> I wish to say in the first place that I do not mean to discuss the admirable essay to which we have just listened. Its moral tone was excellent; indeed it was a joint effort of morality and beet sugar.

That is the magnificent criticism offered by the gentleman who is described as the giant of Guysborough. Even an ordinary man could say as much ? I would remind the hon. member for Guysborough, that the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Richardson) was speaking for the first time in the House of Commons, and I believe that I speak the honest sentiment of every member of this House when I say that a more creditable effort has rarely been listened to than the speech of the hon. member. If, lacking some of the confidence that characterizes some members, he did occasionally refer to notes, it was well that he should do so ; but for the hon. member (Mr. Fraser) to taunt an hon. member on this side because of the moral tone and the moral sentiment of his speech may be good speaking, but I venture to say that it is very bad policy and very bad statesmanship. The hon. member (Mr. Fraser) said something of more importance. He criticised the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition and he said :

> What do you want ? Do you want the policy of 1878 ?

I say yes, and I say no. We do not want the tariff policy of 1878 because we always had that breadth of statesmanship which told us that we must modify and change our tariff with the changing conditions of the country. But if the hon. member asks : Do we want the national policy which tended to the marvellous development of all our resources ; which energized the people, which holds up to them hope, which was as broad as Canada, as broad as the empire, and which was enunciated by Sir John Macdonald in 1878 ; then I answer : Decidedly yes ; and the Conservative party, I am proud to say, stands upon that national policy to-day. I notice that although the member for Guysborough cannot understand the amendment introduced by the leader of the opposition, yet the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) says it is perfectly definite and clear. You would think that these gentlemen on the government benches want us to instruct them in the A B C of commerce and trade matters, in view of the fact that no more definite declaration could be made of the position of a political party than has been made from this side of the House. It is becoming pretty evident to the country that these gentlemen opposite are not honest in their statement that they cannot understand the policy propounded by the Conservative party. It seems to me that these gentlemen ; bankrupt as they seem to be in any concise, clear theory as to the principles upon which this government should be carried on ; having worked upon the conditions they found then in 1878 with the exception of the British preference ; having found now that we have arrived at a stage in the history of this country when in the nature of things changes must be made ; it seems that these gentlemen are not able and have not the ability or have not the courage to announce a policy for themselves, and so they say from time to time : What is the policy of the Conservative party, and what is the meaning of the declaration of the policy that has been enunciated by Conservatives from session to session. In reply to these gentlemen that it is a definite policy; that it is a policy which so far as one can see, the Reform party has not been able to frame. The fact of its being a policy at all makes it what the Reform party are frequently looking for, what they have not been able to find, and what I venture to say—having regard to their actions in the past—they would not have the courage to enunciate even though they found it, because they want to see the way the wind blows before they declare a policy one way or the other. The policy of the Conservative party is not a patch-work policy ; it is not—If I return to the story of Joseph—a patch-work like Joseph's coat, to be worn one side out or the other side just as happens to suit the exigencies of the case ; with a patch for the Minister of Public Works ; a patch, not very definite in colour, for the Postmaster General ; a patch equally undecided in colour for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries ; two patches perhaps—because he has two policies, one in the east and one in the west—two patches for the Minister of Interior ; shreds and patches for the back benches ; with blue ruin all over it here and there by way of adornment for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and with ornaments of immaculate white to represent the immaculate purity of the hon. leader of the government. The Conservative policy is not that kind of a policy. It is a policy which is well conceived, which is grounded on faith in the country, which is studded with hope throughout, a policy of certainty which has proved beneficent to this country in the past ; not devoid of colour either, for with the inauguration of this policy hope was brought to this country before ; and when the Conservative party comes to power again—and they cannot come too soon for the benefit of the country—a universal Christian emblem will span this country from ocean to ocean, and a rainbow of promise and hope will gladden the hearts of the people of Canada. Well, I do not want to pay too much attention to the hon. member for Guysborough, because I would be enhancing his importance, and perhaps, he has enough of that now ; but he is as good a text to speak from as anybody else, and when I describe him I describe a good many others. The hon. member complained of the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in this language :

> I cannot conceive of the state of mind which would induce the hon. gentleman, who has done so much for the sanctity of the Sabbath and the chastity of the home to make such a speech as he made in the House the other day.

Why cannot he conceive of it? I do not think my hon. friend from Guysborough does himself credit. Can he not understand an hon. gentleman repenting of his wickedness ? Is he at a loss to understand that the hon. member for North Norfolk, after having for eighteen or twenty years proclaimed a doctrine in which he did not believe, might very well be aroused by patriotism or by a desire to do what is fair by his country, to recede from the false position he had occupied, and come to acknowledge fairly and squarely that he had abandoned that life and had determined to lead a better one ? The hon member for Guysborough says : 'I cannot understand the state of mind which would induce the hon. gentleman.' Why, Mr. Speaker, does it require an inducement for a member of this House of Commons to do his duty ? What kind of inducement does the hon. member mean ? I do not know; perhaps he does. Then he says, speaking of the hon. member for North Norfolk, 'a gentleman who has done so much for the sanctity of the Sabbath and the chastity of the home.' God help this country, Mr. Speaker, when the sanctity of the Sabbath depends on hon. members of the Liberal party. They have robbed Providence of the credit of the good crops; they have robbed Providence of the rainfall and the gladdening sunshine, and now they are robbing Providence of the credit for the sanctity of the Sabbath. Why, these hon. gentlemen robbed us of our policy. We have heard of men taking coppers from dead men's eyes; but where will these gentlemen stop when they talk of some man sanctifying the Sabbath, the hon. member for North Norfolk by the mouth of the hon. member for Guysborough ? Then, he speaks of the man who has done so much for the chastity of the home. Well, if I read a line or two from a speech of the hon. member for Guysborough, you will see that the chastity of the home is something that the hon. member for North Norfolk might well give attention to. This is what the hon. member for Guysborough said at Morden in 1899 :

> To such a Liberal who said that the government did not keep its pledges, he would say, look at home. Have you kept the pledges made to your wife before you married her ?

The hon. member for Guysborough is surprised; he cannot understand a state of things like that; and he says : 'Have you kept the pledges you made to your wife when you married her ?' Hon. gentlemen I think generally do. Then he says :

> But what would you think if your wife left you, and went off with another man, and that man an unsanctified tramp ? That woman would be just as vile as the Liberal who turned Tory.

Now, I am not going to forget the reverence which I owe to the sacred name of woman and wife; but I am going to say that the hon. member for Guysborough pays a poor compliment to the Liberal party in supposing that it does not better understand morality or the sanctity of the Sabbath, or the chastity of the home, when he speaks of that party as one that will go off with an unsanctified tramp. I will leave the hon. member to follow that out; I will not pursue the matter further. When the hon. member for North Norfolk has fought the final battle with the big member for Guysborough, and with the very plucky member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), I think the hon. member for North Norfolk will triumph, though it does not matter particularly to us. I will just illustrate it by something that was said by the hon. member for North Norfolk. He said: There was a great big burly Englishman whose wife used to attempt to thrash him. His neighbours remonstrated with him over the indignity, and his reply was this : 'It pleases she, and it don't hurt I.' And so we will leave these gentlemen to their own way.

I said that things were coming our way. I have thought the matter out, and I will not say that the brains of the Liberal party have left it; but I will say, and say it advisedly, that by the universal assent of this country, two of the ablest men of the Liberal party, the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) have left and abandoned the party completely, as far as their declarations of policy, are concerned. They have not left it so very far with respect to the policy in force; but we must take these gentlemen as we find them declaring that the policy is unfit for the circumstances and conditions of this country.

We have another state of facts showing that things are coming our way. We have the government not able to proclaim a policy. The dissension in the ranks is so manifestly acute that they cannot get close enough together to prepare a policy. We have them getting up in the House here and there, almost to a man, and enunciating this principle : 'I do not believe in free trade or any such dogma as that, as regards my own county, my own territory, or the trade in which I am most interested; but it is quite good enough for the Dominion at large; so long as it keeps these men in power.' We have that principle proclaimed from almost every bench. The thing cannot go on much longer. On Friday night, notwithstanding that magnificent majority which the government possesses, not one man could be got to stand on his feet in defence of the government's position, and we have members threatening the government. We have just the same condition of things as that which existed in 1878, and I warn hon. members of the government that unless they take a leaf of warning from the history of the past, they will repeat the history of 1878 just as soon as the tide of universal prosperity is checked, and will find themselves on the other side of the House.

I am not sufficiently a politician to very much care which side is in power so long as the best interests of the country are looked after, and I would be glad, even at this late hour, if the government would adopt a progressive policy, especially when we have reached a critical stage in our commercial policy and that of the mother country more important than any previous one in the annals of the Dominion or of the great empire to which we belong. Do hon. gentlemen opposite lose sight of the fact that to-day, when we are approaching the ceremonies of the Coronation, at which will be gathered the greatest minds from the different parts of the empire, and when a great conference will take place on the relations between the colonies and Great Britain as a whole—do these hon. gentlemen realize that instead of squabbling among themselves, instead of appearing before the people of Britain as men torn apart by wrangling views, or, as the Minister of Public Works put it, 'fighting like blazes' around the council board, they should at this juncture be united ? Do they understand that at this, the most important juncture in our history, Canada should be represented by a government having a policy upon which all the members of that government are agreed and not by a cabinet divided by internal dissensions. In this respect I charge this government with the greatest omission of duty that has ever disgraced a Canadian administration. If we had, at this juncture, a leader of the government who understood the position of the country, instead of trying to keep back information from the House it would be his policy, in the speech from the Throne and by discussion in the House, to ascertain, from the general consensus of opinion, what is the best proposal to make to the empire at that important conference. He would make it his business to ascertain what is the voice of the people on our commercial policy and be guided by that opinion, but unfortunately these gentlemen have no settled policy as regards the great questions which must come before that colonial conference. Great Britain is now at the end of her free trade policy, she has now come to the point when there must be a change of ways, when she must adopt a new policy, she has come to that point when, as His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales said on returning from his tour around the world, Britain must wake up. And, Mr. Speaker, British public men are waking up. The trend of public discussion is in favour of a radical change. And there is an alertness on the part of the public men of Great Britain and of her business men as well, such as has never before existed, and which is exceptionally favourable to the adoption of a policy that will tend to unite and consolidate this great empire. Let me refer briefly to the language of the Prince of Wales on this point, as described by 'the Imperial Argus':—

He was equally happy in his allusion to the commercial questions of the day. His remarkable testimony to the impression made upon our colonial brethren by the unaccountable slumbers of Mr. John Bull has attracted wide and deserved attention. It is admirably summed up and illustrated by Mr. Gould in the striking cartoon we publish this month, and the fact that the heir to the throne has found it desirable to add his voice to those of the already numerous critics of our somnolent friend, should convince him, if anything can, that the time has come when he really must 'wake up'—and keep awake.

That advice is equally applicable to this government. The time has come for it to wake up or give place to men competent to manage our affairs. I have another, quotation, which I wish to cite, in order to show the position of matters in Britain at present:

One of the most important discussions of our fiscal system in late years was held on Wednesday under the auspices of the United Empire Trade League, when the Right Hon. James Lowther, Sir Howard Vincent, Lord Masham, and a number of M.P.'s spoke strongly in favour of overhauling a system of taxation which had become inadequate to the requirements of our empire and its changed conditions. Mr. Lowther argued that we need a large revenue from customs duties in justice to our taxpayers, and in the interests of our home and colonial industries. Sir Howard Vincent urged the government, in view of the coming budget, to revise our system so as to relieve the pressure of direct taxation and for the development of commerce within the empire. He stated that the imports of competing manufactured goods was last year over £100,000,000, or ten times the value of the imports in Cobden's day. Our imports from foreign countries were now £413,000,000, and our exports only £197,000,000. The remedy for this inequality, he said, lay in the development of inter-Imperial trade. Canada's magnanimity has been written in gold and in blood, and we offered her nothing for her preferential tariff. We could consolidate the empire on a commercial basis by taxing the foreigner. Sir Howard went on to advocate a duty of 10 per cent on all fully manufactured goods from foreign countries which would yield £6,000,000 a year and 5 per cent on partially manufactured goods which would yield another £4,000,000 a year; also 1s. a quarter on wheat, and 5 per cent on foreign flour, which together, would yield £3,000,000 a year. A resolution supporting the petition in favour of fair trade was carried, and this petition, which is being extensively signed in industrial centres, will shortly be presented to parliament.

And from Liverpool and Cardiff alone, a few days ago, was presented a petition by Mr. James Lowther, bearing 35,000 signatures, praying parliament to impose duties on foreign goods.

So that, if we are to judge by the signs of the times, things are decidedly coming our way; and are decidedly unfavourable to the policy of those who advocte in the House anything approaching free trade.

I come now, Sir, to speak of the address of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, which is pretty familiar to us all. When I come to speak of this distinguished gentleman—at least a gentleman who did occupy so distinguished a position in the past—I approach my subject with great modesty and with a desire, of course, to say nothing personally offensive, but only to discuss his position from a public point of view, and casting about for what may be a reasonable excuse for a gentleman who, the Prime Minister has told us, in 1878 advocated the policy immediately afterwards inaugurated by the Conservative party, and yet, from first to last, denounced that policy—the only charitable construction I can put upon it is something in the line of what is suggested by the hon. gentleman when he talks of closing his eyes. I believe the hon. gentleman has been actually asleep during the past nine or ten years, and that that accounts for the fact that, without a blush or a trace of nervousness, he, unlike the one who sings I cannot sing the old song,' can sing the old song with evident relish. There are a number of instances in which this sort of thing is said to have occurred. For instance, in our asylum we have men and women, who, by reason of infirmity or calamity, live entirely in the sunny past. They are awake, they are alive, but they are not awake or alive to the changes that have taken place for a number of years. But, though I cannot but think that this fairly describes the hon. gentleman, I do not wish to insist too closely upon the parallel. I pass to the story of an old lady who died the other day, a significant and pathetic story—and I submit that the position of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not only peculiar but it is decidely pathetic. This lady, when young, was engaged to be married. She had purchased her trousseau, she had even donned her wedding dress and was awaiting the coming of the bridegroom. But the bridegroom came not. And when it dawned upon her that he was false, that he had not meant it when he told her that he loved her, her mind gave way. What was the result? Ever after that, on the anniversary of the day which had been set for her wedding, she donned her wedding dress, and walked about and waited for the bridegroom to appear. So, after years, when the wedding dress had become out of fashion and was, in fact, but a suggestion of pitiable disappointment, the old lady died. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce parallels that case pretty well. He fell in love with the portfolio of Finance years ago. This was the darling of his ambition. He made overtures to the Grit party and said: That is my ambition; give me that and I will serve you through good and evil report; for that I will abandon my principles and stifle my convictions; give me that and I will follow you where you will. They promised him, and he, like a faithful lover followed through all the discouragements through which they passed. At last the time came when the party got into power, and then this lover came and demanded the price of his faithfulness. But they said: No; we wish to serve our party by giving this portfolio to another; you are getting old and are not exactly a suitable bridegroom. This was the shock which unnerved him, and which has clouded his memory ever since. He accepted the portfolio of Trade and Commerce, but always since then he has lived in the past. If the hon. gentleman thinks that that reference is not suitable to his taste, then I will recommend him to consider a historic instance, that of Hans Christian Andersen, the great Dane who made himself illustrious as a writer of children's stories. Andersen had a great apprehension that he might be buried alive, and I think that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, perhaps, has reason to fear that, living in the past as he does, he also might be buried alive. To prevent the dreadful fate he feared, Andersen had pinned upon his clothing when he retired at night a paper bearing these words: 'I am not dead, I am only in a trance.' I trust the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce may have an awakening sooner or later—and before it is too late. Talking of slumbering, I do not think that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is really one whit more completely asleep than are a majority of the members of this government to the actual condition of things existing to-day. I can give no more apt illustration of what I think will be the historical verdict upon the attitude of the Reform party of to-day, and of the government in particular, to the condition of the country, than is to be found in the well-known volume, 'Looking Backward.' You remember, Mr. Speaker, the instance, how a gentleman, returning to his house after being out for the evening, retired to a cell he had constructed for himself underground in order to be away from the disturbances of the house and the street. He had been celebrating 'Declaration Day'—this was in the city of Boston, in the United States. That night the building above was destroyed and communication with the cell was cut off. The rest of the story will be sufficiently described in what I read:

And now (says the Dr.) 'can you tell me a little more explicitly when it was that you fell into that sleep, the date, I mean.' 'Why, last night, of course; I said so, did'nt I? that is unless I have overslept an entire day. Great heavens! that cannot be possible; and yet I have an odd sensation of having slept a long time. It was was Decoration Day that I went to sleep.'

'Decoration Day?'

'Yes, Monday, the 30th.' 'Pardon me, the 30th of what?'

'Why, of this month of course, unless I have slept into June, but that cannot be.'

'This is the month of September.'

'September! You don't mean that I have slept since May! God in heaven! Why it is incredible.'

'We shall see,' replied my companion; 'you say it was May 30 when you went to sleep?'

'Yes.'

'May I ask what year?'

I stared blankly at him, incapable of speech, for some moments.

'Of what year?' I feebly echoed at last. 'Yes, of what year, if you please? After you have told me that I shall be able to tell you how long you have slept.'

'It was the year 1887,' I said.

My companion insisted that I should take another draft from the glass, and felt my pulse. He said:

'Your appearance is that of a young man of barely 30, and your bodily condition seems not greatly different from that of one just roused from a somewhat too long and profound sleep, and yet this is the 10th of September, in the year 2000, and you have slept exactly one hundred and 13 years, three months and eleven days.'

Now, I do not quote this for the amusement of the House, I quote it because it points a moral, and because we are at a crisies in the affairs of Canada. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been writing epitaphs in order to denounce the Conservative party, perhaps it might not be improper for me to sketch an epitaph for the hon. minister himself. I regret that if the people of Canada were to erect a monument to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, they could not, I fear, unless he repents, consistently engrave upon his monument any such legend as that which is engraved on the monument to the memory of the late Alexander Mackenzie: 'Duty was his law, conscience was his ruler.' But on second thought, I do not think it would be well to erect a monument to the hon. minister, I think it would be better that a tablet to his memory should decorate the halls of this chamber, in order that it might be a warning to young Liberals in future to be careful as to whom they accept as their guide. So I venture to suggest that a tablet be erected to the memory of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, to be placed on the southern wall of this chamber. What can we engrave upon it with any due regard to consistency? We will, I think engrave two pillars of stone. We will make one grand and graceful column dedicated 'Protection.' We will also have a crumbling rock inscribed with 'Free Trade,' and on that we will place the figure of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, leaning against the pillar designated protection. We will place in his hand a flag and on it the legends unrestricted reciprocity, commercial union, political union, annexation to the United States, and absorption in the United States. We will have the hon. gentleman, as aforetime, looking to Washington, and near him the figure of a man, not in particularly good humour—a figure representative of a gentleman named Cook,—and this figure pointing menacingly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In his hand he will hold a scroll on which is written these pregnant words of the great Scotchman Carlyle :

> Judgment for evil thing is many times delayed, some day or two, some century or two ; but it is sure as life, it is sure as death.

We will sketch too the returning Canadians, those who have been expatriated by acts of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. At the foot of the column we will have a volume of the 'Economist', published in England, containing calumnies of this country penned by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. What more would you have ? I have said enough. We will put that slab over on the southern wall, to remain a warning to all Liberals in the future not again to allow themselves to be betrayed as they have been by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce ; and on this slab the legend 'Corruption wins not more than honesty.'

History will do the rest, I think, for my hon. friend, I need not say more—further than to add that as he is now gracefully gliding away from the scene of his labours. I could hope, I could pray, that he may not persist in his sins. Therefore, if the hon. gentleman will take warning, even at this late hour, after having sacrificed the interests of his country to his ambition, having neglected the voice of conscience, I commend to him something more from the pen of Thomas Carlyle :

> Dost thou think that there is therefore no justice ? It is what the fool hath said in his heart. It is what the wise in all times, were wise, because they deemed and knew for ever not to be. I tell thee again there is nothing else but justice. . . . . My friend if thou hadst all the artillery of Woolwich trundling at thy back in support of an unjust thing ; and infinite bonfires visibly awaited ahead of thee to blaze centuries long for thy victory on behalf of it, I would advise thee to call 'halt,' to fling down thy baton, and say, 'In God's name, No !' Thy 'success ?' Poor devil, what will thy success amount to ? If the thing is unjust thou hast not succeeded ; no, not though bonfires blazed from north to south, and bells rang, and editors wrote leading articles, and the just thing lay trampled out of sight, to all mortal eyes an abolished and annihilated thing. Success ? In few years thou wilt be dead and dark,—all cold, eyeless, deaf ; no blaze of bonfires, ding-dong of bells or leading articles visible or audible to thee again at all for ever ; what kind of success is that ?

I will for a few moments point to the position in which we stand as regards trade. The position in which we stand as regards trade matters largely turns upon the position of Great Britain. Having read a good deal lately as to the trend of public feeling in Great Britain, I must admit that we have to adopt one of two alternatives, and Canada had better wake up to the fact as soon as possible. We have either to have a closer union between the members of the British empire, or we shall have to see that empire decline in power. One of these two alternatives is facing the men of Great Britain, and I am glad to see that there is a likelihood that Britain will wake up to the position, and will adopt, not a policy which will dismember the empire, but one which will consolidate it, and lead ultimately to commercial unity.

Now, it is pointed out by very prominent writers that there are only three great world powers, Great Britain, the Russian empire and the United States. Germany is making such rapid advances in commerce that the chances are that if Great Britain does not adopt a policy that will preserve her trade to her own people and that will prevent the inroads of foreign trade at no distant date the supremacy of Great Britain in commerce will be a thing of the past ; and commercial supremacy is the foundation of national supremacy. So that, we are confronted with this position, that it is all important that Great Britain should adopt the policy which would secure the union of the various parts of the British empire upon a commercial basis. Happily for Great Britain and happily for Canada there is at the present time a statesman representing the colonies who not only realizes the position of affairs but who has frequently enunciated his views and who has the determination, the hope and the ambition to bring about the commercial, and perhaps the national union of all parts of the British empire. Mr. Chamberlain said many years ago :

> If I were to ask myself the oft repeated question, whether this empire is destined to follow the empires of antiquity and to perish, and the memory of it to be forgotten, or whether we are to sink like some of our rivals into a condition of mediocrity or obscurity I confess my answer would depend not so much upon what may be done or said by the population of these small islands, but rather upon the eventual determination of that greater Britain which forms, in space at any rate, the larger portion of the empire—and upon the arrangements which they may make to bind us together in closer union.

I refer to two or three lines of an article in the contemporary 'Review.' The writer says :

> One by one the other nations gave up free trade velleities—to their own destruction, as we prophesied at the time—but none the less they have thriven on protection, nay, they have managed to give a fillip to native agriculture as well, while creating trade and industry. Nor have they stopped there; they gradually wrested many of our foreign trade outlets from us, they are now fighting us in our colonies and are invading even our home markets with their wares, while narrowing their own frontiers to ours. We know that trade is bloodless war ; yet we have laid aside our weapons, defensive and offensive, and are become inactive spectators of the premature decay of the vital forces of the nation and the empire.

After pointing out the tendency of the times, and referring particularly to the position of German trade and the utterances of German statesmen, he continues :

The time has undoubtedly come when we shall have to reconsider our attitude towards our foreign industrial competitors, our fellow subjects beyond the seas, and our whole commercial policy as well. Economic and political reasons render a change indispensable; from the insular no less than the imperial point of view a radical reform seems called for. And even military considerations bear out this conclusion; for we began by sacrificing our agriculture, the source of our food supplies in war time, for the purpose of futhering our industry, and now we are offering up our industry at the shrine of a theory which is no longer tenable.

I also refer to a line or two from an article on the Outlook of British Commerce in the 'Empire Review.' The writer deals with an article that was published by Mr. Carnegie. He says :

Need we despair then, because our political ideals have not yet so completely matured as to enable the stupendous resources we command to be systematically organized and methodically developed ? The personal element, Mr. Carnegie states we still enjoy, the 'dogged endurance,' 'the ambition to excel,' 'the will, to do or die.' Possessing these supreme qualities and controlling some 400 millions of people inhabiting nearly one fourth of the land surface of the globe, with every physical advantage and geograph cal opportunity that man can desire, so far from being pessimists, we ought to feel and understand that both in the matter of numbers and natural resources we hold all the winning cards in the great game for commercial supremacy. It only remains to decide how we must play them.

Then he goes on :

This in itself would be a source of congratulation to us were it not for the fact that our accumulative powers as a nation are now being attacked. The industrial armies of the United States are accumulating wealth more rapidly than we, and consequently the time must very shortly arrive when their bankers and financiers will be able to undersell us just as their producers and manufacturers have already done.

How then are we to protect ourselves ? Obviously by the same means that have been employed to raise the states of the American Union to their present magnificent position. Whilst the 'forty-five countries' of America have joined forces, established free trade amongst themselves, and thereby created a compact industrial army of immense strength, the fifty odd countries, colonies and dependencies which make up the British empire—with a population and territory of far greater magnitude than the United States,—are not only disunited in their political and commercial principles, but they are actually in many respects working against each other, and thereby making the way for the commercial and political ascendency of our more powerful neighbours. It is to the question of 'national unity' that we must turn our attention, a unity first of trade principle, which will prevent the sacrifice of our own commerce and that of some of our dependencies and colonies to a theory which, however advantageous when originally introduced, is unquestionably out of date and injurious when considered in relation to the developments in transport, production, and international state-aided competition with which we are now face to face. Unqualified free trade is not only misleading as a theory, but is, when considered from the political standpoint, a mischievous and dangerous principle which we cannot too quickly abandon if we desire to hold our own.

Then, he sums up in this way :

Referring to Mr. Carnegie :

——we need disturb ourselves much about the loss of prestige, for just as a short rest enables the exhausted frame to quickly regain its accustomed strength, so will a period of peace and prosperity restore power and confidence to the holders of British stock; but the question of our stationary commerce is a more serious matter, and one of those unpalatable facts which it seems impossible to explain away. The other great nations of the earth are rapidly overtaking us in the volume of commodities—raw and manufactured—which their enormous territories and expanding populations enable them to so readily produce. And if we are to hold our own in the great struggle for possession of the world's markets now in progress, we must think how we can augument the land, labour, and natural resources at our disposal. Impossible as this may seem at first glance, a moments consideration at once opens our eyes to Great Britain's coming strength—our colonies. When will the dwellers in the motherland understand that their brothers beyond the seas, are not only strong in all they require, but are anxious and proud to place that strength at the disposal of the empire ?

That, this government has sacrificed our interests by the policy of preferential trade, making us less able to give something in return for concessions we might receive, is evident to any reasonable mind. That this government has postponed the accomplishment of that commercial unity of the empire which is to be the grandest achievement of this century, is also perfectly evident. Did Australia made a jug-handled bargain for trade with Great Britain ? Not at all. Is there a doubt about the loyalty of the Australians ? The history of recent years refutes that suggestion. When the Australians came to deal with Great Britain they dealt upon a business basis like men, and they would not sacrifice their rights. I charge that no government has the right to give away a dollar of the money of the people. That money in the hands of the government is a sacred trust. And when you come to give it, not to Britain or to the empire, but to British manufacturers, then I say that kindness begins at home, and it is the duty of patriotic Canadians to think of their own country. I condemn this government directly and squarely for their action with regard to the preferential duty. When we adopted confederation we made a step towards the unity of the empire, and as Mr. Chamberlain has said, we laid the foundation for confederation in Australia which is again a stepping stone towards the unity of the whole empire. But when this government introduced its preferential trade principle they took a retrograde movement, because they put a stumbling block in the way of mutual trade concessions within the empire, and they delayed if that be possible the realization of that great hope. I do not know that I will weary the House further reading extracts, although I have a long array of matters that I believe would be reasonably improving to the members of the government. I would judge from their dumbness; from what lawyers call, the studied silence with 'malice aforethought', that they have not been studying up these great questions or else they would be prepared to enlighten public opinion. Are they the leaders of this country or not?

An hon. MEMBER. Never.

Mr. LENNOX. I believe that remark is perfectly true.

Mr. HENDERSON. Another convert.

Mr. LENNOX. Another convert, and there are converts all along the line. I feel, Sir, that this country is to some extent alive to the important questions that are being discussed in Great Britain, and her colonies, and I need not weary the House by proceeding further upon that matter. I will close by saying: that speaking, not from a political standpoint at all, I do trust that when the leader of this government goes to Great Britain and meets there the great men assembled, he will not allow any personal consideration or any love for that dead dogma of free trade, or Cobdenism to interfere with the intelligent discharge of his public duties as regards our own great country. I do urge him, that although he has not seen fit to lay before the people any large scheme to be discussed at this colonial conference, he will take the matter seriously in mind. But, whether he does or not, I can say to the members of this House and to the people of the country, that the time is coming when there are no two courses open, when Britain has to adopt the course that will unite all the parts of the empire within one broad circle. In doing so, I believe that the master minds of those great colonies will unite loyally with statesmen of Britain working out a scheme which will tend to cement the British empire, and more than verify the grand traditions of that empire. I said that things were coming our way. I think I have with some measure of success established that fact in detail. What does our way point to? Our way points to the rapid accumulation of capital and to the development of well paid labour. It points to the development in this country of great industrial energy; it points to a simultaneous concurrent advance of all our varied interests and to the development of our great natural resources. It points to Canada for Canadians; and the empire—the empire for Canadians and Britons—for us all. It points to commercial unity; comparative immunity from attack; mutual defence, if attacked, to ability to defend, and to the upbuilding of the greatest, grandest nation that the world has ever seen—a nation so grand and so majestic that the wisest statesmen of a quarter of a century ago did not even conceive of it. It points to one united empire, possessing within itself illimitable resources for every station and condition of life, and a wealth, if not beyond the wildest dreams of avarice, yet almost illimitable, wealth in everything that tends to make a nation great, contented, prosperous and free. This, I predict, is going to be the grand accomplishment of this century—the grand accomplishment of the early years of this century. I look for it; I believe in it. There are difficulties in the way, I admit. There are difficulties from without, such as the jealousies of other nations; and there are difficulties from within, such as internal jealousies and want of loyalty. But there are no difficulties which cannot be overcome; and when in the early days of this century—ay, within the lifetime of our present Sovereign—there will be secured this grand unity of the empire, and the world around, then, with a new meaning, a new fervour and a renewed loyalty will ascend from hundreds of millions of loyal British subjects the anthem and the prayer, 'God bless King Edward the Seventh! God save our gracious King!'

Mr. F. B. WADE (Annapolis). Mr. Speaker, I feel at this period of the debate that I owe the House an apology for rising to my feet to take part in the discussion; but, Sir, the matters that have been placed before the House, the questions that have been raised and the issues that have been provoked are of such a nature that I feel that I cannot, in justice to the constituency I have the honour to represent, remain entirely quiet. I fear, however, that a great disappointment is in store for the House, after listening to the able speech which has just been delivered. I fear that I shall not be able to engage the attention of the House for half the time the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has done. Neither must you expect me, in view of my proportions, to float on the sunbeams or waltz on the rainbows as he has done; but I shall have to keep myself upon terra firma. There are some sentences in his speech which have disappointed me. You know I am a bit of an optimist. I look with confidence at the great prosperity of Canada. I thought that we were now on the crest of the wave, and that it was going to continue. But I find that I was all wrong. I find that there will be no prosperity in the Dominion of Canada until the great Liberal-Conservative party has again come into power; and then I sigh to myself and say, 'How long, electors, oh, how long will this great hour delay?' Royalty in England the other day commanded Britons to awake, and yet they slumbered on; the even tenor of their way was not disturbed. But, Sir, the stentorian voice of the hon. member for South Simcoe

(Mr. Lennox) has commanded Britons to awake ; and I dare to prophesy that a wave of insomnia will spread over that land which will enhance the price of narcotics twofold. I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman has been content with exterminating the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) the giant of Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). It is true he did not quite demolish the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, but he left history to complete the job ; the gigantic form of the hon. member for Guysborough has shrunken to mean proportions ; while the hon. member for North Norfolk is on his knees crawling across the House, and begging for admission to the ranks of the opposition.

It would be presumption on my part to endeavour to follow the line of argument of the hon. gentleman who has preceded me. Therefore, I will try to address myself in a quiet way to matters which I conceive to be of interest, not only to my constituents, but to the country at large. There is a sharp and clear issue before the House. I cannot say that it is raised by the resolution which has been moved by the hon. leader of the opposition ; but certainly it has been presented to us by hon. gentlemen on each side of the House. That issuse is : Shall there—or shall there not—be a greater measure of protection in the Dominion of Canada ? Protection, as I understand it, and as I believe the country understands it, and as I believe everybody will admit, is protection for the manufacturers. Now, Sir, in all well-considered measures that may be presented by a government, or passed by parliament, the underlying principle is that the greatest amount of good shall be accomplished to the greatest number of people, and the least possible harm shall be done. Taking that as the platform from which we must consider this question, it is well for us to consider how many people are interested in this question on the one side or the other—how many are manufacturers, and how many are found in other occupations and other conditions of life ? I have been at some pains to get some data on this point. I have been examining the census of 1891, which I have been told and led to believe is not quite reliable. I find myself unable from that census to ascertain the exact number of the different trades and industries, because they have not been grouped ; but I have obtained sufficient data for my argument. There are 1,659,355 represented as being persons having an occupation. Of these 790,210 are agriculturists, fishermen, and miners. Domestic and personal servants are 246,183, those in manufacturing and mechanical industries are 320,001 ; profesions, 63,280 ; trade and transportation, 186,695 ; non-productive, 52,986 ; or a total of 1,659,355. But I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that while under the head of manufactures we have 320,000, that heading includes not only manufacturers in the strict sense of the term, but all mechanical industries, including, so far as I am able to discover, lumbermen, carpenters, blacksmiths, shoemakers, machinists, plumbers, engineers, firemen, and thousands of other people. So that it is safe for us to say that of the 320,000, not more are real or genuine manufacturers than 160,000 ; and I am further borne out in this conclusion by the fact that when I turn to the trade and navigation returns and look at the exports for the year 1901, I find that in them there were : products of the mine, $40,000,000 ; products of the fisheries, $10,000,000 ; products of the forest, $30,000,000 ; animals and their products, $85,000,000 ; agricultural products, $38,000,000 ; manuufactures, $17,000,000. So that we have a grand total of exports, amounting to $191,000,000, of the products of Canada, as against only $17,000,000 of her manufactures. I am only dealing with these figures for the purpose of giving prominence to my point, that when we come to deal with the interests of the people of Canada, we must deal with them relatively, and formulate and adopt a policy which will accomplish the greatest amount of good to the largest number of people. And when we have, upon one hand, a population representing anywhere from 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the whole people, as compared with a population, on the other hand, representing only 10 per cent to 15 per cent, it is our duty to consider as paramount the interests of the larger percentage. That being so, is it not proper that we should, in formulating our policy, consider the interests of the agriculturists, the miners, the fishermen, the lumbermen, the labourers, the professional men and all the others, as well as the interests of the manufacturers. But there are many hon. gentlemen on the other side who seem to imagine that there is but one class in this Dominion which should be considered. I have read the resolution proposed by the hon. the leader of the opposition :

> This House, regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory, is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, as will at all times secure the Canadian market for the Canadians.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WADE. Some hon. gentlemen cheer this. Well, I will pause to hear whether they will say 'hear, hear' after I have made a few remarks further on this point. I would like to know how the hon. the leader of the opposition proposes to protect the interests of the farmer. I am speaking now more particularly with regard to the farmers of the maritime provinces, because I am more familiar with their conditions than with those of the farmers of the western provinces. I would like to understand how my hon. friend proposes to protect the interests of the farmers of the maritime provinces or of our miners, lumbermen or fishermen. I make bold to say that in the whole tariff list there is but one solitary item which has the slightest bearing upon the interests of the farmers down by the sea. I refer to the item of hams and bacon. Prince Edward Island, to a considerable extent, and New Brunswick, to a smaller extent, do produce hams and bacons, and the duties upon these articles may afford them some satisfaction, but leaving these products aside, and taking all the other agricultural articles, I defy any gentleman opposite to show how our farmers in the eastern provinces are benefited by the tariff in the slightest degree.

I have here a list of all the dutiable articles of farm produce. I have gone through the tariff as carefully as possible, and will read the result, though, of course, I may possibly have omitted something. That list comprises :

> Animals, except for improvement of stock ; live hogs, bacons, hams and shoulders, beans, salt beef, butter, cheese, cider, cracked corn and wheat, cranberries, plums and quinces, cucumbers, dried vegetables, eggs, flour and meal, fowls, fruit (raspberries), other berries, hay, meats, milk foods, pickles, potatoes, sheepskins.

That is the list. Take the lower provinces, the only competition which the farmer of Nova Scotia to-day has to meet is the competition of the Prince Edward Islander who comes there with ham, bacon, turnips, potatoes and oats, and sells huge quantities of them and the Ontario farmer whose butter, cheese, beef, mutton and lamb and poultry come to us in striking competition. These are the only people we have to compete with ; there is no competition from the outside at all. Who ever heard of such a thing in the maritime provinces as the importation of any of these articles from the United States, or any other foreign country?

Then I come to the miners. Will some hon. gentleman on the other side be good enough to inform me where the miner is protected ? Every article that enters into his daily consumption is taxed, and taxed heavily, and there is not a solitary thing which he can produce which can be protected beyond those we have on the tariff at present.

But before leaving the farmers, let me refer for a moment to something an hon. and very fair minded gentleman on the other side said during this debate. He said that we had given protection to the farmers because we had not repealed these duties. Why, in the name of all that is reasonnable, if there be any stray corners in the Dominion—and I presume there are some in Ontario and New Brunswick and in Prince Edward Island, as I have said—where the farmers draw some measure of comfort from our tariff should we withdraw from these farmers consideration ? Must we take that from them and give them nothing in return ? Is it only the interests of the manufacturers that are to be considered ? That idea I contend is not a good one.

The same remark applies to the fishermen and the day labourers and to other walks in life.

We are told that we must prevent Canada being made a slaughter market for American manufacturers. Well, this with us down in Nova Scotia is a tender point. It was prophesied when the scheme of confederation was first mooted, that its effect would be to destroy our infant manufactures. The result has verified that prophesy, because the larger manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec came down to Nova Scotia with their goods and under sold our men, and the result was that nearly every factory in Nova Scotia was closed up. Nor did the competition stop there. Nearly the whole of our wholesale dry goods business was closed up by the fact that the larger houses in Ontario and Quebec doing an immense business, were able to come down there and under-sell our men and force them to close their doors. Any man within the sound of my voice, who is at all familiar with the conditions in Nova Scotia, knows what I say to be true, knows that we were obliged, in consequence of the union with these other provinces, to almost entirely change our conditions of life. We did do so. We have changed them, and we are now upon another sound basis and prepared to stand by things as they are.

But there is one idea that suggests itself to my mind with regard to this slaughter market, and which I have never heard come from hon. gentlemen on the other side. Suppose I am correct in my statement that 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the population of Canada are non-manufacturers, and suppose that they are correct in their statement that American manufacturers are making a slaughter market of the Dominion, that the Americans are selling here hundreds of millions of dollars worth of manufactured goods at slaughter prices, is it not self-evident that 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the people of Canada are consequently getting the goods cheaper than do the American people, living in the country where they are manufactured ? I think that idea is commencing to dawn upon the American public. I believe they now begin to see that the very goods that are sold in Canada for a certain figure they are obliged to buy at a largely advanced price. In other words, the manufacturers of the United States who have been able to build this tariff wall ; have been able to say : 'This territory is ours, and we may charge such prices as we see fit, and then we will go into the markets of the world, and, having the advantage of wresting from our own people these extravagant prices to place ourselves in a position to compete upon more advantageous terms with the outside world.'

Take the matter of locomotives; take the matter of steel bridges; of steel rails or railway cars. These are being sold by the United States manufacturers in Spain, in Egypt, in India, and in other foreign markets; and I undertake to say that the manufacturers are selling these goods in those markets at lower prices than they are selling them at in their own market. Let me give another illustration of the working of this high tariff. Cross Lake Huron from the Ontario side, and what do you see? You see Canadian lumber going in there and paying a duty of $2 a thousand feet, and selling at the same price as the American article. It is bought by the Standard Oil Company. In their great works they are using I do not know how many millions of feet every year, making it into boxes for the shipment of their products to all parts of the world. Why do they use Canadian lumber? Because when they ship out this lumber thus made into boxes, they receive a rebate of 90 per cent of duty paid, or $1.80 per thousand, giving them just that much advantage. Who, then, gets the advantage of this high tariff wall? The great monopolists, such as the Standard Oil Company, are the parties who reap the benefit of it. Not only the Standard Oil Company, but other large manufacturers are using enormous quantities of Canadian lumber and getting the rebate in this way. I only mention this to illustrate the fact that the people are being deceived by this idea of high protection. It is not the producer who is always benefited; it is not the consumer who is always injured, provided that that consumer is a big corporation that can control its affairs in the manner I have indicated.

I do not intend to weary the House by speaking on this question. But I think it is my duty to say this, and to say it forcibly, that, while there are differences of opinion on this side as to what should be the exact tariff, there are all interests represented here. There are men representing constituencies who would be delighted to have certain industries protected; there are men who would like to have the broadest measure of free trade. And all have a perfect right to stand here and urge, each one, the interest of the constituency he represents with the utmost vigour. But, I am thankful to say that, on this side of the House, we have a body of men who are willing to 'give and take,' and we are all united upon a tariff which will result in the greatest measure of good to all. There is no man to-day who says that Canada can have absolute free trade. We know that a revenue must be raised, and we know that that revenue can only be raised—or ought only to be raised, that is, it is better that it should be raised—by a tariff. Therefore, it is our duty to meet and agree upon such a tariff as will accomplish this result, and that we have done. Now, gentlemen, on the other side say that we have falsified our promises.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. WADE. An hon. gentleman on the other side says 'Hear, hear.' They said that before 1900. They went to the people and said that. And what answer did they receive? Surely that should have satisfied them. But it does not appear to have satisfied them. The cry of 'Canada for the Canadians,' reverberated through these halls years ago. It was a master hand that first penned that phrase, and he used it to good advantage. But, when we came into power in 1896, and when this government simply carried out in 1897 the pledges it had given to the country, what was the first position taken by hon. gentlemen on the other side? They said: You are going to ruin all the industries of Canada. Then this great wail went up from Montreal, and we were to have soup kitchens everywhere from Nova Scotia to Vancouver to feed the starving people who would be thrown out of employment by the government's policy. But this did not materialize. The record of this parliament teems with the speeches made by the hon. gentlemen of the other side prophsying these doleful things. And when they found that, not only were the factories not closed, but that business had been given a fillip, that the manufacturers were increasing and that business people had more confidence, what then? Why they simply turned about and said: These are our garments that you have stolen; this is our tariff. And they have continued that cry, until this session. But, this winter, they come forward and say: Oh, this is not right; we must now have a declared policy. A 'declared' policy, mark you. Last winter, they wanted a 'pronounced' policy, and with that demand they met the electors of Nova Scotia. With what result? With the result that the leader of the opposition in the parliament of Nova Scotia is fortunate enough to have one man to second his resolutions. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), a gentleman for whom I have the greatest respect, organized this campaign in the province of Nova Scotia. He went to demand that 'pronounced policy,' first, I believe, to the county of Lunenburg, a county in which, in spite of all our efforts in 1900, my hon. and genial friend Col. Kaulbach, was returned with a majority of something over 230. But when this 'pronounced policy' was put before the people of that magnificent county in terms which only the leader of the opposition could employ, what was the result? The result was that they did not want very much of that 'pronounced policy,' and the supporters of the Liberal government were returned with a majority of over 700. The next place this 'pronounced policy' was used, I believe, was the county of Annapolis. I happened to be passing on a train and saw my hon. friend addressing a large crowd at Middleton. I regretted that I had not time to stay to hear him, but was compelled to go on, having business further down the line. I was able to squeeze into this House with a majority of 152. But when the people of Annapolis had digested that 'pronounced policy,' the candidates of the Liberal party were returned with majorities of about 500. So the matter ran all over the province of Nova Scotia. And we have come back here 'pronounced policy.' Somebody says there has been a mistake, that that resolution last winter was a mistake, that there was something wrong about it. I fancy it was the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) who suggested that they had better call it now 'a declared policy.' So now we have got a 'declared policy,' and upon that these gentlemen are going to the country again.

