as to have in the North-west another harvest such as that of last season, and if the general conditions of Canada continue as they have been, we shall indeed have the greatest year in Canada's history. I think we may look forward hopefully, at the same time not counting too much on those things which are still in the future; and if a change should come, owing to a bad harvest or anything of that sort, it will be our duty to observe the signs of the times, and limit our expenditure accordingly.

The buoyancy of our revenues has enabled us to carry on our large operations for some years without the issue of loans in the public money market. In the year 1897 I obtained from parliament authority for the issue of a loan of $15,000,000. There was at the time a considerable outstanding borrowing power. Thus at the close of that session I had authority to raise loans to quite a large amount. So hopeful, however, did I feel as to the financial prospects of the Dominion that I concluded to use the borrowing power in a very moderate way. The loan which I placed on the London market in the autumn of 1897 was for £2,000,000, or a little under $10,000,000. No public loan has since been issued. Our surplus revenues helped us to bear a large part of our capital and special expenditure, and when these proved insufficient occasional temporary loans were obtained from the banks. We have now a considerable temporary loan of this character, and having regard to the need of providing for it and for old loans which will shortly mature in London, it is evident that we shall at no distant date have occasion to offer an issue of our securities to the public. Whether we shall do this during the present calendar year, or postpone it until next year, when a considerable sum of the existing loans matures, is a point which will have to be considered a little later, in accordance with the condition and prospects of the money market. We shall have to ask parliament for authority for these loans, to be used when required.

The existing temporary loan which I have referred to, amounts to £1,250,000, or a little over $6,000,000. This loan, which will mature on the 1st of July next, bears interest at a shade above 3¼ per cent, which, having regard to the conditions of the money market for some months past, is a reasonable rate.

If we find it necessary to go on the London money market this year, I have no doubt that we shall be able to go under very favourable conditions, though not exactly as favourable as those of five years ago. At that time we were lucky in striking the happy moment when we were able to negotiate a 2½ per cent loan. I am afraid that the present conditions of the money market are not as favourable as they were then. If we may judge by making a comparison of the rates of Canadian securities with those of English consols, we find that at the time our loan was placed on the market in 1897 there was a very broad difference between the two; but owing to the high position Canada has attained in the eyes of the world, and especially to the change brought about by the admission of Canadian securities to the English trustee list, Canadian securities have come much nearer to English consols, although the quotations for our securities are lower than they were a few years ago. So that if this is a fair test of credit, the credit of Canada has improved to a very appreciable degree; and I have no doubt that when the moment comes, we shall be able to obtain our loan on favourable and reasonable terms. I have stated the amount of the temporary loan. Perhaps it would be convenient if I were to state also the amount of the loans which are likely to mature in a short time. For the sake of convenience I have made a statement—which, of course, can be obtained from the Public Accounts in more detail—of the loans maturing within the next three years :

In the Budget last year I presented in some detail—possibly with tedious detail—some statistics showing the wonderful growth of the trade of Canada. I do not intend to go into that so fully to-day, but simply to remind the House that gratifying as was the report for 1900 we are able to show in the year following an advance beyond the figures of that date, which is an evidence that Canada is indeed prosperous. I propose to give a very few figures, making a comparison between the business of 1901 and that of 1900 :

These figures briefly recount the great advance indeed in 1901 over the year 1900. I have at hand a statement of the trade of the past eight months of the current year, and it is pleasing to see that that also continues favourable:

Thus the statement for the eight months goes to show that the indications for business during the current year are so far exceedingly good, and I see no reason why we should not look forward to a continuance of good business.

A feature which deserves a passing remark is the gratifying increase reported by the Department of the Interior with regard to the immigration. Not only from the old country is there a moderate increase, but a new feature has been introduced of late in the very large increase of immigration from the United States. Some portion of this, no doubt, is made up of Canadians coming back, while the others are people who have been settled in the United States for years and who are now coming across the line. I need hardly say that they are the most desirable class of immigrants, and we ought to feel pleased that so many are casting in their lot with us. From the returns of immigration, from the returns of homestead entries, from the returns of sales of land by the railway companies, from the recent announcement that the price is advancing of private lands throughout the North-west, we are led to the conclusion that, at last, the great work of filling up the North-west has begun in earnest. There is reason to believe that we may look forward to a splendid development of that great territory during the next few years.

There has been much discussion of late about the operation of our tariff as respects imports from Great Britain and the United States. Leaving out of consideration the question of free goods, it has been represented that on the dutiable goods imported the average rate of duty has actually been higher on British goods than on American. This statement of the average duties, even if correct, may be so presented as to be somewhat misleading. If you buy from England a quantity of fine goods on which the duties are considerable, and from the United States a quantity of goods of another class on which the duties are low, you may strike an average which will seem to show that the duties on British goods are higher. But if the comparison be made of the duties in any one class of goods, the result will be quite different. No figures of this kind respecting averages can shut out from view the simple fact that there are no duties on British goods higher than on American, and that with the exception of a few articles which are excluded from the preference the duties on all British imports are just one-third less than on similar goods from the United States. As a matter of fact, however, the statements respecting the levying of higher average duties on British than on American dutiable imports appear to be inaccurate. By referring to the Trade and Commerce Report (part 1, page 15) it will be found that the average rate of duty on British dutiable goods last year was 24·74, while the average rate on American dutiable goods was 24·83. The fractional difference, therefore, was in favour of Great Britain. Practically, however, on the business of last year the two average rates were the same. How does this compare with previous conditions? One would assume from some of the criticisms that have been offered that the previous tariff bore more lightly on British as compared with American goods. But what are the facts? In the year 1896, under the tariff of the late government, the average duty on dutiable imports from the United States was 26·69. In the same year the average duty on British dutiable imports was 30·20, showing a difference against Great Britain of nearly 4 per cent. Thus, even taking the averages, it will be seen that under the operation of our tariff a discrimination of about 4 per cent against Great Britain has been wiped out, until now there is a small difference in favour of Great Britain. But a closer examination shows still more clearly how the present tariff has operated favourably to British trade. The British preference does not apply to all goods. By general consent it has been deemed well to exclude certain articles such as wines, spirits and tobacco from the benefit of the preference. Leaving out these non-preference articles and comparing imports of British dutiable goods with imports of American dutiable goods—that is to say, taking into consideration all the articles to which the British preference applies—I find that while the average duty on American goods is over 24½ per cent, the average duty on British goods is only a shade above 21 per cent.

If any importance is to be attached to this question of the relative duty on British and American dutiable goods, it is well that we should have the facts and figures clearly stated.

As bearing upon this question, I desire to draw attention to the figures with regard to our increased trade with Great Britain. It is not quite clear to me, by the way, whether some of my hon. friends opposite regard an increase of trade with Great Britain as desirable or not. Therefore, the application of these figures is somewhat difficult. Some hon. gentlemen profess to view an increase of trade with Great Britain favourably, while others think we ought not to buy so much from Great Britain. However that may be, it is undoubtedly the case that we expected that our trade with Great Britain would be increased under the preferential tariff. I have here the figures showing the imports:

Trade with Great Britain. Imports for consumption—merchandise only, dutiable and free.

1895	$31,059,332
1896	32,824,505
1897	29,401,188
1898	32,043,461
1899	36,931,323
1900	44,279,983
1901	42,819,995

Now, it will be observed that, under the old tariff, from 1895 to 1897, the imports from Great Britain decreased. Under the new tariff, they began to increase and ran up to over $44,000,000. And, although last year, they dropped a little, they are far and away above any figures that could be quoted of any time under the old tariff. But, my hon. friends opposite may not attach much importance to the imports. Then, perhaps, they will consider the exports. I will give first the exports of goods produced in Canada :

Exports of Home Produce to Great Britain.

1895	$57,903,564
1896	62,717,941
1897	69,533,852
1898	93,065,019
1899	85,113,681
1900	96,562,875
1901	92,857,525

But, if we consider both home and foreign products, the figures of our exports are as follows :

Exports to Great Britain, Home and Foreign Products.

1895	$ 61,856,990
1896	66,689,253
1897	77,227,502
1898	104,998,818
1899	99,086,981
1900	107,735,968
1901	105,328,956

So, thus far, our trade with Great Britain has enormously increased since the adoption of the preferential tariff.

Mr. SPROULE. Can the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) give us the figures with regard to the United States ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I believe my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) asked that exact question at this exact moment last year. I should have remembered that and brought the figures.

Mr. SPROULE. Let me say that I never asked the question in this House before. It may be that the late Mr. Wallace, then representing West York asked it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. And my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is that gentleman's worthy successor in several respects. I have not the figures here. But we know that the imports from the United States increased. We know that the trade with the whole world has increased.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We cannot help it, Sir, trade in all directions is increasing under the rule of this beneficent government.

Mr. MACLEAN. We got that information from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton).

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then, why does my hon. friend want it again ? What are we wasting time for ?

Mr. MACLEAN. We hope that the Minister of Finance has profited by it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. member for North Norfolk brought forward the fact prominently. I regret that it has not made a deeper impression on hon. gentlemen opposite. This question of how far the imports from Great Britain have been affected by our preferential tariff has been more or less, a matter of debate. I remember that, in the last session of the British parliament, that distinguished statesman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, in the debate on the sugar duties, during which reference was made to the Canadian preference, said, in terms very gratifying to all Canadians, that, while they appreciated very much the step that Canada had taken, the value was to be looked for, more in the good feeling that had been manifested than in the material results to trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friends opposite say : Hear, hear. I suppose they think likewise, and if they think likewise, what becomes of the statements that have been made for some time now that the increased imports under the preferential tariff are destroying some of the factories of Canada ? I am afraid my hon. friends are trying to blow hot and cold on that matter. I cannot find out whether they want that trade to increase or not. At one moment they complain the trade is not increasing under out preference, you will find a column of statistics in the Conservative papers designed to prove that there has been no increase at all, and the next thing we are told is that the preference is ruining the factories of Canada. However, coming back to my friend, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, I felt at the time that the statement, while made in good faith and made in terms which will be pleasing to all Canadians, was based upon a misconception of the situation. In the first place, the actual increase of trade as shown by the figures I have given, is very considerable. Then there is another point to which I fear Sir Michael's attention had not been drawn. In view of the severe competition which is now going on between the United States and other manufacturing nations, if, with the preference of one-third in favour of Great Britain, we have only been able to increase British imports to a small amount, what would have happened to the trade if there had been no preference at all ? Sir, I have no doubt in the world that but for the British preference, that advance in the imports from Great Britain would not have existed at all, there would not have been any increase in the imports from Great Britain. There is not much doubt but that, without the change this government made in the tariff, the imports from Great Britain would have continued to drop as they did from the year 1895 down to 1897.

There was one incident during the past year which calls for mention in the Budget speech. In the Tariff Act of 1897 there was the following clause :

Section 18. Whenever the Governor in Council has reason to believe that with regard to any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among manufacturers of such article or dealers therein, to unduly enhance the price of such article, or in any way to unduly promote the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, the Governor in Council may commission or empower any judge of the Supreme Court or Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior court in any province of Canada, to inquire in a summary way into and report to the Governor in Council whether such trust, combination, association or agreement exists.

2. The judge may compel the attendance of witnesses and examine them under oath, and require the production of books and papers, and shall have such other necessary powers as are conferred upon him by the Governor in Council for the purpose of any such inquiry.

3. If the judge reports that such trust, combination, association or agreement exists, and if it appears to the Governor in Council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on a like article, when imported, then the Governor in Council should place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty on it as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article.

When the section was first submitted to the House, it provided that the Governor in Council should be the body to determine when the combine existed. On further consideration, however, it was deemed unwise for the government to take to itself so large a power. It was thought that in a matter of so much importance it would be better, even at the cost of some delay, to make use of the judicial machinery for the purpose of inquiry and to limit the authority of the government to action after the report of a judge. In several instances complaints were made to the government under this clause, but upon examination they did not appear to come within the provisions of the section. A few months ago, however, complaint was made by the Canadian Press Association in terms which were found to come within the intention of the section. It was alleged that the manufacturers of news printing paper had formed a combine for the purpose of unfairly enhancing the price of the article. The matter was referred under the provisions of the section to Mr. Justice Taschereau, who held a protracted inquiry, heard all parties concerned, and finally reported that the complaint of the Press Association was well founded. Thereupon, the government, exercising the power given it by the section, determined by Order in Council to reduce the duty on printing paper such as is commonly used for newspaper purposes, from 25 per cent to 15 per cent. To distinguish between news print and other papers, it was decided that the reduction should apply to all printing paper of the value of 2¼ cents per pound or less. That, of course, means not the value in Canada, but the value for customs purposes—the value at the place of production abroad. It has been represented to us that while the purpose of the government will be effected as respects the daily journals, the proprietors of which buy in large quantities, it may not cover the case of the weekly papers, which do not buy in such large quantities. The Press Association is to furnish us with further information on that point, and if it be found that the words used in our Order in Council do not properly effect the object in view, an amendment will have to be made. I have no doubt that the results of this inquiry will be of material advantage to the publishers of the Dominion in the making of their arrangements with the Canadian paper manufacturers. Beyond this immediate result, however, the proceedings are interesting and important, and they will serve to remind other manufacturers that if they make an unfair use of any advantage which is given to them by the tariff, a remedy is open to those who will take proceedings under this section of the Tariff Act.

We have again been approached by a large and influential delegation representing the Ontario Beet Root Sugar Association to ask that a bounty be granted on the production of beet root sugar and a similar application came from Prince Edward Island. A new suggestion is offered by some of the parties connected with the movement, that the industry be encouraged by a considerable increase in the customs duty on sugar. I regret that we are obliged to take an unfavourable view of both these proposals. Sugar is an article of prime necessity, universally used in Canada, and already we have a considerable customs duty. Such an increase of the taxation on sugar as was asked would hardly prove acceptable to the sugar consumers of the Dominion, and should not be adopted without urgent reasons. Nor are we satisfied that even the best interests of the beet sugar industry would be promoted by the granting of the aid that is asked. We have to remember that some years ago Canada undertook to encourage the beet sugar industry by the granting of bounties, and that the results were not satisfactory. The capitalists who invested their money lost it, and everybody concerned in the movement suffered a severe disappointment. Naturally, in the presence of that fact, we should be more than usually careful in entering again upon a policy of granting bounties for this industry.

It is represented that the advantages of the province of Ontario, and I suppose the same will be claimed for other provinces which are raising the question, are much greater than were possessed by the eastern townships for raising beet sugar, and it is also claimed that such an advance has since been made in the manufacture of machinery and in the methods of manufacturing beet root sugar as to ensure the success of the enterprise now. I think there is something in that and that the conditions which exist to-day are such as to give that industry a fair trial if it is naturally adapted to the soil of Canada. Our customs duty, which runs as high as $1.26 per 100 lbs. or a cent and a quarter a lb. on the highest grade of sugar, while it is designed for revenue purposes will provide an incidental protection for beet root sugar produced in the country. The competition from foreign beet sugar is likely to be less keen hereafter as it seems to be settled that the continental bounties on this article,which have so long had a disturbing influence on the world's sugar trade, are about to be abolished. In addition the Ontario government have granted a bounty of half a cent a lb. for two years and of one-quarter of a cent a lb. for the third year, but limited to $75,000 per annum, and I understand that at least three factories are at the present moment in the course of construction in that province. They are certain to go on—one of them is already started—and I am inclined to think that a fourth is in a fair way to being erected. In addition to that the establishment of the industry is no longer problematical but it is a certainty in the North-west Territories. Gentlemen have come in from the south and are erecting a refinery in Lethbridge. With the aid which has been given in the way I have described, with the incidental advantage derived from the customs duty on sugar, with the abolition of the bounties on continental sugar, with the advantage of the Ontario bounty as respects factories in that province, and with the further advantage we have given the beet root sugar industry of the free admission of machinery and structural iron for the purposes of beet root sugar factories, I am inclined to think that there are sufficient inducements to enable the promoters to give the industry a fair trial if it is adapted to the soil of the country. I think it would be a mistake if we were to give further aid which might result in encouraging the erection of a large number of factories which might come to grief. I think it is better to encourage the industry in this moderate way, to have three or four factories in the province of Ontario and one in the North-west Territories established so as to give the industry a fair trial than that we should encourage the starting of factories all over the country which might end in disaster.

Mr. SPROULE. The right to import machinery free of duty will soon end.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It will end on the first day of April, but we propose to extend that for another year. Perhaps I ought to say that there has been some objection on the part of Canadian manufacturers to the granting of this privilege of free admission. They say that this machinery is now largely made in Canada and they do not see why we should go abroad for it. I think, however, that the reason on which our previous action was based a year ago still holds good. The argument then used was that where the promoters of an enterprise of that character wish to make a contract for machinery it is an advantage to them to be able to make a contract with one manufacturer, so that he can take the contract for the whole of the machinery, make it where he pleases, be held responsible and guarantee that the machinery will be sufficient for the successful operation of the factory. We have concluded not to propose any changes in the sugar duties, or any bounty on beet root sugar, but to extend for another year the term in which certain machinery and materials for the erection of beet root factories may be admitted free. This privilege will therefore be extended to the first day of April, 1903.

We do not propose to make any changes in the tariff this session. I do not for a moment claim that the tariff is perfect. I think, that, on the whole, it has proved a very good tariff. Indeed, when we recall the circumstances under which our tariff revision took place, when we remember the very complicated and difficult problem with which we had to deal, we may well congratulate ourselves upon our success in devising a tariff so well adapted to the requirements of the country, a tariff under which Canada has prospered in a greater degree than in any previous period in her history. I have occasionally pointed out the desirability of a reasonable measure of tariff stability. Nothing would be more likely to unsettle business than a practice of introducing frequent tariff changes. Hence, we have resisted applications for many small changs and we think it well to do so to-day. But I would not have it understood that this view can always be held. As time passes, conditions change in our own country and it will be well for us to take note of this, so that we may adjust the tariff accordingly. Nor is that the only reason that might require some change. Conditions arise in other countries of which we are obliged to take account. We do not propose that we shall stand still and that this tariff shall remain unchanged, but we think the time is not opportune for making changes at present.

There are several reasons which operate in our minds against entering upon a policy of tariff changes to-day. We have just completed the taking of a census, and while some of the results are available others of much importance have yet to be prepared. Among these are the returns of the operations of our industries. In considering the tariff in relation to the industries of the country, it is desirable that we should have before us, with ample time for consideration, the industrial statistics of the recent census.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the market gardeners of West York who have been living on promises ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If there are any people who have been living on promises that is what they were accustomed to do for eighteen years and they will find it very easy. A further reason against present change is that we are having certain negotiations with other countries in regard to trade of a more or less formal character. We are not without hope that we will be able to broaden the scope of our treaty with France, though of that I am not in a position to make any definite statement. Much has been said in regard to our relations with Germany. My impression is that there has been a misconception on the part of the German authorities as to the position of Canada. Our position on this question is strong in respect to Germany, but that is no reason why we should ignore the German side of the matter. I admit that there is a colour of excuse for the position which Germany has taken. As I have pointed out on a previous occasion, Germany has two tariffs, one for the world generally, the other, known as the conventional tariff, for those countries which have commercial treaties with Germany. I suppose many hon. gentlemen will say that this is sound policy. Germany had a treaty with Canada, or Canada participated in an imperial treaty with Germany, and under that treaty Canada had the advantage from what is called the conventional tariff as respects Canadian products. Canada put an end to that treaty for her own purposes, for good and sufficient reasons. Not one party in Canada, but all of Canada, reached the conclusion that this treaty was not in the best interests of Canada, or of the empire, and it should come to an end. Our sister colonies took the same view on the subject. But it was admittedly the action of Canada above all others which brought about the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties. When we ceased to have that treaty with Germany, when we ceased to extend to Germany certain privileges which she had enjoyed, Germany withdrew from us the privileges of its conventional tariff. Canada thus came into the class of non-treaty countries, the products of which were subject to the higher tariff. Let us not deny that from one point of view there was some colour of excuse for the German action.

But a more careful examination of the question must lead to the conclusion that the action of Germany, while it might have had an appearance of fairness, was based upon a misconception of the spirit and purpose of Canada's policy. It is true that we have withdrawn from Germany tariff privileges which she formerly enjoyed. But it is necessary to point out that the privileges which Germany lost were not privileges which rightfully belonged to any foreign nation, but privileges which properly belonged to the family circle of the British Empire. Germany might reasonably ask that her products have as fair treatment in our markets as the products of any other foreign country. But she ought not to demand that her products should have the same treatment as the products of our mother country and our sister colonies. Public men in Germany appear to have received the impression that the action of Canada was in some way a discrimination against Germany. Such is not the case. Canada has been quite willing to give to the products of Germany the same treatment as is given to the products of any other foreign nation. That, it seems to us, is all that Germany can reasonably ask. We are inclined to think that the action of Germany has been the result of a misunderstanding of the Canadian policy, and we have therefore been disposed to exercise a large degree of patience in having the matter very clearly put before the German government. We are hopeful that our representation of these facts will in the end bring about a better understanding of the matter. Our trade with Germany is not at present very important to us; although what is called the balance of trade is against us, the value of our exports to that country has been increasing rather than diminishing. Nevertheless, at a time when we are stretching out in all directions for extension of our trade, it is not well to despise the opportunities which might come to us under fairer arrangements with Germany. Besides, the principle involved in Germany's action is important, and on that account, as well as for the possibilities of a larger trade, we should make every effort to have the matter settled in a satisfactory way. There are those who have advocated retaliatory legislation as the only means of settlement. We are hopeful that better results may be obtained by a patient presentation of the facts. Another and stronger reason against immediate changes in our tariff is the present position of our trade relations with the mother country and with our sister colonies. We are about to participate in two important conferences to take place in London. One of these has been called at the suggestion of our government for the special purpose of considering the possibilities of enlarging the trade between Canada, Australia and New Zealand. The other conference is of a broader character and has been called by the Imperial government. The ceremonies attending the coronation of the King will take to London representative public men from all parts of the empire, and the Imperial government desires to avail itself of the opportunity to discuss various matters, including questions of trade and commerce affecting the interests of the empire. Canada will be expected to take an active part in the consideration of these questions, and at the close of these conferences we shall be in possession of a knowledge of the disposition of other portions of the empire which will undoubtedly be valuable to us in the consideration of any proposed tariff changes. I do not underestimate the difficulties in the way of bringing about such trade relations within the empire as are desirable from the Canadian point of view. However, it is our duty to avail ourselves of the opportunity to discuss these matters with the public men of the other parts of the empire and to use every effort to bring about such improved arrangements as would be beneficial to Canada and to the empire.

For these reasons we postpone for the present the question of tariff revision. When the moment for revision arrives, the public of Canada may rest assured that the government will undertake the work in the spirit of moderation and caution that has prevailed in their past actions in tariff affairs, avoiding the extremes which almost always find advocates, and having regard to what is best, not for particular industries or particular sections of the country, but for the interests of the people of the whole Dominion.

The Budget, Mr. Speaker, has friendly relations with the Saints.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was on the morning of St. George's day, five years ago that I had the honour to place on the Table of this House the tariff resolutions containing that principle of British preference which has given so much satisfaction to all who honour St. George and Merrie England. This year our Budget is submitted on Ireland's day of rejoicing. This is St. Patrick's day, and from the topmost roof of our parliament House the British flag flies in honour of this occasion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is something suggestive in the coincidence. It seems to remind us that, gratifying as is the story we are able to tell of the material progress of the Dominion, there is something that is more pleasing still. It is the very harmonious and happy relations which prevail between our people of all sections, classes and creeds. Here in this broad Dominion we have a population drawn from many races and nationalities—English, French, Scotch, Irish, Welsh, German—all cherishing the memories and traditions of their mother lands, and specially honouring them at appropriate times, as the memories of Ireland are honoured to-day, yet all cordially uniting their efforts for the development of this country and for the maintenance of institutions under which all enjoy the priceless blessings of civil and religious liberty.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker. I am afraid that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance is taking too much comfort to himself with regard to the relation of the Budget to the Saints' days, in as much as he intended to deliver his Budget speech last Thursday and I induced him to change his mind and to deliver it on St. Patrick's day.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. But my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) wanted it on Tuesday.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I acquiesced without a moment's hesitation to the suggestion of the Minister of Finance that it should be delivered to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am bound to say that if there is not more consolation for that grand old island across the sea in the matter of public expenditure, than there is for Canada in the Budget speech which the hon. gentleman has presented to-day, Ireland will not have much to comfort herself with.

Before dealing with the main matter in the Budget speech, I wish to make an observation or two about the tariff relations between Canada and Germany. It seems to me remarkably late in the day for the Finance Minister to arrive at the conclusion that the position taken by Canada in this respect should be pressed upon the attention of the German government. For about three years Canada has been excluded from the benefits of the German minimum tariff, and although we on this side had pressed the matter on the attention of this government session after session, the Minister of Finance is only now awakening to the fact that it is desirable to bring the true state of affairs to the attention of the German government. We have been urging upon the hon. gentleman and upon the government for three years past that this matter should be dealt with vigorously and promptly; and though it is somewhat late in the day for the Canadian government to think of taking action, it is better late than never, and I hope our government will move at once.

The Minister of Finance asserted that the census returns are disappointing. They are disappointing to all of us. But when the hon. gentleman asserts that the increase is due entirely to the last five years he asserts that the official statements which have from time to time been presented by the government are absolutely misleading and inaccurate. We all know that the Minister of Finance does not mean anything of the kind, and that it is a mere catch cry to save himself from the position in which he would be placed if we referred to the criticism of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) made ten years ago. But even for the purposes of a catch cry, it is hardly worth while for my hon. friend to descend to a statement which is so far from the true facts as that which he has made to-day. He also referred to the post office deficit of $489,000; but he omitted to tell us that the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), during the election in the year 1900, told us that the Post Office Department would be self-sustaining. That indicated that the hon. Postmaster General was nearly $500,000 out in regard to the revenues and expenses of his own department; and I do not know that it is much of a compliment from the Minister of Finance to the Postmaster General.

Now, I am not going to follow my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, in a great many of the comparative statements he has made. I wish, in the first place, to say a word or two about the general prosperity of this country and of the world. We, as well as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, congratulate, not the government, but the country, on the splendid prosperity which has prevailed throughout Canada during the past year. We are not behindhand in doing our duty in that respect; but when my hon. friend, as well as the hon. gentlemen behind him, seem to suggest that this prosperity is in any way due to the present government or to any measure which they have brought down, they lay themselves open to fair criticism. Why, Mr. Speaker, a cock crowing at dawn might think his efforts occasioned, because they preceded, the rising of the sun. It would be just as reasonable for the cock to congratulate himself on the rising of the sun on that particular morning as for my hon. friend to congratulate the government of this country upon the prosperity which has prevailed throughout Canada and throughout the world. That particular chanticleer would crow on a certain morning when the sun rose, and my hon. friend happens to be Finance Minister of Canada during a period of great prosperity not only in Canada but throughout the world; and I venture to say that there is just as much cause for congratulation in the one case as there is in the other.

With regard to the expansion of trade, my hon. friend has submitted figures to us with which we are very much pleased in some respects, though not in others, as I shall endeavour to show a little later on. In years gone by my hon. friend has presented diagrams to the House showing the enormous expansion in the trade and revenue of the country since 1896. I have sometimes been tempted to inquire why it is that my hon. friend has never seen fit to present to this House a diagram showing the increased expenditure and the increased taxation of this country from 1896 to the present time.

An hon. MEMBER. There is not room enough.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). It is suggested that he could not get a diagram large enough; but I do not think that is the case. Possibly there would not be room for it in 'Hansard.' Now, speaking from the standpoint of a critic, I think it is only right that I should bring to your attention and to the attention of the country, the expansion of the expenditure in some of the principal items involved in the administration of this country, which has taken place from 1896 down to the present time.

My hon friend the Minister of Finance has not dealt very fully with this question of expenditure, so far as comparative expenditure is concerned, and I would like to draw his attention to certain figures during a period of five years from 1892 to 1896 as compared with those from 1897 to 1901. Let me give a diagram showing the increase in the total expenditure :

1892	$ 42,272,136	1897	$ 42,972,756
1893	40,853,728	1898	45,334,281

1896	41,702,383	1901	57,982,866
	210,708,819		250,550,005

Average annual expenditure during 5 years of Liberal rule	$50,110,001
Average annual expenditure during 5 years of Conservative rule	42,141,764
Average annual increase under Liberal rule	$7,968,237
Total expenditure, 1897 to 1901 both years inclusive	$250,550,005
Total expenditure, 1892 to 1896, both years inclusive	210,708,819
Liberal rule	$9,841,186

Thus, from 1892 to 1896, the aggregate total expenditure amounted to $210,708,819, and from 1897 to 1901 it amounted to $250,550,005, showing an increased expenditure of nearly $40,000,000 in the latter five years. Therefore, during the five years of Liberal rule, there was a yearly average expenditure of $50,110,001 as compared with $42,141,764 during the previous five years of Conservative administration, or an average increase of annual expenditure of $7,968,237 by the present government over its predecessors.

Why does not my hon. friend the Minister of Finance claim the benefit of this result ? It is one to the full benefit of which he is certainly entitled. He may not be entitled to the credit of the prosperity which prevails in Canada, as well as in all the rest of the world, but certainly he is entitled to the credit of all this expenditure.

My hon. friend became reminiscent this afternoon. Does he ever think of the years gone by in which an expenditure of $38,000,000 was declared by his friends to be $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 too much. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) published an article in the 'North American Review,' in which he attacked the increase in expenditure, during the eleven years between 1878 and 1889, of $13,385,581. I happen to have the article in my hand. It does not appear to interest my hon. friend now, because I observed him yawn when I merely mentioned it. But I assure him that I am not speaking of him simply as the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the financial critic of the opposition at that time, but as the representative of the Liberal party in those days—the man who was put forward as its ablest exponent; who, in the introduction to this very article, is referred to as the real, though not the titular leader of the opposition; whose views were put forward throughout this country as those of the real leader of the opposition. I invite his attention to some of the views he then expressed—views not set out in the heat of an election campaign, but in the calmness of a magazine review; thought out carefully in the quiet of his study and not uttered on a political platform or in the heat of a political struggle. Let us see what view he took of the situation at that time. He said :

> In 1878, the actual taxation of Canada was $17,841,938, though, as there was a deficit in that year, the necessary taxation might be placed at $19,000,000. In 1889, the actual taxation was $30,613,522, being an increase of $11,613,522.

Now, if we compare 1897 with 1901, we find an increase of $15,000,000 in the four years of Liberal rule, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who was shocked at an actual taxation of $30,613,522 in 1889, is not shocked at an actual expenditure of $57,982,000 at the present time.

My hon. friend may say that I am comparing the receipts from taxes with the total expenditure. Well, I will compare something else for him. The total receipts from taxes during 1901 were $38,743,550, so that if my hon. friend had occasion to grow eloquent at that time, he certainly has still more occasion to do so at present. What did he say about it in this magazine article :

> Comment is hardly necessary, nor, indeed, does space permit me to point out the enormous mischiefs which result in a young and poor country from absorbing so large a proportion of the earnings of the people, in defraying the charges of the federal government, as is now being taken in Canada.

Yet, although $8,000,000 more are taken now than then, the Minister of Trade and Commerce seems perfectly contented over the situation. Let us take a comparison which he was good enough to make then, and which is the most striking thing in the article :

In 1845 the population of the United States was (by estimate).....	20,000,000
The taxes of the United States were..	$27,531,630
The total expenditure was.....	22,935,828

Then, he says :

In 1889 the population of Canada was perhaps.....	4,800,000
The taxes of Canada were....	$30,613,522
The total expenditure was.....	36,917,854

And he makes a pitiful comparison between the position of Canada and that of the United States, based on that standpoint. But suppose we were to make a similar comparison at the present time, would not the Minister of Trade and Commerce think it was a perfectly fair one :

In 1845 the population of the United States was (by estimate)..... ..	20,000,000
The taxes of the United States were..	$27,531,630
The total expenditure was....	22,935,828
In 1900 the population of Canada was (so far as we can ascertain from the census).....	5,340,000
The taxes of Canada were.....	$38,743,550
The total expenditure was.....	57,982,866

I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to take the figures I have read to him and go over the article which he wrote in 1889 and apply the same language to the state of affairs in Canada to-day, which he was good enough to apply to its condition ten years ago, and I am sure no stronger indictment can be made against the extravagance of this government.

It is remarkable that my hon. friend, in this article, attributed this scandalous and enormous increase of expenditure—during those eleven years—to what do you suppose ? To the fact that protection existed in Canada. But he tells us himself that in Canada protection does not exist to-day, so he has not that excuse. What then is the reason for the increase in four years of $15,000,000 in our total expenditure ? It cannot be on account of protection, because the Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that there is no protection in the country and that we have merely a revenue tariff. To what cause must we attribute it ? Surely it cannot be due to the extravagance of this government, because having preached the doctrine of economy during so many years it is impossible to believe that these hon. gentlemen, now that they are at the head of affairs, are actuated by motives other than those of the most strict economy.

Let us look at the expenditure in another way. The per capita expenditure was a subject upon which the hon. gentleman was wont to be very eloquent in days gone by. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says that our population remained stationery from 1890 to 1896. If he is correct, the figures which I am giving will show very much worse against the government. But I do not intend to take that position, because I do not think it would be a fair one. I intend to take the position—which I think is reasonable—that in 1896 the population of this country was about 5,070,000. In that year our expenditure was $41,702,383, and the per capita tax 8·22. In 1897 the population, as I estimate it, was 5,120,000, and our expenditure $42,972,756, and the per capita tax had increased to 8·39. Let me give a tabulated statement, made up from the Public Accounts :

PER CAPITA—TOTAL EXPENDITURE.

Year.	Population estimated.	Expenditure.	Per Capita.
1896.....	5,070,000	41,702,383	8·22
1897.....	5,120,000	42,972,756	8·39
1898.....	5,175,000	45,334,281	8·76
1899.....	5,230,000	51,542,635	9·85
1900.....	5,285,000	52,717,467	9·98
1901.....	5,340,000	57,982,866	10·88

Thus, these gentlemen have increased the expenditure about 36 per cent, the per capita expenditure about 32 per cent, while the population has increased less than 7 per cent.

And, from the proposed expenditure, it is evident that there will be a great increase in the per capita tax for the ensuing year, unless there is a much greater increase in the population than we can reasonably anticipate or look forward for. Now, the taxation of the country might be looked at for a moment in periods of five years, in the way in which I have just dealt with the expenditure :

TOTAL RECEIPTS FROM TAXES.

1892.....	$28,446,157	1897.....	$28,648,626
1893.....	29,321,367	1898.....	29,576,456
1894.....	27,579,203	1999.....	34,958,069
1895.....	25,446,199	1900.....	38,242,223
1896.....	27,759,285	1901.....	38,743,550
	$138,106,054		$170,168,924

Average annual taxation under five years of Liberal rule.....	$34,033,785
Average annual taxation under five years of Conservative rule.....	27,710,442
Average annual increase under Liberal rule.....	6,323,343
Total taxation, 1897 to 1901, both inclusive.....	$170,168,924
Total taxation, 1892 to 1896, both inclusive.....	138,106,054
Increase under Liberal rule....	$ 32,062,870

Thus we see that the taxes had increased by no less than $32,000,000 in a period of five years. Therefore, I thought it right to bring to the attention of the government and of the country the fact that, while there has been a very great increase in the volume of trade, and in the revenues of the country, there has been an enormous, a startling increase in the public expenditure. During this period of buoyant revenue we have had no decrease in the public debt as might have been expected. The Minister of Finance has referred to the increase in the public debt under Conservative administration, but if during the period of eighteen years of Conservative rule, the government had had so large an average revenue as this government has had for the past five years, not only would there have been no increase in the public debt, but there would have been a great diminution. I desire to point out also that, during that period of time, the Conservative government expended enormous amounts in the public works of this country. From 1878 to 1896, the Conservatives spent $65,000,000 on the Canadian Pacific Railway; the Liberals, from 1896 to 1901, have spent about $33,000 for the same purpose. On canals, the Conservatives spent $36,000,000, the Liberals, $14,250,000. The Conservatives set aside as debt for the provinces, $10,300,000, while this government set aside $267,000. The Conservatives spent on the Intercolonial Railway, $20,500,000; the Liberals spent $8,250,000. Taking these things into consideration, I do not know that the Minister of Finance has dealt quite fairly with the country in his comparison of the increased debt during the last five years and during the eighteen years of Conservative rule. He does not take into consideration the enormous revenues we have had for the past five years, nor does he take into consideration the very much larger amount the Conservatives spent on public works in this country than have been spent by the present government.

Now, with regard to the trade conditions of the past year, I do not think it necessarily follows that because importations into Canada are greater than they have been in past years, the country is prospering. If the tariff of this country were so arranged as to close dozens of our factories and drive thousands of our people to the United States to seek employment, one of the first results would be an enormous increase in our imports. Merely that this country has increased its imports, that of itself does not prove that the country is prospering; on the contrary, it may indicate a very bad condition of affairs so far as some of our industries are concerned.

The following figures afford a comparison of the exports for 1900 and 1901 :—

EXPORTS OF CANADA.

——	1900.	1901.
Produce of mines.....	24,778,339	40,531,314
" fisheries...	11,224,866	10,730,999
" forest.....	29,954,089	30,276,180
Animals and their produce	57,296,667	56,299,282
Agricultural products.	38,469,961	38,568,052
Manufactures	15,511,581	17,751,350
Miscellaneous	540,541	351,966

A considerable portion of the increase of the produce of the mine consists of the exports of gold-bearing quartz, nuggets, and silver concentrates and ore, which went to the United States, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) told us, to pay the balance of trade which exists between this country and the United States. Let us eliminate these articles from the calculation. The total exports for 1900 were $191,894,723. Deduct gold-bearing quartz, silver concentrates, coin and bullion, amounting to $24,159,666, and we find that the exports of other articles were $167,735,057. In 1901, our total exports were $196,487,632. Deducting coin, bullion, concentrates, &c., $28,844,393, and we have a balance of $167,643,237, or about half a million dollars less of exports than we had last year. The following is a tabulated statement :—

TOTAL EXPORTS OF CANADA.

	1900.	1901.
Total exports of Canada	$191,894,723	$196,487,632
Less gold-bearing quartz, silver concentrates, coin and bullion	24,159,666	28,844,393
	$167,735,057	$167,643,237

I do not see that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has so much to congratulate himself upon so far as the agricultural, mineral and forest exports of the country are concerned, because the advance seems to be made up altogether of gold-bearing quartz, bullion, &c., coupled with the substantial advance of upwards of $2,000,000 in manufactured goods.

Now if we look at the imports and the exports in the same way for 1901, let us see how we stand. If we eliminate from our exports and imports gold-bearing quartz, silver concentrates, bullion and coin, our imports and exports stand as follows : Imports, $186,878,231; exports, $167,643,237; leaving what my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) would call a balance of trade against Canada of $19,234,994. The following is a tabulated statement :—

Total imports, 1901	$ 186,878,231
" exports, 1901	167,643,237
Balance of trade against Canada.	$ 19,234,994

Now the development of our trade with the mother country is a circumstance upon which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has seen fit to congratulate the country; but I notice that in doing so he congratulated the country more particularly on the average for five years, and not on the particular results of the past year. Well, let us look at the results of the past year and compare them with those of 1900 :

	Exports to United Kingdom.	Imports from United Kingdom.	Aggregate trade with United Kingdom.
1900	107,736,368	45,472,294	153,208,662
1901	105,328,956	43,164,297	148,493,253
Decreases	2,407,412	2,307,997	4,715,409

I do not know as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance thinks that the country is to be congratulated upon the decrease in our exports.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. You will find it in my speech, at all events.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance does not think that the decrease in our aggregate trade with Great Britain is a very satisfactory showing, having regard to what he has always claimed for the British preference. He says the British preference works in two ways : In the first place, he says it brings British goods into this country instead of American goods. If he does not say that, I do not know what his argument means. On the other hand, he says that the sentiment in Great Britain created by the preference results in a very large increased exportation of Canadian goods to the mother country. Well, the net result during the past year of that preferential trade system has been, as I have already pointed out, that there is a decrease of our exports to Great Britain of $2,407,412, and a decrease of our imports from Great Britain of $2,307,997, and a total falling off of our trade with the mother country, of $4,715,409.

Now let us look at our trade with the mother country during the past year and see in what articles it has increased or decreased, comparing our exports of 1900 with those of 1901 :

EXPORTS of certain Articles from Canada to United Kingdom.

Wool and manfs. of.	66,318	27,327	38,991
Beans	17,700	11,049	6,651

There are other items which show an increase, for example, leather, $425,813; wood and manufactures of, $762,236; metals, minerals and manufactures of, $268,342; seeds, $186,200, and animals, $157,681; leaving a net decrease of about $2,500,000. But the astonishing thing is that we find as to some of the articles in which our exports to Great Britain have decreased, that Great Britain has actually bought more of those articles in 1901 than she did in 1900. Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance and my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce have told us over and over again that our preferential tariff has created a sentiment in the mother country which operates as a real preference to Canadian products. The figures of the present year show nothing of the kind. While there has been a falling off in many articles imported by the mother country from Canada, her imports of similar articles from other countries have increased, as the following figures show :—

IMPORTS by the United Kingdom of certain Articles.

—	1900.	1901.	Increase.
Bacon and ham	15,995,778	18,118,564	2,122,786

Iron and steel mfrs.	4,830,476	5,104,502	274,026

Therefore so far as all these articles are concerned, while there is in some a very substantial, an enormous increase in total importations by the mother country, we find in every one of them that there is a falling off in her imports from Canada.

Now let us look at our trade relations with the United States in the same aspect, and see whether the preferential tariff trade policy of the government has had the effect which has been claimed for it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does the right hon. gentleman propose to sit this evening ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If it will suit the convenience of my hon. friend I propose to go on.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have just this to say to my right hon. friend. I propose to move an amendment, and I thought possibly it might be more convenient for me to announce it immediately than during my speech to-morrow afternoon.

The PRIME MINISTER. As the hon. gentleman prefers.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I move the adjournment of the debate, and in doing so I may state that in concluding my remarks to-morrow I will move the following amendment :

That all the words after 'that' in the proposed motion be left out and the following substituted therefore :

This House regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians. And, while always firmly maintaining the necessity of such protection to Canadian interests, this House affirms its belief in a policy of reciprocal trade preferences within the empire.

Motion (Mr. Borden, Halifax) agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Annual Report of the Department of Militia and Defence, 1901.—Hon. Mr. Borden.

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

OFFICIAL DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT (West Assiniboia). In the absence of the Chairman of the Committee, I move that the second report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present session be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Essex Terminal Railway Company.—Mr. Cowan.

Bill (No. 55) respecting the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company.—Mr. Sutherland (Essex).

Bill (No. 56) to indemnify sufferers from fires caused by railways.—Mr. Demers (St. John and Iberville).

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, certified copies of the judgments and decisions of the said Court in the Election Appeals for the electoral districts of Two Mountains and Richelieu, by which the said appeals were dismissed.

JAPANESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. AULAY MORRISON (New Westminster). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the first minister if the Japanese section of the oriental report has been brought down, or when it will be brought down ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It has not yet been received, so far as I know.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance :

That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, before the debate was adjourned yesterday, I had pointed out that while the revenue and trade of this country had expanded to a very great extent during the past five years, the expenditure of the country also, as the Minister of Finance would have expressed it, had increased by leaps and bounds. From a total expenditure of $42,972,756 in 1897 to $57,982,866 in 1901 is a pretty good leap. But my hon. friend the Minister of Finance proposes to take a leap of nearly seven and a half millions dollars next year, as he estimates the total expenditure of that year at $65,250,000—being a leap from 1897 to 1902 of $22,277,244, or over 50 per cent increase.

I pointed out also an increase of nearly $50,000,000 in the total expenditure for the last five years, as compared with the total expenditure of the previous five years, and an increase of more than $32,000,000 in the taxes taken from the people during the past five years as compared with the five years preceding. And if we look to the United States, we find that the expenditure of that country, when its population was 20,000,000, was only a little more than one-third of that which the Minister of Finance proposes for the ensuing year, with a population of not more than 5,500,000.

I again invite my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce to devote his attention to that article written by him for the 'North American Review,' to which I referred yesterday, and tell us why it is proper now to have an expenditure of $65,250,000, when our population is only five and a half million, in view of the fact that he lamented so greatly our extravagance in 1889 and 1890, when our expenditure was only about two-thirds as much ?

Mr. COWAN. What was the trade of the United States when they had a population of 20,000,000 ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think my hon. friend will find the figures in the article to which I have already referred—the article prepared by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I have pointed out that the per capita expenditure has increased from 8·22 in 1896 to 10·88 in 1901, and with the proposed expenditure for 1902 it will be increased to 11·86, assuming our population to be 5,500,000. Is there not food in this for some comment from the Minister of Trade and Commerce—more food I should say than there was for the articles which he wrote concerning the expenditure of this country in days gone by ? We have been told by a very high authority that as to some matters which the hon. gentleman touched upon in those days, he did not express perhaps his real convictions, and possibly when dealing with the subject of economy and declaiming against extravagance, he was not any more serious than he is said to have been when holding forth on the question of protection and free trade.

I have also pointed out the enormous expenditure in public works made by the Conservatives during their administration of eighteen years—four items of which, the Canadian Pacific Railway, canals, assignment of debt to provinces, and Intercolonial Railway, amounted to $131,800,000.

I have also pointed out that if during those eighteen years, the average revenue available to the Conservative administration had been equal to the average of the past five years, the public debt of the country would have been decreased by many millions instead of being increased.

Comparing 1901 with 1900, I also pointed out that our exports to Great Britain had decreased by $2,407,412, and our imports from Great Britain had decreased by $2,307,997, so that our aggregate trade with Great Britain had decreased by $4,715,409.

Coming to our trade with the United States, we observe an entirely different condition of affairs. In 1900 our total exports to the United States were $68,619,023. If we deduct from that the gold-bearing quartz, silver concentrates, coin and bullion, amounting to $24,141,872, we have a net export of merchandise to the United States of $44,477,151.

Compare this with 1901. In 1901 our total exports to the United States were $72,382,230. If we make a like deduction for gold-bearing quartz, silver concentrates, coin and bullion, amounting to $28,587,229, we find that our net exports of merchandise to the United States in 1901 were $43,795,001, or an actual decrease, compared with 1900, of $682,150.

But when we turn to the imports of Canada from the United States, a very different condition of affairs confronts us. In 1900 our total imports from the United States amounted to $116,972,554. Deducting coin and bullion, $7,764,201, we find that our net importation of merchandise from the United States was $109,208,353.

Compare this with 1901. Our total imports from the United States in that year were $119,306,775. Deducting coin and bullion, $3,335,687, we have a balance of $115,971,086, being our net importation of merchandise from the United States in 1901, which shows an actual increase of $6,762,733 compared with 1900.

What does that show ? It shows that the gain to the United States over Great Britain in aggregate trade with Canada in 1891, as compared with 1900, is no less than $10,785,391, and the gain to the United States over Great Britain in exports to Canada in 1901, as compared with 1900, is more than $9,000,000. That is to say, in 1901, we, as customers of Great Britain on the one hand and the United States on the other hand, gave to the United States a gain of no less than $9,000,000 over the mother country. The following is a tabulated statement :—

Increase in our imports from United States	$ 6,762,733
Decrease in our imports from United Kingdom	2,307,997
Gain to United States over United Kingdom	$ 9,070,730

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in dealing with this matter in 1897, said that in the very last year of the Conservative term of office, we exported to England apparently $66,000,000 worth of our products, and to the United States, $44,000,000 worth, and that we bought from England $32,000,000 worth of their merchandise and from the United States $58,000,000 worth of their goods. This, he declared was genuine, practical discrimination, to an enormous extent, against England and in favour of the United States under the Conservative policy. Well, hon. gentlemen will at once realize that the figures are very much more in favour of the United States and against England to-day than they were then. Does the Minister of Trade and Commerce say that there is now a genuine, practical discrimination to an enormous extent against England and in favour of the United States under the Liberal policy ? Look at the figures now. In 1901 we exported to England $105,000,000 worth of our products, and to the United States, after deducting gold bullion and silver concentrates, $44,000,000, and we bought from England $43,000,000 worth of goods, and from the United States goods to the extent of $116,000,000. If the criticism, which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce made in former years, was sincere, what will be his criticism of the state of affairs to-day ? The House and the country will be very glad to hear from him on that subject.

The Americans do not conceal their exultation, nor do the manufacturers of Great Britain conceal their disappointment at this condition of our trade. We know that there was in November last in the United States a convention of manufacturers, called the National Reciprocity Convention, which my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had the honour of addressing. Mr. Clarke, a leading manufacturer in the United States, delivered a very strong protectionist address at the opening of that convention, and in the course of his remarks used the following language :—

In 1898 Canada put into effect a tariff which now gives to the British exporter 33 per cent better rates than you can get if you export to Canada. Here was a chance to see how reciprocity would work under favourable circumstances. With what result ? You would think England would have made enormous gains. I will not bother with the figures, but will say that up to and including 1900 England had absolutely lost ground and we gained it, with a 33 per cent differential duty operating against us. The Canadians had every kind of inducement, the money inducement and the loyalty inducement and the desire to buy British goods, and yet we beat the Englishman on Canadian ground with a 33 per cent duty in their favour.

My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was at that convention. The Americans were rather curious about that matter and asked him to explain the circumstances. In the report of his speech the hon. gentleman is represented as making the following very lucid statement as to the causes that had led to this condition of affairs :—

The Canadian tariff against England has a rebate of 33⅓ per cent, but the goods imported from the two countries are dissimilar and the rates of duty on the goods from England happen to be higher than the rates of duty on the class of goods coming from the United States, and the net result, the total duty, is almost the same.