It does not seem to me, Sir, that it is about time that our friends on the other side roused themselves to a realization of the fact that it does not belong to them exclusively to cry, 'Canada for the Canadians.' Have we not just as much right as they have to cry 'Canada for the Canadians?' We may differ from them in our policy, but surely they will be just enough to admit that in adopting this policy we have done that which we deemed and what has proved best in the interest of Canada. I say, it is somewhat impertinent on their part to arrogate to themselves the sole right of shouting, 'Canada for the Canadians.' It is on a par with the position that they took years gone by when they arrogated to themselves the whole of the loyalty in the Dominion of Canada. You will remember that after the speech made by our leader in Montreal, after the elections of 1896, there was a general expression of surprise in the English papers at the sentiments of that speech. Why, they said, 'this man is loyal to the empire.' It was a matter of surprise to them. Why? Because the Conservative papers of Canada had so frequently and for so many years declared that the whole Liberal party were annexationists, that they were, in the words of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, looking to Washington, that they were traitors to the empire—and the English press was surprised to see how false those statements had been. I say that is something of which the Conservative party ought to be ashamed. No man need to stand on the floor of parliament or elsewhere in this country and declare that he is loyal. For my part I consider that the self-proclaimed loyalist, the self-proclaimed patriot, is a man that needs watching. Every man is supposed to be loyal in this whole empire; and the individual who declares that any party is disloyal, or that any group of citizens is disloyal, that man himself is disloyal to the best interests of Canada.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that I should be considered failing in my duty if I did not say something on the apple question; and as it is now nearly six o'clock, I beg to call your attention to the fact.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at 8 o'clock.

Mr. WADE. Mr. Speaker, it would not be necessary for me to have made any remarks, certainly not any extended remarks, in regard to the fruit industry, but for certain somewhat extraordinary statements which were made here a few days ago by the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith). Last session there was considerable discussion in regard to the fruit business in the Annapolis valley in the province of Nova Scotia. I wish to say here that in any discussion I propose to engage in concerning that industry I would like to lift it beyond the pale of party politics. This is a great industry, one of the most important in my native province and in the constituency I have the honour to represent, and I do think, Sir, that we can best serve the interests of the fruit growers of Nova Scotia as well as the fruit growers of the whole of the Dominion of Canada if we approach the discussion of the matters that are of interest to them, from a non-political standpoint. I, therefore, wish to say that I regret that the remarks of the hon. member for Wentworth were not free from political considerations, and that he endeavoured to cast upon the government the burden of all the misfortunes that are attendant upon the present conditions in regard to the fruit industry. He made some remarks that I believe will be regarded as somewhat startling. In the first place he informed the House that Nova Scotia this year had the only good crop of apples grown in the country. This is rather a remarkable statement coming from the hon. gentleman who lives in a part of this Dominion, which at the time when the Annapolis valley was first producing apples in abundance his county was traversed only by the aborigines. The crop of the Annapolis valley was barely an average one. It was good. It was strikingly good, but to have this hon. gentleman publish to the world that this great industry which was established by the French away back in 1600 and odd that its first good crop was last year is rather discouraging. Then, he blames the government for all the difficulties in connection with the transhipment of apples. He says the people there are dissatisfied, and that they are censuring the government. He attempts to, and does read resolutions from fruit growers associations and boards of trade to support—but which entirely failed to support—his charge, and then he tells us about the sad condition of affairs in Annapolis valley. That was rather startling, it was amusing to hear the hon. gentleman talk about the sad condition of affairs in the Annapolis valley where the people this year have put into their pockets over a million dollars as the outcome of their orchards. Then he cites as his authority for all this dissatisfaction, Mr. Peter Innes. Mr. Peter Innes is a very estimable Scotch gentleman. It would be well for me to say who Peter Innes is, because he is the authority that is taken by the hon. member for South Wentworth to represent the true state of feeling in the Annapolis valley. I wish to preface my remarks by saying that it is absolutely incorrect to say that there is the slightest dissatisfaction with the government in the Annapolis valley, and by the Annapolis valley I mean the counties of Annapolis, King's and Hants, in regard to either the apple business or the transportation question concerning it. Now, Mr. Peter Innes was for a number of years the manager of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, now the Dominion Atlantic Railway. That railway to-day is the only outlet for the valley to the sea coast where the apples are transhipped to the steamers. During this regime the farmers and fruit growers of the Annapolis valley claimed that his heart was as adamant towards them. The rates that he demanded were extortionate and they continued in that way until he ceased to be manager and another man took the rein of affairs. Then he became a grand reformer. These rates were ridiculously high. He demanded that they should be cut down at once. And what is the explanation he gave? He says :—In the days when I managed the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, apples were a luxury ; now they are a necessity. In the same way the hon. member for South Wentworth stood by the late government when they did nothing for the farmers, virtually, when they did nothing for the fruit growers, and supported them, having no fault to find with them whatever. But when his party was defeated, when his government was turned from power and when the present administration took upon itself the reins of government, the hon. member for South Wentworth became a great reformer. He demands everything from the government now and he is not willing to give them that credit which they deserve. To read his speech and to listen to his remarks one would suppose that it was the bounden duty of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) to go down through the province of Nova Scotia, to go to the ports of Halifax, St. John and Montreal and there, himself, see to it that the apples were stored on board the steamers that were properly ventilated, to see that they were properly stowed on the steamers and to accompany the ships on their voyage across the Atlantic ocean. I say that the government cannot undertake such a duty or responsibility as that. We might with equal justice demand that the hon. member for South Wentworth should assume responsibility for that Mr. Onderdonk, from Ontario, who went down to the valley last year, purchased on credit some $80,000 worth of fruit, stored it in a warehouse and then gave a bill of sale of that fruit to his creditors by which the farmers were robbed of $80,000 of their money. I say that all the farmers and fruit growers ask is that the government of the Dominion of Canada shall aid them as far as they can in securing proper transportation of their fruit from this side to the other side. Then the hon. gentleman made another statement here. I am sorry he made it because it is not correct. He says :

> Within the last twenty-four hours there has been a deputation of Nova Scotia fruit growers in this House to protest against the condition of things and complain that the government have neglected their duty.

I had the privilege of coming from the province of Nova Scotia in company with and conversing with them from the time we left Halifax until we arrived here. I secured a vast amount of useful information from them. I had the pleasure of going with that delegation to a conference with the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher), the deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) and not only is the statement that they complained of the action of the government untrue, but Mr. Ralph Eaton, the foremost orchardist in the lower provinces, after making a very exhaustive speech in connection with this matter, took occasion to say that he was grateful to the government for what they have done in connection with the agricultural interests, that he was grateful to the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and that he knew that they had his entire sympathy and that he was prepared to do anything and everything he could for them. That is the true situation with regard to the great fruit industry in the Annapolis valley.

Now, Sir, who is he who will be bold enough to say, that the government can come in and remedy all these evils that are existing ? Any man who knows aught about this matter knows, that all the government can do is to grant a subsidy in order to ensure the rapid and proper transit of fruit from the province of Nova Scotia, or from the Dominion of Canada to the other side of the Atlantic. This they have done. Last year and for a number of years they have been giving this subsidy to the Furness-Whithy Company. There was some discussion about the matter last year, and more stringent provisions were incorporated in the contract that was entered into between the government and that steamship company. Last year the company agreed to give the following service—I am reading from the contract :

The contractors will on the 1st of July next, after the date of these presents, place on the route between the Port of St. John, in the province of New Brunswick and the port of London in England, the following steamers :—The 'Evangeline,' the 'Loyalist' and the 'Dahomey'; and with these or with other good steamers sanctioned by the minister, maintained for the period of one year a regular service between these ports at fixed dates at regular intervals of not over fifteen days.

The balance of this contract was carefully drawn. It was supposed by the fruit owners that if these ships, or ships of a like character, could be employed in that trade, the business woud be properly served. I believe that if those ships had been employed and if the stowage of the fruit had been properly attended to there would have been no complaint and no dissatisfaction. In fact, I have here on my brief statements from the leading orchardists in that province supporting that contention, but I am sorry to say that the Furness-Whithy Company did not carry out their contract. In the first place, they were careless about the handling of the fruit from the cars to the steamer. In the next place, they piled the fruit sometimes eleven tiers deep in their steamers with the result, as any body would know—there being no intervening dunnage between the barrels—that the whole pressure of eight or nine barrels coming on the lower ones would spring the bilges of the barrels and bruised nearly every apple in them. Any lawyer knows that the persons who held bills of lading from these steamers would be in a position to maintain an action for damages against the company, but what could the government do ? There is only one thing the government could do and that was, to withhold from that steamship company the subsidy, and we are told that the subsidy has been withheld. But this is not all that this Furness-Whithy Company did. They ran these three splendid steamers for a part of the year; they sold two of them, withdrew the third from the service, and filled their places with inferior steamers without first getting the sanction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as provided for by this contract. That is the cause of complaint throughout the Annapolis valley—not against the government, but against this Furness-Whithy Company which has violated its contract.

What can the government do ? All that they can do is to withhold from the company the balance of the subsidy that has not been paid. I have not approached this matter, Sir, in any controversial spirit, and neither has the hon. Dr. Borden, the representative of King's county, nor Dr. Russell, the representative of Hants. But, after listening to what has been stated by these representatives of the fruit growers, we have had conferences with the minister and we have asked him, in order to secure the proper carrying out of such provisions as we deem necessary, that in the next contract which is entered into between the government and any company that is to carry this fruit from Canada to the other side, certain stipulations shall be incorporated in that contract. The conditions that we have asked for and which meet with the approval of the representatives of the fruit growers are these :

That if the fruit trade, in the opinion of the minister requires it, the minister would insist upon the company increasing the service to intervals of every ten days instead of fifteen days. Such steamships when carrying fruit shall be run at an average of twelve knots an hour.

Many people have demanded that the steamers shall be run at a higher rate of speed, but after a great deal of discussion it was shown that a steamer running at twelve knots an hour will make the trip in something less than ten days, and that is considered to be all that is necessary.

Said steamships when carrying fruit shall be ventilated by forced draft in the most effective manner, to the satisfaction of the Minister, and so as to secure as uniform and cool a temperature as possible. And the Minister may require the company to instal in and upon such steamships theographs to record the temperature.

The handling, loading, stowage and unloading of fruit shall be under the supervision of an officer appointed or named by the Minister, if he deems it desirable.

Said steamships shall not carry between any decks more than five tiers of barrels of apples, that is, there shall not be resting on any one tier of barrels of apples more than four others, unless the same is arranged in such a manner as to relieve the barrels of the extra weight.

I may say in this connection, that the dangerous months in the transhipment of fruit are the months of September and October. During the month of September the temperature between the port of Halifax and the port of London averages something over 59 degrees—I think it is 59·7. During the month of October the temperature averages slightly over 58 degrees. Now, the fruit growers are of opinion that without any cool air chambers and without any refrigeration, but with simply forced draft taking the cool air from outside and circulating it through the vessel, there can be a temperature maintained of about 60 degrees, which is all that is necessary in order to carry the fruit without any loss or damage. That is what they are asking. They are asking simply that these conditions shall be imposed upon the parties to whom the Dominion subsidy is granted. If the subsidy which is now granted is too small, then we make bold to ask the government to make it somewhat larger; and if we are met by the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) in the spirit in which he has met all applications on behalf of the agriculturists of this country, then we have every reason to believe that our request will be granted and that the fruit growers of the Annapolis valley will be satisfied with the result. At any rate, our people are willing to give this forced draft air circulation a fair trial for a year or two, and then if it proves not to be efficient they will come back to parliament and say: We were mistaken, and we ask to have something else done. I submit that it is not fair, in view of what has been done by the Minister of Agriculture, in view of the interest that has been taken by himself personally and by the government in this matter, to censure him or to censure the government, or to say that there is the slightest dissatisfaction with the minister or with the government so far as the people in the valley of the Annapolis are concerned.

There is one other question which is of somewhat vital importance to the people there, and that is the question of railway freight rates on apples. The statement was made by this same delegation to the Minister of Railways; or rather it was at a hearing before him, and what they desired was placed before him by myself in a letter. They are asking that the classification so far as apples are concerned shall be changed. It is now 'three' and 'five,' and they ask that it shall be made 'five' and 'eight,' the same as flour. Of course, the request for a change in the classification of fruits on a railway is a matter of great importance, because that classification is made for the whole Dominion, and we could scarcely hope that the fruit growers of the Annapolis valley could of themselves come here and secure a classification for the whole Dominion unless they were supported. I requested the Minister of Railways to forward this application of mine to the different transportation companies interested; and, after receiving their replies, I hope that other agricultural societies interested throughout the province of Ontario would take the matter up and press the government for this change. I believe that what they ask is fair and reasonable. I can see no reason why apples should not be carried at as low a rate as flour. That is the whole apple question, and a correct statement of the feelings of the people in the county of Annapolis. Last winter there was an Act passed here in reference to apple inspection. That Act has given a great deal of satisfaction. I do not care to discuss it to-night. There is a good deal of divergence of opinion as to whether certain amendments should be made to that Act this year or not; but the consensus of opinion is that we had better try it for another year to see how it works. It is a step in the right direction, and the people are grateful to the Minister of Agriculture, who introduced it. So much for the apple question.

There are one or two other matters which I would like to say a few words about. I wish to remark upon some of the statements made by the hon. leader of the opposition when he moved the resolution now under discussion. I will not dwell as long as I intended to upon that matter, but there are some things I must refer to. There were two statements made by the hon. leader of the opposition which struck me most forcibly. He stated that it was necessary for us to have a declared policy, notwithstanding the fact that we have a declared policy which we have been acting upon for five years, a policy which has stood the test of a vehement political contest and has come off with flying colours; and why does he say so? Because, he asks, 'without it how can we expect men to put their money into the industries of the country with any confidence'? Surely the hon. gentleman must have forgotten himself for a moment when he made this remark. Afraid to put their money into the industries of the Dominion of Canada! Why, Sir, to-day we have men tumbing over each other to secure the industrial and other stocks of the Dominion of Canada. In the province of Nova Scotia this year I have seen property after property sell at 4 or 5 or 6 or even 10 times what they would have sold for in 1897. We have the great industries in the province of Nova Scotia developed as no man had any idea a few years ago that they would be developed. Look at the great Dominion Coal Company. I remember when the premier of Nova Scotia, our present Finance Minister, introduced the legislation of 1894 which brought into existence that great corporation; and what was he met with? The Conservative press of the province of Nova Scotia united in saying that he was handing over the coal mines of Nova Scotia to American speculators, who would close them up and destroy our whole coal industry. A short time previous to that the whole revenue derived by the province from minerals amounted to $120,000. To-day the revenue from the same source has reached over half a million dollars. We have seen the value of the stock of the Dominion Coal Company rushing up 10, 15, sometimes 20 points in a day. And yet the hon. gentleman tells us that people will have no confidence in our industries. Look at the record of the Dominion Steel Company and the Nova Scotia Steel Company. Look at the fact that capitalists have been coming from the United States to buy our railroads. Some gentlemen say that they are coming over to buy everything we have. And yet the hon. leader of the opposition says that in consequence of this policy of ours no one has any confidence in the industries of the Dominion of Canada. Never since the Dominion has been a Dominion has there been even a percentage of the confidence that the financial world has in Canada to-day. It was only a few years ago, I remember it well, when, if you went into the financial markets of New York with a scheme, no matter how tempting it might be, the moment you mentioned that it was from Nova Scotia, that moment you were turned down and never considered. But to-day, 'Nova Scotia' is the gilt-edged scheme that takes. I am free to admit that the great iron and steel industry of Cape Breton has been fostered to a certain extent by this government. The government has given it a bonus, and properly so. Cape Breton island is the great storehouse of the mineral wealth of this Dominion. We are not in a position to estimate what the future holds for that island. The people of Cape Breton have for years contributed their part towards the building up of manufactures and it was but a measure of justice to grant the bounty on iron in order to give their industries a start.

Another thing seemed to trouble the hon. leader of the opposition. He told us that unless we changed our policy and adopted a declared policy, we should become a pastoral and agricultural people. When he said that, it did convey some horrors to my mind. I would not like to live in a purely pastoral community. I think the only animal I have that I could lead to pastures green has seen some thirty winters. I would not cut much of a figure with a shepherd's crook. I believe the hon. leader of the opposition is one ahead of me, because I understand that he has a cow. In this connection I was looking at Ely's Political Economy,' in which he tells us :

> When hunting tribes begin to domesticate animals they enter usually upon the pastoral stage. The earliest chapters of the Bible give us vivid pictures of peoples living in this period of economic development.

He goes on to cite from the Scriptures a passage which, if reports be true with regard to certain dissensions on the other side, would, with a slight change of the names of the principal parties, be appropriate to this occasion. He cites from the 13th chapter of Genesis these words :

> Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold. . . . . And Lot also, which went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents. And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together : for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together. And there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle. . . . . And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee and between my herdmen and thy herdmen. Is not the whole land before thee ? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me : If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left.

If my information is correct, this has an application to-day ; though I am prepared to learn that I have been misinformed. But it is rather a startling proposition to us members down by the sea to be told that we have to become a pastoral people—we with our great fishing industry, our great mining industry, our great farming and lumbering industries, our great steel industry—unless, forsooth, we have a 'declared' policy. We have been living in hopes and have now the almost certain assurance that our old ship building industry—the wooden ship building industry—will, in the near future, be revived in the form of steel ship building, and to-day I am informed that there is in the province of Nova Scotia a representative of one of the largest and most influential ship building firms on the Clyde, who is there for the purpose of arranging for the building of steamships in that province. Why should we not build steel ships ? We have there all that is necessary. We have inexhaustible mines of coal and iron and all the things necessary in order to produce steel cheaper than it can be produced anywhere else in the world. I am informed on the very best authority that before August of this year the Dominion Steel Company will be producing 1,000 tons of steel per day which will yield to that company a profit of $8,000 per day, or over $2,000,000 net profit per year. Yet we are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that if we do not resort to tariff tinkering, we are going to become a pastoral people.

Mr. LAVELL. Does that include the bounty ?

Mr. WADE. That includes the bounty, and the people of Cape Breton are very grateful for that bounty, and I repeat that the giving of it was only what they deserved. They have given bounties to manufacturers, and were entitled to receive from the government some recognition, and they have received it. And in consequence of that bounty, this great industry has been built up in their midst, which has not only benefited Cape Breton and Nova Scotia but the whole Dominion, and is lifting the Dominion into the gaze of the world to-day as the possibly greatest steel and iron producer in the world.

And I say that the bounties which have been given to create this industry has been one of the wisest provisions ever made by any government of Canada.

Mr. HACKETT. Is that steel suitable for the making of steel rails ?

Mr. WADE. I never made a steel rail in my life, but I believe it will make the very best kind of steel rails. However, if the hon. gentleman has any doubts he can go down there and have a steel rail made and see how it works.

I wish to refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). I believe that the House looks upon the hon. member as one of the ablest men who sits on that side. Certainly his speeches are very clear and forcible. I believe that he has been in advance of his party all along, because in 1891 he discovered and declared that the national policy was a delusion and a snare and that what Canada required was a large measure of free trade. And the other night, after he had spoken for an hour or two, he came to the conclusion that he had not much, if any, fault to find with the present tariff, and that we should be grateful for it to the government. His actual words were :—

Although I am prepared to say this, as a protectionist, that I am not altogether disposed to find much fault in the gross with present system, which is very fair in its effects, and it has done a great deal to maintain the interests of the country.

When we find one of the leading members on the other side giving such an endorsation of the policy and tariff of the government, we need not worry very much about what some of the others opposite may say. I might go on and quote further from the remarks of the hon. gentleman in the same connection, but he fell into one serious error. He declared that every man in this House was a protectionist, to some extent or other. That is absolutely not correct. There are men on this side who are protectionists to a certain degree and there are others who wish to be free traders as far as they possibly can. They have to meet upon a ground of compromise. And if a readjustment of the tariff has to take place in the future, I suppose that a compromise will be necessary. And when that readjustment takes place, I wish to say that if I then have the honour to be in this House, I shall be here asking for a further reduction in the duty on kerosine oil and some reduction in the duties upon tobacco and sundry other things, and I believe that we will all have to meet each other in the spirit of mutual compromise and do the best we can to satisfy each other, consistently with serving the best interests of the country.

The hon. leader of the opposition made some reference to reciprocity and retaliation. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) said that all good things were going the way of hon. gentlemen opposite, and he instanced the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who believes in reciprocity and retaliation. But the leader of the opposition took good care to declare that he did not believe in reciprocity or retaliation, and his words in this connection are somewhat peculiar. He said :—

I am not prepared to say that we want reciprocity in natural products with the United States at the present time. In that I disagree with my hon. friend from North Norfolk. There was a period during which such reciprocity was desirable, and during which it would have been a benefit to this country. That period may or may not have passed away. That period probably has passed. What I object to, in any principle of reciprocity of tariffs or retaliation of tariffs, is, that it may bind us to put our tariff down.

That is what was troubling the leader of the opposition. He thinks that reciprocity or retaliation, one or the other, may cause us to lower our tariff in the future and so admit American goods. There is no spirit, I believe, in Canada to-day in favour of reciprocity. I believe that this Dominion has grown until it has become so lusty that we do not care whether we have reciprocity or not. We feel that we can live without our neighbours to the south. There was a period in the past when it seemed to us in Nova Scotia to be our only salvation. But happily that moment has passed away. When the hon. Minister of Finance was premier of Nova Scotia he inaugurated and carried through such a policy as placed that province on a basis of independence to the United States, and to-day we are prepared to meet the United States on a fair basis, but we are not going to plead for reciprocity now because we can live without them. At the same time I doubt whether it would be wise for us to throw down the gauntlet and say we are going to inaugurate a policy of retaliation. It is not necessary that we should do so, it is not seemly or dignified or statesmanlike. We must meet the conditions as they arrive, and I believe that the present condition will be remedied by the Americans themselves. They are beginning to feel that the consumers of the United States are being bled by the manufacturers, while 85 per cent of our people are being benefited by getting goods cheaper in consequence.

I wish to say a word or two with regard to the Intercolonial Railway, directing my remarks to one or two statements made by hon. gentlemen on the other side. These gentlemen have asserted that this is the only railway in the Dominion of Canada that is not paying to-day. Does any of these hon. gentlemen speak for the Conservative party ? And is he prepared to urge the government to impose the condition that will make the Intercolonial Railway a commercial success—that is to increase the freight rates to make them equal to those of other roads ? Is there a man on the other side who will take that stand ? If that is done, the Intercolonial Railway can be made a paying concern. But I believe the country will back me up when I say that we are under great obligations to the present Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair) for the change that has taken place in the administration of that road. It is but a few years ago when the service on that road was most wretched, such a service as the travelling public would not submit to to-day. The deficit of the road—then some 863 miles in operation—was larger than the deficit to-day. Everybody knows that the deficit can be wiped out if you make the service less efficient than it should be. To-day, we are operating over 1,300 miles of railway on the Intercolonial Railway system. We have a service on that road that cannot be excelled on the continent, I do not care where you go—a perfect road bed, magnificent engines, beautiful parlour cars, a splendid dining car service, and every possible convenience.

It is known by every one that the freight rates upon that road are very low, lower than a commercial rate. But, Sir, who is profiting by that low rate ? Do not let it be supposed for a moment that the maritime provinces are profiting by it. I tell you that the upper provinces profit most by it, because it enables them to bring their products down to the maritime provinces and sell them in competition with those of the people there. Now, as to this deficit, let me point out one or two items. For instance, the fuel in 1896 cost $408,861, and in 1901 the fuel cost $973,268, an increase of $564,407. The repairs in 1896 cost $815,044, and in 1901 this item amounted to $1,322,001, a difference of $507,957. These two items alone represent an increase of $1,072,364. Then there is the difference in wages. Of course, there had to be an increase in the wages bill with the increased mileage. In 1896 the wages bill amounted to $863,057, less than in 1901.

An hon. MEMBER. Wages have gone up, too.

Mr. WADE. I was just going to remark, that, in consequence of the increase of wages in other vocations, occasioned by the great wave of prosperity that has swept over this Dominion, the Intercolonial Railway is obliged to pay larger wages. We find that the increase of expense in running that road was $1,925,000. But, Sir, upon the other side we have an increase in earnings of $1,993,000. Therefore, while the cost of running the road has been increased, the earnings of the road have been increased still more. In connection with this matter of the Intercolonial Railway, I have a word to say which may not be pleasing to the government. There must, in the near future, be a largely increased expenditure upon that road. I am going to ask the government to take this matter into serious consideration. The bridges upon that road were built years ago when the locomotives were not half the weight that they are to-day. As a matter of simple precaution a large expenditure should be made in the way of strengthening these bridges. I believe the country will bear the government out if they undertake this expenditure.

Now, a word as to public works. This Dominion is in its progressive stage, its stage of development. I believe the most important portfolio in the government to-day is that of Public Works. Fortunately for the Dominion, we have as the holder of that portfolio a progressive man, a courageous man, a man who is intelligent enough to see the wants of the country and who will push forward to accomplish what is necessary in order to develop our resources. Let me for a moment, contrast the policy of the late government in this connection with the policy of the present government, taking examples from the county I have the honour to represent. I will select only two places, both on the Bay of Fundy shore. One is Margaretville. At that point, the late government had built a breakwater. A storm came and damaged it, and the government refused to rebuild it, allowing it to go down. And what was the reason given ? The reason given was that a majority of the people in that section refused to vote for the government. But since this government came into power, and while the county was represented by my predecessor, who was an opponent of the Liberal party, this government rebuilt this work, and the country round about is in a state of great prosperity in consequence. Then there is the case of Parker's Cove. In 1890, the government commenced the erection of a pier. Previous to that time, I am perfectly certain there were not $500 worth of fish sold from that hamlet in a year. But, during the summer and spring when this pier was under construction, the fishermen were able to take advantage of it, and that year their sales of fish amounted to between $5,000 and $6,000. Next year, when the first section of the pier was completed, their sales amounted to between $15,000 and $16,000. To-day, tenders are called for a contract to add a hundred feet to the length of the wharf and also an 'L' of fifty feet, to complete it; and the best authorities tell me that, when it is done, the sale from that community will amount to between $50,000 and $60,000. There is a direct result of public works. And when a government that can get the money as cheaply as the government of Canada can, expends its money in works of that sort, I think it is accomplishing a great good. The other night I had the honour to present a petition from the counties of Annapolis, King's and Hants, and the counties on the other side of the Bay of Fundy, asking for the construction of a harbour of refuge upon the Bay of Fundy on the south side. There is no spot where a vessel can be sheltered if caught in a storm on that shore. In 1894, the member then representing Annapolis brought this matter to the notice of the House and urged the case upon the government of that day. In that he was warmly supported by the representative of King's, the present Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Borden). But nothing came of it. I am going to urge upon the government that steps be taken to inquire into this matter during the recess, and I am going to try to convince the government that they should construct this much-needed work. Had the work been constructed years ago, it would have saved the government of this country almost as much as the construction would cost. I believe that all the counties on both sides of the Bay of Fundy are interested in this work. I may say there are a few things in the county of Annapolis that I am going to ask for, amongst others an ice pier and bridge on the Annapolis river. I ask for these things with confidence, because I know that it is the policy of the government to expend whatever money is necessary in the construction of these works. While hon. gentlemen on the other side are worrying and fretting because the expenditure is so high, and getting up past the $60,000,000 mark, I hope to live to see the day—and say this advisedly—when the expenditures of the Dominion of Canada will exceed $100,000,000 per year; and when these expenditures have exceeded $100,000,000 per year, then the prosperity of Canada will have been fairly started.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why not do it now?

Mr. WADE. Because I fear it would give the hon. gentleman the nightmare. You know, Sir, I have the greatest consideration for hon. gentlemen on the other side, because they have always treated me with great kindness, coming here as a young and inexperienced man, and I would not like to advocate anything that would be shocking to their sensibilities.

There is only one other question that I wish to deal with, and I will be very brief. I was somewhat shocked the other day when an hon. gentleman on this side of the House told us that Great Britain had done nothing for Canada, and was doing nothing for Canada. When we stop to consider that we have thousands of miles of seaboard bounded by two oceans, that we have three or four thousand miles of boundary line, upon the other side of which there is a powerful and an aggressive nation, when we consider that our present position is due and largely attributable to the fact that we are living under the British flag, I say it ill becomes any one to state that Great Britain has done nothing for us. If the United States to-morrow encroached upon our territory or invaded our rights, what would be the assistance that we would call to our aid? Would it not be the British army and the British fleet? How many million pounds sterling would it take to settle the trouble? And, Sir, under the present arrangement who would pay for it? The British taxpayer in the British islands, he is the man that would pay for it. I have under my hand here a few figures showing the expenses of maintaining the army and navy of the British empire, which amounts to £53,000,000 per year. Of that, some of the self-governing colonies pay a portion:—

	Imperial.	Local.
Cape Colony	£30,000	£220,000
Natal..	6,837	60,186
Canada	Nil.	491,736
Australia	126,000	587,000
			£1,521,759

The burden of this expense which protects this whole empire, is thrown almost entirely upon the British taxpayer. I have clipped an item from a Conservative paper bearing out what I am saying:

A Canadian from the west who has just been spending a few weeks with his relatives in England says it is very painful for a Canadian to realize the crushing burden of taxation which has fallen on struggling people in Britain, and the uncomplaining way in which they face it, while we Canadians have practically not touched the burden at all, though it is, as it were, for our sakes, as colonials looking to Britain for defence, that it is being incurred. We think the great majority of Canadians feel exactly as this man does, or would do so if brought, as he has been, face to face with the facts.

Sir, I believe that the day is not far distant when, as a matter of simple justice and right, the people of the Dominion of Canada will say: We wish to share a portion of this burden, we wish to have a voice in controlling the destiny of the empire, and its policy towards other nations. A great deal has been said on the other side of the House as to the position taken by our honoured leader with regard to the preference that is given to Great Britain. I am but a young politician, and cannot suppose that my words will carry very much weight; but I do wish to say that the statement made by the right hon. gentleman in Great Britain with regard to that preference, sounded the key note of true imperialism. I believe history will prove that this is the case. Further than that, I believe that statement, acted upon as it has been, was the means of provoking—I should not say provoking—was the means of engendering the first spark of national spirit we have ever had in the Dominion of Canada. There is a national spirit abroad in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and that national spirit we upon this side of the House do not claim, belongs exclusively to ourselves. We say that that spirit is abroad on the other side of the House and on the other side of politics as well as it is on this side.

Now, Sir, I wish to conclude my imperfect remarks, and in doing so I would like to touch for a moment upon a ground where there can be no difference of politics. I refer to the South African war. I wish to pay a tribute to the noble men, the Canadian heroes of Hart's River, those men who chose death rather than surrender. They have added lustre to the name of Canada that will be as enduring as time. With such deeds before us, and with the records of the other contingents that have gone to Africa, may we not regardless of political party, feel proud to-day that we can call ourselves Canadians? I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the attention which you have accorded me, and I apologize for the time I have taken up.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). While the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) was speaking, and his friends about him were hanging so intently upon every word that fell from his lips, I could not help thinking that the innermost feeling in the hearts of every one of them, if they had the faintest sense of logic, was 'almost thou persuadest me to be a protectionist.' The hon. gentleman commenced his remarks by giving us a tabulated statement of the people of Canada engaged in the various industries. He showed that those engaged in agriculture were about 790,000; whereas those engaged in manufacturing industries were about 320,000; and he drew the conclusion that it was a monstrous absurdity that we in this country should endeavour to protect a minority of simply 10 to 15 per cent against an overwhelming majority of 80 to 90 per cent. Surely when the hon. gentleman was speaking he must have spoken unwittingly, or he would not otherwise have given this House such a conclusive proof of the sublimest ignorance of the first doctrines of protection. Surely the hon. gentleman must understand that in this country every line of industry, every occupation, is so interested in all the others, that the ramifications of business are so intricate and so widespread, that you cannot benefit any industry without benefiting all others as well; and it is equally true that you cannot injure any industry in this country without injuring all others as well.

Now, we on this side of the House take a broader view than that of my hon. friend. We take the broad view of national protection for every industry, and while I would agree with him in the principle he laid down that legislation should be based on the principle of doing the greatest good to the greatest number, we say that by adopting a protective policy it is perfectly competent for this House to do the greatest good to the greatest number. The hon. gentleman seems to think that the duty of this House is to protect one solitary industry and that is the mining industry of Cape Breton. I was rather surprised that in the course of his remarks my hon. friend admitted that not only were our miners protected but that the bonus system had helped Cape Breton, Nova Scotia and the whole of the Dominion. Nobody on this side of the House takes any exception to the bonus system, but we do take particular exception to an hon. gentleman discussing a question about which he is so profoundly ignorant. Surely that hon. gentleman must be aware that if the bonus to the mining industry of Cape Breton and of Nova Scotia were doubled it would be of no effect unless its permanency were assured. The Conservative party lays down the principle which the hon. gentlemen are beginning to understand that it is just as essential that the protection given to any industry shall be a complete and adequate protection for the time being as it is that that protection shall be a constant protection so that those who engage in that industry need not be afraid that every session they may have all their stocks and profits swept away, but shall know that the government is going to give that industry the protection it requires. My hon. friend, in speaking of his friends on the other side of the House, said that some were protectionists to a certain degree, that some were free traders to a certain degree, that there would probably be a revision of the tariff and he presumed that a compromise would be necessary. If words such as these were uttered by the Finance Minister of the country, it would have a most injurious effect on the industry of this country. If the manufacturers of this country and the capitalists of adjoining countries are given to understand that the revision of the tariff is not to be considered as a matter of principle but is to be entirely a matter of party advantage, of compromise between the free traders and the protectionists, it will be a sad day for the industries of Canada. The hon. gentleman in referring to the remarks made by the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith) the other day was good enough to prove up to the hilt everything that my hon. friend said, so that it will not be necessary for me to do more than merely call the attention of the House to the proof he gave of the remarks of the hon. member for South Wentworth. The charge made by the hon. member for South Wentworth was that the government had not done its duty, had not done what it should have done for the fruit growers of the Annapolis district and my hon. friend read resolutions passed by different associations in that part of the country, which resolutions entirely bore out what he said. But, the hon. member for Annapolis said that he, himself, was perfectly aware of the complaints that were made. He said that the ministers could do nothing except to give a bonus to some line of steamships to induce it to assist in the transportation of fruit from the Annapolis valley, and then in five minutes he read a suggestion that he had drawn up that he had left with the minister and, if practical effect had been given to these suggestions these grievances would have been removed. The very statement shows that the minister, requiring to have some matters called to his attention, although five years in office, has failed to grasp the necessities of the case and that he has failed to do what he might have done. The hon. gentleman, in triumph, speaking of the policy which he and his friends opposite are supporting, referred to the late provincial elections in the province of Nova Scotia, and he said that although at the last election the policy of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) in this House was well known, and I dispute the fact that that policy was well known or was laid before the people of Nova Scotia, the government swept that province by an overwhelming majority. As the people of Nova Scotia vote on local, not on Dominion issues, surely the hon. gentleman would not have us believe that the premier of Nova Scotia is such a wholly unimportant factor in the national life that it is a matter of indifference what he thinks, so long as the views of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads this House, are in accord with those of the majority of the people. We claim in the province of Ontario to have disassociated provincial politics from Dominion politics and we hope that when the election comes on in the near future the people of Ontario will condemn the present administration on its own acts and not on the acts of the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman concluded his speech by a reference to the subject of imperial defence and he gave us some very interesting figures in connection with that. I would like to speak at length on that subject. I would like to call attention to the fact that while many of the colonies are contributing very largely of their means to assist the home government, the Dominion of Canada not only contributes nothing but even declines to consider the question at the approaching meeting of the colonial premiers. But, though I would like to discuss this question I feel that on this particular night it would be utterly out of place in the shadow of the disaster which has fallen on our friends in arms in South Africa and I would prefer to postpone my remarks to another day. As this debate has proceeded, as day followed day and speech succeeded speech. though many passing impressions have faded away I believe one deepseated and abiding conviction has been left on the minds of the hon. gentlemen in this House and on the minds of the people of this country and it is that from the time the world dawned to the commencement of this debate there never were such varied, such grotesque, such bewildering opinions on any political questions advanced before any body of men as those advanced by the hon. gentlemen opposite in the progress of this debate. I have listened carefully and patiently to the speeches as they fell from the lips of the hon. gentlemen opposite and I have studied with some care the 'Hansard' report of these speeches in order to see if I could discover any theory, any feeling, any idea, any determination in common on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and after some consideration it seems a fair conclusion to be drawn that one can find a common theory, a feeling, an idea, a determination. I believe that a fair rendering of these speeches of the hon. gentlemen opposite, is that it is the theory of free trade. Their idea is that free trade is pretty nearly played out. I think they have the feeling that it is about time to abandon free trade and seek some other refuge, probably the protective harbour and it is abundantly clear that there is a determination, no matter what the government may do, no matter how the hon. gentlemen may differ or how the people suffer and that determination is to keep the government in power at any and all costs. I believe that for years back the hon. gentlemen opposite have been kneeling before the shrine of the goddess of free trade, that they have been sadly and grudgingly making sacrifices on the altar of free trade and that while they are inquiring in their own hearts if these sacrifices are really necessary, their minds are beginning to be enlightened by the irresistible logic of facts. They see the conclusive results which have flowed from the application of protective principles and while their hearts were faltering their minds were suggesting that it was well to leave this falling shrine and seek the temple of protection over and beyond. Their consciences politically stifled in their dying throes urged them to set aside all that they honestly believed to be in the interests of the country and so the hon. gentlemen opposite separated by these conflicting forces present the variance which we see to-day. It is said that the hon. member for Victoria, Nova Scotia (Hon. Mr. Ross) whom I see before me now, and the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) are still kneeling before the altars of free trade.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) I have not spoken yet.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I have not said that the hon. gentleman has spoken in this debate. But we know his opinions perfectly well, and if the hon. gentleman has left that altar I will be very happy to withdraw my remarks and to say that he has ceased to believe in the doctrines of free trade. But, until the hon. gentleman does contradict me, I will assume that he still retains the opinions he has so frequently and eloquently expressed. I repeat that the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Ross) and the hon. gentleman for Russell (Mr. Edwards) are still worshipping at the altar of free trade. But there are other gentlemen on that side who differ from them. We have for example the hon. gentleman for Vancouver (Mr. Smith); the hon. gentleman for Westminster (Mr. Morrison); the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) who are still worshipping there, but with one eye on the altar of free trade they are casting another eye over their shoulders to watch the procession of all the peoples of the world marching into the temple of protection on the other side of the road. We have others, such as the hon. gentleman for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) who has not only looked over his shoulder, but is turning around and is blindly groping to find his way into the temple of protection. So we find that among these hon. gentlemen there are all sorts and varieties of opinion on this interesting question. But, Sir, whatever the varieties of opinion may be among these gentlemen, there are one or two respects in which their ideas touching protection differ entirely from the ideas on that subject held by hon. gentlemen on this side. We on this side of the House believe in a national protection. We believe in the protection of every industry in the Dominion of Canada. We believe that it is possible to protect every industry, and we say that under such a policy as the Conservative party inaugurated and maintained, and under such a policy as it will maintain if again called to take the reins of power, every industry in this country will be protected; every artisan, every employee, every labourer in this country will be protected, and we say that the goal of our policy is to see not only capital protected, but that every free labouring man who is willing to do an honest day's work in Canada shall have an honest day's work to do, and an honest day's wage for him at the close of the day. But, hon. gentlemen opposite, as against our ideas of national protection, have a sectional, a local, an individual idea of protection. I appeal to the speeches we have heard from these hon. gentlemen to prove this. The hon. gentleman for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) is a free trader, but he believes in the protection of horses. The hon. gentleman from New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) is a free trader, but he believes in the protection of lumber and lead. The hon. gentlemen from Vancouver (Mr. Smith) and from Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) are free traders, but they believe in the protection of labour. The hon. gentleman from South Brant (Mr. Heyd) is a protectionist, and he believes in the protection of everything except the woollen industry apparently. And so as we go along the line we find that almost every gentleman on the other side of the House believes in the protection of a particular industry in which he personally, or the constituency which he represents happens to be interested.

Now, Sir, if ours is a national protection and hon. gentlemen opposite are advocating a local, or sectional, or individual protection, are we not justified in saying that ours is a patriotic protection while theirs is a purely selfish protection. Perhaps, Sir, this is the reason why hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have been ready and willing for the past twenty-five years, not only in this House but wherever they may be, to advocate the cause of protection, whereas hon. gentlemen opposite advocate their cause in such a way that no man in the Dominion of Canada knows to-day what the position of the government is on this question. Let me give practical proof of what I state; that no person in this country can say to-day where the government is on the question of tariff reform. I start first with the Liberal platform adopted by the party convention in 1893. I have no intention of reading the whole of this interesting document, but one or two sentences on the subject of protection are germane to the matter in hand. I find it laid down as a plank in the Liberal platform :

> That the tariff shall be so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible upon the necessaries of life, and shall be so arranged as to promote freer trade with the whole world, more particularly with Great Britain and the United States.

I find also that the Liberal party there assembled in convention said this :

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based upon that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.

That was the platform of the party which came into power in 1896. In 1897, the following year, it was the duty of that party to lay a tariff before this House. Their position was this : They came before the people as advocates of free trade; they had supplanted a government which was avowedly a protectionist government. They had on the one hand the tariff laid down by the Hon. Alex. Mackenzie in 1877; a free trade tariff; a tariff framed by that noble man who told us what he professed, and was prepared if necessary to suffer for his belief. Looking at the tariff of 1877 and the tariff of 1894—opposites as two tariffs could be—it became the duty of the present government to frame their tariff, and in 1897 they brought their tariff down. If these hon. gentlemen had adhered to the principle which they laid down at the convention of 1893, the tariff of 1877 is the tariff to which the tariff of 1897 would have been most closely assimilated. But I find that in this Liberal tariff of 1877, there are only four pages all told of dutiable goods, whereas in the Liberal tariff of 1897 they have been spun out to twenty-nine pages. I find that in this tariff of 1877, there were thirty-two items of specific duties besides sugar and tobacco—specific duties that have been condemned by hon. gentlemen opposite from the day the Conservative party came into power in 1878 even down to this date. And yet on a reference to the tariff framed and carried out by that grand old Liberal, Alex. Mackenzie, who lived and died a free trader, we find among the small number of items in his tariff that there were thirty-two items bearing specific duties, besides sugar and tobacco. There were twelve items of this tariff of 1877 bearing 25 per cent; twenty-one items bearing 10 per cent and thirty-one items bearing 5 per cent. There you have the whole tariff of 1877. I do not for a moment contend that this government when it came into power were bound to pass exactly the tariff of 1877. The Minister of Customs would be the first one to consider the point if I did not admit that the circumstances of this country had changed, and that a tariff that might be reasonable in 1877 would be admitted to be a monstrous tariff twenty years later. I admit that. But there must be an underlying principle even under a tariff, and I merely call attention to the fact that a certain principle underlaid one tariff to which these gentlemen were bound according to their pledges, and there was an altogether different principle underlying the Conservative tariff of 1894, which they did follow. I have taken a glance through the Liberal tariff of 1897, and I have compared the tariff of 1897 with the tariff of 1894. Certain changes of course were made in the tariff of 1894, while the late government was in power, and certain changes have been made since 1897 in the tariff by the present administration, but these are immaterial since it is a question of principle I am discussing. I have therefore taken the two tariffs, the Conservative tariff of 1894 passed by a Conservative administration giving what they thought was proper protection to the various industries. I then take the tariff of 1897 passed by a Reform administration giving what they honestly believed—because of course they must have intended to carry out their pledges to the people of this country—giving what they honestly believed a tariff so adjusted as to make free, or to bear as lightly as possible on all the necessaries of life and from which the principle of protection had been wholly expunged. I find in looking through the Liberal tariff of 1897 that a number of classes of articles are grouped together. The first class is, 'ales, beers, wines and liquors.' There are ten items in that class and this free trade administration, not considering that they came under the head of necessaries of life, left the duty on all of these articles as it was in the tariff of 1894, save one and they raised that. The next class is, 'agriculture, animals and dairy products.' There were ninety-three items under this class, in the tariff of 1894, and these hon. gentlemen opposite who contend that it is impossible to protect the farmer or to protect any products of the farm might well have relieved all these ninety-three items from any duties, if these gentlemen believed what they professed.