Now, what delightful simplicity there is in that word 'happen' in the speech of my hon. friend from Norfolk. He takes it for granted that this government had brought down a tariff without having the slightest idea of what they were doing when they fixed the rate of duty. Well, according to the view of the hon. member for North Norfolk, British goods, counting all dutiable goods together, pay a higher rate of duty than goods from the United States. And, even according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, the duty paid on dutiable goods coming from the United States is an average of 24·83 per cent, while that on British goods is 24·74 per cent. If you exclude from the calculation, as the hon. Minister of Finance saw fit to do, goods which do not enjoy the advantage of the preferential tariff, you still have a duty of 24·50 per cent—I think he said—upon United States goods, and on British goods a fraction over 21 per cent. Now, this preferential tariff was announced to the country as a tariff which gave the mother country a real advantage of 33⅓ per cent. The Minister of Finance took great credit to himself for bringing down that tariff on St. George's Day, and said there was an association between the saints and his budget. All I have to say is, that, considering the words of the Finance Minister of yesterday, this seems to be the first time on record when any saint was ever taken in by a confidence man. We read in Holy Writ of those who would deceive the very elect. But my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, seems to be proud of having deceived the very saints of heaven.

Now, a gentleman who is in favour of closer trade relations with Canada, and who addressed this same National Reciprocity Convention, said that it was interesting to make an analysis of what the United States sold to Canada. He collected the figures from our returns for 1900 and showed that we bought from the United States the following :—Products of the mine, $11,600,000 ; fish, $484,000 ; forest products, $5,200,000 ; animals, $3,420,000 ; agricultural products, $19,080,000 ; manufactured wares, $61,362,000 ; making a total of $101,146,000. He then went on to show the amount of these different articles of manufactured goods that we imported. I have not been able to verify his figures but, on examining the trade returns for the past year, I find that our imports from the United States may be roughly classed as follows :—

Products of the mine	$14,000,000
Fisheries	416,500
Agricultural products and animals	25,700,000
Manufactures	65,000,000

The amount of manufactures is the amount calculated by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), which, I have no doubt, is approximately correct. Then, on examining our trade returns a little more closely, I find that the manufactures that we bought from the United States include the following principal items :—

IMPORTS of Certain Manufactured Articles from the United States, 1901.

Adding together the dutiable imports of $34,770,626 and the free imports of $21,503,558, we have a total of imports of manufactured goods of the kinds comprised in this list of $56,274,124. Now, this accounts for our main imports from the United States, leaving a balance of about $9,000,000 of miscellaneous articles, assuming the calculations of my hon. friend to be correct. On the import of these manufactured goods from the United States, Mr. Coppins commented as follows :—

> These are but a few of a long list of American manufactures which by their large entrance into the Dominion have given to the retail shops of Canada the appearance of American stores.

That is the way they regard the situation in the United States. That, I suppose, is one of the reasons that caused my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) to say, in Montreal, that there was a crisis. But that crisis does not seem to be taken cognizance of by my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, in preparing his budget speech. Further on, referring to the same subject, this gentleman, Mr. Coppins, asked what the United States took in exchange. I have made an examination of our trade returns and I find that they took the following :—

EXPORTS to United State, 1901.

Produce of the mine	$38,355,330
Fisheries	4,224,948
Forest	12,190,617
Animals and their produce	5,331,657
Agricultural products	2,907,963
Manufactures	4,963,247
Miscellaneous articles	9,305
		$67,983,673
Foreign produce		2,423,168
Coin and bullion		1,975,389
		$72,382,230

But, Sir, we must recollect that of the produce of the mine $28,587,229 represents gold dust, nuggets and silver concentrates ; and looking at the total value of animals and their produce and agricultural products exported by us to the United States, we find that they amount to $8,239,626, or just a little less than one-third of that which the United States exports to Canada of the same articles. Looking at our manufactured goods exported to the United States we find that they amount to $4,963,247, or less than one-thirteenth of the value of manufactured articles that the United States exported into Canada in the same year. Now, when you deduct from the $72,382,232 of exports from Canada to the United States that I have mentioned, the silver concentrates, gold bullion and coin, gold dust and nuggets, amounting to $28,587,229, you will see that our exports to the United States for the past fifteen years have increased very little, while on the other hand our imports from the United States, accepting the statement made by my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) before the National Reciprocity Convention, have increased during the same period about three-fold.

Now, Sir, I venture to inquire whether it is not possible for the people of Canada to manufacture a very considerable portion of the $65,000,000 worth of goods which we are taking every year from the United States. I venture to think that it is not holding out any impossibility to the people of this country to say that, possessing the resources for manufacturing which we do, we should within a very short time, if the government of this country would enact a sufficient system of protection, be able to manufacture a very considerable proportion of these articles ourselves, and keep in this country the people who are now going to the United States, getting work there in the very factories that are turning out the articles which afterwards come to Canada, and which have been produced by people from this country.

Nor is that the only thing that attracts our attention in dealing with the trade relations between Canada and the United States. Is it not possible also that of the $25,700,000 of agricultural products and animals and their produce which are imported into Canada from the United States, a very large proportion can be produced in Canada, and in this way the prosperity and wealth of our farming population be materially increased ? On referring to our Trade and Commerce Reports, and selecting six principal agricultural products, I find that last year we imported from the United States :

—	Dutiable.	Free.	Total.
Animals	$ 624,252	$ 127,371	$ 751,623
Breadstuffs	944,238	6,488,292	7,432,530
Fruits	1,766,379	666,995	2,433,974
Provisions	2,254,630	2,553	2,257,183
Seeds and roots	517,047	688,388	1,205,435
Vegetables	370,419		370,419
	$6,477,565	$7,973,599	$14,451,164

So that taking these six principal articles, if I may call them so, I find we imported from the United States last year, of agricultural products and of animals and their products, $6,477,565 dutiable, and $7,973,599 free, or a total of $14,451,164 of free and dutiable goods. I venture to think, Sir, that that affords an opportunity to the government of this country of doing something to readjust the tariff for the benefit of our farming community.

In framing a tariff for Canada, or in readjusting a tariff for Canada, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we must bear in mind our fiscal situation, our agricultural resources, the abundance of raw material which we possess for almost every branch of our manufacturing industry ; and especially it must be borne in mind that our frontier extends for more than 4,000 miles along that of the greatest agricultural and manufacturing country in the world. For the first time in the history of the United States her domestic exports in 1901 exceeded those of Great Britain. The figures for that year are as follows: Domestic exports of the United States, $1,460,462,806; domestic exports of Great Britain, $1,363,224,000; or nearly $100,000,000 less than those of the United States. Of those exports of the domestic products of the United States, $943,811,020 were agricultural products and $412,155,066 were manufactures.

Now, there is another thing we should consider in this connection, and that is that the growth of manufactures in the United States during the past five years has been phenomenal, and will probably advance in a somewhat similar ratio in future. At the National Reciprocity Convention, of which I have already spoken, the figures which I am about to give were accepted by the convention as correct, and I therefore assume that they are correct. They show the growth of manufactures in the United States during the past fifty years:

1850	$ 1,000,000,000
1860	2,000,000,000
1870	4,000,000,000
1880	5,500,000,000
1890	9,000,000,000
1900	13,000,000,000

From one billion in 1850 to thirteen billions in 1900, an increase of 1,300 per cent in fifty years. Now, Sir, I am pointing that out for this reason, that when we come to compare those figures with the exports of the United States, they indicate to us what an enormous home market the United States have, and how slight an increase in the produce of manufactured articles in the United States, or how slight a decrease in the consuming power of the United States, would immediately enormously increase the exports of the United States, or rather the surplus for export.

The total manufactures of the United States in 1900, aggregated thirteen billion dollars. Their exports of manufactures in that year aggregated $4,333,851,756, so that you will see that the total exports of the United States of manufactured goods in 1900 were less than 3½ per cent of their total production. This is a pretty significant fact when we have to look at the possibility of competition with the United States in times of depression that may not be so very many years away. Now, as to the total agricultural production of the United States in 1900, I cannot give the exact figures, but of this we are well assured that the agricultural products of the United States were many times in excess of their exports of agricultural products in that year which aggregated $835,858,123. If there were any doubt about that I might quote from vol. 19 of the final report of the Industrial Commission of the United States, page 187, where it is said that:

> The products of agriculture comprised 64·64 per cent of the value of our domestic exports in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901. In spite of this extraordinary preponderance, only a comparatively minor proportion of our farm products ever passes out of the home market. * * * Only one fourth of the commercial corn crop ever leaves the county in which it is grown. * * * From 5 to 10 per cent enters into foreign trade. * * *

Less than one-third of the wheat crop is exported and 4·6 per cent of the oat crop is exported. The conclusion of this report is that even taking these great staples as to which the percentage of export would probably be greater than in most other articles:

> The three great staples taken as a whole are mostly consumed at home.

Now, as the produce of the United States both in agriculture and manufactures, will be increasing beyond the home consumption, their need of a foreign market is becoming more and more apparent to them. The utterances of their public men and of their leading business men during the past year indicate that they fully realize the situation and that they are determined to conquer foreign markets in the near future. For example, the late President McKinley, of the United States, in his speech at Buffalo, which has been hailed throughout the United States as the embodiment of political and economic wisdom, used the following language:

> We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now so firmly established. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad, the excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet.

Another utterance of the same gentleman is as follows:

> It——
>
> That is reciprocity—
> ——is to afford new markets for our surplus agricultural and manufactured products without loss to the American labourer of a single day's work that he might otherwise procure.

That seems to be hailed in the United States as the height of economic and politic wisdom, as I have said. Possibly it would not be out of place for us in Canada to take a line from that which has been placed before us by these gentlemen in the United States and to consider whether our policy should not be to so frame our tariff that there would not be the loss of a day's work to a single Canadian labourer. Then, a senator of the United States, Mr. Foraker, said:

> We must have markets for our surplus or quit producing it.

Mr. Deering, President of the Deering Manufacturing Company, in his speech at the National Reciprocity Convention, expressed the following views :

> But now that the protective system has done its work, we are confronted by new problems that are more serious than the old. If we cannot go forward and find new markets to absorb our increasing output, it is inevitable that we shall turn upon ourselves and waste in destructive competition the energy that might with a proper output give us command of the markets of the world. It is axiomatic that with industry stagnant and mills half idle the country at large cannot prosper.

Mr. A. B. Farquhar, representing the National Association of Agricultural Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers, in his introductory address at the same convention, used the following language :

> That our import duties as they stand invite retaliation from countries with whose interests they conflict every week's cable dispatches bring us added testimony. * * * We are the greatest manufacturing nation upon the earth and the general prosperity depends largely on that of the manufacturers of the country. * * * Our capacity for production at low cost renders foreign markets a necessity to keep our labour employed.

Mr. Thomas C. Search, chairman of that convention, expressed similar views in the following language :

> Many of our industries have reached a stage in their development where the home market alone cannot absorb their entire product, and consequently new outlets are necessary for their continuous operation and the steady employment of their operatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, taking these matters into consideration as they strike me, two causes do, and will contribute towards the slaughtering of American goods on the Canadian market. In the first place, their enormous total production which enables them to produce at a relatively small cost in the United States and in the next place the absolute necessity of getting rid of their surplus even at a loss. Now, Canada, as I have said, lies contiguous to the American market for 4,000 miles, and affords a market—you might say a slaughter market—for some portion at least of the excess which must be disposed of. The manufactured and agricultural products of this country are more likely to feel competition from the United States than those of any other country, not only for the reason that we border the United States for 4,000 miles, but also for another reason, that we are their third best customer, receiving one-fourteenth of their exports. We are their third best customer of their total products, and according to the hon. member for North Norfolk, we are their best customer so far as manufactured goods are concerned. In 1901 we took nearly one-sixth of the total export of manufactured goods from the United States. Their total export of manufactured goods in 1901 was $412,155,066, and we took of that $65,000,000, or nearly one-sixth. Our own resources are not only those of an agricultural, but of a great manufacturing people. We have the coal, the iron and raw materials of many kinds which should enable manufacturing industries to be built up and sustained in this country. If we are not to possess such manufacturing industries in the future, then this country must become very largely an agricultural and pastoral country selling its produce and importing all its manufactures. The result of that would be a large diminution of our population, because a large portion of our people would go to the United States for the work which they could not obtain here, and we would be at the mercy of the trusts in the United States, which in the future, beyond doubt, will control the agricultural production of that country as they now, to a very considerable extent, control certain other industries in that country. I do not believe that the people of this country are prepared to accept such a destiny as that. On the contrary, I believe that they propose to develop this country not only on the lines of agriculture, but on the lines of manufacturing and industrial development as well, and I believe they will look to the government to so readjust the tariff as to prevent Canada being made the slaughter market of the United States, whether of manufactured products or of agricultural products. They will look for a policy which will enable this country to be developed along every legitimate line.

Now, when we make a comparison of our tariff with the tariff of the United States, one would suppose that we were a country of 70,000,000 people and the United States a country of 5,500,000 ; one would suppose that we were the greatest exporting, the greatest agricultural, and the greatest manufacturing country in the world, and that the United States was a country practically undeveloped beside us, a country from which we need fear no competition whatever. We find that our rate of duty on total imports from the United States is about 12½ per cent, and on dutiable goods from the United States 24·83 per cent ; while on the other hand, the rate of duty on the total imports of the United States is 28·91 per cent, and on dutiable goods it is 49·83 per cent, or, more than double our rate in each case. As has been already pointed out, the United States has nearly three-fourths of the total importation of free goods into Canada, while Great Britain has to be content with some 15 per cent. One would expect that if we intend to maintain and build up our own products and manufactures against such powerful and tremendous competition as that which we must anticipate from the United States we would fix our tariff of customs against that country on a scale at least as high as is that of their tariff against us. We must remember that our producers and manufacturers are restricted very much as to the home market, while in Great Britain and in other countries we enjoy no advantages in their markets over the United States. In Germany, for example, Canadian products have to meet a less favourable tariff than that which the United States enjoys. While we have no greater advantages abroad, we have a more restricted market at home on account of our small population, and we therefore can reasonably say that having regard to that fact there is all the more reason for that restricted market such as it is being protected for the manufacturers and for the agricultural producers of this country.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I desire to emphasize that which I mentioned a little time ago, namely, the condition which will be brought about if the production of the United States in manufactured goods or in agricultural products, or in both, increases more rapidly than their power of consuming these commodities at home. You will bear in mind that the United States exports between 3 and 4 per cent only of its manufactured goods and probably not more than 10 per cent of its total agricultural products. If you increase the output in the United States of manufactured goods by 5 per cent, what have you ? If the home consumption does not keep up to that ratio you have an enormous increase of surplus for export, and where, let me ask, will that surplus for export be first slaughtered ? Where will it first be sent for the purpose of getting rid of it ? Naturally it will be sent to Canada, which at the present time is the third best customer of the United States in all products, and the best customer of the United States so far as manufactured goods are concerned.

In this connection we must not forget the enormous importance of the home market, not only to Canadian manufacturers but also to Canadian agriculturists. Our total manufactures (including under that term all articles made in factories using machinery and motive power), have been estimated by a very competent authority during the past year at $730,000,000. Of these, we exported less than $68,000,000 or about 9 per cent. Therefore, 91 per cent of the goods manufactured in Canada have been consumed in Canada. We have consequently at the present time to look first to the home market and not to a foreign market. Having regard to that, is it not right that we should take care that the home market is properly protected for the industries of this country ? We can see at a glance that if we increase our foreign export by 300 per cent, and gave away half of our home market, we would be infinitely worse off in Canada than we are to-day. Our home market is in proportion to our foreign market in the ratio of at least nine to one so far as we can get at the figures.

With regard to our agricultural products the same is almost equally true. The agricultural products of Canada are very largely used by Canada herself. If you take the article of wheat alone, an article which I suppose in proportion we export more largely than any other article ; assuming the consumption to be four bushels per head in Canada (which I believe is a fair average), we would use in Canada at least 22,000,000 bushels. In reference to many other articles of agricultural products the proportion would be two or three times as great, I have no doubt.

In discussing this question from the standpoint I have taken, I am following a very illustrious example in the United States. The late President McKinley, speaking in support of a Bill which he introduced into congress and which formed the customs tariff of that country, known as the McKinley Bill, quoted my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and Professor Goldwin Smith for the purpose of showing that Canada not only greatly desired, but could not do without the United States market. And accepting the conclusions of those gentlemen he argued that if reciprocity was so much desired in Canada and would greatly benefit this country, it could do so only at the expense of the United States, and therefore, the proper policy for the United States was to enact a tariff such as he then proposed. He for one was against granting reciprocity to Canada, and so he put up the tariff against Canada, and it has practically remained on that basis ever since.

Now, I do not say that our policy should be framed on any principle of retaliation of tariff. I absolutely and decidedly dissent from that. I say that our tariff should be framed from the standpoint of the Canadian people and with the view of the preservation of the Canadian markets for the Canadian people themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I am not prepared to say that we want reciprocity in natural products with the United States at the present time. In that I disagree with my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). There was a period during which such reciprocity was desirable, and during which it would have been a benefit to this country. That period may or may not have passed away. That period probably has passed. What I object to, in any principle of reciprocity of tariffs or retaliation of tariffs, is, that it may bind us to put our tariff down, admitting the United States manufactures to crush out our own manufacturers ; admitting United States agricultural products to the detriment and destruction of our own farming population. I say we do not want that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What we want in this country is a tariff framed for the benefit of our own Canadian people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What we want in Canada is a tariff framed for the purpose of preserving the Canadian markets for the Canadian people, and that I believe is a policy which will meet with the approbation of the Canadian people whenever it is placed before them.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). And if we have this reciprocity of tariffs that is talked of, how would we stand with these enormous American trusts which are beginning to control all the industries of that country. I do not know how the clause in the customs tariff which was spoken of by the Finance Minister could be applied to these trusts if we were practically to have free trade with the United States. It would certainly be of no service whatever. We will have a hard enough time in fighting trusts and combinations in Canada without undertaking the task of subduing the trusts and combines of the United States which are giving the congress and the legislatures of that country all they can do. And if American writers are to be believed these trusts in the United States have more than once controlled the legislatures of several states of the union in the past, if they do not so control them at the present time.

It may be said that a readjustment of the tariff on the lines which have been suggested will necessarily increase the burdens of the people. I do not think that at all follows. It may be said that the labouring classes and the manufacturing classes will pay more for agricultural products, and that the farming population will pay more for manufactured articles. I do not believe this will be the necessary result. I believe that internal competition will keep the prices down to a reasonable limit. It has done so in Canada in years gone by; though I believe the labouring classes, the manufacturing classes and the agricultural classes of this country, for the sake of developing the country, for the sake of keeping their markets for themselves, for the sake of preventing American competition, which has reached so disastrous a point, would be willing, for a few years at least, to pay slightly increased prices, if necessary.

So fas as competition within our own country is concerned, we have the remedy which was pointed out by the Minister of Finance yesterday, and which has been acted upon during the past year. If the manufacturers in Canada keep up prices unduly, if they use any combination among themselves to the detriment of the consumer, or if the agricultural products of the country should happen to get into the hands of a trust or a combine, it would be open to the government, whatever it might be, to use the clause which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance referred to yesterday, and, by a reduction of the customs duties or otherwise, to teach those people that the people of Canada want nothing of trusts or combines, but want their industries developed on plain, straightforward, and honest lines.

Now, I do not expect that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) will take very much stock in the principles I have been putting forward. We know that in days gone by he has vowed death to protection; he has wanted to stamp upon it; he has called it that villainous protection; he has called it a system of robbery; he has called the men engaged in manufacturing robbers; and, even at this late date, I hardly expect that the lamp holds out sufficiently for my hon. friend to return. Therefore, whatever impression I may have made upon any other gentleman in the House, I do not apprehend that I have made the slightest impression upon my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He will still adhere to his view that to develop the industries of this country on the lines I have suggested would not be in the interest of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in saying that the manufactures of Canada should be developed in this way, I adopt the principle, so far as the mother country is concerned—for I have been dealing up to the present time largely with the United States—that the manufactures of Canada are of as much value to the empire as manufactures in Great Britain. The development of Canada has been intrusted to us, and we certainly would not be true to our duty if we did not seek to develop this country along the lines of manufacturing industries as well as along the lines of agricultural industries, provided we consider that the resources of this country justify us in doing so. We know that the resources of this country do justify us in doing so. We know that we possess the material for carrying on manufacturing industries to an extent possessed by few other countries in the world, and I say that we would not be true to ourselves if we did not seek to avail ourselves of those materials which are close to our hands, and seek to build up in this way not only an agricultural production, but a manufacturing production as well. Our interests must sometimes give way to imperial interests; but any system or policy which closes our industries, causes our machinery and plant to lie idle, and sends our operatives to the United States is not a policy which is advantageous to Canada or to the empire, merely because it gives an increased output to some manufacturing industry in Great Britain. Our policy should be, in the first place, to conserve our own interests ; and, in the next place, as between our competitors, British and foreign, our policy should be to give to the manufactures of the mother country a preference over those of other countries.

In considering this matter, Mr. Speaker, we must not fail to bear in mind, of course, that the mother country is our best customer ; but we must not shut our eyes to the fact that she is also the best customer of the United States, and that she takes a very large proportion of the product of the United States of America. In 1901 Great Britain exported to the United States $143,000,000, and took from the United States $631,000,000, a very much larger proportion of imports over exports than her trade relations with Canada would show.

I submit that the policy which I advocate has nothing in it to which any man in Great Britain or any man in the empire should have the slightest objection. It is sometimes suggested that we have not contributed our proper share towards the defence of the empire. Well, Sir, if we have not, let us go about it in a straightforward way. Let us not, when the mother country suggests it, tell her that we will not even discuss it with her. I wondered that our hon. friends on the other side of the House did not get up and sing 'God save the King,' when that correspondence was brought down the other day. I suppose that although we must settle these matters ourselves, it would be no harm to discuss them at least with the mother country. I for one will always maintain the utmost rights of Canadians to their own self-government. I will always maintain that Canada must settle for herself what her contribution towards the defence of the empire shall be ; but I do not think it necessarily follows that Canada should slap the mother country in the face when the mother country proposes in a courteous manner to discuss this subject with her. I say that I believe in dealing with the defence of the empire in a straightforward way. I do not believe in dealing with it by adopting a preferential tariff which will shut up mills in Canada and give increased profits and outputs to some manufacturers in Yorkshire. That is not the way to contribute to the defence of the empire. We may have our differences about this matter ; but we can settle them in our own way, according to the principles of constitutional government that prevail in this country, and every man in Canada is perfectly entitled to express his views on the matter either in parliament or outside of it. But when we once settle the question to our own satisfaction, let us approach the mother country in regard to it in a courteous manner ; and if we do propose to contribute to the defence of the empire, let us do it in a straightforward, manly way, and not, as is suggested on the other side of the House, by creating a preference and ruining our own industries, because we have not contributed our proper share towards the defence of the empire.

My hon. friend the Minster of Finance, gave utterance yesterday to certain remarks with regard to the preferential tariff which I thought were hardly worthy of the hon. gentleman. He sought to put gentlemen on this side of the House in a dilemma with regard to the action of the preferential tariff. He said that if it had not done Great Britain any good, it could not have done Canada any harm. That was the substance of his remark.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I did not say that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is what his argument meant if it meant anything. If it did not mean that, it meant nothing. Well, Sir, I should think that speaking to men who are supposed to have common sense at least, the Minister of Finance might have remembered that the preferential tariff might yield only a very inappreciable increase to the $1,400,000,000 of exports of Great Britain, and at the same time close up some Canadian industries. I would not suppose that a gentleman of the ability and the astuteness of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance would require to be reminded of that. Why, take just a very few millions, not worth considering in the average $1,400,000,000 of Great Britain's annual exports, and apply them to the product of the woollen and some other industries in Canada, and you might close every woollen mill in Canada without appreciably affecting the total output of Great Britain. Yet the Minister of Finance wants us to believe that because this has not resulted in any appreciable benefit, to the mother country, therefore it cannot do any harm to Canada. I repeat that an argument of that kind does not seem to me a legitimate one in the mouth of a gentleman of the standing and position of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

I do not need to reiterate what Conservatives have said in the past with regard to the policy of mutual trade preference within the empire. That is a policy which, if I am not mistaken, was first put forward by the Conservative party in Canada. We still believe that mutual preferential trade in the empire will be advantageous to all portions of the empire, and are prepared to adopt and carry out that policy, if called into power, having regard in the first place to the protection of our labour and of our agricultural, mining, manufacturing and other industries.

One feature of the present tariff we do strongly object to, and that is the feature under which German and Belgium goods are admitted to the benefit of our preferential tariff under the pretense that they are British goods. That such is the case we know. That such is the case our manufacturers know. That such is the case is apparent from the very terms of the customs regulations which deal with that particular subject. Goods are manufactured in Germany and taken over to Great Britain, where a trifling value of work or material is added to them, and then they come into Canada as British goods entitled to the preferential tariff, while at the same time Germany is imposing on Canada her maximum tariff. And the Minister of Finance only woke up yesterday for the purpose of endeavouring to press upon the German government the injustice which is being done to Canada in this respect. When he goes to the German government, perhaps he will tell them that a considerable proportion of the goods brought into Canada under the so-called British preference are really German goods, to which have been added a small value of work or material in Great Britain, and which have been exported from Great Britain to Canada as British goods. Perhaps that would be as forcible a way of putting the position before the German authorities as my hon. friend could adopt. I venture to think that some greater precaution should be adopted by the government for the purpose of preventing German and Belgium goods coming into this country under the preferential clause.

I must apologize for having detained the House at so great length. I have very little to add. I say that in this country we want a declared fiscal policy. We have not had that during the past five years. We have had the Minister of Trade and Commerce telling us that the ship's head is pointed towards the open sea of free trade. We have had the Minister of Finance telling us that all these matters are matters of compromise, and that eternal vigilance is the price of protection. We have had the Minister of the Interior in the west telling us that this tariff is a free trade or revenue tariff. We have had the Minister of Public Works openly and repeatedly telling the people that he is a protectionist, first, last and all the time. We have had him telling the people that there is a crisis because there is not sufficient protection, and we have had the Minister of Finance telling us at the same banquet that all these matters are matters of compromise, and the right hon. gentleman, who leads the House, telling us on the same occasion that the tariff is as nearly perfect as it can be. Half an hour afterwards the Minister of Public Works declared that he is a protectionist, and a fortnight or three weeks afterwards he told the people that there is a crisis because we have not sufficient protection. How can we expect men to put their money into the industries of the country with any confidence ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Are they not doing it ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I believe that some of them are shrinking from doing it. I tell the Minister of Finance that we do not want a cabinet of all the policies, but a cabinet of one national and Canadian policy. Criticism was made in England a good many years ago of a cabinet which was called the cabinet of all the talents; but to have a cabinet of all the policies is the greatest misfortune which any country under heaven can suffer from. We do not want any vague suggestions from the Minister of Finance about what will be done in the future. He tells us that this tariff will be readjusted some time in the future, and readjusted in all moderation—whatever that means. That is a splendidly indefinite statement with which to go to the people. We want to know what will be the policy of this government, as a government, with regard to the fiscal affairs of the country. We want that to be a declared policy so that the people will know what to expect. In asking that we are asking nothing unreasonable or unfair. We want a policy of protection to our labour, agriculturing, manufacturing and other industries. We want a policy which will give to our people the advantage in their own market—a policy of Canada for the Canadians ; and Canada for the Canadians means not the less Canada for the empire as well. Because in seeking to promote the development, prosperity and advancement of Canada, we are but doing our duty to that portion of the empire which has been specially committed to our charge. And, lastly, we believe in a policy of mutual or reciprocal trade under which, while protecting Canadian interests, we shall give to and receive from the other portions of the empire preference over foreign goods. Therefore I beg to move :

That all the words after 'that' in the proposed motion be left out and the following substituted therefor :

This House regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians. And, while always firmly maintaining the necessity of such protection to Canadian interests, this House affirms its belief in a policy of reciprocal trade preferences within the empire.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, it is very pleasant for me on all occasions to welcome old friends back. And, when I listened to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) and to the terms of the motion which he has placed in your hands, I had only to close my eyes, and five and twenty years rolled away, and his predecessor in that very seat was putting before the House precisely the same idea.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Let my hon. friends hear me out. I have said, Sir, that this was a very old friend. And, most assuredly, no more fitting time could be imagined for the introduction of our old friend to our notice than when the third census that has been taken in Canada since the promulgation of the national policy will give us, as I shall presently show, such an opportunity as we have never had before of seeing what that policy has done for Canada. Now, Sir, I am not going to wade through all the weary statistics that afflicted my hon. friend; I am not going to bother myself with the doctrine of averages as defined by himself or anybody else. There is better game afoot. However, in the first place, I would like to know from my hon. friend what are those 'official statistics,' forsooth, which induced him to dispute the assertion of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) who sits beside me that, in all human probability, the growth of Canada during the last five years had been equal to that during the fifteen years preceding. Perhaps my hon. friend would gratify my curiosity ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Year-book.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am sorry for my hon. friend if that is all the authority he has to adduce. The Year-book may be a very valuable document. I will give a few illustrations of what the Year-book was worth a little while ago. I remember that this same document—I thought that that was what my hon. friend referred to—estimated, in 1887, that the population of Canada was 4,856,226. In 1888 the Year-book's estimation of the population of Canada was 4,946,497. In 1899, it had risen to 5,075,855. They suppressed 1890 and 1891, but I will carry out the calculation. On the same line of calculation, the Year-book would have given us a population of 5,210,000 for 1890, and 5,345,000 for 1891—just ten years ahead of time. These are the 'official statistics' that the hon. gentleman relied upon for the purpose of contradicting what, as I shall show presently, was a very well-reasoned hypothesis on the part of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding). There is another matter I would like to call to the attention of the House. I do not know whether the House noticed it, but I did, that, whenever the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) was able to point to anything showing the slightest reduction in our trade with Great Britain, his loyal followers cheered; and, when he was able to point to any increase in our trade with the United States, his loyal followers cheered more loudly. Let me give the hon. gentleman a few facts as to our trade with Great Britain. We need not follow those microscopic fluctations on which the hon. gentleman lays so much stress. A large trade will vary one or two points from year to year, no doubt. But, what were the broad facts as to our trade with Great Britain ? In 1889, our trade with Great Britain was $43,277,000, on which we collected a duty of $9,576,000. In 1897, the last year of the national policy, our trade with Great Britain had fallen to $29,401,000. In 1901, our trade with Great Britain was $42,819,000, on which we collected a duty of $7,845,000. What did our preference do for Great Britain ? In eight years, under the national policy, we had lost $14,000,000; in the four years under our policy we had gained $14,000,000. And, whereas under the old tariff on imports of about forty-three and a quarter millions, we collected $9,576,000 of duty, under our tariff, on imports of almost forty-three millions—bear in mind, the merest fraction of a difference—we collected $7,845,000 of duty, or about $1,700,000 less duty than was collected on a nearly similar amount of goods imported into Canada in 1889. Of course, there are fluctuations, we know that perfectly well. It has been stated recently—I think the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) told us the other night—that there had been a fluctuation amounting to several millions in the importation of cheese into Great Britain. Under these circumstances what did the present government do ? Did it sit down and wail ? Not a bit. My hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Fisher) at once held a conference with those who represented the great dairy interests of this country, and they are now applying themselves, as men should do, not to give more protection for the dairy interests, but to enable them to help themselves over their difficulty and restore the cheese interest of Canada to the proud position it has hitherto held in the British market. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) thought it a very absurd thing that the hon. Minister of Finance should intimate that the government had anything to do with the prosperity which, thank heaven, has blessed Canada during the past four years. That is a very new doctrine from those benches. When I sat here before and the hon. gentleman's predecessor sat there, was there a day, was there an hour, in which it was not thundered out, much more loudly than my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) has done, that a government did not deserve to exist for an hour—this was what was said by Sir Charles Tupper—unless it could bring prosperity to a country ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What does the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) say about it ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. This was the doctrine of my hon. friend's predecessor. Does he repudiate Sir Charles Tupper ? Does he say that Sir Charles Tupper was wrong ? Does he pretend to say that the great and the good Sir Charles Tupper was saying what he did not mean when he said that a government was good for nothing which did not bring prosperity to a country ?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What did my hon. friend say ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I said then, what I say now—that even the best government that ever existed, even a government like Mackenzie's, could not altogether avert a disaster which overspread the whole world, though it could greatly modify it; and that the position of Canada while Mackenzie was at the head of the administration, compared most favourably with the condition of the adjoining republic, the United States, as every man who examined the conditions of the United States from 1873 to 1879 knows right well. That, Sir, is what I told the hon. gentleman. Now, it is quite true that the best governments cannot always avert a calamity, but unfortunately the reverse is only too true, that a government can very easily bring about disaster to a country, as I shall presently show the government which we displaced was eminently successful in doing, from 1878 to 1896.

Now, Sir, the doctrine of averages is a great doctrine, the favourite doctrine, I remember, of my old friend Sir Leonard Tilley, and I cannot see that it has advanced much in the hands of his successor. But take a sample or two of the doctrine of averages, take the case of Holland. My hon. friend was great on the fact that we apparently discriminated against Great Britain, although I do not think he quite understood the case. We will take the case of Holland, and I call his attention to it. From Holland we imported the last year $797,000 worth of goods, and we taxed these imports $1,350,000. Was not that a fearful discrimination, 170 per cent on the average of goods we imported from Holland? Perhaps my hon. friend thinks that, being pro-Boers, it is all right to punish the Dutch. Or how does he explain that horrible discrimination against the unfortunate Hollanders? We imported less than $800,000 worth, and taxed it $1,350,000. Has my hon. friend any explanation to give?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I should say it was gin.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. He is perfectly right, it was gin; and it shows the utter absurdity of applying this same doctrine of averages. Here one single article amounting to about one-fourth of the whole importation is so taxed that it brings the average up to 170 per cent. Yet the hon. gentleman thinks it is quite safe to apply the doctrine of averages as between Canada and Great Britain, and as between Canada and the United States. Now, I will give the hon. gentleman another illustration of the danger of relying on this doctrine of averages. We import from the United States this very moment a very large quantity of anthracite coal and a very large quantity of cotton wool. Suppose my hon. friend here in the exercise of his discretion was to place a duty of, let us say five per cent, on those articles, and what would the result be? Why, he would at once lower the average on the importations of American goods from twenty-five to twenty per cent. Would that be a proof that we discriminated in favour of the United States as against England? And yet, Sir, under these conditions we would be importing goods from the United States on an average of twenty per cent as against twenty-five per cent charged against England.

Sir, the whole comparison that the hon. gentleman has made of the expenditure is vicious to a degree. I hoped better from the hon. gentleman. I hoped he would have had the candour, when he came to compare the expenditure of last year with that of half a dozen years ago, to point out that a very large proportion of our increased expenditure could not have occurred in the time of his predecessor, and that a very large proportion of our increased expenditure does not cost the people of Canada one cent. It has not cost one cent to the people of Canada collectively, of older Canada at any rate, that we spent a million and a half in the Yukon, because we get a million and a half and more out of the Yukon. It does not cost them one cent that we pay half a million more for sinking fund than we did in 1895. What comes out of one pocket goes into the other. If my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals asks us for six millions for the purpose of carrying on the work of the Intercolonial Railway, he brings back very nearly, though not quite, six millions to us in the increased receipts, without costing the people of Canada a penny beyond the small difference between receipts and expenditures. I beg the hon. gentleman to remember that that is quite as near to an equilibrium as the predecessors of the hon. gentleman ever got. Now, Sir, he allows nothing for that, he won't allow anything for sinking fund, he won't allow anything for expenditure on the Yukon, he won't allow anything for increased receipts from the railway, he won't allow anything for increased receipts from the post office. My hon. friend the Postmaster General, I believe, is spending about $300,000, in round numbers, more than was spent in 1895. But my hon. friend is getting back $500,000 more. The deficit is very considerably less now than the deficit was then; and the people of Canada, Sir, have received, under my hon. friends administration, the advantage that they can send a letter for two cents from one end of the British empire to the other which used to cost them five cents, and they can send a letter from one end of the Dominion to the other for two cents which used to cost them three cents; in other words, they are being charged very little more than one-half what they were charged a few years ago. The burden of the people has been lessened to the extent of one million dollars, but no credit is to be given, of course, to this government for anything of that kind. Why, Sir, we will take this hon. gentleman's mode of calculating and computing the average expenditure. We will suppose, for illustration's sake, that the railways were earning twenty-five millions, and that my hon. friend was expending twenty million dollars upon them. Under these conditions, if we were to apply the line of argument used by the hon. gentleman, the people of Canada would be four dollars per head worse off than they were before ; the expenditure per head would be about fourteen dollars instead of ten dollars under those circumstances, and we would be, I suppose, just so much worse off if his way of reckoning our expenditure is to prevail.

Now, the hon. gentleman must needs mix and muddle up capital and ordinary expenditure. That is always indiscreet, that always leads to confusion. They must be judged by different canons and different principles, and he would have done far better to confine himself to the ordinary expenditure. Sir, I am willing to meet the hon. gentleman, I am always willing to meet these hon. gentlemen on their own ground. I will take a parallel case. He was appalled just now because my hon. friend spent $57,000,000 last year and was in danger of spending $65,000,000 for all purposes during the next year. Sir, I turn to the public records which I have under my hand and I find that in 1884 this hon. gentleman's predecessors found it necessary to expend $57,-860,000 ; in 1885 they found it necessary to expend $49,163,000; in 1886—let the hon. gentleman mark it—they were obliged to spend $61,837,000. Sir, on what population ? The population of Canada in 1884-85-86 amounted roughly to about 4,450,000 to 4,500,000 souls. Now, Sir, if it be such a terrible thing for us to expend $57,000,000, or even $65,000,000, if, as this hon. gentleman declares, it is so terrible a thing that the gross total expenditure of Canada for all purposes, good, bad or indifferent, whether productive or unproductive, should range to a matter of $10 or $11 per head, what has he to say of the case of 1884 when the average annual expenditure per capita amounted to $13.50, or of 1885, when the average annual expenditure per capita amounted to $11.18, or of 1886, when it amounted to $13.75 ? It is a poor rule that wont work both ways. I care little myself for this doctrine of averages, but if it pleases the hon. gentlemen to know what the averages are, why, I am always willing to oblige them. Sir, let us look at the broad facts of the case. We find that the broad facts of the case are these : In 1895, as he can see by looking at the public records, our total expenditure on consolidated account was $38,138,000. Our population, taking his own estimate, which I do not concur in for reasons I will give presently, was about five million. Now, in 1901 it is quite true that our expenditure amounted to $46,866,000 ; but of that sum $5,000,000 represented cross entries, sums which we received with one hand and which we paid out with the other, sums for sinking fund, sums for post office, sums for Yukon Territory, sums recived from the railway and paid out again in wages on the railway.

Strike, as I have a right to strike, this $5,000,000 out, and then apply your per capita calculation. What is the result ? Your 5,000,000 people in 1895 spent $38,138,-000 representing an expenditure per head of $7.63, and your 5,370,000, deducting the $5,000,000 I have spoken of, as entries on both sides of the account, expended $41,-360,000, being a per capita amount of $7.70 as against $7.63. Well, Sir, seven cents per head are not to be sneezed at. We required three of those cents (with the full concurrence of hon. gentlemen opposite) to pay our extra indemnity last year. We required four cents of the balance, making up the seven cents, to meet the necessary expense incurred by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) in collecting nearly double the revenue we had in 1895. I ask the hon. gentleman, does he consider that the people of Canada are any poorer with the addition of this $5,-000,000 for the purposes that I have enumerated, or, do any of the hon. gentleman's friends contend that it should be fairly counted as a part of the taxation to be reckoned against us, in stating as he did the fact that we spent $50,000,000 a year as against the $40,000,000 spent by our predecessors ? I have not the time, but I would like to go over the $3,000,000 of difference between the $46,000,000 and the $38,000,000, deducting the $5,000,000 that I have spoken of, and I think if the hon. gentleman or any of his friends, choose to go over that in detail they will see that for that additional sum that was expended by us during these five or six years the people have received very ample returns. A certain portion of that amount was expended for the benefit of the agricultural community and they have received, I venture to say, from ten to twenty fold in the increased value of their productions from the annual expenditure which was made for the purpose of promoting their interests under the administration of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher), Another considerable portion of that expenditure was for the purpose of promoting and increasing immigration to this country, one of the most desirable objects in a country like Canada for which we can possibly expend our money. Yet another part, with the full concurrence and approbation of these hon. gentlemen who are constantly pressing us, forsooth, to spend more money in that direction, was expended for the purpose of putting our militia on a more efficient footing. And so, I might go on through the whole of it. The hon. gentleman has not chosen to do it. Possibly the hon. gentleman considered that as neither he nor his friends ventured to oppose these expenditures on the floor of the House, they could not with much decency criticise them on the present occasion.

As to the capital expenditure, that, I say, is entirely on another footing. It must be judged by itself because it may be productive, or it may be unproductive. If it be not productive it is the hon. gentleman's duty, and it is the duty of his friends behind him, to criticise any proposition we make and I invite him most cordially to do so. It is all very well to say that because we have added a few million dollars to the public debt we are open to criticism. It is for the hon. gentleman to show that this expenditure will not be profitable. An addition of $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 may be a most useful and productive outlay, while, on the other hand, an addition of half a million to the public debt may be most useless and mischievous. You must judge each case on its individual merits. We are all prepared, and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) is prepared, to challenge the sharpest criticism as to any amounts we have added to the public debt for the purpose of public improvements, and here I may add as to the remainder, it is well known that a very considerable portion of the addition to the public debt was incurred by the gift we made to England to help her in her South African difficulty. I must say that I did hope for better things from the hon. leader of the opposition who is a lawyer and a lawyer of repute. I thought that he would have embraced this opportunity to make something like a discriminating review of these expenditures. I expected that making due allowance for the circumstances I have referred to, that recognizing the facts I have stated, that admitting that it was not fair to charge us with those large sums which came into one pocket as fast as they went out of the other, that admitting what he has not alluded to in the slightest degree that within the last four years there has been a marked increase in the cost of living and a marked increase in the rates of wages all through the Dominion necessarily involving a large increase in the cost of carrying on public works, that allowing that there is an increase of population under our regime to be accounted for, and that this was a growing time in a period of great expansion, if then he had any criticism to make, if he thought there had been improvidence and extravagance my hon. friend might have done a great service to this country by pointing it out. I, myself, desire to say that I think the time has come when we should proceed more cautiously, when we must consider very carefully what further large expenditures we commit ourselves to, and I think that in that respect the opposition, if they choose to do their duty, may be of considerable use to us. The hon. gentleman talks very lightly and rather flippantly, I think of the progress of Canadian trade. I do not take quite the same view as the hon. gentleman does. I do not regard it as being a matter of indifference that our Canadian imports and Canadian exports should expand in a ratio hitherto unknown in this country. I have here a rather interesting table showing the total trade of Canada, our imports and exports, as compared with the trade of Australasia, the trade of the United States, the trade of Great Britain, the trade of Belgium, the trade of France and the trade of Germany. I will give the House a few extracts from that which are worth considering. Our total imports, per capita, in 1890 amounted to about $24. In 1895 they were $22, per capita, and in 1900 they had risen to $36.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman dislikes to hear that Canada's imports have increased. I differ from him. I take issue with him and with all those other hon. gentlemen. I am glad to see Canada's imports increase, and I am glad to see Canada's exports increase. I think, if he does not, that if we wish to sell we must also buy. In 1890 our exports amounted to $19 per capita, in 1895 they had risen to $22, while in 1900 they had risen to $36, or nearly double within the period of ten years, and they have largely increased within the period of four years that I have alluded to. How does this compare with the trade of the other countries which I have mentioned during corresponding periods? In Australasia imports remained stationary and exports increased at a vastly less ratio than ours. Ours rose from $19 to $36, while theirs rose from $45 to $59 per capita. In the case of the United States I find that they began in 1890 with $13 per capita, that in 1895 they had sunk to about $12, and that in 1900 the per capita exports of the United States had risen to $19. That is to say that they were just exactly in the position which we held ourselves ten years ago, and at this present moment have very little more than half per head in their export trade of that of Canada.

I take the total volume of trade. In 1890 it amounted to $44 per head; in 1895 it amounted to the same; in 1900 it had risen to $71 per head. And, how does this compare with our neighbours to the south? In 1890 it was $26 per head in the United States; in 1895 it was $23 per head in the United States, and in 1890 their total volume of trade amounted to $29 per head; very little more than one-third per head as much as the people of Canada. I have not time to go through all these figures, but I will give the House the general result. Of all these countries—and several of them, as you know, are in the very van of progress in all ways—of Australia, the United States, Great Britain, Belgium, France, and Germany, Canada has increased at all points; increased in her imports, increased in her exports, increased in her total volume of trade, in a far greater ratio than the best of the others—not by any means excepting Great Britain.

Our volume of trade compares with Great Britain, as follows : In 1890 we had $44 per head; in 1890 Great Britain had $97 per head. In 1900, we had $71 per head; we had increased in the ratio of about 60 per cent; and Great Britain had $104 per head, having increased in the ratio of about 7 per cent. I commend these figures to my hon. friends opposite. They ought to do them good, but I am afraid they won't so long as they continue in their hide-bound state of adherence to their medieval ideas of trade and commerce.

Now, Sir, this tariff-making which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is engaged in is no doubt a very interesting problem. Perhaps he will pardon me for giving him a few hints. I am an older man than he is; I have a little more experience in the trade. I think I can give him a few hints even in the art of making a tariff to suit a protective community. Would it surprise my hon. friend (Mr. Borden, Halifax) very much to know that it would be a very easy matter indeed to make a tariff which should be at once and the same time a most highly protective tariff and yet under which the average duty on all imports would be very low indeed ? Would it surprise him to hear that ? Would he like to know how it is done—it may be useful to him ? Would it surprise him to know that it would be equally easy to double, to treble, and to quadruple the actual taxation of the people of the country and at the same time to reduce their nominal taxation to one-half or one-third of what it now is ? Would it surprise him to know that ? Would it surprise him very much to know that it would be an easy matter—and he is on the high road to it—to frame a tariff under which the people of Canada should be taxed $60,000,000 a year, and under which $20,000,000 would go into the treasury and $40,000,000 would go into the pockets of a few favoured interests, from whom in good time a campaign fund might be levied as in the old days to keep the hon. gentlemen opposite in power ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) does not know that, I will be very pleased to give him a few lessons in these three matters at any time he likes. Here you have the protective practice and the protective theory in a nutshell. What I have suggested is not a mere matter of academic possibility, but it is what is being done to-day in the United States, which the hon. gentleman has been holding up to us during the latter part of his speech as such a model of political economy. I have very great respect for the memory of the late Mr. McKinley. I had the pleasure of making his acquaintance, and I very greatly honour Mr. McKinley in many respects; but he was not the sort of person whom I would advise a Canadian legislator to look up to as a model of all that was wise and prudent and successful in economic questions. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is disposed to follow Mr. McKinley. I have no objection. It is not the first time that we have found these gentlemen hiding a very strong appreciation of American political methods and of American political designs under the guise of an earnest desire to keep up British connection.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Now, Sir, while I am on this subject, I would like to say a word to our manufacturing friends. I understand that many of them are pleased to regard me as their particular enemy. Well, Sir, I have no desire to quarrel with the manufacturers of Canada. I desire to do justice to them as I desire to do justice to all classes of my fellow-countrymen. But, I would like to say a few words to these gentlemen. Sir John Macdonald was in the habit very frequently of calling attention to a certain epitaph which he said he had seen in a grave yard, to the effect :

I was well, I would be better, here I am.

Now, Sir, I would advise our manufacturing friends to lay this to heart.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I say that this government has treated them with the greatest consideration. I say that this government used all possible care to see that their interests—not alone, mind you, but in common with the interests of the rest of the people—were safeguarded in the preparation of our present tariff. And in any alterations that may be made in the tariff, whatever line they may be pleased to take, I for one shall never advise that injustice be done to the manufacturers or done to anybody. But, I have to say to them, that they have had most uncommonly good fortune and most uncommonly good times. If they have used these well they ought to be most admirably prepared to-day to meet any reverses which may happen to overtake them, as reverses may overtake them, as reverses may overtake all classes of the community. I hope they have used their opportunities well. But, I do not believe that the way to really advance their interests is to impose higher taxes for their benefit on the rest of the community. If we are to have protection, I have this to say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax). I may tell him that we will see that that protection shall be thorough. We do not want any more of the jug-handled, one-sided kind of protection which prevailed under the late administration. There are other classes to be heard. I have the honour to represent one of the richest, wealthiest, and most independent agricultural communities in the province of Ontario, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that the farmers of Ontario—and the farmers, I think, of Canada at large—are not disposed, if this protective question is to come to the front again, any more to be content with the sort of sham protection that was awarded to them before.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Sir, you cannot protect the farmers of Canada or of the North-west. You cannot protect men who raise a vast deal more of food products than they can possibly dispose of in the home market; and the price of whose farm products is fixed for them in England and in London. You cannot protect them by any paltry fence of a tariff that you may put up against importations of food from the United States. There is but one way in which the farmer, if you are going to have protection, can have a share in it. Again, I make a present to the hon. gentleman—as he appears to be desirous to protect all interests—of the way in which it ought to be done and can be done. That way is simple enough. You cannot protect the farmer, as I say, by putting up a higher tariff fence, but you can protect the farmer, if you like, by giving him a bounty on all that he raises. If you are going to have protection let it be thorough; let the farmer have protection on every bushel of grain he raises; let him have protection on every pound of bacon, every pound of butter, every pound of cheese, every horse, every cow, every hog, that he brings to maturity. Has he not the right ? Has he not as good a right as the manufacturer, the fisherman, the lumberman, the miner ? Are not the farmers men on whose prosperity the prosperity of all of us depends—the prosperity of the manufacturer, the prosperity of the professional man, the prosperity of all classes in Canada ? And, therefore, I say, that if we are to have protection, by all manner of means let it be thorough, and let us begin, and let the hon. gentleman begin, by introducing a proper scale of protection for our farmers in the only way it can be given, namely, by giving a cash bounty down on the nail to our farmers for all they may be pleased to produce.

I admit that it will cost a trifle. Our farmers are not greedy. They do not want 35 per cent, they do not want 40 per cent, or 50 per cent or 60 per cent ; they will be content with a very moderate rate. But, Sir, what would a moderate rate amount to ? Well I made a calculation. Say, for instance, ten cents a bushel on all the grain they raise, one cent a pound on all their butter, all their cheese and all their pork, $10 for each decent horse, $5 for each decent cow. It would cost a trifle—$40,000,000 or $50,000,000 ; but what is that by the side of a great principle for the benefit of the whole community, such as my hon. friend advocates ? My hon. friend sitting opposite me sees that the farmers have to be considered in this matter ; and if it be so extraordinarily advantageous, by protection, to increase the manufacturing population a few thousands, what would it be if we were to add several hundreds of thousands to the farming population by a moderate system of bounties, amounting to 10 per cent only, such as I suggest to my hon. friend ?

Sir, this puts me in mind of a little story, I do not tell many stories, and therefore I may be pardoned on this occasion. It so happened that once upon a time I was present with a distinguished member of this House, who I am afraid at this moment is slightly backsliding towards protection—no less a person than my distinguished friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). Now, my distinguished friend is a devout man. We know it because he has told us so more than once ; and, like other devout men, he had seen a vision. We were present at a certain agricultural gathering. My hon. friend narrated his vision. Like Dante, he had visited the nether regions. He had travelled through the various circles, including that circle to which faithless friends, according to Dante, are committed. At last he came to a very large and very extensive room, where he saw a number of persons suspended in a very curious attitude, closely resembling flitches of bacon prepared for market. My hon. friend addressed his sable guide, and inquired what on earth they were doing with these people overhead. The black gentleman informed him that these were the souls of farmers who in their lifetime had believed in protection, but, being found too green to burn, they were hung up to dry until they could be made fit for fuel. Now, I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet; but I warn our manufacturing friends that it would not be a very difficult business—because the tempers which once influenced the patrons of industry is not dead in Ontario—in a campaign of a few months to unite the farmers of Ontario, and I suspect the farmers of some other provinces, in a demand to be given their share of protection, if protection is to be the law of Canada ; and they are wide awake enough to know that the way I suggest is the only way in which the farmers of Canada will ever obtain any fair share of protection.

Now, Sir, I have another matter to bring before this House. As I stated at the commencement of my remarks, I was very much pleased—more pleased than I can express—that this question was being brought up at the time when the records of the third census of Canada were being laid before us.

No more fitting time could be selected for investigating the policy under which the government of Canada has been carried on during the major part of the 24 years that have elapsed since Mr. Mackenzie was defeated. My hon. friend beside me had very great cause indeed, as I thought, to congratulate the people of Canada on the immense accession of material wealth in various ways which had marked our progress during the last four years. But, Sir, there is one thing which is more important to Canada than even an increase of wealth, and that is an increase of the number of intelligent, industrious, active and vigorous people residing in Canada. That is the true wealth of a nation. That is what I desire to see grow and increase very much more than I do savings bank deposits of the volume of trade and commerce. I beg to say to hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly to the hon. leader of the opposition, that I adhere at all points to the statement made by me, not once only, but many times in this House, that the best test of the growth of any nation, more especially any young nation like Canada, with boundless areas of fertile land untouched, lies in this, whether in such a country you find the people of the land willing to stay in it, and the strangers who come induced to remain. That is the true test, not only of the growth of the country, but of the way in which it is administered. By that test I am ready to be judged, and that test I am about to apply. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the estimate which he appeared inclined to dispute, the estimate which I made of the natural increase that might be expected in a country like Canada unless violently disturbed, is perfectly correct; and the record of our census and that of the census of the United States go very far to establish it, if they do not establish it completely.

I say that the record of the last twenty years—because in order to do justice to this matter we must go back not merely to 1891 but to 1881—is a most singular record. Prima facie that record shows the grossest misgovernment on the part of those who were entrusted with the destinies of Canada during the greater part of that period. If the opposition be correct in what they appear disposed to contend, if they are right in the statement that after four years of unexampled prosperity, after adding nearly 100 per cent to the total volume of our trade and commerce, the exodus is still going on unchecked, if our growth has been as slow since 1895 as it was before that time, then I should say that the outlook for Canada was gloomy indeed. But if analysis proves the direct reverse—if I am able to show, as I think I shall be able to show, that the plague has stopped, that the current has been reversed, that our own people are remaining in Canada and that strangers are crowding in, notably from the United States, then there is a good hope for Canada, for a better era is dawning on this country.

Now, I cannot doubt that, as loyal Canadians, hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly the hon. leader of the opposition, will be very pleased to hear me say that I have good ground for stating that after a careful analysis of these two censuses, I believe first of all, the increase during the last decade is double the increase which took place during the decade from 1881 to 1891, and next, that the increase during the last five years, from 1896 to 1901, in all human probability equals the total increase of the preceding 15 years from 1881 to 1896. Sir, these are not statements to be made lightly by a man in my position, and I do not make them lightly. I shall be prepared before I sit down, even at the cost of wearying my hon. friends' patience, to give chapter and verse for these rather remarkable statements. I shall be prepared to show that the error which has led to the statements which have been circulated has been caused by very gross frauds in the census of 1891; that the returns for 1891 were purposely and deliberately for political purposes swelled unduly; and that in consequence the apparent rate of increase from 1891 to 1901 was very materially reduced. I challenge the keenest criticism on this point. If I make good the statements to which I now pledge myself, if I am able to show that the increase during the last decade was double the increase which took place between 1881 and 1891, and that the increase during the last five years in all probability is fully equal to the increase that took place during the preceding fifteen years, then I say that is a most pregnant fact, and while it is the best augury for the future, it sheds a most lurid light on the manner in which the administration of Canada was carried on from 1878 to 1896.

Sir, I say that the passage in the Address to which the hon. gentleman referred is true in all particulars and true to the letter. But first I would desire to contradict a slanderous statement which has crept into the public press, and concerning which I believe that those who circulated it did not fully comprehend what they were about. I refer to the statement which endeavours to put the blame for the small increase in the population of Canada on the shoulders of the ladies of Canada. I stand here to refute that slander and to say that the ladies of Canada, now as ever, have done their duty faithfully to their country. And if our numbers are less than we think they should be, it is no fault of theirs. If the men will go away what are the poor women to do? It is not through any fault of theirs that the rate of increase has not been so great as we would have desired. Of course we know that evil communications corrupt good manners, and it may be that here and there, certain Yankee practices have crept in; but I deny that such practices have affected in the slightest degree, the great majority. They are prepared to do their duty by their country now and ever as they have always done. One thing more, I am breaking no state secret when I say that long ago I foresaw just this controversy which has occurred, and I was very desirous, when I came into office—knowing that gross frauds had been committed in 1891 in taking the census—to establish a fair point of departure, so that we might have absolute legal proof of where Canada had arrived in 1896. There was a good deal to say against taking a census then. No doubt such a measure was a contentious one and would have been violently opposed by the other side. Our finances were not very flourishing in 1896, and I am far from saying that those who opposed the idea had not a great deal to say for themselves. But I regret that we did not take a census in 1896 and obtain legal, absolute proof of what our population was at that time. I think, however, I will be able to lay before this House such ample circumstantial evidence as will fully bear out the statement I have just made.

I propose to deal with the exodus in several aspects. First, as regards its extent, which has been greatly underrated, or at least not sufficiently appreciated, by the people of Canada. I propose to deal with it also with respect to the quality of the exodus, which I consider to have been, in every sense and shape, a double loss to Canada. The people we lost and sent to the United States were emphatically the very flower of our population. They were to a most unusual extent, composed of young men and women in the very best of their youth, and the only consolation I have ever been able to find has been that wherever I have gone through the United States, from one end to the other, always and everywhere, I have found Canadians doing well, occupying places of trust and emolument, and in many cases places of the very highest position. I doubt whether any equal number of the people of the United States—any equal number, whether they be native or foreign born—could show to-day so many persons well and highly placed as the Canadian immigration to the United States. Look to the United States Senate and you will find Canadians there. Look to the United States judiciary and you will find them on the bench. Look at the very front rank of American inventors, who can surpass Edison, a Canadian boy. Look at the front rank of railway magnates, and there you will find Canadians. Everywhere you will find them, and if the very best of our people have gone to the United States, that only makes the loss to us the more severe, and how severe I shall presently proceed to show.

Our people hardly appreciate the immense extent of the loss which we sustained from 1880 to 1891. In 1880, according to the census returns of the United States, there were 717,000 Canadians in that country. In 1890 that number had increased to 980,000; in 1900 it amounted to 1,181,000. You will remember that in order to keep up the number of those who were found in the United States at any one of these given periods, a very much larger number than the difference between those found in 1890 and those found in 1880 must have emigrated to the United States. You cannot possibly put the death rate at less than 2 per cent per annum bearing in mind the very large number who had been in the United States a long period. If you bear that in mind, you find that Canada lost from 1880 to 1890 not less than 433,000 souls altogether, and from 1890 to 1900 Canada lost certainly not less than 417,000 souls. In other words, in the two decades, beginning in 1880 and terminating in 1900, the total loss to Canada—the absolute and ascertained loss—was not less than 850,000 souls; and bearing in mind that a most unusually large number of these people were men and women in the very flower of their youth, you must in all conscience, add to these the children who would naturally have been born to them had they remained in Canada, if you wish to form an estimate of the total loss to Canada during those years. Putting all those together, is it possible to believe that we lost less than 1,400,000 people who ought to have been in Canada between 1880 and 1901.

I have stated that this was a most miserable exhibit. I am aware that hon. gentlemen opposite have not paid very much attention to this rather unwelcome subject, and I doubt if they have ever taken the trouble to consider how other countries similarly circumstanced to ours have fared during the same period of twenty years. We, from 1880 to 1901, have barely added one million to our population. We began with 4,324,000, and we have increased to 5,370,000. What was the record in the United States during the last twenty years? Beginning with a population of 50,155,000, they rose to 62,000,000 in 1890, and advanced to 76,000,000 in 1900. The United States gained 26,000,000 in these twenty years, against Canada's 1,000,000. We gained at the rate of about 25 per cent—not quite that—in a period of twenty years, and the United States gained at the rate of 52 per cent. But I will take an illustration that is better than that. Take the United States at a time when they had no immigrants to fall back on, when the United States were left to their own resources, when locomotion was slow, when every yard of territory had to be gained at the point of the rifle, from 1790 to 1810, when the population of the United States was very considerably less than the population of Canada in 1880. How stands the record then? In 1790, the United States had a population of 3,929,000; in 1810, the population had risen to 7,239,000. They had gained 3,310,000 on a population of less than 4,000,000; while we with the large addition from the immigrants who came to us, had gained a bare 1,000,000 in a like period starting with a population of about 4,300,000. Am I not justified in saying that this is a most miserable exhibit? Or, I will take the states adjoining our Northwest. Take the states of Dakota and Minnesota. In 1880, Dakota had a population of 135,000; in 1900, the population had risen to 720,000. Minnesota, in 1880, had a population of 780,000, and in 1900, the population had risen to 1,750,000. Why, in Dakota and Minnesota alone, in these twenty years, the growth of population was 1,500,000, starting as they did with a population of less than a million. Some of these hon. gentlemen opposite are fond of talking of national humiliation, because, forsooth, we buy more from the United States than we sell to the United States. But I have not heard them tell us what grievous national humiliation it is that England buys from us a great deal more than England sells to us. How it can be a disgrace to us to buy more from the United States than we sell to them, and not a disgrace for England to buy more from us than she sells to us, I do not see. But I say that this is the true national humiliation, that, under the circumstances I have stated, with boundless territories almost unexplored, with room for fifty millions of people—I well believe, for a hundred million—we are unable, after twenty years, to point to an increase of more than one million, while the United States, under far more disadvantageous circumstances, were able to show an increase of 3,300,000. I say that this is a national disgrace, and speaks in trumpet tones of the gross misgovernment and mismanagement of those who were charged with the government of the country during the greater part of that time.

I have said that I have very grave ground to distrust the census of 1891. One of my grounds was the conduct of the government of that day when the accuracy of that census was challenged. Unfortunately, there are but few here who had seats in parliament in 1891. But those hon. gentlemen who were then in the House will remember, when my hon. friend the present Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Borden) rising in his place, brought forward most incontrovertible evidence that gross frauds had been committed in one subdivision at least in his own province, how his statements were received. If the government had been honest men, they would have ordered a rigorous investigation. Or, at least and at lowest, they would have abstained from throwing every obstacle in their power in the way of the investigation that my hon. friend desired. They would give us no satisfaction, no opportunity to extend the scope of our investigation. But enough was done by my hon. friend on that occasion to show clearly and distinctly, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that, in the case he gave there had been very gross and deliberate stuffing of the lists on the part of the census enumerator. That was one ground for distrust. Another and even graver ground is to be found in the conduct of the enumerators employed. There were two objects which the census enumerators of that day had in mind. They were extremely desirous of making it appear that the national policy was a success. They were extremely desirous of swelling the number of the people. As it happens, we are in possession of very perfect evidence as to the means they adopted for the purposes of glorifying the national policy. Hon. members who were in the House at that time will remember how astonished they were to find that the national policy had called into existence twenty-five thousand new industries in the space of ten years. And we were still more astonished when we got hold of vol. 'C,' the third volume of the census of 1891, and when it dawned on our astonished mind what sort of means the Conservative enumerator on the warpath is ready to use for ad majorem Dei gloriam his own emolument and the renown of the national policy. I have here some choice samples, very choice samples, of the way in which these gentlemen made something out of nothing and created five and twenty thousand new industries to order. I find that, in 1881, Canada had eleven carpet factories. But I find that in 1891, Canada boasted 557 carpet factories. Of these, Sir, seventy were located in the good county of Antigonish. And a curious fact it is, which I have not been able quite to understand, that it is on record that these seventy factories employed sixty-nine hands. There was one man; sixty-four old women; one boy, and three girls. I am inclined to believe that the man, owing to the wonderful effects of the national policy, must have become ambidexterous and so expert that he could run two factories, one with each hand. I find on further examination—I am quoting, remember, from the census record, that invaluable volume 'C' which I desire my friends to cherish and prize—that the machinery required to run these seventy carpet factories was valued at $1,089, being an average of $15—nearly—apiece. I find that these seventy factories paid wages to the amount of $4,539, being, roughly, I think about $60 or $65 per annum, or about $1.15 a week—approximately 20 cents per day. Sir, I proceeded in my investigations, and I found that they had done nearly as well in knitting factories by the county of Shelburne, as they had done in carpet factories by the county of Antigonish. Shelburne boasted of ninety-three knitting factories. These ninety-three knitting factories employed, I think, ninety-three hands, but I am not quite sure. At any rate, they had invested $623 in machinery, being at the rate of $6.50 per knitting factory in Shelburne. They possessed $1,500 working capital among them, being at the rate of $15 per factory. They paid in wages $1,833, being at the rate, roughly, of about $18 a year, which subdivided gave, if I remember right, about 4½ cents per day.

Not to do any wrong to the neighbouring provinces, I find that in the matter of basket factories Quebec was greatly favoured. Huntingdon possessed forty basket factories, employing forty-five hands. The value of the land, of the land, Sir, on which these forty-five basket factories stood, is given by the enumerator, I think, at $690 collectively, amounting to $17 each for the value of the land. The buildings are put at $1,800 collectively, amounting to $45 per building, $62 in all. Subsequent inquiries have led me to believe they were probably wigwams, constructed of bark. Their total wages, amounting to $1,970, being $47 a year, was ninety cents a week, or say fifteen cents per day.

New Brunswick, Sir, was rich, not in baskets but in carpet factories. New Brunswick had fifty-one factories employing fifty-one hands. These fifty-one hands required $707 worth of machinery to keep them going, and they earned wages at the rate of ten cents per day. Sir, we made a pretty careful investigation. We took Port Hope. Port Hope, I believe, had 147 industrial establishments, 120 of them employed 200 hands, one man or one woman as the case might be, and about half a boy or half a girl at each factory. And so on, and so on, and so on, until, before we had threshed the thing out, it became tolerably apparent that these census enumerators had succeeded in discovering 25,000 new industrial establishments out of what an ordinary mortal would have considered about 500. Why, Sir, such was the zeal of these worthy men that it is on record that rather than omit anything they included among industrial establishments certain institutions which I believe the great and good Saint Augustin has described as necessary evils, but which, until they fell in the way of the Conservative census enumerator, no one, past or present, sacred or profane, ever yet described as an industrial institution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I call attention to these matters for a definite purpose. Here you will see very clearly what was the animus that actuated the men who were intrusted with the task of compiling the census tables in 1891. If they were capable, in a case where detection was almost certain, of perpetrating the gross and impudent frauds I have just narrated, think you, they would hesitate to add here and there a name to the members of the family where detection was almost impossible, particularly under our de jure system ?

Now, Sir, I come to the Ontario returns for 1901. If these returns are correct, and if the returns for 1891 are correct, certain amazing results make themselves apparent. Sir, I knew Ontario from 1881 to 1891 as few men knew it. I had travelled Ontario a dozen times from end to end during those ten years ; I had addressed hundreds of thousands of my fellow countrymen during that interval.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It had a very bad effect.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not think, if Sir John A. Macdonald was alive, he would say that the results in 1891 were beneficial to his party. Sir, I made it a special subject of inquiry, I spoke of it in my place in parliament, I inquired constantly in every possible place where I had any opportunity of obtaining information as to the exodus which was going on in Ontario from 1881 to 1891, and I obtained all sorts of evidence that the exodus was unparalleled, and everybody who knows Ontario knows that during that decade we lost an almost unprecedented number of our people. Sir, if, as I say, the census we have now got is correct, and if the census of 1891 is correct, this very remarkable result follows, that the growth of Ontario from 1881 to 1891 was three times as great as the growth of Ontario from 1891 to 1901, although the latter period includes four years of remarkable prosperity, to the people of Ontario at any rate. It follows also that the growth of Ontario from 1891 to 1901 was scarcely one-fourth part of the growth of England during the last decade. This other very remarkable result follows : We find that in Ontario, between 1881 and 1891, the number of families increased from 366,000 to 414,000. There was an increase of 48,000 families, and an increase in population of 191,000. In this second decade from 1891 to 1901, there was an increase of 40,367 families, and a total growth of population of only 68,000, as against 191,000 in the previous decade. There is another remarkable fact that I have to bring forward. Putting out of count the new districts, the unorganized districts in which a great part of the increase occurred, as everybody knows, it is a remarkable circumstance that the municipal census of Ontario shows that, less Nipissing, less Muskoka, less Parry Sound and less Algoma, there was a growth of about 70,000 between 1891 and 1901, while, according to the government census, there is only an increase of 16,000. Now, Sir, what is the deduction to be drawn from that ? The deduction is unanswerable, the deduction is clear, that there were a very considerable number of persons in Ontario in 1901 more than there were in 1891, and that one of two things has occurred, either the census of Ontario has been unduly diminished in 1901 by the error of our enumerators, or the census of Ontario was most unduly swollen in 1891 by the gross frauds of Conservative enumerators. I recommend hon. gentlemen to wait a little before they dispute that matter.

Now, there were a great many people, like myself, who thought that it was a very remarkable circumstance indeed that with this increase of 40,000 families in the province of Ontario there should only be an apparent increase of 68,000 people. It was supposed and alleged by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, it was supposed and alleged by their press, it was supposed and alleged by their supporters, that the number of people in Ontario had been largely underestimated and they selected the city of Toronto as a proof that the number of people in Toronto had been greatly under the mark in the enumeration. Well, Sir, they made an enumeration and they produced an apparent surplus of something like 13,000 over the number recorded by our enumerators. We caused an examination to be made into this matter. I have here the report, which I am going to lay on the Table of the House, of Mr. Carlyle, to whom was entrusted the duty of looking into this matter. Mr. Carlyle reported to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture that after a careful examination——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Who is Mr. Carlyle ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Carlyle is the gentleman who was entrusted by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture with the duty of taking the census in Toronto.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He is ex-Ald. Carlyle.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am going to give the House the benefit of Mr. Carlyle's figures, and it bears very remarkably on the assertion that the census taken, as far as our enumerators were concerned, was incorrect. The police commissioners took a census which showed a population of about 13,000 more than the census did, but when we came to examine the details of the police commissioners' census, we found that 4,000 students in the schools and colleges had been included, naturally enough, in the police census, who had not been included by our enumerators, because they had been reckoned elsewhere. We found that several thousand visitors from the country were at various hotels and had been included by the police commissioners' enumerators, who had not been included by our enumerators, that a considerable number of domestic servants had been counted by the police commissioners who had not been counted by our enumerators, and when you add to that the natural growth of Toronto during the seven months between the time of the taking of our census in April and the taking of the police commissioners' census, which would account for about 3,000, or 4,000, you get a remarkable confirmation of the accuracy of the enumeration made under the control of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture. It is well known, Sir, that whereas Toronto remained as to population stationary during a period of five or six years from 1891 to 1897, after 1897, Toronto, I am happy to say, regained its former growth and on the average has been increasing at the rate of 6,000 or 7,000 a year. I place this on the Table for the information of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. SPROULE. Might I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that all this mass of figures will hardly be admitted to 'Hansard' unless he reads the report ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Well, I have read all the figures that are pertinent, and I hand the report over and place it on the Table for the information of hon. gentlemen. I am afraid that if the hon. gentleman insisted on my reading all the figures I have here, I would be obliged to keep this House in session for a most unusual length of time.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I notice that this is a typewritten copy of the report, and of course it would be contrary to the usual rule to put it on 'Hansard' unless he reads it ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Has the hon. gentleman any wish to have it ?

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he would lay it on the Table so that it might appear in 'Hansard.'

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No, not in 'Hansard,' but simply that the hon. gentleman might have access to it. Now, I desire to say that personally I would very greatly prefer to be able to believe that the miscount which I think has clearly taken place in Ontario was due to an under enumeration. It would be very much to the interest of myself and to the interest of the government, as it would relieve us of a very great deal of trouble and perplexity if we were able to say that the number credited to Ontario was greatly less than rightly belonged to it. I would desire that the enumeration might prove to be faulty, but the evidence we have been able to obtain and the examination we have been able to make go to show that our enumerators did their duty properly and that if any error has occurred, and error there undoubtedly has been, it to a very large extent arose from the miscount which took place in 1891. Now, Sir, I would like to call the attention of the House to the position in which the census enumerators found themselves in 1891. A general election had just taken place. The question of the exodus had been a burning issue and the public mind was much excited on the question of the exodus. These persons who were employed as enumerators knew right well that the government of that day, their friends, were tottering to their fall, that Sir John Macdonald's days were numbered, that the result of the investigation then being prosecuted at the instance of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) would not fail to disclose facts extremely damaging to the Conservative administration and they knew perfectly well that if they were to give it out that the population of Ontario had been reduced between 1881 and 1891 to such an extent that the province was likely to lose several seats, the result could not fail to be most disastrous to the Conservative party. They were under the strongest motives to falsify the census, and they had shown what manner of men they were by the figures that they returned in respect to the enumeration of industries recently laid before you. But, I have to say to hon. gentlemen, if they do not think this is a sufficient reason it does not affect my main argument at all. Sir, if there has been a large increase in the population of Ontario, it equally proves my position that the increase between 1891 and 1901 has been very much greater than the increase from 1881 to 1891. Take it whichever way you please, it will not affect my main argument. If we diminished the population, we diminished it, Sir, to our own great injury. We certainly could not have desired to diminish the number of people in Ontario, or anywhere else, whereas the enumerators, as I have shown, who were employed by the Conservative government, had the strongest possible motives in the spring of 1891 to falsify the record and prevent the iniquities of their friends being brought to the knowledge of the people. It is, I see, just five minutes to six o'clock, and as I have a good deal more to say on this subject and cannot possibly conclude by that time, I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose I had been pointing out the extraordinary discrepancies which had occured between the census returns for 1901 and the census returns of 1891, for the province of Ontario. I think that both sides of the House will probably agree with me in this: That when you find that the municipal census of Ontario in the organized districts shows some 70,000, or nearly 70,000 more population than the government census does, and when you find that an addition of 40,000 families has resulted in the addition of barely 68,000 to the population of Ontario in ten years; I think that both sides of the House will agree thus far in believing that a prima facie case has been made out that there has been a gross error in either the census of 1891 or the census of 1901. So far I shall probably get the assent even of hon. gentlemen on the other side. As to whether that error occurred through the default of the enumerators of 1891 or the default of the enumerators of 1901 may be a question. For myself, while I entertain no doubt of the main fact, that is to say, of the discrepancy which exists between the two censuses of 1891 and 1901 in Ontario, and while I think that the presumption is very strong indeed that the error arose on the part of the enumerators in 1891; I am quite willing to admit that that is a fair subject for argument.

I have a few points to bring before the House in that connection before I proceed to the other divisions of Canada. It came to my knowledge between 1881 and 1891 that the exodus from Ontario had been enormous. I will give the House three cases all within my own personal knowledge which goes to show how very wide-spread that exodus was. In 1887 or 1888, I made inquiries from the editor of a newspaper which had a considerable circulation in western Ontario, and that gentleman informed me that in the three or four years preceding, 9,000 subscribers on its weekly list had sent him other addresses in the United States. That is to say that they had left Canada and had gone to the United States. Heretofore they had been residents in Canada and their addresses had been in Canada, but after that date he was directed to send his paper to the United States. I made inquiries with respect to the movement of the population in several small towns, and I remember that in all these a very considerable number of persons were reported within the three or four preceding years to have gone to the United States. I recollect in one small town alone; in the constituency I then represented, a town not having a population of more than 1,200 or 1,300; as many as 170 persons were reported to me, names given, to have removed to the United States within the three preceding years. I had another curious illustration of the extent of emigration from Ontario. For certain reasons of state, I was obliged to exercise a rather strict supervision over a certain election contest which took place in the earlier part of 1891 between one Alexander Gunn and one John Alexander Macdonald. The total vote polled on that occasion was a little over 3,000—and I need not tell you that every vote was polled that could be polled. Of that 3,000 we found that 400 voters in the city of Kingston had been brought from the United States at no inconsiderable expense to record their votes for Sir John Macdonald. Now, Sir, these three circumstances alone would go very far to show—and they were merely three of many others I could have obtained evidence of—they will go far to show how extensive and widespread was the emigration from Ontario to the United States between the years 1881 and 1891. I have also shown the extraordinary fraud which had been committed by the census enumerators of 1891 in the way of stuffing the census returns in the matter of industries to be credited to the national policy, and I want the House to understand distinctly that the instances I gave were only a few instances out of many score. For days and for weeks in this House, as those who were then members will recollect, it was a constant practice to compel the Finance Minister of that day, much against his will, to answer certain questions with respect to the various industries which the enumerators had discovered throughout the province of Ontario and elsewhere. I doubt if there was a single hamlet in Ontario; I doubt if there was a single village in that province containing 500 or 600 people in which these ingenious persons did not discover at least 40 or 50 industrial establishments of various kinds. They are on record; there is no mistake about it; the 'Hansard' is there to testify to this day to the remarkable ingenuity which these enumerators displayed. There was not a blacksmith, there was not an artisan, there was not a carpenter throughout the province of Ontario I verily believe, who was not put down as an industrial establishment whether the thing was run by himself or run by himself and his boy combined. I say that all these things together, coupled with the conduct of the government (on which I lay very considerable stress) in absolutely refusing their aid to an investigation when charges of gross fraud were preferred by members in their place in parliament—I say that all these things go to constitute a very strong prima facie case against the good faith of the enumerators of 1891. However, I admit there is room for argument, only I further call attention to the fact that at that particular moment the Conservative party was in a very deplorable plight, a kind of plight which would tempt and almost excuse strong party men—and we know very well that the census enumerators were strong party men—to do a good deal that they might otherwise have hesitated to do for the benefit of their party; and that it would have been in the highest degree for the benefit of their party to make the Ontario lists appear larger than they actually were, no man who remembers the condition of things in the spring of 1901 can presume to doubt.

The emigration from Ontario is peculiar in some respects. It was not, as I understand the emigration from Quebec is or was, largely composed of families. It was almost exclusively composed of individuals, generally young men or young women from their several families, and under the de jure system which prevailed then and which has prevailed since, there was a great opportunity given to any enumerators who chose to include people who had left Canada for many years, as I believe the enumerators did to a very great extent. Beyond all that—although the difficulties in our way are very great and although the expense at this distant time of ascertaining the facts is almost prohibitory—the Minister of Agriculture at my instance did cause in some cases investigation to be made. It will be for the House later on to say whether it is or it is not desirable that a commission should issue to inquire further into this matter. It is of quite sufficient importance I think to make it worthy of consideration, speaking for myself alone of course. The hon. Minister of Agriculture found that in the case of several towns, notably in the case of Goderich, notably in the case of Clinton, notably in the case of Simcoe, notably in the case of Port Dover, notably in the case of Cornwall, there was a considerable number of instances in which evident frauds had been committed. As I say, the difficulties in his way are very great. The total number of these frauds which are discovered is probably insignificant compared with the number that were actually committed, but enough have been discovered—I think that the reports are in the hands of my hon. friend, and I have no doubt he will be only too ready to lay them on the Table of the House—to show conclusively that there is good prima facie ground for saying that the census returns of 1891 for the province of Ontario were grossly stuffed.

Mr. SPROULE. Would the hon. gentleman tell us the newspaper he referred to, and 9,000 of whose subscribers he said had gone to the United States?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have no objection to state. It is the London 'Advertiser.'

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). It never had 9,000 subscribers.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. On its weekly list? My hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) is very ignorant, I am sorry to say, of the extent to which the London 'Advertiser' at that time circulated. Now, Sir, I come to another and a still more important phase of this question. As I have said, in Ontario, where I think the evidence is conclusive that there has been a grave miscount, the evidence as to the date at which that miscount took place is necessarily somewhat imperfect. I can only go on circumstantial evidence and on presumption.

But it so happens that in the sister province of Quebec we stand on much firmer ground. Every hon. gentleman who knows anything of the customs of the people of Quebec is aware that in that province the parochial clergy every year make a very accurate census of all their parishioners, and I am informed of all the people within their particular cure. From the nature of the case that census is more strictly accurate where the population is chiefly Catholic and French than where it is mixed; but in any case it is a census the fairness of which no one on either side of the House will, I think, dispute. I invite the special attention of the House to certain facts which I am about to lay before them with regard to the province of Quebec. I have here a report carefully made by a chief officer of the census, Mr. Côté, in which that gentleman gives us the difference between the parochial census taken in 1891 and the government census of that year, and the results are very extraordinary. In the county of Bagot the government census discovered 2,743 more people than the parochial investigators had been able to find three months before. In the county of Bellechasse is discovered 1,050 more people; in Berthier, 3,433 more; in Champlain, 2,230 more; in Dorchester, 608 more; in Iberville, 2,090 more; in Joliette, 3,817 more; in Kamouraska, 2,003 more; in l'Assomption, 1,223 more; in l'Islet, 1,008 more; in Lotbiniere, 1,191 more; in Maskinongé, 2,770 more; in Montmagny, 1,157 more; in Montmorency, 421 more; in Nicolet, 2,635 more; in Portneuf, 998 more; in Richelieu, 3,155 more; in Rimouski, 3,783 more; in Rouville, 3,123 more; in Témiscouata, 1,134 more. The above statement shows that the enumerators in 1891 raised in 21 counties 40,615 more names than were recorded three months previous to the census by the parish priests. I am willing to admit that there will always be a slight discrepancy between such a census and the census taken by the government enumerators. I believe the parish priests do not enumerate those who are absent at the time, and there are some other slight differences; but our census of 1901 corresponds with these parochial censuses within 8,000 souls. Therefore I say that these statements prima facie afford the clearest proof that can well be laid before the House at this distance of time that in these 21 counties of the province of Quebec the lists were stuffed in 1891 to the extent of at least 32,000 souls. Sir, that is by no means all. It is not to be supposed that this occurred in 21 districts only. There is evidence, and good evidence, as I think hon. gentlemen will have to admit, that not merely in these 21 counties, but in many others—I cannot say whether in all—of the 65 counties into which Quebec is divided, similar frauds were perpetrated. I have here a report of two subdivisions in the city of Montreal. That report shows that in these two subdivisions only the census over-estimated 1,006 persons. There were in the city of Montreal in 1891, 125 enumerators for 125 subdistricts. I do not at all pretend to say that the fictitious entries in the others were in as large as they were in these; but if there were in two subdivisions of Montreal fictitious entries to the extent of 1,006, the House can judge for itself how likely it would be that other districts would escape scot-free.

As this is a matter of more than ordinary importance, I have obtained, by the kind permission of my friend the Minister of Agriculture, more ample returns regarding the province of Quebec, which I shall proceed, for the information of the House, not to read—that would take too long a time—but to lay on the Table. Some of them, I observe, are in French; and it will be no doubt a pleasing task for some of the hon. gentlemen opposite of that persuasion—there are not many of them—to translate for the benefit of their English confreres. These are the returns for Bagot; these are the returns for Beauce; these for Berthier; these for Bonaventure; these for Bellechasse; these for Chateauguay; these for Champlain; these for Charlevoix; these for Chicoutimi; these for Dorchester; this for Gaspé. The hon. gentlemen will observe there is nothing to conceal. This for Jacques Cartier; this interesting one for Joliette; this for Kamouraska; this for l'Assomption; this for Labelle; Laprairie; Laval; Lévis; Lothbiniere; Maskinonge; Montcalm; Montmorency; the city of Montreal; Nicolet; Portneuf; Richelieu; St. Jean D'Iberville; Temiscouata.

I have here Mr. Côté's documents, which I lay on the Table, being desirous to furnish every information to hon. gentlemen.

It is utterly impossible to compute the total extent of the frauds that were committed in Quebec, but I do not think anybody will say that I am exaggerating when, after examining the evidence that I have laid on the Table, I say there is every reasonable ground for believing that at least 50,000 or 60,000 souls were improperly counted in Quebec in the census of 1891. In Ontario, as I have pointed out, I believe there was a grave miscount. I have given my reasons for thinking that that miscount occurred in 1891, and it will be for the House to judge for themselves how far those reasons are entitled to credit. But I think this much is clear. There was a very large over count in 1891, and strong probabilities—bearing in mind the evidence which the Minister of Militia produced with respect to the maritime provinces, and which was in no way contradicted—that at least from 125,000 to 150,000 persons were wrongly counted in the census of 1891, who consequently ought to be added to the census for 1901. Because it is plain to the meanest understanding that for every one improperly counted in 1891, we in 1901 are losing one. It does not very much matter to my main argument whether there was in Ontario an under count in 1901 or an over count in 1891. The main result would be the same, namely, that there has been a very much larger increase in the total population from 1891 to 1901 than the census returns of 1891 and 1901 taken together would appear to indicate.

Now, I turn to another not unimportant but comparatively insignificant matter. That is the question as to how far the increase which did take place in the last decade took place between 1891 and 1896, or 1896 and 1901. Here I must appeal to the common sense of the House. From 1891 to 1896 everybody knows—and no men were louder in declaring it than the predecessors of those hon. gentlemen—that Canada was labouring under a period of great depression, a period of deficits, of reduction of trade—just the sort of period during which many men would be sure to leave the country and very few who came in would be likely to stay. That is a patent fact known to everybody. It is equally well known that from 1896 to 1901 Canada as a whole enjoyed a most unusual amount of prosperity. It is also well known that there has been a very great reduction in the exodus which has taken place from Canada in the last four or five years. The evidence from the province of Quebec and the evidence as to the settlement of the North-west prove that beyond a doubt. And a piece of evidence, which no doubt will commend itself strongly to hon. gentlemen opposite, goes very far to prove it also. I happen to have here the assessors return for Toronto. That is an interesting document. The assessors, as you know, take a yearly census in the good city of Toronto. Let me read to the House, without inflicting on it the details, the result of the assessors' census in the city of Toronto, because it bears pretty strongly on the point which the Minister of Finance made, that there was a strong probability, to say the least, that the increase in the last five years of this decade was very much greater than in the first five years. The assessors census for 1891 gave 170,951 as the population of Toronto. In 1896 it gave that population as numbering 178,185, showing an increase in five years of just 7,000 souls. That same assessors' census in 1901 gave the population as 205,887, being an increase of 28,000 souls, in round numbers, as against 7,000 in 1896. That may not be conclusive evidence for the province of Ontario, but it is pretty clear evidence as to the movement of population in the good city of Toronto. I have been at pains to procure a list of the vacant buildings in Toronto during that period. In 1894 there were 4,633 buildings vacant. Let me read the list :

In 1894	4,633
1895	3,990
1896	4,014
1897	2,514
1898	2,672
1899	1,706
1900	761
1901	676

I submit, with all respect that this is tolerably clear evidence, quo ad Toronto at any rate, of the truth of the Finance Minister's assertion that population increased a great deal more rapidly in our regime from 1896 to 1901 than it did from 1881 to 1896. Now, if hon. gentlemen opposite admit—I do not ask them to admit, but if they are disposed, as my friends on this side are disposed, to admit—that I have made out a prima facie case for believing that there was an over count of 125,000 or 150,000 in the census of 1891, what follows ? Why, this follows, that in the ten years ending with 1891, the increased population was just about 350,000. And this further follows that, in the ten years from 1891 to 1901, the increase of population was just 700,000. And if I am correct in my opinion that, after 1896 the exodus was materially checked—I do not say abolished altogether—and if I am correct in the further statement which I make and for which I will give some further evidence presently, that from 1896 or 1897, the great bulk of the immigrants who came to this country remained in this country—then, Sir, I say it is not very unlikely, on the contrary there is the strongest ground for believing, that, after 1896, Canada gained at the rate of 100,000 a year. After all, that would be a very small matter. It would merely mean that we reduced the exodus from 50,000 to 25,000 and added 25,000 by immigration to our population. And, if that be so, if we added for five years —and all the evidence points that way—100,000 a year to our population, and if you admit my previous calculation as to the over count in 1891, then, everything I stated is proven to the letter and the growth of the last five years is shown to be fully equal to the growth of the preceding fifteen years. This matter of the immigration to Canada is one that has attracted a good deal of attention. It was my painful duty, some years ago, standing in the place at present occupied by the leader of the opposition, to call the attention of the House and the country to the very remarkable fact that, whereas our immigration returns as published by the late government showed an immigration to Canada in the ten years from 1881 to 1891 of 886,000 persons, the census returns, making every allowance for the loss by death of the foreign-born population, only showed 150,000 to have settled in Canada. As I have said, it is interesting to trace the movement of population in the North-west upon which so much depends. I have here an enumeration furnished me by the Department of Agriculture, of the number of immigrants that came to Canada from 1897 to 1900. I find that the total number of immigrants who came in 1897 was 20,016; in 1898 the number had risen to 30,742; in 1899 these immigrants numbered 44,506; in 1900 they mustered 44,697; and, for the fiscal year 1900-1, they mustered 49,149—although I apprehend that in these two years there was some overlapping. At any rate, and making allowance for this, the total in these five years would amount to 164,000. I find further, that, in 1897, 712 immigrants from the United States reported themselves in Canada ; in 1898 the number of Americans was 9,119 ; in 1899 11,945 ; in 1900 there were 15,500; and, in the fiscal year 1900-1 there were 17,987. If these remained here, there is not much need to add further evidence to show the very strong probability, to say the least of it, that our population has increased 500,000 in the last five years. What is the ground for holding that probably at least the greater number of these people remained here? I have here a very interesting statement showing the number of acres sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Hudson's Bay Company, and other railways and other landowners in Manitoba and the North-west I invite the attention of the House to these records. I drop the odd figures. In 1893, these companies sold 120,000 acres; in 1894, they sold 68,000 acres; in 1895, 114,000 acres; and in 1896, 108,000 acres. This was a total of 411,000. In 1898, these same companies, in one year sold 448,000 acres—a good deal more in that one year than had been sold in the four years that I have just enumerated. In 1899, they sold 162,000 acres; in 1900, they sold 648,000 acres; and in 1901, they sold 621,000 acres. Thus, in the four years from 1893 to 1896 both inclusive, these companies sold to settlers 411,000 acres, and in the four years from 1898, to 1901 both inclusive, they sold 2,180,000 acres. I think that is tolerably good presumptive evidence that the great bulk of immigrants that came to Canada under our regime remained here. This is further confirmed by the information we have been able to obtain from our various agents scattered throughout the North-west Territories. But there is another little evidence in the same direction. I have here a statement showing the homesteads in these periods. Leaving out the cancelled homesteads, the number was as follows :

1894	1,926
1895	1,419
1896	1,384
Total for four years	7,222
1898	3,876
1899	5,604
1900	7,012
1901	8,136
Total for four years	24,588

Now, that may not be direct evidence, but I submit that it is very strong circumstantial evidence in proof of the very important statement that we have been increasing our population in vastly greater ratio during the last five years than we did during the first five years of this decade.

Sir, it appears to me that in all this there is good promise for the future. And it appears to me there is good promise on this one condition, that we steer clear of former errors, and that Canada in the future does not, as she did in the past, go philandering—the Vulgate has a stronger word—go philandering after new inventions. Sir, our losses have been tremendous, our progress also may be tremendous if we only will condescend to learn where our real strength is, and where the future of Canada properly lies.

I would like to say something as to two or three other points of interest connected with this census ; I would like to say something about the distribution of our rural and urban population. I might have a word or two to say on the delicate question of the education that we are giving to our people. But I pause. I must pass over those subjects, because I have to deal with another and also very interesting portion of this subject, and that is the question of the causes of this exodus. I have pointed out how grave the exodus was; I have shown you that in all human probability, of our own flesh and blood alone we have lost about a million and a half within twenty years. And mind you, that statement, formidable as it is, is amply corroborated by the facts as to the growth of other countries in similar conditions to our own. Now, Sir, a question of the gravest moment, one which is the very reverse of an academic question in which that enormous exodus was due to causes which were beyond our control, or whether it was due to preventable causes. If due to causes beyond our control, there is nothing more to be said; if due to causes which can or should have been prevented, it demands our utmost strength and energy to prevent this fatal drain on our resources from continuing.

I say again that our exhibit in the matter of population from 1881 to 1891 is a most miserable exhibition. Take Manitoba, rural and urban, and we find the rural population of Manitoba in those twenty years increased by 24,000 families. We look across the border and we see that the state of Dakota alone, North and South together, increased its rural population by 120,000 families, while Manitoba was adding 24,000 to hers. We look at Minnesota, and we find that Minnesota gained 200,000 families in the same period. We find that 320,000 families were added to Dakota and to Minnesota in the twenty years from 1881 to 1901, while Manitoba and the North-west together hardly gained 35,000 or 40,000 families, Manitoba certainly not more than 24,000. Those 320,000 families were productive in the highest degree. They have added most enormously to the wealth and prosperity of the United States. Dakota and Minnesota have alone added hundreds of millions a year to the annual products of the United States. With good government and good management the huge territories that we possess, Manitoba, Alberta, Assiniboia and Saskatchewan, should have added in that interval equally to our resources and our trade.

Now, Sir, that statement alone is enough to condemn us, but there is much more behind. I charge over and above downright neglect and misuse of those superb opportunities, criminal maladministration on the part of the government of the day. On this subject I speak with knowledge. For many years, from 1880 to 1886, I was in the habit of making yearly visits to the province of Manitoba. I have traversed the greater part of it again and again, not by railroad, but in company with men like my friend, the Hon. Thomas Greenway, and others of the same standing, who were very intimately acquainted with the possibilities of the province of Manitoba. I witnessed that most extraordinary rush of settlers which went into Manitoba in the years 1879, 1880, 1881 and 1882. I never in all my life saw men more admirably qualified to develop a young country than were the settlers who were pouring in by tens of thousands from the best counties of Ontario, and other portions of this Dominion, to which I have already alluded. There were men and there was money in abundance, and nothing on earth but the most frightful blunders on the part of the government of the day prevented those men from developing Manitoba just as Dakota and Minnesota have been developed. Sir, I say that it was owing to the intolerable railway policy of the government, that it was owing to the intolerable blunders of their land policy, that it was owing in large measure to their fiscal policy, that we see the miserable spectacle which we see to-day in Manitoba and the North-west, miserable, that is, compared with what it might have been, compared with what took place on the other side of the border. Sir, I stood myself in the Railway Committee room upstairs, and I heard the government of Canada deliberately refuse the settlers of Manitoba and the North-west the right to build a railroad at their own expense without costing the government of Canada one penny. What shall I say of the introduction of that mischievous and ill-considered measure, the checker-board system ? Who that has been in Manitoba who of all of us who knows that country, does not know that its great want is to have the population brought together, that the great difficulty is that the settlers are isolated ? Schools and churches are almost impossible when men are separated by great distances. What did the government do ? They deliberately introduced a system by which every man was kept at a distance of a mile or a mile and a half from his neighbour. The result was that settlement was slack, that people did not choose to go into the country and take up land when they were refused the right to build railroads at their own expense, and compelled to set themselves down at a distance of half a league or more from their nearest neighbour. I recollect at the time there were a number of Yankee capitalists, perfectly well acquainted with what had been going on in Dakota and Minnesota, who would have been only too happy to furnish the money for the purpose of constructing these railroads. But they were refused admittance, they were driven out, literally, they were pitch-forked out and what were the results ? Why, we lost the whole of these magnificent seed years, as I may call them, from 1878 to 1885. I am within the mark when I say that 20,000 settlers in southern Manitoba alone were expelled from Manitoba and obliged to take refuge in Dakota and Minnesota by reason of the policy of the government of the day. Nor, was there any relief found for that state of things until there had been one rebellion on the Saskatchewan and until the people of Manitoba had virtually risen in rebellion also. No wonder that I spoke strongly in my place in the House as to the way in which the future of the North-west was being sacrificed by these men. Had they simply let the matter alone, had they simply allowed the people of Ontario and the other provinces to go in, had they simply allowed them to build railways, simply allowed them to make the best of the opportunities before them—I say, and I speak with knowledge—that by 1885 there would have been 50,000 families of magnificent settlers settled in Manitoba, and that to-day in Manitoba and in the valleys of the Saskatchewan, in the districts of Alberta and Assiniboia, you would have had a population, not perhaps as large as that of Dakota and Minnesota, but a population in all human probability of 250,000 families, or a million and a quarter strong.

Now, think for a moment what that would have meant to Canada. Winnipeg to-day would have been a worthy rival to St. Paul and Minneapolis. Our provinces, and they are equally fertile, quite as good as the states that I have mentioned, need never have feared to enter into competition with Dakota and Minnesota. Sir Charles Tupper's vision of 600,000,000 of bushels a year might very well have been realized—it never could have been under his management—but it might have been if Manitoba had been left to the management of the late Mr. Mackenzie. But, there was a more excellent way and that was pointed out to my certain knowledge. The inrush of settlers might have been guided and utilized. The huge amount of money that was wasted in Manitoba in land booms might have been used to the advantage of that province. It was pointed out in this House that had the policy of Mr. Mackenzie's been adopted we would have seen to-day in all human probability not a million and a quarter but two millions of people settled in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. In making that statement I claim no more for us than was done on the other side of the border under greater difficulties. If the policy of Alexander Mackenzie had prevailed in 1878 that would have been the result. Now, the time has come, and I gladly embrace the opportunity to do this scant justice to the memory of my old colleague. He has passed away, not unhonoured. At the time of his death I think Mr. Mackenzie's worth was recognized by all classes of the community, but he passed away hardly appreciated. It was the fashion among some of his own supporters to say that Alexander Mackenzie was all honesty and no policy, while Sir John Macdonald was all policy—I shall not finish the sentence. Alexander Mackenzie had his faults like the rest of us. He had his faults but he was honest and sagacious. What was his policy ? His policy was, like himself, simple, sensible and straightforword. He intended—the thing had been shaping in his mind for some time, he developed it partly on the floor of this House, he developed it to a greater extent in speeches which he made in my presence in the maritime provinces and in parts of Ontario towards the end of the campaign of 1878, and his policy had three grand features—he intended, in the first place, to reserve the land for settlers, to sell it to settlers only at low rates, and to give money only to promote the building of colonization railways ; he intended, in the second place, to construct a number of short line colonization railways radiating from Winnipeg, and he intended in the third place to use all the power of the government to keep the people together and form a solid state in and about the present province of Manitoba from which, afterwards, as a base, railways might radiate on every side. I have several times since discussed that policy with men of great ability and of experience in the North-west Territories, men of all political persuasions, and they have agreed with me that it was one of the greatest misfortunes that ever befell the North-west Territories that it had not been carried out.