But I find, on comparing the 1894 tariff with the 1897 tariff, that out of these 93 items 81 remained unchanged, 5 were decreased, 6 were increased, and one was changed from specific to ad valorem, the result being, I think, about the same. The next class is fish and the products of the fisheries, of which there are 19 items. Every one bore a heavy taxation under the Conservative regime, and not a single one in the whole 19 was reduced under the able generalship of the Finance Minister, although he comes from a fishing province. The next class is books and paper—18 items; 12 unchanged, 6 changed. Class 5, chemicals and drugs—14 items; 9 unchanged; 4 increased, 1 lowered. Class 6, opium—3 items, all unchanged. Class 7—colours, paints, oils, varnishes, &c.—21 items ; 14 unchanged, 3 increased, 4 decreased. Class 8—coal—2 items; 1 unchanged and 1 decreased. Class 9—earthenware, cements, slate and stoneware—20 items ; 11 unchanged, 1 increased, 3 decreased; 5 changed from specific to ad valorem. Class 10—glass and glassware—11 items; 5 unchanged, 3 increased, 3 changed from specific to ad valorem, probably increased. Class II—leather, rubber and manufactures of—11 items; 8 unchanged, 3 increased. Class 12—metals and manufactures of—99 items. The wording of these items was so changed that not being conversant with them I have left out the 99 items. But this I may say, that bonusing would afford a tremendous protection outside of the tariff protection, and perhaps the last item of the class will shed a light on the spirit in which all the changes were made, the last item being goods not otherwise provided for, on which the duty was raised from 27½ per cent under the 1894 tariff to 30 per cent under the 1897 tariff. The next item is class 13, vehicles; 4 items; 3 unchanged, 1 changed slightly, so that it lets shoddy buggies come into this country. Class 14—manufactures of wood, cane and cork; 19 items; 14 unchanged, 1 decreased, 3 increased, 1 compromised, but it discriminates against Canadian wood. Class 15—jewellery and material therefor—8 items; 6 unchanged, 1 increased, 1 decreased. Class 16—minerals—3 items; no change. Class 17, musical instruments—2 items; 1 unchanged, 1 partly raised and partly lowered. Class 18—textiles, hats, furs, &c.—51 items; 22 unchanged, 17 increased, 6 decreased, 6 readjustments. Class 19—sundries—26 items; 21 unchanged, 3 decreased, 1 increased, 1 new. Class 20—sugar, syrups and molasses—7 items; 1 unchanged, 6 raised. Class 21—tobacco and manufactures of—5 items; 5 increased. Class 22, unenumerated goods—1 item, unchanged. The sum total of all this is that, excluding the manufactures of iron, some 99 items, there were in the tariff some 348 items, of which 244 were untouched, 54 were increased, 34 were decreased, and the remaining 16 were adjusted between specific and ad valorem; I cannot say whether these were increased or decreased. And that, hon. gentlemen opposite profess, is the carrying out of their promise to the country to lower the tariff, to bring about freer trade, and to entirely expunge from the tariff the radically unsound principle of protection.

But let us see how it has worked out in actual practice. When hon. gentlemen opposite sat down to frame this tariff, I presume the Minister of Finance would be a leading spirit at the board. The Minister of Finance is a life-long free trader; he has had no hesitation in announcing that fact to the House again and again; and so, as an ardent free trader coming from the province of Nova Scotia, he sat down at the board to see that his native province secured those benefits of free trade which he had advocated so long and so eloquently. How did he do it ? There were three great industries in the province of Nova Scotia—the fishing industry, the coal industry, and the iron industry. In the fishing industry there were 19 items, not one of which was changed; on coal there was a duty of 50 cents a ton and he left it at that, affording ample protection; and in the iron industry the miners were given bonuses which I need not comment upon, since the hon. gentleman who has preceded me (Mr. Wade) has admitted that owing to the bonuses the iron manufactures of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton have attained a success which they could not possibly have attained without those bonuses. We have here a practical proof that the Finance Minister, the head of the board, was careful to see that a full measure of protection was given to his own province. Of course, the Minister of Customs, from the province of Ontario sat down at the board. I presume he must have done so, because Ontario had some items increased and some left alone. The wicked Tories in passing the tariff of 1894, thought that 25 per cent was a sufficient protection on biscuits, and the Reform government thought the same in 1897. But on sweetened biscuits the Tories in 1894 thought 25 per cent was sufficient, but the Reform government in 1897 did not, and they increased the duty to 27½ per cent. On pickles the Reformers in the old tariff of 1877 thought 17½ per cent a sufficient protection; in the tariff of 1894 the wicked Tories increased the rate to 35 per cent, and in 1897 the Reform Minister of Customs did not cut that down, but left it as it was. On jellies and jams there was a duty under the tariff of 1877 of 17½ per cent; the Tories in 1894 made it 3 cents per pound, but the Reform free trade government in 1897 increased it to 3¼ per pound. Then, somebody, I presume, was looking after the interests of the farmers on that board.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What did the Tory government make the duties on those articles in 1895 ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I think they raised the duties in 1895.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It would be fair to say that.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I have no objection to saying that they did. But it is a question of principle I am discussing, not the question of a paltry change of 1 per cent or 2 per cent. It seems impossible for hon. gentlemen opposite, even ministers of the Crown, to consider these questions on any higher ground than a paltry 1 per cent or 2 per cent a pound on jellies, jams or pickles. We on this side of the House are prepared to discuss this matter as a question of principle; and if the government came into power pledged to remove the principle of protection, they did not do it if they imposed a higher duty than what the Conservative government considered sufficient in 1894. I am quite prepared to admit that in some cases the duties were raised in 1895, but precious good care was taken that they were not put back in 1897.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Is that correct ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I think so.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman should remember that there was 33⅓ per cent taken off all the articles he has enumerated, large amounts of which come from Great Britain.

Mr. NORTHRUP. I am coming to the question of the preference; the hon. gentleman need not think that I am going to evade it. But the hon. gentleman must understand that when the duty is raised, it is raised against all the world except one country, and he and his friends claim that there are patriotic reasons why this should be the case. He took precious good care to protect himself against all other countries. The hon. gentleman specially disapproved of what was done in 1895, and if the preference had not been given, he would not have put the duty so high in 1897.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did he say so ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. The hon. gentleman takes precious care not to say so. He called attention to the fact that although apparently the duty is as high as three-quarters of a cent a pound, it is less on account of the preference, but if the preference had not been given would the hon. gentleman have raised the duty ? I pause for a reply. The hon. gentleman declines to answer. Then the raise was made because the preference was given, and the hon. gentleman stands in the position of having to admit that he first raised the duty and then gave a preference, so as to give an advantage nominally to England without hurting the manufacturers here, on that particular article, to the extent of a single dime.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What was the duty in 1895 ?

Mr. NORTHRUP. I am not discussing 1895 tariff but the facts of the two governments on two different occasions. It is a matter of utter indifference to me what was done by either subsequently. I am mentioning what was done at a particular time, and the government of 1894 was either right or wrong in the tariff it brought down, and so was the government of 1897. If the hon. gentleman will look at the duties in the tariff affecting the agricultural community, he will find that they were not maintained. The hon. Minister of Customs has in this House again and again condemned the tariff of 1894. I am not saying that he condemned it with regard to jams, jellies, pickles and preserves, but he condemned it, as a whole, yet we find that practically he adopted that tariff when he came into power, except to amend it in certain respects, and in each of these he invariably amended it for the worse.

We find several reductions made with regard to agricultural products. The duty on wheat was reduced from fifteen to twelve cents a bushel, on wheat flour from seventy-five to sixty cents per bushel ; but on biscuits not sweetened the duty remained as it was, 25 per cent and on biscuits not sweetened at 27½ per cent. Corn was admitted free, and the duty on corn meal, I believe, was reduced. I suppose perhaps that one reason why corn was admitted free was because the ministry held the idea, which was advanced by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) and by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) and others in this House, that it was impossible to protect the farmers. Whether or not that statement be correct, it has certainly been made again and again throughout this budget debate, and I would judge that the only reason why the Minister of Customs representing Ontario—which is to a large extent an agricultural province—allowed the duties on agricultural products to be cut while those on manufactured goods were so religiously maintained, was that he and his colleagues thought it was impossible to protect the farmer. Allow me for a moment to consider that question: We had an object-lesson in 1888, 1889 and 1890. In 1888 bacon and hams and Canadian pork were imported to the extent of 31,000,000 pounds, and in 1889 to the extent of 33,000,000 pounds. Representations were then made to the government of that day that the Canadian farmer was having his home market made a slaughter market for the Americans, and the duty was increased. The next year the 33,000,000 pounds of importations fell off to 17,000,000 pounds, in 1891 they fell off to 13,000,000 pounds, and in 1892 they dwindled down to 6,900,000 pounds. So you see there, Sir, a distinct object lesson. You see there an instance in which the Americans were making Canada a slaughter market, and when, after their tariff was increased and our farmers were protected, their importations fell off to a very considerable amount. Sometimes protection may work in favour of the farmer in a way that may not appear at first sight. In the riding I have the honour to represent we have the Rathbun Company establishment, one of the largest manufacturing concerns in the country. And at a public meeting held some years ago the head of that company, Mr. Rathbun, speaking on the subject of protection, pointed out that just as long as we lay along side the United States—a country which is liable to such sudden fluctuations in its currency and to sudden panics in its markets—it was absolutely necessary that we should have a distinct protection on products raised by Canadian farmers. Only a few months ago previous there was a panic in Chicago. The price of pork had fallen a great deal lower than it could be raised for, and Mr. Rathbun could have purchased in Chicago all the pork that he required for his shanties at a lower price than he could have got it from the farmers of Hastings, had there been no duty. But the duty was there, and he told his audience that, on account of the duty, there was no object in his buying at Chicago, but he said; had it not been for the duty I would have bought my pork at Chicago where I could have got it the cheapest. Then turning to the farmers who were standing around, and whom he knew by name, he said, addressing one of them in particular: You brought your pork down to my establishment at Deseronto to sell last fall as usual, but had I purchased at Chicago I would have declined to buy. Having no other market you would have been obliged to take it home again, and the result would have been you would have had to suffer a heavy loss simply because you had no market at home. There is an object lesson to show how our farmers can be protected. If they cannot be protected as these hon. gentlemen say, why do they leave all these items on the tariff? Or do they simply wish the farmers to believe that something is being done for them when in reality nothing can be done? The hon. gentleman who preceded me admitted that while the farmers in his part of the country could not be protected, there might be some in some parts of the country to whom the duties on certain items afforded some protection. But we have it admitted by the Minister of Customs that the farmers have been protected, and that in Nova Scotia itself they can be and are protected.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) What about the fishermen?

Mr. NORTHRUP. If my hon. friend will look into the tariff he will find that there are some nineteen items connected with the fishing industry, the duties on which are precisely the same as those in the tariff of 1894. He will find that, from numbers 104 to 122, all fish products, there is protection on every one of them.

Hon. gentlemen opposite must remember that protection can be indirect as well as direct. If it be true, as my hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) has said—and I quite agree with him on that point—that the bounty given by the government to the iron industries in Cape Breton and Nova Scotia has resulted in an immense amount of capital being brought into and expended in that country, surely that affords protection to the farmer by providing him with a home market right at his door, where he can sell his products. In that respect the farmer of Nova Scotia is probably better protected than the farmer of Ontario, and the fishermen in Nova Scotia enjoys a similar protection because he too finds the local market at his doors, which owes its existence to that bounty, apart from the advantage that he gets from the tariff. But hon. gentlemen opposite are so welded to the doctrine of free trade that they close their eyes to the object lessons which are visible on every hand. Their great difficulty is that they take one item standing by itself and do not see how the tariff on that item is directly going to benefit the particular persons interested. But a tariff on a different thing altogether may give an indirect protection to other interests. Let me give an illustration. The hon. members for Winnipeg (Mr. Puttee) and Vancouver (Mr. Smith) stands up here, as the representatives of labour, and declare themselves free traders. Nevertheless they believe in protection to labour, that being the only local industry which they are interested in having protected. But surely if they are consistent, they will say: We are here to protect labour, and we find that labour in Peterborough and Cornwall and other great manufacturing centres is losing its occupation, and therefore, without discussing the duty on woollen or other manufactures, we turn to the government to urge them that it is their duty to see that the particular classes of labour in these places are protected. They, however, take the same short-sighted sectional view, and merely ask direct protection to labour in the way of excluding the Chinese, while as a matter of fact, if they would only look over this great country from one end to the other, they would find that ten times the protection would be given labour by a tariff properly applied than by keeping out a few Chinese.

I have a list here of certain items that have been imported into this country, and this perhaps may throw a little light on the question as to whether the tariff really does assist those engaged in the production of any particular article.

Take the item of biscuits, in 1897 biscuits to the value of $41,877,000 were imported, and in 1901 only $28,871,000 worth. Indian corn in 1897, we imported to the extent of $1,230,000, and in 1901 to the extent of $6,-647,000. Breadstuffs in 1897 we imported to the extent of $1,895,000 worth, and in 1901 to the extent of $8,070,000. Collars and cuffs, on which the duty was decreased, in 1897 we imported to the value of $39,152, and in 1901 to the extent of $89,075. Thus in 1901, when the duty was reduced, the imports increased. Cottons and manufactures of cotton, in 1897 we imported $7,609,-000 worth, and in 1901, $12,301.899 worth. And we hear to-day the cries of woe from the cotton industry.

In provisions, the increase was from $702,000 in 1887 to $2,345,000 in 1901. In wool manufactures the increase is from $8,056,000 to $11,357,000. Yet we wonder at the cries to Heaven from the woollen manufacturers. But I notice as a rather singular feature, looking at the public returns that, while our exports have increased very largely, as hon. gentlemen can rightly claim, yet, if we take the trouble to go through the various classes of exports, we find that the greater bulk of the increased exports is in lines with which hon. gentlemen opposite cannot even claim to have anything to do. Our exports of home produce which, in 1887 were $123,959,000, and, in 1901 were $177,431,000, an increase in favour of last year of $53,471,000. But exports of products of the fisheries—they have been amply protected, but precisely as under the old government—increased $406,000. The export of minerals increased form $11,000,000 to $40,000,000 an increase of $29,000,000. But of this $24,000,000 came from the Yukon. And hon. gentlemen opposite will not say that they discovered the Yukon. I hardly think that, in the light of the events of the present day, they will say that to their management of the Yukon is attributable any of the success of that country. The exports of the products of the forest decreased by about $1,000,000. Animals and their products increased $16,000,-000. But the duties on these items are the same as they were under the late government. The exports of agricultural products increased for $17,000,000 to $24,000,-000. Hon. gentlemen opposite know perfectly well that that is owing to the better harvests we have had, particularly in Manitoba and the North-west, and also to increase in prices, so that the same number of bushels exported would show a vast increase in value. The export of manufactures increased $16,000,000. Add these together—the mines, the animals and their products, agriculture products, and manufactures and you find a total increase of $57,940,000. The total increase of exports of home products, as I have shown, is only $53,471,000. This shows that you must have a shortage of $4,000,000 in other items. But there is one respect in which there was not a shortage. And in speaking of this I shall say all I intend to say, it is the subject of the census which has been so much discussed. At page 296 of the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce last year, I find one export the growth of which I was astonished to see. In 1897, when hon. gentlemen opposite came into power, the settlers effects exported from this country amounted to $1,008,000. The following year, the export of settlers' effects was less by $15,000. But in 1899—I suppose the new tariff had begun to work—the export of settlers' effects amounted to $1,051,000 ; in 1900 it was $1,165,000 and in 1901, it was $1,212,000. That is to say, last year the export of settlers' effects was over $200,000 more than 1897. That proves one of two things. Hon. gentlemen opposite may argue as much as they please about the exodus being stopped, but, if $200,000 more in value of settlers' effects left this country in 1901 than 1897, it is as sure as the heaven above us that either a wealthier class of people are going out and taking more property with them, or a larger number of poor people are going. I do not pretend to say which horn of the dilemma hon. gentlemen opposite should occupy ; but it would strike one outside of this House as somewhat audacious for an hon. gentleman to stand up here and say that the exodus is practically stopped when we find that there is an increase of $200,000, equal to 20 per cent, in the export of settlers' effects.

Mr. TAYLOR. According to his own report.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Yes, according to the official report. I have spoken longer than I intended to. But there is one other subject to which I wish to refer for a moment. In the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition a reference is made to the desire for a preferential tariff between the various parts of the empire. I think that on this point there is a clear conflict of opinion between hon. gentlemen opposite and ourselves. I think that we can discuss this question without imputing disloyalty to hon. gentlemen who differ from us. But hon. gentlemen opposite have their idea of how to display their loyalty and we have ours. We think that they are wholly wrong and are making an absurd display of loyalty, but we can express our difference without imputing disloyalty to them, and nothing is further from my thought. We on this side are prepared to admit that all the subjects of this glorious empire should, as far as possible, deal with one another and give one another a preference as against outsiders. And we are prepared, in any case, to give a preference to our fellow subjects in England, or Australia, or any where as against the people outside the empire. But there are people in the Conservative ranks so blind as not to be able to see that a man who represents a Canadian constituency, for instance, West Peterborough, is bound to vote in this House to give a preference to the manufacturer and the workmen in Yorkshire at the expense of the manufacturer and the workmen in Peterborough, so that the manufacturer in Yorkshire may manufacture more and the manufacturer in Peterborough less, and the employees in Yorkshire have more work and the workman in Peterborough lose his occupation altogether. They are all British subjects and we are willing to give fair play to them all. But, if we must protect one, we hold that charity begins at home and we would protect the Canadian first. But hon. gentlemen tell us that this preferential tariff was given to the mother land as a matter of gratitude—that she had done so much for us that the least we could do was to give some return. I would be the last man to say that the mother land has not done much for us ; I say that we owe her more than we are likely ever to repay. But we have all laughed at the American humorist who was so anxious to put down the war in his country that he was ready to sacrifice all his wife's relations. Has not the government gone a step further than Artemus Ward? The government come to us and say: 'The people of Canada owe a debt to the mother country for what she has done for them ; we cannot pay anything ourselves, we cannot even pay the expenses of our own contingents going to take part in fighting the battles of the empire ; but we will make the cotton manufacturers and the woollen manufacturers pay for it by putting them at a disadvantage as compared with the Yorkshire cotton and woollen manufacturers, and that will square Canada's debt with the empire. If we, the people of Canada owe anything to the mother country, let us all contribute to the paying of it, and not lay the whole burden upon those who happen to be in business and to be injured by the tariff. That would be a strong enough case, even if this preference were confined to the mother land. But as a matter of fact, we find that only 25 per cent of the labour necessary to produce the goods has to be done in Great Britain to entitle them to the preference. We find one after another of the gentlemen in this House testifying that, according to his own knowledge, goods manufactured in Germany and other countries are brought to England and are there merely finished or even merely parcelled and sent out as English goods and brought into Canada under the preference of 33⅓ per cent, thus giving the Germans a preference that the Ministry would not dare to propose to give them directly. If there is to be a preference to the mother country, whatever percentage it may be, let it be for goods manufactured wholly in England, and then no outsider will get the benefit. I think it does not require any elucidation to convince the House that there is an honest difference between hon. gentlemen opposite and us on that question. And I sincerely trust that, when the premier goes, as he will go, to the old country, to attend the meeting of the Colonial premiers, where we know he will maintain the honour of this country in a manner that will be gratifying to all good Canadians irrespective of party, he will consider these questions, that he will consider the subject of preferential trade and will devote his ability to doing what he can to make such arrangements that, whatever others may do, Canada may prosper at home and may have a place of honour in the empire by bearing the share of the burden which properly devolves upon her.

Mr. H. A. WARD (East Durham). I desire, like other members of this House who have spoken before me, to congratulate the House and the country upon the prosperity that Canada is at present enjoying; but I cannot subscribe to the doctrine which has been promulgated by the Minister of Finance and his colleagues, that that prosperity is altogether owing to the beneficent government that at present holds the reins of power. I desire to point out that there is another party in this country, and there has been for a great many years another party in this country, which has, in my humble judgment, accomplished something in the interest of the Dominion ; and I think it would have been only just for hon. gentlemen opposite to give some credit to the Conservative party for some of its achievements since confederation. Now, I do not propose to offer an excuse, as some hon. gentlemen have taunted us with doing, for the prosperity we enjoy; but I do propose to offer some reasons why that prosperity exists, and why it is not altogether due to hon. gentlemen opposite. I would not for a moment detract from the credit which is due to the fathers of confederation, and those members of the Liberal party among them who did their share in welding together the four great provinces and laying the foundation of the nation. But I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to the fact that after confederation something was done by the Conservative party to enlarge the boundaries of the Dominion and to make her the nation she is at this time, and to put Canada in such a position that hon gentlemen opposite, on coming into power, found government made easy. Now, I am not going to weary the House with many figures, but I desire briefly to point out some of the achievements of the Conservative administration since confederation. First was the acquisition of the North-west Territories and Rupert's land, that was, I think, if the Year-book does not lie, accomplished by a Conservative administration. We have also the admission of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island into confederation; and I think we can fairly claim that up to 1873 the Conservatives did accomplish something in the interests of the country by welding the different provinces into a nation.

Now I regret that I have to refer to a remark which, if I am credibly informed, was made by the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) during the recent election in West Durham. I understand that when he was speaking at a little village called Newtonville shortly before the election, he made the astounding statement that all the great works in the interest of this country had been initiated and carried out by the Reform party. Following the example of other members of the government, he claims that nothing has been done by the Conservative party. Now it was in 1873 that a Reform administration came into power for the first time since confederation, under the leadership of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I have looked through the Year-book to find, during the five years of their administration, if any important Act was placed on the Statute-book in the interest of the country at large, but I have looked in vain. There were, it is true, three Indian treaties signed during that time, a government was provided for the North-west Territories and a Lieutenant Governor appointed, and there was a large fire in the city of St. John. I think these are the only three matters of importance, or the only events that took place during the administration of our hon. friends opposite. The Pacific Railway, the surveys for which had been commenced during the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald, were, it is true, continued during Mr. Mackenzie's administration. But what is the history of the Pacific Railway during those five years? It is, I think, a history of delay, of exaggeration of what that railway was likely to cost, and of embarrassment generally of the construction of that great work. We all know how that party came into power. It was because the Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald had propounded a scheme for building that railway by a private company. When the Conservatives came into power in 1878, acting up to their pledges that they would introduce a protective policy, the national policy was brought into existence by the government of Sir John A. Macdonald. That national policy, I claim, though I am not going to bring forward figures to prove it, because that has been amply done by other hon. gentlemen who have preceded me—that policy, I claim has done more to place Canada in the position she occupies to-day and to provide hon. gentlemen opposite with so large a revenue to expend, than any other act of any administration since confederation. After the national policy came the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and I think no hon. gentleman on either side of the House will deny that the accomplishment of that great work has been other than beneficial to this country. The speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite and their leaders in the House at that time, show that they were afraid to attempt that work even as a government work, that they were utterly incredulous that the railway could be built in twelve years time, which I believe was the period fixed, but that they asserted it would take an infinitely longer time, and a very much larger sum of money than was eventually expended in the construction of that work. On the 1st of October, 1880, the contract was made for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway; on May 2, 1881, the first sod was turned, and on November 7, 1885, the last spike was driven. That shows what Canada accomplished under a government that was alive to the necessities of the country.

Now I wish briefly to point out that it is the opinion of Conservatives at least, that something was done by Conservative administrations since confederation to place the country in the position it occupies to-day, and to enable hon. gentlemen opposite to pose, as they are doing, as successful administrators. Let me refer for a moment to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade). He paid considerable attention to a previous speech of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith). I think he should have remembered that that hon. gentleman is one of the greatest authorities in Ontario in respect to fruit growing, to which subject the hon. member for Annapolis devoted a considerable portion of his speech. I think it was only due to that hon. gentleman, especially as he was not here, that the hon. member for Annapolis should have quoted the remarks of the hon. member for South Wentworth correctly. The hon. member for Annapolis stated that the hon. member for South Wentworth had, in his speech called attention to the fact that for the first time in the history of the Annapolis valley they had a good crop this last year. I do not think my hon. friend made any such statement and I will read the remarks that he really did make in that connection.

In Nova Scotia they had this year the only good crop of apples grown in the country, and the apple growers of the Annapolis Valley, who had a crop that should have brought them in a million dollars, have lost $300,000 on last year's crop, because of the want of proper ventilation on these steamers.

I waited anxiously for the hon. gentleman to answer the gravamen of the charge made by the hon. member for South Wentworth, but in the whole course of his speech he made no reference to that and confined himself to making a quotation of my hon. friend's speech which does not appear at all. The hon. member for Annapolis put up a straw man in order that he might knock it down again. He stated that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House frequently said that we owed nothing to the mother country. I have never heard any hon. gentleman on this side of the House make any such statement and the only thing I can remember which the hon. gentleman might have been referring to was the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), who on one occasion said that we owed Britain nothing but forgiveness. I think that must been in the hon. gentleman's mind and that he had nothing whatever to quote as against any hon. gentleman on this side of the House.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ward) excuse me? In the absence of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade), I might say that he had reference to a speech made on this side of the House by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He was quoting something from what he said when that charge was made. He made no reference to any hon. gentleman on that side of the House in commenting on the remark that Canada did not owe much to Great Britain.

Mr. WARD. I am sorry that the hon. member for Annapolis is not here. Not having heard the statement referred to by the hon. member for Victoria, N.S., I can say nothing about it. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, in the course of his long speech in this House, which was characterized by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) as being a very ingenious speech, made some of those remarkable statements which usually pervade that hon. gentleman's speeches. It was an amusing feature of the debate when the hon. gentleman welcomed back old friends. He no doubt felt that his old friends or enemies were coming back and that they would make themselves felt in this House, as they did in 1878. His speech on this occasion and the recklessness of the figures he produced recalled the speech which he made in 1890, when he made an attack on the farmers of the province of Ontario, in order to make a point against the national policy and when he endeavoured to show that half of the farms in Ontario were mortgaged for half of what they were worth. That statement was founded upon returns from thirteen different registry offices which he had received from different registrars, and his argument from that statement was, that each concession of which he had returns at that time, was mortgaged to the extent of $96,000. One hon. gentleman on this side of the House produced a statement some days afterwards to show that in the county that he represented at least there was only an indebtedness of $67,000 for each concession, and it was pointed out on that occasion that if the hon. gentleman who made the statement had had any knowledge whatever of the registry laws of the province of Ontario he would never have based the statement on such evidence as he laid before the House. Every lawyer who is practising knows, and the hon. gentleman should have known, that about half the mortgages that appear upon the registry books have been already discharged and that the discharges are in the hands of the loan companies who hold the mortgages at the present time upon these lands. These mortgages are not discharged upon the registry books. There is no way in which the registrars can give correct statements of mortgages existing against these lands, and it was a matter of surprise to me at that time and to many members of this House, that the hon. gentleman should have made such a charge against the farmers on such false premises. The hon. gentleman stated at that time that these mortgages might have been very much larger, owing to interest accumulations. It was pointed out to him at that time that these mortgages had been receiving payments. It was quoted to him from the returns of the loan companies at that time that the payments had been eminently satisfactory during that very year and that mortgages had been reduced rather than increased during the time of which the hon. gentleman was speaking. The hon. gentleman charged the administration with neglecting their duty because they had not at that time, or previous to that time, provided some machinery by which it could be known what was the actual indebtedness of the farmers on account of mortgages in this province. The hon. gentleman has been in power six years and I have not heard that he has taken any step in that direction. I think his figures were so effectually contradicted at the time that he thought no particular advantage could be derived from his taking such a step. The hon. gentleman is endowed with a considerable sense of humour and he showed that humour when he offered his advice to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) in regard to the proper way to protect the farmers. I think he said that certain bounties should be given to each farmer for every product he raised. Surely the hon. gentleman had not forgotten that during the Conservative administration duties were raised on the products of the farm, that protection was given to the farmer by the Conservative administration, which raised these duties and enabled many farmers to go into mixed farming, thereby saving their financial lives. That was due to a Conservative administration, and if the hon. gentleman has forgotten it, the farmers in my neighbourhood at least have not forgotten it, and they have taken advantage of the protection given to them by the Conservative government. The hon. gentleman, when he indulges in unconscious humour, is still brighter than when he attempts real humour. He has found great fault with the Conservative expenditure of $38,000,000, and at the same time he accused every camp follower of the Conservative government of making hundreds of thousands of dollars out of the Conservative administration of that day.

If it were possible for camp followers of the Conservatives to make large sums of money by corrupt means out of an expenditure of $38,000,000 annually, did it strike the Minister of Trade and Commerce that it must have been a perfect Godsend to the camp followers of the Liberals when they increased the expenditure to $57,000,000 a year. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was the only man on the treasury benches who had made any attempt to excuse the increased expenditure by the Liberal government. His only excuse was that there were some cross entries on each side which would reduce that expenditure by about $5,000,000, and he instanced the expenditure on the Yukon. But the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) must have forgotten that there were cross entries of the same character during the Conservative administration, and that there were expenditures in the Yukon I might almost say since confederation from which Conservative governments absolutely received no return. There has been a large expenditure in that country for years but until these hon. gentlemen who are so fortunate came into power, there never has been any return to the treasury from the Yukon territory. The excuse offered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not in any way alter the position of matters, and the government of the day ought to be condemned for having raised that expenditure to so high a rate without justification, and in utter defiance of the pledges they made to the people before they came into power. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) had a good deal to say about the corruption of the Conservative government, but surely he has not forgotten that there were some little scandals during the short time he occupied the position of Finance Minister from 1873 to 1878. There were then some rumours about the Fort Francis lock, and the Neebing hotel, and the purchase of steel rails some seven or eight years in advance of the time they were required. All these things seem to have escaped the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he could think of nothing except the terrible corruption that he alleged existed under Conservative rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words, if the House will pardon me, in reference to the sad though glorious news that has come to us during the last day or two from South Africa. Let me pay a brief tribute to the memory of two of the men who fell so gloriously fighting for the empire on the veldt of South Africa. One of these men came from my own town and is the son of a particular friend of mine ; the other was captain in the regiment of which I have the honour to be major. Captain Milligan was a good soldier in every sense of the word. He represented Canada at Wimbledon and Bisley, and he was in every way fitted for the duty which he volunteered to perform for his country in South Africa. Canada mourns two brave men in the two soldiers of whom I speak. I desire to pay this tribute to their memory and to express my sympathy with their relatives and friends who are bereaved by their sad loss. It will be a consolation to them to know that these two gentlemen met so glorious a death.

As regards the resolution proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition, I shall have much pleasure in supporting it. The Conservative party in Canada since 1878 have been consistent protectionists. They have nailed their colours to the mast, and in pronouncing for a declared policy of protection they are simply following the policy which was inaugurated in 1878 and bequeathed to them by their grand old chieftain Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. JAMES KENDREY (West Peterborough). Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up much of the time of the House in dwelling on the issues which have been submitted to us in the course of this debate on the budget. Under the policy formulated by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, which built up the industries and increased the wealth of this country, the industries of Canada were prosperous, and in so far as that policy has been departed from by the present government it has proved disastrous to our home manufacturers, and to the labouring men of Canada. I call the attention of the House to certain Canadian industries which are suffering seriously, because of what is called the preferential tariff of this government. It is all very well for these gentlemen opposite to be loyal, and loyalty is a good thing in its place, but as a Canadian I maintain that we should be loyal to our own people first. But, Sir, while these gentlemen opposite have been loyal to the people of England, they have not been loyal to the citizens of Canada, or at all events to a great number of them. I remember some years ago when this preferential tariff was first brought up in the House, I was amongst the first to condemn in the strongest language I could this so-called preference. Remember that this is not a preference given to England or given to the empire, but it is a preference which is given to the English manufacturer against the Canadian manufacturer, and to the English workingman against the Canadian workingman. So long as I have a voice in this House I shall oppose any such preference which can only be worked out at the expense of our fellow Canadians. Much as I would wish to, it will be rather difficult for me or for any one else, to follow the views enunciated on the trade question by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House from the ministers down, because the views expressed by them differ so materially one from the other. One of these hon. gentlemen supporting the government declares that he is a free trader; another declares that he is a protectionist; one is a broad protectionist and another is a limited protectionist, and so we have ranged in the support of the present ministry a heterogeneous lot covering all kinds of protectionists and all kinds of free traders. Again we have some of the ministers travelling through the country making statements on trade matters which are entirely incorrect. The Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) speaking at Blackstock in West Durham is thus reported in the Toronto 'Globe' of January 11th:

> He thought 23⅓ per cent was enough to pay the manufacturer for his goods. He ventured to say that if the woollen manufacturers would take counsel among themselves; throw out inadequate machinery and apply themselves to newer and better methods of manufacture they would be able to face competition without adding further to the burdens of the rest of the people of this country.

I take exception to this language, because the statements are not correct and in fact the minister (Hon. Mr. Fisher) plainly shows that he knows nothing about the woollen industry. If the government had the interest of this country at heart, they would send a commission of competent gentlemen—because they are very fond of appointing commissions—to go through the country and find out the wants of the country; but they have not done so. The woollen manufacturers and the people working in the woollen mills are just as much entitled to fair treatment as the people in Nova Scotia who are well protected. It seems that this government has class legislation; it legislates for one part of the country against another part. There is no part of this country that has suffered more than the province of Ontario, and there is class legislation against that province. No gentleman in this House knows that better than the Minister of Customs. Deputation after deputation came here and laid its case before the government—the cotton manufacturers, the woollen manufacturers and the agricultural implement manufacturers. I sympathize with the agricultural implement makers of this country. I think they ought to have a fair measure of protection. Last year over $2,000,000 worth of agricultural implements came in from the United States. If the government were looking after the interests of this country, they should have looked after that industry. With 2 or 3 per cent more duty we would have been able to keep that $2,000,000 in this country instead of sending it to the United States. The Minister of the Interior stated in Manitoba that if the woollen manufacturers of this country were not able to live on 23⅓ per cent, they ought to shut down their places. We have as highly skilled labour in this country as is to be found in any other part of the world. The statement has been made by one or two gentlemen on the other side of the House that the Canadian mills were not equipped with up-to-date machinery; but these hon. gentlemen make statements that they do not know anything about. A great many of us have all our capital locked up in this industry, and it is a pretty hard thing if you have a government that legislates away all our interest. We are not put on the same footing as other manufacturers of this country. Go back 150 years, and you will find that the government of England protected the woollen industry to such an extent that it would not allow any wool to come into the country. The great woollen industry of England was built up by protection. In this country we are not able to manufacture as they do in the United States, where each mill makes a specialty of one line of goods; but we have to diversify our manufactures in order to keep our plants going. Since the preference came into effect, our woollen industry has been much worse off than ever. Large quantities of German goods come into this country under the preference as English goods, although hardly any English work has been done on them. These are statements which I am prepared to prove. I object to that preference because it is class legislation. It strikes at one particular class of people. And we have the Minister of Agriculture saying that our factories are not properly equipped, and the Minister of Interior saying that 23½ per cent is enough protection. If it is enough for one class of manufactures why is it not enough for others ? Yet other manufactures have protection running all the way from 25 to 35 per cent. The woollen industry in Canada to-day is paralyzed. It is smaller to-day than it has been for 20 years. There are 40 sets of cards, over 200 looms, and over 7,000 spindles less in operation to-day than there were in 1899. These figures do not include the mills which are at present idle. It is worthy of a passing note that of the half-dozen mills burnt down in the last year or so not one has been re-built. These facts in themselves should be sufficient to convince the government that they have brought disaster on an industry which was once one of the most prosperous and promising in the country. Up to the time the preferential tariff came in the woollen manufactures of this country possibly did not increase as much as they would have done in times of good trade. We have had good trade in the last few years, and under the old conditions there would have been double the amount of machinery running in this country than there is, and we would hardly have been able to keep up with the demand. We have presented our case to the government, and the government has given us no relief. In several parts of the country, at Hespeler, Galt, Cornwall and Sherbrooke, our hands have left and gone to the United States. In the United States, with their high tariff they are able to pay larger wages than we could pay. Over 100 men out of my mill have left and gone to the United States, and I have had some skilled labour for twenty years, some for fifteen, some for ten. They went because they could get higher wages there. This makes it very hard for the woollen manufacturer in this country. It is impossible for him to compete, if the manufacturer on the other side of the line are able to draw away his best labour, while on the other hand, there is the English preference against him—a preference in favour of the British manufacturer and against the Canadian. The government say they have given this preference to England. They have not given it to England, but only to a few manufacturers in England. It is a preference to English labourers and English capitalists as against Canadians. I think those who have invested their money in Canada are entitled to fair play. And where are the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who will invest a dollar in the woollen business of this country ? You could not get them to take any stock in such an industry at all.

I wish to call attention to an article which appeared in the Toronto 'Sun,' of March 26, 1902. It refers to the Cornwall mill. It states that it is notorious throughout the trade that this factory was built thirty years ago, and that the machinery has not been replaced and is now out of date. I do not know where this paper got its information, but some two years or two years and a half ago I was asked to go down and investigate that property and report on its condition, the reason being that they wanted me to take an interest in the business and also take the general managership along with the concern, of which I am at the head to-day. Under ordinary conditions I would have accepted. But, after inspecting the property, although I found that the mill was as well equipped as half the mills in the United States, or as half the mills in England, I found that what had closed it down was the preference. I said : So long as we have the preference I will not invest a dollar in any mill in this country. And that is the reason I did not take hold of it. I do not believe in the newspapers making such statements such as I have just quoted. But we find the Minister of Agriculture making statements of a similar kind. Instead of doing that, the government should have employed somebody to investigate the condition of the woollen industry. No minister or member of this House has a right to make statements concerning an important industry like this without knowing the facts. There is another point to be considered. A mill that would cost $100,000 in England would cost $140,000 in Canada, owing to the duties and the freight. There is, thus, the item of interest always against the Canadian mill. And this is due to conditions imposed by the government. Then, also, there is the question of labour. I say that in this country we pay from 40 to 50 per cent more than they do in the English mills. I went there and investigated their conditions; and I want to say that I hope never to see the conditions in this country that exist in England even to-day. Whether we are employers of labour or not, we wish to see our workmen get a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. But if this preference is continued, we shall be obliged to lower our wages. The government are legislating against the labour of this country and are driving out Canadians. I know, as a matter of fact, many workers who have left this country, driven out by this preference. The hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) also knows that many have been driven away. I think that the hon. gentleman is well informed concerning the condition of the woollen industry in this country and knows that mills from one end of the country to the other are about closed down. Within the the last six or seven years not a mill has paid any interest on the investment. For some time we had bad trade conditions, but now, trade is good, business is expanding in every other line. But the woollen industry is paralyzed. Had the tariff conditions remained unchanged, had we been given a fair show, our trade would have been all right. The collar industry is about in the same condition, I believe. The manufacturers of agricultural implements, I understand, are not given satisfactory conditions, and I, for one, would be glad to see them put on a basis to enable them to keep out this $2,000,000 worth of machinery which is imported into this country, and make that much more in Canada. I do not say that we ought to have high duties, but they should be fair duties, duties that would enable us to compete and to pay the working people good wages. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Customs to the smuggling of textile goods of German, Austrian, and French manufacture, which are said to be finished in England and brought into Canada. If the Minister of Customs will send his inspectors to Peterborough, I think I have a good deal of information that I could give them on that line. I do not wish to make any statements here to the detriment of anybody in particular, but there are certain goods imported by wholesale houses here which are sent to Canadian establishments merely to be finished, and the finishing of which amounts scarcely to any work at all. There is probably not 5 per cent of the cost added to these goods by the work done on them. But they are coming in case after case, by the hundreds of pieces, while our woollen industry is being paralyzed.

Mr. WRIGHT. What class of goods does the hon. gentleman refer to ?

Mr. KENDREY. Woollen goods.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman mean all kinds of woollen goods, such as cashmeres as well as tweeds ?

Mr. KENDREY. I am not speaking of cashmere.

Mr. WRIGHT. They are woollen goods, and I wanted to know to what particular kinds of goods the hon. gentleman was referring.

Mr. KENDREY. I am referring to serges and goods of that kind used for ladies dresses, and so forth. I come now to another point with reference to the wool of this country. Never in our history was the Canadian wool so cheap as it is to-day. It is only worth some 12 or 13 cents a pound, so that our farmers hardly get anything for their wool. That shows the effect which this preference against our woollen manufacturers is having on our native wool. Take the western wool which is a good wool, and which can be worked up in all the woollen mills of this country, at present there is no profit on it. Some years ago our western farmers grew a finer grade of wool, but as they are not able to get paying prices for it, they are now only growing the coarser grades. The preference, therefore, by paralyzing one-half the woollen mills, is hurting the native wool of the country. I remember well that in 1896, when I had my election my oponents attacked the national policy simply because wool was so cheap, but to-day it is several cents a pound cheaper than it ever was. Thus you will see, Sir, that the prosperity of the woollen manufacturing industry of this country is identical with that of our farmers. Take the town of Cornwall and a number of other towns, which I could name, which, in years gone by, granted exemption from taxes for ten years and twenty years in order to build up this woollen manufacturing industry. To-day they find that all their sacrifices have been in vain, because this government is legislating to kill the very industries to which these municipalities gave exemptions from taxes for the purpose of aiding in their establishment. Just as soon as this preference came into effect in 1899, our woollen mills began to shut down. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) told us how things were prospering down there, how property doubled in value, but that is only in one part of the country, and the reason is evident. It is because we have given the particular industry of that section the heaviest form of protection—a bounty of $7 per ton on their iron and steel. I think that it is unfair to give such an advantage to one province without giving an equal advantage to the other provinces. In the province of Ontario you will find nearly three-fourths of the whole machinery of the woollen industry of this Dominion. But a number of these mills have shut down and more will have to close in the next year or two, and all because of the preference we have given the English manufacturer. That preference has done more to paralyze the woollen business than any other. There are some industries that of course are not affected by it at all. Take, for instance, the wooden ware and furniture and boots and shoes and food products, and other industries of that kind, they send their products into the British market, and consequently can hold their own here against the preferential tariff. But the woollen industry has to meet the full force of British competition. That is an industry which the British manufacturers for long years have made peculiarly their own—so much so that they can face competition even in those parts of the world where a high protective tariff is in force. I did expect that the government would have applied some remedy to that particular industry. They certainly should have done so, for as Canadians they should have taken care not to legislate against any particular Canadian industry. If they were alive to our interests, they would have sent around commissioners to examine into this question. Deputation after deputation has waited on this government for years to show the condition of the trade, and surely it was an elementary duty of the government to send some one or some number of gentlemen to examine and see in what position that industry was before legislating it out of existence. I have nothing further to add except to say that so long as I hold a seat in this House, I shall condemn any preference that does not work to the benefit of Canadians.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the woollen machinery cost 40 per cent more in this country than in the old country.

Mr. KENDREY. Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT. And also that the woollen manufacturers in Canada were paying much higher wages to their men than are the English manufacturers ?

Mr. KENDREY. Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is that the case with reference to the American manufacturers ?

Mr. KENDREY. No, the Americans are paying higher wages than we can afford to pay under the conditions existing here.

Mr. WRIGHT. Supposing you find upon your counter a piece of tweed or worsted which is of English manufacture, how are you to know whether it is all English manufacture or whether one portion was made in Germany.

Mr. KENDREY. Within the last six or seven weeks there was a fire in Toronto, and one of the establishments was burned down. They consequently sent me these goods to finish and dye, and that is the reason why I know all about it. I do not wish to hurt the people in that business or take this as a personal matter, but as the hon. gentleman has put the question I tell him that I know exactly where the goods come from.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that these goods he referred to were partially made in the old country and were finished here in Canada ?

Mr. KENDREY. Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT. They were not imported from Germany to England and finished there, and then brought over here as English goods ?

Mr. KENDREY. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, there are some questions that I might answer, but I do not think it would be hardly fair to these people to do so. I said to the Minister of Customs that I would give him such information of that kind as I deemed it right to give. I do not wish to stand up here and be cross-questioned by the hon. gentleman, but I would be willing to give to the Minister of Customs that information.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of the Minister of Customs, the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 8, 1902.