Mr. SPROULE. Especially the water stretches.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. And Alexander Mackenzie had intended to keep control of the railways and railway rates. In respect to the water stretches Mr. Mackenzie wisely used them to the utmost of his power and perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has forgotten that at the time he went out he was most busily engaged in pressing forward the construction of the railway from Winnipeg to Fort William. I say that if Mr. Mackenzie's policy had been adopted, and I say it with the knowledge which comes after forty years experience in public affairs, and with the knowledge of a man that has travelled Manitoba from end to end, not once but a dozen times over, if Mr. Mackenzie's policy had been adopted in all human probability you would to-day have had 500,000 families, or 2,000,000 of people settled in Manitoba, Alberta, Assiniboia and Saskatchewan, and a volume of trade and commerce not far from $1,000,000,000 a year. Let hon. gentlemen sit down and calculate what would be the result of a development such as I have spoken of. I will not say a development of two millions, but suppose we had a million, or a million and a quarter of people settled in that country, what a huge boon that would have been to the whole of Canada ! All that was within our grasp and all that we could have had by letting the people alone. We could have that by adopting the policy of Mr. Mackenzie. Hon. gentlemen have a good deal to learn from this census, we have a good deal to learn from it, the people of Canada have a good deal to learn from it, and one lesson I would like the people of Canada to lay to heart is the lesson of what Canada lost in 1878 by discarding Mr. Mackenzie. Had Canada allowed Mr. Mackenzie to remain in power and to carry out the scheme he was then devising for the development of the North-west Territories, I am quite sure that the people of Canada would to-day have been something like one thousand million dollars richer and they would have numbered 2,000,000 more than they do to-day. In place of 5,000,000 we would have had 7,000,000, and after all that would have meant simply that we would have kept our own people in their own country. And one thing more, had Mackenzie remained in power the people of Canada would have been spared that carnival of corruption which ran riot throughout Canada from 1878 to 1896, or at any rate to 1891. Sir, must I recall to these hon. gentlemen the events which marked the expulsion of Sir Hector Langevin from power under the charges brought forward by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works ? Must I recall to their recollection the comments which were made by the English press at that particular time as to the result of thirteen years of Conservative administration ? It is well that I should do so, because I know that a great many hon. gentlemen were not in this House at the time and these things very soon pass from peoples memory. I am not quite sure, but I think I am perfectly within bounds when I say that there is not one man in five out of the 213 who now hold seats here who held seats in 1891, certainly not one in four ; and what had the English press to say of our doings in 1891 ? Here is an extract from the 'Times' :

> Here in the mother country there can be only one feeling, that of deep regret for the wrong done to the fair fame of the eldest of her daughter nations by the lax morality of her politicians.

The London 'Daily Chronicle' said :

> It seems to be possible in the Dominion to secure the political support not only of individuals but of whole provinces by gifts of money. The locality is bribed as well as the member, and the consequent demoralization spreads through all ranks.

The 'Telegraph' observed :

Enough, unfortunately, is already known to make it clear that only the most resolute and drastic purification can redeem public life in Canada from the taint of corruption, the like of which we have not seen in our own country for hundreds of years.

The Birmingham 'Gazette' said :

Rascals out of office defraud the public in order to bribe rascals in office, and rascals in office prostitue themselves, sacrifice their honour and forsake their trust in order to keep on good terms with the rascals out of office.

And the London 'Echo' remarked :

No country can prosper where public departments are in league with fraudulent contractors, and where ministers are open to offers.

The London 'Graphic' declared :

It is no longer possible to doubt that corruption in its worst form is rampant in a large portion of the Canadian civil service.

The St. James 'Gazette' observes :

The existence of an organized system of corruption among public officials in Canada has been conclusively proved, and like everything else on the American continent the bribery has been colossal.

The 'Graphic Despatch' went on to say :

The secret of Sir John Macdonald's electoral victories is out. On this side of the water surprise has often been expressed at the patience with which our Canadian cousins submitted to the Tory protectionist rule of that prince of political intriguers. There is now, alas, no difficulty in explaining that curious situation. Sir John's government rested on a stupendous and all prevailing system of bribery and corruption. Even Tammany Hall smells sweet and clean in comparison with the huge stink pot of Sir John's government.

And so forth ad infinitum.

I am not bringing these disagreeable matters up for nothing. Let the House also remember that these expressions were used long before a great deal more which I subsequently brought to light in respect to the dealings of Sir Adolphe Caron in certain counties had been made manifest. Only a corner of the veil was lifted, yet that was the impression produced on the public opinion of England by the result of that small exposure ; and remember also that not the half no, not the tenth part of what might have been disclosed has ever yet been made public. It would have given me very little trouble if I had so chosen to have duplicated and quadruplicated the exposures which I caused to be made in Sir Adolphe Caron's case a matter of eight or nine years ago.

And if the House wants to know why I spared further exposures my reasons were these. I thought that quite enough had been done to show future historians in what sort of fashion Conservative rule was maintained from 1878 to 1891. It used to be said that there are certain anatomists to whom, if you show a bone of any given reptile, they are able to construct the entire animal. It does not require a political Owen or a political Cuvier to construct the collossal scheme of corruption which prevailed in these years from the evidence which myself and the Minister of Public Works have caused to be put on record. Sir, I might, no doubt, have sent a dozen or two Conservative heelers to the penitentiary or at least to share Mr. McGreevy's cell, but I did not think it was worth my while. However, if hon. gentlemen dispute the truth of my statement ; if hon. gentlemen desire further information ; if they are filled with a burning desire to know why the Langevin block cost something over a million dollars ; if they want to know why Quebec harbour stands in our books for $3,700,000 ; if they want to know why the St. Charles branch, a matter of thirteen miles of railway has cost close on $2,000,000—some $200,000 or $300,000 more than the acquisition of the Drummond Railway cost altogether I believe—if they want to know that ; if they want to know what became of the subsidies for the St. John Railway ; if they want to know what happened in the case of the subsidies for the Temiscouata Railroad, it won't be very difficult to obtain the information for them.

Why, Sir, these were days in which the mere camp followers of the Conservative party were allowed to plunder the people to the tune of hundreds of thousands of dollars. Has the House forgotten the exposure I made of that eminent gentleman Mr. John Charles Rykert, then a member of this House, when I showed and proved that for $2,000 he had been allowed to purchase from the government a part of the public domain which he sold afterwards for $200,000 ; when I showed and proved—and so did other gentlemen here—that Mr. Robillard, another camp follower and also a member of this House, had been allowed to obtain property belonging to the Indians for $316, which was sold within a few months for $55,000 hard cash. Well indeed might Mr. Rykert say when appealing to his electors : It was very hard I should have singled him out when I knew—and he spoke the truth there—while I knew that there were scores as guilty as himself who had sat in judgment on him.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). How much did seats in the Senate bring in those days ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What did my hon. friend say ?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I asked you what was the price of seats in the Senate in those days ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentleman chooses to inquire he would not have much trouble in ascertaining. I have heard very considerable sums named.

Mr. BENNETT. $10,000.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have heard a much more considerable amount put down as the price of a seat in the Senate under the Conservative regime, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) desires it, the information on that subject may be forthcoming at no distant date.

Sir, when I contemplate the collossal corruption that existed at that period and the fashion in which those huge sums of money were acquired and used, upon my word there is only one man in the whole lot for whom I feel the slightest commiseration, and that man is Mr. Thomas McGreevy. Upon my word, Sir, when we reflect on what that man did and what that man suffered; when I reflect that he was beggared and broken hearted; when I reflect on what he did for the party and how the party requited him, I will say to these hon. gentlemen that if they are moved to atone for the sins of their predecessors; if there is any true repentance in them, let them go to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, and I will back their request; let them beg a plot a little way from the left of these parliament buildings and let them erect there a monument to Mr. Thomas McGreevy, and I will supply the inscription. That inscription will be:

'To the memory of Thomas McGreevy, victim and martyr, who did more than any other human being to put the Conservative party in power in 1878 and keep them in power regardless of expense for thirteen years. Who was imprisoned and bankrupted by them.

'Had he served his country as faithfully as he served his party leaders, the name of Thomas McGreevy would have stood high on the roll of Canadian patriots.'

Now, Sir, why do I recall these things? I recall them for one purpose and for one alone. I want that future historians and the people of this country may know what sort of a price the people have to pay when they choose to substitute plausible charletans for able and faithful public servants. Further I know things are very apt to slip from the public mind. I know very well that the co-temporary history of all things is the least known by the men of to-day. We are constantly forgetting what has happened in our own time. Ordinary business men and ordinary professional men really know nothing of the co-temporary history of their own time, and even in our own House members succeed other so fast that all recollection of these things is apt to pass away within a very short time. But, Sir, I think the House should understand one thing; it would be well that hon. gentlemen and it would be well that the country should understand one thing and that is this: That protection (at any rate as they practiced it) and corruption are practically convertible terms. I do not mean to say that a government may not be corrupt and yet not protectionist. That may be. But I do say that human nature being as it is, it is almost impossible for a government to be protectionist and escape being corrupt. And I will add this further; I will add that while I think protection and corruption are practically inseparable; I will add that I likewise believe for my part, that protection and true freedom are all but absolutely incompatible. On that I will give you words of another more eloquent than any I can utter. Here are some remarks which are very much indeed to the purpose. The gentleman whom I quote says:

> I come to expose to you the policy of the Liberal party. Let me tell you that policy may be resumed in the good Saxon word 'freedom' in every sense of the term; freedom of speech, freedom of action, freedom of religious life and civil life, and last, not least, freedom in commercial life. . . . . .
> In the American Republic you have the line of cleavage which exists between the Liberal party and the Conservative party—the question of free trade. We stand for freedom, they stand for restriction; they stand for servitude; we stand for freedom.
>
> I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage; yes, bondage, and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which the American slavery was bondage; not in the same degree perhaps, but in the same manner. . . . . In the same manner the people of this country, the inhabitants of the city of Winnipeg especially, are toiling for a master, who takes away, not every cent of profit, but a very large percentage, a very great portion of your earnings for which you toil and sweat. . . . .

Mr. TAYLOR. Is 35 per cent protection?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. 35 per cent may or may not be protection. 35 per cent may be high revenue tariff or it may be a grossly protective tariff. It depends entirely on how applied. 35 per cent as against American goods is a high revenue tariff and as against British goods it would be a protective and prohibitive tariff. This gentleman from whom I am quoting goes on to say:

> I do not tell you that we must have no taxation, but I do say that the government has no right to take a cent from you or me except for the necessities of the revenue, and if the government takes from you any portion of your earnings, whether the portion be large or small, to give to somebody else that government is as much a robber as the highwayman who puts a pistol to your forehead and says: 'your purse or your life.'

Admirable sentences, admirably expressed with that force and eloquence with which my right hon. friend (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) usually puts the case before his audience.

Mr. MACLEAN. Is that a warning?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. A warning to you.

Mr. MACLEAN. A warning to your leader.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I hope it is a warning to you, but I am afraid the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) is not greatly inclined to take it. I say that if you wish to see Canada ten years hence as Canada was ten years ago when the British press was ringing with those sentences I lately read, you have only to return to the Conservative government and to the good old Conservative ways of a protective tariff.

Now, Sir, I turn to a more pleasing side of the question. We cannot undo the past; we cannot recover our lost legions; we cannot regain our lost opportunities; and it may be that we have lost more than we are aware of, because at this moment there are other formidable competitors springing up whom we may soon have to face. I have noticed with considerable interest the enormous development now taking place in Siberia. It may be that in wheat and other kinds of agricultural produce that country may enter into a formidable competition with the people of North America, especially the people of Canada. But although nearly a quarter of a century has been thrown away, although Canada has done little more than mark time for a generation, I believe that the chances are coming back to us again. Great fertile areas are lying open to us, and we must bring people to them. The process has well begun, indeed no sign of the times is more wholesome and hopeful than that which I mentioned a little while ago, that the number of immigrants coming from the United States to Canada has risen from 700 to 17,000. I warn our people to beware that they do not check the progress now going on. It is no idle dream to say that if we do as well within the next decade as Dakota and Minnesota have done, we may look for a population of two millions, or at the lowest a million and a half, in the valleys of the Saskatchewan, the Red River and the Assiniboine, and in the vast territory that extends towards the Peace River district; and we may double the volume of our trade. I do not altogether agree with some of the demands of our friends in the Northwest; but I heartily sympathize with them in the view they take of the great future that awaits Canada if she will only stretch out her hand and seize the opportunities that present themselves to us there. And let me say further to the people of Canada; if you are desirous of entering into a controversy or a commercial war with the United States, the true way to conquer them is to show them that you have a population increasing faster than theirs, that you have a volume of trade far in excess of theirs. Then indeed you may reasonably hope in a comparatively short space of time to have them knocking at your door. This is for Canada the true path to greatness, the true path to wealth. Let us not turn our backs upon it. Let us lay the lessons of the census to heart. I say it was a national disgrace that the increase of Canada during those twenty years was far less than what took place in the same period in old and long-settled European countries. I have heard it said by hon. gentlemen opposite, and even by some friends of mine, that Canada is a dumping ground for American manufacturers. I have heard plaintive wails that heathen Yankees, not having the fear of God or of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association before their eyes, come to Canada and actually have the audacity to sell goods to Canadian consumers at a lower price than that at which they sell them to their own people. It is even said, though this lacks proof, that they sell them at less than cost, in their greed to monopolize so profitable a trade; and it is said that there are many Canadians so unpatriotic, so dead to all lofty feeling, that they will actually purchase American goods for no better reason than the fact that they can obtain them better and cheaper than they can similar goods in their own country. It is a very sad state of things, no doubt. But to my mind it is a much sadder thing that Canada should be, as Canada was for eighteen years under the national policy, no better than a breeding ground for people of the United States. Here is where Canada was landed in 1896—in depopulation and stagnation, utter incapacity to utilize her vast territory, and with political corruption practically reduced to a fine art. Now, I counsel the people of Canada no more to copy Yankee vices. I do not want them to imitate the Yankee fiscal policy or Yankee political methods. I desire, like hon. gentlemen opposite, that Canadians should think for themselves and act for themselves; and if they will imitate the people of the United States, I advise them to imitate their good qualities, not their bad ones. Let them imitate their pluck, their patriotism, their energy, their push, their skill in developing and utilizing their waste territory. If they will do that, Sir, I have no fear for the result. Take it all in all, I say that the record of the last four years is a grand record, a credit to the country and a credit to the government. The progress of our trade in that period has been very great, and if I am correct in the statements I have made to-night, the recovery of our people in population in the last four years has been relatively as great as the expansion of our trade. The government invites criticism; it invites the closest scrutiny; the facts will bear out my statements. Sir, I repeat the assertion with which I commenced. I say that the best test of a nation's progress, at least a nation like Canada, with enormous quantities of fertile land wholly untouched, is the increase of her population; and I say that Canada can stand that test now, and she will be in a position to stand it infinitely better ten years hence. If we do our duty, our shame will then be wiped out, our national humiliation will be effaced, and Canada will be in the van once more. She will have a larger trade in proportion to population than the United States, a faster growth, a better distribution of wealth, better security for life and property, a better fiscal system, and infinitely more freedom.

Sir, I am not given to idle gush, as this House knows; but I believe that our resources have been barely scratched. I believe we have enormous resources, the extent of which we have scarcely begun to realize. With half a continent unexplored, we can only imagine what possibilities yet lie before us. After what we have seen in the Klondike, who shall say that the barrenest region in the arctic zone may not contain riches equal to the Rand? Who shall say that the region of Hudson bay or the region of Labrador, or the region of the Mackenzie river or the great Slave lake—all these regions which are only geographical expressions to-day, may not become household words to-morrow? But there is no need of talking of possibilities. The Red River valley, the Saskatchewan valley, the Assiniboine valley, the Peace River valley, are realities; and the progress which the western States have made is a reality too. We have room for a population of at least fifty millions. We have marvellous water powers, the value of which we are just beginning to realize. We have immense mineral resources. We need but men, capital, fair-play and freedom, and if we are true to ourselves and persevere in the path we have entered upon in the last five years, I believe that the record of the next ten years will surpass that of the last five, good as it has been, as much as the record of the last five years has surpassed that of the preceding fifteen.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I have just been wondering where we are. I have not been in this House long enough to carry my memory back to the subjects which we have had discussed for the last hour and a half. I thought we were going to have a discussion of matters which are of interest to this country to-day. We have scarcely a word from the hon. gentleman dealing with events that are within the personal experience of the great majority of the members of this House. Instead of dealing with the facts of the day, he harked back to ancient history, he revelled in old scandals. He in fact shouldered his political crutch, fought his old political battles, and made his old political speeches over again. And where he did not deal with events that have disappeared in the archives of the past, he deluged us with a dry array of figures, despite his promise at the outset that he was not going to weary the House with statistics. Well, if the hon. gentleman has any more figures than he has already given to us, we have reason to be eternally grateful to him for keeping them to himself.

Referring to the speech of the leader of the opposition, the hon. gentleman said he could shut his eyes and imagine that he had heard all that before. Well, I do not think that it is necessary for any one to shut his eyes or draw on his imagination at all to come to a like conclusion with regard to the speech we have just heard. One would require to close one's eyes very tightly indeed and make a considerable draft on one's imagination to come to the opposite conclusion. It would require a considerable effort of the imagination to make one believe that he has not heard over and over again the arguments and the appeals to which the hon. gentleman has been treating us during the last three hours.

I jotted down a few of the things upon which the hon. gentleman appeared to lay some stress. One of the first was his admission that the cost of living under the present government has largely increased. In that respect I do not think any one will contradict him, but whether that is something which the present government has a right to be proud of, I leave to the House and country to decide. He then took credit for the reduction in the postage rates to Great Britain, but we have the admission of the Postmaster General that only one-seventh of the mail matter which leaves Canada is carried in Canadian boats or through Canadian channels, and that six-sevenths are carried in foreign channels. If that be a point on which the hon. gentleman thinks he is entitled to some credit, I am willing to gratify him to the utmost extent.

Then my hon. friend could not forbear loosing one of the shafts of his satire at his hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He referred to a vision of Hades which that hon. gentleman had at one time and of which he gave a vivid description. But if my recollection serves me right, the Hades which the hon. member for North Norfolk described was merely a vision, whereas the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had been plunged, not into an imaginary, but into a real political Hades from which his friend, the member for North Norfolk (Mr, Charlton), had to extricate him. The policy of the Minister of Trade and Commerce had failed to meet the approval of his electorate, another Reformer was ambitious to get his place, and the hon. minister was doomed to political Hades and would have become for ever politically extinct, had it not been for the help of his friend (Mr. Charlton), who got him out of the shades of death. And this friend the hon. minister does not now hesitate to throw over.

In all the time during which the hon. gentleman laboured through his argument, he made no reference to any question of the day, no reference to the policy of his party, no reference to the enormous growth of expenditure, no reference to the increase of public debt, or to anything of live interest to the country. For nearly an hour and a half he spoke of the census of 1891 and the census of 1901, and he assumed that the former was fraudulently taken. His whole speech was simply drawing a red herring across the track in order that public attention might be taken away from those things which are of importance to Canada to-day, from the shortcomings of himself and his colleagues since they have been in office, and directed to matters of far minor importance. He spoke of the immigration to the North-west. He pictured the rush that took place into that country in 1881 and 1882, and tried to draw the inference that had free trade prevailed, that country would to-day have been settled up and we would have had a million or a million and a quarter population there now. But I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman is sufficient of a business man to know that the reason why population did not continue to flow into the North-west was because the price of wheat had fallen from $1 a bushel to about 40 cents or 45 cents per bushel—a price at which it was almost impossible for farmers to make a living out of it. He quoted Dakota and Minnesota as illustrations of how countries fill up with great rapidity, but he omitted to tell us that these two states flourished under the highest protective tariff known on the earth.

He gave us also figures from the census returns of Toronto and Manitoba, to show that up to a certain period these localities were depressed and are now flourishing. But he omitted to draw our attention to the fact that these places were suffering from that most disastrous thing which can befall any community—a land boom. Toronto suffered from that evil and is hardly over it to-day. So did Manitoba, and is only just now recovering from it.

He drew a glowing picture of what would have happened had the policy of the late Mr. McKenzie been carried out. I tell you, Sir, that had that policy been continued, the whole of the trade and the products of that western country would now be tributary to the United States. It may be possible that a larger population would be there now, but our North-west would not belong to Canada, and there are few members who will agree that it were better that Manitoba were more prosperous at the cost of not belonging to Canada and Great Britain.

Another point on which the hon. gentleman dilated was the vicious system of granting government bonuses to railways. Had that system not be entered upon, had the railway companies been forced to enter the country and build for themselves, we should have had that country built up without railway bonuses. But surely the hon. gentleman could not have been in earnest in this argument. Has he been asleep these ten or fifteen years and just woke up? Is he not aware the policy of granting railway bonuses is the same to-day as it was under the late administration? And there is not to-day the same reason for that policy which existed in the past. Yet notwithstanding that the North-west has been settled since ten or twenty years and that there is no longer the same reason for granting bonuses, we find this government continuing the policy of granting large bonuses to railways in the North-west. And we find this government continuing the same checker board system of reserving each alternate section which the hon. gentleman denounces as an evil. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman finds it impossible to disassociate himself from the past and cannot refrain from denouncing the same things which he was won't to denounce in the days of old, although he is to-day the member of a government in which these very same practices continue to flourish.

But talking of the policy of the late Mr. McKenzie and the policy of the late Sir John Macdonald, one of the men who is very high up in the political scale in this country, the Hon. George W. Ross, had the manliness to admit publicly that he was mistaken in his judgment of the policy of Sir John Macdonald in connection with the settlement of the North-west. He is the only man of the late chieftain's opponents who has had the manliness and the honesty to make this admission; and I tell you, Sir, that that admission appealed to the sense of fairness of the people of Ontario and did more credit to Mr. Ross than any act of his life.

If we examine into the heaps of figures which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce piled upon us during his speech, we will find that there is not a clean-cut statement among them all. They are all based upon assumptions, and his conclusions flow from mere assumptions. He takes the figures of the census, puts them together in his own fashion, and then draws his own conclusions, and treats those assumptions as facts. They are figures drawn up by a man who looks at only one side of the question, who is choosing his figures and making them tell the story exactly as he wants it told.

It is a very interesting spectacle to see how thoroughly the members of this ministry are in accord with one another. They cannot keep their little grievances at home, but the spite that is shown between the members of the administration is made known to the House and to the world. The hon. member who preceded me said that he was not going to trouble the House with figures—and he wearied the House for three hours with figures. We have had figures for two days. And for that reason, although I have many figures here, I shall leave most of them out.

Look back for one moment to the Speech from the Throne, for a government of business men, of wonderful men, that was a great production. Here was a Speech from the Throne, and in it was supposed to appear the questions upon which Canada was vitally interested in one of our most interesting years, a year of great prosperity, a year when great works are going on and when great schemes might have been expected to be outlined by the government. And what have we in this speech ? Outside of the ordinary platitudes, and an expression of thankfulness for the visit of Their Royal Highnesses, we have a reference to only two wonderful things. This government, so great, and so powerful, in their great wisdom saw fit not to prevent an inventor landing on the soil of Canada and carrying on experiments. It would have been a very sad thing for Canada and for the world if the government had seen fit to order that inventor off the soil of Canada. The government take great credit to themselves for having allowed Mr. Marconi to come and experiment here, and they tell us they are going to give him $80,000. Now, that is a very serious and very important item to put in the Speech from the Throne. The next thing the government take credit for is for not having refused—for it was in their power to have done so—to allow a private company to spend $20,000,000 of money to be raised from its own shareholders, and to be used in improving its road-bed, its rolling stock, and so on—expenditure that will be a benefit to Canada. The government in their great wisdom have decided to allow that company to increase its capital stock. These are the only two things in the speech. It completely bears out what I had the pleasure of hearing the Prime Minister saying at a luncheon of the Industrial Exhibition Association in Toronto, that there was nothing to reform in Canada, that everything had been done. Even the Senate is reforming itself without the aid of our wise men ; so we hear no more of the great reforms that were to take place in the Senate. Let us come down to what we in this House think worthy of discussing. We ought to take the question of our finances, the question of what this government has done for the good of the country, and how it has fulfilled the promises made before it came into power. In 1895, in a speech on the budget, the present hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), discussing the expenditure of that time, $38,000,000, said :—

To-day we are called upon to pay the interest, and the 10 or 12 million dollars a year, which we have to pay through the medium of the government, is only a small part, only a part, at any rate, of the total sum of interest which Canada has to pay. Sir, have we got value for our money, had that money been invested in works which were really useful and which really added to the productive powers of Canada, the case would not have been so bad. If it had been possible for us to have borrowed $800,000,000 or $1,000,000,000, if you will——

The hon. gentleman was dealing in large figures.

—and we should have been able to pay the interest largely out of the profits arising from those works. But it is only too well known to any one who knows anything of Canada that an enormous amount of money which was borrowed has been wasted, aye and worse than wasted, for a very considerable part of it has gone to debauch and corrupt the people of Canada.

Now, that is the platform on which the hon. gentleman stood and which he enunciated in this wonderful article of his that has been referred to by the leader of the opposition, that the money spent had been, in great part, spent on works that were not for the benefit of Canada but for corrupt purposes. In 1895-6 we had a revenue of $38,041,700. According to the present Minister of Trade and Commerce that was about $4,000,000 too much. In 1901, the revenue was $57,000,000, and, according to the Minister of Finance it is a revenue that is a great deal too small and will be increased considerably during the present year. In 1896, our debt was $258,497,000 ; to-day it is $268,480,000, and this notwithstanding the fact that during that period, something like $39,000,000 additional have been taken out of the pockets of the people. The platform on which the government came into power in 1896 is the platform by which we must judge them to-day. I quite admit that an increase of expenditure is necessary for an increased population and an increasing trade. But the $4,000,000 by which the revenue under the Conservative administration was too much should have been quite sufficient to provide for the necessary expansion during the five or six years that the present government have been in power. The government came into power on the policy of economy, reduction of taxation and reduction of the public debt. They remain in power to-day in consequence of extravagant expenditure, a large increase in debt, increased taxation, and an expenditure exactly and precisely on the terms to which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has referred, whereby the people of the country are debauched and corrupted. We heard that hon. gentleman the other evening, speaking on a proposed item in the estimates of absolutely useless expenditure, defended that expenditure on the ground that it was making up for the injustice that Conservative governments had done to his friends. In other words, not because the Conservative party had spent money, but because they had not spent enough money, as he put it, corruptly, for the purpose of debauching the country.

Now, Sir, Canada being a great and growing country, it should be the business of statesmen to cast about and find how they can direct the trade of that country into the best and most profitable channels. But what has this government done in any shape or form to bring about such an end ? They have talked and talked about improving the navigation of the St. Lawrence. They have proposed to spend money upon it, they have admitted that we must have a better outlet for our produce and grain to the sea; and yet we cannot find, on inquiry, that they have taken one single step towards realizing that end. We are spending money in all manner of ways, we are spending money all over the country, frittering it away, in little driblets here and there; but as for relieving the pressure of our western grain and providing the farmers with freer and better transport to market, this government has absolutely neglected to do anything.

The question of a fast Atlantic service, like some other large questions, has been before this government, but they have shirked it and put it on one side, until now it is almost forgotten. Yet we find that mail subsidies have gone on increasing, and last year alone they increased by $112,000. What has this government done towards solving that great question? Sir, in my opinion the transportation question is the most important question before this House and country to-day. It was discussed a great deal last year, and aroused a good deal of interest, but nothing has come of that discussion. We do not know yet whether it is Montreal, or Quebec, or that new port at Sorel, that is going to be the seaport for our Canadian grain. We cannot tell whether our grain will eventually come by the St. Lawrence, or whether it must go by United States ports. It is admitted on all hands that we ought to get some of the grain that comes to Buffalo, some 300,000,000 bushels, that part of that grain ought to find an outlet by way of the St. Lawrence. But people forget entirely that two-thirds of that grain is consumed in the New England states and never reaches the seaboard. Nevertheless one of the great questions that should engage the attention of the government is how to improve our transportation facilities. The government are now spending large sums of money on the upper lakes and on all the ports, but so far they have not taken a single step towards relieving the pressure in the North-west caused by lack of facility for bringing that grain east, no more than if such a question never existed. On the other hand, the government are constantly devising schemes to spend money in the various constituencies where it will do them the most good—solely and only for that purpose. We see item after item in the estimates where the minister charged with it is not aware whether it is wanted or not; but if it is wanted, he will take care to look after it and see that the money is properly spent. I notice the Minister of Justice, in speaking the other day at Montreal, referred in concise business terms to this question of transportation, and acknowledged the necessity of solving it, but he had no suggestion to make, and not a single step has been taken by the government towards finding a solution.

There is another question that ought surely to have engaged the attention of the government if they are to help on our marine, and that is the proper lighting of the coasts of the St. Lawrence and of our inland lakes. Now, we have spent very little comparatively on that important matter. If you look at the map of the American upper lakes you will find lighthouses dotted all along the coasts, but if you look at the map of our own shores you will see that we have only a miserable light here and there; and many of those lights, I believe, are so poorly maintained that they will only last half the night, and unless a man gets up in the middle of the night to replenish them, they go out before morning. Surely that is a question worthy the attention of the government; and I expected that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, during his three-hours and a quarter oration, would have devoted some little attention to it. But he does not seem to realize that he is not living twenty years ago, when he used to talk about free trade and protection, and of the terrible misfortunes that would happen to the country under a protective policy.

Now, I come to another point which I wish to treat briefly, and that is the Intercolonial Railway. The government have increased the capital of that railway by eight to nine million dollars since they came to power. They have also leased a line into Montreal for which they pay a large yearly rental. Now, it is very amusing to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce and a previous speaker saying : It is quite true we have spent money, but our revenue is increasing. Yes, their revenue is increasing, but their expenditure is increasing in a still greater ratio. Every year their deficit it getting larger; and I am bound to say that if their accounts were kept properly, if a proper proportion of their expenditure for rolling stock and like things were charged up against the Intercolonial Railway, the deficit would be probably twice as large as it shows to-day. Now, Sir, the condition of the Intercolonial Railway is rather humiliating in the face of the fact that there is not an old one-horse railway on this continent that has not picked up during the last year or two, that is not paying its running expenses and showing a little surplus. Not a solitary instance can be pointed out on this continent, with the exception of the Intercolonial Railway, which does not show an improved condition of affairs, an increasing revenue, a decreasing expenditure, or, at all events, making both ends meet, and leaving something for the stockholders or the bondholders. The Intercolonial Railway does not charge one cent for the interest of capital expended on it. The Minister of Railways and Canals is increasing its capital expenditure year after year, apparently without any thought as to a limit, and yet deficits are pilling up year after year under the mismanagement of the present government. It would almost seem as if the government were in league with those portions of the community who do not believe in public ownership of public franchises, because, surely the exhibition of the Intercolonial Railway and what the government are making out of it is so humiliating that no advocate could be found of public ownership in the hands of such management. There is no other railway on this continent that shows such a lamentable state of affairs. The government do not give us its earnings and expenses in such a way as to enable us to check what its rates are. I cannot find out from anything that is published as to the rates charged on the Intercolonial Railway. The freight rates, at all events, are as high, and probably higher, than the rates on either the Canadian Pacific Railway or Grand Trunk Railway for similar service and similar distance. We are not able from the government returns to ascertain that, and I think it is a great mistake that such returns should not be published in the government railway reports. The reports are drawn up as far as it is possible in such a manner as to prevent anyone from arriving at a correct statement of the figures as to the expenditure and revenue. Capital and ordinary expenditure are so mixed up that it is impossible to come to any conclusion.

Now, the burning question, to-day, and it evidently is a burning question between the different members of the ministry, is the question of protection and free trade. It was generally thought in the country that the ministers were pretty well coming round to be of one mind. It was suggested that there had been an anti-free trade vaccine imported into the ministry and that the importer of the vaccine was quietly administering it to all his colleagues and administering it also to his followers. We saw that this had a very startling effect and that it had taken very strongly upon one member of the government, the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte). I think that it has taken fairly well upon the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) and I think he is showing very good signs that he has had a proper dose of vacccination. Upon some of their followers the anti-free trade vaccine has taken so strongly that they are baring their arms all the time and showing the public that they have been vaccinated against the evils of free-trade. I have an impression that the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) has been vaccinated, but he has his shield on yet and his arm is pretty sore if you go near it. As to the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I think he would be vaccinated if he saw any necessity for it. I think he would bare his arm and cheerfully submit if his colleagues thought that the best thing for him to do and that it would ensure him his political health. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) absolutely refuses the vaccine. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has drawn for us a very doleful picture of what will take place if we do not return to good old simple free trade. What would free trade mean for Canada ? It would mean the closing up of every factory we have from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It would mean that Canadians would be hewers of wood and drawers of water for the great American manufacturers. What has been the effect of free trade, to some extent, already ? It has driven away our bright young men who are educated in our schools of practical science and other institutions of learning. These young men have gone off to join our neighbours and take an interest in the development of the large manufactures in the United States. These men have been replaced in this country, how ? We have been sending away our brightest young men. We must send them away unless we can give them employment in this country and exercise their skill in all manner of manufactures and enterprises. We are sending these men off and how are we replacing them ? We are replacing them at the government expense with Galicians, Doukhobors and the lowest class of labour. We are sending away from the country our brightest young men and bringing into the country a class of men who are lower than any we have in the country already. That is how free trade acts. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I do not propose to quote all my array of figures, my remarks will be much shorter than I had intended them to be, because I know the House is weary of figures. I think we will have figures in detail many a time during the next week or ten days, but I want strongly, before I sit down, to emphasize one point which we should keep constantly before the country. We should keep before the country the fact that this government ame into power pledged to economy, pledged to reduce the expenditure, which was then $38,000,000 to some $3,000,000, or $4,000,000 below that sum. We now see hon. gentlemen opposite glorying in an expenditure of $57,000,000 and we hear the hon. Minister of Finance saying that the expenditure is to be very largely increased during the coming year. We see that they have increased the debt of this country by $10,000,000 or within a few dollars of $10,000,000, and at the same time they have taken out of the country an amount of $39,000,000 more taxation than the average taxation of the year in which they came into power. These are the questions that are of interest to this House and of interest to the country and it is on these questions that this government must be judged. There has been no attempt made towards a reduction of the debt. Hon. gentlemen are simply revelling in spending money and their policy seems to be: While we have money coming in, we will spend it and trust to luck when it stops coming in. There is no attempt at economy; there is a glorying in expenditure. There has been no important undertaking in the interest of the country. These are the points that I think should be held up before the country. These are the points that the government should discuss and the members of the government should intelligently defend, not the points raised by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in his three and a quarter hours speech. The hon. gentleman did not refer to a single matter that occurred less than five or six years ago. That is not the kind of discussion of public affairs that we want. It is simply dragging a herring across the track, hoping that people will not understand and will not see the iniquities that this government is perpetrating; the breaking of all their promises; the breaking of all their pledges; the increasing of the debt of this country, and the encouragement of corruption to a degree that was not known and not even thought of before the Liberals came into power. These are the questions that are engaging the attention of this House and of the country, and it is not a live issue when the hon. gentleman talks of figures and of contracts, the men concerned in which have been dead for years.

Mr. C. B. HEYD (South Brant). Mr. Speaker, owing to the very lengthy discussion we have had on this question to-day, I presume it would be gratifying to both sides of the House if it were brought to a close now, and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Prime Minister, the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 19, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Agreeable to notice given the other day, I wish, Mr. Speaker, to move in reference to the third report of the standing committee on Public Accounts. A great deal of attention has naturally been turned towards the management of the Intercolonial Railway and the general government railway system, and among other matters which engross the attention of members of the House at this time is the working of that road. The committee on Public Accounts have taken cognizance of some of the facts, and certain members who are interesting themselves in the investigation before the Public Accounts Committee, asked to have a certain witness summoned to appear and give evidence. The motion was opposed by the minister interested and other ministers present, and in the end was negatived by a majority vote. Under these circumstances, there was nothing left for those prosecuting this inquiry but to appeal from the committee to the House. I have looked into the question with the view of discovering what precedents I could find bearing on it, but so far I can find none whatever. The rule seems to be, as laid down in the authorities:—

> No witness shall be summoned to appear before the committee and be paid his expenses unless a certificate shall have been first filed with the chairman of the committee, by a member thereof, stating that the evidence of such witness is, in his opinion, material and important.

Technically speaking, that was not done, but a motion for the summoning of the witness was made by a member of the committee, seconded by another member of that committee and supported by verbal explanations in the course of which these gentlemen stated that they considered the evidence of such witness material and important to the investigation. I have looked to see if I could discover any precedent for the action of the committee in rejecting this motion and can find none. Apparently nothing of the kind has ever occurred before in the history of this parliament. On no occasion has it ever been necessary for any member of any standing committee to appeal to the House against a decision of the kind to which I am now referring. In the opinion of those who are prosecuting the inquiry before that committee, which naturally has a majority under the control of the government, there is nothing left for them but to appeal to the House from its decision and ask the House to instruct it to summon the witness in question.

I do not know that I need go into a full explanation of why this investigation is now proceeding. I may say briefly that the figures in the Public Accounts, Auditor General's return, and the report of the Minister of Railways, seem to show that there are matters which the public advantage requires should be looked into, and in reference to which it would not be at all surprising to find that serious deviations from the course of good government and honest management have been made during the past year.

But, to summarize, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that the amount spent this year, on the Intercolonial Railway, a work which has already cost the people a large sum of money, is very great indeed. Under the head of capital expenditure, we find that nearly $4,000,000 has been expended on that work which must have been regarded very many years ago by the people of Canada as a completed work. Of course, the figures I give include the Prince Edward Island Railway—the whole system which is under the management of the Minister of Railways. The actual figures as given in the returns of the Auditor General is $3,941,466. Now, that is not all the Intercolonial Railway has cost the people of Canada this year. We find that, under the system of book-keeping adopted by the minister, or under his direction I presume, there is suspense accounts by means of which $213,000 which should have appeared, and which would have swollen that expenditure above $4,000,000, has been carried into the following year. That, of course, must be added to the expenditure of the year of which I am speaking. In addition, there is a deficit in the working expenses of the road of this year of $348,-186. There is a deficit on Prince Edward Island Railway of $67,883. That is to say, the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railway have cost the people of Canada, for the year ending June 30, 1901, the sum of $4,570,536. Such an enormous outlay naturally attracts attention to the management of the Intercolonial Railway. I believe, that, in the public interest, the inquiry should be made as thorough and complete as possible. Moreover, in the interest of the minister in charge and of the government of the country, that inquiry should be made thorough, searching, exhaustive and complete. But when we sought to go on with our inquiry, we are met at the first stage, almost at the very first witness, asked for by the gentlemen who were in the minority on that committee, and who, representing the minority in parliament and in the country, speak for those whose interests are to be protected by that minority, by a refusal to call that witness, though he is manifestly a competent witness, and though the minority declared him to be most material, important and necessary witness, if the inquiry into the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway is to be made what it ought to be. I do not criticise the action of the Minister of Railways and Canals in opposing the calling of that witness. That is not my business. I suppose he acted in the manner which he thought would most properly conserve his own interest, perhaps his own reputation. That is a matter for himself. But I would call the attention of the House to the fact that he is, so far as I can discover, the first minister whose conduct has been challenged or inquired into by the Public Accounts Committee, since Canada had existence as a country, who thought it necessary to refuse the request of a minority of the committee to call a proper and material witness. If he is anxious for a complete, exhaustive and satisfactory inquiry, I should think he would be glad to have any witnesses the committee asked for. I shall not go on and discuss the statement made by the minister before the committee, because I think that would be out of order, and, no doubt, he will make his own statement here and now. But, to my mind, that which should regulate and decide such a matter as we are now discussing is the one question, is it in the interest of the people of Canada, is it in the interest of the department whose management is being inquired into, that the witness should be called? It has not been the rule in the past, to inquire very closely into the scope of the evidence that a witness would give if called before the committee. It has, apparently, been the rule in the committee that the greatest latitude should be allowed by those initiating the inquiries, and they have been allowed to judge what value the evidence of the witness would have if called before the committee. In this case, the person the calling of whom as a witness is desired by members of the committee who happen to be in the minority, and whose attendance is refused by the committee under the direct instructions of the minister, happens to be the man, who, of all others in Canada, outside the office of the Intercolonial Railway and the Minister of Railways, knows most about the matter into which the committee is inquiring. He spent the greater part of his life in a most responsible position in connection with the road. He knows its working and every feature of importance that it is necessary for the committee to understand. He has an unblemished reputation as a railway man, and a magnificent reputation as a railway engineer; and there can be no doubt that the evidence he can give to the committee if he were allowed to attend and testify would develop no attack on the minister, but the truth and the whole truth in respect of those matters into which the committee thought it well to inquire. The matter is as I have stated. There has been gigantic outlay on the railway, and there is evidence to show that very poor management had been used in controlling the affairs of the railway. In the counties through which the Intercolonial Railway runs, it is a matter of common repute that the road is run more as a political and electioneering machine than as a railway; that, whenever it is necessary in the interest of the government of the day, the resources, the employees of that road are called to the service of the party in power. I could give evidence on that subject if necessary, but I am not going further than to state that it is a matter of common repute in those counties that the road has been deflected from its purpose and converted into an engine of advantage and gain for the government of the day.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Was it so used by the Tory party ?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It cannot be of much service to the Tory party at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BELL. We are inquiring into the working of the road at the present time and not in the past. But I say that if, at any time under Conservative rule, hon. gentlemen opposite had chosen to pursue such an inquiry as we have proposed, I cannot believe that they would have been met at the very first step by a refusal in the part of the late government to allow the attendance of a competent witness. In fact, the record of the commissions held during the existence of the late government go to show that the government was most anxious that every possible witness should be had.

I do not think it necessary to go further than this. I hope I have made it plain to the House that here is a matter which suggests the necessity for very careful and thorough inquiry. The minority of the committee charged with the duty of inquiring into such matters have asked for a witness whom they described as one having the fullest knowledge and one of the highest competence. They are refused the presence and assistance of that witness, apparently upon grounds which are absolutely without precedent in this country. I can discover no precedent, and I am satisfied that none exists, that would justify the minister, or the government if the government chooses to support him, in the course that has been taken in this matter. I therefore move, without speaking further on the subject :

That the third report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts, presented to this House on Thursday, March 13th, be referred back to the committee with instructions that Mr. P. S. Archibald, C. E., of Moncton, be summoned to give evidence before the said committee.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair): I think, Mr. Speaker, I shall have no difficulty in showing that the hon. member (Mr. Bell) who makes this motion has furnished us with no sufficient reason why his motion should pass. I do not intend, however, to be drawn this afternoon into a discussion of the general policy of the government and of parliament, in making the appropriations it has hitherto authorized for the improvement of the Intercolonial Railway. The amounts which have been authorized in these appropriations have not, as the public accounts will show, been exceeded by the administration; and I take it that if there was a monstrous and outrageous sum of money expended upon the railway during the past year, it was a most monstrous sum of money for parliament to have voted; and I wonder that the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House had not made his voice heard on this question when the several items which constitute the total sum were submitted for the consideration of parliament. I shall not be drawn, either, into discussing other matters to which the hon. gentleman has referred, but I will endeavour to confine my attention to the subject which is properly before the House, and which I think the hon. gentleman has not treated in any effective or sufficient manner.

I understand that the Committee on Public Accounts has been authorized by parliament to investigate and to inquire into the expenditure for the past year. I understand that in constituting that committee, parliament has invested it with certain discretion as to the manner in which it may conduct that inquiry, as to the witnesses it may summon, and as to the manner in which those witnesses may be called. I apprehend therefore that the hon. gentleman is in duty bound to show, before he can successfully appeal to parliament to reverse the decision at which the committee has arrived, and before he can ask parliament to pass any resolution reflecting upon the action of that committee, he is bound to satisfy the mind of parliament that that committee has failed in its duty, and has had such evidence presented to it as would compel it, in the proper exercise of that duty, to summon the person whose name he has mentioned in this resolution. Sir, I say unhesitatingly, that no cause was shown to that committee why we should go outside the line and the course of procedure which the committee was taking, why we should break into the examination which was then being proceeded with, and why we should summon somebody, not an officer of the Intercolonial Railway, not a man who was responsible in the slightest degree for the expenditure of public money, not a man who had any direct connection with the railway, and who, for the past six years, has had no relation whatever with us. I take it, Sir, that before parliament should undertake to pass a reflection upon the committee for the exercise of the discretion with which it has endowed the committee, parliament ought to be convinced that there is good reason why such a course should be taken. The hon. gentleman entirely failed to show any such reason, he entirely failed to produce any facts which would justify his motion.

What is the business of the Railway Committee ? Its business is to examine into the expenditure, to ask explanations from the officers as to how, when, and under what circumstances, and by what warrant, any expenditure was made. Is not that the business of the committee? And if, as a result of the inquiries which they make, they think that there is any doubt of the integrity of any person connected with the government, or of any of its officials, any doubt that they have not acted in accordance with their duty, or that they have committed any corrupt act, then it would be proper enough for these gentlemen, perhaps, to go outside to get further light upon the matter, and to obtain any evidence that can be gathered to bring home this wrong-doing to the parties guilty of it. It would be time enough when a charge has been preferred for these hon. gentlemen to go outside and to cast about the country to find, if they can, somebody who has a sore head, and who has been spying around in order to discover something derogatory to the administration of the department.

Sir, who is this gentleman whom the hon. gentleman now asks this House to instruct the committee that they may summon? The gentleman that he refers to is Mr. P. S. Archibald, who was six years ago chief engineer upon the government railway. He has not since been in the employ of the government, he has since had no part or hand in the transaction of the government's business. I do not know what his business is, I do not care what his business is. I understand from the hon. gentleman that he has been busying himself about the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway. If he has done so, he has done so of his own free will, and no doubt acting on a very high, patriotic and public-spirited impulse. I have no doubt that Mr. Archibald, when he comes up to Ottawa, if he should come here in consequence of the action of this House, will come here for some purpose. What will he come for? Will he come here to exonerate anybody against whom reflections have been made? Will he come here for the purpose of throwing light upon transactions, explaining this or explaining that? I take it that he will come here with a little prejudice in his mind against the officers and men in consequence of whose action he is no longer in the employ of the government, and no longer chief engineer of the government railway. He is not coming here with any other object or any other purpose than to establish a foregone conclusion in his own mind that the people who turned him out of office are not competent or qualified to continue any longer in the administration of the government railway.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the House for a moment to the way in which this inquiry was being conducted. The hon. gentleman first called the Auditor General, who did not know very much about what was going on, but who knew about auditing the accounts as well as any gentleman could be expected to know whose business it is to audit all the accounts of this Dominion. But the hon. gentleman kept plying him with questions containing reflections upon the management of the railway, and conveying, as far as he could, an unfavourable impression of the men who were managing that road, and of the officers under the administration. The hon. gentleman desired to proceed in that investigation when he knew thoroughly well that this gentleman had not the information he desired, but that there were officers in the employ of the government at the present time who could give him the fullest light upon the subject. Then we had Mr. Pottinger called. Mr. Pottinger had not been under investigation one session, he had scarcely touched, he had scarcely been allowed to touch, the threshold of the matters which have been referred to, when the hon. gentleman who has made this motion moved that Mr. P. S. Archibald be summoned as a witness. When that motion was made my predecessor in the department (Hon. Mr. Haggart) stated that Mr. Archibald had been here and had given him very valuable information which he thought that Mr. Archibald ought to be allowed to confirm personally before the committee. That was the hon. gentleman's statement. Mr. Archibald, then, has been up here, and it appears Mr. Archibald has been filling the ears of the hon. gentlemen, and they have availed themselves up to this moment of the information which Mr. Archibald has been able to give. But they had scarcely been examining Mr. Pottinger two or three hours before they found that Mr. Archibald had put them on the wrong track, and they wanted to get him back so that he might coach them again. They wanted him to act as prosecuting or advising counsel, and they thought it would be most convenient if Mr. Archibald should be summoned here before the Public Accounts Committee and should be kept at their elbow to pour distilled poison into their ears.