The Speaker took the Chair at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) moved :

That from this date to the end of the Session Government Orders have precedence on Thursdays immediately after Questions to be put by members.

Motion agreed to.

ACCOMMODATION FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to bring to the attention of the government the fact that the committee room in the tower used by the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, is entirely too small for the needs of that committee ; and, as the old railway committee room has been vacated since the new one has been finished, and is comparatively idle, I think we ought to be allowed to use that room, which is not occupied except on days when the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization does not usually sit, and therefore it seems to me that it could be used by that committee without inconvenience to any other.

Mr. A. CAMPBELL (Kent). That would hardly do. The Banking and Commerce Committee meets there, also the Public Accounts Committee, and I understand that the Senate Railway Committee is going to meet there. So that I think that room will be fairly occupied for the rest of the session.

Mr. SPROULE. The Banking and Commerce Committee could surely use the Private Bill's Committee room, which is vacant most of the time. I think the Public Accounts Committee is not so large that it could not use the tower room conveniently.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The Public Accounts Committee is large and usually has a number of witnesses, and I would not like to take the step recommended by the hon. gentleman if it would interfere with the meetings of that committee. With regard to the Senate, I hope that arrangements may be come to under which the Senate Railway Committee can use the Railway Committee room on alternate days. There are no reasons why we should not come to a friendly understanding and avoid any difficulty. If several committees are called on the same day, of course there may be confusion, but the chairmen of the respective committees can easily arrange so as to prevent any trouble of that kind.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). A good deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite, Mr. Speaker, regarding the increased expenditure of this country, and that is a subject which perhaps has not been dealt with on this side as fully as it might be. In view of what these hon. gentlemen opposite have said and in view also of the feeling which, I am free to admit, may exist to some extent in the minds of sincere believers in Liberal principles and firm supporters of this government, that we have not been faithful to the instructions given to us or to the platform of 1893, I would like this afternoon to tax the patience of the House somewhat by entering into the details and giving figures bearing on our expenditure. I know that it is not very pleasant for the House to have to listen to a long array of figures, nor is it at all agreeable to me to enter into these somewhat dry details, and I shall endeavour to be as brief as possible and weary the House as little as I possibly can in this respect.

Some hon. members of the opposition have charged my hon. colleague the Finance Minister with not having put his case fairly, but to my mind he gave us an honest, clear and fair statement. In fact I think that he put the case which might be urged against the government in a stronger light than was necessary. He informed the House that he anticipated having to add some millions to the public debt this year. I think that, in stating the amount he did he took the view of one who was anxious to present rather the least hopeful view of the future, and thus, like a wise financier, err on the safe side by giving a forecast which would be more likely to result in an agreeable disappointment to the people than the reverse. I am in hopes, judging by the trade returns and the financial situation, as I view it, that our expenditure will fall short of the figures mentioned by the Minister of Finance, and that it will be found that my hon. colleague, in his budget speech, presented a case against the government stronger than the facts would warrant.

My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, gave us a statement of the increases under the various heads of expenditure, but there he stopped. He did not enter into any comparisons. He made no allowance for the altered condition of affairs at present compared with those of the years preceding this administration. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Osler) also referred to the increase of expenditure in a general way. It is, however, very easy to make general statements, but much more difficult to particularize. I have taken the trouble to scrutinize the various expenditures, and at the risk of wearying the House, I propose to give the results of my researches, and I am convinced I shall be able to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of all fair-minded men, that comparing service with service, and taking into account the rapid development of the country during the last five years, its great increase in population—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And the wonderful activity which has prevailed in our industrial life, the financial record of this government compares very favourably with that of its predecessors. I hear cheers from hon. gentlemen opposite, rather derisive in their nature. In view of the argument advanced by the leader of the opposition that the increase in our population was as great during the last five year decade of Conservative administration as during the succeeding five years of this government, it becomes necessary for me to consider carefully this question of our increase in population. I think I shall be able to prove conclusively that the result of the last census redounds to the credit of the present administration. Leaving aside the two arguments—that the census of 1891 was stuffed and that the census of 1901 was improperly taken—and assuming, for the purpose of my argument, that both censuses were correct, I propose to show that during the last five years of the census decade, the progress of this country was much more rapid than it was during the first five years, and the natural and inevitable conclusion must be that in the latter half of the decade there was a greater increase in population than in the former. The following figures will bear out this contention. I am addressing myself to fair-minded men, to whom I think I can prove beyond doubt that the increase of population during the last decade must have taken place almost wholly within the last five years during which the Liberal party were in power.

What figures shall I give, by what shall I measure ? Let me take the trade of the country, and what do I find ? I find it shows the following results in the two periods I have mentioned :

	$		454,641	2,454,899

These figures prove beyond any question or cavil, it seems to me, that the increase in the population during the last five years must have been almost equal to the total increase that took place during the decade. There was a period of almost absolute stagnation in this country during the last five years when hon. gentlemen opposite held office. On the other hand, there has been a period of unprecedented prosperity in this country during the first five years this government has been in power. And it will not do to say that good times or better trade alone has been responsible for these increases, while the population has remained stationary. The increases are so large that the mere improvement in trade would not account for them—there must have been an increase in population as well. Now, figures are rather tiresome things so I have reduced these comparisons to percentages, and I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite to listen to them :—

	Percentage of increase between 1891 and 1896.	Percentage of increase between 1896 and 1901.

It seems to me that these figures prove conclusively my contention with respect to population and they also prove that Canada has developed at a marvellously rapid rate during the last five years. Take another illustration of our progress. During the fiscal year 1896, the daily foreign trade of Canada, Sundays excluded, amounted to $763,659; and during the last fiscal year, 1901, it was $1,236,112, an increase of nearly half a million dollars for every working day. The aggregate foreign trade of Canada on the basis of goods entered for consumption, and Canadian produce exported, for the half year ended December, 1901, was only $7,000,000 less than the trade for the whole fiscal year 1896. For the seven months ended January, 1902, it was $21,000,000 greater than for the whole year of 1896.

The aggregate foreign trade of the country during the five years 1897 to 1901 inclusive, was $1,651,726,204, as compared with $1,193,453,797 for the previous five years, being an increase under Liberal rule of $458,272,407. If further proof were needed, other figures could be given, but I do not wish to tire the House. Why have I given these figures ? Simply because they give us something by which we can judge the wisdom of the government's course in many things. Many may have been biased by statements in the press supporting hon. gentlemen opposite that there has been an increase to fifty, or sixty, or as some say even seventy millions of dollars in the expenditure. I ask fair-minded men, in judging of the increased expenditure, to take into account the difference of the circumstances of the country now and in bygone days. A business man's expenses increase with the growth of his business—so with a nation. The government had to keep pace with the advance movement. It would have been remiss in its duty if it had failed to do so. Bearing these facts in mind—the growth in the trade of the country and the evident increase that we have in the population—let us proceed to a scrutiny of the expenditure. We will take first the ordinary, the controllable expenditure. For the purposes of this comparison I take the year 1894-95 and compare it with the year just closed. I take the year 1894-95 because it is well known and will not be denied—at any rate it cannot be successfully contradicted—that the expenditure accounts for 1896 under hon. gentlemen opposite were not completed accounts. I know that in my own department amounts were left over to be paid after the year had elapsed. It was an election year and the full expenditure was not shown. Therefore, I take the year 1894-95. The ordinary controllable expenditure for 1901 was $46,866,367. In 1894-95, the ordinary expenditure was $38,132,005. These figures show an increase in 1901 over 1895 of $8,734,362.

Now on the face of it this looks large, but let us consider the details before passing judgment. I propose to go through all the departments, and thus afford an opportunity to any hon. gentleman who follows me to point out which of these particular expenditures he takes exception to. I call upon them to do that; and I mention to you, Mr. Speaker, right here, that the position of the opposition at this present moment is one that absolutely justifies every dollar of expenditure that has been made, and every dollar that has been added to the public debt. Why do I say that? Why, Sir, the Minister of Finance has made his budget speech, he has given the fact that our expenditure has been increased; he has not hidden the fact that on ordinary expenditure there has been an increase; he has not hidden the fact that on capital expenditure there has been an increase; he has not hidden the fact that there has been an addition to the public debt. These hon. gentlemen know that, and now is the time, now is the opportunity, if they dare do so, to offer an amendment and have it fairly debated. It was their duty to do it, to put a resolution before you, Mr. Speaker, declaring that the expenditure was unwise, unjustifiable, but they have not done it; and the fact that they have not done it proves conclusively to my mind that, they themselves being the judges, being conversant with the public accounts and the state of the country, are satisfied that the extra expenditure has been well and wisely made, and that there is no fault to be found with it. Sir, they do not venture to do so. If ever there was a time to challenge that expenditure it is now. It is very easy for them to rise and make speeches and let them go broadcast throughout the country, but the way for them to show that they are in earnest is to place themselves upon record against these expenditures——

Mr. POPE. And so we will.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. But you have not done it, and this is the time to do it when the financial statement is being discussed. The hon. gentleman sees the weakness of the position. Instead of introducing an amendment, an amendment so vague in itself that we cannot tell what it is, a thing that has reference to something that is not clear even in their own minds—instead of introducing that amendment, if they believe their own statements that there has been unjustifiable expenditure, why it was their bounden duty to move an amendment to that effect, and place it in your hands challenging the administration of the affairs of this country and dividing the House upon it; and, Sir, we would not have shrunk from the test and from the discussion that would have ensued. Let me go through these departments in detail, and as I do so I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that while there has been an increased expenditure, necessitated by the circumstances and conditions of the country, I think they will admit there is nothing to be alarmed about. Take the first item, the sinking fund, there is an increase in that of $478,025. Nobody is alarmed about that, it is simply a cross entry, that is all. In immigration there is an increase of $249,077, nearly a quarter of a million dollars. Now perhaps hon. members opposite join this in the general statement that there has been an unjustifiable increase in every department of the government. But what are the facts with reference to immigration? Have we had full value for the expenditure under that head?

An hon. MEMBER. No.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, does some hon. gentleman say? Then we hope he will put himself on record as condemning it. But if he does he will have to face these facts when he puts his motion before you, Mr. Speaker, that according to the records of the Interior Department, in the five years from 1897 to 1901, 190,000 immigrants have been brought into the country, and what is better, they seem to be staying here. Every western man knows that immigration has been greater during the last five years than for any previous like period. The figures prove that. Homestead entries:

1901	8,167

Do you tell me that a quarter of a million dollars of extra money expended in the way it has been under the Minister of the Interior, bringing in that 190,000 people, settling up these homesteads, has not been a good investment for this country? Why, Sir, the added commerce of this country alone justifies that increased expenditure. You can see it from the increased number of patents of Dominion lands issued:

And as I said before, the government and railway companies sold $454,641 worth of land in 1896, and in 1901, $2,454,899. I say, and I believe the country will say, that the increased expenditure under the head of immigration is justifiable, and has been a wise investment on the part of the minister who conducts that department. During the last fiscal year no less than 18,000 people came from the western states to settle in western Canada, many of them our own sons coming back to this land, when there is a government in power making a condition of things here which entices them to return. This spring, reports from responsible customs officers indicate that there is a great rush of incoming settlers from the States. Permit me to quote an extract from a letter of one of the sub-collectors of the Customs Department stationed at North Portal, which is at the boundary of Minnesota:

> Since the rush began we are almost swamped with work both night and day. What with settlers coming in and wheat going out the railway yards are full all the time.

That is cheering. Swamped with work, night and day, with immigrants coming in with their settler's effects. And yet the hon. gentleman opposite would propose a resolution in this House affirming that $250,000 of an increase is unjustifiable. Why, in the 'Evening Journal' of Ottawa we saw a day or two ago this item clipped from the Medicine Hat 'News':

> Pouring Into the West.
> The influx of settlers to the Canadian west is simply wonderful. At Medicine Hat we are in a position to size up the great incoming, especially of Americans, as we see here daily train load after train load of would-be settlers, bringing with them carloads of miscellaneous effects—horses, cattle, implements, household stuff. The exodus, this time from the states into Canada, shows that the undeveloped riches of western Canada are becoming known, and Canada is coming into her own. The rush of settlers is unprecedented, and is taxing the railways to the limit to handle the business in connection with their trade.

Now it may be said that these settlers are coming in of their own accord. The Minister of the Interior has had a few men throughout the western states for a few years past to promote immigration from that country, recognizing the fact that they are a most desirable class of settlers; and their work is bearing fruit, and no fault can be found with that comparatively small increase of expenditure which has brought about such results, especially when we remember the fact that every one of these incoming settlers who settles in that country becomes himself a most valuable immigration agent by the letters he writes to others; and great as has been this increase of immigration, we can scarcely imagine at what ratio it will continue to grow in the years that are coming, and that without a greatly added expenditure on the part of this government. This, I claim, to be wise legislation, wise administration, and in the very best interests of the country.

Now, we come to the next department, that of arts, agriculture and statistics, presided over by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher). The increase here is $480,000. It is accounted for largely this year by an expenditure of $249,907 for the census, and for cold storage $100,059, for which there was no corresponding expenditure in 1895 except a small item of $5,729 charged against the belated preparation of the census in that year. Then, in exhibitions we have had Glasgow, Buffalo and Paris, and we spent $164,823 on these exhibitions. Any one who is conversant with the success of the Canadian exhibitors at these different exhibitions, I think, will admit that it was money wisely expended. It was money expended for the benefit of all classes of the community, not any one industry alone, but for all, and the accounts of the Glasgow exhibition especially are most cheering in their nature. Canada has been advertised, trade has been increased to a wonderful extent there, and also to a more limited extent at Buffalo, but even at Buffalo the Canadian commissioner's quarters were thronged daily with people making inquiries about the North-west Territories and other portions of the Dominion. The benefits to be derived from the Paris exhibition were fully explained to us by the Minister of Agriculture last year. This accounts for an increase of $162,864. Is that expenditure to be condemned or is it to be approved? Was it not a wise expenditure, the laying out of that small sum at the present time to be returned ten-fold, though not perhaps in the manner in which you put it directly in cash into your pocket, but which will manifest itself in the increased prosperity of the people of the country? Then, in promoting the dairying interests of the country $20,000 more was spent last year. But the hon. Minister of Agriculture had no charge of $40,000 for the purchase of cheese and butter as in 1895. The maintenance of experimental farms only cost $4,700 more last year and we know the valuable work being done there, too.

I ask what expenditure there has been in connection with the Department of Agriculture that has not been wisely made or productive of good.

In legislation there is an item to which, perhaps, there might be a little exception taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. There is an increase of $231,155. This is largely accounted for by the increase in the sessional indemnity granted last session. If our hon. friends are feeling very badly about that, or, if any of us feel badly, we can reduce that increased expenditure by telling the accountant that we will be satisfied with the old sum that we received before.

Mr. BROCK. Are you prepared to make a motion to that effect ?

Mr. CLANCY. Does that include the hon. gentleman's increase of salary as well ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In civil government there is an increase of $52,000. I suppose any one will admit that you cannot, with the increasing work that is devolving upon the government, expect that there will not be some increase.

In the government of the Yukon there is an increase of $274,000 spent by the Department of the Interior on ordinary or consolidated fund account. Now, there was no corresponding expenditure in 1894-95, but everyone knows, or should know, that while $274,000 was expended there, as far as any taxation upon the people of Canada is concerned outside of the Yukon territory, it has no bearing whatever, because, if you go to the Public Accounts you will find there a statement which shows that since and inclusive of 1894-95 there has been an expenditure in the Yukon of $5,945,216, while the revenue derived from that district amounts to $6,700,193, the surplus of revenue over expenditure being $755,000. Now, though you had a swelling up of the expenditure made under the Department of the Interior by $274,000 on Yukon account, it did not cost the people of this country one cent of taxation outside of the Yukon. The Yukon paid for itself and put $755,000 into the public treasury besides.

Under the head of administration of justice there is an increase of $117,550. Of this amount $74,787 was spent in the Yukon, while $3,701 was spent for enforcing the alien labour law. There were no expenditures under these heads in the year 1895. There is an increase of $20,000 in the province of Ontario and of $16,000 in the province of Quebec for additional judges. Of course, justice must be administered, and it is necessary, with the growing condition of the country that facilities shall be given for the settlement of disputes. This is an item, however, which I think will very well bear comparison with previous years. In 1890 there was an expenditure for the administration of justice of $709,784; in 1895 it had swollen to $755,682, while in 1901, excluding the Yukon, it amounted to $798,445, so that the expenditure has not increased at as great a ratio during these years of plenty as during the previous years.

Under the head of fisheries there is an increase of $47,529. This is practically accounted for by three new necessary services : Steamer for fisheries and customs protection in British Columbia $19,973, cold storage for bait $12,674, and fish hatcheries in British Columbia and Gaspé, $19,981. These are the items of increase. Who will say that these items are not justifiable ? I believe that the credit for providing cold storage for bait is to be given to the hon. senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. Kendall), who pointed out that the expenditure would be of great benefit to the hardy fishermen who live down on the coast there, and listening to him with the most intense interest, as I have endeavoured to do to every hon. gentleman who has taken part in this debate, coming from whatever part of the Dominion he may, I heard him state that he thought he could see a way in which this important departure might be still further extended with advantage to the fishermen by providing something of the same kind for the deep sea fishermen. As far as I am individually concerned, he will not need, if he can perfect a scheme of that kind, to ask that the cost be taken out of the bounty that the fishermen get at the present time, thus reducing it by that amount, but I think this parliament will willingly vote him any amount that is in reason.

Mr. SPROULE. How do you reconcile that increase with the fact that the decision of the Privy Council took the fisheries away from you largely ? Notwithstanding that there is an increase in the expenditure of the government.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. It did not take the ocean away from us.

Mr. SPROULE. It was decided that the fisheries belonged to the provinces, except of course the Atlantic fisheries.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In public works there has been a very great increase. There has been an increase of $1,644,316. Now, that is a large increase. I frankly admit that if the people of this country want to stop every improvement; if they want to stop all expenditure on these public works, the government can do that. But it is for us to consider whether it would be wise policy for the government to do so. In a prosperous period such as we have had, when the finances of the country warranted needful public expenditure, and when the public works in many parts of this Dominion had to be repaired or renewed to save them from utter collapse owing to the dilapidated condition into which they fell during the Conservative government, the question for us was : Is it wise that we should preserve these public works for the benefit of the people of this country ? Of course, as I have said, we can stop this expenditure if we choose. If we want to stop all expenditure we do not by any manner of means need to raise the amount of revenue we do, and we could confine ourselves simply to carrying on the ordinary machinery of the government. But there are other duties devolving upon the government and upon parliament. We have a country to be developed and to be improved, and there are certain expenditures which while benefiting the country bring back to us valuable returns. In such cases there should be a wise expenditure of public money.

On public buildings we expended in 1901, $1,195,847 and in 1895 there was only expended on these buildings, $486,275. It will be seen that we spent a great deal more than was expended in 1895, and if we spent it properly the people of Canada have the benefit of it. If we did not spend it properly, then of course we are to blame, but our hon. friends opposite do not make that charge against us. On harbours, rivers and dredging in 1901 we expended $1,636,726, while in 1895 the expenditure was only $1,075,993. We expended over half a million more in dredging our rivers and harbours last year than we did in 1895. Is that an unwise expenditure? Who will say that it is? Remember, that expenditure was not confined to the harbours and rivers within the boundaries of the constituencies of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but it was a general expenditure in different parts of the Dominion; deepening harbours where it was necessary it should be done; giving increased accommodation to the vast flow of trade and commerce, especially on the great lakes where we need all the harbours that can be provided in order that we may bring that vast traffic down through our own magnificent lake and river system, to the summer and winter seaports of Canada. That expenditure is made to enrich the producer in Canada who puts into his pocket in actual cash every cent that is saved in transportation, and it benefits the whole country as well for it gives employment and wages to the men who handle that grain at Canadian ports. On slides and booms, and upon roads and bridges, and so on, there has been an increased expenditure. These have been some of the expenditures for public works and I do not know that I need enlarge more fully upon that subject. The sum of $60,000 represents the expenditure on a telegraph line eastward to the Straits of Belle Isle in the interest of our shipping. We built a telegraph line to the Yukon, so that the far away city of Dawson, almost within the Arctic circle, that it used to take weeks and even months to reach, is now brought within daily communication of the Capital of the Dominion because a telegram given to the operator at Dawson reaches Ottawa on the same day. These are all expenditures that we had to make and which, if they were wisely made no one will find fault with. I do not know that even our Conservative friends opposite will find fault with these expenditures. When the estimates are under the consideration of the House I noticed that these hon. gentlemen instead of objecting to grants, rise one after the other in their places to point out where a further expenditure could be made in the public interest in their different constituencies, and it is perfectly right on their part to do so.

In the lighthouse, coast, ocean and river service there is an increase of $130,783, and $36,000 of this was spent for the construction of lighthouses in excess of what was spent before. Who will find fault with that ? On an additional steamer for this service $27,000 extra was spent and for a new lighthouse and fog alarm in Lake Erie $24,000.

The cost for mail subsidies and steamship subventions increased $115,930. Here is an item which effectually refutes the statement that it is impossible for a government to benefit the farmers of this country. What do we give these steamships subventions for ? Why does my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) expend money for cold storage ? It is because he wishes to benefit that portion of our population which belongs to the agricultural community, and seeing that he can reduce the cost of carrying their goods in prime condition to a foreign market, he expends money to provide these cold storage facilities in order that the tillers of the soil may get one cent or two cents a pound more for their produce. That is the reason why we give these increased subsidies to steamship lines, and who will deny that that is a wise expenditure ? Under the head of steamship subventions twenty-nine services were subsidized last year, as against eighteen in 1895.

The expenditure upon superannuation increased by $59,122. In reference to that let me say that so far as I am aware no additional term of years has been added to the superannuation of any employee by this government and it will not be forgotten that this government two or three years ago substituted for the Superannuation Act, another Act which is self sustaining and applies to new appointees after July, 1898.

For militia and defence there was an increase of nearly half a million dollars. I merely mention that because it is well known that that money was for the better equipment of our volunteers, and the expenditure has never to my knowledge been questioned or even criticised.

On the mounted police service there has been an increase of $266,025, but $498,824 of that was expended for the mounted police in the Yukon, and as I have pointed out the Yukon has paid for the Yukon, and has paid for that expenditure along with the others. Therefore, if you deduct the expenditure for the Yukon police, you will find that the service generally costs us less than it did before.

In the North-west Territories government there was an increase of $200,761. For my part it seems to me—although I am not inviting people to ask for additional aid to the government—but it seems to me from the facts within the knowledge of every man, that that item ought to be increased in fairness of the settlers who went into the North-west, who are charged with the expenses of the government and of educating the youth, and whose expenditures are bound to increase commensurate with the increase of the population. No one will find fault with that expenditure.

Under the head of 'miscellaneous' there has been an increase of $118,000, and $60,000 of this represents the grant that was given to beautify the city of Ottawa, and in return for which we receive considerations from the city authorities in the line of a water supply and so on.

The interest on the public debt increased $341,660. But let us look at this for a moment. The expenditure for interest in 1890 was $9,656,841, and in 1895 it had increased to $10,466,294; an increase in these five years of $809,453. In 1901 the expenditure for interest on the public debt was $10,807,954. During the five years since 1896 it had increased by $341,660 as against $809,453 increase during the previous five years of the Conservative government. That is quite a difference. Then, I trust the hon. gentlemen opposite have not forgotten that when they went out of office they left this country in debt; that they were not paying their way. Several millions were added to the public debt, and they had not provided for the interest on that, because it had not become due until our first year, and therefore there is a debt which ought to be charged against them. In these different departments I have shown the increases to the amount of something like $5,000,000 out of the $8,000,000 increase in the ordinary expenditure.

I come now to the expenditures under the head of collection of revenue, that is, customs, excise, post office, railways, and minor revenues. Now, a good way to judge whether there has been extravagance on the part of the government or not is to compare the revenue derived from these different sources with the amount expended in collecting that revenue. If that is done, the comparison stands to the credit of the Liberal government. In 1894-5 the expenditure under this head was $9,129,416, and the revenue collected was $33,978,129, the percentage cost of collection being 27 per cent of the amount collected. In 1901 the expenditure was $12,503,249; but the revenue was $52,514,701, the percentage cost of collection being only 24 per cent, or 3 per cent less than it was in 1895. If it had cost as much per cent last year as it did in 1895, the expenditure would have been over $1,600,000 more than it actually was. That, I think, points to economy and efficient administration. That is a statement that will enable any one who has thought that the expenditure in these different departments had increased, to see that there has been nothing reckless or extravagant in the conduct of them.

Take the post office department as an illustration. Its expenditure in 1901 was $3,931,446 and its revenue was $3,441,504. In 1895 the expenditure was $3,593,647 and the revenue was only $2,792,789. The increase in the expenditure in 1901 over 1895 was $337,799, but the increase in the revenue during the same period was $648,715. This shows nearly $2 more revenue for every dollar expended; and this has been accomplished along with a reduction of 33⅓ per cent on the cost of transmitting those millions and tens of millions of letters which have circulated through this country; with a reduction in the cost of carrying a letter to the British Isles from 5 cents to 2 cents, and with all the other advantages that have come to the country, such as additional mail routes and other facilities which had never been in use before.

Then take the Intercolonial Railway, another of the departments in which there is expenditure for the collection of revenue. Last year the working expenses of the road increased by about $2,500,000; but do not forget that the revenue increased by fully $2,000,000. I may be told that there was a deficit this year in the Intercolonial Railway. But I may remind you that there was a surplus last year. On a great public work of this kind, you may have a surplus in one year and a deficit in another. The profits of a great railroad cannot be judged by the results of any single year. This year there has been an expenditure of many thousands of dollars that will result in saving expenditures for years to come. So I think there is nothing to be alarmed at, even though there happens to be a deficit this year.

I am not as fully conversant with the departments of other ministers as I am with my own, and I will just illustrate by reference to the customs department, how the increase of expenditure is not only necessary, but is perfectly justifiable and perhaps worthy of commendation instead of condemnation. In the department of customs there has been an increase of expenditure from 1895 to 1901. In 1894-5 the expenditure was $917,632; in 1901 it was $1,123,817, which was an increase of 22·46 per cent in the expenses of working the department. The revenue, however, in 1894-5 was $17,890,516, while in 1901 it was $29,106,979. The expenditure increased 22·46 per cent while the revenue increased over 62 per cent. I may be met by hon. gentlemen opposite with the objection that your customs officers can as easily take in $10 on an entry as $1. But I would point out that the tendency in trade at the present time is for importers to repeat orders, so that the entries are really more frequent. In 1895 the number of entries inwards was 501,357 ; in 1901 there were 739,809, an increase of 47 per cent. The entries outwards increased 150 per cent. The railway reports inwards increased 51 per cent, and the railway reports outwards increased 85 per cent. There are 115 more ports at which the revenue is collected.

The percentage of the cost of collecting the revenue in 1894-5 was 5·13 per cent. It cost $5.13 on every $100 to collect the customs revenue in 1894-5. Last year it cost us $3.86 on every $100. With all the extra work I have pointed out—work that brings in no revenue at all, such as special officers that have to be engaged at Coteau, Fort William and many other places, owing to the volume of trade and commerce going through this country and demanding the attention of the Department of Customs; but from which we have no direct revenue added to the treasury—with all this extra work the cost of collecting is less than it was in 1894-5. Had it cost last year the same percentage to collect the customs revenue as it did in 1894-5, we would have expended $369,371 more than we did. We therefore saved that much in proportionate work to the government of this country, and in that increase of labour I have not asked credit for the new improvements we have made in the service—improvements which have cost this country large sums of money, but which, I believe, this country approves. Take my statistical office, there is $44,000 of expenditure there charged up, which was not incurred in 1894-5. Two years ago I asked the House to sanction this expenditure, and the House generously did so. It does not bring any revenue, but this is what it does. On April 4, there was placed on the Table, and ready to be placed in the hands of every member of this House, a complete statement in detail of the whole trade of this Dominion to the end of February, or about thirty-five days after the close of the month, you had in your possession a detailed statement of the whole trade and commerce of this country, from ocean to ocean, as complete as you could get it in the Trade and Navigation Returns, which you used to receive six months after the close of the fiscal year, and not before. That is something, I believe, the people are glad to have. That tells in what directions our trade and commerce is expanding. That gives information to hon. gentlemen of which they are glad to avail themselves. But it costs an extra expenditure and brings in no revenue, and yet is included in the expenditure I have given you. And notwithstanding that and other items I could mention of a corresponding character, it has cost us less to collect our revenue last year than it did in 1894-5. For instance there is the secret preventive services, on which we spent $5,000, and there is an expenditure of $7,000 on extra preventive service to prevent smuggling, and I venture to say that that expenditure has been repaid to the country ten times over. Unfortunately, however, for the Customs Department the benefits are not to be found in the added customs receipts, but will be found in the augmented inland revenue receipts, caused by our people buying the products of this country instead of foreign products smuggled into Canada. Then there is an additional expenditure of $18,000 for additional revenue cruisers and also $3,000 additional for customs uniforms. We thought it only right that the officers of this Dominion, who have to meet the travelling public at the border points, should have something more than a little medal to show their authority, when examining baggage. We thought that this government ought to put these officers in a decent uniform, so that our people need not be ashamed of the appearance of these men who have to meet the travelling public and examine their luggage. There are altogether some $92,000 additional expenditure by this government on new services that did not exist in 1894-5; and if I were to deduct that amount, as I should do to make a fair comparison, from my expenditure, instead of their being a proportionate saving in the cost of collecting the revenue of $369,371, there would be a saving of $461,371.

I have no doubt wearied the House with these items, but I did think it worth while, in view of the statements made by our friends opposite, that we should examine a little into detail, and I believe that the information I have given will be satisfactory to those who wish to be in a position to know just what extra expenditure was paid and the purposes to which it was put, and the government are not afraid of their verdict.

Let me now call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to this fact, which I think is most important, namely, that while there has been this increased expenditure of $8,000,000 odd, it has been defrayed out of revenue, and a surplus of over $19,000,000 left in the treasury. Whereas, during the last five years of Tory rule there was a net deficit of over $4,000,000.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the $19,000,000 has been left in the treasury ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I say that in the five years this government have been in power, we have paid all our ordinary expenditure and have a surplus left amounting to $19,743,527.69.

Mr. CLANCY. What has become of it ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I shall deal with that point a little later. I was mentioning to my hon. friend that while we have paid our way, that while we have met this increased expenditure out of revenue, we have done so, and still had a surplus left at the end of those five years, which we could have applied to reduction of our public debt but did not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. And for which I propose to give good reasons when I reach that part of my subject. But even if we have spent the surplus on capital account, as we did, let me ask the hon. gentleman in all fairness: Was it not better to have in those five years that surplus of $19,000,000 and spend it on capital account, which must do some good to the country, than have done as they did, during their last five years of office, namely, not meet our ordinary expenditure but absolutely run the country in debt? Which is the better? Which would my hon. friend rather have? Would he rather have us go back to the old times and have to borrow money to carry on our ordinary expenditure, or so arrange—as we have done—that under a lightened taxation we still have millions to spend on capital account besides paying all ordinary charges?

I find, on looking at my papers, that I anticipated my hon. friends opposite would want some light upon this point. For I have a note here: 'Our opponents may say you spent that surplus of $19,000,000 and more too on capital account.' And I have noted here: True, and for what have you spent it? Here I have the details of the capital and other special expenditures of the present government. We can call it all capital expenditure, for, as hon. gentlemen opposite understand very well, it all goes into capital account, although the special expenditure, such as my subsidies and the like, is kept in the books, as it has been under all administrations, under the heading of special account.

The present government has spent under this heading of capital, in the last five years, $41,622,572, as compared with $26,858,798 in the previous five years, or an increased capital expenditure of about $15,000,000. Thus, we have expended on capital account during our five years $15,000,000 more than hon. gentlemen opposite did. And, for my own part—I do not know how others may feel about it—I am not in a mood to apologize for it, but rather in a mood to approve and commend it. For what services was this money expended? These are the expenditures in round figures:

St. Lawrence river canals	$10,890,000
Trent canal	1,623,000
Welland canal	244,000
Sault Ste. Marie, canal	645,000
Lachine canal	883,000
Rideau canal	13,000
Total for canals	$14,000,000
Government railways	$8,700,000
Improvement, River St. Lawrence	1,460,000
Railway subsidies, including Crow's Nest Pass	8,270,000
Militia	1,670,000
Yukon	1,043,000
South African war	2,450,000
Dominion lands	838,657

Small services account for the balance. Now, to what do hon. gentlemen opposite take exception in these expenditures? Do they condemn the expenditure on the canals? They had entered upon it themselves, and were proceeding with it at a very leisurely pace—and borrowing money to pay for it. But, when this government came into power they recognized the fact that all parties were agreed that the St. Lawrence canals should be deepened. We had fourteen-foot navigation from the great lakes, through the Welland canal and a large part of the St. Lawrence river, but there were parts where you could not send a boat drawing more than eight or nine feet. As the strength of the weakest link determines the strength of a chain so the shallowest point of your navigation determined the size of the vessel that could be brought down from the great lakes. We believed that the country would sustain a policy that would complete this system of navigation, and that the people would like to see it done while they were alive—for men take more interest in things when they are alive than when they are dead. We engaged contractors, and their electric lights blazed on the banks of these canals, making the night as the day, while double gangs of men worked in order to complete the system of navigation. And it is completed. As a result of this expenditure, you have made Fort William and Port Arthur, Canadian ports at the head of Lake Superior, fourteen hundred miles from salt water—you have absolutely made them ocean ports. A vessel loaded at those ports may pass through that mighty waterway down to Montreal, on to Quebec, and, if need be across the broad Atlantic and land its cargo, as has been done, at Liverpool. Do hon. gentlemen opposite now say it would have been better to have sayed that $10,000,000 out of our $19,000,000 of surplus, not to have had the canal and still be $4,000,000 in debt. Is that the alternative hon. gentlemen opposite would favour? Then, take the government railways. On these you have spent $8,700,000. Have you not an asset for it? Have you not added to the length of the system? Have you not strengthened and improved the railway in all directions? This improvement was necessitated by the progress of railway business. We need to-day larger cars, heavier locomotives, and these entail heavier rails and stronger bridges. Of course, these things cost money meanwhile. But we have every reason to believe that this expenditure will result in an augmented revenue or lessened expenses. Who finds fault? Who says the Intercolonial Railway should not have been brought to Montreal, the great commercial emporium, instead of being left to terminate in a field, as you might say, at Lévis? It is true that a cry was raised against this in days gone by, but we do not hear it to-day. Who objects to the $1,460,000 spent in improving the River St. Lawrence? I represent an agricultural constituency, yet I approve that expenditure. Why? Is it out of love for the city of Montreal? I value Montreal and its residents very much, as I do other places in this Dominion and those who live in them; but it is not wholly for that and without thought of the interests of my constituents that I favour this expenditure. I wish to improve this waterway and the harbour of Montreal primarily because the harbour of Montreal cannot take all the shipping that seeks to come there. I want all the ships that will come to Montreal to have facilities for doing so. Why? The more ships that come there looking for trade the lower will be the freight rate; and every cent off the cost of transporting a bushel of wheat, or every dollar off the cost of transporting a steer, means a cent or a dollar in the pockets of the farmer in my constituency. This is a Dominion question and one in which the producers of this Dominion generally are interested. Then, take the railway subsidies, including the subsidy to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the total being $8,270,000, and also the expenditure on the South African war of $2,450,000 which this parliament granted willingly. If these expenditures had not been undertaken, we should not have added a dollar to the public debt, and would have had all these other improvements besides. Do hon. gentlemen opposite object to these subsidies to the railways? Does anybody object to the subsidy to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway? We do not hear them say so. One hon. gentlemen ventured to refer to it the other night—I think it was the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). He told us a yarn to the effect that he had found something crooked about it——

Mr. TAYLOR. Did not you increase the subsidy granted by the late government?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What was crooked about it?

Mr. TAYLOR. Ask Joe Martin; he will tell you.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon. gentleman tells us to ask Joe Martin. If I remember well, the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Taylor's) statement—I have not had time to look it up in 'Hansard,' but if I am wrong the hon. gentleman can correct me—was that there had been some corrupt bargain with the Canadian Pacific Railway to take Joe Martin, as he calls him, and for this we were to give an increase of subsidy.

Mr. TAYLOR. And you did it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Where did the hon. gentleman get the news, and when did he get it?

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson) will not contradict it conscientiously.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Will the hon. gentleman tell me how long he has had this information and yet kept it from the public. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) refuses to tell us where he got his information and how long he has had it. But this we do know—that hon. gentlemen opposite were loud in their denunciation of the Crow's Nest Pass subsidy when they were upon the political platform addressing the electors. The Crow's Nest deal and the Crow's Nest steal was the way they rang the changes on the words.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Some hon. gentlemen say 'Hear, hear.' That is the way in which they do it. Well, Mr. Speaker, will you listen to this argument and see whether it is correct? I voted for the Crow's Nest Pass Railway grant, and I believed that it was in the public interest, and that being the case, there may be in the minds of some people an idea that I erred in judgment, that I made a mistake. But they can forgive an error in judgment, they can forgive a mistake if they believe the man is honest in doing what he thinks is right. But if these hon. gentlemen opposite, as by their cheers they now allege, believed there was something wrong, something corrupt, and if they knew it and never voted against it, as they did not, I ask if the country can forgive them?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Your shouts of 'louder' will not drown the judgment of the people of this country. If hon. gentlemen imply there was corruption in the deal that was made in the House of Commons, and they sat there as one of the parties to it, the judgment of the country will be that, while they may forgive a man who honestly did what he thought was in the interest of the country, they cannot forgive men who sat there and knew that a corrupt bargain was being put through and never dared to record their vote against it. That is the position. Now, what about that Crow's Nest Pass Railway? Let me illustrate how I think a government can benefit a country by wise expenditure. Let me illustrate also how, under our system of raising revenue by a tariff and customs duties levied upon many articles, the operation of which may give more direct benefits to one section of the community than another—how it is possible that those other sections of the community may also benefit, perhaps not so much through the tariff, as by a wise expenditure of the money col-iected from the tariff, to the advantage of the other classes who contribute, the artisans among them. Let me illustrate this principle by the bargain that was made with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. By that bargain you opened up your vast Kootenay mining districts, a source of wealth to the Dominion of Canada, opened up a market for the farmers of Alberta, made running arrangements with other roads upon the payment of a fair rental to use their line and got 50,000 acres of coal land that are held by this government to prevent any monopoly of that valuable mineral in that district. What more ?

Mr. SPROULE. Two mililon dollars to the 'Globe' newspaper.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Two million dollars to the 'Globe' newspaper, and the hon. gentleman knew it at that time, and yet supported the resolution ! Sir, what more, I say ? This government, careful of the conditions of all the people of this land, recognized the fact that the bargain that was originally made with the Canadian Pacific Railway by our friends opposite, imposed terms and conditions with reference to freight rates to be charged over that road that could not be altered until the company earned 10 per cent of their capital. They have not done it. The settlers in Manitoba and the North-west felt that this was a very heavy charge upon them; the government recognized the fact, and they recognized that no doubt while the Crow's Nest Pass bargain was of special benefit to the men who farm in that country, still the interests of all are so intertwined one with the other in this country, that they made a stipulation for a lowered freight rate over that road. It is not likely that, under the conditions that prevailed last year and which are likely to prevail for some time to come, with the amount of freight pressing upon them more than they could handle, the company would voluntarily have reduced the rate, and they agreed under this Crow's Nest Pass Railway bargain and subsidy, to a reduction of the rate by three cents per 100 pounds on all the wheat and flour that went out of that country. And what is the result ? It was in operation last year, and we are told that there is the equivalent of 60,000,000 bushels of grain to be moved out of that country. What does it mean ? It means over $1,000,000 of actual cash that goes into the pockets of the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west, as actually as if it was paid out as a direct bounty by this government from the Dominion treasury. Perhaps our hon. friends will say that the government should have stipulated with the railway to keep back 3 cents on every 100 weight and pay it into the Dominion treasury to help the revenue. They might say that it was not fair to ask other portions of and classes of the community who dwell in cities and work in factories to pay a portion of this subsidy when the indirect benefits were felt chiefly by the farmers in the west. But the government did not take that view. They recognized that primarily, perhaps, these men are more benefited by it, but they recognized that in their prosperity is involved the prosperity of all who dwell in this country to a greater or lesser extent, and so they secured that reduction in the public interest, and I believe that as the years go by that arrangement will be found more and more to have been made in the public interest. It may be said that the company would have voluntarily thrown it off. Well, I ask if, under the conditions that prevailed last year, and that are likely to prevail, the company would not, if they had the power, have charged the 3 cents per 100 weight more ? Why, to ask the question is to answer it, and having answered it, I leave it to the judgment of the House to say whether that $3,300,000, which is included in that $8,270,000 of subsidy, was not an investment redounding directly to the benefit of those men who farm our lands in the North-west, and incidentally to the benefit of all the people who dwell in this Dominion ?

What more ? Remember the government can advance the interest of the community not only by the way in which they impose their taxation, but also by the expenditure of the money. Things can be equalized in that way. It may be that some classes are benefited a little more through the imposition of a certain tax—though it never can be justified except it is in the public interest—while another section will not get the same benefit. But in the expenditure of this money all sections benefit, though not all directly, and consequently there is something like justice, and there is regard for all the different sections of this community. There should be no legislation passed for any particular section of the community unless it can be justified as in the interests of the whole community. But where you have diverse interests, as we have in this country, then I say the way in which the taxation of this country is raised, and the way in which the people want it to be raised, through customs and inland revenue, is fair, and in the interests of the whole people of this country. Our interests are so intertwined that all legislation which we pass should have reference to it. But, I will not spend more time with the capital expenditure. I have asked my hon. friend to what he objects. Is it to the half million dollars of railway subsidies which has gone to the Great Northern Railway ? Who will say that is not in the interests of the public ? Who will say, having witnessed the grain blockade that has occurred in the west, that this expenditure is not a wise one ? That road is being pushed through the North-west Territories, it has reached there already, and it will be turned to account this year. The same applies to all the other lines that we have opened up. Who will say that we should not have done that, that we should not have opened up mineral regions and given an advantage to the miners—the miners who cannot be benefited by tariff arrangements, but who can be benefited by the expenditure of money raised under the tariff and to which others have contributed as well as themselves? It is fair that money should be expended in this way and so we have endeavoured to hold the scales evenly and justly as between the different sections of the community, and the fact that this government and the friends who are behind them have succeeded moderately in their desire to do justice to every section of the community, is shown by the universal prosperity and contentment that I believe reigns throughout this country at the present time.

Then, my next note is that our opponents say that our resolution of 1893 expresses alarm at the large increase in the debt and that instead of using our surplus to reduce it we have increased it. Well now, that is true. Let us examine that. It is nominally true that we have increased the debt. I have a comparative statement here of the increase in the debt. When we speak of ordinary expenditure and capital expenditure, hon. gentlemen know how the books are kept, but the final record is that when the ordinary and capital expenditure meet together and are offset by the total revenue from all sources and according as the revenue is greater than ordinary and capital expenditure combined, there is a reduction of the public debt. If, on the other hand, the combination of ordinary and capital expenditure is greater than the whole revenue from all sources you have an addition to the public debt. We have an addition to the public debt. In 1897 we added to the public debt $3,041,163.69. In 1898 we added $2,417,802.45. In 1899 we added $2,317,047.69, and in 1900 we had a surplus, thereby decreasing the public debt, of $779,639.71. In 1901 we added $2,986,196. In five years, deducting the surplus of 1900 from the amounts that we increased the public debt, the total addition to the public debt was $9,982,570.92, or an average increase per annum during the five years of $1,996,514.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the $6,000,000 of temporary loans you have from the banks?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) got mixed up when he was speaking the other night. In 1892 there was a deficit on the part of our hon. friends opposite and I will not weary the House by referring to it. But, they added to the debt every year of their last five years and the increase for their last five years of the public debt was $20,688,402.26 as against $9,982,570.92 of an increase under us, or the average increase per annum under hon. gentlemen opposite was $4,137,680 while the annual increase per annum under us was $1,996,514. I have taken their last five years in office. If hon. gentlemen will take the public accounts and go through them they will find that during the whole 18 years that they were in power they added over $6,000,000 to the public debt every year. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) when he made his speech the other evening asked us to drop out the years 1882, 1883 and 1884, when they added $60,000,000 to the public debt, and he said that we would find that if we did that they had not added as much as they were charged with adding, a proposition in which I agree with the hon. gentleman. Still, it is true all the same that we have to pay interest on the debt. But, my hon. friend will see that I have left out these years and that I have just taken the last five years for the purpose of this comparison. I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, what the resolution of the Liberal convention did, for I have it before me here, express alarm at the increase of the debt. Plank No. 4 was as follows:

> We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments that have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the government of the country.

That was the resolution passed by the convention in 1893, passed under the circumstance that your ordinary expenditure was $38,000,000, and that with your ordinary expenditure at $38,000,000 your government could not pay it out of your revenue but were running in debt, borrowing money, and adding to the public debt, to say nothing of the expenditure on capital account. It was a period in which the prosperity of the country seemed to have shrunk away. It was a proper resolution to pass then. When the country was running in debt to pay its ordinary running expenses, it was time to express alarm. But, the conditions are entirely changed as compared with that time, because now we have paid everything out of the lowered taxation imposed upon the people and have had $19,000,000 in five years to the good in the way of surpluses. In reference to the public debt we have added a little to it. We would not have added anything to it if we had not to meet these expenditures on capital account, and I think the additions we have made to it are justified. There are two ways of reducing the public debt. The only method of properly measuring the public debt is to ascertain the debt per head of the population. It is self-evident to any man that if we could suddenly increase the population of the Dominion of Canada to 10,000,000 of people and keep our debt where we have it now, we would cut it in two. We could reduce the expenditure in that way. What are the facts ? In 1891 the public debt amounted to $237,809,-030. Based upon a population of 4,833,239, according to the census of 1891, the debt was at the rate of $49.20 per head. In 1896, which was the last year of the Conservative administration, the debt of the country was $258,497,432. Now, assuming, which I do not grant, that the increase in population between 1891 and 1896 was in as great a ratio as during the last five years under the Liberal government, the per capita debt in 1896 was $50.66, or an increase in the debt of $1.46 per head over 1901. If you were to admit for the purpose of argument that hon. gentlemen opposite added one half of the population that was added during the decade you will find that while they were running behind in their ordinary accounts they were increasing the debt to such an extent that in five years it was $1.46 per head more. Now the public debt in 1901 amounted to $268,480,003. Calculating from the population as shown by the recent census, the debt amounts to $49.99 per head, or a reduction of 67 cents per head as compared with 1896. Not only were they running behind and not meeting their ordinary expenditure but in their last five years they increased the public debt $1.46 per head, while in our five years we have decreased it 67 cents per head ; and as the population increases, as it is increasing, and as the expenditure will be kept in reasonable bounds as it will be, considering the demands of our great public works, you will find that the debt per head—if the Liberal government are permitted to remain in power—will go on decreasing as it has been decreasing during the five years we have been in office. It will therefore be seen that during the last five years of the Conservative regime the debt was increased per head $1.46, while during the five years the Liberals have been in power it has decreased 67 cents per head. The comparison is made all the stronger in favour of the Liberal administration when it is explained that during the five years of Liberal rule from 1897 and 1901 inclusive, the large sum of $41,622,572 was expended on capital account in connection with the development of great public works within the Dominion and other special services ; whereas during the five preceding years of Conservative rule the capital expenditure was $26,858,798. The addition to the debt during the last five years of Conservative rule amounted to $20,688,402, being as I said an average increase per annum of $4,137,680, while during the five years of Liberal rule the debt was increased by only $9,982,570 or an average per annum of $1,996,514.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. In brief —and I ask the attention of the House to this summary—in brief, the Liberals during the last five years spent $15,000,000 more than the Conservatives did for the previous five years on capital account ; added less than half the Conservatives did to the public debt, and still decreased the per capita rate of the public debt 67 cents per head, as against an increase of $1.47 per head during the last five years of the Conservative rule.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I ask the attention of the House to the resolution I read when we expressed alarm, and with reference to which our Conservative friends attempt to say : That we have violated the instructions of that convention by our increased expenditure and by making an increase to the public debt. I ask the House again to bear in mind the wording of this resolution. It did not say what the expenditure was to be, but it expressed alarm at the expenditure of that time and at the increase that was being made to the public debt under the conditions which I pointed out ; and added this : That what did alarm them was the consequent undue taxation of the people of that account. Now then, what about the taxation. We have spent this money, but it may be said perhaps by our hon. friends opposite : You may spend money very freely if you go into the pockets of the people and take from them the money that should be left to them.

But what has been our record with reference to this question of taxation and of taking revenue from the people. Briefly it is this. In 1896 the average rate of duty levied upon all goods dutiable and free coming into the Dominion was 18·28 per cent. That was under the rule of our Conservative friends. On every hundred dollars worth of goods that came into this country there was levied upon an average a duty of $18.28 by the Conservatives. Under the Liberal administration of last year—as you will if you take the trouble to figure it—we only taxed the people $16.06 for every $100 worth of goods that came into the country.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the hon. gentleman exclude the Indian corn that is being exported, when he makes that calculation.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not and for this reason : That the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) will find, that if for these years he excludes the corn and the coin and bullion, instead of there being a difference of $2.22 on every $100 in favour of the Liberal administration, it would be $2.29 ; so I am taking the figures that tell least in our favour.

And about this $2.22 reduction, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) alluded to it and he said that there had been a 'paltry' reduction of $2.22 per cent in the taxation. My hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) pointed out to him that $2.22 of a reduction on $18.28 was something more than 2·22 per cent reduction, as I think any gentleman will see at a glance. A reduction of $2.22 on $18.28 means that the tariff was reduced 12 per cent by the Liberal government. That is what it means. It means 12 per cent of reduced taxation by this government, notwithstanding all our expenditure. A 'paltry' reduction, says my hon. friend from West Toronto. Well, I can tell him that another reduction in the tariff even less than that, would bring the rate of taxation that has been levied by this government below the rate of taxation that was levied by the Mackenzie government under which we did not raise revenue enough to carry on the affairs of the country. I want to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Osler), who called this a 'paltry' reduction, that if, when he goes to the accountant at the close of the session the accountant hands him a cheque for $1,320, and he says: What is the matter here; the indemnity is $1,500 now. Suppose the accountant says: Oh, yes, I know, but I have just taken off $180, and it is a paltry reduction of 12 per cent. I wonder if the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) would consider that very paltry. Suppose a farmer in the North-west takes his load of wheat to Brandon or to Winnipeg and sells it for 60 cents a bushel, but next day he is told that he will get only 53 cents, and he inquires what is the matter; is the market down, that you should take off the 7 cents; and the answer is given him; it is only a paltry reduction of 12 per cent—I wonder what that farmer would say. I wonder would he consider it very paltry? Suppose a man working for $12 a week in a factory gets $10.60 handed to him at the end of the week and he says: What is this for, I lost no time; but the cashier answers: why it is only a paltry reduction of 12 per cent—I wonder would that wage earner consider it paltry.

Sir, that is the reduction made in the rate of taxation by this government. Paltry or not paltry it is the reduction we have made. I call the attention of our friends to it, and I call it a material reduction; a very material reduction indeed. I could give you the items here in the general tariff; many of them to show that reduction. The great general outstanding feature of our tariff policy was of course the preferential tariff given in favour of the motherland, which reduced the general rate of taxation, and brought us great benefits otherwise. But, I have heard my hon. friends opposite say: Oh, but what is the use of talking of not taxing the people more; the accounts show that you have taken between $11,000,000 and $12,000,000 more money into the treasury than we did in 1894-5.

When did the Liberal party ever pledge themselves to have less revenue? You will not find any resolution of that kind passed anywhere. We expected to have more revenue when we came into power, and we got it. Governments do not make the prices of goods in foreign countries; the law of supply and demand regulates that. A government cannot compel any man or woman to go into a store and buy a dollar's worth of imported goods on which duties are levied. Every man and woman do just as they please in that respect. There is one thing a government can do, and only one. What is that? It stands between the man who buys the goods and the price he will have to pay for them, and says by its law that before the merchant can take those goods out of the custom-house to place them on the shelf for sale, he must pay so many cents on the dollar to go into the Dominion treasury. That is the rate of taxation; that the government can control; it was that rate of taxation which we were pledged to lower, and which we have lowered 12 per cent; and the extra millions that have gone into the public treasury have gone in under that lowered rate, because the people are better off, and because there are more people in the country who voluntarily buy goods on which duties have been paid.

Having shown that under a reduced rate of taxation we have obtained a greatly increased revenue, the next question is whether that increased revenue has been expended wisely. The Liberal party in their convention declared that there should be economy in public affairs, and I maintain that there has been economy. True, economy does not mean parsimony; it means the wise expenditure of public money. I have challenged our opponents to formulate a motion condemning the financial administration of this government; but they have not done so. Why, Sir, when we think of all the advantages that have accrued to the country under the administration of this government, ably supported by the gentlemen who have given it their confidence; when we think of the expenditure on canals, on the Intercolonial Railway, on subsidies to railways in order to open up and develop the country; when we consider the expenditures made to deepen the harbours and waterways of the country; when we consider all these, then we are able to judge whether we did wisely or unwisely in not only spending our surplus, but in adding slightly to the public debt, nominally, while virtually, if you measure it, as it should be measured, per capita, there has been an actual decrease. No wonder the opposition have failed to move in regard to the financial administration of this government.

Now, I did not intend to do more than speak on the financial side of the question, which had not been discussed, I thought, perhaps as fully as it might be, and a discussion of which might be of profit, though no doubt it has been wearying too. This amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition does not touch upon that subject at all. If hon. gentlemen opposite view that subject with the alarm which some of them have professed in their speeches, I think it should have been voiced in their resolution; but instead of that they move :

> That all the words after 'that' in the proposed motion be left out and the following substituted therefor :
> This House regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians. And, while thus firmly maintaining the necessity of such protection to Canadian interests, this House affirms its belief in a policy of reciprocal trade preferences within the empire.

This House is here asked to affirm that we regard the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory. When the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) rose to speak upon that resolution, he made a remark to the effect that when he heard it read, he fancied that if he were to shut his eyes and listen, he might almost believe he was hearing something that had been read in the House some twenty or more years ago—at which our opposition friends cheered. They thought he had made a mistake.

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, no; they knew he had stuck his foot in it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Then they mean that that resolution is intended to signify that they prefer their old national policy to the present tariff. If that was the meaning of their cheers on that occasion, they have challenged a comparison of the two policies, and it is well we are able to make it. It is a very great advantage that we are in a position to see the results of the operation of both tariffs. Let us look at what these hon. gentlemen consider to be unsatisfactory. Let us take the trade of the country—the tariff has something to do with that—and let us see how it stands. Let us compare the trade of the country during the last five years under their policy with what it has been in the last five years under this policy, which they regard as unsatisfactory; and if you are persuaded by the result of that comparison that their tariff worked much more satisfactorily than this one, then we can let them come in and put their tariff back. The aggregate foreign trade of Canada in the two periods under comparison was as follows :

Increase.....	$ 458,272,407

Perhaps this increase in the five years of Liberal rule is unsatisfactory to the hon. gentlemen; perhaps they do not want this extra trade—a very strange state of mind to get into. I do not view trade as a bad thing; I consider it a good thing. I think we are all looking for more trade. What is good for an individual, I take it, is good for a nation; and we have had 458 millions more trade in the last five years than we had in the previous five years. I do not see how that can be unsatisfactory, or a reason why we should want to go back to the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, unless we want to crawl backwards. Our imports for consumption have increased 190 millions. Our exports the produce of Canada have increased 233 millions; our exports to the United States have increased 72 millions; our exports to Great Britain have increased 142 millions. So with our exports of fisheries, of the mine, of the forest, of animals and their products and of agricultural products. So with Canadian manufactures, the exports of which have increased under our policy to $62,143,532, while under their policy they were only $39,561,961, an increase of $22,581,571. And then they ask us to go back to the old policy under which this restricted trade was done, and to declare that the expanded trade, which is taking place under our policy, has not been satisfactory. Why, take the whole eighteen years under the national policy and compare it with the period under the present tariff, in that whole eighteen years the aggregate increase in the foreign trade of the country was only $66,000,000, while in the five years of our Liberal policy that trade had increased to $147,000,000. I need not go through the whole list to show the wonderful increase in trade.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition said that if we deduct the gold bullion and concentrates the exports of Canada in the last fiscal year decreased as compared with the previous one. No doubt, Sir, there always will be variation in the exports of particular items, comparing one year with another. One year there will be a larger wheat crop or a larger mineral output or a larger fishery export. But to reassure my hon. friend, let me show him that our export trade has recovered itself in the other lines. He will be glad to know in the eight months of the present year, ending February, 1902, our exports increased by $9,000,000 over the same period last year, and while they increased to this extent, there was a decrease in the products of the mines to which the hon. gentleman made particular effort. The increases are in these lines :

Products of the forests....	1,000,000
Animals and their products and agricultural products....	7,000,000
Manufactures....	1,000,000

The foreign trade of Canada, Sir, is something of which we may be proud. Compare it with that of older and stronger nations, and we have reason to congratulate ourselves. The per capita export trade of Denmark is $27.67 ; of the German empire, $17.88 ; of France, $19.53 ; of Austria-Hungary, $8.44 ; of the United States, $18.27 ; Great Britain, $34.67 ; Canada, $32.51. Canada, therefore, stands next to Great Britain, within two dollars per head, and its export trade exceeds that of the United States by nearly two dollars to one.

Mr. ROSAMOND. And it does not grow half as fast.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I expect that it will grow faster in proportion.

Mr. ROSAMOND. You are a long time expecting it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. As a business man, my hon. friend will agree with me that the more people we can bring into this country as settlers in the west, for instance, the better it will be for our manufacturing industries in the east. No doubt one of the great secrets of the success and prosperity of the American manufacturers was the great immigration that came to their shores in years gone by, when they might be said, to use a figure of speech, almost to have annexed the foreign market to their own by bringing the people there. That is a state of things which, we believe, is about to take place in Canada, and which will immensely benefit our manufacturing industries by furnishing them with a vastly increased market in our western territory.

But the great feature of our policy, compared with that of hon. gentlemen opposite, is the preferential tariff. We take credit to ourselves for that tariff, and I note that while our friends opposite may attack it in an underhand way, they have not ventured to ask by resolution for its repeal. True that is embodied in the spirit of their amendment, but is not openly stated. The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Kendrey) came out last night plainly on the subject. He said that he was opposed to this preference. Some other gentlemen opposite have also expressed their disapproval of it, but they have not moved to abolish it except in a very covert way in the resolution before the House. What has been the effect of that preference ? In the first place, it has been one of the great causes of reducing the taxation on the people. I am not going into details, but to give you a test which any man can apply for himself. Take the Trade and Navigation returns for 1896 and 1901, divide the amount of duties by the value of the articles imported, and what will you find ? I am not taking individual items but general lines of goods, of which we import tens of millions of dollars. Take, for instance, iron and steel manufactures, under the tariff of 1896, they paid $25.65 per $100. Under the preferential tariff that has been reduced to $11.56. Take woollen goods, in the tariff of 1896, they paid $31.71 per $100 and that has been reduced to $23.

Mr. CLANCY. How much of the iron goods came in under the preferential tariff?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am dealing in great general lines. I have the figures showing the special reductions made on a long list of implements used by the farmer, but these have been given to the House before, and I do not want to repeat them. I am simply dealing with great lines of goods and taking the aggregate duties paid. Take the item of woollens, you know the millions of dollars worth that we import of this line of goods, the duty has been reduced from $31.71 per $100 to $23. Then take cottons, they paid $28.53 under the Conservative tariff of 1895, but under our preferential tariff they come in at the rate of $20.43 per $100. Earthenware and chinaware paid $30.20 per $100 in 1896 and now they only pay $20.02. On manufactures of flax, hemp and jute the duty has been reduced by the preferential tariff from $22.25 in 1896 down to $18. But let me give the items tabulated :

Articles.	Average rate of duty under Conservative Tariff on importations of 1896.	Average rate of duty on importations under Preferential Tariff, 1901.
Iron or steel manufactures....	25·65	11·56
Woollen goods.....	31·71	23·
Cottons	28·53	20·43
Earthenware and chinaware...	30·20	20·02
Manufactures of flax, hemp and jute	22·25	18·
Glass and manufactures of....	25·60	17·11
Hats, caps and bonnets.....	30·00	20·00
Gloves and mitts	35·00	23·33
Leather and manufactures of..	20·11	10·70

I call your attention further to this fact that, in all these lines that I have mentioned, Great Britain is an active competitor with the United States and with other countries. And any business man knows that if there are large importations of these same articles from the United States under a tariff of 30 or 35 per cent and also large importations under the preference from Great Britain, the Canadian consumer gets his goods from the American producer at the same price as the English goods, and that the public treasury receives hundreds of thousands, if not millions of dollars in duties besides.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson) tell the House how much reduction has been made on the iron goods coming from the United States because of the preference given to imports from Great Britain at the same time ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. As a business man—or one who was a business man—I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr.

Clancy) this, that if a gentleman representing an English house offered me an article in which I was dealing, quoting a certain figure, and an American commercial traveller also offered me a precisely similar line of goods—of course, supposing that the circumstances were equal, that is for instance, that I was not in a hurry, and therefore was not compelled to get the goods from the United States, the transport being quicker—I would add to the price quoted the preferential duty and the freight from England, and also the general duty and the freight from the United States, and, if the price quoted by the Englishman plus freight and duty, came to less than the price offered by the American, plus freight and duty, I would tell the drummer from the American house: I can get these goods cheaper from England, though you offer the same price at your factory as they do; and, if the American did not lower his price, I would buy the goods from England. My hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) shakes his head. He would buy the Yankee's goods and pay more for them. Hon. gentlemen opposite say this tariff has done no good to England. But their speeches contradict one another. They say the imports from Great Britain are damaging some of the industries of this country.

Mr. BROCK. Does the hon. gentleman deny it?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I believe that in one line, which has been mentioned by hon. gentlemen opposite, the manufacturers are hampered. And they have my sympathy. They may say that sympathy does not do them much good. But the fact must not be forgotten—hon. gentlemen opposite had to recognize it when they were in office—that there are a great many interests concerned, and it is not such an easy matter to have a tariff every detail of which will be advantageous to everybody. We are told that there are differing views expressed on this side. Wherever you have your revenues raised by a customs tariff, you must have diverse interests and so cannot expect all to think alike.

Mr. LENNOX. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? In the matter of woollen goods, if you imposed a higher duty, would you not also assist the farmer?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know. But I do trust that this government, in all its legislation, will not lose sight of the interests of the farmer, and I feel sure that they will not. Of course, there are differing views expressed on this side. You cannot get in the Liberal party—I doubt if you could get in the Conservative party—all men to think alike on these questions. I can understand a man being a Liberal and believing that the best way to raise the revenues of this country would be to follow as closely as we might the British method of taxation, yet being frank enough to admit that the conditions of the country are not such as to make that the most advantageous system for the present time for us; and, for the present he may move with the party that most nearly agrees with the views he holds. I can understand a man holding Liberal views, a man who thinks for himself, and favouring the policy that was stated the other night by the hon. senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. Kendall). That hon. gentleman said that it would be better to have absolute free trade, to wipe out the customs and excise, and raise all the revenue by what is called the single tax, the tax on land values, the tax that would take for public purposes what is called the unearned increment or community value of the land—the value added to farms in the Northwest by incoming settlers and by extending the railways, and so with other lands. But that hon. gentleman himself admits that he is not prepared to advocate that as a means of raising the tariff at the present time, and says that he is content with a tariff framed on the lines of the present tariff and with the care that has been shown in arranging it. I can understand men taking such position as I have suggested, but some of the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite I do not understand. I cannot understand hon. gentlemen arguing that a preferential arrangement with Great Britain has done no good to Great Britain, and that, at the same time the vast imports from that country are ruining the interests of Canada. These are absolutely contradictory positions and cannot be reconciled.

Mr. TAYLOR. The goods are made in Germany.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. That is a statement that has been reiterated in this House. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Kendrey) urged this very strongly upon us last night. If there are goods made in Germany coming in under the British preference, they are coming in contrary to the desire and intention of this government. And I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the Prime Minister has asked me to go——

Mr. BROCK. Has not the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson), in his tariff directly made provision for that, by providing that goods made in Germany or elsewhere may come in under the preference, if 25 per cent of the labour employed in producing them was English labour? Does not this give a preference on 75 per cent to Germany?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I was about to say that I trust that any representations made to this government are received with all the consideration they deserve. I take it that the Finance Minister and myself, owing to the departments over which we preside, are brought in contact with the business interests of this country—not with the manufacturers alone—more than are other members of the administration. I think hon. gentlemen will give my colleague and myself credit for having endeavoured to give the utmost attention to all representations that have been made to us. I certainly do not believe that any man can sit quietly back in his chair and, out of his own inner consciousness, verify all the complex conditions of business in this age. Therefore I am delighted to avail myself of all the information I can get from deputations, come with regard to what subject they may. It may be said that the manufacturers come to us oftener than others do. But I can assure our agricultural friends that they have good representatives in this House. I have listened to those representatives with the utmost attention, as they have pointed out difficulties that seemed to them to exist, and how they could be best removed. Wherever I have been able to get any information from a member from British Columbia or any other province as to how the prosperity of this country could be enhanced consistently with the general interests, I have been delighted to avail myself of that information. And, because there has been no action of the government in the direction that, perhaps, some gentlemen could have desired, that does not prove that attention has not been given to representations made. It must be remembered that, as has been pointed out by a previous speaker, when we have the actual results of the census showing the production of the various industries of this country, we shall be in a position to determine much more accurately what increases and decreases have taken place in production. When hon. gentlemen have made representations to me about goods coming in from Germany, I have tried to find out the actual facts. So far, I have not found that these statements have been verified. But, as I have said, the first minister has asked me if I would go to England this summer with one or two of my colleagues to take part in the trade conference. If I should go, one of the reasons that would tempt me—for I have no love of the ocean—will be the hope that I shall be able to learn for myself the facts with regard to this matter which has been pressed upon my attention—of foreign made goods coming in under the English preference. All I can say is that if I should find that is the case, I will lay the matter before my colleagues; and I can tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that if if it should be found to be the case, it is possible for the government to act in that matter without the intervention of parliament, as parliament has sufficient confidence in the government to entrust them with determining what proportion of English labour should be put upon the goods to enable them to enter under that tariff. I was remarking that hon. gentlemen opposite have objected that it was a fraud upon England. Now, is it not a waste of time in this House for any gentleman to take that line of argument? If the English people are pleased with it, why do hon. gentlemen opposite worry over it? Can they produce any testimony from any English source that the English people regard this tariff as a fraud upon them? I defy them to do it. If, on the other hand, they were to challenge me to produce evidence from public print and from personal testimony as to the value placed upon it in England, it would not trouble me to give article upon article and testimony upon testimony. Therefore, I do not see why our hon. friends opposite should trouble themselves on that ground.

I desire to refer to one remark that was made by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule), I think, it was, in regard to an industry which he specified, and I think his remark has been quoted by some of his friends opposite. He said that capital was being withheld from investment in this country for want of a declared policy of adequate protection. Now, I would ask where is there any evidence to prove that? The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) who addressed the House last night, asked the same question. I remember, however, that the hon. member for East Grey said that capital was being withheld in the matter of the erection of sugar factories, because we would not give a bounty upon sugar. I think the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) will bear testimony that one or two factories are going up in his own riding. Out in Alberta and the Northwest Territories, there has been a contract entered into by Mr. Jesse Knight, a wealthy man from Salt Lake City, with the Northwest Irrigation Company, in which he bound himself under a deposit of $50,000 which he has placed in the hands of that company, to be forfeited if he does not finish the construction of a beet root factory costing not less than $300,000. That is an answer to the hon. gentlemen who attempt to bring up specific instances of capital being withheld from this country.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman permit me? Did not the sugar interest make application to the hon. gentleman for assistance?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Well, I have no doubt they did. Yes, they did, but nevertheless they are going on with the erection of the factory. And I would remark to my hon. friend that if the factory is started, as it is about to be started, without that extra assistance, it stands on a stronger foundation when it does not depend upon tariff props than if it did, because public sentiment may change in reference to the tariff, and anything that is built upon the tariff alone is not as stable as if it stood upon its own merits. So I say that, compelled as we are to raise a revenue by a tariff, and a tariff that I believe is right, a revenue not only to carry on the ordinary machinery of the government but one that will give us millions of dollars that we can expend on public works to the benefit of all portions of the community, I say a tariff such as that must impose a large percentage of taxation on certain lines of goods, and there is no doubt it will be an advantage to those who are engaged in the manufacture and production of those goods. That has been the case under the operation of the present tariff which these hon. gentlemen say is their old national policy, so much protection do they find, or seek to find, in the tariff we have at the present time. Sir, there will be a special advantage to some persons where you levy duties, there can be no doubt of that; but when we were told to reduce the taxation and to reform the tariff, we were instructed to do so without working any injustice to any class of the community. And, Sir, I can appeal to this country, I can appeal to the prosperity of all sections of it, if in the tariff in its present shape, though I do not claim it is perfect by any means, we have not succeeded in framing a scale of duties that are on the whole satisfactory to the people of this country. I am quite sensible to the fact that changes take place in the trade conditions of a country, I am sensible to the fact that changes take place in other countries. New devices, combinations may I term them, may spring up, and policies may have to be altered. In that case changes may have to be made in the light of what has transpired. We have a notable instance of that in England at the present time. England for years, from Gladstone's time away down, refused to move when the Germans, French and Belgians were making a slaughter market of England for their sugar. English public men held that if foreigners would tax themselves to give the British people cheap sugar, the British people would accept it. And so it went on until the government, seeing that one of their possessions in the West Indies was suffering under this unfair competition, has taken the step of using their influence, of making almost a threat, to compel these people to withdraw their system of slaughtering sugar, even though it means an increased expense to the users of sugar in the British Empire. I recognize these facts. I recognize that there are immense trusts and combinations formed upon the other side of the line, and it has been reported to me that the design and avowed object of some of these immense corporations is to crush out any industry in this country producing goods like their own, and after they have succeeded in crushing out such industry, then they will raise their prices and make the people pay. These things demand consideration, inquiry, that we may arrive at a knowledge of the facts. I am not insensible that changes take place in trade and commerce, nor do I believe that my colleagues or our friends on this side of the House, are insensible to changing conditions. I believe the hon. members on this side of the House, having had confidence in us in the past, will continue their confidence until, by our declared policy—which must be a declared policy, if any changes are made and laid on the Table—they will then judge us, and I think they will continue to give us their confidence unless they feel that we have proved ourselves untrustworthy.

Sir, I wish only to add in conclusion, that I recognize the value of every man to this country. It is no part of the government's duty to legislate in favour of one man as against another. I recognize that different pursuits are followed by different sections of the community; I recognize the value of our manufacturing institutions. I do not lay the stress that some do upon the importance of the comparatively few individuals who own the capital by which these institutions are run; I lay much more stress upon the hundreds, and thousands, and tens of thousands of artisans that work in these factories; and I recognize the fact that every man who labours in this country is producing wealth, and his labour is a source of wealth to others as well as himself.

I say then that he is a valuable member of this community. I recognize that the farmer, the miner, the fisherman and the lumberman are all producers of wealth, and that, under the tariff there are advantages given that cannot perhaps particularly benefit these classes, but when expenditures to which the whole people contribute are made for cheapening the cost of transportation, when we pay out money to enable the miner, the farmer, the fisherman, or the lumberman to reach his markets and to produce more cheaply, then, I say, he is benefited. Under the tariff the class least benefited is the class of hardy fishermen whose case I have alluded to. In their case I should say that in the expenditure of public money, if there can be means found by which these men can have advantages greater than they enjoy at the present time, it would be only justice in their case that that expenditure should be made, as I believe it is in the case of every section and in the interest of the whole country, because our interests are so intertwined one with another, that care being exercised and fairness being given effect to, you cannot benefit one portion of the community without you benefit every other individual member of that community in a greater or less extent.

I see that the hon. leader of the opposition is in his place and I would like to say a word in regard to the resolution that he asks this House to adopt. I would ask him if, when the right hon. Prime Minister of this country, goes over to engage with the representatives from different parts of the empire and from other colonies in the trade congress, which is to be held in London, this resolution embodies the instructions of the opposition to the Prime Minister as to the course he is to take at that conference. As I understand the resolution by the 'adequate protection' which hon. gentlemen call for, they have gone beyond their national policy. Some goods did come in under that policy, but we have had interpreted by their speeches, that by this 'adequate protection' they want us to declare that it will never be adequate until it absolutely prohibits any goods coming into Canada from any other country. The issue is clear between the parties. They believe in absolutely prohibiting all goods coming in and therefore prohibiting all the revenue from that source. We stand for a revenue tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The laughter of hon. gentlemen—I was going to say, but it would be unkind—is like the crackling of thorns. I will not make the comparison for the hon. gentleman knows what Solomon says, but to laugh at our tariff being a revenue tariff that produces $30,000,000 as against $17,000,000 as in times past is really something to be wondered at. While there may be some amendments, and amendments must take place in a tariff, though there has been stability in this and stability is a great thing in the tariff, while, as I have said, there may be some change the change will not be the introduction of a tariff that absolutely prohibits all goods that we can produce in Canada coming into Canada from any other country. There is no other meaning to be taken from the resolution of the hon. gentleman. The speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite have enlarged upon it. The hon. leader of the opposition himself said that the tariff should be put at least as high as the tariff of the United States is against us, but the amendment goes even further than that. This adequate protection will only be adequate when it keeps out all goods that we can produce in Canada, and I suppose they will put it up notch by notch, keeping a continual state of uncertainty in the country until they get it up to the point at which they have killed any advantage that may be derived from it. What does the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) say :—

> I hold that the tariff should be so arranged that every institution in this country which is manufacturing goods to be consumed by the Canadian people should have sufficient protection to keep out the same class of goods made in any foreign country ; and I have no hesitation in saying that if that country should be England, the policy of Canada should be framed in the interest of the Canadian taxpayer as against people who are producing the same class of goods even in the old country under the same flag.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Hon. gentlemen say hear, hear. Our policy would be to make everything we can in this country except such things as we do not produce, and allow no foreign goods to come in.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What I have to ask the hon. gentleman is this : Your tariff is prohibitory. By the resolution it is prohibitory. There is no doubt about it, and while you declare for preferential trade you declare for it on such terms that as far as Canada is concerned the Prime Minister of this country will be placed in this position. We will suppose that negotiations are opened with the object of seeing what arrangement can be made. The Prime Minister, we will suppose, will say : We want your products and we want to sell you our products, such as agricultural products, so that our farmers can get a preference. Very well. What do you propose to give us in return ? We are now making a bargain. The Prime Minister will say : My instructions from the opposition are that we are going to give you a reduced rate on anything that you produce which we do not. Then the Englishman will probably, and he will inevitably ask : What do we produce in this country that you do not produce over your way ? I would like the hon. leader of the opposition to write out a list of those products for the guidance of the Prime Minister. I know of nothing that is produced in England that is not or cannot be produced in this country under adequate protection. Sir, the amendment of the Opposition in respect to preferential trade is very similar to the position said to have been taken by parties in the United States. They professed to be ready for reciprocity, and if the report be true, their idea was to get an open market for their products in foreign countries, in return for which they offered to lower their customs duties on only such articles as would not interfere in the slightest degree with their own industries. Considering the fact that the United States manufactures almost everything required for consumption, it seems to me that an offer like that was an insulting offer. It looks to me that men who could really propose that virtually say to all other nations of the world that they must be foolish. What will England think of Canada if we go over there, make an offer for preferential trade on the lines laid down in the hon. gentleman's resolution, ask her to give a preference to our products in her market and announce at the same time that we will maintain a tariff here that will absolutely prohibit the introduction of a dollar's worth of goods ? That is the effect of their amendment, that is what they propose and to that amendment I believe hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will not give their adhesion. I fain would hope for their own sakes, that gentlemen on the other side of the House will recognize the position in which they have placed themselves, and withdraw that resolution, and not insist on a vote being taken.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

Mr. JAMES CLANCY (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker, I would indeed be deceiving myself were I to think for a moment that I could add anything new to what has already been so ably said on this question by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. I must even ask the indulgence of the House for directing the attention of hon. gentlemen at any length however brief to the question before us at this late state of the debate. I was much struck with the opening remarks of the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson). He commenced by saying that for a debate to be valuable and to be worthy of proper consideration, the facts presented in the discussion should be presented with exactness. To that we can all subscribe. I had hoped that I might be able to congratulate the Minister of Customs on having at least fairly adhered to that principle, but I am afraid that I cannot extend my congratulations to him in that regard. He gave us a very lengthy disquisition upon a great many subjects, but the House must conclude that they were largely composed of apologies, rather than directed to a vigorous defence of the government. From the commencement to the end, his speech was an apology for the conduct of the government of the day. The first task he set himself to was to try to prove that the population of Canada had vastly increased since the advent of the Liberal party to power. He told us that he would not attempt any discussion as to whether the census had been stuffed in 1891, or whether it had been underestimated in 1901, and the hon. gentleman has saved his reputation to some extent in avoiding that unpleasant discussion, and leaving that unsavoury task to others of his friends. As an evidence of the increase of our population he told us that there has been an increase in trade, an increase in exports, an increase in the deposits in the banks, an increase in the discounts, an increase in the amount of freight carried, an increase in the earnings of the railways, an increase in the immigration, an increase of settlers effects brought in, an increase in the number of letters passing through the mail, an increase in the sales of land in Manitoba and the North-west. Let us test that. Let us see about the increase of immigration and the sales of lands in the North-west. I have here the evidence given under oath by Mr. Pedley, superintendent of immigration, and he says :

The land sales that took place during the last fifty years in Manitoba and the North-west were as follows : The Hudson Bay Co., sold 82,398 acres ; the railway companies sold 538,719 acres; the half-breed scrip or land sold under the authority of it, 231,076 acres ; lands sold by the department, 91,539 acres or in all 943,076 acres of land sold under these circumstances stated.

In connection with the sum of $400,000 spent on immigration, Mr. Pedley was asked if he could identify a single person who was brought in by the Immigration Department and who was connected in the remotest sense with an acre of that land, and Mr. Pedley answered, no. I now ask the Minister of Customs if he will look into the evidence given by Mr. Pedley, and if he does he will see that his whole defence of the immigration expenditure by the government was refuted long before he spoke this afternoon.

But I want to point to another thing. The hon. gentleman, in trying to show the economy and thriftiness of this government, claimed that although they were collecting a large sum of money from the people, yet after all the people did not pay it. That is rather a new doctrine—that money can be taken out of the pockets of the people, and yet they do not pay it. He gave us some instances of the economy of the government in connection with the different services, particularly in the cost of collecting the revenues of his own department. He told us that in 1894 it had cost this country 5·13 per cent to collect the customs revenue, which is quite correct. Then he said that for the year 1901 it had only cost 3·86 per cent. That is quite true too. But the hon. gentleman held that the cost had been lowered to that extent by reason of the economy and efficiency of the government. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman if that is a fair conclusion. I ask him if it is not the case in his own business, as in every other, where in these days of keen competition every penny must be turned to the best account, that a large establishment can be carried on more cheaply than one conducted on a smaller scale ? And is there any rule that obtains with regard to the collecting of customs revenue that does not obtain in regard to every large and small business in this country ? The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that there was no necessity of increasing the officers in many cases when the revenue doubled. The hon. gentleman knows that customs collectors are not a class of men who are overworked. He knew very well that the comparison he made was not a fair comparison. But the hon. gentleman went further than that. He selected the year 1894. Why did he select that year? The hon. gentleman told us at the outset that we ought to be fair, and I am sure he thinks he is fair. He selected the year 1894 because it was the most unfavourable year he could find in the 18 years of Conservative rule. If the hon. gentleman looks in his own report, he will find that in the last year the Mackenzie government was in power, the expenditure was $5.56 for every $100 of revenue collected. The hon. gentleman may search in vain during the 18 years of Conservative rule until he comes to the year 1894 to find as large an expenditure compared with the revenue. That is a sample of the hon. gentleman's fairness. Has the hon. gentleman told the whole truth to the country? Has he done himself justice in taking a position of that kind? I do not think he has. The hon. gentleman thought we ought to be very candid and very decided about criticising generally the expenditure of the government of the day. He told us our duty was to point out the items to which we objected. If we were opposed to any items, we ought to move against them, and if we failed to do that, we were not doing our duty—in other words, we were quite insincere. Now, I ask the hon. gentleman if he wishes to lay down one rule of conduct for the opposition and another for the government with regard to criticising expenditures, and taking action, by vote or voice, against any that are objected to. I do not think the hon. gentleman will do so. I wish to point out that the hon. gentleman sat for 18 years in this House without moving a single resolution to reduce a single item of expenditure under the Conservative government. Was he sincere in his criticism of its items? Was he doing his duty during that period? Was he open to censure, as he would give it to be understood we are open to censure, for not having moved against the items he objected to? If the charge is good against us in this case, it is more than good against him for his own conduct during those 18 years. But somebody may say, although the hon. gentleman himself did not move against what they call extravagant expenditures it was done by his friends. I suppose that would be the hon. gentleman's answer. Now, I happen to have under my hand a list of the items of expenditure which the Liberal opposition moved against during the whole period of 18 years during which the Conservative party were in office, and we will see what they were. In 1879 the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) proposed to make a reduction of $70,000 in the expenditure for civil government. In 1880 no objection was taken. In 1881 they were silent; they did not move any resolution. In 1882 Mr. Mills proposed a reduction of $8,000 being payment for damages to a steamer known as the U. C. Upper. In 1883 no resolution was moved against the expenditure; in 1884 no resolution; in 1885 no resolution; in 1886 no resolution; in 1887 no resolution; in 1888 no resolution. In 1889 the present Minister of Trade and Commerce moved that the vote for Manitoba penitentiaries be reduced by $10,526. In the same year Mr. McMullen moved that the vote for East Pictou river improvement be reduced by $500. In the same year, Sir Louis Davies, a late member of this government, moved that the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway be reduced by $200,000. Mark the reasons given for the reduction: because the railway carried coal from Spring Hill mine at less than cost and created a deficit of $368,000. In the same year the present Minister of Trade and Commerce moved that a vote for the Department of the Interior be reduced by $95,748. Mr. Sommerville, in the same year, moved that a vote of $195,135 be reduced by $50,000 because Mr. Henry Smith, who was formerly a member of the House, and Mr. W. A. Webster, who was immigration agent, had not furnished correct dates for their services. In the same year, Mr. McMullen moved that the salary of C. C. Chapman be reduced by $2,300 or left out.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Who was that Mr. McMullen.

Mr. CLANCY. A gentleman recently appointed to the Senate of Canada. In the year 1890 no resolution was moved by hon. gentlemen opposite. Nor was any moved in 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896. Therefore, this hon. gentleman who took the opposition to task this afternoon for not having moved any resolution, has in the same breath condemned himself and his colleagues in the past. Why, Mr. Speaker, during the whole period of eighteen years, in which there was an expenditure to the extent of $603,000,000 in round numbers, these gentlemen only objected in the irregular way I have mentioned, to $447,000 of it, I would ask the hon. gentleman to say now whether in view of the opinion he has given to this House, that he and his friends properly discharged their duties in the past. The duty of the opposition, sir, in this House and out of it, is not what the hon. gentleman gave us this afternoon to understand it was. That is an old trick resorted to in the back country school houses, but he knows perfectly well that the opposition put themselves sufficiently on record when they rise and criticise the various expenditures as they are submitted to the House. Would he not be quite ready himself to take advantage of any speech made in this House on any item of expenditure? Would he not name the member who made that speech and call him to answer for his conduct, if the item was not one which should be criticised? It would be for the opposition an impossible task to call for a division on every item of expenditure to which they object. If such a practice were resorted to, it would take up our whole time, and we would not be able to do anything else. If that were the only means the opposition of the day had of putting on record their objections to any item of expenditure which they considered wrong, why, the whole session would be taken up in division.

The hon. gentleman has given, as an evidence of the increase in population, the increase in trade, the increase in exports and bank deposits and discounts and railway freights and railway earnings and settlers' effects, and letters and lands and so on. Let me say that there can be no room for discussion of the fact that we are enjoying a period of expansion. The opposition of to-day have no desire to imitate the conduct of hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in this side. We do not care to decry Canada as these hon. gentlemen were wont to do even in periods of great expansion. I challenge any one of them to show any instance in which they put themselves on record, even in periods of great prosperity, by a single sentence giving credit to Canada for being prosperous and progressive, Neither the hon. gentleman nor any of his colleagues can be accused of having given utterance to a single sentence on behalf of their country. Their cry was always to the opposite effect. Well, we do not propose to imitate a policy of that kind. We frankly admit that Canada is making great progress. But we say that in that respect Canada cannot be singled out from any other civilized country. It is an undeniable fact that the whole world is passing through a period of great expansion and prosperity. But we deny that Canada is enjoying the prosperity which she should under the circumstances. I deny that Canada is as well off as she might be if her affairs were properly conducted. Hon. gentlemen opposite take great credit to themselves for our prosperity, but everybody knows that in 1896, before they came into office, a change began to make itself felt. They knew perfectly well that the betterment began in 1896, not only in Canada, but throughout the civilized world. Our customers began to buy from us, prices advanced, we have had good crops, and indeed have enjoyed everything that can contribute to the advancement of our country. And in that respect we are not alone, but the whole world in general has shared a corresponding advance in prosperity. These hon. gentlemen came into power when the whole commercial world started to move, and they went with it. They got on the merry-go-round and have been riding on it ever since, and seem to labour under the delusion that they were running the whole world. They appear to believe that they have made Canada. But let me tell them that it would have been impossible for them even with all their efforts—and they did their best—to stem the tide of prosperity that has come upon Canada and the world in general. I do not propose to dwell therefore on a subject that is not open to discussion, namely, whether we are enjoying a period of great prosperity or not. On that question both sides are agreed. But the question now fairly open for discussion is whether these hon. gentlemen have made proper use of their opportunities, whether they are conducting the affairs of Canada as they should be administered, taking into consideration the great advantages we are enjoying.

The hon. Minister of Finance gave us, at the outset, his forecast for the coming yeaf, just as last year he gave us a similar forecast. Let me call his attention to this fact, that in not one instance last year were his previsions correct. Take, for instance, the first item. He estimated our revenue at $52,750,000 and it turned out to be but $52,574,000 or $235,299 short of his prediction. The expenditure on consolidated revenue he estimated at $46,400,000, but the actual expenditure was $46,866,000 or nearly half a million dollars in excess. Then take his estimate of expenditure on capital account, he put that at $10,700,000, whereas the actual expenditure was $11,116,000, or an excess over his estimate of $416,499. I now come to the estimated surplus, in which he disappointed the people although he has taxed them highly. That is not nearly what he said it would be. He estimated that at $6,330,000, but it actually was only $5,648,000 or $701,667 less than his estimate. Then he predicted what the increase of the public debt would amount to.

And he said that would be $1,800,000. And how much did he state the increase to have been? Not $1,800,000 as he stated it would be, but $2,986,000, or $1,186,000 more than he had estimated. If his figuring is not more correct than that of last year, the House and the country need repose but little confidence in his predictions. He said that in the coming year we shall have a revenue of $58,500,000. And he estimates an expenditure on consolidated revenue account of $51,000,000 and, on capital account of $14,250,000. He estimates a surplus on consolidated revenue fund of $5,800,000, and an increase—and this is where the charm of the surplus is felt by the people—an increase in the public debt of $6,000,000. I propose to deal with that branch of the subject somewhat later on. In the meantime I wish to say a word about the tariff. The hon. Minister of Customs took a good deal of pains to show the House that the people were paying less taxes now than in 1896. I do not wish to misrepresent the hon. gentleman, and, if I am not correct I would like him to give his dissent now. I understood him to say that the people are now paying less in taxes than in 1896.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. At a less rate.