That is the whole purpose and object for which hon. gentlemen want Mr. Archibald here. Is it to get at the truth? No, the truth would not suit them. Is it to get the men who have paid out this money, who have made these contracts, who have been serving the public in these responsible positions, a very large number of whom were in the same positions which they occupy today under my hon. friend opposite (Hon. Mr. Haggart). Is it for the purpose of having them exonerated if there is any ground at all for suspicion? Is it for the purpose of preventing them from having an opportunity of making those explanations before the committee which some one should give, or is it for the purpose of casting reproach upon their conduct in the positions which they occupy? No, that is not the object. The object, as anybody can see at a glance, is that this gentleman should be summoned by these hon. gentlemen to be at their elbow and keep them straight. They have been working away but they have not made much progress. They have been looking into the accounts, but they have not seen anything that would be likely to be of service to them and they have come to the conclusion that the sooner they get their friend, this amicus curiae, the better it would be for the cause they have at heart. That is wholly the situation in which this matter stands. No person has said, the committee have not said, that if, at a future period, it was found necessary that Mr. Archibald, or anybody else should be brought here, he should not be summoned. The committee have not said that if it should be considered later, after we get the officers here, after we get the men who have made the expenditures here, after they have explained what they have done, if it is deemed necessary to go outside into the highways and the byways, the roads and the streets, to drag some one who may have something to tell before the committee and put him on the stand, it shall not be done. But, until we advance a little farther into the inquiry than we have yet gone, I submit that no sufficient case has been made out, that no sufficient reason for such a request as this can be furnished, and I do not wonder that my hon. friend (Mr. Bell) has been unable to find a precedent for it. Hon. gentlemen opposite would be the first to laugh to ridicule any proposition on our part made under such circumstances as these. If any one ever had the coolness, or the effrontery to make such an application before a committee on a previous occasion and it was refused, I do not wonder that it did not come before this House, because any one would know that the House would not, under such circumstances, allow the name of the committee to be used, for such a grossly improper, irregular and unprecedented purpose. As Minister of Railways and Canals I say that I am not afraid of any investigation which my hon. friend desires to make. Let him think what he pleases and try what he dares, I will be found, as a member of that committee, ready and willing to afford every facility for bringing before the committee all persons who have any knowledge of the dealings and transactions under consideration at first hand and not depending altogether on hearsay for what they may know. I am perfectly willing to have this 'enormous expenditure,' as the hon. gentleman characterizes it, thoroughly investigated, and I think I may prophesy that after he has exhausted his energies in this investigation, whatever mistakes he may find have been made by my officers, or by myself, he will be unable to attach any criminal wrong-doing to any of the men who have been filling these responsibile positions in the government service. He may be able to show that we have not exhibited the capacity that we should have exhibited, that we have not been able to watch in detail every item of expenditure, but he will not be able to show that the responsible officers of the railway, from those at Moncton to the head of the system, have not exercised their best judgment and capacity in the management of that railway system. Let me appeal to the House and to ask it whether it would be possible to conceive of anything lamer than the application which this hon. gentleman has made and the motion which he has founded upon it. Are we going to lay down this precedent in this House that any hon. member of a committee may jump up in his place, or that any three or four hon. members who want some friend of theirs brought here to attend any investigation that is going on and who cannot get along without outside assistance, and ask that anybody may be brought before that committee ? Are we going to establish a precedent that all these gentlemen have to do is to get up in the committee, call for somebody to be summoned and that the committee has nothing to say as to the time or occasion or manner of their appearance ? Whatever may be the hon. gentleman's hopes in regard to the passing or the refusal of this motion, I have no doubt we will hear a great deal in the public press about stifling investigation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We always hear that. Hon. gentleman always have the same kind of side cry when they have nothing more substantial to build their hopes on. Whatever course the House may take, I hope it will take a proper and regular course and lay down no principle of action which cannot be justified on the soundest precedent and on the best ground.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) has given us a lecture as to how we ought to proceed in the conduct of an investigation before the Public Accounts Committee. My hon. friend (Mr. Bell) who moved this motion showed without doubt that never before had such a precedent been before the committee or before this House in connection with an investigation into an affair of the greatest importance to this country, because, I say it is a most important matter where the expenditure on a public work in this country was $4,500,000 and more in excess of the revenue, an expenditure which ought to alarm the whole country when taken into consideration with the expenditures that the hon. gentleman has made from the time he entered office to the present day. Our duty is to inquire into such expenditures as these, and in making that inquiry have we not to follow the precedents and rules which have been established and which have served as a guide for every deliberate assembly, every committee, as well as for this House and the British House of Parliament ? An hon. member gets up and summons a witness. Another hon. member gets up and declares that to the best of his information and belief the witness he has summoned is prepared to give evidence. Now, we had the extraordinary proceeding of the minister who was on trial before the country entering an objection to the summoning of this witness. It is a matter of public notoriety in the papers of the hon. gentleman's own province and along the line of the Intercolonial Railway that if inquiries were pushed before the Public Accounts Committee as to the expenditure of public moneys on that road, such developments would be made—I am using the words of the papers—as would astonish the country. I am putting it in the mildest possible terms. We are exercising our duty of investigation and are we to be confined to the officials whom the hon. gentleman puts into office, and who, when he puts them in the box, have hanging over their heads the fear of dismissal, to whom the minister puts his questions and suggests the answers ? Are we to be dictated to in what manner we shall make this inquiry ? Yes, we have to examine these officials and every one else who is connected with the office, but we are not to go outside at all. We are to be confined to the officers of the department and to the hon. gentleman's officials. I venture to say that such a course was never before dictated to the committee of a free assembly having control over its own affairs. That committee is appointed for the closest investigation of the public accounts of this country, and we are told forsooth, that we must confine ourselves to an examination of the officials of the department. But the Minister of Railways has been taken down. Some of his supporters in the committee had mental reservations in supporting him, notably the member from Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) who hoped that some time in the future the minister might change his mind and that the witness we needed should be summoned. Ashamed of the proceedings in the committee he now promises to the House that after the officials have been examined, then if it is necessary Mr. Archibald would afterwards be summoned. What we demand is that the committee shall have full power to call witnesses, and that when a member states that he believes that a certain witness is able to give information which shall be valuable to parliament, that that witness shall be summoned. Who is the witness we desire to summon in this case. He is a gentleman who was chief engineer of that railroad for a number of years up to 1897, and against whose honour and record for ability never a word could be said. He was dismissed from his office. What for ? Was it because he was an inefficient engineer in chief ? Not at all. He was dismissed because he would not serve the political purposes of the present Minister of Railways, and because he was too honest and too honourable to do that. We are told that this man is to coach the opposition and that if he was brought up here he might give us some information. Well, it is information we want, and that in itself is sufficient reason why he should be summoned. If the House votes now to sustain the Minister of Railways, it will establish a precedent which will not be in the interest of this country. The Minister of Railways has introduced new manners into this old parliament of Canada, to which this House has been a stranger hitherto. He is bringing in the fashion of dragooning, which I suppose he learned in his little operations in New Brunswick, where it may pass current, but it will not do in this parliament of Canada. There is too much honour in this House for that. The members on the opposite side of the House know very well that what we demand here is simply fair-paly. No precedent can be brought for the House refusing to summon this witness. In England it is said to be necessary that a person should state in writing the reasons why a witness should be summoned before a committee, and I offered at the last meeting of the committee to give my reasons in writing, but the chairman of the committee said there was no necessity for that as the matter could be considered when the report was being considered in the House. The minister says he is not on his trial. He is on his trial. He is on his trial for capitalizing the amount which he paid to the Grand Trunk Railway ; he is on his trial before the people of this country for the enormous expenditure of over $22,000,000, made up of capital expenditure and deficits on the Intercolonial Railway since he took charge of it. Including the amount which he asks us to vote for this year and next year on capital account, his expenditure on capital account on the Intercolonial amounts to nearly $23,000,000, which is more than the whole surpluses during the period the Liberals have been in power. That money which might have been expended in developing this country largely is being sunk in that sink hole by the Minister of Railways, and he now refuses to allow us to summon a necessary witness in order to inquire how his expenditures have been made. I appeal to this House ; I appeal to the country ; I appeal to the supporters of the Minister of Railways. It is the business of the opposition to investigate, and are they to be thwarted in their investigation ? Will this House of Commons sanction that ? And, Sir, if the supporters of the government refuse to do what is right there is nothing left to us but to appeal afterwards to the people of the country, who will, I believe, insist on our getting fair-play, and insist on having the public expenditure of this country properly investigated.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). This is a little matter of business which we might well afford to discuss in a quiet businesslike way. I had not the good fortune to hear my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) throughout all of his remarks, but I had the good fortune to hear him in the committee, and I suppose I know his general view. I also know the view of the hon. gentleman from Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) and I observe that he has tried to cover up a weak defenceless position by introducing new and entirely unjustifiable matter. The hon. gentleman has treated this as a trial, the case of an accusation. He says that the hon. Minister of Railways. is on trial. If the minister be on trial, who is his accuser ? Which one of these gentlemen opposite accuses him ? The hon. member (Hon. Mr. Haggart) is an old parliamentarian and he knows the procedure. Let him stand up and put his charge in writing and let us know what it means.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I have made the charge here publicly.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) has made no charge. The hon. gentleman dare not make a charge. The hon. gentleman and his associates have been fishing for a fortnight in the hope of finding some kind of a charge and they have utterly failed. I draw attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman has treated this as a charge and one hon. gentleman in the committee said : there is a charge and whoever heard when a charge is made of any restriction upon the calling of witnesses. There is no charge, Mr. Speaker. The hon. gentlemen opposite are no doubt courageous, and they would willingly make a charge if they had any ground for it. But when we see at this very moment that notwithstanding insinuations and suggestions, not one of them has dared to make a charge against the Minister of Railways, I think the House will understand the position which we occupy to-day. Now, what are the facts ? Sometimes it is necessary to translate a motion. What does this motion say ? It says that if John Smith shall stand up in a committee meeting and say, I move that John Brown be summoned, that motion must pass. That is the whole situation. The hon. gentleman has attempted to add reasons and explanations, and all sorts of things, some of which did not occur in the committee at all, I take the responsibility of saying.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What explanation did I make that did not occur in committee ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman at a second meeting of the committee began to tell what he meant to have said on a previous day ; but meantime the record was down, and in reply to that I simply said that the record would speak for itself, and the House would judge on the record. I have the record in my hand :

Moved by Mr. Bell, seconded by Mr. Barker, that P. S. Archibald, C.E., Moncton, be summoned to appear as a witness before this committee at its next meeting.

There was no reason given, no explanation, no charge. It was simply as if any man stood up in the committee and said, I move that John Brown be summoned.

Mr. BELL. Will the hon. gentleman permit me ? That of course was the formal motion ; but was there not in addition to that a statement made by me, and repeated afterwards by Mr. Haggart, that the witness should be called because his testimony in our opinion would be important ? That, of course, does not appear on the record, for this reason, that the shorthand writers who made that record were instructed to put down nothing but motions and the evidence.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman is correct, he would be bound to state in his motion his reasons for making it, so that it would be a matter of record, and not a subject of dispute in this House. I do not think my hon. friend made the statements he says he made.

Mr. BELL. If my hon. friend will pardon me, the authority which I read in the course of my remarks states that no witness shall be summoned unless a certificate shall be first filed with the chairman of the committee.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Was that done ?

Mr. BELL. No.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Then the hon. gentleman, according to his own authority, did not lay the necessary foundation for his motion.

Mr. BELL. What I say is that the hon. gentleman is not correct in saying that the motion before the committee should contain a statement of the reasons for it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say that at the time the motion was made there was no statement, no charge, nothing at all but a huge blue-book containing a large number of accounts ; and if a man gets up in the committee, and says I move that John Brown be summoned, and a couple of days afterwards says I believe that John Brown can give useful information, that is no ground whatever for summoning him. My hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) afterwards said : 'I wish you would report to the House that there are thirty or forty men in my county who could give useful information, and who would like a trip to Ottawa; why not summon them?' There would be just as much reason for summoning these persons as for summoning the man whose name was mentioned, and who had no more relation to the investigation than any other man you could imagine. The hon. gentleman talks of the magnitude of the expenditure. The expenditure is larger than it was, undoubtedly; but that has nothing to do with the question. What we have to consider is whether there was anything before that committee which required the summoning of this gentleman. We were at the first stages of the inquiry—I do not say investigation, because there was nothing to investigate—into the public accounts. Hon. gentlemen opposite, who thought they knew a good deal about railways, but have since discovered that they know precious little, thought they had something to investigate; and they spent two days in asking the Auditor General about matters of which he confessed he knew nothing. That was the first stage of their investigation. Then they had the General Manager of the Intercolonial summoned, and he was waiting. They had another officer of the Intercolonial Railway summoned as well as several other witnesses. Hon. gentlemen opposite have a fashion of getting a lot of witnesses summoned at the expense of the country, and keeping them dangling around Ottawa two or three weeks, and then not calling them after all. Now, I quite admit that circumstances may arise in which they might connect this gentleman, either as an expert or in some other way, with the business of the Railway Department. If they can disclose anything which seems to be a reasonable matter for investigation, then let him be called; but at a time when no charge was made, no ground alleged, and when the hon. member did not comply with the rule which he himself quotes, I submit that there was no foundation whatever for calling this gentleman. I was one of those who voted that he should not be called. I say now that if hon. gentlemen can show any reason in the world, after the examination of the principal officials, for supposing this man can give any useful information, I am prepared to call him. Nay, more, if they are prepared to make any accusation respecting the honour or honesty of the management of the Intercolonial Railway, and this gentleman or anybody else can give any evidence in support of their accusation, I am ready to call him. But when we have no charge before us or anything to investigate, and a gentleman stands up in the committee and says, I move that John Brown be called, and two days afterwards some one else says, I think John Brown knows something about this matter, I submit there is no proper ground laid for calling him. If Mr. Archibald can give any useful information, I shall be glad to hear it, but on the grounds which the hon. gentlemen have laid down, they have not a shadow of right to call him. If we are to observe the practices and rules of the House, then we will not undertake to call witnesses until a fair and reasonable ground is laid to show that such witnesses can give some useful information bearing on the public accounts before the committee.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, what a delightful exhibition the hon. gentleman has given us of a quiet, business-like discussion.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I thought I was exceedingly quiet.

Mr. BORDEN Halifax). A most delightful exhibition of what he says should be the mode of discussing this question. The hon. gentleman has had some experience in the same kind of business in the province of Nova Scotia. A gentleman made a charge with regard to the distribution of road allowances in that province when my hon. friend was premier of the province; and witnesses were allowed to be summoned when it was convenient, and certain witnesses who were not perhaps thought to be very agreeable to the hon. gentleman were not allowed to be brought; and the investigation was dealt with by my hon. friend's government in such a way as seemed best adapted to serve not the interests of the country, but the interests of my hon. friend's government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If my hon. friend will permit me, he lays the foundation that there was a charge, which I deny; and in doing that he lays down different conditions from what exist to-day.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What I am pointing out is that there was a charge.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There is no charge here.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). There were distinct charges in the province of Nova Scotia on that occasion and they were dealt with in exactly the same way as this matter was dealt with. I think my hon. friend ought to think before he speaks.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. We settled all these things in Nova Scotia.

An hon. MEMBER. Thirty-six to two.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Thirty-six to two.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). On that particular occasion?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. On nearly all occasions. We do not have to count very closely down there.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is a most delightfully satisfactory answer to the question as to whether or not we are to have this witness. The answer is—thirty-six to two; call in your members.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, we did not call in the members; we called in the people.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman is not only attempting to violate the rules of the committee but the rules of the House by interrupting me without my consent.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will not interrupt the hon. gentleman without his consent, but when he interrupts me I will call his attention to it.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I have the floor at present. The hon. gentleman must remember that although he is a very great man no doubt, he has to observe the rules of the House, if he does not observe the rules of the committee. If he desires to make any special remarks that are pertinent to this debate, I will sit down and give him the opportunity.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I think I have made them.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Regarding the remarks which my hon. friend has made, I desire to mention that I have attended sessions of that committee for five years, and have never before seen any occasion —although party strife was sometimes strong, although matters were keenly debated in that committee—when that committee refused to summon a witness after a member of this House on the committee had stated, on his reputation, that he believed the witness to be material. On the contrary, the rule laid down in the Public Accounts Committee and the Privileges and Elections Committee and every committee on which I have had the honour of sitting was that if any gentleman of that committee or any member of this House would stake his reputation on the belief that a witness was material, that witness was called, as a matter of course. And naturally so. Because any gentleman, any member of that committee who took it upon himself without sufficient cause, to ask that a witness be summoned, after stating that witness was material, took his reputation in his hands, and perhaps more than his reputation. I would like to know upon what other basis are we to act in a matter of that kind. What is considered sufficient justification to any hon. gentleman for asking for an investigation? Is it not that he stands up in this House and stakes his reputation on the truth of the charge which he makes? Does he not practically assume the same position when he stands up in the committee and states that he, as a member of that committee, believes that a certain witness is material?

The Minister of Railways and Canals took a rather singular way of dealing with this question. He adopted a rather singular mode of argument. He wanted to know if this witness was coming for the purpose of exonerating some one. He seemed to think that unless a witness was coming for the purpose of exonerating some one, he should not be called. He seemed to think it was a dreadful thing that a witness should, as he expressed it, post the opposition. Well, in the interests of this country, is there any particular reason why the opposition should not be posted on the methods of hon. gentlemen opposite? I wonder if all hon. members on that side, I wonder if all the hon. gentleman's colleagues are not of opinion—some of them at least—that it would be a fair thing to have the methods of the administration of the Intercolonial Railway fully investigated? Is there any reason which the Minister of Railways and Canals or the Minister of Finance can suggest why the opposition should not have every possible means of sifting to the ground every transaction of the government?

The hon. gentleman says that this witness is not an official. Well, I have seen something of that hon. gentleman's mode of examining officials before a committee of this House, and I do not think it is a valid reason for not calling a witness that he does not happen to be an official of this government, because the hon. gentleman is somewhat intense in his manner with officials, when examining them. I have noticed that more than once, and I am not quite sure that possibly we could not get evidence out of a witness more clearly and more fairly, if that witness did not happen to be an official of the Department of Railways and Canals.

I do not know what my right hon. friend who leads the House thinks about this. This is not a question merely of dealing with a few items in the estimates or the Public Accounts respecting the Intercolonial Railway. This is the setting of a precedent. Are we to have the precedent set for all time to come that although a dozen gentlemen, members of a committee, may stand up in that committee and say that they stake their reputation on the materiality of a witness, the minister in charge of the particular department concerned, shall call on his followers, who are a majority in that committee, to vote down the motion just because he happens to think that it will not suit his interests, and upon such reasons as the Minister of Railways has indulged in this afternoon.

These items, Mr. Speaker, relating to the Intercolonial Railway will be investigated. Let not the Minister of Railways imagine for one moment that by preventing the summoning of this witness, he is going to prevent a most thorough investigation into every item of that expenditure. He may delay the proceedings or protract them, but I venture to say that my hon. friends behind me will see that these proceedings are not completely burked. Even if this material witness is not permitted to us, we will endeavour to get at the proof in some other way, and I assure my right hon. friend that I think it will be in the best interest, not only of the government of this country, but of all of us in this House, if he would exercise some pressure on the Minister of Railways and Canals and see that any witness, as to whose materiality any hon. gentleman on that committee stakes his reputation, is not kept from that committee by denying the issue of a summons. I am not saying this in any spirit except that which prompts me to believe that we on this side are bound to see to it that these accounts are investigated in the most thorough manner and that we are doubly bound to see to it in this particular instance on account of the action taken by the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of Finance, the latter of whom, as the guardian of the treasury of this country should have been above the position which he has ventured to take.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I hasten to assure my hon. friend the leader of the opposition that he will find in this House no intention whatever of burking the inquiry in the Public Accounts Committee. Since he has appealed to me, I am bound to tell him that I shall hope that in the future, as in the past five years, nothing will ever take place in that committee which will disgrace this government, such as took place under late administrations. We shall endeavour to meet all charges as they are brought, but I want to call my hon. friend and the House to a proper sense of the rules of the House. There is no occasion for any display of passion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is none at all, and my reasons may apply as well to one side as to the other. I was surprised at the manner in which my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) discussed this question. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that this is purely and simply a matter of parliamentary procedure. The rule is well laid down and will be observed on the floor of this House, and will be observed also upstairs, that all matters connected with public expenditure shall be investigated to suit the opposition or to suit anybody else. In this matter, however, how do we find the case brought to the House? This is an appeal from a decision reached a few days ago by an important committee of this House, the Committee on Public Accounts. Now, I appeal to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, I appeal to my hon. friend the member for South Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart), who is an old parliamentarian, to support me when I say that the rule which is invariably followed on the floor of this House is that the House maintains the decisions of committees unless adequate cause be shown to the contrary, and unless cause be shown on the record, and not upon the ipse dixit of this man or that man. There is a rule which has been departed from in this procedure, and a rule the wisdom of which has been shown by the example which we have had on this occasion, that there is to be no discussion in this House of what has been said in one of the committees. There is a rule that the report of the committee must stand by itself, and that it is not allowed to refer to what may have transpired in the committee.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Until the report of the committee has been presented.

The PRIME MINISTER. And then we are bound by the report of the committee. If we are allowed to refer to what took place in the committee, what have we in this very case but a statement made on one side and contradicted on the other side? Here we have two such honourable men as my friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) and the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) not exactly agreeing on a statement of fact. I say that if the decision of the committee has to be appealed to the House, it is the bounden duty of the hon. gentlemen who wish to make an appeal to place before the House a complete record, so that the House may judge from that record. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) thought he was not properly treated by the committee in not having the witness summoned that he desired. I shall come to that presently. But I have to say to my hon. friend that if he wanted an appeal taken to the House, his bounden duty would have been to have the record so prepared by the committee that the House would be in possession of the facts. We have here the bare fact that request was made to summon a witness and the committee would not allow it. What were the committee's reasons for that decision? They may have been good or they may have been bad. We must assume that they were good. There is nothing before the House to show that they were bad. If the case was that request was made that a certain witness be summoned at once, and the committee said: We will not summon him to-day, there are other witnesses to be heard, would that not be a reasonable thing? And why should I give my vote to reverse the decision of the committee? If the hon. gentleman had taken the precaution to say: This is a material witness, and I wish to summon him to give evidence on this or that point, and give the reason, and, if, then, the summoning of this witness had been refused, he would have a complete case. But how do I, as a member of the House, know the reasons that actuated the committee? I have not the honour of being a member of the committee, and I do not know what took place. It is not reasonable to ask me to take the word of any member of the committee or anybody else. As a member of the House, and speaking for the whole House, we have a right to have on record the reasons which led the committee to act as it did. If the decision of the committee was a good one, the committee ought to be supported, if not, the decision of the committee ought to be reversed. But how are we to carry on the business of the House unless the safeguards which surround our procedure are maintained as sacredly as they are maintained in Great Britain? I will go one step further and refer to what I said in the first instance. The opposition have a right to investigate expenditure. It is not only their privilege, but I say without hesitation, it is their right. Let them make application to the committee, and if they do not get justice there, let them come before this House with a case that we can deal with, and, for my part, I will pledge the majority of this House that they will receive the justice that is their due. But my hon. friend from Pictou, who has a logical mind and understands these rules, must see that it is not possible for the House to take action upon the appeal that he has made. The record is too bare. You have nothing of the reasons which were given to the committee for summoning the witness. It is not even stated that the rule of the House which my hon. friend has quoted has not been observed in this instance. We have only, as I gather from the conversation which took place a moment ago across the floor of the House, a statement that such and such a thing was done. I advise my hon. friend to go before the Committee on Public Accounts, take the necessary procedure, if he wants this witness summoned, and, certainly, if he puts himself within the rules of parliamentary procedure, he will be entitled to all necessary support in making his investigations. Let me say one word more to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I would have preferred that he had not held out any threats against us. We will not be threatened. We are prepared to stand by our rights, as we are prepared to stand by the rights of the opposition. We are prepared to do our duty whenever the appeal is made to us upon grounds which enable us to see what that duty is. But no threats will be listened to.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman a question. Suppose that the majority of the committee refused to put the reason of the refusal in the report of the committee?

The PRIME MINISTER. Then, I would expect that there would be a minority report laid before the House.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Although the question before the House is, on its face, a very simple and unimportant one, yet, there being a principle involved, it is very doubtful if a question of greater interest or importance to the people of this country will come up during the present session than the question now before us. There seems to be great difference of opinion between hon. gentlemen on the other side and hon. gentlemen on this side as to what that principle is. Speaking my own view, not presuming to express the opinions of gentlemen on this side—I think, however, they will agree with me in this presentation of the case—whenever matters are referred to the Public Accounts Committee, they do not go before a court for the trial of any individual. The committee has no machinery to try any individual. And, even if any member on this side were, on his responsibility as a member of parliament, to make charges against the Minister of Railways—to make all the charges that are at present floating in the air—and even if those charges were proved before the committee, that committee has no machinery to pass any sentence and no machinery to punish. It would be utterly without force in acting upon the evidence laid before it. As I take it the functions of the committee are simply these: The people of this country raise a large amount of money every year, taking it out of their own pockets, and they have appointed certain gentlemen as their trustees, with the function, among others, of disbursing these moneys. When the representatives of the people come to Ottawa, among our duties is that of seeing to it that the moneys disbursed by our trustees are honestly, economically and wisely disbursed. When we go before the Public Accounts Committee, we go not to charge that the minister has acted in a manner forbidden by law, we go not pretending to know that there is anything wrong in his department. We do not attempt to make a charge; and if we had a charge to make, the committee would not be the proper place to make it. We go there as representing the people of this country to investigate the accounts on behalf of our constituents, and to see whether those items are properly disbursed. Going then as a committee, and trying to use the common sense which I am sure every member of this House possesses, it must be assumed that the members on this side of the House are more likely to investigate those accounts carefully than gentlemen sitting on the other side, who perhaps have more confidence in the hon. gentlemen making the disbursements than we have on this side of the House. Naturally, I say, the people of this country expect gentlemen on this side of the House to investigate these accounts more carefully, and to show whether the moneys are properly disbursed. Now then, if that duty devolves upon us there must be surely some power belonging to us to enable us to carry out that high duty.

But the reason I rise is to enter my protest against the principle laid down by two ministers of the Crown to-day that there should be a charge made, or that, as the Minister of Railways and Canals expresses it, witnesses should not be summoned before that committee unless some wrong was proved, that is to say, that after the necessity for the witness being called had passed, then we could call him. Perhaps it will not be out of place to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that when a day or two before a member of the committee asked that two officials of the railway should be called, they were promptly called, not a word of objection. I would like to ask what right had members on this side of the House to call on those two officials of the railway ? What conceivable reason could be given for any member on this side calling for those witnesses, or any witness ? There must have been some reason, or the Minister of Railways and Canals would not have consented to these two witnesses being called. These witnesses were called, and on a subsequent day precisely the same right was invoked, the member who had before exercised his right desired to exercise it again, and if a member had a constitutional right to call those two witnesses, how can he be refused the constitutional right to call another ? Now, the premier called attention to the fact that the record should show the ground on which this motion is based. I submit that the record does show the ground. I submit, and I think my argument is sound, that there is an inherent right in every member of that committee to name a witness whom he wishes to call. That, I submit, is the prima facie right of every member of the committee, though the regulation of that right rests in the committee, so that if any member abuses his right, then that member in future will forfeit it, and the committee will refuse him the privilege of misusing a right which, nevertheless, he certainly possesses. Now, I think it was hardly fair to this House that, when so important a question was raised, when so much money was at stake, the Minister of Railways and Canals should rise in this House and, after saying that no witness should be called unless a wrong had been proved, and after an inquiry had been made, that he should say, why should Mr. Archibald be called unless to exonerate the minister ? Is a witness only to be called after a charge is proved, and even then only if his evidence will tend to exonerate a minister ? I say it was rather beneath his dignity and unworthy of his place in this House to say : I am not afraid—boldly challenging all criticism. Of what should he be afraid, after his committee had refused to call the witness we wished to call ? I could not help wondering if, when the hon. gentleman spoke, there was not running through his mind these lines of an American poet :

In short, I firmly du believe
In Humbug generally,
Fer it's a thing thet I perceive
To hev a solid vally ;
This heth my faithful shepherd ben,
In pasturs sweet heth led me,
An' this'll keep the people green
To feed ez they hev fed me.

Now, Sir, I shall not take up any more time, because the only point I wish to insist upon is the right of every member of that committee to call any witness whom he thinks proper to be called in the public interest; and if hon. gentlemen opposite are to lay down a contrary doctrine, it is just as well that this House should understand, it is just as well that the people of this country should understand, that when we, the members on this side of the House, who are upon the Public Accounts Committee, desire to investigate the finances of this country, in the course of our investigation we are only to be allowed to call those witnesses that hon. gentlemen opposite approve.

Mr. T. B. FLINT (Yarmouth). As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, and having been a member of it for nine or ten years, and having been present on the occasion referred to, I presume it would be proper for me to make a few remarks in respect to some of the observations made by hon. gentlemen on the other side. I cannot but think that perhaps more heat has been evolved from this discussion than the intrinsic merits of the case demanded; but perhaps that heat has been evolved in obedience to a well known scientific law that heat is evolved in proportion to the momentum and weight of the two bodies which come into conflict. As a reason for adopting the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), it has been stated that large sums were involved, that there was great extravagance, and that dangerous principles were being established in the management of the government railway, that the Minister of Railways and Canals was upon his trial, and that, to a certain extent, the political party which supports him was also upon its trial. I think this is wandering rather far afield, and making the matter of greater magnitude than a calmer consideration would allow. If any body is on trial it is the Public Accounts Committee, and from that standpoint alone I propose to view the situation. As the hon. member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) has remarked, after the vote was demanded which decided that the gentleman named should not be summoned, I ventured to remark to the committee that I presumed this would not prevent us dealing with the matter later. That point seemed to be generally accepted by the committee. Following the observations made by other hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the House, I cannot see that any considerable grievance can be complained of by hon. members composing the minority of that committee. Certainly I think it was not very becoming for my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to intimate that any sort of terrorism should be exercised against the majority of the House by threatening to prolong the session if his wishes were not complied with.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I made no such suggestion.

Mr. FLINT. I accept the hon. gentleman's disclaimer, but it appeared to me that there was an intimation that the session might be prolonged in consequence of this refusal of the committee. Any standing committee of this House has certain discretion as to the order of its procedure. It is true, as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) stated, that there is no precise precedent for a case of this kind, but I can call to mind during my recollection of proceedings in this House, many occasions on which the summoning of witnesses has been deferred until other proceedings were taken, until a more opportune time had arrived on which to hear their evidence. Moreover, when a question of fair-play towards the opposition is raised, we have also to remember that there may be a question of fair-play to the administrators of the government, a question of fair-play to the officers in the employ of the government, who are conducting the various public affairs in the outlying portions of the Dominion and expending large sums of money. Certainly the committee charged with such investigations should follow a reasonable and fair course of procedure towards both parties, especially when it is claimed that a minister or any other person is put upon his trial before that tribunal, and necessarily before the country. We have officials on the Intercolonial Railway spending hundreds of thousands of dollars, covering a vast variety of subjects all of which are subject to investigation, to differences of opinion; and it is the right and duty of that committee to investigate all these points carefully, to see that the vouchers correspond to the accounts, to see that the proper procedure has been taken, that no extravagance has been committed in the operations of the road. As a mere matter of procedure before the committee, it is proper that officials of the road should first be examined as to their expenditure of the money placed at their disposal before any outsiders are called to explain discrepancies or improprieties in the expenditure. I think it was not fair for the leader of the opposition to intimate, as he did, that there was any improper terrorism exercised by the minister towards his subordinates before that committee. I am certain that I never have, and I do not believe that any hon. member of that committee has ever seen the slightest scintilla of any such spirit shown on the part of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals towards the men who are under him and who have been before that committee. If that should be maintained, every one could easily understand that the result would be that the evidence given by these men, many of them men of eminence and high standing, would be discredited, and I do not believe that a charge affecting the integrity, the courage, and the fearlessness of these men ought to be entertained by this House, or by the committee. We all agree that examinations before the committee should be thorough and exhaustive, but, I think we must all agree that these examinations should be systematic and based on some fair and reasonable principle, not perhaps on the strict legal principle which would be followed in the trial of an action at law, but, perhaps, corresponding to that, because there must be some regularity in order that the gentlemen of the committee who are not familiar with these details should be able to make up their minds. There are two kinds of committees which are mixed up in the minds of some hon. gentlemen here, and they have spoken as if the procedure before any committee should be of precisely the same character. There are the regular standing committees of the House, which have large jurisdiction, and there are committees of inquiry, which are appointed for the investigation of particular charges. The latter class of committees are special committees appointed by this House based upon charges laid and formulated before the House and sent to the committee for special examination. In such cases specific charges are made, and a gentleman formulating these charges and being desirous of establishing them through the evidence which he has in his possession, it is easy to see that it would be only fair that he should be given more latitude and ready facility for subpœnaing his own witnesses. But, the committee of which we are speaking is a committee formed in a different way. Its operation is not based on specific charges, it is a committee with large powers of inquiry and of procedure in a particular direction, and the discretion to be exercised by such a committee would be somewhat larger and ought to be exercised in a broader spirit than the same discretion would be exercised by the majority of a special committee. This matter was discussed in the House of Commons many years ago, and the late Minister of Justice (Sir John Thompson) made some observations upon it which may be proper to be read at this time. Speaking of the powers of the Committee on Public Accounts and its course of procedure, that eminent gentleman made these remarks :

> No one can deny, and certainly on this side of the House we do not pretend to deny this afternoon, that, in the investigation of any reference made to the committee by this House, it is entirely proper for the committee to hear evidence which may be adduced, no matter what consequence may ensue to any member of this House. It matters not, therefore, in the least whether the committee finds that an item in the account which is before it for investigation affects the credit and honour of a minister or of a private member of this House. The one claim I should make, if it were necessary to do so—but it is not necessary, because there is nothing to the contrary in this resolution—would be that it shall be the duty of the committee carefully to see that the proceedings before them is not searching for evidence, fishing for evidence, a proceeding for the purpose of affecting the honour and credit of any member of the House or a member of the government, but that the evidence shall be pertinent and relevant to something which the committee has been instructed by the House to investigate. Further, I say that the moment the committee—I speak of the present committee, and I will refer to future committees in the same way as long as I have a right to say anything on the subject in this House—the moment the committee is satisfied and evidence is adduced which is relevant to any inquiry which this House has asked the committee to undertake, that inquiry should be continued, no matter how fatal it may be to any member of this House. The one safeguard which, I say, it is unnecessary to insist on, should be contained in this resolution, because it contains nothing to the contrary, is that the committee shall not be made use of by outsiders for the purpose of attacking the honour and credit of members of this House.

The House to-day is under the same line of argument. This is the case before this committee. An enormous volume of public accounts relating to expenditures on the Intercolonial Railway is before the Committee on Public Accounts. I ask the intelligent members of this House, and particularly the members who may be members of that committee, what course they would like to see pursued for their own information. They are not experts. They are waiting patiently for such an exhibit of evidence as will enable them to form their opinions and make up their minds as to the propriety of any suggested procedure. Is it not natural and fair to assume that the first men they would like to hear are the leading and important officials of the road who are concerned in the expenditure on this road, and that after they have been heard and searchingly examined by gentlemen on both sides of the committee, and by gentlemen particularly interested, perhaps —although all the members of the committee are interested—in the more thorough probing of the public accounts, the committee would be willing to hear the evidence of other gentlemen who are not officials of the government and who may be called to throw light upon matters which have been brought forward in the previous testimony. Any other course would strike me, as I am sure it would strike other members of this House, as being decidedly unfair. I think it would be only fair that prima facie evidence should be given first of the officials of the road, and if there is to be any rebuttal of their testimony, or if matters upon which they have been examined have not been satisfactorily explained to the committee, then, any member of the committee would be justified in summoning outsiders to atend upon the investigation and contradict or deny the evidence given by the proper officials. I cannot but think that our hon. friends opposite have been premature in bringing forward this resolution, and that if they had been content to wait a little longer and lay their reasons before the committee why this witness should be called before the committee, I am as certain as I can be certain of anything, that the committee would be willing to accede with alacrity to their request, but, while men employed in connection with the railway had been summoned and are on their way to Ottawa, I think it would be permature to ask for other witnesses to be summoned here. I think hon. gentlemen opposite have thought that this might be a good opportunity for making some political capital.

Mr. MACLEAN. That is what we are here for.

Mr. FLINT. Apart from the importance of the evidence, hon. gentlemen no doubt imagine that they can divert the attention of the House to another point, by trying to make it appear that this committee was endeavouring to stifle inquiry. I, for one, as a member of that committee will join them at any time to prevent any attempt at stifling inquiry. It would be suicidal, politically as well as economically, on the part of my hon. friends to do anything of the kind. It would be injurious in the interest of the party responsible for the management of the railway to cover up one item of folly or extravagance, and I, as a member of that committee, as, I believe the majority of the committee, will assist the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals and assist the opposition in that committee to examine most thoroughly and in detail every item of the accounts which the hon. gentlemen opposite desire to have examined. But, we must have some procedure, some form, some fair-play, not only for the government and for the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, but for the officials who may be charged with wrong-doing. I support the action of the committee under the circumstances, and I believe this House should, in justice to the committee, throw out the resolution of the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the very fervid declaration from, I think, every hon. gentleman who has spoken upon the other side of the House of the fact that he is actuated by the most honest and most sincere motives. From what has taken place one would imagine that if that declaration had not been so explicit, there might be some reasons for doubting it. As a young member of this House I would not be very much impressed with the desire of the government or the desire of the supporters of the government to have a full, fair and impartial investigation of the public accounts, judging from what has already taken place in the committee and in this House. Without wishing to be offensive to the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint) I may say that he has added nothing to the debate, and that his chief success was in getting further away from the issue than any other of his friends who have spoken. He says that this motion is premature, and that if delay is allowed then we may get the witness we require. It is the first time, in a rather long experience which I have had of investigations in the course of my profession, that I have ever heard that the party prosecuting should be directed by the other side as to the manner in which he shall conduct his case. It is a good sound rule of law that those who have the conduct of an investigation are the best judges of how to array the evidence in support of the contention which they set up. So much is this the case that even the judges do not interfere with counsel as to the order in which he shall call witnesses. It would be a most extraordinary stretch of prerogative if when we are investigating the public accounts of Canada, the government should dictate to us as to what witnesses we should call, and in what order we should examine them. This is not a question with us of begging for something. It is not a question of: By your grace or by your leave. We are here to maintain our rights as representing the electors of Canada, and it is our right to call this witness now, and not to delay until some future time when it may suit the convenience of the government to call him. I am learning all the time I am in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LENNOX. I am getting experience all the time.

Mr. HOLMES. You need it.

Mr. LENNOX. I echo back to that hon. gentleman: So do you need it. I may tell that hon. gentleman (Mr. Holmes) something that he and his friends do not seem to understand; I tell him that when I came to this House I understood that the parliament of Canada was above all things a deliberative assembly. I understood that it was an assembly to which men came, not to vaunt wild opinions in extravagant language but to reason calmly and deliberately upon the great questions affecting the people of Canada. I am glad and yet sorry for what has taken place in the House to-day. I am sorry that so many of the ministers of the Crown lost their temper, and I am glad that the First Minister of the government of Canada saw fit to give them a very just and very merited rebuke. The violence of the Minister of Railways was such, that although I understand he is a prominent counsel, I would have wanted nothing better than that he should make such a exhibition before a judicial tribunal, if I were arguing the case against him. But, after all his violence and after all his proclaiming that he had nothing whatever to fear, that he was scathless, harmless, and innocent, he wrapt himself up behind the committee and said: I won't let you know anything about these accounts. When the Minister of Finance commenced his speech I thought we were getting back to a deliberative assembly again. He began in a very mild way and said it was a pity that we could not approach this little matter of procedure in a quiet, calm, and business-like spirit, but he had not proceeded far in his speech when he outdid the Minister of Railways in violence. If the violence of the Minister of Railways echoed to the roof, the thunders of the Minister of Finance went loftier still. Is that his idea of the discussion of a business-like question in a calm and judicial spirit. What is the meaning of such conduct on the part of the ministers, when all that we on this side of the House ask is, that we shall have an opportunity of ascertaining how the money of the people of this country was expended. And who is asking for this right? Why, the Minister of Railways grows eloquent, and if he does not grow eloquent he grows violent, in declaring that the members of the committee, who demand, shall not have an opportunity of examining Mr. Archibald. The Minister of Railways asks: who is this Mr. Archibald? I will tell him. Mr. Archibald is not a hireling of the government. He is an independent man who can have no motive for prevaricating or colouring his evidence one way of the other, and he it is whom we want to examine. The Minister of Railways tells us in effect that no member on this side of the House, that even the whole opposition have not the right to call Mr. Archibald as a witness. Well, we differ from him in that. We may have no right per se, but we are the representatives of the people of this country who want to know how their money has been expended, and as the representatives of the people we have that right. I can tell these hon. gentlemen opposite that whether or not they vote down this motion, the people of Canada will know how this money was spent. The First Minister told us that there was not sufficient record upon which to order a reference of this matter back to the committee. Let us see if there is not. In the first place it is known to all the members of this House, that when such a motion is made in the committee the reasons alleged in its favour by the mover or seconder are not taken down in the reporter's notes. That was very fully explained the other day in the committee.

But do we want any further record than we have? Mr. Speaker, we have this record: We have the fact that the public accounts are being investigated; that is the first step in the record. We have it on record that witnesses are being called to give evidence on those accounts. We have the further fact that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) asks that a witness be called. For what purpose? For the purpose of throwing light upon these accounts. Is not the hon. First Minister splitting a hair, endeavouring to draw a red herring across the trail, when he tells us that we have not a sufficient record of the transaction ? I have the greatest respect for the hon. First Minister—great respect for him as one of those gentlemen that can get around a corner by plausible and eloquent language about as well as any one I ever knew ; but I had not to-day such profound admiration for him as a counsel learned in the law. When I listened to his special pleading—that nice skill which not only splits the hair, but if necessary walks along the hair without disturbing it in the slightest degree—my admiration for him as a lawyer of the old school, which flourished in those bygone days when special pleading was in vogue, rose very high indeed.

I say that the people are waiting for us to get to work to investigate these accounts and let them know whether they are correct or not. Not that we want to try to make out that they are false or fraudulent; but we want to know whether they are correct or not ; and that being the case, hair-splitting comes with bad grace from the hon. First Minister. Hon. gentlemen opposite want to know what it is all about. I will tell them. We have admittedly an enormous deficit in the transactions of the Intercolonial Railway, at a time when we should not have expected it, when the circumstances of the country and the buoyancy of trade justified us in expecting the reverse ; and in the face of that fact the necessity is imposed upon us of inquiring whether there is any leakage. When we come to investigate these accounts, what do we find ? We find that at the time the general elections were coming on there was a most unprecedented purchase of ties—ties to bind the voter and the government together. There were 1,300,000 ties purchased at a time when we had a surplus of 127,237 ties on hand from the previous year, making in all 1,427,237 ties for the financial year ending June 30, 1901. These ties were bought at twenty-eight cents apiece. The estimated requirement for the year was 650,000 and the actual requirement was 495,000. Thus we had a surplus of 932,237 ties over what was necessary—not a surplus of the ties which were necessary to bind the public to the government at that time, but unnecessary for the purposes of the Intercolonial Railway. We have the fact, therefore, that there was a purchase of three times the actual requirements of the railway ; and, that being the case, and an enormous deficit occurring at the time, is there not good reason for saying that the people should be on the alert, and that we of the opposition would be recreant to the trust reposed in us by the people of this country—and we represent the very best people in this country—if we did not say, we will investigate until we find out the facts ? Now, we have found out a great deal. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about fishing. I think it was a gentleman from Yarmouth who talked about fishing. I suppose there is a good deal of fishing down there. But I think we have fished to some purpose. We have this fact, that in the face of this surplus of ties on hand, a contract was made with the New Brunswick Coal and Railway Company for 2,000,000 ties at twenty cents apiece. By this first transaction, therefore, the government incurred a loss of $80,000 of the money of the people of this country.

Now, with regard to the question whether Mr. Archibald should be called or not, he is a man who has had a large and valued experience in connection with railway matters. We have already elicited the fact in the committee that that large purchase of ties was a very unwise transaction, because a great many of those ties are now being worn out without being put into use, and because a very large proportion of them were not suitable for the purpose. For the edification of the House, I will read a portion of a letter received from a gentleman at Campbellton who knows the facts to which I am referring. Speaking of the ties he says :

> So many ties were got out during the last campaign that they are now, and have been ever since, piled up along the Intercolonial Railway between Campbellton and Moncton as a monument of mismanagement and corruption. A large proportion of them are of no use except for firewood.

They have served their purpose, I presume, pretty well.

Mr. COWAN. Is that letter from a defeated candidate ?

Mr. LENNOX. I will relieve the hon. gentleman's mind by giving the rest of the letter :

> This is patent to every person travelling over that section of the railway, and if Mr. Pottinger has not seen these huge piles of sleepers rotting it is because he had his eyes closed. This state of affairs has been commented on by travellers who had no interest whatever in our country. As soon as it was decided to appeal to the country in 1900, a number of the boss heelers seem to have got carte blanche, to get as many sleepers as they deemed necessary, to purchase votes, and at the same time to allow themselves a handsome commission. In my canvas through this country, I saw piles of ties here and there, newly got out, consisting of cedar, spruce, fir, and even ash; that was not the only objection. Some were rotten, some crooked——

They were like some of our hon. friends opposite in that particular and probably the gentleman who has been interrupting me.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has no right to apply the expression 'crooked' to any member of this House.

Mr. LENNOX. In deference to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the expression in the fullest degree, and hope that the hon. gentleman, after this withdrawal, will not look crooked.

——and a large quantity were undersized. I took the trouble to get out of the wagon on one or two occasions and examine some. They were so plainly defective that one could not help taking notice of them. Any person who was in the market could get work on the railway line or get a contract to get ties throughout the whole campaign. When these ties were brought out they were taken without any objection—it would not do to make any enemies at that particular time.

We have here, whether from a defeated candidate or some one else—and let me remind the House that sometimes a defeated candidate ranks quite as high as those elected—this fact, which bears out what has already been shown in the committee, that Mr. McManus' inspection of ties was such that the country has suffered an enormous loss. These are some of the facts and circumstances which necessitate a careful investigation. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite, who were somewhat premature in their applause of the heroic utterances of the Minister of Railways this afternoon, to reflect before taking action. They talk about precedents, why, what precedent is required for the plain exercise of a plain duty ? When a different government was at the head of affairs, they wanted no precedent because they never refused any reasonable demands, and if honest square dealing is to prevail it is hard to see how the motion before the House can be rejected. Let hon. members not look at this thing in a narrow carping spirit, but decide it on its merits. Otherwise they will be simply giving the country reason to believe that they suspect the Minister of Railways of not having efficiently managed the railway under his control, and are afraid to have his maladministration exposed to the light.

I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite for another reason. If they create a precedent by refusing to summon this witness, is their decision not likely to recoil against themselves ? If the indications are to be trusted, at no distant day they will have to change places with hon. members on this side, and the precedent they are now creating may be then quoted against them. I would ask them to rise to the level of their duty by supporting this motion to have the report referred back to the committee with instructions to procure this witness, in the interests of an honest administration of the affairs of this country.

Hon. D. TISDALE (South Norfolk). I am at a loss to understand on what grounds the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals and the hon. Minister of Finance object to this motion. Each one gives a different reason why it should be rejected. It seems to me that the whole question is whether we should retain or abrogate one of the most important rules of this House, and whether the opposition should consent to forego its right and its duty to insist on being given every facility for an investigation into the administration of public affairs. The Minister of Railways wanted the name of somebody who was making a charge. The Minister of Finance based his objection on the fact that there was no certificate that the witness required was material. But he did not deny that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) had offered in the committee to give such a certificate and to give his reasons in writing, and that seems to me to entirely dispose of the objection of the hon. gentleman. The only objection that had any point was that which was raised by my right hon. friend, the leader of the House. He said that the record was not complete—that there was nothing in it to show that the hon. member who asked to have the witness summoned considered that witness material. But if not, who was to blame ? If that is not in the records, it is due to the fact that the majority in that committee directed the shorthand writer not to take it down.

If we take the reasons given by the three hon. gentlemen who spoke, except the Prime Minister, we find, not only is there no answer, but such reasons as they attempt to give do not agree. The Prime Minister makes an argument upon the question. If I understood him aright, I do not hesitate to say that I am glad that he spoke as he did, because it makes the issue clear. While this government exists, for three years to come, at all events, we are not to have a different view from that which we have hitherto held of a well known rule of this House. If I understood the Prime Minister, he agreed with the hon. member for South Lanark that, if any hon. member of that committee stated that he believed that a certain gentleman could give evidence of value to the committee, he had a right to have that witness called. If that is the Prime Minister's direction to his followers, I agree with him. If the view to be taken is different from that, I regret it, and hon. gentlemen opposite will regret it. I would like to know from the Prime Minister if I understood him aright.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tisdale) appeals to me, I have no objection to tell him my view. Any member of the committee has a right to ask for the examination of a witness. I do not mean to say that there must be a charge. But, if a member of the committee desires to investigate a matter connected with the public expenditure of the country, he has the right to ask for the examination of witnesses. But it is the right of the committee to ask him upon what he wishes to examine the witness, and to see that that is relevant.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I agree with the Prime Minister in that. If hon. gentlemen on the other side will take that interpretation, they will find hon. members on this side agree with them. Now, the question arises whether under the circumstances of this case the House shall uphold the ruling of the committee in refusing to call a witness. The Prime Minister states, very fairly from his standpoint, that the whole case should appear upon the record. But it is not gainsaid here that the hon. member (Hon. Mr. Haggart) sought to comply with all the requirements that the Prime Minister has laid down, but was prevented. If the right hon. gentleman says that the fact that the case does not appear upon the face of the record is to be held as a bar to my hon. friend, notwithstanding that the committee would not allow it to be put upon the face of the record, then I cannot follow him. If it had not been for that, I am frank to say that I would not disagree with the Prime Minister.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Will my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Tisdale) permit me to say that I dissent from his statement of fact. I do not admit that that statement is correct. I merely express this dissent, but do not wish to take up time, having already spoken.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Do I understand the Minister of Finance to say that what the hon. member for South Lanark states is not true ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not wish to contradict anybody. But if the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tisdale) says that the hon. member for South Lanark stated in the committee the purpose for which he wanted that witness and the committee prevented that being put upon the record, he is misinformed.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps I may be allowed to explain. What I stated was this: I offered to put in writing the reasons why I wanted the witness called and wished to have that embodied in the report. This was during the second day's proceedings. But the chairman said that perhaps it would be as well that the report should go in as it was. The committee did not refuse to have it put on the record. I never said that it did.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That occurred the day after.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Yes. The first day, I went to the trouble of going into details to show why I wanted this witness.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I beg the hon. minister's pardon. I think the rest of the committee will bear me out, and so would the chairman if he were here. I stated that I wished to examine the witness in reference to the ties, in reference to the braces, in reference to the bridges—I gave half a dozen reasons. I stated that I had had a conversation with the gentleman, and I thought he would be able to give evidence on these particular points which would be of use to the committee.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. What the hon. member for South Lanark states as to this matter being excluded from the record does not bear out what I stated in the words I used. But I say that what passed between him and the chairman was sufficient to cause him to believe that, though it was not incorporated in the record, it would be treated by the chairman as part of the report when it was brought in.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That was after it was adopted. You could not change the record then.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. But the report had not been brought to the House, and such a report is not completed until it is brought to the House. I am surprised that my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Fielding) should engage in mere hair splitting. He is an older parliamentarian than I am, and he knows right well that such a report is not completed until it is brought down. The very fact that the committee discussed it a second time shows that, under the rules of order, it was still open to discussion. But, so far as I am concerned, the point made by the Prime Minister is an important one. I am glad to hear from the Prime Minister that he is not going to allow his ministers in these committees to do as they please. If the Prime Minister had been there, according to the rule he has concurred in to-day, we would not have had this rule treated as it was.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not a fair statement.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I am in the judgment of the House in what I say. What was the hon. gentleman's (Hon. Mr. Blair's) speech ? I have already stated that I was disappointed in it, and I repeat that statement. There was nothing in his speech. He even wandered off into talk about what the witness might say. He knows as a lawyer that that was quite irrelevant. Therefore, I think I am not severe in saying that he would take the same course in the House as in the committee, and that he should not be sustained in it. I am glad to be able to say, after hearing the Prime Minister, that there is no dispute about the rule and that we know where we stand.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Withdraw the motion.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. So far as I am concerned I would have no objection to withdraw the motion, after the statement of the Prime Minister, and if the Prime Minister will agree that the witness shall be called if he is asked for in the proper way.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is within the discretion of the committee.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. After the Prime Minister's statement, he having corrected his minister, and having stated his position frankly and willingly, I, for my part, would not object to the withdrawal of the motion. I think all the useful services of the motion have been to a great extent accomplished, and that the general acceptance of an important rule is of more benefit than any other question connected with the discussion.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). I ask the indulgence of the House once more, as I have done on many occasions, to condemn the practise of having a political head over the government railways of this country. When our own party was in power years ago I stood up in this House and opposed the principle of placing government railways under a political head. Sir, the doubts I had then as to the wisdom of that adminsitration are greatly strengthened to-day. The Minister of Finance stated that we should discuss this question quietly and on its merits. Well, surely when we find that a large portion of the public press are saying that improper expenditures have taken place on the government railways, are we not discussing the question on its merits ? Now, Mr. Speaker, suppose the government railways of this country were taken away from a political head and placed under some independent body that would be responsible to the Crown for the proper expenditure of all public moneys on the government railways, I ask whether any hon. gentleman in this House, whether he be a supporter of the government or a member of the opposition, would rise and say that notwithstanding the fact that the public press are condemning the expenditure on this government railway, we should not have an investigation into such charges ? Supposing an independent commission were to use these words of the Minister of Railways and Canals : We are not afraid of an investigation, any investigation that may be made—would any hon. gentleman in this House burk an inquiry into charges made against that commission such as have been made by the press of this country against the administration of the government railway ? Why would they not oppose such an investigation ? Because it would be a business transaction, it would be their duty to investigate the affairs of that railway in the interest of the people whose money was being expended.

Now I am not going to charge hon. gentlemen opposite with the mismanagement of that railway, any more than I made such a charge against my hon. friends when they were in power; it is the principle of the matter that I am discussing, it is the administration of government railways by a political head that I am opposing. But discussing the question now before the House in the interests of the people of this country whose money is being expended, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, is it not a fact that those of you whose constituencies are located alongside of the government railways, have at one time or another approached the general manager of that railway, or approached the Minister of Railways and Canals, asking him for certain favours on behalf of your constituents ? In many cases perhaps he may have refused your request, and in consequence of his refusal, no doubt threats were made and dissatisfaction engendered. Taking that view of it, then I say if, instead of a political head, you were to approach an independent body and ask them to put on more men than are really necessary to conduct the operations of the railway, why, that independent body would simply say to you in a business way : The department in which you wish us to place more men is already filled up, and we have no need for any more at present. That would be the end of it. We should not see, as we see now, and have seen in years gone by, more men employed than were required on the railway, thereby placing upon the people a heavier expenditure in order to satisfy political friends. For that reason I am opposed to this method of conducting government railways.

Now, we have a general manager, and Mr. Pottinger's name has been mentioned. I am not in a position to judge of his merits, I am not in a position to say whether he is well qualified or not. But since the Minister of Railways and Canals has stated that the officers of the government railways have exercised their best judgment in the administration of that railway, I question his statement in view of the fact I have just explained, that the manager of that railway is not left alone to use his best judgment in its administration, he has been subject to political influences from one quarter or another, and by reason of that undue influence it would be unfair to judge him on his merits as an administrator. The other day I attended that Railway Committee, and I observed another reason why the railway should be taken from under a political head. I found that certain questions were asked a witness in that committee, and the opposition members were eager and willing to obtain the information they wanted from him; and I also observed a disposition on the part of the supporters of the government to burk the evidence given by that witness which would tend to injure the government, But would hon. gentlemen take that course if they were investigating the management of the country's railway by an independent commission ? Certainly not. It is of great importance that the railways owned by the people of this country should be administered on business lines, the same as those on which other railways are administered throughout Canada and the United States, that is to say, on business principles.

Now let me examine some of the objections of the Minister of Railways and Canals to the motion that is before the House. He says he objects to Mr. Archibald being summoned because he is not an officer of the railway, and because he is not a contractor for the railway. Now are these reasonable objections? I have not heard one hon. gentleman in this House say that Mr. Archibald is not a competent civil engineer. No fault has been found with that gentleman so far as his profession is concerned. Now if he posseses the qualifications to give an expression of opinion as to what ought to be done in the interests of the people in the administration of that railway, then I consider it to be our duty as members of this House to ascertain whether he thinks, according to his judgment, that the railway has been properly administered, and he should go upon the witness stand before that committee for that purpose. Another objection made by the minister is that Mr. Archibald is a sore head. Surely that is not a sufficient reason. Suppose that any hon. gentleman in this House were a stockholder in any other railway of this country, and that he happened to be in a minority on a question of managing the railway. Suppose a motion was made concerning the administration of that road, I would like to know from the Minister of Railways and Canals whether he does not think that a man in the position of Mr. Archibald would not be one of the very first persons called upon for information to ascertain whether the road was being properly administered. Why, Sir, he is one of the very best men to have before that committee for the purpose of securing information of that character.

Now, the hon. gentleman asks, does the minority of the committee want Mr. Archibald for the purpose of getting at the truth? The hon. gentleman said in the first place that he was not afraid to have any investigation made into this matter. Surely, if he is not afraid, if there is nothing to hide, nothing to expose detrimental to himself, or to the officers of the railway, what objection can he have to Mr. Archibald being present? Surely he can have no objection at all. As to the truth or falsity of the statements made by Mr. Archibald that would be outside of the members of the committee, but, certainly, the people of the country would have an opportunity of judging as to the truthfulness of the statements made by Mr. Archibald. These statements would go broadcast throughout the Dominion of Canada. They would not go entirely through the west where there is no government railway, but, they would be circulated along the line of the Intercolonial Railway, through the eastern part of Canada, and those who are living alongside of that railway and know something about its management would know very well whether the statements made by Mr. Archibald were true or false.

Now, the question has arisen between hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as to the propriety of the reasons why Mr. Archibald should be summoned before that committee. I am not a member of that committee, but I have paid some attention to the last two meetings and I distinctly heard the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Haggart) say that on a date previously he had given the reasons why he wanted Mr. Archibald summoned before that committee. The records were referred to but the shorthand reporters stated that they did not make a practice of including anything in the record other than the evidence given before that committee and by reason of that the statement made by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals was not included in the evidence given before the committee. Now, he rose up afterwards and stated why he wanted Mr. Archibald summoned, and really and truly I did not think it was necessary in the interests of the people of this country that my hon. friend should be placed in the position of a lawyer and be under the necessity of complying with the rules of procedure in so far as that he must place his bill of particulars before the other side in order to secure a witness. I did not think the people of this country required anything other than that he should frankly get up and state the reason why he wanted Mr. Archibald before that committee. He stated that he wanted Mr. Archibald for the purpose of inquiring into the cost of ties, of braces, and of bridges, and who will deny that this gentleman has the knowledge necessary to give information to the committee of very great importance? Nobody can deny that. Having said that is that not a sufficient reason why the committee and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals should have him summoned? But the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, who, for the time being is at the head of the government railways of this country, called upon his supporters to vote it down and as a matter of fact his supporters did vote it down. Now, let me ask that hon. gentleman: Would he do that if there were no politics involved in securing Mr. Archibald before that committee? He certainly would not do it although I do not say that, perhaps myself, even, or perhaps, my friends might have done so in days gone by. I do not think that I ever did in my life, and I am quite satisfied that the Conservative members of this House never in their lives, opposed the securing of the evidence of a witness who would give important testimony. Now, there is a strong feeling throughout the country that government ownership of railways is a proper thing for this country to adopt. If there is a gentleman in this country who believes in the administration of government railways on the principle of administering them as we have it now, then, I call upon him to change his views and denounce any such proposition, because the proposition as we have it now is not in the interests of the people of this country. So long as I am a member of this House I will protest against any political interference with the management of that railway. Here is another reason why Mr. Archibald should be called upon to give evidence before that committee. We had the general manager of the road before the committee and we had his statement that he was the one who prepared the estimate for the large number of ties necessary for that railway. Shortly afterwards he was asked the question: What class of ties did you purchase? And he was subsequently asked: What are the lives of the different qualities of timber that you purchased? He could not tell the committee the lives of the ties that he had been using for years. I want to say that I do not like to reflect upon the general manager of that railway, but, if he says honestly under oath that he cannot tell the life of a railway tie, then, he is unfit to manage the government railway or any other railway. How can any man sit down and estimate the number necessary unless he knows the lives of the ties and unless he knows too the age and number of old ties which had been put under the rails by which matters he arrives at his estimate, and on which his estimate is based? If we cannot get a statement of that character from the general manager should we not have a statement from a man like Mr. Archibald who does understand the life of a railway tie on this or any other railway? I do not intend to take up any more of the time of the House——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. INGRAM. Yes, I can quite understand why some of my hon. friends say 'hear, hear.' If they will go before their constituents I will venture to go before their constituents with them and I venture to ask their constituents if they are in favour of administering this railway under a political head, or through an independent body which will not be subject to the whims of every member of parliament, and I will undertake the responsibility of saying that 99 per cent of the average Grits or Tories in the country will support me in my contention, because, instead of having large deficits on our government railways as we have to-day, the expenditure will be something within the revenues instead of the expenditure being in excess of the revenues owing to the improper management that we now have of the government railways of the country.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe in the government ownership of railways in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN. Hear, hear, and after the speech of the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Ingram) and after the speech of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) last night, in regard to the same question, I wish to set myself right and I especially wish to set right the views of those who believe in the government ownership of railways. I believe in government ownership and I also believe in a political head who is responsible for the administration of the road in the way that a certain amount of political responsibility goes with it, but I do not believe that there should be any partisan administration of government railways. The two things do not go together, and only last session, when I brought up the question of the public ownership of railways, I brought it up in the way of presenting a motion to the House declaring that the administration of the Intercolonial Railway should be depoliticalized. I was laughed at for that proposition by hon. gentlemen opposite. There is no connection between the two things. The Intercolonial Railway to-day can be administered as the peoples' railway without any partisanship in it, without any interference, as there is to-day by members of parliament and party heelers from one end of the road to the other. In Australia, a colony somewhat similar to Canada, where they have public owned railways, they have a responsible chief in parliament, but they have the administration of the road placed in the hands of commissioners as was outlined by the hon. member for East Elgin to-day. I take this opportunity of putting myself right and of asking others in the country who believe in public ownership to put it fairly before their fellow citizens that we say that partisan administration of a state owned railway is not a necessary adjunct to it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte) :

1. The contract price for the steamer 'Scotia,' was £47,000.

2. On September 28, 1901.

3. No, this steamer did not arrive until late in the season; moreover, the landing stages at Mulgrave and Point Tupper were not ready nor are they yet fully completed; the vessel also sustained some damage while being navigated by the builders from Newcastle-on-Tyne to Port Mulgrave.

4. The amount that has been expended on this steamer over and above the contract price to date is $7,690.

CONFISCATION OF FISHING GEAR.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. What was the number of confiscations of fishing gear made by the Department of Marine and Fisheries in Prince Edward Island in the year 1901 ?

2. In which of the counties of the province were the confiscations made and the locality (as exact as possible) ?

3. What amount was realized from the sale of property so confiscated, and the names of parties to whom sold ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. James Sutherland). The officers of the department inform me that there is no record of any confiscation of fishing gear in Prince Edward Island in the year 1901.

RAILWAY STATION AT ALBERTON, P.E.I.

Mr. HACKETT asked:

1. Is it the intention of the government to build a new and suitable railway station at Alberton, Prince County, Prince Edward Island, this year?

2. If so, will they have the new station so placed as to avoid the 'Y' nuisance there? If, not, why not?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte). No, it is not the intention of the government to build a new railway station at Alberton, P.E.I., this year.

THE CLIMATE OF CANADA.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria) asked:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the reply of Right Honourable Joseph Chamberlain to the deputation from the Welsh Patagonian Committee, as reported in the 'Times' (London, Eng.), of February 19th, as follows:—'It struck me while you were speaking that the change of climate—from a very hot country to the terrible region of the Canadian winter—might be rather a danger to face'?

2. Is it the intention of the government to endeavour to disabuse Mr. Chamberlain's mind of his mistaken views respecting the winter climate of Canada, (a.) by sending to him a copy of Hon. Mr. Sifton's Atlas of Western Canada; or (b.) to request the Canadian lady teachers when passing through London, en route to South Africa, to wait upon the Colonial Secretary, and furnish him with data showing the delightful nature of the winter climate of Canada?

3. Is it the intention of the Prime Minister, on his approaching visit to England, to further endeavour to remove such erroneous notions?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The attention of the government has been drawn to this matter through the public press; but, as the Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain is a remarkably well-informed man in all colonial affairs, I am bound to believe that this must be a newspaper mistake, and that he never could have made use of the language attributed to him. If any of the remedies suggested in the hon. gentleman's question are to be made use of, I think that the visit of the young ladies would be the most agreeable and pleasing to the Colonial Secretary, if he is like other ministers.

BREAKWATER AT NORTH HEAD, N.B.

Mr. GANONG—by Mr. Taylor—asked:

What is the estimated cost of a breakwater at North Head, Grand Manan, N.B., from survey recently made by the government engineer?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte). If built of native timber, $91,000; if of partly creosoted timber, $143,000.

PORTLAND CEMENTS.

Mr. OSLER—by Mr. Taylor—asked:

Have any tests been made by the testing department of the Department of Public Works or by the Railway Department of the various brands of Canadian and foreign cements? If so, what is the result of such tests?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte):

1. Yes.

2. That Canadian Portland cements give better satisfaction than imported cements. For the past fourteen years tests have been made regularly by this department of all available cements, even though not sent to the department for that purpose. During the past two years 900 tensile and crushing tests have been made besides hot water, air, cold water, specific gravity, setting, sieving and chemical analysis of each cement.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS — CENTRAL BLOCK.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

1. What is the total estimated cost of the addition made to the Central Block of the Parliament Buildings, Ottawa?

2. What is the superficial area of this addition; what number of rooms does it contain, and to what purposes are these rooms devoted, or to be devoted?

3. What appropriations have been made by parliament towards the expenditure on this work?

4. What is the total amount expended to this date?

5. Were tenders called for?

6. How has the work been executed, by contract or otherwise?

7. The names of the contractors?

8. What is the cost of the alterations and improvements made in the attic of said block?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte).

1. Cost of addition, including heating, lighting, &c., $30,000; elevators, taking down walls, cutting floors, building foundations and brick walls for elevators and the electric elevators, $12,000; attic rooms over old parliament building, new roof, iron skylights and finishing rooms, $8,000; granite columns, new doorways in entrance hall to elevators, painting main hall and staircases, &c., $4,000; minor works, changes Commons post office, changing stairway to public gallery (Commons) and messengers' rooms, fitting up rooms for Senate, &c., $2,500; total, $56,500.

2.

	Area.
Ground floor 26 x 60..	1560
First floor 26 x 70....	1820
Attics 40 x 70....	2800
Total area.....	6,180

Ground floor devoted to 'Hansard' staff, first floor, one room for Mr. Monk, M.P., one for Mr. Stewart, and apartments for Deputy Speaker, House of Commons.

3. $35,000.
4. $35,167.47.
5. Tenders were invited for the elevators.
6. Partly by contract and partly by day labour.
7. The Fenson Elevator Company, of Toronto, for the elevators. The Forsyth Granite and Marble Company, of Montreal, for the granite columns.
8. $8,000.

According to the first plans prepared for the addition, the elevators were shown to be placed directly opposite the main entrance door of the parliament buildings and the estimate was made from the first plans. Had the elevators been placed as shown by the first plans, less accommodation would have been got than there now is, and it would not have been possible to get the large committee room that there is now in the attic.

After careful examination, it was found the elevators could be placed in the space they now occupy. Where now placed they are more convenient than if placed where originally intended. Owing to this change, the cost of the alterations was considerably increased ; further, in order to get the additional attic rooms over the old part of the building, the old roof had to be removed and a new roof constructed and iron skylights put in. The roof trusses had to be remodelled and iron tie rods put in, as also a concrete floor, heating, lighting, &c. The changes named are the reasons why the original estimate has been exceeded.

NORTH BAY PIER, INGONISH.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

1. Did the government do any work during August and September, 1901, to further protect the pier at North Bay, Ingonish, in the county of Victoria, N.S.; and if so, what was the nature of the work ?
2. What sum of money was paid for such work ?
3. Was the work done by contract or by day's labour ?
4. If by contract, has the contractor been paid ; and how much ?
5. If by day's labour, have the labourers been paid ; if so, when and how much ?
6. What is the name of the overseer of the work, and what was his remuneration ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte).

1. Yes, placed a stone talus on seaward side of breakwater.
2. No money paid yet. Cost of work, $951.36.
3. By day labour.
4. See below.
5. See below.
6. D. M. McDonald, $2.50 per day.

Work was completed on 12th September. Mr. Milliege asked Overseer McDonald to forward paylists; these were not sent in until 16th January, when they were returned for correction and forwarded to department on 12th February. The overseer was altogether responsible for the delay.

OYSTER LICENSES.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

1. During the year 1900, were licenses issued entitling the persons named therein to fish for oysters on the beds planted by the government in the harbour of Shediac ?
2. To whom were the licenses issued, and on what dates were they respectively issued ?
3. By whose authority were they issued in each instance ?
4. Were such licenses, or any of them, cancelled ? If so, how many, and on what date ?
5. For what reasons were such licenses cancelled ?
6. What quantity of oysters were secured under such licenses during the period they were in force ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. Jas. Sutherland). Nearly 200 licenses have been granted. If my hon. friend will move for a return I will have the information brought down. It is too long for a question.

HOPEWELL CAPE PIER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. How much has been paid to the contractors for the new pier under course of construction at Hopewell Cape, Albert County, New Brunswick ?
2. What is the date for completion of this work, according to the contract, and what is the likely date of its completion, according to the present progress in construction ?
3. What arrangements have been made for the building of a road to the pier ? What is the amount to be paid for this road ; and with whom has a contract been made with respect thereto ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte).

1. $3,360.
2. Date of completion, 8th October, 1901. Chief Engineer recommended extension of time for one year.
3. A right of way was purchased in January, 1901, from H. J. Bennett, for the sum of $85.

The contractors are W. Downey and E. W. Linds, of Hopewell Cape.

CANADIAN AND FOREIGN CEMENTS.

Mr. OSLER asked :

Has any tests been made by the testing Department of Public Works or by the Railway Department of the various brands of Canadian and foreign cements ? If so, what is the result of such tests?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Hon. J. I. Tarte). Tests have been made of a number of brands of cement by the Department of Railways and Canals at the

Superintending Engineer's offices on the several canals, but the results of these tests are not on record in the department.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. LEONARD asked :

1. Is the government aware of the relations existing between the warden and deputy warden of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary ?

2. Does the government know that the deputy warden is in open conflict with the present warden, thus lessening the authority that the chief of such institution should have ?

3. If not, does the government intend to inquire into it ?

4. If yes, has the government taken measures to cause this state of things to cease, and to maintain the respect due the chief of the institution.

5. What are the measures taken ?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Hon. H. G. Carroll). The answer to the first question is : Yes.

To the questions 2, 3, 4 and 5 : No.

The deputy warden is not in open conflict with the warden and the relations existing between them are not of such a nature as to lessen the authority of the warden.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY.

Mr. LEONARD asked :

1. Has the honourable the Minister of Justice written or caused to be written a letter to the warden of the penitentiary, relating to the conduct of certain employees during the last election in Laval ?

2. If so, will the honourable minister communicate it to the House ?

3. Does the government intend to inquire from the warden of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary concerning the conduct of certain employees of that institution, especially of Oscar Beauchamp, deputy warden, during the said election in Laval ?

4. If so, will the government do it immediately, and report it to this House ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) :

1. No, but the minister has issued instructions to penitentiary and territorial jail officials and employees regarding their future conduct.

2. Copy of circular attached.

Ottawa, February 12, 1902.

Dear Sir,—It is in the best interests of the institution under your charge that when a man enters the service of the government he should refrain from actively interfering in political contests. Will you be good enough to inform the officers of the penitentiary, of all ranks, that while perfect freedom to vote in conceded to every employee, all interference in political contests is forbidden, and the officer found guilty of breaking the rule is liable to immediate dismissal.

Yours very sincerely,

(Sgd.) CHARLES FITZPATRICK.

LAND GRANTS TO SOUTH AFRICAN CONTINGENT.

Mr. SCOTT asked :

Is it the intention of the government to make grants of lands to members of the military contingents which went from Canada to South Africa ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). The matter has not yet been considered by the government.

3. What are the relative strengths of the 26th and 7th regiments ?

4. What is to be the total cost of the drill shed ?

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—ALLEGED SMALL-POX AMONG TROOPS.

Mr. SAM HUGHES (North Victoria). Before proceeding with government business, Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the government to an item which appears in this evening's 'Citizen,' to the effect that small-pox has developed among our boys in South Africa. The item is as follows :—

Small-pox has developed in the second section of the Canadian mounted rifles, and the troops are said to be in quarantine at Durban, and likely to remain there for three months.

Relations, in Ottawa, of boys with the contingent have received no word of them since they left and the fact goes to confirm the rumour that they are in isolation pending the stamping out of the disease.

I would ask the government if they have any information on this subject ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). So far, I have no information beyond what has appeared in the newspapers. I wish to point out that the transport ships were Imperial ships and were under the control of the Imperial naval and military authorities from beginning to end ; the Department of Militia had nothing to do with the ships, and consequently was not responsible. Of course we are very anxious to know the actual condition of things, and I shall endeavour to get all the information possible, and shall make it known at the earliest moment.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance :

That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. C. B. HEYD (South Brant). Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had the pleasure of listening to the reply of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) also to the reply of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) to the leader of the opposition. And the friends of the Minister of Trade and Commerce desire to congratulate him upon his manifestation of his old time vigour which has so often electrified the House. We are pleased to see him still so vigorous, and congratulate him on making one of the best speeches, that we, his friends, have ever heard delivered in this House. We also had the pleasure of listening to a reply, or supposed reply, by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member for West Toronto opened with an expression of regret that the Minister of Trade and Commerce had revelled in old slanders. From the manner in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce presented his case I am not surprised that the hon. member for West Toronto was sorry, and I can well imagine that that sorrow was shared by every hon. member on your left, Mr. Speaker. I can realize that, were I a follower of the men who were responsible for the condition of things that the Minister of Trade and Commerce so eloquently depicted, I also would have experienced feelings of regret ; but, combined with those feelings would have been a feeling of shame. It is not well for our friends opposite to forget what took place in this country in days gone by. It may be an old story, but it is an old story that will bear repeating, and the people of the country should not be allowed to forget it. For, on the other side of the House there is still a remnant of the old guard. It must not be forgotten that like begets like, and that, if the country were left unwarned, the old conditions of affairs might again result. The hon. member for West Toronto should have regretted these statements of the hon. minister because they were ancient literature. I am sure the hon. minister had an excuse for going back ten years, after having listened to the leader of the opposition, who, when finding fault with the expenditure of the present government, had to go back sixty years in the history of the United States to tell us that, at that time the expenditure of the United States was only one-third as great as the expenditure of the present government of Canada. Sixty years is a long time to go back in order to gain arguments, particularly when those arguments had no bearing on the case, the conditions being entirely dissimilar. At that time the exportations of the United States amounted to the huge sum of about $9,000,000. But it is not to that part of the speech of the hon. member for West Toronto that I object to so much. What I object to is the inaccuracies that he injected into his speech, the positive misstatements that he made—or my reading of Canadian history has been incorrect. As will be remembered, when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce drew attention to the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie and his scheme of development of the North-west, he passed a glowing eulogy upon the character of our departed friend, and still insisted, as he had insisted twenty years ago, that, if the schemes of Hon. Alexander Mackenzie had been carried out, the interests of Canada would have been better promoted than by the schemes that were afterwards adopted. Here is what the hon. member for West Toronto said :

I tell you, Sir, that had that policy been continued, the whole of the trade and the products of that western country would now be tributary to the United States. It may be possible that a larger population would be there now, but our North-west would not belong to Canada, and there are few members who will agree that it were better that Manitoba were more prosperous even at the cost of not belonging to Canada and Great Britain.

Where does our hon. friend from West Toronto get the idea that, even had the desires of Alexander Mackenzie been gratified, we would have lost that great territory to the north and west of us ? How could we possibly have lost the North-west and Manitoba ? · The discussion which took place here on that very question last night convinced me still more clearly that Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was right in his contention. I have often attended banquets and have heard the glowing eulogies by our Conservative friends taking credit to themselves for the work of making the Canadian Pacific Railway. I rejoice with them that it is a magnificent piece of work. I am willing to confess that the expectations which I had with respect to it have not been realized. I had the pleasure of going over it, and I found that it was, from end to end, a thoroughly modern and well equipped road and a credit to the people of Canada. But, in saying that, I do not mean to say that the scheme of Hon. Alexander Mackenzie would not have answered the purpose of the people of Canada equally well. And our friends who are so willing to discredit Alexander Mackenzie's memory, and to speak of the 'water stretches' which were part of his scheme, had evidence the other night in the speeches of our friends that represent that western country that these same 'water stretches' that have been so decried still offer the solution of the problem that is before us. It is now the purpose of the government, and has been for years, to utilize these same 'water stretches' which were to have been a part of Alexander Mackenzie's scheme. And it was because there was no means of using this water communication that the recent glut took place in the North-west.

As I understand it, and I do not think I have forgotten, it was the intention of the Liberal party at that time to construct a railway from Port Arthur to Winnipeg and use the water stretches to get to it. These same water stretches have still got to be utilized in order to make of the Canadian Pacific Railway that benefit to the people of Canada that they have a right to expect. So far as being an available means of moving the products of the western farms to the places of export in the east, that narrow line that passes through New Ontario down to Montreal is absolutely useless.

But we might excuse our hon. friend for going back himself into ancient history if he was absolutely correct in telling us what he found. But I take it that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) made a great mistake when he began to touch the trade questions of the country. If I wanted advice as to the quality or judiciousness of an investment, I would be willing to take the advice of the hon. gentleman. On matters of business of that kind I acknowledge his superior skill ; but when we read statements emanating from him such as the one I am about to quote, we have to revise our opinion, I have looked into his speech, and I find he says this :

> The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has drawn for us a very doleful picture of what will take place if we do not return to good old simple free trade. What would free trade mean for Canada ? It would mean the closing up of every factory we have from the Atlantic to the Pacific. . . . . What has been the effect of free trade to some extent, already ? It has driven away our bright young men who are educated in our schools of practical science and other institutions of learning.

I was not aware, Mr. Speaker, that the free trade of Canada had driven our bright young men out of the country to seek homes in a foreign land. If that has taken place, the Minister of Trade and Commerce proved last night that it took place at a time when we had anything but a free trade tariff ; and if it took place during the past five years, it certainly has not taken place during a period of a free trade tariff. The hon. gentleman was entirely wrong in introducing the question of free trade. We have not got free trade now. We did not have it during the period of the national policy, neither did we have it at any time during the history of this country with which I am familiar. In 1896 and for the fifteen years previous to which the Minister of Trade and Commerce alluded, the average rate of duty on dutiable products was thirty per cent. Surely he does not call that a free trade tariff. The average rate of duty to-day after the preference has been granted to Great Britain, based upon the valuation of goods entered for consumption in this country, amounts to twenty-seven per cent. Surely no hon. gentleman, much less a financier of the standing of the member for West Toronto, will say that a tariff which gives a protection of twenty-seven per cent is a free trade tariff, and that because of a free trade tariff our bright young men are leaving this country to make homes in the United States. I am surprised that our hon. friend made such a mistake. After two or three specimens such as I have given you of the errors into which he fell, I will be excused if I do not devote any more of my time to his speech.

Now, I desire for a few moments to confine myself to the amendment that has been presented by the leader of the opposition. We have had in former years amendments to the Budget resolutions in various forms. They all vary slightly, but the resonant note in them all is that we must have increased protection. That amendment starts out by saying :

> This House regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory.

Now, I am quite willing to admit that in certain details, or in its practical operation as regards certain industries, it is unsatisfactory to the proprietors of those industries. But to ask this parliament to affirm that the present tariff is unsatisfactory is to ask us to deprive ourselves of our reasoning faculties and to say that white is black or black is white. Now what are the actual facts of the case? What evidence did our friends give us to prove that this tariff under which the country has made such wonderful progress, is an unsatisfactory tariff? Is there any evidence of it any where in this country from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean? What are the facts of the case during the past five years? Our friends on the other side say they want to get back to that old national policy under which this country made that marvellous progress of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke last night. But we do not need to take opinions on matters of that kind. There are facts accessible to prove whether the tariff as a whole is unsatisfactory and has been injurious to the people of this country, or whether on the other hand it has been advantageous. I do not want to weary you, nor will I do so, by giving you a long procession of figures; but there are a few facts that I desire to present to the House to-night that will be probably welcomed by some who have not given that phase of the question the consideration that it deserves. We had the national policy for some fifteen or sixteen years before the present government attained power.

Mr. TAYLOR. We have got it yet.

Mr. HEYD. If we have got it yet, then the very first statement in the resolution is incorrect, which says that the tariff is unsatisfactory, because then the tariff would be satisfactory. Now, which position does my hon. friend choose to take? If he says it is satisfactory, then it must be the old national policy; if it is not satisfactory, it cannot therefore be the national policy. Now, I notice that whenever our friends have got an object to gain, and that the present tariff can in any way be credited with any benefits, they say it is the same old tariff. But when they think they can make political capital by decrying the tariff, then they deny that it is the national policy. I would like our hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) to choose to-night on which side he is going to stand. Is this tariff satisfactory or unsatisfactory? If satisfactory, it must be the old national policy; if not satisfactory, then it cannot be the national policy, and it must be a product devised and brought into execution by the present government. But what effect had it upon our trade during the past five years? And five years is quite long enough to test the efficacy of a tariff. Take the imports into this country in 1896; that is a pretty good test of the purchasing power of the people. We find that in 1896 the imports entered for consumption exclusive of coin and bullion, were $105,147,000. Five years before that during the operations of the national policy, or the tariff that our hon. friends want to restore, the imports amounted to $110,000,000. So our power to purchase the luxuries and the necessities of life from foreign countries had actually been reduced by $5,000,000. Since the introduction of the present tariff, satisfactory or not to our hon. friends on the other side, our imports have increased to $177,000,000, being $72,000,000 greater in 1901 than they were five years previously.

Measured from that standpoint, this tariff is not unsatisfactory. For the last five years of the old national policy the import trade of the country had diminished by $5,000,000, while during the first five years of the present tariff it had increased by $72,000,000, or over 70 per cent. Apply the same process of reasoning to the export trade of the country and has this tariff injured the producing classes of the country in any particular respect? If so, the trade returns do not show it. In 1896 our exports of the produce of Canada were $109,000,000. For the five years before they were $88,000,000, or an increase of $21,000,000 in five years. During the last five years, under the operation of this despised and much-to-be-amended policy that we have now, they increased to $177,000,000, or an increase of $67,000,000 in five years, or 65 per cent, the entire increase in five years, both in imports and exports, being $140,000,000. Measured on the basis of a revenue producer the conditions are also favourable. In 1896 the revenue was $20,000,000, collected on an average duty of imports of 19¼ per cent, while in 1901, the revenue was $29,000,000, based on a 16½ per cent tariff, an increase of $9,000,000, or almost of 50 per cent. Surely that does not prove that the country has been retrograding. The total revenue increased from $37,000,000 to $52,000,000, or by $14,000,000 a year. While the general trade of the country was so satisfactory, while the revenue has never been so buoyant as it has been in the last five years, what has been the effect of this policy on our trade? The discounts, the money loaned by the bank to traders and to the manufacturers of this country in 1891, amounted to $202,000,000; in 1896, five years afterwards, the amount had increased to $224,000,000, or an increase of $22,000,000, while during the past five years the discounts have risen to the magnificent sum of $318,000,000, or an increase of $93,000,000. When you come down to the real basis, that is, its actual operation, upon the individuals who constitute the people of Canada, you can measure it best by the savings of the people. In 1891 the deposits in the chartered savings banks and in the Post Office Savings Bank, amounted to $193,000,000. In 1896, after five years of the national policy in all its glory, the deposits had increased to $245,000,000, or an increase of $52,000,000, while in 1901, after five years of the application of the present much-despised tariff, the deposits of the people had increased to $390,000,000, or an increase of $145,000,000 added to the savings of the people. These are the financial and trade aspects of this tariff of ours which has given our friends so much trouble, and which they are so anxious to amend. Now, I am quite willing to admit that I would like to have seen the government make some slight changes in the tariff, changes, that, in my opinion, would have been a benefit to some of the manufacturing interests of this country, changes, that, under the circumstances, I think they were entitled to, but, I realize what these figures mean when the hon. Minister of Finance sees the question staring him in the face and wonders to himself how a change in the tariff will be viewed by the various portions of this Canada of ours, which are not equally interested in that aspect of the question. There is another phase of this resolution to which I desire to object :

This House is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, &c.

Now, I would not like, as far as I am myself qualified to speak, to be willing to express an opinion of this kind. I do not believe that the agriculturists of this country would endorse that opinion. When I look at the trade figures once more and I discover that our agriculturists are the greatest manufacturers there are in this country, that the agricultural interest is the greatest manufacturing interest there is in Canada, when I find that that industry exported last year, in animals and their products alone, $55,000,000, where five years ago they exported $36,000,000 worth, that in agricultural products they exported $24,000,000 worth, while five years ago only $14,000,000 worth were exported, I ask myself the question : Am I entitled to speak for that great agricultural class which has no interest in a high tariff, whom we cannot protect by a high tariff and whom we can only benefit by making life as easy as possible ? We cannot protect the agriculturists of this country. Neither have I been waited upon by any agricultural societies in the riding from which I come, asking me to seek increased protection for any product of the farm or of agriculture. I ask myself the question : Would I be justified in expressing the opinion that a declaration of protection will benefit the mining industry of this country ? That is an interest that does not appear to receive that calm consideration that its growing magnitude entitles it to. That mining industry of ours is going to become a source of enormous wealth to the people of Canada, which we, even in our day, have only a faint appreciation of. When we look at the actual facts of the case and see that only five years ago the exports of minerals from this country were $8,000,000, while, last year, they had risen to the munificent sum of $40,000,000, an increase of 500 per cent in five years, we can hope that when twenty-five years shall have elapsed the prediction made by Professor Bell, one of the most eminent geologists that we have in this country, recently in an address delivered in the city of Toronto, when he showed himself to be thoroughly conversant of the subject, that in twenty-five years Canada would export not $40,000,000 but $1,000,000,000 of mineral products, shall have been verified, and we are hardly in a position to say that by increasing the cost of mining machinery we will be advancing the interests of the miners of this country. That is an industry that can only be protected by making mining machinery cheap. The government have done what they could by removing the duty from mining machinery, and I do not therefore like to endorse this resolution even on behalf of the miners. Then, you take our fisheries; how can we give adequate protection to the fisheries ? They have no products we could give any protection to under the sun. The only protection our fishermen want is the protection of good harbours, good life-saving apparatus and the protection that markets easy of access will give to them. Any money in the form of protecting the fisheries expended to make the lives of the fishermen more secure and their occupation less hazardous and more agreeable, will be money well expended, and it will be the only kind of protection that we can give our fishing interests.

Take our forest products. I am aware that some who are engaged in the lumber industry, especially in British Columbia, are anxious that a duty shall be put upon lumber. But while that may be the case in British Columbia it apparently is not the case in Manitoba. As far as I am personally concerned—although I do not think it would do much good—I am in favour of putting reciprocal tariff on lumber as long as our friends to the South of us maintain a tariff on lumber. But that industry has not increased materially during the past three years as it has only risen from $27,000,000 to $30,000,000. Taking the five great national industries I have spoken of : The minerals, the fisheries, the forests, animals and their products, and agriculture, we have an export of $161,000,000. On that vast trade, by no method of protection can you encourage it to the development of a single cent. On the other hand we have the great manufacturing industries of this country ; industries that have grown up, some of them, with the country ; industries that sprung up under the fostering care of the national policy ; and it is this phase of this resolution that particularly appeals to me. Under this excessively high tariff which hon. gentlemen opposite desire to bring about, we would have again a condition of affairs such as we had some fifteen years ago when industries were established in this country that were alien to the country, that would never be self-sustaining, that would always have to be spoon-fed and always be a burden upon the rest of the community.

I, of course, have my own views on this question. I am regarded by some of our friends on the other side as being a protectionist. I am a protectionist in some things. I am a protectionist for all these industries that are indigenous, and all in relation to which there is even a remote possibility that they will develop into such a national growth as will enable them ultimately to become self-sustaining. I believe we have these national industries in this country of ours. I have seen grow around me, and grow in all parts of the country, industries that have been encouraged by the people of Canada ; industries in which the savings of a life-time have been invested, and my sympathy—even if my judgment does not—my sympathy compels me to assist the promoters of these industries whenever I have an opportunity, to preserve the savings that a life-time of frugality and of self-denial have enabled them to acquire. Even the manufacturing industries—however, they may complain of the present tariff—have prospered as a general thing during the past five years, and we have the same method to go by in order to measure the extent of their prosperity. Five years ago our exports of industries that were to be ruined by the free trade Liberal party as our friends choose to call them, and as the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) calls them ; five years ago we exported $9,000,000 worth, and last year we exported $16,000,000, an increase of $7,000,000, or almost 80 per cent.

I recognize the value of manufacturing industries to this country. I realize that no country has ever grown great that was a purely pastoral, or fishing, or mining country. I realize that the home market is of tremendous benefit to the province of Ontario and to the province of Quebec. The condition of our farmers in Ontario is entirely dissimilar to the condition existing in the North-west and Manitoba. To all farmers living within 25 miles or 30 miles of the city of Brantford, the local market makes their farms more valuable, makes living easier, makes life less arduous and decidedly more pleasant. That condition prevails throughout the province of Ontario, and realizing from the experience of other countries that we must have a manufacturing development in this country to take advantage of these great sources of wealth that a benevolent providence has bestowed on our people ; to enable us to develop those great timber resources that we own and these mining resources that are just beginning to make their appearance ; I say it is absolutely necessary to develop manufacturing industries in Canada. I take the stand now, and I have always taken it, that wherever we have a natural product that is capable of development by encouragement, in the way of a subsidy, or of a bonus, or in the way of even protection if you like ; I am quite willing to go with you in that. I endorse the bounties that were given by the present government to our iron industry. It is said that these bounties will cost us some $800,000 this year. I do not care what it costs. Some people are getting frightened that it will cost $8,000,000 before the period shall have expired during which the bounties shall be granted. I do not care. If it cost $8,000,000 all the better. I would rather it cost $8,000,000 than $5,000,000. The mere fact that it does cost $8,000,000 is an evidence that it is an industry that is not alien but native to the soil, and that ultimately will redound to the welfare and the prosperity of this country.

The iron industry particularly, is regarded by almost all nations as the barometer of their prosperity. Wherever the iron industries are prosperous that country is bound to prosper, and, therefore, I endorse the attitude of the government in respect to the bounties on iron. But I see before me conditions arising which will require—whether the government are willing or whether they are not willing—a readjustment in this tariff. If the Canadian manufacturers are going to use Canadian iron there will have to be a readjustment of the tariff in such a way that not only the iron producers themselves, but the man who is engaged in converting that raw iron into its varied manufactured forms—all those cognate interests that are associated with it—will have to be also encouraged in various ways. Although this may result in a temporary increase in protection it will mean in the end the establishment of industries in our own country, and the providing of a home market which after all is the best and surest market that any country can possibly have. That is my view on that question. As one who is familiar with financial and trade questions, I see that the government have almost insuperable objections to make to any change. But looking at it from my standpoint, I do not agree with them in the attitude they take with respect to the slaughter market.

I listened last night with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) who alluded to some of his friends as being slightly tinctured with the virus of protection. I included myself in that category. Probably I was egotistical in thinking that he alluded to me, but I thought that if what he said be true, namely, that the people of Canada have no reason to complain that they are buying cheap goods in the slaughter market ; that those of us who differ from him in that opinion are at least in good company, because we remember that only recently a conference was held in Europe, at which this great question of the slaughter market was forced upon the powers of Europe who had been bonusing beet sugar that was exported from these countries.

Great Britain stood by until her sugar refineries were driven out of existence. She consoled herself with the fact that in their place she had acquired jam makers who had captured the markets of the world. But notwithstanding the fact that their jam makers had bought cheap sugar in England, the British government entered its protest, and said to the continental beet-root sugar producers: Unless you cease making Great Britain a slaughter market, we shall have to put a countervailing duty on your sugar. The result is that the bounties granted to beet-root sugar production will only be paid a short time longer; and the slaughter market which Great Britain has been for years for the bounty-fed beet-root sugar producers of Germany and Belgium will soon come to an end. Therefore, if I am not egotistical in including myself among those friends of the Minister of Trade and Commerce who object to Canada being made a slaughter market, I can at least console myself with the reflection that we have the government of Great Britain along with us on that particular question.

The Board of Trade of the city of Brantford passed a resolution objecting to unfair competition, and I believe the government could have justified an attempt to prevent that unfair competition. I instanced a case in which a deliberate attempt was made to stifle a Canadian industry on the plea that for a short time the consumers of cutlery would be able to buy it cheaper than they otherwise would. But I am convinced, they are convinced, we are all convinced, that when this industry is stifled out of existence, the price of cutlery will go back to its old position. These men did not ask for increased protection. They simply wanted this cut-throat competition from the United States put down. They wanted the government to raise the duty, in order to prevent these men flooding our market with cheap American cutlery, and to make such a rebate to Great Britain as would leave the present tariff of only 20 per cent. We must remember the importance of that industry. It is an industry that is cognate with the iron industry. It is an industry that is made up entirely of Canadian labour, because 14 cents worth of raw material, after Canadian labour and Canadian intelligence is expended upon it, is converted into $8.50 worth of finished razors. That is the kind of industry we ought to encourage in this country. A dozen shears worth $6.12 in the open market are made out of raw material that only costs 78 cents. It is too late to talk to these men after their industry is stifled. It is no use to tell them then that stability of the tariff is a desirable thing. I recognize that stability of the tariff is a good thing; but there is no use offering a stone to a man who is hungry or a straw to a man who is drowning. These men want to be protected now, not after their industry is stifled; and in these particular lines, I think the government might well listen to the plea that has been made.

The claim made by the carriage men is also one entitled to consideration. They do not ask for more protection; they simply ask for the Canadian market. They want the valuation of a slop-made buggy increased to $50, so as to prevent the country being overrun with a quality of buggy that is of no use to the purchaser and is likely to injure an industry capable of conferring great benefit on the people of this country.

We have other industries in South Brant in the same condition, such as the hammock industry and the pottery industry. Yet I am not in favour of making the violent change in the tariff which our friends of the opposition demand. During the operation of the tariff we have had in the city of Brantford alone six new industries started. They knew the competition they had to meet, and they will be able to hold their own unless an attempt is made to stifle them through the medium of a slaughter market. It was only the other day, since I spoke to the House on the question of shears, that an increase was made in the price in the United States market of 10 per cent, while a reduction has been made in the price in the Canadian market of 17½ per cent. In the United States shears are sold at $5 a dozen, which in Canada are sold, less duty, at less than $3 a dozen. No industry, however well conducted, or however honest may be the men who are behind it, can stand a competition like that, and I would have stood by the government if they had said: We will set our faces against the slaughtering of the products of the United States in the markets of Canada. The producers of the United States are so hedged in that they are not subject to competition from foreign countries. I realize the position they occupy; and although I am not very friendly to the United States, I also realize that we live alongside of them for 4,000 miles. Whether we like that or not, we have to put up with it; we have to subject ourselves to those natural conditions by which nature has surrounded us. I have heard considerable exception taken to the fact that we buy so much from the United States and sell them so little. That is true; but it is brought about by conditions which no government can affect. The United States is the producer of those raw materials which the people of Canada absolutely require, which they cannot produce themselves, except at an abnormal expense, and which they cannot get any where else in the world. Therefore it is that last year we imported $53,000,000 worth of raw materials from the United States; and we got them there because it paid us better to do so than to buy them any where else or to raise them ourselves. That is a natural condition that cannot be altered. Cotton, coal, India rubber and a hundred other products we must get there; and we cannot change that fact, however much we would desire. Of the things that are even on the dutiable list, but that are absolutely necessary to the welfare of the manufacturers of this country, we have imported from the United States a large quantity. We have imported some $7,500,000 in metals alone; but these are the raw materials of many of our manufacturers. I hope through the development of our iron industries at Sydney, at Collingwood, at Hamilton, and at Sault Ste. Marie, we shall soon be in a position to be independent of that phase at least of our importations from the United States. But, try, however much we may, talk however much we like, we cannot change those natural conditions which will for all time make it necessary for us to go to the United States to buy certain raw materials; but holding the views I do, I am not willing, even for the benefits that might be conferred on Canada, or even in a desire to gratify a feeling of animosity to the people of the United States, to vote for the resolution that is placed before us, because I believe that a tariff that would give the protection which is absolutely necessary to make every manufacturer independent of foreign competition would not be in the interest of the people of this country. But, on the other hand, a tariff devised with skill and care, a tariff that would develop the natural industries of this country, that would discriminate in favour of them as against those which would always be a burden on the people, would ultimately result in the development of the manufacturing interests of this country to an extent that Canada has never yet witnessed.

Mr. E. D. SMITH (South Wentworth). Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House have listened to the speeches of the three gentlemen on the other side of the House who have addressed us on this question, with some amusement and some gratification. It is said that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery ; and the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down certainly ought to be gratifying to any member on this side of the House, if a good, sound protectionist speech on the whole can be said to be so. The fact is also amusing that the three hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side of the House represent three different phases of the tariff question. First, we had the address of the hon. Minister of Finance, which was very wary. The hon. gentleman has had experience. He told us that he had been waited upon by numbers of deputations, representing different industries of this country, asking for increased protection, and he replied that he could not see his way clear at present. He held out a ray of hope for the future. He evidently remembered the lesson of twenty-five years ago, when the representatives of the various industries of this country waited upon the Finance Minister in the Mackenzie administration and asked that protection be granted our Canadian industries. He remembered the reply then given by the Finance Minister of that day (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) : 'Governments are but flies on the wheel ; I can do nothing for those industries. Go home, work harder, put more elbow grease into your work, and you will get along nicely.' And he remembered too the verdict at the succeeding election. Therefore the hon. gentleman was more wary than his predecessor in the Mackenzie government. He did not say positively, as Sir Richard Cartwright did twenty-five years ago, that the government were but flies on the wheel. He did not come out flat footed and squarely on the policy of free trade or revenue tariff, in which he is generally supposed to be a thorough believer. No, he put the manufacturers off with the plea that at some future day they might obtain the desire of their hearts. At some future day he was quite willing to abandon, even more than he has done already, those principles which, during so many years, he had advocated throughout the country. Evidently the desire to retain comfortable office had greater weight and power over him than his inclination to stand by his principles, and so he hedged on that question.

Then we had a speech from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) and it sounded very much as if it were his last speech. He made such a gigantic effort, he spoke at such great length, three and a half hours, he sang so loudly once more the old songs, that he seemed to be concentrating all his remaining vigour into one great valedictory argument before leaving the theatre of parliamentary life. He evidently had a crow to pick with his colleagues, and in this, the closing effort of his parliamentary career, he determined to let them know where he stood. To every one in this House it must be evident that the hon. gentleman is far from comfortable. His memory no doubt harked back to twenty-five years ago when he regarded the proposal to raise the tariff from 17½ to 20 per cent, as the entering of the thin end of the protection wedge, and the contrast must have struck him with his position to-day when he is compelled to remain in the same cabinet with colleagues who have adopted a 35 per cent tariff against the importations from the United States and other countries. And this 35 per cent tariff, he is constrained to declare is a revenue tariff. The position of the hon. gentleman is certainly a humiliating one, and I do not wonder that he must look forward with dismay to the not distant day, predicted by the Minister of Finance, when the representatives of this government, who have all their lives been advocating free trade or a revenue tariff, will make a big rise in their tariff. It is not surprising therefore that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should have been anxious that this should be his last speech, and judging by the effort he made he evidently felt that he was singing his last song and fighting his last battle.

The next gentleman who addressed the House was the representative for South Brant (Mr. Heyd). From that hon. gentleman we had quite a different tune. He started out determined not to commit himself, he made a huge effort to avoid declaring positively that he was a protectionist, as everybody knows he is, he made a desperate attempt to agree with the government in its tariff policy, but he had not gone very far when he gave up the attempt and broke into a good, sound protectionist's argument. It was indeed an amusing object lesson to see those three hon. gentlemen, who first addressed the House from that side on the Budget, taking each a different view of the tariff. What is the country to understand ? Surely the resolution of the leader of the opposition is a very opportune one. Surely the time has arrived when the government should pronounce itself definitely and distinctly on this tariff question.