Mr. CLANCY. Then, my hon. friend qualifies it by making it a matter of rate.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I am not modifying it, but telling the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) what I said.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman makes a distinction between taking millions out of the pockets of the people and the rate of assessment upon which his taxes are levied. I am glad to understand the distinction he makes, because it is important. Now, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in opposition they were in favour of what they called a revenue tariff. The Minister of Customs read this afternoon a resolution adopted by the Liberal party in 1893—or rather he read a portion of it. But here is the concluding part of that resolution, which will live as long as the Liberal party lives and tariffs are to be dealt with in Canada :

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound, and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours.
> This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Does the hon. gentleman stand by that now? They will not stand by it, for they have been alarmed by the public sentiment of this country. They know that they must give the people a measure of protection, and that they must give a better measure of protection than would be given as an incident of a revenue tariff. But a revenue tariff and the protection incidental to it were what they declared for in unmistakable terms. Let me see what the Prime Minister said on this very subject. Speaking at Elmira, on the 24th of October, 1895, according to the 'Globe' the right hon. gentleman said :

> This is the platform on which we stand. We want the revenue to be raised by customs, but we do not want to have a revenue to be raised to have extravagant expenditure such as we have, but simply to take from the pockets of the people only what is necessary to have economical, honest and efficient government.

When the right hon. gentleman made that speech, the amount being taken from the people was $42,000,000. He called public attention to this, and deplored it as a great burden of taxation. But to-day he is taking $57,000,000 out of the pockets of the people. Is it a revenue tariff which takes $57,000,000 instead of $42,000,000 out of the pockets of the people ? It is not a revenue tariff; it is a taxation tariff. The Prime Minister went further on that occasion :

> This we denounce as an invasion of the rights of the people. I take this issue with the Conservative party. They believe in taxation to build up the country——

That is very true. We do believe in so levying the taxes as to build up the country.

> —we hold that taxation is an evil——

Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to hold taxation to be an evil now. They all revel in it, as the Minister of Customs did this afternoon, when he told us that he had no apologies to make for it, but approved it.

> —a very necessary evil if you will, but an evil that nothing will justify except the necessity of raising the revenues of the country and nothing else. We of the Liberal party lay down the principles that taxation is taking away from a man a portion of his earnings, and we say that every man has a right and an absolute right to his own earnings and to dispose of it as he thinks fit.

Are they carrying this out ? The Prime Minister went on :

> We stand here against protection, in favour of a customs tariff based on the principle of revenue and nothing else.

Then we have the familiar speeches of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), but I will not trouble the House with them, they have already been embalmed in 'Hansard.' All will remember that that hon. gentleman denounced protection as a fraud and a robbery. Then we have the hon. Minister of Customs who made a speech at Harristown, which I find reported in the 'Globe' of 14th of November, 1895. In that speech, the hon. gentleman said :

> There has been an indirect taxation that has been paid that does not go into the treasury at all but has gone to the support and maintenance of the industries of the country. I do not say and I do not claim that in all cases the amount of the duties is added to the article by the manufacturer who manufactured that article in the country, but it would be more than folly for any man to say that under a protection system the man who purchases home-made goods does not pay more than he would have to pay if there was free competition. What is protection put on for? It seems to me that it is a waste of time to talk about it in any other respect than that.

The hon. gentleman made a speech in London a few days before this, in which he made a reference to himself. I know the hon. minister's delicacy, and I realize how embarrassing it must have been to him on that occasion to make any reference to himself, and it is with equal delicacy that I refer to anything having relation to the hon. gentleman's own personal business. He was speaking to a large and intelligent audience. He said :

> What I want you to consider when you go home——

He was speaking to all classes of consumers, he was speaking to the taxpayers of the country, whom he had been teaching that the system of protection was a wrong one and ought to be changed, he was pointing out its evils, and he gave an example. What was that example :

> What I want you to consider when you go home is whether a law passed by the Tory government and placed on the statute-book, that made Paterson rich, has made you not rich, or some of you even poorer than you were before. Whether that is a just law or not and one that should be continued ?

Would you not expect, Mr. Speaker, that the first thing that gentleman would do on coming into power would be to remove that stigma from himself ? Would you not expect that the hon. gentleman would take the first opportunity to wipe out a statute which gave the business in which he was concerned a large measure of protection ? Your surprise will be, Sir, that the hon. gentleman did nothing of the kind. That hon. gentleman does not want any protection, and yet—I do not say this in any offensive sense to the hon. gentleman—the hon. gentleman made use of that language to point out to the people that there ought to be a reduction in taxation, that the manufacturers had a large share of protection to which the hon. gentleman declared they were not entitled. He selected his own case, and he declared this was an unjust law and ought to be removed from the statute-book. I ask him when he is going to remove that law from the statute-book ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did the hon. gentleman say that I said it had made me rich ?

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman gave the inference to the public that he was rich.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. No, no, tell the truth.

Mr. CLANCY. Very well, I will take the hon. gentleman on his own interpretation of his language. The hon. gentleman meant that it did not make him rich. If it did not make him rich, it did not make other manufacturers rich. The hon. gentleman has absolutely no means of escape.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. The hon gentleman said I stated that it made me rich. I ask him if I said that ?

Mr. CLANCY. I will read it again.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know where the hon. gentleman got his garbled extracts.

Mr. CLANCY. As I have already said, I am quoting from the 'Globe' newspaper, I have given him the date, so I take it for granted the extract is an accurate report. This is what the hon. gentleman had to say :

What I want you to consider when you go home——

Mark the words.

——is whether a law passed by the Tory government——

Mark those words.

——and placed on the statute-book, that made Paterson rich——

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What preceded that, please ?

Mr. CLANCY. I will tell the hon. gentleman what succeeded it if he will wait a moment. What was the next sentence of the hon. gentleman ? It was an interrogation to the persons who were listening to him. What does he say ?

——has made you not rich or some of you even poorer than you were before. Whether that is a just law or not, and one that should be continued.

Is there any escape from the hon. gentleman's meaning on that occasion ? If the hon. gentleman wishes to revise it, I am quite willing.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What is the date ?

Mr. CLANCY. The 'Globe' of the 5th of February, 1895.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. I will look up the date, but I fancy the hon. gentleman will find that I was dealing with a statement made by a late colleague of his, Dr. Montague, that the national policy had made me rich, and on that I based the argument that if it had made me rich it should make them rich too. I did not say it made me rich.

Mr. CLANCY. Very well, I will take the hon. gentleman's own version of it. I will conclude that the hon. gentleman was not made rich, I will conclude that the hon. gentleman meant that Dr. Montague was wrong when he declared it had made him rich, I will conclude that when Dr. Montague included him with the other manufacturers as having benefited by the national policy, that he was wrong, and that he did not benefit by the national policy, and therefore the national policy was not taking money out of the pockets of the people. What was the hon. gentleman's contention on that very occasion ? It was that a large sum of money was being taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers of Canada, and that a great proportion of it never went into the public treasury, and therefore it was unjust taxation. Why was it unjust ? Because it made the people poorer by reason of the taxation, and for other reasons. I ask the hon. gentleman which of those two positions he desires to choose; that he was telling the people things that were not true, or that I have been misrepresenting him. There is no escape from one of these two positions.

Then, we have the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). This hon. gentleman seemed to sing the same song during that period. It is very funny, Mr. Speaker, that during certain periods hon. gentlemen took a certain course and were generally pretty well agreed upon that course; but as soon as a turn of affairs came and it suited them to take another course, they did so. The hon. member for North Norfolk, speaking in the same campaign, said :

The farmer might rely upon this statement as being infallibly true, that no protective duty upon any product of which he raised a surplus for export could increase the price to the producer in Canada.

The hon. gentleman gave his views on that point. But he went further. He would level down everything, he was supporting the contention of the Minister of Customs and of the government of the day. I will quote what he said, and ask you to put it alongside the speech that he made here a few evenings ago :

> Much has been said and still was said about making a slaughter market for cheap goods. In the interests of the consumer he was unable to see what evil consequences would result from buying articles we needed away below their value. He would advise every man to buy a dollar's worth of what he wanted for fifty cents if possible, and he had no hesitation in assuring him that the only party that wanted him to pay full prices would object to his having a chance to pick up bargains. Even if the importer of slaughtered invoices wanted to force goods upon him as a gift he could stand it. So far as the consumer is concerned, the cheaper he could buy goods the better, and the prejudice that was excited against permitting buyers to pick up bargains because some were living in the country, wanted to force sale at a ruinous sacrifice, was not a well founded one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we had that hon. gentleman telling us a few days ago that we ought to have a defensive tariff. He told us that we could produce nearly all the goods that were brought in from abroad, and he gave the government a friendly warning of what he expected them to do in the future. That is the position of the hon. gentleman on the tariff. We know now about the difficulty of framing a tariff policy for the country. With the settled opinions as enunciated by the Liberal party in the past with regard to what their attitude is on the trade question, the government is placed in a difficult position; because the Minister of Customs does not dissent from the statement I made a moment ago that a revenue tariff and a revenue tariff alone, is suited for the interests of Canada, and that under what he calls a revenue tariff Canada has made great progress.

The Liberal party are pinned down to this position that their policy is a revenue tariff, and if there is any departure from that it is an evil. It is an evil to the extent which the hon. gentleman himself has said more than once in this House. The difference between the policies of the two parties, as stated by the hon. gentleman on more than one occasion, is this : The policy of the Conservative party, as he states it, calls for a tariff that is protective. If any revenue comes from that tariff as an incident it must come as an incident because the principle is protective. The opposite to that is the position of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, namely, that their tariff is a revenue tariff and if any measure of protection arises from that revenue tariff as an incident the manufacturers and people of this country will have that protection to the extent of the incident and no more. I think I have correctly stated the positions of the two parties as understood by the hon. gentleman himself. They hold that every particle of protection that arises out of a revenue tariff as an incident is an evil. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he takes that position ? The hon. gentleman is opposed to every form of protection. It is well for us to understand the position of the two parties upon this great question. I ask the hon. gentleman, as he has set his face against protection in every form, if any protection arises from a revenue tariff as an incident, is it an evil ? Will the hon. gentleman answer ? I will sit down and ask the hon. gentleman to give an answer to the question because it is an important question.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. We do not generally argue questions across the floor of the House. We make speeches. The hon. gentleman is not my catechist. Go on with your speech.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) tells me to go on with my speech. The hon. gentleman finds himself in difficulties. I tell the hon. gentleman that he and his party and his government, like every individual and everything that is started wrong, feels that he must play false to the end of the game The hon. gentleman is in a false position and he knows it perfectly well, namely, that when he enunciates the differences between the two parties he declares that the policy of the Liberal party is opposed to protection, and he tells the people that he grudgingly gives that protection which arises out of a revenue tariff as an incident ; yet, the hon. gentleman has not the courage to get up and deny the statement here this evening, that if any protection arises as an incident out of the revenue tariff it is not an evil to this country. I tell the hon. gentleman that he is a protectionist and that he dare not own it. The government of the day are doing things every day in regard to the tariff and other matters that they dare not own because they have been preaching other doctrines for many years. What is the difference between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff ? We frankly own that the object of the Conservative party in framing the protective tariff was to help the interests of Canada. We framed that tariff for the purpose of advancing the interests of this country. What is the difference between a protective and a revenue tariff ? One is a tax gathering tariff as the hon. gentleman admits it must be, and the other is a protective tariff. A protective tariff is the very opposite of a revenue tariff. What is the position of Canada to-day ? What is the position of every civilized country to-day ? We have a commercial war continually in progress between the civilized countries of the world. What are the weapons of defence that are used in the United States, and what are the weapons of defence that should be used in Canada ? Are they not the tariff ? Does the hon. gentleman not throw them away when he refuses to use them and proposes to impose a dead weight upon Canada by means of a revenue tariff as he calls it ? Does he propose to throw away every weapon of defence we have against the United States? What does a protective tariff in Canada mean, and how is it viewed by the United States and by other countries ? Are not our tariff changes, as they affect the United States, a subject of great alarm ? They are, and properly so, because they affect the trade of that country and affect the rights of the people of that country to come in and take what belongs to the people of Canada. This is the only weapon that the people of any civilized country can use and it is the only weapon of defence that we have with which to protect the interests of the people of Canada. Yet, the hon. gentleman says we will give you just what protection you have as an incident. In every way he says protection is false and an evil, view it from whatever standpoint you may, and he will give you no protection. But the hon. gentleman is giving a large measure of protection, or rather, the hon. gentleman and his friends failed to take away, I am glad to say, the large measure of protection that was already given. In the whole revision of what the hon. gentleman calls the protectionist tariff, and which I admit was a protectionist tariff, less than 30 per cent of all the items were dealt with. Two-thirds of the items, I am glad to say, in the interest of the country, were not dealt with, but I regret to say that those that were changed were changed to the injury of Canada as a whole, as I shall be able to show later on. Now, one of the positions taken by hon. gentlemen opposite in 1897 was this : The first thing the hon. gentlemen did was what we might have expected from a set of very intelligent gentlemen who either never understood the trade of Canada or who put themselves in the position that they were not able to deal with it. In other words, the hon. gentlemen were shrinking from the consequence of their own conduct and teachings. The first thing that hon. gentlemen did was to introduce what they called a general tariff and a reciprocal tariff and they gave reciprocal advantages to every country in the world that was willing to take advantage of them. One year passed over and hon. gentlemen repented and repented with very great cost to Canada. Hon. gentlemen found themselves in a false position, namely, that they had undertaken a task that they could not perform, and when my hon. friend smiled when I said that the government of the day had either not studied the trade question of Canada, or that they had placed themselves in a false position to escape the difficulties of their past record, I will say to him that this statement is perfectly true. After undertaking to have the Belgian and German treaties renounced they were obliged to forego the reciprocal advantages that they professed to give to the world at the outset. There are two conclusions to be drawn from this—either hon. gentlemen did not know what they were doing in 1897, or they were not honest in what they did in 1898. I will leave it to hon. gentlemen to take their choice if there is any choice in the matter.

What followed ? Why, Sir, the preference was given to Great Britain alone, and the outcome is that there is not one redeeming feature in the preferential tariff in so far as any benefit to the people of Canada is concerned. That is a very broad statement but it is as true as it is broad. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) attempted to show that some benefits did flow from the preferential tariff, but I tell him that a preference under any condition, even it were a reciprocal preference with Great Britain or with any other country, is a difficult thing to work out. I do not say that it is impossible to work it out ; I believe it is possible that it might be adjusted, but I say that the adjustment would be difficult. We cannot give England or any other country a preference without having to make two kinds of sacrifices. One is : That we must to some extent interfere with the industrial interests of Canada, and the other is : That we must relieve foreign importers from the duty which they would otherwise pay, and then the deficit has to be made up by taxation on the people of our own country. That would be the result even in the case of a mutual preference. But the government has made these sacrifices without obtaining a single iota of compensation in return for the people of Canada. In round numbers, customs duties have been removed to the extent of $2,000,000 last year by reason of the preferential tariff. I assert that the people of Canada have not benefited as a whole to the extent of a single dollar by that reduction. I am prepared to admit that some few persons in Canada may have been benefited, but the hon. Minister of Customs will not contend that we should have a tariff in Canada which benefits only a few, and in the benefits of which the people in general do not participate. Any system of taxation is unjust under which the burdens are not fairly divided. Does the hon. gentleman say that the consumer in Canada pays one farthing less for his goods than he did before the preferential tariff was inaugurated ? Not at all. Every dollar saved in that way goes either to the wholesale man in England or to the wholesale man in Canada, and the consumer does not get a dollar out of it. We have lessened our revenue to that extent, and in one way or another the people of Canada will have to contribute the $2,000,000 which we have sacrificed, without receiving any compensation whatever. To that extent the preferential tariff is absolutely an injury to Canada. Let me point out that last year farm implements were imported to the extent of nearly $2,000,000 on which was collected a duty of $388,000, and how much do you suppose the farmers of Canada—who in numbers represent one-half of the taxpayers—how much do you suppose they were relieved on that importation of $2,000,000. Well, they saved by the preference tariff the very magnificent sum of $2,493. That is the extent to which the preference helped our farmers.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) spoke about giving encouragement to the industries of Canada, and he said that with the exception of one, namely the woollen industry—with which he expressed his sympathy but which he made no effort to relieve—he knew of no other industry in Canada that was injuriously affected. But the hon. gentleman knows that his attention has been called to numbers of industries that are injuriously affected ; some by reason of the preferential tariff and some by reason of the unwise changes which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues made in the tariff in 1897. Look at the refusal of this government to give any assistance to the beet sugar industry. The hon. gentleman told the House that two factories were being built in my constituency, that another was being built in the North-west, and that because these gentlemen had invested their money there was no reason to suppose that they needed assistance, and so the government refused them assistance. I can tell the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Paterson) that the fact that about $1,500,000 has been invested in the beet sugar industry in my constituency is no reason in the world why this industry should not be assisted by the government. He knows perfectly well that to a large extent the beet sugar business in Canada is an experiment. He knows it will be some time before that industry can be firmly established, and he ought know that during the period of its growth it should have encouragement from the government. The people from several districts came here and asked the government, either to increase the import duties on foreign sugar or to give assistance by way of bounty, but the government refused to give assistance in either way. The Minister of Customs invited the deputation to dinner and he gave them a stone to eat, and they have gone back home to live on that and to work out the difficult problem of carrying on their industry. It is quite true that two beet sugar factories are being built in my constituency, but I can tell the Minister of Customs that the people of that constituency have burdened themselves by giving immense municipal bonuses to encourage that industry. They have relieved these factories from taxation for many years, and although already overburdened by taxation they assumed these responsibilities, hoping and believing that their efforts would be seconded by the government. In this they have been disappointed. That is the true position of the beet sugar industry in my county. Why was not the beet sugar industry given assistance as any other industry in the country ? I would like the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) and the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) to tell me, what is the difference between the sugar industry and the iron industry in Canada. Will any one tell me that there is a reason why there should be encouragement given in one instance and not in the other. For my part, I am utterly unable to see why both industries should not be treated in the same way.

It is another evidence of the false step hon. gentleman took in the past ; and what was it ? Why, Sir, with regard to the iron duties, they had been crying out from one end of Canada to the other for years that all the duties on iron ought to be taken off. That was the position of the Minister of Finance; it was the position of the Minister of Customs. It was the trend of the speeches of every member of the government and of every Liberal in public life at that time, that the duties ought to be taken off both coal and iron. When they came into office they found themselves bound to do what they believed was wrong. What did they do ? The first thing they did was to slash off the duties from iron goods coming from the United States, giving the United States manufacturers an advantage to that extent in the markets of Canada. Then they had to do something to offset that, and we have the words of the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Finance to the effect that having taken the duties off iron, they had to put their hands in the pockets of the people to grant bounties to the iron industry to make up for it. That is a case of burning the candle at both ends. In the first place, we have taken off a large amount of duties that would have been paid by the manufacturers of the United States in order to come into the Canadian market ; and, to make up for that, we are taking three quarters of a million dollars from the pockets of the people to pay bounties on iron made in Canada. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if that is a consistent position, or one that inures to the benefit of Canada. On the contrary, it is one of the most stupendous blunders a government ever made. I am not opposed to a fair measure of bounties on iron, if the government took care, when they gave the bounties, that Canadians would have the field to themselves in which to sell their goods, instead of throwing down the bars and opening the gates, as the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) put it, and allowing foreign producers of iron to come in. I say there never was a greater mistake made in a revision of the tariff than that was; but in that, as in everything else they have done, the government had to act falsely. They took the duties off iron, to what purpose? Let the hon. gentleman go to the farmers and every other class of consumer, and ask them if there is one article of iron manufacture which they can purchase more cheaply now than they could in 1896. Nor has the reduction of the duty gone to any great extent into the pockets of the manufacturers in Canada who were making farm implements. It has gone to the benefit of the iron producers of the United States to the detriment of Canada. If, on account of that blunder—and I say it was a great blunder—we can take from the pockets of the people of Canada, by way of bounties to the iron industry of Canada, I ask the hon. gentleman on what ground can he or his colleagues refuse to give similar encouragement to a great industry which will benefit the farmers of this country? True, the farmers cannot come to this House and present their case. They have not the same organization; they cannot make themselves heard; they cannot come here at short notice and thunder at the doors of parliament for their rights. But the hon. gentleman is doing a manifest injustice to them. What was the remedy the Minister of Trade and Commerce offered them the other evening? That hon. gentleman is usually on all occasions a master of jibes and jeers, and he could not allow the farmers to escape. On that occasion he said: You cannot protect the farmers; there is no use in trying to do that. All you can do is to give them bounties. We will give them bounties on their cows, their pigs, their grain; it will only cost the country forty or fifty million dollars, but what is that so long as you are protecting the farmers? I tell the hon. gentleman that the farmers are not going to take any such slurs; because they know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce was insincere when he made that statement, in order to ridicule the idea of giving aid to the greatest of all industries. The hon. gentleman is doing the farmers a manifest injustice by not granting them some assistance by way of bounty. I am not prepared to say that the government would be called upon to raise the import duties on sugar to a large extent. They have done that already to some extent in their revision of the tariff in 1897; but there is no reason that one can imagine why they are not bound to assist the sugar industry by way of bounties as they have done the iron industry as a result of their mistaken course in taking the duties off iron.

Now, the hon. Minister of Customs has drawn a parallel between taxing the people and imposing a rate of taxation upon the people. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that a rate on the dollar means no more than a rate of taxation in a municipality, irrespective of the assessment. There is no means by which the people may draw a more absurdly false conclusion than to say that the rate is the measure of taxation. The Minister of Finance knows that it is perfectly idle to take a rate of taxation independent of the sum taken out of the pockets of the people. Take the hon. gentleman's own municipality. I will suppose that the assessment in that municipality is $100,000, and that the rate of taxation is one cent on the dollar. I will suppose that that assessment is raised to $500,000, and that the rate of taxation is reduced to 99-100ths of a cent on the dollar. The Minister of Customs would have us suppose that in such a case the taxation had been reduced instead of being as a matter of fact trebled. Let me give you an evidence of the way in which the hon. gentleman has lowered the taxation to the people of this country. The rate of taxation for customs and excise in 1896 was $5.42 a head, and in 1901 it was $7.31 a head; or, taking a family of five, which is the average number throughout Canada, the extra sum paid in the latter period is $8.95 per family. The total revenue taken out of the pockets of the people in 1896 was $7.14 a head; in 1901 it was $9.78, or an increase for each person in Canada of $2.64, or, for each family of five, an increase of $13.20. In other words the tax per family, in 1896 was $35.70 and in 1901 $48.90, or just $13.20 per family more than in 1896. Does the hon. gentleman call that lowering the taxation? Will he go to the people and convince them that he is imposing less taxes and lower rates when he is taking out of the pockets of the people now $13.20 per family more to run the affairs of Canada than was taken by the late government in 1896. I think he will find great difficulty in convincing the people that he has done so.

Let me now take the rates of taxation which, the hon. gentleman says, he has lowered to the extent of 3·02. In 1896 the rate was 18·28, and the hon. gentleman was not fair when he said that it had been reduced to such an extent that there was a difference between the average taxation of 1896 and that of 1901 of 2·02 in favour of the latter. What are really the facts? The whole importations into Canada of goods dutiable and free in 1901 amounted to $181,237,988. Of that amount there was Indian corn which passed through in transit, which was exported from Canada and not entered in the sense of being for consumption at all, which formed no part of the consumption of goods in this country, although so entered, under the new regulations of the hon. gentleman—of that sum, the Indian corn thus entered amounted to $5,506,542, thus reducing the amount of goods entered for consumption to $175,731,000 in round numbers, or giving an average rate of 16·56, being 1·72 less than when hon. gentlemen took office. That includes, as the hon. gentleman knows well, the operation of the preferential tariff which, as I have pointed out, was absolutely of no use to us. What then is the effect of that ? The effect is this, that while the hon. gentleman has given a reduced rate, as he says, of something like 2 per cent on the present tariff, he has not given any relief to the people, for he knows that that could not be anything but a mere fraction, even if the preferential tariff operated to the benefit of the people.

But let us take the iron duties. The hon. gentleman took off in duties from grains to the extent of $182,000 in round numbers, and the reduction on iron duties amounted to $971,000, making a total of $1,251,000 from which the people have not derived a particle of benefit. He knows that under the preferential rate, the iron goods which came in from England were only 15 per cent of our total importations, and that we got from the United States 85 per cent, so that the people of Canada in no sense received any benefit.

Then take the industry with which the hon. gentleman has so much sympathy. He asked the leader of the opposition for some advice to the Prime Minister with regard to the tariff of Canada and those questions in general which interest the colonies and Great Britain and which will come up for discussion in the London conference. He wanted some explicit declaration with regard to what the resolution of the opposition meant when it declared the present tariff unsatisfactory. He seemed not to be able to understand just what that meant, and wanted some light, not only to guide himself, but to guide the Prime Minister when in England. Well, I suppose, in view of the right hon. gentleman's refusal to consider the question of Imperial defence, it would be very difficult for the leader of the opposition to give him any advice which would cover that question, and therefore I think he would be quite absolved from doing so. But I want to point out where the tariff is unsatisfactory. Take the woollen trade of Canada, which we know is in a very unsatisfactory condition, owing entirely to the blunders of the government. They were wrong in the position they took before 1896 and have been wrong ever since. They made war upon specific duties in every case, as unduly taking money out of the pockets of the people and as being an unfair discrimination against the poor in favour of the rich. Let us see what was the effect of the specific duties on this industry. The rate that would have been paid upon the goods imported in 1901, under the tariff of 1896, would have been 31·82. That was reduced by the preference to 25·71, but the rate on goods that did not come in under the preference was 33·44. The people were thus taxed on these latter goods the difference between 33·44 and 31·52. Their burdens were increased to that extent, and still the protection taken away from the manufacturers. These hon. gentlemen took away the combined duties of 25 per cent and 5 cents a pound, which were charged on woollen goods under the tariff of 1896, and replaced them by the tariff of 35 per cent. If that had not been modified by the preferential rate to the extent of the importations from England, the Minister of Customs must be aware that he would have been taxing the people more than they were taxed in 1896 and at the same time have taken away the protection from our manufacturers. There is an instance in which taxation has been increased and the protection taken away from our own manufacturers on the goods imported under the general tariff, on which the tax is 33·44 as against 31·82 on those imported under the preferential rate. The taxes have been increased and yet the Canadian industries have been ruined. If these hon. gentlemen would restore the weight duty of 5 cents a pound, which existed under the Conservative tariff of 1896, our manufacturers would at least have their present condition considerably relieved and have a fair measure of protection. I am giving this as an instance, of which there are many others, to show how the present tariff is unsatisfactory, and how an increased protection may not mean increased taxation on the people.

There is just one more matter to which I wish to refer and that is the position of the Liberal party and that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman is not able to be in the House. Hon. gentlemen will remember that he wrote a letter to the newspapers on the 25th of October, 1894, in which he had this to say :—

> What are the other planks of the Patron platform affecting Dominion politics ? They are these. First, economy in administration : second, purity and independence of Parliament ; third, tariff for revenue only ; fourth, reciprocal trade ; fifth, protection of labour from monopoly ; sixth, no railway bonuses ; seventh, voters' lists made by local officials ; eighth, no gerrymandering——

We shall see what is to come—> ——ninth, lands for the settlers. Now, there is simply no single one of all these objects which the Liberal party have not been fighting for, moving resolutions for and doing their very best to obtain any time during the last 25 years.

As to economy, how do hon. gentlemen opposite fulfil that ? The expenditure in 1896 was about $44,000,000, and in 1901 it has risen to $57,000,000. As to purity of elections and independence of parliament, their fulfilment of that is well illustrated by West Huron, Brockville, West Elgin, the St. James division of Montreal, and even the municipal elections in London. Tariff for revenue only has been fulfilled after the fashion of hon. gentlemen opposite by taking $52,000,000 out of the pockets of the people last year as against $36,000,000 taken out of the pockets of the people in 1896—an increase of about 50 per cent. Reciprocal trade—their promise with regard to this has been fulfilled by the first minister declaring that Canada no longer needs it. As to granting no more railway subsidies, which they were supposed to have been fighting for twenty-five years, that has been fulfilled by the hon. gentlemen opposite granting since 1897, no less than $21,736,000.

Now, I wish to say just a word with regard to the charges that have been brought in this House about the taking of the census of 1891. I am sure it must be a matter of sincere regret that hon. gentlemen opposite have taken the position with regard to this matter that they have taken in this House. I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce must have surprised the House and the country by the shocking declaration he made that the census enumerators of Canada had fraudulently lent themselves to the assistance of the leader of the government of that day, Sir John Macdonald, and that some 4,000 of these persons had deliberately banded themselves together and committed fraud, and, in doing so had violated their own oaths of office and so had committed perjury as well. This is a sad commentary upon the influence of the churches in Canada. It is a charge so shocking that the government cannot disregard it but must see the duty that is imposed upon it of making a full investigation. What are we to think of the morality of the people of the great province of Ontario, when we find such charges made against a large number of men of whom probably 85 per cent belong to one or other of the great brancnes of the Protestant church ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce took care to say that this is a matter that should not be spoken of or treated lightly. I know well what I have to say ; I understand the gravity of the situation ; but I shall give chapter and verse for everything I have to say. I defy any man in this House or out of it to find any word in the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that can be tortured into the form of a single reason in support of the charges he made. What were those charges ? One was that Sir John Macdonald was in a bad plight ; the elections of 1891 had given him but a small majority, and he was likely to be compelled to face a new election ; therefore every census enumerator had come to the assistance of Sir John and had falsified the lists in order to give a false impression to the country. Is there a man in this House who believes that that charge has any foundation ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce did not even make an attempt to do more than make the bald assertion that the enumerators had falsified the census. The government of the day must take notice of that charge and investigate the facts, or they will stand convicted before the people of having, under the shelter of the privileges of this House, made charges which they would not dare to make outside. I am not going to deal with the case of the province of Ontario just now, but with the province of Quebec. I do not see the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) in his place. I do not see the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in his place. I do not see many of those who pride themselves, and justly pride themselves, upon being French Canadians. But I call upon these gentlemen to pay close attention to the charge made against that province. The last man you would think to make a charge against these people is the Minister of Agriculture. He says :—

> Now, Sir, what have we found ? We have found, by a careful investigation, in so far as it has gone—and it has gone very far indeed in the province of Quebec, and a reasonable distance in the province of Ontario—that if that instruction was given, it was disregarded to such an extent that we must conclude that it was wilfully disregarded.

In other words that they had deliberately perjured themselves. Let us see the charge the Minister of Trade and Commerce made against the province of Quebec.

> It is utterly impossible to compute the total extent of the frauds that were committed in Quebec ; but I do not think anybody will say that I am exaggerating when, after examining the evidence I have laid on the Table, I say there is every reasonable ground for believing that at least 50,000 or 60,000 souls were improperly counted in Quebec in the census of 1891.

Could a man make a more grave charge than that ? But that is not all. The Minister of Agriculture has taken special pains to single out the province of Quebec, to cast a stigma on the people of Quebec, although Ontario has been besmirched and the hon. gentlemen have done everything they could to take away the good character of the people of that province. What does the Minister of Agriculture add to the charges and insults that have been already mentioned ?

> Now we did not wish to confine the investigation by any means to the province of Quebec. Although the difficulties were much greater in the province of Ontario, still a slight investigation was made to find out whether anything like the same conditions obtained. I may say at once that we did not find anything like as much of this sort of thing in the province of Ontario as we did in the province of Quebec.

In other words, as depraved as the people of Ontario are, willing as they were to commit perjury, still they must take second place to the people of the province of Quebec.

Mr. MONET. So far as the Tories of the province of Quebec are concerned, because these people are Conservative employees.

Mr. CLANCY. Quite so, Mr. Speaker, we have the version of the hon. gentleman. Is the hon. gentleman sincere ? Is he prepared to take the responsibility of saying inside or outside of this House, would any gentleman on either side of the House so far forget himself as to say that because a man was a Conservative he was likely to be a perjurer? Yet there is where the hon. gentleman draws the line of distinction. We have this state of thing trumped up, we have the hon. gentleman pursuing that course, and that he should back up the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture is not at all surprising. But let us see the evidence upon which they proceeded in the province of Quebec. What have they done? Why, Sir, they started out in the first place upon a fishing expedition. Mr. Thomas Cote was employed as an assistant commissioner, and I challenge the government to say that Mr. Thomas Cote, from the hour he was appointed, and during all the time that he has been drawing the public funds of Canada, ever lifted one finger towards preparing a single figure or a single portion of the census of 1901. I challenge the government to say that he did one act in that census. But what did he do? Why, he started out on a fishing expedition. His business was to justify the false position, the slanderous position, which the government had taken. They were bound to have blood, whether innocent or guilty blood. Mr. Thomas Cote went out, and what did he do? Why, I charge him before the people of Canada and before this House with having violated a sacred oath, and I charge the Minister of Agriculture with having violated his position as a minister, and he should no longer sit there in a parliament or in a ministry of Canada. Let me give you the proof. I will quote now, Mr. Speaker, from the regulations and instructions that were given to the census commissioner, the census enumerators and all the officers in the Census Department, on entering upon the work of taking the census of 1901. This is what I find on page 8:

> Every commissioner, enumerator or other person employed in the execution of the Census Act must take and subscribe an oath binding him to faithful and exact discharge of his duties under the provisions of the Act, and in all respects as required by the forms and instructions issued by the Minister of Agriculture; and every such person who makes wilful default in any matter required of him by the Act or the instructions, or who wilfully makes a false declaration touching any such matter, is guilty of a misdemeanour.

It goes on further to say:

> Every officer or other person employed in any capacity on census work is required to keep inviolate the secrecy of the information gathered by the enumerators and entered in the schedules or forms. An enumerator is not permitted to show his schedules to any other person nor to make or keep a copy of them, nor to answer any question respecting their contents directly or indirectly. And the same obligation of secrecy is imposed upon commissioners and other officers or employes of the outside service as well as upon every officer, clerk or other employee of the census office at Ottawa. The facts and statistics of the census may not be used except for statistical compilations, and positive assurance should be given on this point if a fear is entertained by any person that they may be used for taxation or any other object.

Now I come to the latter part of the instructions:

> No result of the enumeration may be given to the public in advance of the printed bulletins or reports, except by the head officer of the census acting under the authority and direction of the Minister of Agriculture.

What has been done? Why, Sir, information that has not yet been given to this House, for which no bulletins have been issued, has been peddled out and given indiscriminately by Mr. Thomas Cote in the province of Quebec. What is the conclusion? The conclusion is that the Minister of Agriculture lent himself to the scheme, and gave authority to use this information in procuring which Mr. Thomas Cote stands charged with having violated a solemn oath. Now the government of the day can take their choice of the two positions. The Minister of Agriculture may deny that he gave such information, but if he only gave authority to use it he is still guilty of an act that is disgraceful. If he takes the responsibility of saying so, we are quite willing that the country should judge what kind of a minister is at the head of that department. I say to the members of the government that are here to-day, that they should demand that man's resignation, he should not remain a member of a responsible government for a single hour if he takes a position of that kind.

Let me see what kind of evidence we have of the efforts that have been made for the purpose of fastening a charge of perjury on the people of the province of Quebec. Now we have a letter written by a gentleman who signs himself the Rev. J. B. Morin. I am told that the Rev. J. B. Morin is at present the parish priest at a place called St. Jean de Matha. He has been there for something like a year. I asked the Minister of Agriculture whether the evidence was taken under oath on so serious a charge against the people, and I was told that it was not taken under oath. I asked the question because, if two hundred, or three hundred are selected, or, two thousand, or three thousand, it is a fair indication of the character of the people throughout the whole province. I asked the question because I think that when the pastors of the people in the province of Quebec had conducted so serious an investigation upon so serious a charge they ought to have conducted it under oath. I was told that it was not conducted under oath but that the information was given and that the investigation had taken place under the parish priests. I tell the hon. Minister of Agriculture now that this is a base slander upon the parish priests of the province of Quebec, that the parish priests took no part in it. The parish priests did what they were expected to do, I suppose. They gave in that courteous and prudent manner in which they usually act such parochial census as they had in their hands and at their disposal. Beyond that they had no part in this unsavoury job. It is a sad thing that hon. gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House, of the same religion and nationality, living and growing up under the same teachings, will not rise and say one word in defence of these gentlemen, and I am sorry to say that it falls to my lot to say that the clergy of the province of Quebec took no part in this affair with the exception of one and I regret to see how disinterested that gentleman was and how anxious he was to convict the Tories of perjury. He wrote as follows :

In answer to your circular letter dated Oct. 21 last, I have the honour to inform you that the movement of population in this parish of St Jean de Matha, county of Joliette, has been during the last ten years practically stagnant. The population must be about the same as in 1891, and we do not understand here the discrepancy of 717 between the census of 1891 and the census of 1901.

How does he get the information that there was a discrepancy of 717 unless Thomas Cote had violated his obligation and given that information to him ? He had no means of knowing unless Mr. Cote gave him that information through the connivance and through the assistance of the hon. Minister of Agriculture. He goes on to prove that and gives evidence of it. He says :

The census that I do take every year since I am in this parish agree with the figures of your enumerator. I have already sent you these figures, and you must have remarked their identity.

How did they come to agree ? Because the figures had been sent down there illegally, improperly and contrary to the regulations by the minister or his census officer, and gives evidence of it. He says :

The census I take every year——

What does this gentleman know about the people of the parish of St. Jean de Matha ? The man never was in that parish, so far as I can tell. He had not been parish priest for fifteen years until 1900 or 1901. That was the first time that he had anything to do with the parish so far as there is any record. I will not say what his zeal was.

We are all of the opinion that the census of 1891 was over-valued by at least that difference of 717 which is seen between the last census and the census of 1891. It would be very easy to discover the fictitious figures and I will do the work if you will send me copies of the figures of 1891.

They had no business to do that. Then he goes on :

It would be extremely easy to check the lists and I will show you the names to be struck off. We will willingly do that work to help you, to give you satisfaction and to show you that the enumerators of the last census have faithfully and conscientiously done their work.

In other words, that the Liberals were not perjurers and that the Conservatives were perjurers. Then, there is another letter from this gentleman dated 5th December :

Dear Mr. Cote,—I have received your letter and copy of the census tables used in 1891. I am conscientiously at work.

Mark this. Mark the tone of this disinterested gentleman employed to investigate a serious charge :

I am conscientiously at work. I have asked the help of two good citizens. You may expect results which will surprise you. For instance, a man aged 48 years and his wife aged 35 are put down as having eighteen children and the eldest is 24 years old or just eleven years less than his mother. In a few days I will send you my report which will be very carefully prepared with references to the schedules. This is rather a long work.

I venture to say you will see a pay list at the end of it.

But we desire to be absolutely sure of our facts and data, so as to enable you to use the same in due time. We find repetitions in the book also names of people who have left the parish in 1882 or of people absolutely unknown in this locality. Families of two or three children are gratified——

I do not know what this means.

—with a dozen of them. You must expect nothing but real astonishment.

When the hon. Minister of Agriculture dealt with this question he told us that this fortunate man who had eighteen children was Paul Guilbault, that his wife was 35 years of age, that he was somewhat older and that there was just eleven years difference between the eldest son and his mother. I am surprised that a man should pen this statement, and that the hon. minister should be silly enough, and I do not make any apology for using the word, to make such a statement in the effort to make out a case of perjury without investigation. It is quite possible, indeed it is probable, that that particular man not only had eighteen children, but that the son, as it is stated, was only eleven years younger than the reputed mother. Every hon. gentleman knows that there is no provision by which to enumerate whether the wife is the mother of the children shown in a particular family or not. Let us take the ages of the children as they were given by the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The oldest is put down as 24, the next 23, and the next 22, the next 20, the next 19, the next 18, the next 17, the next 16, the next 15, the next 14, the next 13, the next 12, the next 11, the next 10, the next 9. There are two eight years of age and the last is put down as being three months old. What conclusion do you come to from that ? I am told that in some cases there are very large families in the province of Quebec, reaching as large as eighteen in number. They may be exceptional cases, but I am told that such cases do exist in Quebec. What are the facts as to the charge on the face of it ? That this was this man's second wife. What does it prove ? The space between the seventeenth child and the eighteenth child is considerable, as one is put down as eight years of age and the other as three months. Does not anybody know that that may be the case, that it is perfectly true, and that there is no falsehood in the statement which is cited in order to make out a case of perjury against the Conservative enumerators. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe just such a case did occur in the province of Quebec. What did the Minister of Agriculture say as a climax, and he was cheered by his friends. He said :

> This is another specimen of the way the census was stuffed in the province of Quebec in 1891.

That is his final conclusion. Now, the Rev. J. B. Morin sends another letter with the result of his investigation, and you can understand what the report will be when I have shown the zeal of this gentleman. He says :—

> You will receive by the same mail a report of the census of 1891. You will notice by the reference which I have made to the census that the returns of ten years ago were frightfully exaggerated. The report which I am sending you has been prepared carefully and conscientiously. It is accurate. You may use it at your discretion. Dr. Turgeon, the notary and Mr. Dugas, both responsible citizens residing in the parish for the past fifteen or sixteen years are absolutely qualified to certify to the accuracy of the information I am mailing you. We are still at your disposal and if you ask for more details we will gladly furnish you with the same.

My hon. friend beside me asks me who Mr. Dugas is. If he asked me who Mr. Turgeon is and who Mr. Marcil is I could say without fear of contradiction and without making inquiry, that both Mr. Dugas and Mr. Turgeon are active Liberal politicians who are endeavouring to bolster up a bad case for the government. Now, let me point out that this gentleman and his two responsible citizens had from the 5th of December to the 16th of December, or nine working days, to do the work they undertook. Let us see what they did in that time. They were able to locate 380 heads of families ; they were able to locate 556 children of all ages ; they were able to hunt up their location ten years ago, and they were able to tell who were in the parish then and who were not in the parish then. In nine days, they were able to do that and more. They were able to tell that a great many of them were in the constituency but absent during the census year of 1901 ; they did all that in nine working days, and sent their report to this government. Well, Sir, I know of nothing more disgraceful to Canada, than what that piece of business discloses. I turn to the opposite side of the House because there should be men there who would rise up in defence of the enumerators of the province of Quebec, whose characters have been assailed in this way. I ask the member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) if he thinks this charge of perjury is a fair one to make against the enumerators of the province of Quebec. I ask him if he thinks his people have had fair play. I ask him if it is not the saddest thing that Canada ever contemplated, that the clergy made up of more than ninety per cent of one religious persuasion, and nearly all of one nationality in that province, have been so remiss in their work of centuries as to turn out such a body of perjurers as these enumerators are alleged to have been. I tell him and I tell his compatriots from the province of Quebec, that as a matter of fair play to their own nationality they should demand a most rigid investigation into the serious charges of perjury, and if they fail to do their duty in that respect they are no longer worthy of the confidence of the people. I repeat that it is the saddest commentary upon the religious teachings of the ministers, both Roman Catholics and Protestants, that Canada has ever had to contemplate in its whole history.