What are the arguments advanced why this government should be sustained ? The only one was the prosperity of the country. Well, we on this side are glad to be able to admit that the country is prosperous and are just as proud of that fact as hon. gentlemen opposite. But to say that the country is prosperous is one thing and to credit that prosperity to the government is quite another. Twenty-five years ago the Minister of Trade and Commerce took entirely the opposite view. He then said that governments were but flies on the wheel and could do nothing for the interests of the country. Last night he admitted, nay, urged, that governments can do a good deal. That a wise policy well administered can do considerable for a country is undoubted, but has this government done anything to increase our prosperity ? In order to reply to that question we must go into details. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and those who followed him on that side have a very happy faculty of grouping together our imports and exports, and thus showing a very large trade in the aggregate, and comparing that with our trade five years ago they see a great gain. I do not know, however, that, with the exception of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, there is any hon. member of this House who would have the temerity to maintain that our imports in themselves represent prosperity. The Minister of Trade and Commerce did that last evening. But I would ask how is this country to be benefited by having large importations. Supposing we had large importations and small exports how long could that state of things continue. It could only continue as long as we can raise the money to pay the difference by mortgaging our farms and factories. Is that desirable ? Can anybody possibly contend that that would be a satisfactory condition of affairs ? What is the history of those countries that have exported more than they imported ? We have an example right along side of us. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that a country cannot export unless she imports, that in order to sell we must buy. That is the old theory, started doubtless at the time of Cobden and Bright, and the hon. gentleman must have been sleeping all these years. But we are living in a practical and not in a theoretical age. We look upon what is transpiring about us and judge by the actual results. What are these results ? Until twenty-five years ago the United States imported more than they exported. What was the condition of affairs then ? Not only millions but billions of dollars of British capital floated into that country to develop its resources. British capital owned the American railways, it operated the American factories, and the greater number of American industries. About twenty-five years ago these American industries became developed to a large extent and the United States began to export more than they imported. They became wealthier year after year. They have paid off portions of the capital they had borrowed, lifted the mortgages upon their farms and factories, and bought in the stocks of their railways. Year by year they became more masters in their own house, until, about five years ago, when the value of commodities rose very rapidly. Then their exports took a tremendous bound and their exports for five years past amounted to the enormous sum of $2,600,000,000 more than their imports. Has it made them poor ? Does it appear that the United States are in a deplorable condition because they are selling more than they are buying ? For twenty-five years they have been selling more than they have bought, and during the last five years their surplus of exports over imports has been enormous. And they continue to do it. Does anybody presume to say that they will not continue to do it ? What is their condition to-day ? Not only have they got possession of their own industries and their own railways, not only have they been able to pay off their mortgages and to relieve, to a large extent, their municipalities and states of debt, but they are reaching out all over the world to find places to invest that large amount of money they have made by exporting more than they have imported. They are coming into our country and buying our industries and our railways. They are going into London whence twenty-five or thirty years ago came the money that built up the United States and are buying industries there. They are going into France, they are going into Russia, into South American states, into Mexico—they are going all over the world, to find investments for the enormous sums they have made by exporting more than they imported.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith, Wentworth) allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). Certainly.

Mr. HOLMES. Will the hon. gentleman tell me how it was that, from 1879 to 1894, during the national policy, the imports of Canada were larger than the exports every year ?

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). That is an exactly similar state of affairs. Let these industries continue under a protective tariff, as is proposed by this resolution, and instead of importing $75,000,000 of goods from the United States, millions from Germany and from other countries, our own industries will be able to supply our market, and we shall be in the position of the United States, viz., by exporting more than we import. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HOLMES. The hon. gentleman has not answered the question.

An hon. MEMBER. You are very hard to please.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth). Aside from the attempt to bolster up a bad cause by always speaking of the prosperity of the country, and pretending that it is the result of their policy, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce made some statements that are worthy of a word in passing. In contending that, under the policy of the Conservative administration the country had not developed and been as prosperous as it would have been had the policy he proposed been carried out, he referred to the case of Manitoba and the North-west, and argued that the Conservative policy had been injurious to the people of the North-west, and that if the policy that he and his government twenty-five years ago had adopted, had been continued, the development of the North-west would have been greater than it is to-day. Everybody must have been surprised to hear the hon. gentleman make such a statement, as we were surprised to-day to hear the hon. member for South Brant try to maintain that proposition, in the face of the well known fact that the government of which the present Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member over twenty-five years ago opposed, tooth and nail, the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the principal, almost the sole, means of developing the country. It was the Conservative party that, in the face of all difficulties and notwithstanding the criticisms and opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite, built the Canadian Pacific Railway. Hon. gentlemen opposite at that time maintained that this was a work far beyond the power of this country. They maintained that it would bankrupt the Dominion and that the road would never pay for the axle grease for the wheels. Yet, in spite of the determined opposition of the most powerful men in the Liberal party, the Conservative party carried out what they proposed to do, and finally built the road—not with 'water stretches,' but a railroad from one end of the country to the other. And everybody to-day, whether Grit or Tory, no matter what his politics may be, agrees that the Canadian Pacific Railway has been the great means of binding the provinces together and developing the resources of the North-west as they could never have been developed without it. How can these hon. gentlemen stand up and say, of all things, that their policy would have developed the North-west ?

The Minister of Trade and Commerce also had some criticism to make with regard to the number of people coming to this country. He said that under the late administration there were not so many immigrants as are now coming to Canada. I well remember reading—I was not then a member of this House—whenever these sums of money were asked by the Finance Minister in those days for immigration, and they were small sums compared with those that are now spent, hon. gentlemen opposite declared that it was useless to spend money to bring in immigrants to this country. The late government spent about $125,000 on immigration during their last year of office, but this government spends about $500,000. If the late government had spent equally large sums, no doubt they could have brought in a great many more immigrants than they did. It does not lie in the mouths of opponents of the late government to complain on this score.

Now, in order to show that this government is, in no measure, responsible for the prosperity we now enjoy, as I said before, we must investigate the different items. I have spoken only of imports. I do not think there are many people in this country that think imports alone bring prosperity. Now, I must confess that the government can do a great deal, not only with regard to the exports, but also with regard to the imports. What did the government preceding this one do ? Let us take an example. When they came into power we imported 7,000,000 pounds of raw cotton. Now we import over 40,000,000 pounds. What does that mean ? That means simply this—that there are employed in this country many thousands of hands manufacturing this cotton. And so it is in every line of industry that was protected in 1879. That is what that government did to build up the industries of this country, bring in population and retain in the country the people that we had.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce criticised the Conservative government for allowing immigration to flow from this country and so many Canadians to go to the States. I was wondering what would have been the result if his principle had been adopted and if, instead of having the protective tariff, which even hon. gentlemen opposite are bound to admit has built up this country, his policy of a revenue tariff had been carried out. How many more Canadians would have gone from this country to the United States ? Surely when hon. gentlemen opposite themselves have been obliged to accept this protective principle, although they say they have cut off a little twig here and there, they must admit it would have been injurious to this country and that we would not have had so many people retained in this country from 1878 forward, if their policy had been adopted. They furnish us the proof themselves. So I cannot understand, no one can understand how, if from 1878 forward, any policy which the hon. gentlemen opposite have ever proposed had been carried out, the Canadians who have left this country could have been retained in it. Until they show that I contend they have not proved their case.

When I say that a government can do a good deal to make the people prosperous, I refer to the imports for the present, or rather the power the government exercise through the tariff in compelling the manufacture in this country of the large quantities of goods that are imported. In that way government can do a good deal in regard to imports. But what about exports? In regard to exports the government have limited powers. I am sure they will not contend that it has been through their instrumentality that we have got better prices in the old country during the last five years for our cheese, butter and various products of the farm. In what way then can they benefit industries and increase exports? I think that can be done to a limited extent by improving the facilities for manufacture, by improving the education of the people, and by giving better opportunities for production and providing better transportation facilities. Now, let us examine in detail what our exports have been; let us see what the government have been doing during the last five years to encourage larger exports. I find that for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June last, our exports increased over the previous year by $16,733,000. We find that the exports of gold amounted to $24,445,000 against $14,148,000 the year before, leaving $10,296,673 of gain in our exports of gold. Now in what way have the government been responsible for that increased export of gold? Is it not a notorious fact that the royalty levied by this government, and their exactions on the miners in the Yukon territory, have been greater and have made it harder for the miners there than in any other country? That has been a notorious source of complaint. I am not criticising the government for exacting this royalty, I am only saying that under those conditions they have made it harder for the miner to produce gold for export, and consequently they cannot claim any credit for those increased exports of gold. There is another fact, this $10,000,000 of gold does not altogether represent added wealth to this country, because it has been largely taken out of the country in the pockets of American miners who have gone with it. Then I find that the total exports of the mines have increased by $15,752,000; a part of that was gold, and that represents nearly the total increase of our exports for the past year. Now, in what way have the government made it easier for the miners to extract the gold? In what way have the government made the mineral products of this country more valuable? Can any one answer that question? The miners have to work harder, and larger quantities have been exported, but the government cannot in any way be credited with that increase.

Then our manufactures have increased about $2,000,000. In what way are the government to be credited with the increased production of our factories except that they have retained to a large extent the policy of their predecessors? The increased output of those factories, Mr. Speaker, is surely attributable, if it is to anything, to the policy of the predecessors of these hon. gentlemen. The policy that established these industries and made them able to manufacture and export is the policy that still exists to a considerable extent. It is the same story over again that we have seen in the United States. The adoption of a protective tariff in that country caused manufacturing industries to spring up, and they grew until they were able to export tremendous quantities of goods. In this country our industries were started in the same way, and had it not been for the tinkering of the tariff by these hon. gentlemen when they came into power, these industries would have been on a much better footing than they are to-day, and would have produced more for export. That is one source of complaint I have against the government, that whereas they adopted the principle of a protective tariff, whenever they touched it they touched it to its detriment.

They took off the duty on binder twine, and the result is that instead of manufacturing our binder twine now the major portion of it comes from the United States. If they had let it alone we would have had more manufactories in this country, more people engaged, and fewer going to the United States. They took the duty off barbed wire, and what is the result? Some of the barbed wire factories closed up, more Canadians gone to the United States to find employment. So I say that wherever they have tinkered with the tariff they have done so to the detriment of the industries of this country. Take the woollen industries as affected by the English preference, and what has been the result? The woollen industries would have been to-day much more prosperous, they would have afforded employment to many more men than at the present time if that business had been let alone. I find in looking over the different articles that we have exported nearly $2,000,000 worth of agricultural implements. Has the policy of the present government made it easier for the implement makers to manufacture for export? No, they get a rebate on the duties on the steel and iron used in their machines, and they have the same conditions prevailing to-day that prevailed six years ago; therefore the government are in no way to be credited with this increased export.

The next thing is bicycles. Have they done anything to improve the exports of bicycles? Cotton fabrics, $381,000; household effects, $1,138,000. That is one of the exports of our manufacturers, household effects. Why, I thought the Minister of Trade and Commerce last night said that Canadians were not going to the States any more. Did these household effects walk over and set up housekeeping themselves on the other side? I imagine that there were some people who went over with them, and that Canadians are still going to the States in spite of the policy the hon. gentleman bragged about. Wood pulp, nearly $2,000,000 increase. What has the government done to increase facilities for the exportation of wood pulp? If the government would put on export duty of $2 or $4 a cord upon pulp wood, or if they would put a further export duty upon pulp itself going out of Canada and cause the manufacture of paper in this country, then it might be said they were doing something for the people of this country. But no, they allow all pulp wood to go out free, they allow the wood when it is made into pulp to go out, and do not do anything to encourage the manufacture of paper in this country. I do not see how they can claim credit for this export in any way adding to our prosperity; it rather represents an enormous loss. There was over $1,000,000 of manufactures of wood. Can hon. gentlemen point to anything that they have done to increase the export of these manufactures of wood? Leather goods, $25,000,000. Has the operation of their changes in the tariff made it easier for the manufacturers of leather goods for export?. No one will contend that it has. So all through the list of manufactures, not a thing has been done by hon. gentlemen opposite to assist the industries of this country in increasing their exports.

Now, let us take some other items of export. Let us take, for instance, cheese. We exported in the last six months $14,425,673 worth of cheese, and in six months of the previous year corresponding, $15,215,678, so that there was a shrinkage of $790,000 in our exports of cheese in six months. Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend that there was a chance for the government to have done something but a chance that they neglected and deliberately threw away. I brought to the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture three years ago the fact that our steamship accommodation across the ocean was very deficient, that our apples were going across in a wretched condition and that the farmers of Canada were losing millions of dollars from this bad system of shipping apples, and I urged that something ought to be done. The hon. Minister of Agriculture gave some attention to the matter and he asked for a sum of money from this House to provide some sort of ventilation upon steamships for this purpose. That sum of money was quickly voted and a certain number of steamships were fitted up with fans so that fruit could be carried across the ocean in better condition. What has been the result? Did the hon. Minister of Agriculture do all that could be done under these circumstances? I say that he did not, that he has simply played with the question. Instead of taking hold of it in a whole-hearted fashion, instead of compelling every steamship that sails from the ports of Canada to put these fans in for the purpose of ventilating its holds in which these apples are carried, instead of making it impossible for the steamship owners to send their vessels across the ocean without operating these fans, instead of taking such means as would be a check so as to enable us to know that they did operate these fans, he did nothing of the kind. What has been the result? Professor Robertson came before the Agriculture Committee of the House a year ago, and stated that owing largely to the bad ventilation of these steamships our cheese, which is one of our largest exportable products and most valuable, had received a black eye in the old country market; that our cheese, which had stood at the highest notch, had received a set-back, and he prophesied that this year our exports of cheese would shrink in value by $3,000,000. He came very near the mark. The exports for six months, as I have said, have diminished by $790,000 instead of increasing nearly that amount, as in former years. That makes about $1,500,000 in six months, and if you take the total product for a year, it would amount to something over $2,000,000 that our cheese has depreciated in value, largely because the hon. Minister of Agriculture did not vigorously go to work and carry out what he had found on examination to be a serious state of affairs, such a state of affairs that not only were apples going over in bad condition, but he has found that cheese has been damaged to the extent of $2,000,000 a year by his neglect in not compelling the different steamships to carry this cheese properly. Why did this thing not occur before? Why was it that our exports of cheese had gone on increasing year after year and that this is almost the only year in which our exports have decreased? Simply because years ago we made a hard cheese and that hard cheese would carry in almost any kind of a steamer's hold. It did not matter so much whether it was ventilated or not, but of late years, in order to compete with other cheese producing countries, we must make a mild flavoured cheese, that mild flavoured cheese is softer, and cannot endure the hardships to which the hard cheese was subjected, and this cheese, being carried in unventilated holds, was damaged and the country has suffered to the extent of over $2,000,000 a year. It will take many years to recover from the blow. What of our apples ? As I pointed out three years ago, and as I pointed out a year ago, in this House, we have lost in Ontario, and in Nova Scotia, many millions of dollars owing to this ill-ventilation of these steamers, and we are losing still. One would have thought that with his experience the hon. Minister of Agriculture would have gone so vigorously to work that by this time he would have had every steamer sailing from Canadian ports equipped in some fashion and would have enabled these ships to carry apples in safety. Have we found that to be the case ? No. We find that from the port of Halifax during this past winter there does not appear to have been a single steamer sailing from that port that was properly equipped. In Nova Scotia they had this year the only good crop of apples grown in the country, and the apple-growers of the Annapolis Valley, who had a crop that should have brought them in a million dollars, have lost $300,000 on last year's crop, because of the want of proper ventilation on these steamers. Who is to blame for that ? There was a chance where the government could have done something to increase the exports of the country, where the government could have done something to add to the prosperity of the country and they failed to do it. Let us see what the documents say as to the condition of affairs at Halifax this year. I will give an illustration or two from the record of the shipment of apples from that port. Part of the cargo of the steamer 'Grecian,' was sold on the 30th October. There were 873 barrels tight, 889 barrels slack, 68 barrels wet, and 28 barrels slack and wet, so that much more than half of the cargo arrived in a damaged condition. On the steamer 'Ulunda' I have a record of 779 barrels tight, 477 barrels slack, 24 barrels slack and wet and 18 barrels wet. On the steamer 'Damara' 414 barrels tight, 832 barrels slack, 407 barrels wet and 260 barrels slack and wet. What does this represent ? I turn to the catalogue of sales to see how these apples sold, those that were tight and slack, and slack and wet. Here is a man who had 60 barrels of No. 1 Blenheim that were tight and they brought 21 shillings a barrel. He had 197 barrels slack and wet and they brought 17 shillings 6d. a barrel, a difference of 3 shillings 6d. a barrel, or over 80 cents a barrel loss, whereas those both slack and wet sold at a loss of from $1.50 to $2.50 per barrel loss. You will see that over half of these apples arrived in a bad condition, and that there was more than 80 cents a barrel of loss on them. This same condition of things has been going on in Montreal for years and years. I will just draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the sale of apples that went in the unventilated hold of another steamship from Halifax, the 'Evangeline.' That steamship carried a cargo of 22,000 barrels of apples. One fruit-grower in the Annapolis Valley claimed that there was a loss of $30,000 on that cargo, while another man claimed that there was a loss of $22,000. Within the last twenty-four hours there has been a deputation of Nova Scotia fruit-growers in this House protesting against this condition of things and complaining because the government have neglected their duty. The apple-growers of Nova Scotia have suffered a loss of $300,000 on their apple crop this year, and if the hon. Minister of Agriculture had done what he might have done, he might have remedied this condition of affairs. Last winter the Nova Scotia fruit-growers met in convention. Last winter there were many meetings held in the Annapolis Valley and those who attended them were very indignant, and they passed a number of resolutions in regard to this very business.

Mr. Innes who is a prominent fruit-grower there and who took this matter up along with a number of other fruit-growers at different meetings, proposed the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted, which I shall read in order to show to the House the feeling of the fruit-growers in that province on the subject.

Whereas, the apple industry of Nova Scotia has of recent years grown to important dimensions, and is steadily increasing as young orchards come into bearing and are being set out ; and

Whereas more than two-thirds of the total production, which is now some half a million of barrels a year, are exported to Great Britain by a line of steamships which has secured a monopoly of the carrying business by the aid of annual subsidies from the Dominion government ; and

Whereas, our distance by rail from the seaboard is short, averaging only some 80 miles, and Halifax is some 500 miles nearer to Great Britain than any apple shipping port on this continent, and our apples are carried on subsidized steamers, yet notwithstanding all these advantages in our favour our transportation charges are higher than those paid by Canadian and United States shippers, and we are thus unable to market our product on equal terms with our competitors ; and

Whereas, the subsidized steamers have been in some cases unsuitable for business, and are in all cases unprovided with proper and sufficient ventilating appliances to ensure a continuous and even cool temperature, with the result that our apples, especially the valuable early shipments, have been delivered at destination in a slack, heated and damaged condition, thereby causing grievous loss to our shippers and serious detriment to our industry; and

Whereas this association has repeatedly made representations and passed resolutions with a view to induce the government to regulate the freight charges by the subsidized steamers, and inspect the vessels to ensure their suitability for the trade, but no action has been taken to protect our interests and industry and remedy the grievances complained of ; now

Therefore, resolved, that this association do hereby petition parliament to cause an investigation to be made in respect to the matters herein referred to, and in respect to all matters connected with the exporting, transportation and marketing of our apples; and thereupon to enact a law to regulate the business in accordance with the facts and circumstances, and with such provisions as may be just and reasonable, and as will tend to remedy and remove the disabilities which have hitherto hampered and jeopardized a most important industry.

Here is another resolution passed at another meeting, and the newspaper report in connection with it says:

The matter of the ocean transportation of Nova Scotia apples was then taken up by Peter Innes, in a vigorous address in which he roundly scored the Furness, Withy Company for their criminal carelessness in handling our Gravenstein apples, and his words found a responsive echo in the hearts of every one in the audience, many of whom had been losers of a portion of the $30,000 lost by the exploit of the Evangeline in cooking 20,000 barrels of Gravensteins. On motion of Mr. Innes, seconded by Colonel Spurr, it was unanimously carried that;

This association do humbly petition parliament to cause an investigation to be made in respect to all matters connected with the exporting, transportation and marketing of our apples and thereupon, to enact a law to regulate the business in accordance with the facts and circumstances, and with such provisions as may be just and reasonable and as will tend to remedy and remove the disabilities which have hitherto hampered and jeopardized a most important industry.

This will show the sad condition of affairs in the Annapolis valley, where the industry was just getting on its feet, and where they can grow apples as good as can be grown in any part of the world. Three years ago the Furniss-Withy people had some boats that carried apples in good condition. I remember calling the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to a large shipment of apples which arrived in good condition, and in which there were only thirteen barrels slack. I then pointed out to the minister that although this steamer was only fitted up in a primitive fashion, yet that such care was taken of the apples on the voyage, that they were landed in England in prime condition. But these boats were taken off the service and others not so suitable put on—many of them subsidized by the government—and as a result the sorrowful condition of things which I have pointed out prevails. Let us see what are the conditions with regard to the port of Montreal. The minister (Hon. Mr. Fisher) has secured the placing of fans on a number of vessels sailing from that port, but it is one thing to put fans on a vessel and it is another thing to make sure that the fans are operated during the voyage. I remember very well that some fifteen years ago the apple shippers of Canada induced one line of steamers to put a few fans on some of their vessels. We found, however, that the apples were not carried in any appreciably better condition, and when we made an investigation we found that the boats operated the fans while in the harbour, but when they got out to sea they stopped the fans because it cost a little money. I believe that to-day this very same thing will account for the apples shipped from Montreal not arriving in a better condition on the English market. I believe that some of these vessels did operate their fans and did carry out the regulations, and as a consequence the apples arrived in good condition, but on the other hand some of these vessels did not operate the fans, and the result was very injurious to the shipment of apples. I took the trouble to write to a number of receivers of apples in the old country, gentlemen who handle large quantities of our apples and who are in the best position to judge of the condition in which the fruit arrives. I asked them about this matter, and I shall read an extract from the reply of one of these gentlemen which will throw some light on the question.

As far as the export trade to Europe is concerned unfortunately we cannot say as far as our own observation is concerned that the system of ventilation, and cooling chambers introduced upon steamers sailing from Montreal to Liverpool has been a success. As certainly the steamers that carried apples under the above systems did not land their fruit in as good condition, as steamers that were not ventilated by mechanical means. You must not take from this that we think mechanical means of ventilation should not be used.

* * * * * *

The trouble we think with the steamers from Montreal not carrying their fruit in better condition was that they did not work the system properly.

The writer has just been looking up averages made upon apples carried during the present month upon steamers with and without exhaust ventilation. Two steamers sailed from Boston within 24 hours of each other and arrived here within that length of time of each other, and their fruit was sold the same day. With result that on the apples we had on them there was a difference of fully two shillings per barrel in favour of the steamer that used exhaust ventilation. We, fortunately only had a very few on the steamer without exhaust ventilation, although we have considered her one of the best apple carriers sailing between Boston and Liverpool. We had a much larger quantity arrive the following week on a steamer of the same line, and a good carrier. Upon the one with exhaust ventilation we had 2,135 barrels which averaged 14s. 8d. per barrel while upon the one without exhaust ventilation we had 1,603 barrels and they averaged 11 shillings 11 pence per barrel or a difference in favour of the steamer with exhaust ventilation of 2s. 9d. per barrel. The fruit was packed almost entirely by the same men, and the quality of the apples on the steamer without exhaust system was if anything superior to the others, but they landed in a much worse condition, although they were stowed in the peak hatch, which is considered the best place on any steamer for carrying apples.

We are now using our best efforts to have the same system of ventilation introduced upon all steamers that carry apples, and have great hopes of it being introduced in a number of steamers before another season opens. We certainly will not rest until it is accomplished, and have given instructions to all our representatives to favour the steamers that have introduced the system, and that give it proper attention, as we certainly think those steamers with the fans in, which sailed from Montreal to Liverpool were not properly attended to or they would have landed fruit in better condition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that what the Minister of Agriculture ought to do is first of all to insure that every steamer leaving Montreal or Halifax and carrying perishable products, whether apples, cheese, or any thing else, shall be equipped with apparatus that will secure a free circulation of air through the compartments in which the perishable products are carried. Then, having done that, the Minister of Agriculture has only performed part of his duty. It is very easy for these steamers to put in fans which will only cost a few dollars, but the minister must go further and he must take care that these fans are operated during the voyage across the ocean. That, the Minister of Agriculture can easily do. He can put a thermograph in each compartment of the steamer in which these perishable products are carried, and he can put another thermograph on the deck. He can lock these thermographs and when the vessel reaches England one of the number of officers whom he has watching the fruit business there, can unlock the thermographs and can see at a glance whether the fans have been worked during the voyage or not. If the fans have been operated the readings of the thermographs in the holds will be almost identical with the reading of the thermograph on deck. The Minister of Agriculture can have absolute and positive proof as to the working of the fans by this means. It therefore lies in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture, to enable the farmers of Canada to export every pound of cheese and butter, and every barrel of apples to the old country in a sound and marketable condition. Thus preventing the great losses we have experienced in the past.

Let us touch on another item of our exports, that is, butter. In the last fiscal year we exported $3,355,197 worth of butter, or $2,074,366 worth less than the year before. Where is the hand of the Minister of Agriculture that our exports of butter have thus decreased instead of increased ? What has become of that magnificent system of cold storage which was to be established all over this country ? To hear the hon. gentleman talk in this House and out of it at different times, you would have thought that he had magnificent cold storage warehouses at all the ports of debarkation, and a chain of cold storage warehouses, as he called them, from one end of this country to the other, and that by this time, instead of exporting only $3,000,000 worth of butter a year, we would be exporting twenty or thirty million dollars' worth, as the little country of Denmark is doing. On investigation, this so called chain of cold storage warehouses turns out to be what ? The Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, when called on, furnish a refrigerator car and put ice in it for the purpose of transporting butter along their lines. These cars go along the different lines of railway picking up butter at different factories, and no doubt in most cases soon secure a carload, but the shipper in any case is charged less carload rate, which is a very good thing indeed for the railway companies carrying carloads of butter at less carload rates, and the government paying for the ice. That is what the government has done—made arrangements with the railway companies that these cars shall be provided. But that is not enough to justify the bragging about what has been done for the butter industry of this country. The arrangement is a good thing for the railroads and is of some advantage to the country ; but what has the Minister of Agriculture been doing that our exports of butter have decreased from $5,000,000 worth to $3,000,000 worth ? It seems that almost everything that hon. gentleman touches goes backward. Two or three years ago the hon. gentleman boasted a good deal about arranging with the United States to raise the quarantine against our cattle, so as to make it easier for our farmers to export their cattle to that country, where they might be fattened instead of at home. One might think that the result would be that our exports of cattle to the United States would increase. But I find that the farmers know their business better than the hon. gentleman, for instead of exporting $1,401,137 worth, as they did in 1900, they have had the good sense in 1901 to export only $891,300 worth to the United States, doubtless fattening them at home, and selling them for export at $60 to $100 per head, instead of $10 to $15 to the States as lean cattle or calves. These are some of the items with regard to which the government could have exercised some influence in increasing the quantity of our exports, and have benefited the farmers and the people of this country generally ; and I am sure that any one who investigates the subject without bias must come to the conclusion that the Minister of Agriculture has not done any small portion of his duties in these very important matters.

In the course of the argument of the hon. gentleman who preceded me, it was contended that the government was in some way responsible for the vast increase in our exports during the past five years, and ought to receive some credit for it. The truth of the matter is that our exports have not increased in quantity so much as in value. The volume of our exports has gone on gradually increasing from year to year, whether this government or the previous government has been in power, which has proved to my mind that the population has increased steadily from year to year, and not, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce contended, that all the increase has been in the last five years. When I look up the figures, I find that our exports have increased in quantity in an average ratio, and that there has not been a very great difference in the past five years as compared with the previous five years. Was it the government that caused the value of these products to increase in the last five years? No, it was the prosperity of the buyer in the old country and the United States. Take cheese, for example, one of our largest and most profitable exports. In 1891 we exported 106,202,140 pounds. In 1896, after those depressing times when our exports did not increase as rapidly as they have done in the past five years in value, the quantity had increased to 164,689,123 pounds, an increase of 55 per cent. But during the past five years the increase in quantity has been but 19 per cent. This shows that the people have been working away just about the same in one period as in the other, and it is fair to conclude that the population has been increasing in the same proportion. Take another item—wheat. The quantity exported in 1891 was 2,108,216 bushels, and in 1896, 9,919,542 bushels, an increase of 370 per cent, whereas in 1901 the quantity exported was 9,739,758 bushels, a decrease of 2 per cent. I mention these figures for the purpose of showing that whereas the quantity of wheat exported during the first period increased 370 per cent, the value only increased 264 per cent, and that in the last period, while the quantity exported decreased 2 per cent, the value increased 19 per cent. Who placed this increased value on the wheat—the hon. gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches, or the British buyer? Take another item—lumber, or planks and boards, one of the largest exports of the products of the forest. The quantity we exported in 1891 was 807,859,000 feet, and in 1896, 818,529,000 feet, an increase of but 1 per cent in the quantity, while the value actually decreased 5 per cent. In the next five years, while the quantity actually decreased by 11 per cent, the value increased 10 per cent. Are hon. gentlemen opposite to be credited with that increase? Did they increase the price of our lumber, or did the British buyer and the American buyer? So I could go through all the different industries. Take bacon. During the first period our exports of bacon increased in volume 558 per cent, and during the last period they increased only 119 per cent in volume. Here is an industry which is an example of what the government can do to improve the affairs of the country. Before the Conservative administration placed a high duty on pork, we were buying pork from abroad; we were not exporting any. Enormous quantities of American pork were brought in and fed to our lumbermen. But the farmers and pork producers came and represented the matter to the Conservative administration, who did not turn a deaf ear to them, but placed a duty on pork—not a moderate but a high duty. What was the result? In a very few years we were not only able to supply our own markets with all the pork we required, but pork packing establishments were started all over the country, and they have kept on growing year by year until they are now exporting $12,000,000 worth of bacon, besides supplying all the demands of the country. There is what a government can do, and there is where this government is wanting, and until it adopts a measure, such as suggested by the amendment of the leader of the opposition, and bring about such a condition of affairs that a large part of that $75,000,000 of manufactured goods, which we import from the United States will be made in this country, it will not be doing its whole duty.

What would be the condition of affairs should the amendment of the leader of the opposition be carried? Just consider our present condition. Here we are importing large quantities of goods from the United States and from Germany. From the United States we are importing $75,000,000 worth of manufactured goods. My hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Heyd) was very careful not to touch particularly on that part of the question. When speaking of our large importations from the United States, he confined his attention to the imports of raw products. But nobody objects to raw products coming in free, which are the basis of our manufactured goods. To admit these free was the policy of the late government and the Conservative party. But what would be the result if this amendment should carry? Instead of the large quantity of goods which we now import from the United States being made in that country, a considerable portion of that trade would be transferred to this country. Supposing only $25,000,000 worth of these goods were made on this side of the line, would not that be a very good thing for us? It would add the population of a very large town to this country. And supposing that $25,000,000 or $50,000 000 more of our imports, instead of coming from the United States, were to come from Great Britain that would be an advantage in two ways. First of all, I feel that I am equally a Briton, equally a citizen of the British Empire, as a citizen of Canada. The result of that transfer of trade from the United States to Great Britain would be to give the advantage of the manufacture of that quantity of goods into the hands of our own people. I consider that the people of England, Ireland and Scotland are equally our own people as the citizens of our own country, and that in transferring this trade from the United States to Great Britain we would be adding to our own prosperity. What would be another result ? It would be this, that our ships would have more goods to carry from the other side to our shores. Instead of coming across, as a large number of them do, in ballast, they would come across loaded, and that would give us lower freights on our exports. In that way therefore our producers would be largely benefited. In that respect we to-day occupy a very unsatisfactory position. Instead of British ships coming back to this country loaded, they only bring back $40,000,000 worth of goods, although they carry from this country $100,000,000 worth. Then we bring back goods in condensed form, for one ship will bring back as much value as five ships carry away. Things are not in that position in the port of New York, for the quantity of exports from that port only exceeds the imports by about one-fifth. Therefore by putting on a big tariff against the United States, we would cause a considerable portion of American manufactures, which we now import, to be manufactured in this country, and another considerable portion to be manufactured in and imported by us from Great Britain, thus improving our position in every respect. The Minister of Public Works may improve the St. Lawrence channel as much as he pleases—and I shall be delighted if he can improve it to such an extent that steamers may sail through that channel at the highest rate of speed both night and day—we will still be handicapped, as compared with New York and Boston, until such a change is effected in our fiscal policy as will cause a much less disproportion to exist between our imports from Great Britain and our exports to that country. That can only be brought about by shutting out a large proportion of the goods which we to-day buy from the United States.

I may be met by the argument that the result of putting on a stiff duty would be an increase in prices, that our people would have to pay more. Well, the history of the past does not bear out that theory. I maintain that we are now making in this country a large number of these things which we import from the United States just as good and just as cheap. I maintain that our agricultural implements are as good and as cheap as those made on the other side. Why, then, do Canadians buy $2,000,000 worth of American agricultural implements? Let us get right down to the facts, and we will see. These agricultural implements are sold chiefly through agents, and every man who has ever handled agents knows very well that a good agent can sell a poor article at a high price and a poor agent cannot sell even a good article, in opposition, at a lower price. Our agricultural implements are sold almost entirely through agents. The agent goes about through the country and canvasses the farmers and a good smart tongued seller will persuade them that his implement is better than that made by Massey-Harris or Frost & Wood or any other Canadian manufacturer. Everybody conversant with the business knows that to be the case. I know from my experience in my own business, through my own agents, that a poor agent cannot sell a better article, even at a cheaper price, in competition with a smart agent. The whole thing lies largely with the salesman. We buy half a million dollars worth or more of American shoes, yet we make as good shoes in this country, fit for any Canadian to wear. But the American drummer comes along and persuades the retail merchant that his shoes are better than the Canadian article, and the retailer concludes that he will try them. The smooth slick tongued agent succeeds in making a sale, the shoes are laid on the tradesman's shelves, and he must sell them. Our manufacturers will even buy an American made article when they might just as well buy one of Canadian make.

It is useless to tell the people to be patriotic. I remember very well on one occasion last winter, when at a gathering of the people I tried that argument. I said to them : You ought to be patriotic. We make as good machines as you can get on the other side, we make just as good boots and shoes, and yet you will buy $75,000,000 worth of American goods when you can get just as good value at the same or lower prices in our own country. Why do you not encourage manufactures and thus add to the population and prosperity of our country and enlarge our own home markets. Not only the merchant and the factory people but the farmers and the producers of every kind will benefit by this building up of our own industries. That seemed to take very well with the audience, but to my surprise a clergyman followed me and repeated the very argument which the Minister of Trade and Commerce gave us last night. He said: I am afraid that the arguments of Mr. Smith are not very sound, because in order to sell you must buy. That was the very argument used by the Minister of Trade and Commerce last night. But I have shown by the example of the United States, and it can be shown by the example of many countries, that it is not necessary to buy in order to sell. The United States sell $100,000,000 worth of goods and buy only $40,000,000 from us.

The United States export $2,640,000,000 more than they import in five years. There is a living example that it is not necessary for any nation or individual to buy in order to sell. I was gratified, on coming home from that meeting, to read an address made by the Finance Minister the night before at some banquet along the same line, declaring that it would be a patriotic thing for Canadians to buy Canadian goods and urged strongly that they do so. The hon. Minister of Finance did not suppose that, before one short year rolled round the Minister of Trade and Commerce would—from his seat alongside of him—tell him, that people, in order to sell must buy. Now, no amount of talk, no amount of persuasion, nothing but putting up the tariff wall a little higher—a good deal higher if necessary—will induce the people of this country to buy Canadian goods entirely or nearly so. It is due chiefly to throughtlessness. But it would be a happy condition of affairs, having the goods in this country, or having the facilities to make them to have the people induced to buy the goods. It is said that the manufacturers would charge enormous prices and that the consumer would suffer. But the government has shown, as in the case of the paper combine, that it has the remedy in its own hands. If a combination exists in any industry, the government can apply the remedy at once. Considering these facts, I think it is the duty of every member of this House to vote for the amendment presented by the hon. leader of the opposition. That amendment is certainly along the line of progress made in the past. And, judging by our experience and the experience of the United States who adopted that policy and prospered under it, such a policy must inure to the benefit of the country. Having the facilities we have, and the resources we have, under no other policy can we succeed so well. I am glad to know that there are on the other side a number of gentlemen imbued with the same spirit. I imagine that before many years the party that is now in power will take up that policy. When once the Minister of Trade and Commerce and a few more of the old war-horses who have talked so long and hard against this policy are removed to good places, Senatorships or Lieut.-Governorships, I feel sure that the master hand of the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) will assert itself. And that the hon. gentleman will be supported in bringing this policy by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd). He will be supported by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell), who has of late, become a convert to the principle. Living, as he formerly did, in the county of Kent, and representing that county, a county that had beans to sell, it is natural that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) should favour commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, free trade with the United States, and so on. But, having removed to a county where he is surrounded by protectionist influences, he has become converted. Whether it was the influence in and about Toronto, or honest conviction, I am not prepared to say. But I am pleased that the hon. gentleman has come out boldly and declared his conversion. Having read some of his addresses of a few years ago in this House, I am bound to say that of all the anti-protectionists, of all the men who opposed that policy tooth and nail, he was one of the strongest.

Mr. SMITH (Wentworth).

I do not know whether the Minister of Public Works can be spoken of as having been converted. But he is a leader in the movement; and, knowing as we do that he has the whiphand of the administration, I believe that before many years the government will do what they have done on many occasions before, steal the policy of the leader of the opposition, and that, two or three years from now, we shall have them coming before the country proposing the same kind of a tariff as is declared for in this amendment.

Mr. DONALD A. MACKINNON (East Queens, P.E.I.) After the interesting addresses to which we have listened, Mr. Speaker, and considering the lateness of the hour, it becomes me, in speaking upon the subject now before the House, to make my remarks brief. The hon. Minister of Finance has made his motion for a Committee of Ways and Means and the leader of the opposition has proposed the following amendment:

> That all the words after 'that' in the proposed motion be left out, and the following substituted therefor:
> This House regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians. And, while thus firmly maintaining the necessity of such protection to Canadian interests, this House affirms its belief in a policy of reciprocal trade preferences within the empire.

Now, it seems to me that the leader of the opposition must have a very keen sense of grim humour when he resurrects from a motion moved in this House in 1878 the main part of his amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKINNON. I am glad the supporters of the leader of the opposition understand that it was, in effect, the resolution of 1878—they are not working in the dark. The preference part of the resolution of course is new. The last speaker, as well as the leader of the opposition, informed us that under such a policy the people would pay increased prices. I think I took down the words of the leader of the opposition correctly, that 'the people would pay slightly increased prices to protect the manufacturers.' That goes, of course, to the root of the question.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The hon. gentleman (Mr. MacKinnon) does not quote me exactly. I said I thought that prices would not increase, that competition would keep prices down.

Mr. MACKINNON. I am willing to accept the explanation. I thought I had the words correctly. But the sentiment was reasonably clear.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). My words are reported in 'Hansard.'

Mr. MACKINNON. I think we substantially agree. The hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith) said he wished to have the tariff wall put up, and that prosperity would follow such a policy, as it did in the United States. But, in the first part of his speech, that hon. gentleman said that we already had prosperity. I do not see why he should revert to the old resolution of 1878 in order to bring prosperity which is already here, particularly as that resolution and the high tariff which was the outcome of it did not bring anything like the prosperity that the present policy has brought. There are a few principles laid down by the last speaker, which I think it is my duty to refer to. He stated at the outset that he was a practical man and believed in practical politics. Yet, he does not suggest a single commodity the duty on which he desires to have changed. Had he suggested an increase in the duty on any article, I would not at once agree that the change would result in advantage to Canada. It might plainly result in good to some part of Canada. But, being something of a practical man myself, I would look into that subject and see how it affected the whole of Canada, and perhaps I would come to the conclusion that it would be better to increase duty on that particular item. That is the way, it seems to me, that a practical man should consider any question of changing the duty. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith, Wentworth) did not give us a single practical suggestion but dealt in theories throughout his whole speech. And the amendment of the leader of the opposition to the extent that it expresses anything at all, expresses a mere theory. From a practical point of view it is a resolution into which we can read anything—even our revenue tariff or any other tariff method. Now I will admit that there is one conspicuous instance in which that tariff has not operated satisfactorily, indeed it operates unsatisfactorily, and that is to the success of the Conservative party in Canada.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is an old story.

Mr. MACKINNON. I never heard it before, I gathered that idea from reading the resolution, and noting its disastrous effects on the national policy leaders in the elections of 1900. I regret to repeat a chestnut for the hon. gentleman, because I suppose he is not accustomed to hearing it. Now, the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith) says that it will not do to take the total trade of the country as an argument to show prosperity, but that we must take the imports. So he proceeds to consider the imports, and at one blow he destroys his argument by stating that the imported goods should be manufactured here. He is opposed to any importations at all. He says that the imports represent prosperity, and in the next breath he says we should not have any imports at all; I hardly see how he can make both these arguments coincide. He instanced Germany, and says that we should not import from Germany. He instanced Belgium and the United States, and says we should manufacture in this country the goods we import from these countries. He forgets that we export to these countries as well as import from them. For instance, in the case of Belgium, we import $3,783,919 worth of goods from that country, and export $2,806,142 worth. In the case of Germany, we exported $2,141,552, and we imported $6,679,264. In the case of the United States we imported $119,000,000, and exported $72,000,000 worth. If the principle he lays down is a solid one, and if all nations adopted it, what would happen? Why, no nation would have any imports at all, and where would our exports go? International trade would cease. The position is evidently one that no reasonable man can accept, because it is only by the whole trade of a country that we can gauge that country's prosperity.

Now, what prosperity have we had? The hon. gentleman admits we have prosperity, and I wish for a moment to present some instances of our prosperity as affected by the tariff. The hon. gentleman says that the government should get no credit for the prosperity that exists, and then he proceeds to show that values do not represent the increased prosperity at all. He says that the increase in value occurs in this way: The countries that purchased goods from us, if times are good, are able to pay more for these articles. That is the position he takes. He admits the increase in value and not in quantity, but he does not give any credit to the government for it. One important factor he forgets, and that is the part the people themselves play in the production and manufacture of these articles. He forgets to give the agriculturist and the manufacturer credit for their work. I for one am not unwilling to give credit to the men who produce the articles. I think it is owing largely to the people themselves that we have such a large export and import trade.

We have had governments and governments, and certainly this government is deserving of considerable credit when we compare what has been going on under their administration with what went on under a former government. I intend to make a few comparisons between the two administrations. The total trade during the last year the Conservatives were in power amounted to $239,025,360. Last year the total trade was $386,903,157, an increase of nearly $150,000,000. Now, that increase did not take place under the tariff enacted in 1878, it has occurred under the present tariff. Yet the opposition bring forth an amendment declaring that the operations of the present tariff are unsatisfactory. How can any reasonable man state that the operation of a tariff is unsatisfactory under which the trade of the country has increased $150,000,000, in round numbers, in five years? How can any reasonable man vote for such an amendment? I appeal to the common sense of hon. gentlemen opposite whether they can support such an amendment by their votes in view of this great increase under the present tariff. I must say that when the present tariff was enacted I for one would never have dared to predict the enormous results that have resulted from its operation; and I believe that neither of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in favour of the amendment would have dared to predict that Canada would have seen such a marvellous development in her trade as has taken place.

Now, let me deal with the imports. In 1896 these amounted to $118,011,508; in 1901 they amounted to $190,415,525, or an increase of nearly $90,000,000 in imports alone. The duties collected upon these imports amounted in 1901 to over $29,000,000, and in 1896 to $20,000,000; so that the duty amounts to only about $9,000,000 more in 1901 than it did in 1896. Had the famous old national policy remained in force, instead of collecting $9,000,000 more, the government of the day would have collected a much larger amount in duty upon goods imported into Canada; and if hon. gentlemen who are in favour of this amendment think that the government should have collected many millions more of duty than they did, I beg to differ with them. Now, there is this important point to be noticed, that of all the goods imported in 1901 there came into Canada for the benefit of the people $71,730,938 free of duty. Perhaps it is that particular result of the tariff that our hon. friends opposite object to, it may be unsatisfactory to them in that respect. I have not heard any of them point out in what respect the tariff is unsatisfactory. For my part if all the goods came in free I think the people would be satisfied.

I will refer to the exports. In 1896 these amounted to $121,000,000 odd, and in 1901 to $196,000,000 odd, showing an enormous increase of $75,000,000 and over. I have simply gone into a few of the details of our exports and I would like to refer to them. Take our fisheries, for instance; in 1896 the value of our exports of the products of our fisheries was $11,183,698, while, in 1901, it was $10,000,000 odd, showing a decrease. I think that the fishing industry deserves to be taken up by the government and some improvements made so that the country will derive more benefit from that important branch of industry. There are many ways in which the fishing industry may be improved and the establishment of hatcheries is one way. The government has been doing very well in providing a system of cold storage for preserving fish, and I hope it will go further with that work so that the industry, instead of retrograding shall go ahead. Of animals and their produce in 1896 we exported to the value of $37,404,396, while in 1901, our export of animals and their products totalled $56,299,282. There is an increase of over half as much as the exports five years ago under that famous national policy. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith) who spoke last endeavoured to make it clear that the government had not accomplished anything to encourage the development of the cheese and dairying industry of the country. But it is evident, and the country knows it well, that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has been introducing the cold storage system into steamers wherever he could. It is already in operation on some steamers, and this year, I understand, seventeen steamers will be equipped with cold storage. This is a system that I believe the hon. Minister of Agriculture is experimenting with, and we cannot expect it to be perfect all at once. If a few losses have occurred, as the hon. member for Wentworth has suggested, this must be expected, because people must necessarily run some risk in experimenting at the outset. But, to further benefit the agricultural interests I would suggest the advisability of establishing more illustration stations throughout the country. If there is one thing more than another that we are interested in it is in advancing the agricultural prosperity of the country in every way possible, and, speaking for my own little province, I can say that the farming community are now in such a position that they understand in a different way from what they formerly did any new methods that are brought to their attention, any improvements that are brought to their knowledge in the working of their farms, and they are ready now to adopt everything along the line of improvement. Of course, the farmers of Ontario for some years have been engaged in a dairying and cheese business and have led the way in those important branches of agriculture. Down in the eastern provinces we are following in their footsteps and we are after all a portion of the same body politic and we wish to share in the general advancement of the country. In agricultural products, in 1896, the exports amounted to $17,900,000 and in 1901 to $38,568,000, an increase in value of more than double the total exports of five years ago. When an hon. gentleman says that this is simply an increase in value, he does not speak by the book, because this is too great an advance to be entirely affected by the value of these products, and I can take the blue-book and show him the quantities set forth proving conclusively that there has been a large increase in the volume instead of the value only having been increased. Of the produce of the mine we exported $8,000,000 worth in 1896, and in 1901 the splendid sum of $40,531,314 was realized from our exports, or over five times as much in 1901 as in 1896. Of course, the Yukon was opened up, but, possibly, if our Conservative friends had remained in power, it would have continued as it had been since Adam's time. In butter we exported, five years ago, $1,000,000 worth, while in 1901, we exported over $3,000,000 worth, so that hon. gentlemen will see that our exports of butter more than trebled. The hon. member for Wentworth spoke of the slight decrease that had occurred compared with the year before, but he forgot to tell the House that there had been an increase of $2,243,000 as compared with five years ago in the butter trade. There is no doubt that the government are entitled to considerable credit for supplying cold storage wherever they could. They could not force it into steamers, but they have offered subsidies to such steamers as would adopt it. It is remarkable that from Canada we export more butter than they do from the United States. The figures I have of their butter export in 1900 show that they sold $3,142,378 worth, while Canada exported in 1900 $5,429,563 worth of butter. In cheese, in 1896, we exported $13,956,000 and in 1901 we exported over $21,000,000 worth, or nearly $7,000,000 of an increase in our cheese export. Of course, the largest part of this cheese was made in the province of Ontario, but I think our own little province comes second or third on the list, and this is remarkable where there is so much farming land. It shows the farmers there have been benefited by the addresses given by the gentlemen sent down to the island by the government and that a new era has opened up for that province. Everything looks brighter than in the past. This amount of cheese which we exported in 1901 was the largest amount ever exported from Canada. There is no year previous in which the export comes anywhere near to it. It was over $21,000,000 in 1901. Comparing this export with the export of cheese from the United States we find that they sent out $4,939,255 worth, or only about one-quarter or one-fifth as much cheese as we did. In 1896, in eggs, we exported $807,000 worth, while last year we exported $1,692,296 worth, an increase of $885,000, an increase of more than double in the egg trade. In bacon and hams, in 1896, we exported $4,000,000 worth and in 1901 $11,000,000 worth, or nearly treble the amount, and yet some hon. gentlemen grumble about the condition of the bacon and ham industry. In beef and mutton only $28,000 worth were exported the last year the Conservatives were in power, while last year over $826,000 worth were exported, showing an increase of nearly $800,000. Of fruits we exported, in 1896, $1,700,000 worth, and in 1901 $2,000,000 worth. Now, the government deserves credit for taking a greater interest than ever has been taken before in the fruit industry and in horticulture. Of wheat, in 1896, we exported $5,000,000 worth, and in 1901 over $13,000,000 worth. Of flour of wheat, in 1896, we exported $718,000 worth, and in 1901 we exported $4,030,746 worth. Our export of our total grain products amounted in 1896 to $1,000,000, and in 1901 over $4,500,000, with one exception that of the year 1898, the largest export of grain in the history of the country.

I shall not confine my remarks to agricultural products alone, but I shall refer to a few of our manufacturing products in order to show the prosperity that exists in this branch of our national life. I have given a few examples to show that the farmer is marvellously increasing his exports, and now I trust to be able to prove that the manufacturer is benefiting as well. I am not of that class of radical free traders who would favour free trade through thick and thin and deny just favours to the manufacturers or to any other class of people in Canada. I want to see the manufacturer and the farmer working hand in hand and prospering together. I can observe now more than ever before, that in certain portions of Canada our manufacturing interests are deserving of more encouragement than I formerly thought they deserved. I did hold, and I still hold, very strong free trade views, but as one hon. member has said, I believe in practical politics, and I believe in doing what is fair to each section of the country, so that we may benefit as a whole people. Take the manufacture of agricultural implements in Canada, and we find that $1,749,000 worth were exported last year as against $593,000 worth exported in 1896 under the old Conservative tariff. There certainly is an instance where the manufacturer has benefited under the Liberal tariff. Our people are able to manufacture more of these implements and to export more, bringing wealth back to the country, than they did before the Liberal party came into power. Surely there is nothing in that to show that the present tariff is unsatisfactory. I would like some solid sound reason against the existing tariff before I could vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member (Mr. Borden). It is true that you may find that a few manufacturers complain, but those are the men who want to make money personally. They do not complain because they seek the general welfare of the country. I believe that any manufacturer who wants any change which would be in the general interest of Canada, will get that change made by the present government, but the man who wants a change for the benefit of his own pocket will not and ought not get it at the expense of the country. One gentleman on the other side complained of the number of carriages that were imported into Canada, but I can point him to the fact that over $450,000 worth of carriages, including carts, bicycles, &c., were exported from Canada last year. I can see no reason why carriages should not be imported into Canada just as well as we export them from Canada to other countries. Again let me point out that $75,000 worth of boots and shoes were exported from Canada in 1896, and that last year we exported $200,000 worth ; in 1896 we exported leather and manufactures of leather to the value of $1,995,000 and last year to the value of nearly $2,500,000. Surely these enormous increases show increased activity in trade. These figures strike me, Sir, as very excellent reasons why we should support the present tariff. Under this tariff the country has progressed by leaps and bounds and when the hon. leader of the opposition proposes that we should change existing conditions, he should be able to give some sound reason to induce us to make the change. That reason I have not yet heard. Reference has been made during the debate to the increase of the public debt. There is no doubt that the public debt has been slightly increased, but we should remember that if there is a large public expenditure it is in the interests of the country that it should be so. If there is any unwise expenditure of public money then it should be condemned, but no man who knows the extent of our country and the resources which we have to develop, will deny the necessity of an increase in the public debt for useful public purposes. I will take some credit to the present government for some features in connection with the increase in public debt, and I will make a comparison. In 1896 we paid in interest on the public debt $10,502,429, and in 1901 the interest amounted to $10,807,954. We are now paying $305,000 more interest on the public debt than we paid five years ago, but on the other hand this government is receiving more interest on its investments than the Conservative government received. In 1896 the government received as interest on investments $1,317,000, and in 1901 we received from the same source $1,784,000 making an increase of $414,833, or a balance in our favour—comparing the interest which we pay now on the public debt with the interest which was paid in 1896, and the interest which we receive now on investment with the interest which we received formerly—a balance in our favour of $109,308. On the whole this government is paying less interest than did the Conservative government, and we are having the benefit of the expenditure of more money in the country. I call that good financing, and I am quite sure that the gentlemen opposite will give credit to this government where credit is due. I repeat that in view of the larger rate of interest we receive on our investments, we are actually paying less interest charges than did the Conservative government five years ago. I shall not trouble the House with a reference to the expenditure because gentlemen on the other side have voted for each item of almost this total expenditure session after session, and to that extent they have endorsed the expenditure. That is the best answer to any complaint that may be made as to the increase of our annual expenditure. As another indication of the prosperity of the country I might mention that the total deposits in the Post Office savings banks alone have increased by $11,000,000. I would point out also that the larger share of our exports during the year have gone to Great Britain. We sent to Great Britain $105,000,000 worth and to the United States $72,000,000. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) has suggested that we should follow somewhat in the footsteps of the United States. I take issue with him there. His amendment is intended to retaliate in some measure against the United States. That would be an unwise policy for us to adopt. We as sensible men, must use our judgment and frame our tariff regardless of the tariff adopted by any other country. It would be foolish for us, because they increased their tariff that we should increase ours in proportion in order to hit back. It would be a senseless policy for us to adopt. We are after all but a young country in comparison. Many of our people are living happily on the other side, and the disposition of the United States towards us is, I think, friendly, as our disposition towards the United States should continue to be. They have put up a high protective tariff, but we have the word of the late President McKinley in his last speech that their intention was to reduce their tariff and gradually get it to a revenue tariff basis. I believe that if President McKinley had lived he would have changed the old United States tariff, which undoubtedly was injurious to us at the time it was adopted.

I have now a few words to say with reference to the administration of our railways. The Intercolonial Railway is to-day in splendid condition and its accommodations are equal to those of any railway on the American continent.

Mr. BROCK. Does it pay as well ?

Mr. MACKINNON. It pays better than when the Conservatives were in power; that is the point. You cannot expect a railway to make as good a showing when it is being thoroughly equipped—when new cars are being built, new engines being purchased, new ties and rails being laid. The revenue from the railway in the past year has, I think, been greater than in any previous year. Then, there is the Post Office Department, from which we are all deriving great benefits. A great many new post offices have been opened up throughout the country, and greater conveniences have been given to the people. The new system adopted by the Postmaster General will cause his name to go down to posterity side by side with some of the postal reformers of England.

I cannot close without referring also to the Public Works Department, which we all know to be one of the most important departments of the government. We find from one end of Canada to the other public works being constructed for the general improvement and advancement of the country, and transportation facilities being provided. All these things will help the farmers and manufacturers ; we cannot do without them. We find hon. gentlemen opposite complaining of the increase of the debt, and yet asking for more public works—a very peculiar position to take. I feel satisfied, as a representative of the people, that in every department of the public service we have men in charge who are entitled to the public confidence and the praise of men of good judgment, for their ability in managing the affairs of the country ; and they are led by a leader who is beloved and trusted by our people all over Canada. What is the use of our people sending up this prayer from our churches and elsewhere :

> With bounteous times our cities crown,
> Our fields with plenteousness.

If when that prayer is answered hon. gentlemen come into this House and say that this country is dissatisfied with one of the methods by which this prosperity is brought about.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 20, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. N. CHAMPAGNE (Wright) moved that the third report of the Select Standing Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates of this House be now concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman that objection was taken lately in this House to motions to concur in reports being made on the same day that the reports were presented ; and it was thought advisable in future that a notice of motion to concur should be given previously, and the motion could be made later on. The hon. gentleman, therefore, will understand that a notice of motion would be more in accordance with the rules.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 59) respecting the Ontario James Bay Railway Company.—Mr. McCormick.

Bill (No. 60) to amend the Canada Temperance Act and Acts in amendment thereof.—Mr. Flint.

Bill (No. 61) to amend the Criminal Code, 1892.—Mr. McCarthy.

QUESTION.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AT PICTON.

Mr. ALCORN asked :

For what reason is the opening of the public buildings at Picton delayed, as to the post office, as to the custom-house ?

When will the same, respectively, be opened to the public ?

Is a residence for the collector of customs to be provided in said buildings ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. James Sutherland). In the absence of the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) I would say that the building is now completed and the Post Office and Customs Departments have been notified.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. RICHARD BLAIN (Peel). Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a few observations on the question that is now before the House for consideration. In the first place, I wish to allude to the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) questioned some of the figures that were quoted in this debate by the leader of the opposition. When the hon. leader of the opposition was speaking, he was interrupted by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce :

I would like to know from my hon. friend what are those 'official statistics.'

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Year-book.

MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am sorry for my hon. friend if that is all the authority he has to adduce.

Now when I heard that statement, Mr. Speaker, I thought it was a strange statement to come from an hon. Minister of the Crown. I hold here the Year-book, and I remember well that during the last session of parliament there was considerable discussion over an item that was placed in the estimates for the printing and circulating of this book. I wish to quote what the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) said in that discussion over this item :

> This book is compiled from departmental reports, which are generally ready for the public within six months after the termination of the year.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that if this book is to be of any value to the public, if it was right for parliament last year to vote not only the sum of $3,000, but to increase the sum to $4,000, on the request of the Minister of Agriculture, for the production of this book, then I say we have a right to find in this book some information that any hon. gentleman can quote on the floor of this House. If this book is of no value to the parliament and to the ratepayers of Canada, then it is the duty, not only of the government but of this parliament, to strike out of the estimates that $4,000 a year, and discontinue the production of this book altogether. Now let us see if we can verify the statements made by the Minister of Finance from this Year-book. During this debate the hon. Minister of Finance stated, page 1341, 'Hansard,' that the net debt of the Dominion of Canada in 1896 was $258,497,432.77. I turn to the Year-book to find out whether the statement of the Minister of Finance is correct, and I find in that book a statement of the debt of 1896 in exactly the same figure as quoted by the Minister of Finance. I continue for the years 1897, 1898, 1899, and 1900, and a comparison shows that the figures the Minister of Finance quoted on the floor of the House in this debate were also taken from the Year-book. Therefore, I say it is not proper for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to stand up on the floor of this House and cast any reflection on the figures quoted by the leader of the opposition. Now it is generally conceded, Mr. Speaker, that if we are to have a good government it is important that we should have a good opposition in the House. I wish to read just one statement from the leader of the opposition, made in his closing remarks on this question :

> We want a policy of protection to our labour, agriculturing, manufacturing and other industries. We want a policy which will give to our people the advantage in their own market—a policy of Canada for the Canadians and Canada for Canadians means not the less, Canada for the empire as well.

While the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was willing to make the statement that it was the same old policy of the Liberal Conservative party, as a new member, coming into the House for the first time, and as a Canadian, I am proud to say that the policy of the Liberal Conservative party as enunciated by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) in this House, is the policy of the forefathers of this country. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) ventured to lay upon the Table of the House, and the Table is now covered with them, returns in respect to the census ten years old. Away back in 1891 he made a very long reference to the census returns. I would like to lay on the Table also another statement which is a little more up to date for the consideration of the government and particularly for the consideration of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. Whatever discussion and public opinion there may be as to the correct taking of the census in 1891, I would remind that hon. gentleman, and I do it with no pleasure, because the Liberal Conservative party do not wish to state upon the floor of this House with any measure of gratitude that the population of this country is decreasing, and although there is a great deal said upon the other side of the House as to the splendid prosperity that the people of Canada are enjoying, as I have said, I would remind him that the census taken last year proves that the population, at least, in many of the central counties of Ontario, is fast decreasing. Let me give the hon. gentleman his own riding of South Oxford. It had a population in 1891 of 22,421. Under this wonderful prosperity that we have had for five years under this new government, the population has gone down until last year it was 21,797, or a loss of 624 of the population of the county that the hon. gentleman represents himself. Then, North Oxford, the riding which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) represents, has lost in population in 10 years 773 souls. South Ontario has lost—I will not weary the House with the figures. Halton has lost in population 2,409, Lennox 1,478, East Lambton 1,221, Kingston, the old city where the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce resides, 1,220, West Huron 1,243, South Huron 1,722, East Huron 1,599, North Lanark 1,086, West Lambton 1,427, Peel county 1,780, South Perth 1,523, Centre Wellington 2,824, North Wellington 1,156, North York, lying alongside of the great city of Toronto 1,497, Prince Edward county 1,025, making in all of these central counties a loss from 1891 down to 1901 of 28,469. That would be a document also to be laid on the Table that would be a little more up to date and would be worth the consideration of hon. gentlemen who are talking so much about the prosperity of this country.

But, now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the Liberal Conservative party are just as anxious as the great Liberal party of this country that Canada should be prosperous. In the county I have the honour to represent we have been contributing to the prosperity of Canada like other counties. If we have a large measure of prosperity, as I think we have at the present moment, I wish to say that in that county, in the town of Brampton, Ont., we have the largest cut flower business in the Dominion of Canada, and the third largest on the continent of America known as the Dale Estate. The present manager being Mr. T. W. Duggan. That business has now fifty greenhouses with 300,000 square feet of glass, covering 7½ acres. The largest houses are 840 feet long, and the firm are now erecting 21 new houses. When these are completed at the close of this year, there will be 70 greenhouses, covering about 10 acres of land, and having a total area of glass of 400,000 square feet. This institution is three times larger than the next largest in Canada, which is Dunlop's, of the city of Toronto, and the firm employ from 50 to 70 hands, all men who are paid large wages. The output consists of roses, carnations, violets, chrysanthemums and smilax, and a portion of it is exported from the country to the cities of Chicago, Detroit, Rochester, New York and other large centres of the United States. The gentleman who inaugurated this great institution, Mr. Harry Dale, some twenty years ago, saw a future for Canada, and although he was cut off in the very midst of the development of this rose and cut flower industry, it is still growing, and I am delighted to be able to say that last year the output of cut flowers from that institution was $65,000 and that 90 per cent of that $65,000 was sent to the different centres and cities throughout the Dominion of Canada. So that the old story that Canada is the land of snows must be set aside because we are fast becoming a land of roses and cut flowers.

There has been a great deal of talk in this House and in the country in respect to the national debt. I wish to make a brief statement in respect to this question. The national debt stands to-day at $268,480,000, leaving out the odd cents. That leaves a net debt upon every man, woman and child in Canada of $50. We are paying, or we did pay last year, in interest upon this enormous debt, $10,800,000. What does that mean? It means that there is due out of the treasury of this country at the close of each day $29,250 to pay the interest upon this enormous national debt. That means that every hour that we are sitting here and every hour from the commencement of the year until the close of the year, including Sundays, there is due out of the treasury of Canada $1,218 to pay the interest on the national debt. Whatever may be in the reports and statements made by hon. gentlemen on the floor of this House as to the prosperity of Canada, I say that it should be a note of warning to us when we are paying over $10,000,000 simply for the interest upon this enormous national debt. We have had a great many statements from hon. gentlemen opposite about this great national debt and we had a great many promises from them when they were in opposition. Let me quote the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson), page 769 'Hansard' of 1893, when these hon. gentlemen were in opposition. That hon. gentleman said :

> Where is the statesmanship of these men who said that they could hold the expenditure to that amount, and have allowed it to increase until it has reached the enormous sum of $36,000,000 ?

Perhaps I ought to read it up to date, and let me read it to this hon. gentleman and say to the hon. gentleman himself and the members of the cabinet : Where is the statesmanship of these men who said they could hold the expenditure to that amount, and have allowed it to increase until it has reached the enormous sum of not $36,000,000 a year, but in the neighbourhood of $55,000,000 a year ? I suppose that it is well we should remind the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson) of some of his old promises in connection with that matter.

The members of the Reform party in this House are constantly making the statement here that the tariff is highly satisfactory, and as an evidence of that they point to the increase of revenue we are receiving, and to the great trade that is going on in the country. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am concerned my opinion is that the present tariff is not at all satisfactory to the people of Canada. Let me give a few examples to account for the faith that is in me in this respect. When the people of Canada wish to send wheat to the United States—and we grow more wheat than we can use in our own country—when we wish to send a bushel of wheat into the United States, we are met with a duty of 25 cents a bushel, while the Canadian duty is only 12 cents a bushel if the American wants to send his wheat in here. On oats the American tariff is 15 cents a bushel and the Canadian tariff is only 10 cents a bushel. On barley the American tariff is 30 cents a bushel, while the Canadian tariff is only 30 per cent, or 12 cents per bushel. On pease the American tariff is 40 cents, while the Canadian tariff is only 10 cents a bushel. On hay the American tariff is $4 per ton, and the Canadian tariff $2 per ton. On apples the American tariff is 75 cents a barrel, and the Canadian tariff only 40 cents. On potatoes, the American tariff is 25 cents a bushel, and the Canadian tariff 15 cents per bushel. On beans, the American tariff is 45 cents per bushel, and the Canadian tariff 15 cents per bushel. On butter, the American tariff is 6 cents per pound, and the Canadian tariff only 4 cents. On corn, the American tariff is 15 cents a bushel, and the American corn is allowed to be imported into this country free of duty. On wheat-flour, the American tariff is 25 per cent ad valorem, or about 75 cents per barrel, while the Canadian tariff is only 60 cents per barrel.

I wish to say that so long as the tariff of the two countries remains in that relative position to each other, I, representing as I do an agricultural constituency, will declare on the floor of this parliament that such a Canadian tariff is unsatisfactory to the farmers of Canada. I will tell you why it is unsatisfactory. During the last year there came into this country oats to the value of $946,313; barley to the value of $32,346; peas to the value of $15,943; potatoes to the value of $88,649; tomatoes to the value of $37,508; grapes to the value of $59,915; blackberries, strawberries, gooseberries and raspberries to the value of $80,366.

Imports from United States, year ending 13th June, 1901.

Oats	$946,313
Barley	32,346

In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that we have in this country, and indeed in the vicinity of many of our large cities, great quantities of land that is suitable for the production of all these articles I have mentioned; I say it is unfair to the Canadian population of 5,500,000 living alongside the American population of 70,000,000; it is unfair to us, I say, that we should allow that enormous quantity of grain and other products of the farm to come into this country while we have millions of acres of land in Canada not occupied at all.

But we had some promises from these hon. gentlemen opposite and I have a record of them here. We had some very glowing promises from these gentlemen when they were in opposition. They told us that when they came into power they would get us reciprocity with the United States, and that cry took with the farmers of Ontario at least.

This reciprocity with the United States can be obtained by those whose hearts are in the business.

A quotation from Sir Louis Davies in 1892.

Put us in and if we do not obtain reciprocity for you turn us out.

Said Sir Louis Davies.

Mr. BENNETT. He is out now.

Mr. BLAIN. Here is another quotation: tion:

If my leader comes into power it would not be a rash prediction to say that within six months from that day by the scratch of a pen a treaty of reciprocity would be in force between Canada and the United States.—(Mr. Fisher, now Minister of Agriculture.)

These are words which were used by the present Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) when he was in opposition.

If hon. gentlemen on this side of the House cross over to the treasury benches I can promise that there will be no difficulty in getting reciprocity with the United States.

Said the Hon. David Mills in 1895. These quotations could be added to by similar expressions used by the present Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, and by other distinguished Liberals. But, when they came into power they did appoint a deputation, or a commission, as I understand it to bring about reciprocity. I have been looking up the records of the House; I have been making inquiries from hon. gentlemen who have had seats in this House for many years to find out what report this wonderful commission has brought to us in respect to the promises they made to get reciprocity for the people of Canada. Well, I have a report from that commission, but all I can find in that report is an expense account for $34,000. I find that the Prime Minister received out of the treasury of this country when looking for the reciprocity which he failed to obtain, a sum of $3,821. I find that Sir Richard Cartwright drew $3,361; that Sir Louis Davies drew, $2,630; that Mr. John Charlton drew $1,766.

Mr. BENNETT. He is the cheapest and best.

Mr. BLAIN. Yes, and I find that H. Bourassa, M.P., secretary, drew $2,200. I need not enumerate these expenses further only to say that they had tips to servants during this good-time commission amounting to $407; they had rooms rented at Washington and at Quebec for which they paid $1,314, and they had entertainments, banquets, fishing trips, &c., which cost $2,656.58. Now, Mr. Speaker, if I am not correct in this statement, hon. gentlemen on the other side can very easily rise and correct me. So far as I can gather that was the only record that the commission presented to the people of Canada, and that is all the people of Canada get from the promises which the Liberals made that they would secure reciprocity for us.

And now what about the preferential tariff. In so far as I am concerned, I wish to say that the preferential tariff is not at all satisfactory to the people. The Minister of Finance, after the preferential tariff was placed on the statute-book stated in parliament, I quote from 'Hansard,' page 2469, year 1899 :

> Let us not for a moment suppose that our new tariff has not been of substantial advantage to the British manufacturer which he understands and appreciates. . . . . the imports of British goods have not been so large as we had hoped for.

These are two statements made by the present Finance Minister, and I wish to say that I do not accord with these statements. I would rather have a Finance Minister of this country place on our statute-book a tariff, that instead of being of substantial advantage to the British manufacturer which he understands and appreciates, would be of substantial advantage to the people of Canada which they would understand and appreciate. That is the policy the people of Canada desire, as against the preferential tariff.

Now, it is said that some of the manufacturing establishments in Canada are prosperous, even under this tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BLAIN. Some hon. gentlemen say 'Hear, hear,' and that undoubtedly is true; but there are living examples of the injury this tariff has wrought at different points in Canada. We know that in the town of Cornwall two of Canada's leading gentlemen, Lord Strathcona and Lord Mountstephen, who have great means at their disposal, invested large amounts of money in a woollen manufacturing establishment. Why is that establishment closed up to-day ? Is it for the want of capital ? Not at all; because these gentlemen have given of their means to many other institutions in Canada. Is it because they have lost interest and faith in Canada ? Not a bit of it, because they are proud of Canada's present position and hopeful for its future. But they believe that it is of no use continuing to operate an establishment of that kind so long as the government of Canada keep on the statute-book a tariff that gives a preference to the British workman over the Canadian workman. That is the reason these gentlemen have discontinued operations in connection with that mill, for it cannot now be operated to pay.

Mr. COWAN. How do you account for the fact that the woollen mill at Kingsville, which closed down under the old tariff, is now running night and day ?

Mr. BLAIN. I am not at all familiar with that factory.

Mr. COWAN. The Wigle-Brown factory.

Mr. BLAIN. But I venture to say that if that institution is running to-day, it is because of the principles that have been imbedded in the history of Canada by the Liberal-Conservative party, and it may be that it will continue for a little while. But we have the testimony of the best business men of Canada, on both sides of politics, who have come to this government on deputations, session after session, and, although they have not made much impression on that government, even though the present Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has said that he is a protectionist up to the hilt, I understand that they have made some impression on some of their followers, if we may judge from statements which we have heard in this debate.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The Kingsville factory is a gas machine.

Mr. BENNETT. It is shut down while the member is away.

Mr. BLAIN. Mr. Speaker, in the county of Peel we have three manufacturing establishments which are directly interested in the tariff as it now stands. One is a woollen manufacturing establishment that employs fifty hands. Almost every pound of the raw material which Mr. McMurchy, of Huttonville, uses in his factory, comes from the old country. Here is a sample of the raw material from New Zealand; here is another from Great Britain. In the main this raw material comes from 3,000 miles away. I ask this House, how can they expect that gentleman to continue his business when he is compelled to bring his raw material 3,000 miles across the water, and pay freight upon it, and when he is compelled to pay 25 per cent more for his labour than the manufacturer in the United Kingdom or in Germany ? When he has to bring all his machinery from Great Britain, and when the equipment of his factory costs almost double the equipment of a similar factory in Liverpool or Glasgow, how can it be expected that a man like Mr. McMurchy can develop his business under this tariff, which gives a preference to the British and German manufacturer ? We have also a tweed factory in the county of Peel, at Streetsville, owned and managed by Mr. Brodie, and the preferential tariff is altogether detrimental to that institution. If the preference in the tariff were done away with, that institution could enlarge and develop its business by supplying more of the goods used by the Canadian people. We have a large boot and shoe establishment in the town of Brampton, the Williams Boot and Shoe Company, and I do not think it is fair to the proprietors of that establishment that in every town in Canada where they sell their goods, they are confronted with boots and shoes made in the United States by people who do not contribute one dollar to the taxes of the Dominion of Canada. I hold that the tariff should be so arranged that every institution in this country which is manufacturing goods to be consumed by the Canadian people should have sufficient protection to keep out the same class of goods made in any foreign country; and I have no hesitation in saying that if that country should be England, the policy of Canada should be framed in the interest of the Canadian taxpayer as against people who are producing the same class of goods even in the old country under the same flag.

Now, I wish to refer to some other statements which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. the Deputy Speaker (Mr. Macdonald, Huron), in 1898, as reported in 'Hansard' at page 3399, said, speaking about the Intercolonial Railway :

> We shall earn a much larger proportion of money than before ; so much so that not only will we be able to pay $210,000 annually, but there will be a respectable surplus to place to the credit of the country.

Mr. Paterson, the present Minister of Customs, said in 1899, as reported in 'Hansard,' page 2670 :

> Here was a railway that cost this country over $50,000,000, and the policy of the Minister of Railways and Canals has succeeded in making this railway of greater use to the country, and has put it in a position to pay its own way.

These are statements which these hon. gentlemen have made on the floor of this House. I shall now take up the record in order to see whether these predictions have turned out to be true or not. I find that last year this great railway, which was so extended by this government that it was going to pay its own way, had a deficit of $488,186.77 on the running expenses, and there is also charged to capital account $3,652,313.46. That is the way these hon. gentlemen suppose that this railway is paying its way. At the investigation which is now going on before the Public Accounts Committee, it appeared that they have opened a new kind of account, which this House has never heard tell of before—a suspense account; and in that suspense account we find a large sum that ought to have been charged up against the railway last year, so that it does not appear in last year's report as having been charged up at all. Therefore, I say that the predictions of our hon. friends in respect to the running of this railway have not been true predictions, and are not verified by the statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Mr. BLAIN.

Mr. FLINT. I would like to ask a question. Was the hon. gentleman not present in the Public Accounts Committee when the manager of the Intercolonial Railway said, under oath, that the suspense account was an old account and had been used on every occasion during the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite ?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not permitted to refer to anything that has occurred in a committee.

Mr. BLAIN. Then we had a statement from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that if his party were returned to power they would so reduce the public expenditure as to effect a saving to the extent of $5,000,000 per annum. I am delighted to know that the hon. gentleman has undergone some conversion with respect to the tariff, and the people of Canada will still more rejoice if he will stand up like a man in the House and condemn this government for having increased our national expenditure and our national debt. I am quite sure that when he recalls the debate to which I have just referred, he must feel strongly impelled to condemn the extravagant expenditure of this government which had promised to be so economic.

Coming to the record of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) I find this statement made by him, as reported in 'Hansard' page 1,333, in 1882 :

> Now it is quite true so long as we continue having this prosperity the mischief of this may not be so apparent, but even the hon. Minister of Finance will hardly venture to say, in view of our own experience and the experience of the United States, in view of the experience in England, and every country that raises money at all in the same way as we do ourselves, that he has any patent which will enable him to secure a continuance of this prosperity for ever,——

That was the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) when in opposition, and when the Hon. Geo. E. Foster was Finance Minister. He went on to say .

> ——and the moment the check occurs, the moment times become, in the slightest degree hard, then, Sir, our surplus will disappear, but unhappily our taxes will remain. And the scale of the expenditure which the hon. gentleman is now fixing, will remain too ; there is no more difficult task than to cut down, or materially reduce the expenditure of any country, when it has been allowed to attain a certain figure.

That was the statement which the hon. gentleman made when in opposition, and I am surprised, in view of his then expressed opinion, that, having accepted a seat in the government, he should have allowed not only our national but our public expenditure generally to grow to such enormous proportions.

But we have a statement from another hon. gentleman, high in the councils of the Liberal party, with respect to the office which the Minister of Trade and Commerce holds.

> I must take exception, in the first place, to the office, the Department of Trade and Commerce, ever having been created. I do not see why it was created, unless it was to give a resting place for the balance of his life to the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position, drawing $7,000 per year for virtually doing nothing.

That was the statement made by a former member of this House, Mr. McMullen, when in opposition, and who has since been transferred to the Senate,

> We denounce this expenditure upon superannuation. We will wipe it out when we get into office.

That was the statement made by one of the leading members of the opposition, and yet these people have increased this very taxation which they then denounced and promised to wipe out. 'We demand,' they said, 'the strictest economy in the administration of the government.' This demand you will find in the resolution passed at the Ottawa convention of 1893. 'We are the party of low taxation,' said the Prime Minister, when leader of the opposition. I had the honour myself of hearing the right hon. Prime Minister, when leader of the opposition, make this declaration on the platform in the town of Brampton, surrounded by hundreds of his admirers, prior to the election of 1896 :

> The expenditure of this country has grown until the people are not able to bear it. I promise you that if you put our party into power we will reduce that annual expenditure $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 per annum.

I will not refer to what the expenditure is now, as that can be taken from the statement of the Finance Minister, but let me draw attention to a promise which the Finance Minister gave us when making his statement. It was not a promise that he would meet the views of the deputations which might call upon him. No, he was very careful in that respect, but he promised that next year the debt would be increased about $6,000,000. That was the promise made by the Finance Minister in his last budget speech.

I do not see that I need weary the House any longer upon this question. But there is one great question before the people of Canada, the transportation question, to which I wish to refer before taking my seat. I heard one of the distinguished gentlemen from the other side make the statement in the last session of parliament that out of every hundred bushels of wheat transported from our North-west eighty-five per cent was now sent to the seaboard on American railways and American vessels. When we consider the immense expenditure we have made on our railways and canals, that statement is a very disappointing one, and I am quite sure the people of Canada expected that at this session at least the government would have come forward and laid before parliament some properly matured plan of transportation, and committed themselves to it, that would when completed bring down all this wheat through our own Canadian territory. I am surprised that these gentlemen allow this state of things to continue. The Minister of Public Works is asking money from this parliament almost every day to be spent on private docks here and there. On all these different schemes the government are recklessly expending large sums but they have not expended, nor are they prepared to expend a dollar in procuring expert information as to what would be the correct course to bring that wheat through our Canadian territory to the seaboard, whether by water or rail route or partly both.

I say that the people of Canada have a lasting grievance against this government for having allowed that condition of things to go on year after year, while they spend public money upon wharfs here and there, with no properly matured scheme to place before the people's representatives when they assemble here to discuss public affairs.

The other great question is the question of the population of Canada. In concluding my address, I wish to remind the House that there was some information presented to the House last session with respect to the census taken last year that might be of value in the consideration of this question that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has introduced into this debate. I have here a letter dated Bradford, April 17, 1901, and addressed to the Hon. Sydney Fisher. It says :—

> I am sending you one of the schedules you wired me about. I regret to say that they had been forwarded to each of my enumerators some days ago. I thought they had been sent in the regular way and was under the impression that I was doing my duty by placing them in the hands of the enumerators.

What were these schedules ? Here is a letter which will explain :—

> In reply to yours of the 27th inst., asking information as to the bogus schedules, I beg to say I received these schedules through the post office in the regular way and the general appearance and a make-up of items led me to think they were genuine. At the time of receiving them, I was very busy and did not notice until I had received your message that they were to be sent to the Liberal candidate in each county in Ontario after having been filled in by the enumerators.

These were documents sent out in connection with the taking of the census. They were placed in the hands of men who were paid to take the census of Canada and sworn not to divulge the facts they learned or to make any statement concerning them outside of their official duty. Yet, I have here, copies of telegrams which were sent in connection with these documents. The first is from North York :

Bradford, Ont., April 17, 1901.

Hon. Sydney Fisher,
Ottawa.

Have received such document; am making every effort to have it stamped out.

(Sgd.) CHARLES ELLIOT.

Here is one from Algoma:

Fort William, Ont., April 16, 1901.

Hon. Sydney Fisher,
Ottawa.

Have received schedules but did not give them to enumerators. No authority to do so.

(Sgd.) E. A. MORTON.

The next one is from North Bruce:

Chesley, Ont., April 16, 1901.

Hon. Sydney Fisher,
Ottawa.

I have received the schedule you inquire about; have made no use of them.

Here is a letter addressed to Mr. Blue, special commissioner of census, from Campbellford, and dated 17th April, 1901:

Your telegram of to-day's date reached me too late to wire answer and I accordingly now write you. I have seen the schedule in the hands of some of the enumerators.

And here is one addressed to the commissioner of census from Bancroft, dated 22nd April, 1901:

I way away when your telegram of 17th inst. came to Marmora asking if I had seen or heard of alleged fraudulent schedule. I at once followed up the enumerators and found some of them had blank papers to fill in the names of males 16 years and upwards.

It was discovered by inquiry on the floor of this House that these documents were sent out by some person to the men in charge of the work of the census. I do not think that it will be alleged that the opposition in this House or the Liberal-Conservative party in Ontario caused these schedules to be sent to the officers, considering that these enumerators were asked to fill in the names of all male persons over sixteen years of age and return the schedules to the Reform nominee. I am of opinion that this government should have investigated that case; they should have taken pains to find out who it was who sought to make use of the enumerators and of information gained by them in their official capacity to assist one political party against the other in connection with the revision of the voters' list.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up the time of the House with the discussion of other questions. I desire to say that I am heartily in accord with the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax). We have a leader that the Liberal-Conservative party in this House and in this country are proud of. On this side of the House, you find no division. This government have the advantage of being criticised by an opposition that is not talking blue ruin, but is endeavouring to investigate public questions, and is giving its united influence for the promotion of wise legislation in this House. We are standing behind a leader selected by the party who is not only a credit to the members here but is a credit to the Conservative party in this country; and I predict that in the very near future, he will cross over to the other side and be the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. AULAY MORRISON (New Westminster). Mr. Speaker, I shall not attempt to follow the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) in his arguments. If I were disposed to criticise his remarks, I should find it difficult indeed, considering his very gracious tribute to all of us yesterday in the distribution of the beautiful rose of Brampton. However, should I find it in my heart to criticise him, I should have ample opportunity. The first point on which he laid himself open was in having the temerity to begin with statistics of the census returns of 1891. If there was one topic which the hon. gentleman ought to have avoided this was that one. Admitting his premises in his reference to the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), of course his conclusion would be inevitable. But the hon. member (Mr. Blain) began by assuming that the Statistical Year-book was a proper source to which to go to prove that the remarks made by the hon. member for South Oxford was misleading. Because, forsooth, a reference made by the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding) was corroborated by the Year-book, therefore the reference made by the hon. member for South Oxford was erroneous. The hon. gentleman mistates the position of the hon. member for South Oxford—whose cause, however, I do not wish to champion. What that hon. gentleman said was that the Year-book was not a correct criterion, inasmuch as the census returns of 1891 were not correct. It is not evidence that the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford was incorrect, that the Year-book is in accord with the statement made by the Minister of Finance. However, as I stated, I shall not attempt to follow the hon. member for Peel. I do not see what he or any gentleman on the other side has to complain about in regard to the condition of affairs in Canada to-day. I am sure that the prosperity which we now have and which we have had for the last five years does not require statistical demonstration. I do not think that the spectacle of the hon. member for Peel with the Year-book in one hand and 'Hansard' in the other is enough to shut out from view the general prosperity of the country. The hon. gentleman may search all the statistical year-books in existence, and may read the speeches made by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House from the time of confederation, yet he will not succeed in satisfying himself or the people that the country is not prosperous, or that, if the country is prosperous, the present administration is not to have some credit for that prosperity.

I am not one of those who think that the fiscal policy of any country is perfect, or that the tariff of any country is not subject to improvement. I will go so far as to say that there are some features in the present tariff which are not satisfactory to the people of the province from which I come, though the tariff is on the whole the most satisfactory the Dominion of Canada has ever had. But we are confident, in view of the history of the Liberal party since they have been in power, that they will go on from year to year improving the tariff; and we are confident that, upon the administration being satisfied that grievances exist, they will remedy those grievances. There is no use in frivolous criticism, or in harking back to what occurred ten, fifteen or twenty years ago. Let us face present conditions. I think if hon. gentlemen on both sides were to bear in mind that the administration of the country must be regarded as we would regard the administration of any large business concern, if they would bear in mind that the affairs of the country must be conducted upon sound business principles, a great deal of misunderstanding that appears to exist would be cleared away. I think the chief difference between the present administration and the one it succeeded lies in their business methods. We may, for campaign purposes and political effect, raise before the electorate the cry of Liberals and Conservatives, of free trade and protection; but at the same time, underlying free trade or protection, incidental protection or revenue protection, must be found sound business principles, call them by whatever name you please; and a government that departs from sound business principles is bound to mismanage the affairs of the country.

Now, I consider that the great measure of prosperity that we enjoy, the fact that the present administration have taken advantage of an era of good times, is a proof that we have at the head of the administration men of business capacity, men who adhere to sound business principles, and who never lose sight of them. So long as we have men of that kind conducting the affairs of the country, we may be sure they will take all possible advantage of good times. In prosperous times they will make the most of the prosperity, and in times that are not prosperous, a judicious business administration will foster and husband the resources of the country, will adopt a policy of economy and frugality, will keep down expenditure, and will only construct those public works which are necessary and construct them as economically as possible. In times of great prosperity such as we have now, I think it is quite proper for an administration to make large expenditures so long as they can show some equivalent for such expenditures. It is no argument against any administration to say that the debt is very large, that the expenditure is growing, that it is much greater to-day than it was five years ago, or ten years ago. The question is: Have we anything to show in return? That is the test, and I think the present administration have no fear of the application of such a test.

Now, I think that the first consideration of any administration is the welfare of the people. There is a very true expression in one of the letters of Junius, with which you doubtless are all familiar. He says that the ruin or prosperity of a state depends so much upon the administration of the government, that to be acquainted with the character of a ministry we have only to look to the condition of the people. If we find them obedient to the laws, prosperous in their industries, united at home and respected abroad, we may reasonably conclude that the affairs of the country are being conducted by men of experience, ability and virtue. That statement, I think, is as applicable to-day to the present administration as it could be applicable to the administration of any country. That Canadians are obedient to the laws goes without saying; gentlemen on both sides of the House will cordially agree with that statement. That the people of Canada are prosperous in their industries, we have abundance of evidence. That they have been prosperous in their industries since 1896, there is the most cogent evidence. We have only to refer to the budget of the hon. Minister of Finance every year from 1897 down to the present time. The characteristic of that deliverance has been a display of surpluses, in striking contrast with the budget speeches delivered prior to 1896. We have this year, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, a surplus of $5,800,000. What does that mean? It's elementary meaning is that our revenue has exceeded our expenditure by that amount; and applying the test as you would to any ordinary business concern, is that not a most satisfactory showing? All the people of Canada require to know, I think is that the current revenue for the fiscal year ending June, was $56,800,000, and that the estimated expenditure for the same time was $51,000,000, in round numbers, leaving, as I said, a surplus of $5,800,000. That is evidence of prosperity, it is evidence of a proper handling of the affairs of the country during that year.

As a further evidence of the prosperity of the country, we find its various resources make a satisfactory showing. The products of the mines, the fisheries, the forest, the farm, amount to a very large figure indeed. We find that the value of the fisheries in Canada to-day exceeds $24,000,000; we find that the value of the minerals this last fiscal year leaped up to the enormous sum of over $69,000,000; we find that the lumber and forest industries exceeded in value $80,000,000; while that great industry, that great source of wealth to the people of Canada, the agricultural industry, exceeded the almost incalculable sum of $600,000,000. Now those are some of the assets of the country with which the present administration has been dealing since 1896, and in the handling of which they have made the very satisfactory showing to which the Minister of Finance referred in his address.

Now I do not wish to dwell at any length upon the general fiscal policy of the country. It is indeed a difficult matter for one to deal with that subject after the able addresses we have had from the Minister of Finance, the leader of the opposition, the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler); and in view of their exhaustive treatment of the subject, it is scarcely necessary for me to go into a general discussion of the trade question.

I shall presume, for a short time, to say something in reference to the province from which I come, the western province of British Columbia, and refer to one or two aspects of the tariff which are not satisfactory to the people of that province. As has often been said to the public and to this administration as well as to preceding ones, the province of British Columbia contributes three times as much per capita in the way of customs and other revenue as do the people of the rest of the Dominion of Canada. The people of British Columbia have to pay a great deal more than this to their fellow-citizens in the east in the way of the increased cost of staple goods, which except for the tariff, the people of British Columbia would be able to get very much cheaper from the American side. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite can get no consolation from any criticism by any hon. gentleman on this side of the House of the tariff as it is applicable to British Columbia. These grievances existed under the old regime as they exist to-day. We have, for instance, merchants in British Columbia, and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will be able to corroborate what I say, who have reason to complain of some of the existing tariff rates in regard to staple articles. Merchants there complain, we will say, of the tariff in regard to the staple article of preserves. There is a specific duty of 2½ cents a pound imposed upon canned fruit, and 3½ cents per pound on jellies, jams and preserves, which amounts, in some instances, to 100 per cent upon the value of California goods of the same quality. We find in the matter of lumber, one of the great industries of British Columbia, that the hardship is indeed great. Lumber coming into Canada, as hon. gentlemen know, is free, while lumber going from Canada to the United States has to pay a duty of $2 per thousand feet, and this imposition bears particularly upon rough lumber shipped to the American side. We find that a small mill located near the international boundary on the American side, has a market both in the United States and in Canada. A small mill, or in fact a large mill, located on the Canadian side, has only the Canadian market, and if the owners wish to go to the United States, they are met with a tariff of $2 a thousand feet. Let us see how this condition affects the construction of international railways like the Crow's Nest road, which is now being built from Jennings, Montana, to the Crow's Nest district. An American contractor can bid for the construction of that road on the Canadian side as well as on the American side. The Canadian contractor, however, in bidding for the American section, must figure upon this duty of $2 per thousand feet on lumber, of course, shutting him out, practically, from securing the contract. Then, about Rossland and in some parts of the Kootenay, in the mining camps, planks and timber are used for mining purposes and most of this lumber is brought from the American side of the line, thus competing directly with the lumber industry on our own side. The supply trade finds itself in much the same position. The mills in Washington, Montana and Idaho, ship their lumber across the prairies of Idaho and Montana by the Great Northern, or the Northern Pacific Railway, into Manitoba and the North-west Territories over the Canadian Pacific Railway, cutting out the products of the British Columbia mills. The people of British Columbia maintain that so long as there are readjustments of the tariff to be made, the article of lumber should not be overlooked. A difficulty is presented by the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, who, of course, properly enough, say that the cheaper they can get their lumber the better it is for them, and they care not where they get it, but the fact is that with the present state of affairs and under the present conditions the American mills will soon have the market of the North-west Territories and Manitoba to themselves, they will have a monopoly of it, and they will raise the prices to the notch at which they had them before the competition of the British Columbia mills was introduced into Manitoba and the Territories. The people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories ought to appreciate the competition of the British Columbia mills more than they do. I am told by people who are competent to form an opinion upon this matter, that the imposition of a fair tariff, a tariff equal to that imposed by the Americans on our lumber, would not in any way increase the value of lumber in Manitoba and the North-west Territories. I had the pleasure of hearing the representations made by a very large and influential delegation of lumbermen, men such as Mr. Waldie and Mr. Bertram, of Ontario, Mr. Jardine, of British Columbia, and other gentlemen from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Quebec, who came here, and, before the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton), demonstrated, at any rate to my satisfaction, that if a duty were imposed, such as is imposed upon other articles under the tariff, the price of lumber would not be increased to the consumers in the North-west Territories and Manitoba. However, I think, myself, that the government will realize that notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen from Manitoba and the North-west Territories may say—and I think the time will come, and come very soon, when hon. gentlemen from that part of the Dominion of Canada will see—that it will pay the people of Canada to patronize home industry and pay them to insist, as I shall insist, that the tariff—call it what you may, protection incidentally, or for revenue—shall be a tariff of Canada for the Canadians. That is the kind of tariff I want. We want an indiscriminating, equal tariff if we are to have a tariff. I think the country must have a tariff under the present conditions. I am not a protectionist, I never have been a protectionist, and when I go as far as I do, I do not think it is any evidence that I am a protectionist. But, we have a tariff to day in Canada, and we see that there are certain articles that are not in the tariff, that the tariff is not equal, and we want an equal equitable distribution of these impositions.

There is another matter affecting the people of British Columbia to which I wish to refer, and it touches the people there just as much as the matter of lumber. It is the question of lead products. The question of lead products applies almost exclusively to the province of British Columbia. The production of silver lead ores in British Columbia has amounted up to date to $25,000,000, showing that this is no inconsiderable source of revenue and of advantage to the nation. Its production began in a very small way, but by proper development, with railway and smelting facilities and proper consideration by the government, it has increased, as I have said to something like in all $25,000,000. In the year 1899 it had reached the value for the two metals combined of $2,542,758 and for the year 1900 a total of $4,985,676. To give you an idea of the value of this industry, I may state that in 1900 the price of lead on the London market was about £17 sterling per ton, and in that year the production of lead in British Columbia amounted to about 31,000 tons, in value nearly $3,000,000 worth. During the past year 1901, the price in London went down to ten pounds five shillings per ton, but owing to the fact—and it is a very humiliating thing for us to consider—and owing to the fact that the American Smelting and refining Company known popularly as the American Lead Trust, saw fit to withdraw their ore buyers from British Columbia and to refuse to make any terms for the smelting of the British Columbia ores, the quantity produced fell as well as the price. There is in Canada altogether a consumption of something like 13,000 tons of lead in all forms. This consumption is at the present time partially supplied by our own mines, but owing to a peculiar twist in the tariff to which I most respectfully and most emphatically draw the attention of the Minister of Customs ; owing to an inexplicable eccentricity of this arrangement of the tariff, a most important item in the list of lead products consumed in Canada is not supplied from our own lead mines. Of the total quantity of some 13,000 tons consumed in Canada, about 7,000 tons comes to Canada in the form of lead used in paint. As you all may know the lead as it is used in paint is simply metallic lead. As it comes from the refinery it is known as pig lead. This pig lead is subjected to one of several processes by which it is corroded or reduced to the form of what is known as dry white lead and in that condition and being mixed with linseed oil we have the ordinary paint of commerce. Our tariff as it stands imposes a duty of fifteen per cent on pig lead ; (that is this metallic lead that comes from the refinery) and a duty of twenty-five per cent on mixed paint. Here is where the anomally comes in. On dry white lead there is only a duty of five per cent, so that you can see that instead of sending in his pig lead on which there is a duty of fifteen per cent, or his paint on which there is a duty of twenty-five per cent, the exporter to Canada subjects this pig lead to a very important process enhancing its value, and makes it dry white lead and has it sent in here with only a duty of five per cent against it. The consequence is that the very important industry of corroding this pig lead is completely killed in Canada. People will not invest their money in concerns for the purpose of treating this lead in this way when they find there is only a duty of five per cent against the American product, and under the preferential tariff it is reduced to three and one half per cent, so that as regards that commodity we are at the mercy of the American and British manufacturers. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that this is a very important industry, and I hold that if the tariff on that particular branch of that industry were equal to the tariff on the pig lead and on the paint the difficulty would be overcome. I do not mention that at all as an attack upon the principle of the tariff. There is no principle involved in an objection of that kind. The fault is traceable to gentlemen opposite when they were in power. They cannot criticise this tariff. This little ano-mally runs back to the time of Confederation. These gentlemen opposite are satisfied with the present tariff apparently, because they say it is theirs, and we seem to be quite satisfied because we have made little or no alteration, and particularly none at all this year.

Now, Sir, we in British Columbia have loyally accepted the tariff as we find it. I am drawing attention to these features of it in a friendly way and as a culmination of the many overtures made to the government in respect thereto by delegations and by private representations. We in British Columbia have submitted to this tariff which imposes very substantial taxation upon us in respect to what we consider staple articles, and which taxation is a burden upon us for the advantages of our fellow citizens in the east. I refer to the high percentage per capita which we in British Columbia are contributing in the way of customs and revenue duties. Whether intentionally or otherwise, the people of British Columbia are made to contribute very substantially by having themselves taxed in this way for the advantage of the people in Eastern Canada, and it is nothing but reasonable that we should ask that in respect to those items of production in British Columbia which are susceptible of being benefited by a tariff rearrangement, it is nothing but reasonable that we should ask that these productions of British Columbia should at least be put on an equal footing in the tariff, with those articles which we are obliged to buy in the east. Put us on an equal footing in the tariff, with, at all events, the people on the American side of the line. For instance, if the duty upon bricks is to remain at twenty per cent and upon grindstones at twenty-five per cent, and upon drain pipes at thirty-five per cent, and upon plumbago and asbestos at twenty-five per cent; there is no reason why the duty upon pig lead should not be twenty or twenty-five per cent. If the duty upon ochers which are mere earth dug out of the ground, is to stand at twenty per cent; if the duty upon oxides and siennas is to be twenty-five per cent; if the duty upon fire proof paint dry, which is an iron paint, is to stand at twenty-five per cent, and if the duty on linseed oil with which the paint is mixed is to stand at twenty-five per cent; then we can see no reason why the duty on dry white lead should remain at five per cent, and should not be raised to twenty-five or thirty per cent. Is there anything unreasonable in making this demand?

Mr. CLANCY. The reason is, if the hon. gentleman will permit me—

Mr. MORRISON. I do not want my hon. friend's explanation at the present moment. No doubt it is very interesting.

Mr. CLANCY. I suppose you know what it is.

Mr. MORRISON.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not see why the government of the present day, and the Conservative government of the past as well, did not drop on to that apparent injustice to an industry which should be a very important industry in this country. I, in the best spirit, insist on the government taking this matter into consideration. I know that with such a vast country as we have, and in view of the multiplicity of things which the administration has to consider, the chances are that a matter of this kind which might be looked upon as somewhat insignificant, may be overlooked. But Sir, to the people of the Kootenays this is a very serious matter indeed.

Take for instance the condition of silver mining in British Columbia. We have in the Slocan and in the East Kootenay, a silver deposit district that is unparalleled in the world. During the short time that this mineral has been developed and exploited, we have a mine which has only been exceeded in its output on the whole American continent by another mine in Idaho. That is saying a good deal. That Canadian mine is idle to-day. What is the reason? Do you blame the people out there for saying that it is in consequence of this tariff discrimination. Take for instance the other mines such as the North Star and the Sullivan mines, and notwithstanding that they have at their doors smelters like those at Nelson and Traill, yet they are lying idle. The only mines that are working are the high-grade mines, and they have great difficulty indeed in keeping going, owing to the present very low price of silver something like fifty-five cents per ounce. I think this is a matter to which the government should give its immediate and most serious consideration. I must admit that there has been no want of representation on the part of the people who are most interested in this matter; and I trust that at this time next year, when the hon. Minister of Finance makes his budget speech, it will be as satisfactory in respect to other matters as it has been this year, and that, in respect to the matter I have referred to, it will be eminently satisfactory to the people of British Columbia.