Let me say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favour of the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition which declares in the most emphatic terms that the present tariff is not a satisfactory tariff. I shall vote for that resolution as a protest against the policy of this composite government made up of men of all kinds of theories with regard to our fiscal policy. We have the Minister of Finance telling us that he does not propose to make any tariff changes this year, because it is not a good thing to have constant tariff changes. In that we may agree with him. He tells us that conditions may arise with regard to our home trade and our foreign trade which it will be necessary to take notice of. His tariff is unsatisfactory because he does not take notice of these conditions. We have the Minister of Agriculture still trimming. He says that the tariff is satisfactory, but that conditions may arise when the interests of the country will demand a change. How can he better the country by a revenue tariff ? That is a dead weight tax collecting tariff, but a protective tariff protects the interests of the people of Canada and it is the only weapon we can use against foreign countries who make commercial warfare on us. I will vote for the amendment of the leader of the opposition because it announces a policy that will give every Canadian in Canada the first chance, that will give every Canadian workman the first chance for a day's work; that will give capitalists security for their investment, and that will give to the producers of this country the first right to the markets of Canada; a policy that will in brief, benefit Canadians first and before all others.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). Mr. Speaker, it appears to be my misfortune to come in near the close of this debate now extending over three weeks. From the very able manner in which this subject has been discussed by hon. gentlemen, I fear that little is left for me, but I trust to be able to pick up here and there some crumbs that may have dropped during the debate, on which I may be able to found an argument that has not yet been touched upon in support of the resolution of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I am sure we have listened with pain, I think with extreme pain, to the statement which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) has been compelled to make in reference to the charges made against our French fellow citizens in the province of Quebec. I confess, Sir, that I have not lost my respect for them. I cannot understand why the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and still more I cannot understand why the Minister of Agriculture who has been for many years a citizen of the province of Quebec, should take so much trouble to decry and besmirch the reputation of honourable citizens of that province. I have no doubt the day will come when the French of the province of Quebec will reckon with the Minister of Agriculture for the stand he has taken in this House, where they have no opportunity of defending their reputation. I regret that the Minister of Customs has found it necessary to leave the Chamber. He opened up this afternoon a fresh discussion on the question of the tariff, and I do think it is his duty to be here when a question of that important character is under discussion. Notwithstanding his absence, a good many of my remarks will have to be addressed to him, because I intend to give some attention to the question he has raised. He began by intimating that he as well as his colleagues in the ministry had been unfaithful to the promises they had made to the people. He did not attempt to deny that they had been unfaithful; but possibly he thought the better way to get out of the difficulty was to make the confession, and appeal for mercy to his supporters around him. He took another plan, however. After having acknowledged the unfaithfulness of himself and his colleagues with respect to the expenditure, having increased it far beyond the amount which they assured the people would be proper, he commenced to throw dust in the eyes of his supporters as if to blind them to the fact of such unfaithfulness. He brings out a perfect mass of figures, which I will undertake to say he had the clerks in his department engaged in preparing for the past three months. Every one of these figures was prepared at the expense of the people of Canada. I have no doubt that collection of figures cost the people of this country thousands of dollars, simply and solely for the purpose of enabling the Minister of Customs to make a defence in this House. Then he called upon the opposition to answer this terrible array of figures. Just imagine the Minister of Customs, with a staff of eight or ten clerks in his department, spending three months preparing figures to make an attack on the opposition in this House, and, then, at the close of the debate—because he refused to be heard until the last afternoon, when there was no opportunity of looking up these figures—he boldly calls upon us to answer them.

An hon. MEMBER. And then runs away.

Mr. HENDERSON. And then runs away, as an hon. gentleman says. Surely he is a brave man. I have no doubt the Boers in South Africa would like to meet such men; I do not think they would have much difficulty in establishing their position. Then he tells us that we do not dare to formulate a resolution and submit it to this House condemning the expenditure of which we complain. The hon. gentleman who has preceded me (Mr. Clancy) has dealt very fully with that question. He has shown us that the hon. gentleman himself, during a long period of eighteen years, never dared to open his mouth when in opposition, in condemnation of what he called the extravagance of the Conservative government. But the hon. gentleman is all wrong when he says that we dare not formulate a resolution. Has he forgotten that within twelve months a resolution exactly of the character to which he refers was moved in this House and voted upon? And now, to refresh the hon. gentleman's memory, I will read that resolution, which was moved on the 22nd of May, 1901:

> That this House desires to place on record its opinion that the expenditure for the year ending 30th June, 1901, and the proposed expenditure for the year ending 30th June, 1902, are excessive and extravagant, and it regrets that the government, with an exceptionally large revenue at its command, has not only failed to reduce but has largely increased the public debt, and has not shown proper appreciation of the extreme difficulty if not impossibility of reducing in future years the very high standard of expenditure which is being fixed during a period of great prosperity.

What stronger resolution than that, I ask, would the hon. gentleman expect us to move? And to a man we voted for that resolution. But where was the Minister of Customs? If he thought, as he intimated at the outset of his speech, that the expenditure had been excessive, why did he not join us? I look in the division list, and I find that all the thanks we got for introducing that resolution was that the hon. Minister of Customs assisted in voting it down.

The hon. gentleman referred to the question of superannuation, and I was very much surprised at a statement he made. I will not suppose that it was based on information which he himself obtained from the Blue-books. I am sure that was the work of one of the clerks in his department, because I am sure he would not have made the statement had he examined the record himself. He said that the superannuation was self-sustaining.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The Minister of Customs certainly did not say that. He said there had been a change made in the system, and that under the new system it would be self-sustaining.

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly caught his words, that it was self-sustaining. Now, in 1901 the collections on account of superannuation were $10,916 less than they were in 1896, whereas the payments were $13,276 more, so that, as I understood the hon. gentleman, he was wrong by exactly $24,192.

Then he took up the question of the reduction of postage. Now, I desire to say at the outset that I have no wish whatever to take away from the Postmaster General one iota of the credit that is due to him for anything he has done in connection with the administration of that department; but I want to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that before the present government came into power there have been Postmaster Generals who have to my mind done as great things for the country as the present Postmaster General. In 1868, the government of that day reduced the postage on domestic letters from 5 cents to 3 cents. The present Postmaster General reduced the letter postage 1 cent, and it was blazed all over the country as a wonderful thing, although it was only half of what was done in 1868. In 1871 another reform was introduced by the Conservative government of that day in the matter of post cards, which gave the people a cheaper system of communicating with each other. I consider that this was a very great reduction indeed, in the postage paid by the people generally, but that was not the only reduction. In 1889 the postage rate was practically cut in two in a great many instances. On a letter weighing two ounces the postage previous to 1889 was 12 cents, or three cents per half ounce, but after that year a letter weighing two ounces passed through the mails for six cents. In many cases the postage was actually split in two by the reduction of the charge from three cents per half ounce to three cents per whole ounce. This no doubt affected the revenue very materially, and was a great step towards cheaper postage, so that we find that previous to the advent of the present government our Postmaster Generals had done very great service to the country in that respect. We are told frequently by hon. gentlemen opposite that the postage rate has been reduced one-third. But they forget that a very large amount of postal revenue is derived from drop letters, which pay only one cent. These letters paid one cent before and are paying one cent still, and they furnish a very considerable amount of revenue. Then we have the letters in cities where there is a postal delivery. The old rate on these of two cents has not been changed, so that there has been no reduction whatever in the postal rates in the cities where there is a postal delivery. He charges also the same rate for registering a letter, namely, five cents, as before. Considering therefore the whole matter, the reduction in revenue by the change from three cents to two cents on ordinary domestic letters, does not amount to what the government claim credit for. I want to draw attention to another feature in this connection. It has been claimed, and claimed by no one more strongly than the First Minister, notably in his speech at the city of Toronto, that the government have wiped out the deficit or the difference between revenue and expenditure in the Post Office Department. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who do not ask the Postmaster General to make the revenue and expenditure meet. I do not think it fair to do so. Why should we take a department, such as the postal department, which comes the nearest to every man, woman and child in the country, in which every man, woman and child is more interested, I believe, than in any other department of the government, because that is the one which furnishes them with the means of communicating with each other—why should that department be starved simply to enable the government to declare that it is self-sustaining? The other departments are not self-sustaining. The Department of Public Works does not meet expenses, nor does the Department of Railways and Canals. What other expending department of the government is self-sustaining? And why should the postal system in which the people are more interested than in any other department of the government, be made self-sustaining at the expense of the service. I say that the government will act wisely if they will give us a better service, even if it should cost us more than the revenue it brings in. The government claim credit for having reduced the deficit. Last year that deficit stood at $512,023 and the previous year it was $553,241. Of course I include in this both the revenue and expenditure in the Yukon district. I find, on referring back to 1891, that there were 8,061 post offices then in Canada. In 1896 there were 9,103, or an increase in the five years of 1,042, making an average increase of 208 new post offices every year during the last five years of Conservative regime. Let us see how far this Liberal government have supplied the people with postal accommodation. We hear a great deal about the development in New Ontario and the immense areas of land that have been settled in the Northwest and the new territory that is being taken up. If all that be true, surely there ought to have been a greater demand for new post offices in the last five years than during the previous five years. But what do we find ? We find that in 1896 the number of post offices was 9,102, and in 1901 it had increased to 9,824, or an increase of only 731 in those five years, against an increase of 1,042 in the previous five years. In other words, while the increase in the last five years of Conservative rule was 208 on an average per year, the average yearly increase in the last five years of Liberal regime was only 146. These hon. gentlemen may have reduced the deficit, but if so they have done it by refusing to open new post offices where required in this new country, by applying the sweating system to the mail carriers throughout the country, by refusing to pay the mail carriers in the cities their honest due, and by starving the service in every way possible. The United States has never attempted to cover its postal expenditure by its revenue. In 1901 the post office expenditure of the United States was $115,554,920, and the revenue only $111,631,193, making a deficit of close on to $4,000,000. This, of course, is provided for out of the revenues of the country, and I have no doubt the people of the United States are provided with the very best postal service, much better than in this country, because there the government have introduced the rural delivery system—a system which will not be introduced in Canada for many years, if hon. gentlemen opposite are going to insist on their policy of wiping out the deficit before furnishing better accommodation.

The next point that came up in the hon. gentleman's speech was that of reduced taxation, on which he dwelt more perhaps than on any other question. He insisted that they had reduced the taxation, and of course claimed credit for it. I do not propose to enter into a lengthy argument, but let me say that I take very strong exception to that statement, and I have no hesitation, standing here in the presence of hon. gentlemen on this side and in the presence of a very small number of hon. gentlemen opposite, in declaring that the hon. gentleman has not reduced the rate of taxation. That statement, I believe, I can substantiate before I sit down. Notwithstanding the figures he has quoted, I claim that he has not reduced the average rate of taxation. What I maintain is that the average rate in the last five years of Conservative rule was lower than that during the five years of Liberal rule. Hon. gentlemen opposite seem to fail altogether to make any distinction between taxation and protection. They seem to treat these as precisely similar terms, but to my mind they are entirely distinct. We may have very high taxation and very low protection, and the trouble at present is that we have too much taxation and too little protection. What we require is just the reverse. We require to reduce the taxation and increase the protection, and when we get a policy of that kind we will get a policy that will develop this country.

We are told by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the figures we find in the public documents of this country are not to be relied upon. Consequently we must go to other sources for information. The Minister of Finance last year informed us also that the figures prepared by the Minister of Customs were not correct. I have the speech in my desk, and read it over a day or two ago to refresh my memory, and I find that he said the deductions put in the Blue-books from year to year were not, strictly speaking, fair or correct. I do not intend to be guided by those incorrect figures. I will not take exception to the trade returns as we get them in the Trade and Navigation statistics. I am compelled to admit that they are all right. But, when I come to deal with the summaries or deductions that the hon. gentleman makes in these figures, I must refuse to accept his calculations. I do not know whether they are made by himself or by the officers of his department. But, in any case, I assume that they are made under his direction, and, where they are in error, I hold the hon. minister responsible for those errors and not those who are employed under him. I need not dwell upon the export of corn from this country, for that was referred to this afternoon. We are familiar with the fact, that, under the old regime, when corn crossed through the country, entering at one side only to be sent out at the other, it was counted neither in the imports nor in the exports, but was merely treated as being in transit. To make a fair comparison with the years before the change in tariff, we must get down to the same basis. Therefore, I propose to deduct from the total imports for home consumption for the last five years the amount of foreign corn exported from this country, corn not the produce of this country and I am sure I shall be borne out by the Minister of Finance, who drew attention to the fact last year that this ought to be done : In 1897, the present government imposed a very large additional tax on tobacco, averaging upwards of $1,000,000 a year. That duty was imposed not as a customs duty, but as an excise duty. But, no matter whether excise or customs, it is taxation, and when we are dealing with the taxation of the country we must include that increased item.

So, each year as I read my statement I will include the increased duty paid on tobacco and cigars for that year.

I take first the year 1898—

Imports for home consumption	$130,698,006
Less corn exported	5,165,955
Net imports for home consumption	$125,532,051

During that year, the customs duties paid on goods dutiable coming into the country were $22,157,188; increased duty on tobacco and cigars, $971,558; total $23,128,746. This made an average duty on goods, dutiable and free for 1898 of 18·34 per cent, and not 16·95 per cent as given in the return of the Minister of Customs. I regret that I am obliged to read all these figures, but I desire to have them in 'Hansard' that they may be carefully examined. Now, take the year 1899 —

Imports for home consumption	$154,021,593
Less corn exported	6,332,682
Net imports for home consumption	$147,688,911
Customs duty paid	$25,734,728
Increased duty on tobacco	1,067,156
Total taxation	$26,801,884

This makes an average duty on goods dutiable and free for 1899 of 18·4 per cent instead of 16·7 per cent as given by the Minister of Customs. Now, here are the figures for 1900 —

Imports for home consumption	$180,834,016
Less corn exported	4,757,595
Net imports for home consumption	$176,076,421
Customs duty paid	$28,889,110
Increased duty on tobacco	971,977
Total taxation for the year	$29,861,087

This makes the average duty on goods dutiable and free 16·96 per cent, instead of 15·98 per cent, the figures given in the Trade and Navigation Returns. Now, we come to 1901, the last year for which we have the figures :

Imports for home consumption	$181,237,988
Less corn not the produce of Canada	5,506,542
Total net imports for consumption	$175,731,446
Customs duty paid	$29,106,779
Increased duty on tobacco and cigars.	1,206,817
Total	$30,313,796

Or an average duty on goods dutiable and free of 17·25 per cent, instead of 16·6 per cent, the figures given in the Trade and Navigation Returns. Now, I summarize these. I take the years 1892 to 1896 inclusive. These I take as they are given in the Trade and Navigation Returns, because by taking off the corn in transit and adding the increased duty on tobacco, I have brought the calculation to the same basis as in these years, and we are now in a position to make a fair comparison, which we could not do under the system adopted by the Minister of Customs. The following are the average rates of duty for the years 1892 to 1896 inclusive —

Average duty.	Per cent.
1893	17·38
1894	17·13
1895	16·99
1896	18·28
A total for the years given of	87·34
Divided by 5 years gives an average of	17·46

This is the average for the five years under the Conservative regime on goods dutiable and free. Now, take the five years commencing with 1897, the first year of Liberal rule. I find that, according to the Trade and Navigation returns the average was 17·87 per cent. Only for a very small portion of this year was the corn free, and for only a small portion of it was the new tobacco duty in force, and so trifling was it that I did not take it into consideration. In 1897 the average rate of duty was 17·87. In 1898 the average rate of duty was 18·34 ; in 1899, 18·14 ; in 1900, 16·96 ; in 1901, 17·25, or a total for the five years of 18·56, divided by 5, gives an average of 17·71. The average rate of duty paid on goods coming into this country, dutiable and free, during the past five years, was 17·71 ; and for the last five years of Conservative rule it was 17·46. I challenge the government by any conceivable plan to controvert this statement of the average rate of taxation ; and I trust when the hon. gentleman rises to speak in this House again he will not compare dissimiliar things in order to make a good showing for himself, but that he will be fair enough to give us the facts and make a comparison which is fair to all parties. If he does so I am sure he will admit that his rate of taxation is higher than was the rate under the Conservative government for the periods named.

We have been told and I think the Minister of Finance reminded us in his budget speech, that had the same rate of taxation been applied to the imports of this country in 1901 as was applied in 1896 we would have paid $4,000,000 more duty than we actually did in 1901. Now, I consider that that was a very unfair statement, because, strictly speaking, it was not absolutely correct. Of course the hon. gentleman was mislead by taking the figures of his colleague. However, he admitted that these figures were not correct, and he should have been more guarded before he made the statement. Now, what are the facts ? In 1898 we actually paid $1,104,572 more duties than we would have paid under the average rate of duty from 1892 to 1896 ; and in 1899 we paid $853,607 more duties than we would have paid under the average rate of the last five years of Conservative regime. In each year from 1897 to 1901 we paid an average of $390,866 more than we would have paid under the average of the last five years of Conservative rule.

Now, with reference to the additional $4,000,000 which the Minister of Finance tells us we would have paid had the Conservatives been in power, I want to draw his attention to this fact, that free sugar was the Conservative policy. In 1891 the Conservative party placed raw sugar on the free list and gave the people of this country a free breakfast table. Sir Leonard Tilley, nearly ten years before, had placed tea and coffee upon the free list. Then Mr. Foster, in 1891, put raw sugar on the free list, and gave back to the people of this country what he might have collected between 1891 and 1895, a sum equal to $20,000,000. Mr. Foster was aware of the fact that a wave, not of prosperity, but of adversity was passing over the country, and he did what a good statesman should do, he took off the burden of taxation, struck off $20,000,000, to enable us to tide over the difficulties of those days. Had he retained that $20,000,000 of taxation he would not have had the deficit that the hon. gentleman talked so much about this afternoon. In fact, had Mr. Foster not removed that, the hon. gentleman would have scarcely had a text from which to preach to-day. But Mr. Foster did it in the interest of the people of this country; and although in 1895 he was compelled, owing to the fact that he was unable to make the revenue and expenditure meet, to put back half a cent a pound on raw sugar, that was no evidence that Mr. Foster nor any other Conservative Minister of Finance intended that it should continue and with the return of better times and the improvement of business, there is no doubt in the world that in one or two years that half a cent would again have been removed, and that to-day we would be enjoying free raw sugar in this country instead of an increase of from 50 to 67 cents per 100 pounds. So that practically there would not have been a dollar of that $4,000,000, because with the duty taken off raw sugar amounting to $1,105,855, which was the tax in 1896, the average rate of taxation that year would not have been 18·28 but would simply have been 17·28, practically the same as we had during the past year of 17·25. Thus I say the whole burden of the song of the hon. gentleman about the favourable comparison between his own tariff and that of the Conservative party, when investigated, really amounts to little, and his argument fails altogether to support his contention.

Now, a very strange statement was made by the hon. gentleman to which I will refer just now. He stated that the public debt of this country had decreased during the five years of Liberal rule by 67 cents per head of the population. Well, I thought that was an astounding statement. It staggered me, I could not understand it. An increase in the public debt of $16,000,000, and an actual decrease per head of the population—it was inexplicable. Well, I made a little investigation during the recess between 6 and 8 o'clock, and to my surprise, after allowing the most liberal increase for population, since our last decennial census was taken, allowing 100,000 to be added to the population from 1901—and that would be at the rate of 1,000,000 during a decade, I think I was liberal enough in my allowance—even after making such an allowance I find there was no decrease whatever, for five years to 1902 that there was actually an increase. The hon. gentleman told us also that in 1896 the average rate of taxation was 18·28 for 1901, he quoted his erroneous figures of 16·06, making a difference of 2·22. This is a point which I wish to draw attention to. Why, he said, that was not simply a decrease of 2·22, it was a decrease of 12 per cent—a most astonishing statement for the hon. gentleman to make. Now, if he would simply decrease it about a third more than he has done, about ·71, he would bring the total decrease up to about 16 or 17 per cent, and we would have no taxation at all. That just shows how utterly absurd the hon. gentleman's statement is. Of course he means 12 per cent of the rate of duty, but he intends that statement to go to the country as a reduction of 12 per cent in the duty. That was his intention. He intended that statement to be read by the farmers of the country who, through his speech will be told that the duty is 12 per cent on an average lower than it was. I cannot say that he is honest. I do not like to use harsh terms, but that statement has been made by other hon. gentlemen in this House and it is a statement that should not have been made.

Then the hon. gentleman spoke very boldly about the preferential tariff and asked: Why do you not move to repeal it? If we had fifty of a majority on this side of the House, we would very soon repeal it. I would have no hesitation any day recording my vote in this House to wipe out the present preferential tariff. I never favoured it. I do not expect to live long enough to be able to favour a one-sided preference such as we have now. I am a Canadian, Canada first is my motto, and if there are preferences to be given I am going to give them to Canada. I do not intend now to discuss the effect of the preferential tariff. If I had anything to say now I would limit the importation of goods coming into this country under the preferential tariff to goods wholly made in Great Britain. And I would do more than that; I would limit the imports under the preferential duty to goods imported through a Canadian seaport. If we did that I believe we would maim and wound and hamper this preferential tariff so that it would not be so much of an injury after all, but, if we cannot get rid of it in that way, let the government bring down a resolution to remove that preferential tariff, and on that question I will assure them that they will have my hearty support.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). My hon. friend (Mr. Henderson) had better do it instead.

Mr. HENDERSON. We practically are doing it now.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No, you are not.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, the hon. Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) told us so.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well do it.

Mr. HENDERSON. He said that our resolution in favour of adequate protection and then a reciprocal trade preference within the Empire, but adequate protection first means practically the repeal of the one sided preferential tariff, and it is embodied in that. The hon. gentleman may not see it, but the day is coming when he will see it. I trust that the day will not be very far distant. I am prepared to vote for a bald motion to repeal it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Move the motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not speak for hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but I presume there is very little difference of opinion on the subject.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Make a motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. And in the country there is very little difference of opinion on that question. It is not a policy that has met with the approval of this country. Of course, the sentiment is very nice. It is a nice thing to do something for the mother country, but as we have heard an hon. gentleman say, a 12½ per cent preference would have accomplished all the sentiment that a 33⅓ preference would accomplish. I do not think that the people of Great Britain fully appreciate Canada's preference, and they did not appreciate us one whit more when we lowered the rates of duty. How many people in Great Britain know that there is a preferential tariff? Very few of them take more of our products because of that tariff. I will venture to say that out of the forty millions of people in Great Britain, not twenty millions know that there is a preferential tariff. I will undertake to say that there are millions of people in Great Britain who do not know but that Canada is part of the United States. It is absurd to say that they are buying our products because we give them a preference. What does the workingman's wife, when she goes to the butcher shop in the morning to buy her bacon, her hams, or her eggs know about the preferential tariff? She does not buy Canadian products at all. The products of Canada are not consumed by the working classes of England. Our hams, our bacon, our butter and our cheese are bought up at the highest prices by the wealthier classes in Great Britain. The working classes consume the products of the American farms, and the curse of the preferential tariff is that instead of providing a market for Canadian goods in this country, or in the old country, we are doing all we can to provide a market for the products of the American farmers, our competitors.

Just a few words as I pass along in reference to some remarks made by some hon. gentleman. I find that the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes), the other night made a very nice speech, and I must compliment him on it. It was the most erratic speech I have heard for some time. He said the national policy was rejected by the people in 1896 and again in 1900. We know perfectly well that the national policy did not decide the elections of 1896. I need not elaborate that for a moment. There is not a man in this House who will contend that the trade question of this country decided the fate of the government at that time, or in 1900 again as he contended. In the province of Quebec I think that the popular cry was 'Laurier,' 'Laurier,' where they did not stop to inquire what kind of a policy he favoured. It reminds me of a little story that I heard the other day. the right hon. leader of the House ran in the constituency of Richmond and Wolfe. It was just after he became a member of the administration of Alexander Mackenzie, away back in 1877 or 1878. It was reported through the constituency that he was a minister. The people voted against him. They did not believe in having a minister in parliament, and therefore they would vote against him. It is very peculiar sometimes what questions turn an election. In the province of Ontario I will undertake to say that the government did not gain anything from what they call their revenue tariff. Let me look around. I see the hon. member for South Waterloo (Mr. Clare). Did you ever hear of a protectionist being elected for South Waterloo before? No, but the people of that intelligent riding rejected the Liberal candidate who supported this revenue tariff. I look around and I see the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Tolton). Just fancy the redoubtable James McMullen having been laid aside after his advocacy of free trade principles for 18 long years and being succeeded by my hon. friend. Is there any evidence in that that the national policy was rejected by the people of Ontario? Then, I see the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. McGowan) leaving behind our old and esteemed friend Mr. Semple, an ardent supporter of anything in the nature of free trade or a revenue tariff. Then I notice my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) who defeated a man who had some four or five hundred of a majority, and came out with a very respectable majority, condemning the policy of the government in that respect. The election of my hon. friend from South Grey (Mr. Richardson), who is unfortunately absent to-night on account of sickness in his family, is another instance in which the policy of the government was condemned. Look at my hon. friend here from North Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Lavell), and look at my hon. friend sitting next to him from Cardwell (Mr. Johnston). They are all over. The woods are full of them, and when the government again comes to appeal to the province of Ontario let me tell them that a revenue tariff is not a policy on which they will appeal if they are going to succeed in the country. How is it that there are a hundred members on that side of the House who dare not rise and support the government, who are compelled to sit mum and not say a word on behalf of the government that they are going to vote for. How is that ? I will undertake to say that there are hon. gentlemen on that side of the House who dare not go into their ridings and tell the people that the government are justified in putting cream separators on the free list ; and yet these hon. gentlemen are going to vote against the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition, and they are going to go home and justify their vote by saying that it was a motion of want of confidence, while at the same time they are voting against their own conscience.

Here is a peculiar thing that I am going to read. Within the next two months the hon. G. W. Ross is going to appeal to the electors of Ontario. He is an astute politician, and he knows the sentiment of the people of his province perhaps as well as any member in this House. In the budget debate in the Ontario legislature on the 22nd January last, the hon. G. W. Ross uttered the words which I will read. He knew he was going before the electorate and he knew he had to be in sympathy with the electorate, or otherwise he would not secure their support, and he delivered his speech which was intended to secure the votes of the people of Ontario, and it was a speech in direct opposition to the sentiments expressed by the hon. gentlemen who support the government in this House. Mr. Ross opens out thus :

> It has been, within the last half century at all events, the policy of the governments of all countries to aid in the development of the natural resources of the countries which they respectively represent, to foster the industries which occupy the attention of their citizens, and generally to promote trade and commerce, and by that means add to the wealth and power of the nation.

How different Mr. Ross is from the hon. gentlemen opposite, who tell us we cannot protect the farmers of this country, and that the manufacturers of Canada have no right to government consideration. Mr. Ross knows the sentiment of the people ; he is looking for their votes, and he knows which side his bread is buttered on. He says further :

> The American government, sixty or seventy years ago entered upon a policy of fostering its industries by protection. Germany, France Italy, Russia and latterly the Australian Commonwealth, has followed in the foot-steps of the United States.

Again he says :

> Railways have been built by subvention in land and money, for the development of the latent resources of the country. The states of the Union, including the federal government, have given nearly one million acres of land for that purpose, as well as large cash subsidies. The Dominion government did so for the C.P.R., and no doubt that road would never have been built unless so aided. . . . . The object of my argument is to show that it seems to be admitted all around that a government in modern times has something more to do than merely discharge administrative functions. It has to be the pioneer, if possible, at all events the foster parent, of manufactures and commerce.

How well Mr. Ross can gauge the sentiment of the people of Ontario. He further said :

> It would be an easy thing for a government to say: 'Give us so much money and we will administer the affairs of the country, see that officers are appointed for the various duties, see that checks are issued for salaries'—that would be an easy duty. It is another matter for a government to assume the responsibility of leading the nation, or leading and educating the people to apply their minds to the development of industry, and to the fostering of manufactures or to the development of latent resources, or to any other purpose which may be of more immediate advantage to one or more sections of the country than to the whole country.

Again Mr. Ross says :

> I am proud to be able to say that in the province of Ontario, as well as at Ottawa—we have addressed ourselves to the solution, or rather to the discharge, of that duty. In fact, I do not know but the Dominion government, the Conservative government at Ottawa years ago, realized more quickly than perhaps some of us did—(Opposition members—Hear, hear)—what seemed to be the direction—of universal opinion, I was going to say—or rather the direction of all civilized governments at that time, and, realizing that view, they struck out a course which in many respects has been followed since, and has been accepted by some other countries since that time.

I turn to another page and I will read a few words more.

Mr. POPE. Go on ; it is good.

Mr. HENDERSON. And I suppose the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) will be supporting Mr. Ross very shortly.

Mr. EDWARDS. What about the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson). Is he going to support Mr. Ross ?

Mr. HENDERSON. No.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Ross is a dead horse.

Mr. HENDERSON. We have a better policy than even Mr. Ross has. What Mr. Ross says further is very delightful reading, and I am sure that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) will endorse it. This is what he says :

No nation that does not aim in certain matters as being self sustaining can be great. No man that does not endeavour to feel that spirit of self-reliance which will enable him to go out and compete with his fellows will ever attain to anything. The Americans have become strong largely by that dominant strain which has permeated American legislation and commerce for the last thirty years, and they have become self-sustaining to a great extent; and the British navy has been dominated by the idea since Nelson's time that the British navy is invincible.

I ask the attention of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) and the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) and a number of these hon. gentlemen opposite who are going to vote against our resolution, I ask their attention to this language which was used by the hon. G. W. Ross :

And so will we Canadians, by being inbued with the same spirit of manufacturing our own goods as far as we can, developing our own resources where we have the means, so will we become self-sustaining, applying ourselves with energy and tact to whatever comes to hand.

Well, Sir, if the Conservative party comes into power I would not at all object to giving the hon. G. W. Ross a seat amongst us in this House if he still retains sentiments of that kind, as I have no doubt he will. These are the sentiments of the Prime Minister of Ontario, and he is now wooing the electors, and he believes in making a people self reliant by aiding them and fostering the industries of the country. He speaks in that way because he is speaking the sentiments of the people of Ontario.

Now, Sir, I come to deal with the amendment offered by the hon. leader of the opposition—this doubtful resolution as gentlemen opposite say. I come to deal with this resolution which we are told no member on that side of the House can understand. I am surprised at that. To my mind it is a piece of very plain Queen's English, and I do not understand why it is so unintelligible to them. I wonder if they understand what a revenue tariff means ? I know that the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Holmes) was perfectly at a loss the other night to understand the difference between a revenue tariff and a protectionist tariff. He thought it was somewhere between 25 and 30 per cent. I may be very ignorant of things of that sort, but I thought a revenue tariff was one imposed on articles which we do not produce in the country. If you put a tax on tea or coffee, that is a tariff for revenue only, because we do not produce tea or coffee in this country. If you put a tax on raw sugar, that is a tariff for revenue only, because we do not produce raw sugar in this country. If you put a tax on apricots, prunes, and other dried fruits which we get from California—and I think every dollar of duty should be taken off these things—that would be a tariff for revenue, because it does not interfere with any industry in this country. Take the duty off tea, or coffee, or sugar, and you will not hurt the woollen industry of this country or any other industry. On the contrary, you will help it, because you will enable the workingman to get his tea and coffee and sugar cheaper. The fact is these hon. gentlemen have not got a revenue tariff at all, although they call it by that name. Whether it is adequate or not they do not know, because they do not seem to know the meaning of adequate. The Minister of Finance finds that it is not adequate, because he has to add six millions more to the debt of the country. I do not suppose it is my duty to schoolmaster hon. gentlemen as to the meaning of the word adequate. If it were, I would tell them it is exactly the opposite of inadequate. We know when an industry is not adequately protected. I think I have something here which will give an idea of what adequate protection is. The Canadian Textile Directory states that in 1885 there were 107,879 spindles running in the woollen industry of this country; that is, the industry that is making cloth; I have no reference to looms or cards. Under the benign influence of adequate protection, the number of spindles had increased in 1899 to 194,086, nearly double. Now I think hon. gentlemen will see what adequate protection means. It means that there are more goods made in the country, more work for the workingmen, a better market for beef, mutton, cheese, butter, eggs and all other products, which are consumed in the country. Now go back two years and a half to the time the preferential tariff took effect on the woollen industry, because it was only then that serious injury began to be felt. Since that time we find that there were new mills or additions to old ones to the extent of 3,960 spindles, but during that same time there were closed out 10,705 spindles, a total loss of 6,745 spindles. Here is an evidence of what inadequate protection produces. I will trouble the House to read an extract from this very valuable journal. After quoting the figures which I have given, it says this :

While in previous periods there has been an increase in the manufacturing capacity of Canadian mills, there has been a new loss since June, 1899 (when the preferential tariff had got into full swing), 6,745 spindles. These figures do not include the mills which are at present idle, but is simply a record of mills that are out of business entirely, either by insolvency, abandonment by the proprietors, or destruction by fire. It is worthy of passing note that of the half dozen or more mills that have been burned down in the past year or so, not one has been rebuilt. Moreover, the insurance companies have in a number of cases cancelled their policies on woollen mills, and it is difficult to effect new insurance on any terms on small mills. These facts of themselves should be sufficient to convince the government that they have brought disaster on an industry that was once one of the most substantial and prosperous in the country, and which, notwithstanding the periods of depression, showed a steady growth up to the date of the preferential tariff.

And yet we find a minister of the Crown in a western part of this Dominion telling the people of the country—and we find it reiterated in this House, I believe in one instance by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes), that if the woollen industry cannot exist on 23 per cent, it should go under. That is the manner in which they treat men who invested their capital in good faith under a policy which gave assurance that the principle of protection to the industries of this country would be continued. In a banquet speech delivered in Montreal last autumn, the Minister of Finance gave the strongest reason I have ever read why the woollen industry cannot be successfully carried on in this country. He struck the key-note, although I am sorry he is legislating contrary to his convictions to-day. At the banquet in Montreal he said that he deplored the lack of Canadian sentiment. The people of this country, he said, would go a thousand miles to buy goods instead of buying them at home, and it was that lack of Canadian sentiment that prevented people carrying on business in this country. Why, what is the hon. gentleman doing himself? He is actually putting on the statute-books in this country an Act of parliament to legislate away and destroy Canadian sentiment—an Act telling the people of this country that if they buy their goods in Germany, in England, in France, in Austria, he will give them a reduction of 33⅓ per cent off the duty. He is legislating to destroy, instead of encouraging the sentiment which he so much deplored the absence of when talking to the manufacturers in Montreal. Business men all over the country know that the Minister of Finance was correct in that statement. I will undertake to say that fifty Canadian ladies out of every hundred will prefer to buy American-made gloves to Canadian gloves just because they are American, though they may not be so good an article. The same thing applies to shoes. Our people do lack Canadian sentiment, and it is the duty of the government to encourage Canadian sentiment. When the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York, now the Prince and Princess of Wales visited this country, you know how thousands and tens of thousands of young voices cheered them and showed an exuberance of loyalty. We were glad to see that display of loyalty, because on that sentiment depends the lives and liberties of the people of this country. We believe that the Duke and Duchess will some day be our King and Queen, and we rejoice that that sentiment is so strong, but what we want is a commercial sentiment in keeping with the loyal sentiment—not a sentiment that will educate our people to go to the old country for our goods. It is quite sufficient for us that we should take our King and Queen and our Governor General from the old country, but we do not want to purchase there everything we require. What we should cultivate in Canada is a commercial sentiment, and I hope that the time is not far distant when the legislation of this country will shape in that direction, and when the Minister of Finance will correct the very thing which he deplored when speaking to the manufacturers at the banquet in Montreal.

I think I have explained pretty fully the meaning of adequate protection. I think that hon. gentlemen opposite understand it. Speaking of taxation, I find that in 1901 we collected in customs duties $28,425,284, and in excise $10,318,266, or a total of $38,743,550. In 1896, on the other hand, we collected a total taxation of $27,759,285, or the taxation in 1901 was increased by $10,984,265. But hon. gentlemen opposite may say that that is increased protection. I say it is nothing of the kind. High taxation does not mean high protection. The fact is that we have too much taxation and too little protection, and that requires to be remedied. We want more protection and less taxation. We do not want to bleed the people white by taxation, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce used to say in days gone by, but there is no danger in doing that if taxation be put on for the purposes of protection. And I reiterate again that the mistake of our tariff is that it has too much taxation and too little protection.

It was said, in the early days of the present tariff, that the Liberals had stolen our clothes. I never said so, but of course when the preferential duty was only 12½ par cent and when on coloured cotton goods and many other goods the duties were practically the same as under the Conservative regime, there was some reason for perhaps coming to the conclusion, without due consideration, that the Liberals had stolen our clothes. But I do not consider that they have done anything of the kind. I am only sorry that they did not, for it would have been better for the country if they had. Their tariff is instead just the antipodes of ours. Ours gave protection with as little taxation as possible, and theirs takes more taxation from the people and gives as little protection as possible. The government could remove raw sugar to the free list and thus reduce taxation by $2,000,000, nearly as much as the reduction by the preferential tariff on goods from Great Britain, which only amounts to about two millions and a half, and as my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has well said, the money does not go into the pockets of the consumers. I question if one dollar of it finds its way into his pocket. I believe it all goes into the pockets of the manufacturers of the old country and the importers in this country. When you get it down to the consumer, it is so infinitesimally small that you cannot divide it. What would signify the reduction on a yard of cotton, retailing at five cents, even though there was one-eighth of a cent taken off the duty. The dealer gets it every time. An hon. gentleman opposite—I think the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) was boasting about the great reduction on locks from the duty on which two and a half per cent was taken. Well, that article costs about six to ten cents, and I wonder whether he or his customer gets the benefit of the reduction. I am one of those who believe that adequate protection does not increase the prices of goods. We never had cheaper cotton goods or woollen goods in this country than when the national policy was in full swing, and I am prepared to return to that policy in its entirety. I am satisfied that under it people would get a better and cheaper class of goods than they do to-day. We may possibly be getting a class of woollen goods at lower prices, but they are not the quality that we got years ago, and for quality and price combined they are not at all equal to what we got under the Conservative regime. If we only could buy our goods in the United States free of duty, these hon. gentlemen say, how much cheaper would we get them. They want to buy agricultural implements in the United States, which is one of the highest protected countries in the world. But why not protect our own country and then get cheaper goods here ? Why do we go to the United States to buy $62,000,000 of dutiable goods ? Evidently because we get them cheaper. But why not imitate their policy, and by protecting our own manufactures be in a position to get the goods cheaper at home and not have any freight to pay, and besides furnish a home market for the products of the farm. Every farmer would be delighted to have the better market which would be furnished him at home if these $62,000,000 worth of goods were manufactured in this country. The hon. Minister of Customs tried to persuade us this afternoon that the Americans, who sold goods in Canada, simply sold them at so much less because of the preferential tariff. If the hon. gentleman will take the matter into his consideration, I think he will find the reverse to be the case. Take an article, which we may buy indifferently in the United States or Great Britain or France or Germany or Belgium. Last year I illustrated my argument by a spool of thread to show how much the people were robbed by this preferential tariff. I showed how they had to pay $1,000,000 more for spool thread in consequence of this preference. I may take that simple article because small things often serve better the purposes of illustration than large ones. A spool of thread of 200 yards, six cord, is identically the same whether made in the United States, Great Britain, France or Belgium. If I can buy that article in the United States and lay it down in Canada after paying 25 per cent duty, just as cheaply as I can by purchasing it in Great Britain and paying 17 per cent duty and freight, of what advantage is the preferential tariff to me ? If I cannot do better in Great Britain, of what advantage is this preference ? As a matter of fact, I cannot. We buy just as cheaply in countries which pay a duty of 25 per cent as in Great Britain which pays only 17 per cent, and that fact is evidence to me that Great Britain does not sell that class of goods any cheaper than the United States. The fact is the British manufacturer will not sell the thread cheaper. Of course, it costs about 8 per cent more to get it into Canada from the United States than from Great Britain. The British manufacturer knows that, so he simply adds 8 per cent to his price and makes us pay 8 per cent more than we would pay in the United States. The statement is as absolutely correct as that of the Minister of Customs. In England there is a combine that keeps up the price of that article so that you cannot get it at its actual value. This proves the case conclusively that you can buy the article cheaper in a country where there is not a preferential tariff, in the big protection countries such as the United States, France and Germany. We buy $112,000 worth of thread from the United States and pay 25 per cent duty, and we buy $131,000 worth from Great Britain and get it in under a 17 per cent duty. This is conclusive proof that the British manufacturer adds the 8 per cent to the price of his goods and makes that much more money out of the Canadians.

I have already referred to the question of the woollen goods, I stand by what I said. My experience is that these goods were cheaper under the national policy and better also than they are at the present time. Now, we have been told over and over again that the agriculture interests of this country cannot be protected. I am one of those who believe that the agriculture interest is well protected. Do we not spend hundreds of thousands of dollars yearly in the experimental farms for the benefit of agriculture ? And the provincial government is doing the same thing. All over the country we have these experimental farms. Then, look at what we are spending for cold storage. Cold storage is not necessary for the shipment of manufactured goods but for the benefit of the farmer. We are practically giving a bonus to the farmers in that class of expenditure. And by protecting other industries, I say, we are protecting agriculturists. Take the woollen industry. What is the woollen industry but a by-product of agriculture? And it is out of the by-products that the money is made very often. For instance, everything from axle grease to chewing gum is made out of petroleum. The profit is not made so much out of the coal oil as it is out of the by-products. Unless you can gather up and dispose of the by-products your main article of the manufacture may result in a loss. We have been told that the woollen industry should go down if it cannot live under a duty of 23 per cent. When the hon. minister says that I wonder if he thinks that the Intercolonial Railway which in the last five years has cost us $13,000,000 more than we have received from it, should be closed up. I wonder if the hon. gentleman does not consider that the government of this country should resign because they cannot run the country without a loss of $6,000,000. The woollen industry buys the wool from agriculturists and this class are benefited to the extent that it makes a market for their wool. We know it to be a fact that, since the time the preferential tariff came into full effect, the price of wool in this country has gone down. The farmer does not realize the profit that he did formerly, and there is no hope that under this government the industry is to be put on a sound footing. I regret to see, I think it was in an evening paper, an item which would indicate that the cotton industry cannot be successfully carried on in Canada against the competition that is brought to bear upon it, as was so fully explained a short time ago by my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock). I notice that at the annual meeting of the Dominion Cotton Mills Company, only yesterday, it was announced that no less than $312,000 was their loss on last year's business. How long is the Dominion Cotton Company going to stand that? But all the sympathy they get from hon. gentlemen opposite is: If you cannot work under the present tariff, you may go under. These hon. gentlemen kill the industry by slow degrees. Now, not only does the woollen industry buy the wool from the farmers, but the people engaged in that industry afford a market for perishable products of the farm, products that cannot be sent abroad to a market. So these industries, like the woollen, cotton and other industries are the by-products of the agriculture industry. And just as these by-products thrive so will thrive the great industry of agriculture. Until these various industries are in a healthy and prosperous state, the agriculturists need never expect to acquire great wealth. I read in a newspaper a few days ago, apropos of this point, that a gentleman in Toronto, a dealer in hogs—and that is a very important industry in this country—was asked how it was that hogs were higher in Buffalo than in Toronto. The answer to that was very simple; it was that, in the United States, they consumed 80 per cent of their hog products and exported 20 per cent, but we in Canada consume 20 per cent and export 80 per cent. This shows the importance of having such industries as the woollen industry and the cotton industry to give employment to working people and to create a market in this country for as much of the products of our farms as possible. It is estimated—and I presume it is a fair estimate—that the entire products of the farmers of this country in one year would be worth about $400,000,000. We export about $80,000,000 of that, or about 20 per cent, and we consume about 80 per cent. What a grand thing it would be for this country if we could find a home market for a much larger percentage. We should not then be troubled so much about the transportation problem, the providing of facilities for taking goods out of the country. What we want is to get people into the country and to get live industries here, as was suggested by the Hon. G. W. Ross, who says that this is necessary in order to make Canada self-reliant. When we can do that, then the value of what is consumed at home will be increased and the country will be benefited. They tell us that under protection there are combines. But combines exist in Great Britain under free trade. So much has been said on the subject of coal oil that I almost fear to touch it. But one thing I do know is that, under the tariff in force prior to 1897, we had cheaper coal oil than we have had since, and cheaper, I believe, than we shall have until the policy of the government is changed. I do not believe that, under our style of government, variable and very liable to be turned out at any time, you can get men in Canada who will invest their money in enterprises to bring about the same competition that we had before and keep the prices down. Coal oil is now at a wholesale price, at any rate in all points of western Ontario, 3 cents a gallon higher than it was five years ago; and as I said before, I do not believe that we will ever get back to the old price. So much for this tariff of high taxation and low protection.

Now, I referred a short time ago to what the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) said about the national policy being rejected. He gave two or three instances, and I want to refer to them before I go any further. He not only said that the national policy had been rejected in 1896, but that it had been condemned recently in several instances, and one instance he referred to was Beauharnois. I thought that he had a great deal to be proud of when the majority was reduced by one-half in a by election. I thought that was a condemnation of the government policy and an approval of adequate protection. Then he referred to some other cases. He did not refer to Laval, represented by my hon. friend here (Mr. Leonard). He did not say a word about that county, where a majority in favour of the government of between 300 and 400 was converted into a minority. He never mentioned St. James division, Montreal, where a majority of 1,600 odd was reduced by 1,000 ; and if there had not more ballots come out of the box than went in, it might have been wiped out altogether. He did not say a word about Lisgar, yes the riding of Lisgar, where the Minister of the Interior fought until he almost bled, and had to go to a watering place to resuscitate his shattered nerves after the shock he received up there, after suffering a defeat of 400—because the government candidate polled 400 less votes than were polled against him, an utter condemnation, even in free trade Manitoba, of this principle of inadequate protection.

Mr. McCREARY. What about the Conservative candidate in that county ?

Mr. HENDERSON. There were two sets of candidates, one was for the government and the other was against it, and the gentleman who was running in the interest of the government polled fewer votes than the other two who opposed the Government. Therefore, the government were defeated, and the Minister of the Interior got ill from it, and had to go down to the southern states in order to recuperate.

An hon. MEMBER. What about West York ?

Mr. HENDERSON. Why, the government candidate became a protectionist, and he cannot open his mouth in this House to-day.

Mr. McCREARY. The hon. gentleman has misrepresented the case in Lisgar. The Conservative candidate, the only one of the three who advocated a raise in the tariff, lost his deposit.

Mr. HENDERSON. All right. But the facts are plain that there was a government candidate there supported by the Minister of the Interior with all the machine force, no doubt, which he could bring into play. I am not finding any fault with him, he wanted to support his government. There were two other men running, they were both opposed to the government and the two polled more votes than the government candidate polled, a clear condemnation of the government from a free trade constituency.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize, perhaps, that I am unfair to the House in continuing my remarks at this late hour, but I am waiting for the Minister of Customs to return, and if he stays out until three o'clock I am not sure but I will talk him into the House. I sat here, Mr. Speaker, and listened to the Minister of Customs and heard every word he had to say, and I think it is only fair that he should give us five minutes, at any rate, of his very kind attention.

Now a word about the Minister of Finance and his budget speech. We must refer a little to that, it would not be courteous if we closed this debate without complimenting the hon. gentleman on his very excellent speech. Of course, just as we expected, the old story of Canada's prosperity formed the first chapter ; and in the next budget speech I hope the same old story will be repeated when the hon. gentleman rises to address the House. Every one of us on this side of the House re-echo our great pleasure at the fact that there is a very considerable degree of prosperity in this country. I think the minister perhaps was a little more modest this year in claiming that he was responsible for that prosperity. I think he allowed Providence a little higher percentage this year than he formerly allowed. Last year the hon. gentleman seemed to be getting somewhat pessimistic. Two years ago he warned us that the pendulum that swings one way to-day is going to swing another way to-morrow, and he had some vision of a near future when the pendulum was going to swing back. I am glad that it has not swung back yet, I am glad he is not as good a prophet as we took him to be. But last year he had another vision. He thought we were on the crest of the wave, and he seemed to think we had gone just as far as we could go for two or three years, and he said in all probability Canada will take a rest. He did not think she would slip back, but he thought there would be a rest. Now, I can quite understand why the hon. gentleman was so nervous about Canada's position ; I can quite understand why he thought we were arriving at a period of rest when there would be no further improvement. The hon. gentleman was aware of the fact that new life and energy had been infused into this new Dominion of ours by reason of the national policy, and that under a system of higher taxation with less protection that energy was becoming exhausted. Realizing that fact, the hon. gentleman began to think that possibly there would be a reverse. Of course I give the hon. gentleman credit for having something to do with the prosperity of this country. I believe he has had something to do with it, at any rate the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has, perhaps even more than the Minister of Finance. We know that you cannot expend $20,000,000 of money in the Dominion of Canada on public works, even if many of them are useless, without benefiting the people among whom it is expended. If you throw that money broadcast throughout the country it is going to help trade, there is no question about it. So to that extent I believe the hon. gentleman did help to bring about prosperity in this country. I remember well the time the Grand Trunk Railway was built, about the year 1856, through the county that I live in. Large sums of money were expended, and though there was a cry of hard times, the people in that riding were enabled to tide over those hard times. Tens of millions of pounds sterling were spent in Canada, and it was the salvation of the country at that time. But what I complain of is this; Although admitting that the expenditure of large sums of money will benefit us, the present is the wrong time to spend it. The time for a large expenditure, in my opinion, is not in years of prosperity, but in years of adversity. Now is the time that we should be reducing our public debt. Instead of adding $6,000,000 of money to the debt, we should be taking off $5,000,000 or $6,000,000. If we have a surplus we ought to apply that to a reduction of the national debt and preserve our great resources, our great wealth, our borrowing powers for the time when the lean years come, when the pendulum swings back and when we need help to tide over these years. Then Canada would never need to take a rest but would go on and on for ever.

Since the advent to power of hon. gentlemen opposite we have disbursed $250,550,000, an enormous amount of money to expend even in this big country. We have only collected $228,677,000 so that we have actually disbursed $21,873,000 more in five years than all our revenues amounted to. Of course, I desire to be fair to the hon. Minister of Finance. A portion of that is applied to the reduction of our debt by means of what is called the sinking fund. Here, I am going to take issue with the hon. Minister of Finance. I do not think that the sinking fund is treated in a fair way. Each and every year the sinking fund is charged to the consolidated fund account and then immediately on the other side it is deducted from the account and applied in reduction of the present year's indebtedness. What is the meaning of a sinking fund? Every hon. member has been connected with municipal institutions. You borrow money for a period of twenty, thirty, or forty years and you issue bonds or debentures. You lay past a certain sum of money each year to meet this indebtedness as it falls due. What would you think of a municipal officer, who, instead of saving the sinking fund to meet these debentures twenty years hence, simply applied it to the present year's purposes. If he did so in the province of Ontario he would be put in jail because there is a penalty provided for that sort of thing. He is compelled to invest it for the purpose for which it is designed. But here you do it in another way with the result that the country does not realize the actual fact that our deficit each year is much larger than it really appears. Next year it appears only as six millions, $6,000,000, but if you take into account the sinking fund it will actually be about $8,500,000. The hon. Minister of Finance brings it down to $6,000,000 by deducting the present year what should be deducted in years to come. The United States have adopted the principle I suggest. Of course, during the first three of the last five years they had a great war on hand and they were compelled to use all their revenues for the purpose of paying their war expenses, but during these few years, these years of prosperity they have been putting past money to pay off the national debt. They have set aside in two years $157,000,000. They have not spent all their revenues. They are making provisions for days of adversity in times of prosperity. They are preparing for adversity and when the pendulum swings back they will be able to utilize this $157,000,000 for general purposes to help the country, to reduce taxation and in some other ways to assist the people to tide over their difficulties and thus we will expect that in the United States, with such foresight, good times will continue while we in this country must suffer for our improvidence in making no provision in the fat years for the lean years that are sure to follow.

I desire to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to the manner in which the Public Accounts of the Dominion are kept. I believe the time has come and I know it is the feeling in the country that the people ought to know where we stand in regard to finances. As a matter of fact the people do not know. Last year fifty or seventy-five per cent of the people were under the impression that we had a surplus of $5,648,333. That is what goes forth to the country and our local newspapers will publish the statement that the surplus is so much. They forget to tell the people in many instances, or to make it plain, that this is simply the difference between the two sides of the consolidated account, whereas there is a large sum charged to capital account. Last year the total disbursements were $57,982,866, and our total receipts $52,514,701, showing a deficit of $5,466,533. Now, that is a statement that ought to go to the people and if the hon. gentleman persists in keeping books by double entry I say that he ought in fairness to the people, in large type, over and above the whole thing, print one statement that will show them exactly how the finances stand. At the expiration of the present year, ending June, 1902, we are told that the revenue will be $56,800,000 and that the expenditure on consolidated fund account will be $51,000,000, leaving a surplus of $5,800,000. To the ordinary reader that is very satisfactory. It looks nice. But, we have a capital expenditure of $14,250,000 which, added to $51,000,000 of expenditure on consolidated fund account makes a total expenditure of $65,250,000. As the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) says it is the vastest expenditure that has been. Then the hon. Minister of Finance tells us that this government has increased the national debt simply by $6,000,000 instead of $8,450,000 which is actually the case as his result of manipulating—I do not use the word in any offensive sense—the sinking fund of this country. Now, just one word in answer to the statements made by a great many hon. gentlemen who claim credit for the government of this country for having done a great deal to bring about the present era of prosperity. No hon. gentleman seemed to argue that the imports of the country have very much to do with the prosperity, but they talked largely about the exports and to my mind the exports are a very good test of the country's prosperity—that is what we export out of the country and realize money for. But all exports are not evidence that the country is becoming wealthier. We can extract gold from the mine or coal from the mine, which is so much national capital taken out. I do not know that the government have in any way helped to increase that export. The total exports of Canada for last year were $196,487,632, of which there were foreign products and coin and bullion to the amount of $19,056,246, leaving the net exports of home products for 1901 at $177,431,386. In 1897, the first year in which the Liberals were really in power, the first year when they controlled the affairs of this country, the net exports of the country were $123,632,540, showing that there was an increase in the preferential tariff period of exports of $53,798,846, a very creditable increase.

But how much of that was the government responsible for? How much did they influence? The increase of the products of the mines from 1897 to 1901 was $29,068,763. I don't think the government caused one dollar's worth more to be dug out of the ground than would have been if the Conservative party were in power. The increase of agricultural products from 1897 to 1901 was $6,798,846. I am not aware that the government claim any credit for the increase. They had a crop of 60,000,000 bushels of wheat in the North-west this year, against possibly 30,000,000 last year. Surely the government would not claim credit for the difference. They have no right to claim any credit for any increase in the export of purely agricultural products. It is a fact that in 1898 we shipped 10,000,000 bushels of wheat to the old country more than we did in 1901. The government did not control that. In 1897 we exported 1,000,000 barrels of apples more than we did in 1901, simply because we had 1,000,000 barrels of apples more to export. As far back as 1893, even before the cold storage system of the Minister of Agriculture, we shipped out of this country $1,000,000 worth more of all kinds of fruit than we did last year. Nobody holds the government responsible for that. I say that the government has no right to claim any credit for these increased exports. We find that when we deduct minerals and agricultural products which together gave an increase of $35,867,614, the balance of the increase is $17,821,232. What is that amount made up of? It is made up of the increase of the products of the fisheries, of the forests, of animals and their products and of manufactures. I go back to 1893 and 1897; I take the previous four years to see how it compares. You will be surprised to find that in the last four years of the old regime the increase in exports in articles that the government might control was actually about as large as the increase during the past four years, the difference being only $2,014,232. Of that $2,000,000 of increase during the last four years, I wonder how much the government was responsible for? What have they done to increase these exports? One very large item of that increase is $1,742,946 for agricultural implements exported last year. They tell us: See what we have done for agricultural implements; why, we have reduced the duty on iron and we have reduced the duty on steel and we are helping the manufacturers so that they can make implements to send to foreign countries. Well, the old government gave as large protection as the present government to the manufacturers of agricultural implements. Under the old government the rule existed with regard to rebates on exported articles, so that the present government has done nothing more to encourage the export of agricultural implements, or carriages or hardware or machinery of any kind, than the old government did. The whole thing is worked on the same principle as formerly, and therefore this government is not entitled to any credit for that.

I desire to close my remarks, Sir, by drawing attention to one other matter, and I am sorry the Minister of Customs has not put in an appearance, because the condition of affairs I desire to draw attention to is one of the most deplorable that exists in the country. I say that the farmers of this country; the great producing classes of this country are unfairly treated in this preferential tariff. We on this side say that it is an unsatisfactory tariff and our resolution is put in that way. It is unsatisfactory because it imposes too much taxation and gives too little protection. It is unsatisfactory because it gives us no new markets and has closed up the second best market that this country had for the products of Canada. We are voting conscientiously when we say that that Liberal government tariff is an unsatisfactory tariff, and I cannot for the life of me see how the Minister of Public Works is going to come here tonight to vote against that resolution after the declaration which he made in Montreal when he said he was born a protectionist and had no reason to change his faith, and that he could not for the life of him see why we could not be protected in this country just as well as the people of the United States. But what I desire to refer to more particularly is the preferential tariff as it has affected our market in Germany. I am not going to discuss the question as to whether German discrimination against Canada has been brought about by reason of this preferential tariff or not. I think that is admitted on all hands. If there had been no denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties there would be no discrimination against Canada by Germany. That is admitted and I leave it at that. What is the position we now find ourselves in. Against Canada in Germany they put up 43 cents per hundred pounds of a discriminating duty against our butter. That is a considerable discrimination against us. On beans they have a discrimination of 3¼ cents; on oats a discrimination of 4⅓ cents; on peas a discrimination of 3¼ cents. That is the difference between the conventional tariff and the general tariff. Of course we have been giving offence to Germany by the denunciation of the German treaty and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when in Toronto a year or so ago, was very careful to tell the people there that he was instrumental in having the treaties denounced. Therefore the government must take the full responsibility for this discrimination against Canada. On rye, there is discrimination of 9 1-12 cents against Canada, and on wheat a discrimination of 9½ cents against Canada. I read an extract from a Berlin paper on March the 19th, the very day after the budget speech of the Finance Minister the 'Berliner' declared :

> Canada is, economically speaking, a completely autonomous state and therefore she cannot establish differential duties in favour of England without exposing herself to retaliatory measures.

That is what a leading Berlin paper wrote the day after the budget speech was delivered in Canada. They say that Canada being responsible for her own tariff, she must take the consequences if she persists in doing what she has done.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Henderson) to condemn the denunciation of the Belgian and German treaties ?

Mr. HENDERSON. I condemn it if it is for the purpose of securing a one-sided preferential tariff.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is aware that both political parties for years desired the abrogation of these treaties?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not for the purpose of obtaining a one-sided preference.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. No matter what the purpose is.

Mr. HENDERSON. The purpose is everything. That was only one part of the policy of the Conservative party, but no such wild policy would have ever been adopted by the Conservative party as a policy calculated to destroy Canadian industries and Canadian agriculture.

Now, I want to show how we are handicapped in that country by this policy. I picked up the 'Globe' newspaper of the 14th of March, containing the market reports of the 13th of March ; and I find that on that day red wheat No. 2 was selling at Buffalo at 88 cents, whereas at Toronto the highest price quoted for it was 78 cents, or just 10 cents less than the price at Buffalo. The Buffalo man could send his wheat to Germany and realize on it 10 cents a bushel more than the Toronto man. Consequently the farmer who drove his wheat to the Buffalo market got 10 cents a bushel more for it than the farmer who took his wheat to the Toronto market. At Liverpool on the same day red wheat sold at 87⅜ cents. It used to be said that Liverpool ruled the market, but under the preferential tariff Buffalo fixes the price of wheat. Germany last year took from the United States more wheat than the entire export from the Dominion of Canada to Great Britain, and this is the market that is closed against us, while German goods are allowed to come into Canada under the preference at a reduction of 33⅓ per cent. The same thing could be said about rye. On the 13th of March rye sold at Buffalo at 65½ cents and at Toronto at 58 cents. In 1901 Canada exported to Britain 9,739,759 bushels of wheat, to Germany we sent only 28,369 bushels. This may have been inferior wheat. We know that we have damaged grain, we can find a market for it in Germany when the millers in England and Scotland will not buy it ; but even for damaged grain we are practically excluded from that market. In the same year the United States sent to Germany 10,267,622 bushels of wheat, or more than all the wheat we exported from the Dominion of Canada. I listened to hon. members from Manitoba and the North-west talking about their need of transportation facilities, and telling us of the millions of bushels of wheat that were lying about the country in bags exposed to atmospheric influences and liable to be destroyed for the lack of the means of transportation ; and yet these hon. gentlemen are ready to vote for a policy which prevents this wheat being sent to Germany through the United States. Any port in a storm would be my policy, and if we could not get transportation for our products through the Dominion of Canada I would send them through the United States and out by New York. But even if we did so, we could not take advantage of the German market, because when an attempt was made a short time ago to export from Manitoba through New York, mixing it with American wheat, the fact was discovered by the German consul, and it was stopped. We were not permitted even to smuggle our wheat to the German market through New York. Germany is determined not to trade with a people who refuse to trade on equal terms with it. I wonder at these hon. gentlemen from the North-west talking about that loss, while they are ready to vote for a preferential tariff which shuts them out of a market where they could get 10 cents a bushel more than they do for the article which they produce in the largest quantities. How do they expect us in the older provinces to provide better means of transportation if the farmers of Ontario and Quebec and the other provinces as well as the manufacturers are to be handicapped by the very policy they are voting for? If these hon. gentlemen would join us in voting down this preferential tariff, and give us an opportunity of doing something to help them, they would find a justification for their votes; but until they do something for the country, I fail to see how they are going to justify themselves to their consitutents. In 1899 Canada exported 327,486 bushels of rye to Great Britain, to Germany we did not send a bushel, but the United States sent to Germany 4,036,554 bushels. By the preferential tariff we have turned that market fully over to the United States. Of barley Canada exported to Great Britain in 1901 2,386,000 bushels, to Germany we did not send a bushel, shut out by the preferential tariff; but the United States sent to Germany 3,385,140 bushels in 1900. Of oats Canada exported in 1901 8,155,000 bushels, but not a single bushel to Germany—the second best market in the world closed to us by reason of the preferential tariff. Of oats the United States sent to Germany in 1900 1,295,609 bushels. Of pease Canada exported to Great Britain in 1901 3,664,389 bushels, and only 60,351 bushels to Germany. In 1901 Canada exported 310,416 bushels of beans to Great Britain, we did not send a dollar's worth to Germany. The same thing applies to butter, of which Canada exported in 1901 16,335,526 pounds, but we did not send a pound to Germany, shut out by reason of the preferential tariff.

Now, I wish to draw attention to this fact, that notwithstanding that we are excluded from the second best market in the world for our agricultural products, we are to-day taking large quantities of manufactured goods from Germany. We took last year $7,021,405 worth, not including the German goods which were smuggled through the ports of Great Britain by reason of the preferential tariff. We exported to Germany $2,141,552 worth; but these exports were not the home products of Canada. Of home products we only sent her $1,374,716 worth, so that practically our trade with Germany was only fifth or sixth class. Belgium, with a population of 6,000,000, took from us more goods than Germany. In 1901 Belgium took from us $1,728,484, whereas, Germany, with a population of 56,000,000, only took from us $1,374,716 worth. We took from Belgium $3,828,450 worth, or about one-half of what we took from Germany.

I assume that the hon. the Minister of Customs has gone on a journey or he is asleep. If the latter, I hope he sleeps soundly, but I would have been very glad indeed if he had given me the light of his presence. I can assure him that whenever he speaks in this House, I shall, if possible, always be present to hear what he says. Not because what he says is always so very entertaining or interesting, but because I always like to know, when I have to reply to an hon. gentleman, what he has said in order that I may not misrepresent him. When the hon. gentleman said that this government had reduced the rate of taxation, I declare just as emphatically that they have not, but on the contrary, have increased it, and I should have been glad had the minister been in his place to hear the arguments I advance in support of my contention, and to point out the errors, if he conceived there were any, in these arguments. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for the kind attention given to my remarks.

Mr. LEMIEUX (Gaspé). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this stage of the discussion, and at this advanced hour of the night, to participate at any length in the debate that is now in progress. I may even say, that it was not my intention, after the many speeches we have heard, to have intervened in the debate; but I feel it to be my duty to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), who has directly appealed to me. I must confess to my astonishment at the new role played by the hon. gentleman who has constituted himself the guardian of public morality, and the champion of the province of Quebec. This is quite a new departure from the record of the hon. gentleman and his friends on the other side of the House. I should rather say that if I wished to account for the splendid isolation—to use a word that is now classical—in which my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) finds himself, I should assign no other cause for it than the unwarrantable language used by his own colleagues on the other side of the House.

The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), referring to the census, asked whether, after the disclosures made by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, in connection with the parish of St. Jean de Matha, in the county of Joliette, it ought to be inferred that all the census enumerators in 1891 have been perjurers? Sir, that was not the charge made by the Minister of Agriculture. I listened very attentively to his speech, the other day. He did not say that the census enumerators had deliberately perjured themselves, nor did he state that they had received ambiguous instructions, through which they were enabled to stuff the census ; but he said that some enumerators in the province of Quebec, and in other provinces of the Dominion, had unduly swelled the numbers, and exceeded their instructions. Moreover, apart from the county of Joliette, still more shocking facts have been brought to light.

The same conditions, as I said, prevailed also in the other provinces. The hon. member for Bothwell was at a loss to understand how a parish priest, the reverend Mr. Morin, could have presumed to write a letter, in order to contradict facts that had been sworn to by the census enumerator. The hon. gentleman failed to understand how a priest, who has been a resident in this country but for a couple of years, could have given an exact enumeration of the people living in the parish of St. Jean de Matha in 1891. I think all the hon. gentleman's doubts would be removed did he know how scrupulously the registers are kept by the Roman Catholic priests in the province of Quebec.

In each Roman Catholic parish, registers are kept by the parish priest, in which the acts of civil status, such as the acts of birth, of marriage, of burial and the number of communicants are inscribed. In a parish like St. Jean de Matha, where you can hardly find five Protestants, I hesitate not to say that the name of every man, woman and child in the parish is inscribed in those registers, and those registers, mark you, are handed down from generation to generation. It is a well known fact, that there is no religious denomination in the world, the ministers of which keep the registers of civil status with greater care than is shown by the ministers of the denomination to which I may say—though in no spirit of vain glory—that I am proud to belong. Those registers have been kept in our Roman Catholic parishes from time immemorial ; and should you pay a visit to the early settlements of Quebec, you would be surprised to find old dusty registers dating from the French dominion. As early as 1536, under Francis I—and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier may bear witness to what I say—through an ordinance which has become famous, the Roman Catholic priests were bound to keep the registers of civil status in their parishes, missions or chapels. Duplicates of those registers are deposited in the prothonotary's office of the Superior Court.

Mr. F. D. MONK. (Translation.) Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ? Does he think that he has succeeded in clearing the province of Quebec from the charge levelled against it, and from the imputation cast on its honour by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) ?

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Surely, the hon. gentleman is not in earnest, when he so unfairly brings to task the hon. Minister of Agriculture. The hon. minister did not say that the shocking state of affairs described by him prevailed in the province of Quebec alone, because he showed that there had been stuffing of the lists in the counties of Colchester, West Huron, Cornwall, Antigonish and Annapolis.

Mr. F. D. MONK. (Translation.) The hon. minister said it was worse in the province of Quebec than in the other provinces.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Does the hon. gentleman think that from the fact that a census enumerator is denounced for having violated his oath and having perjured himself, it follows that the whole province of Quebec is besmirched, and that the charge of perjury is fastened upon the whole people of Quebec ? One cannot expect to find absolute perfection here below, even in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, when I rose to address the House, in the French language, I wished to speak out my mind, and so to say, to unbosom myself to the House, as to the general policy of the government ; and I am now going to address myself to this task. Let me say, first, that they were labouring under a strange delusion, who, after 1896, fancied that the Conservatives had laid down their arms. As a matter of fact, the Conservative party were not long in assuming the offensive again. The Liberal party, they said, composed as they are of unruly soldiers and sharp-shooters, will not fail in creating such a disturbance in the conditions of the country with their fiscal policy, as will cause to rise in arms against them the trade interests and the manufacturers of the country. They also said : ' The Conservative party, strongly rooted as they are in the soil, having at their command the long enjoyed assistance of high and powerful influences, supplied as they are with the sinews of war by generous and large-hearted followers, will not be long in resuming the reins of power. As giant Antæus, in the fable, acquired new strength every time he touched the earth, so, they said, the Conservative party will gain fresh energy, and be nerved to new exertions from their crushing defeat. There was not to be found a single man among the Conservatives, who did not believe that the check the party had met with was but a temporary one, and that at the next sound of the bugle the rout of the Liberals would be complete, and their defeat irretrievable.

Mr. Speaker, it is very true that faith will move mountains. But, after the general elections of 1900, and the recent by-elections, our opponents, to use the language of poetry, had to come down from the paradise dreamed of, and to face the cold and stern realities of existence.

I referred, a little while ago, to the splendid isolation in which my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier finds himself, a man to whose talents and strength of mind I am happy to pay homage. He is not by no manner of means to blame for that isolation in which he finds himself. The guilty party is the electorate, or should my hon. friend like it better, I shall say that the guilty party is the Conservative party ; because their political record for the last twenty years is one of intestine quarrels, and of family feuds ; so that the hon. gentleman, when surveying the ruins heaped up all around him, may well exclaim : 'Ceci a tué cela.' It was those suicidal quarrels that killed the party.

However, let the hon. gentleman cheer up and remember that parties are by no means eternal. Till brighter days dawn, let him not forget to look after the electorate. I heard, a little while ago, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson) tell us a little story, which gives an insight into our political manners. He told us that in 1877, Mr. Laurier, who had just become a minister in the Mackenzie administration, was running in the county of Arthabasca, and that his opponents circulated the report, in the backwood parishes, that he was a Protestant minister. The story told by the hon. member for Halton is perfectly true, and it goes to show—although those who make such silly appeals to prejudices and passions generally fall short of their design—that in the province from which I come they stop at no language, however strong, at no imputations, to compass the defeat of a Liberal. I said that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier knew that the acquaintance of the electorate was worth cultivating. As an instance, I may tell the House that last fall, he addressed the members of the Club Morin of Montreal, and that he did not hesitate to represent the right hon. prime minister as most unworthy of the confidence of his fellow-countrymen. I have not the verbatim report of that speech in hand, but I have here an extract from the Toronto Mail of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. Here are the headlines :

Laurier Fails in Duty to Quebec. His Premiership of No Aid to French Canadians. Notable Speech by F. D. Monk.

And the 'Mail' goes on to say :

By the very nature of his position Sir Wilfrid Laurier was obliged every day to make concessions. In the same way when the subsidies to the Provinces came up for consideration Prince Edward Island received a bonus. New Brunswick will also receive one, but Quebec's claims are left without consideration. The same thing applied to Experimental farms. Every other province had one, but Quebec was left out. In the Immigration Department, conducted by Mr. Sifton, the French Canadians were practically eliminated. The immigration was directed to the far west, to the detriment of Quebec. Referring to the Montreal harbour works, Mr. Monk said that the necessary works have been delayed for years simply because the government is afraid to do anything for the province of Quebec, which gives Canada its Prime Minister. All along the line Mr. Monk claimed that Quebec Province had gained nothing, but, on the contrary, had lost in prestige and advantages by having one of its own sons at the head of the government.

Those appeals to racial prejudices and passions among French Canadians, against the government, have had the result contemplated by our opponents.

Take, for instance, the county of Laval, where the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) has succeeded in having a young man of talent returned to parliament. It must be borne in mind that there were two Liberal candidates in the field, and that but for the split in the Liberal ranks, Mr. Wilson, the government candidate would have carried the county. Take as another instance, the county of Beauharnois. Now, in that county, if the old majority of 1900 was not polled in favour of the Liberal candidate, let us not forget that it was owing to the fact that 300 voters of Valleyfield had neglected to have their names registered on the voters' lists. But for that neglect, our fried, Mr. Loy would have been returned by a larger majority. In the electoral division of St. James, Montreal, the fact that the majority polled by our candidate was smaller than formerly —and it is a matter of public notoriety—is due to the split in the Liberal ranks. Let it suffice to say that, up to the very day preceding nomination day, there were two and even three Liberal candidates in the field.

Mr. Speaker, the capital grievance formulated by our opponents against the government is that they have no well defined fiscal policy. The name of Mr. Alexander Mackenzie, the old Liberal leader, has been evoked during this debate, and it has been stated that he was the apostle of free trade ; that his successor, the Hon. Edward Blake had, in his Malverne speech in 1882, pronounced in favour of moderate protection; that later on, the right hon. Prime Minister had successively advocated such platforms as unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, commercial union, a revenue tariff policy, and that finally he had become a worshipper at the shrine of protection pure and simple.

Now, what are the facts ? In 1896, when the Liberal party, after they had passed twenty years in the cold shades of opposition, were put at the head of public affairs by the will of the people, a commission was appointed which held its sittings in the different parts of the country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and obtained all kinds of information, during their investigation, from all classes of the community ; and after having gone thoroughly into those informations and grievances, during the session of 1897, the hon. Minister of Finance framed his fiscal policy, and as a consequence, the Fielding tariff was put in force.

What were the results of that policy ? An unprecedented era of prosperity was ushered in and a fresh impetus given to trade and industry.

Of course, Sir, the ideal which is cherished by all friends of liberty is free trade as it is understood in Great Britain. But there is many a slip between the cup and the lip. In a young country like ours, placed as it is in the immediate neighbourhood of the great American republic, I do not know of any rigid and unalterable principle that may be laid down in fiscal matters. Of course our infant industries need protection, but that protection should not be eternal. All depends on the conditions of the country. Did not the hon. Minister of Finance state, upon two different occasions, that the manufacturers should prepare and make provision for the time when, their industries having been built up, the mouldering branches would be lopped off and the duties reduced ? This is a most wholesome warning by which all the interested parties should profit. As I said, in matters fiscal, there is no absolute and fixed principle, and everything depends on circumstances. In the course of this debate, reference was made to the names of Cobden and Bright, the two champions of free trade in England. But does anybody pretend to say that, had they lived under Cromwell, those two champions of commercial freedom would have taken the position they did take in this century ? Was not Sir John Macdonald himself, prior to 1872, a free trader ? And yet, in 1878, he evolved into a full-fledged protectionist. Did not Sir Robert Peel, in 1846, move for the abolition of the Corn Laws, thus passing from protection to free trade ? It was the same statesman who, on the 29th of June, 1846, gave utterance to the following words :

> When proposals are made, apparently at variance with the course which ministers have heretofore pursued, and subjecting them to the charge of inconsistency—it is perhaps advantageous for this country, and for the general character of public men, that the proposal of measures of that kind, under such circumstances, should entail that which is supposed to be the fitting punishment, namely, expulsion from office..... In relinquishing power, I shall leave a name, severely censured I fear by many who, on public grounds, deeply regret the severance of party ties..... I shall surrender power severely censured also by others who, from no interested motives, adhere to the principle of protection, considering the maintenance of it to be essential to the welfare and interests of the country. I shall leave a name execrated by every monopolist who, from less honourable motives, clamours for protection because it conduces to his own individual benefit ; but it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good will in the abodes of those whose lot is to labour, and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, when they shall recruit their exhausted strength with abundant and untaxed food, the sweeter because it is no longer leavened by a sense of injustice.

Now, listen to the utterances of Mr. McKinley, the apostle of protection in the United States, when on the day before his assassination, he delivered an address before the immense audience gathered on the exhibition grounds of the world's fair at Buffalo :

> The period of exclusiveness is past.
> The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem.
> Commercial wars are unprofitable.
> A policy of good-will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals.
> Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times. Measures of retaliation are not.

So. Mr. McKinley, who was the champion of high tariffs in the United States, stated that he was in favour of reciprocity treaties, and of entering into negotiations with the South American republics and Canada. All which goes to show, as I said, that the fiscal policy of a country is a growth of the times and circumstances.

But, Sir, to adopt the amendment now under discussion would be to take a step backwards, and to revert to the policy of 1879 ; for if you compare the amendment with the motion brought down by Sir John Macdonald in February, 1878, you will find that they tally, and that the wording is exactly the same. Now, is it desirable for this country to revert to that policy ? In this connection, I beg to submit to the House a few figures, in a tabulated form, which speak for themselves :

Increase for trade of Canada, over 1896..	$150,515,526
Increase for exports of agricultural produce and animals, over 1896.	40,377,553
Increase for exports of cheese, over 1896..	6,740,380
Increase for exports of butter over 1896	2,243,574
Increase for exports of bacon over 1896..	7,111,900
Deposits in banks, in 1895—Conservative regime	183,103,038
Deposits in banks, in 1901—Liberal regime..	315,000,000
Deposits in savings banks, in 1895—Conservative regime	44,450,498
Deposits in savings banks, in 1901—Liberal regime	75,000,000

With such increases, Sir, I say that we have no reason to regret the old regime, to which the hon. leader of the opposition would fain have us revert. The prosperity of the country is so palpable, so clear, that there is no need of statistics to prove it. Why, then, should we revert to the old state of things ?

However, there is also a dark side to the picture. The census, it must be confessed, was a disappointment to all of us. The population of Canada has not increased in the ratio that we had reason to expect it would. Still, from the standpoint of the province of Quebec, I find that we have room to rejoice ; for, from the census reports, not only have Montreal and Quebec added to their numbers, but Valleyfield, St. Hyacinthe, Shawinigan also show an increase. As to the city of Quebec, I am glad to say that it is developing so rapidly that, before many years have elapsed, by reason of its geographical position, it will prove a most dangerous rival to Montreal. I sincerely rejoice in the progress made by the city of Quebec, within the last ten years; the more so, as I have the honour of being one of the representatives from the Quebec region.

Not only have our manufacturing centres progressed; but I wish to emphasize the fact that the increase of population was more particularly marked in the regions opened up to settlement, such as the country to the north of Montreal, the Gatineau Valley, the Temiscaming region, the Lake St. John valley and the Gaspé district. I have no hesitation in saying that in those vast regions there is room for thousands and thousands of hardy settlers who will find there a rich and friendly soil and vast natural resources, yet undeveloped. Those results, I must admit, are due to the labours of our colonization and repatriation societies and to the Quebec government who have spared no efforts, within the last five years, to promote the cause of colonization. In this connection, I may be allowed to quote from a report of the department of colonization for 1901. I find, page 203, that Mr. Lussier, the representative of two railway companies, publishes a tabulated statement showing that, from June, 1900, to June, 1901, 16,011 French Canadians have come back to Canada. The accuracy of those statistics cannot be called in question.

While I am dealing with this question, I would like to offer a suggestion to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). I have no doubt but that the Galicians and the Doukhobors are first-class settlers; but I am free to say that I place more reliance on those Canadians who, though living for the time being in the United States, would be delighted to come back to Canada, should they be offered proper inducements to that effect. I have before me a tabulated statement recently published in the American papers, showing the number of French Canadians in the United States:—

New Hampshire	95,000
Vermont	70,000
Massachusetts	310,000
Rhode Island	80,000
Connecticut	60,000
New York	130,000
New Jersey	3,000
Pennsylvania	4,000
Illinois	50,000
Ohio	8,000
Michigan	140,000
Wisconsin	50,000
Minnesota	60,000
Kansas	8,000
Dakota, north and south	15,000
Washington	7,000
Montana	8,000
Washington	7,000
Oregon	5,000
California	10,000
Other states and territories	30,000
Total for the United States.	1,228,000

I humbly suggest to the hon. minister that if he did appoint reliable and competent agents, whose business it would be to do missionary work in the French Canadian centres in the United States, it would result in bringing back to Canada thousands of French Canadians. What I say of the French Canadians applies to many Anglo-Canadians as well who, within the last 25 years, have gone over to the neighbouring states.

From the census question to the readjustment of the subsidy paid by the Dominion government to the provinces is a natural transition. There is, in our constitution, a provision which is most unfair to the two great provinces of Ontario and Quebec. I refer to clause 118 of the British North America Act which provides that the federal grant of 80 cents per head of the population shall remain at that fixed rate, for Ontario and Quebec, whose population is based on the census of 1861; whereas, so far as the other provinces are concerned, that grant of 80 cents per head of their population shall be increased by each subsequent decennial census. Clause 118 reads as follows:—

118. Grants to Provinces.

The following sums shall be paid yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures:—

Ontario	$80,000
Quebec	70,000
Nova Scotia	60,000
New Brunswick	50,000
	$260,000

And an annual grant in aid of each province shall be made, equal to eighty cents per head of the population, as ascertained by the census of one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and in the case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, by each subsequent decennial census until the population of each of those two provinces amounts to four hundred thousand souls, at which rate such grant shall thereafter remain. Such grants shall be in full settlement of all future demands on Canada, and shall be paid half yearly in advance to each province; but the government of Canada shall deduct from such grants, as against any province, all sums chargeable as interest on the public debt of that province in excess of the several amounts stipulated in this Act.

I say without the least hesitation that this section of the federal Act is most unfair to Ontario and Quebec.

As a matter of fact the west and the maritime provinces, with a total population of 1,240,000 souls, receive an annual grant of $1,016,649, while Ontario, with a population twice as large, only receives $1,116,572, and Quebec with a population larger by one third, only receives $893,528, or 11 per 100 less than these more favoured provinces. I have just said that this section is unfair, and I shall endeavour to prove it. Here is a comparative tabulated statement giving the decreasing progression per capita of the federal grant of 80 cents paid to the province of Quebec, and also the increasing progression per capita of the amount contributed by the province to the federal revenue :—

Years.	Federal Revenue per head.	Federal Subsidy per head.
	$ cts.	$ cts.
1861	4 05	0 80
1871	5 50	0 75
1881	6 83	0 65
1901	9 48	0 55

So, in 1861, the province of Quebec, for the administration of local affairs, received 20 per cent of its contribution to the federal revenue ; but from decade to decade, the rate has decreased from 20 per cent to 14 per cent, from 14 to 9, from 9 to 7, and at last from 7 to 5½ per cent per head of our population ; that is to say, when the proportion of the federal revenue derived from the province of Quebec has increased by 135 per cent, the rate of the subsidy has decreased by 33 per cent. In other words, from 1867 to 1901, our contribution to the federal treasury amounted to over $412,000,000, and the total subsidy paid to the province during the same period, was only $39,315,232.

As far as Ontario is concerned, we are met with a still greater anomaly. From 1867 to 1901, that province has contributed to the federal treasury a total sum of $617,558,902, and the total grant paid to that province, during the same period only amounted to $49,142,368. In that province also, the per capita contribution to the federal revenue has increased by 135 per cent, and the per capita subsidy has decreased by 36½ per cent.

During all that period the other provinces of the Dominion have been receiving 80 cents per head of the population, and in that way they have secured from the Dominion treasury an additional subsidy of $10,410,000, as shown by the following table :—

SURPLUS of the federal subsidy paid to the Maritime Provinces and the West.

——	1871.	1881.	1891.	1901.	Total.
	$	$	$	$	$
Nova Scotia	46,000	56,000	55,000	56,000	2,140,000
New Brunswick	27,000	55,000	56,000	63,000	2,010,000
Prince Edward Island	11,000	23,000	23,000	18,000	750,000
Manitoba	.....	33,000	107,000	182,000	3,220,000
British Columbia	.....	13,000	62,000	154,000	2,290,000
Total from 1871 to 1901	.....	.....	.....	.....	10,410,000

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the same rule had been applied to the two larger provinces, the province of Quebec, for her share would have received from 1867 to 1901, $9,500,000 more, and Ontario would be the richer by $18,000,000. During the present decade, the Quebec yearly subsidy would be $403,253 larger, and the Ontario yearly subsidy would be $617,500 larger.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, in these figures are to be sought the causes that have paralysed, to a certain extent, the development of the two great provinces. The situation is certainly abnormal, to say the least. Why, Sir, the federal government pays annually 80 cents for every immigrant, be he a Chinaman, a Doukhobor or a Galician, that settles in the other provinces, while Ontario and Quebec never had a single dollar for any of the Canadians born since the census of 1861, nor for any of the immigrants that have settled within the limits of these provinces since that date. I say that the revision of the federal constitution in the direction I have outlined is a necessity. Every year the federal government come out with a large surplus, and if they were willing to deal fairly with the two older provinces, which were truly the constituent parts of confederation, they would put in the estimates, under the head of 'federal subsidy,' an additional sum of $1,020,765, that is to say, $403,255 for the province of Quebec and $617,510 for the province of Ontario.

The revision of the constitution in this direction is a pressing need, for in their present situation, there is no inducement to these provinces to increase their population, since every addition to that population is a new burden upon local revenue and the profit to be derived therefrom goes to the federal treasury.

The provinces that have constituted the federal power must be in a position to carry on effectively the administration of local affairs. Their revenue is out of proportion to the heavy expenditures they have to meet. I do not think I am going too far in saying that they have been deprived of the sources of revenue they should have.

In 1867, the Fathers of Confederation made provision for an amount of $1,500,000 to meet the cost of provincial administration. But it stands to reason that this amount is altogether inadequate, considering their increased population and their increased territory. The expenditure has increased in proportion to the new needs of the provinces. Sir A. T. Galt, the then Minister of Finance, said that a sum of $1,500,000 would amply cover the expenditure for the maintenance of asylums, the administration of justice and other branches of the service. But he had not foreseen the extraordinary development of the provinces. I shall give the House a few figures compiled from the Public Accounts of the province of Quebec.

In 1868, the cost of maintaining the asylums was $97,946.63 ; in 1900, that same service entailed for the province an expenditure of $348,000. The cost of administering justice was $322,000 in 1868, and $661,242.37 in 1900. To-day, the annual subsidy paid by the province to charitable institutions is $100,000 ; the local government pays $184,845 for colonization and $173,759 for agriculture. I maintain that even with the strictest economy it is impossible to curtail by a single dollar these necessary expenditures.

As far as the administration of justice is concerned—I mean criminal justice—we must not overlook the fact that the provinces are, after all, only enforcing federal laws. We must not forget that the expenditure under that head is increasing from year to year, and it is only reasonable that the Dominion authorities should be called upon to provide for the enforcement of their own laws.

The provinces are entitled to live. In the position in which they are, under section 118 of the British North America Act, as the saying goes, they exist, but they do not live. We are told by the champions of federalism : 'There are three ways, for the provinces, to extricate themselves from the entanglement in which they find themselves to-day, that is : direct taxation, loans, sale of public property.'

As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, I might say that the people of that province want no more taxes, no more loans. As to public property, is it right, is it wise to sell it, and deprive thereby our children of their inheritance ?

This is by no means a new question ; it is a question above party politics. In 1883, the first minister of the province of Quebec, Mr. Mousseau, leader of a Conservative administration forwarded to the federal authorities a memorandum to that effect, and the treasurer of the day, the Hon. Mr. Wurtele, held the same views, as did also his predecessor in office, Mr. Robertson.

Later on in 1887, under a Liberal administration, the Hon. Mr. Mercier convened the prime ministers of the different provinces of the Dominion to a conference which was held in Quebec, and resolutions to the same effect were passed with the endorsation of the present first minister of Ontario, Mr. Ross, and the then premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick (Messrs. Fielding and Blair). I do not wish to encroach in the least upon federal rights. Every one is familiar with the title of the pamphlet published by Siéyes, when the States-General were called together in 1789 : 'What is the Third estate? Nothing. What can it be ? Everything.' I say likewise: What are the provinces under the Confederation Act? Nothing, or almost nothing. What can they be ? Something !

Before concluding these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word or two on the question of imperialism, with which the political atmosphere is fairly saturated just now. The South African war, the sending of the contingents, the past and future colonial conventions, editorials published in newspapers and periodicals here and England, a certain decision given by the Privy Council, of which I had occasion to speak in this House, such are the causes that have given rise to a movement hailed with enthusiasm by some and fiercely denounced by others.

To my mind, imperialism made its appearance in this country under three different forms. We had, first of all, political imperialism, then commercial imperialism, and lastly, sentimental imperialism.

Political imperialism, or imperial federation would entail the creation of an imperial parliament, where would meet the representatives of all the colonies. A most zealous promoter of that contemplated federation, a member of the bar, in Montreal, gave the following redistribution of seats in this parliament in London :—

England	465
Wales	30
Scotland	72
Ireland	103
Canada	90
Australia	63
	750

Need I say that such a plan could not stand a thorough examination? Who would ever think of sitting in parliament three thousand miles away from Canada to consider and discuss measures affecting Canadian interests with representatives from India, Cape Colony or Australia ? What would be the influence of ninety Canadian members in a parliament numbering 750 members ? Such a question is settled as soon as it is stated. But then the imperial federation league is no more ; there is no more reason to dread that imperialistic system. Moreover, let us bear in mind that at the colonial conference of 1897, the Prime Minister of Canada himself presented a resolution stating that the political intercourse between England and her colonies should not be interfered with. We know that that resolution was carried by the unanimous vote of all the colonial premiers present at the jubilee festivities.

And lately we have gathered from the correspondence that passed between the Colonial Secretary and the Canadian authorities that the political connection between both countries would not even be discussed, but that the question of our trade relations alone would be debated at the conference following the coronation celebration.

I now come to commercial imperialism which in its concrete form is a policy of reciprocal trade preference within the empire. I have always thought, Mr. Speaker, that to ensure the validity of a contract the co-operation of two parties was required.

Mr. MONK. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask if he favours the present one-sided preference ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Undoubtedly, I favour that one-sided preference because it tends to alleviate the burden of taxation that lay heavy upon the consumers under the old tariff. The volume of our trade with England peremptorily demonstrates that fact. True it is that the colonies, particularly Canada, would be delighted to supply with their produce, the markets of Great Britain, all other nations being excluded. But it must be borne in mind that, barring a few enthusiasts, such as Sir Howard Vincent and others, that proposal has been rejected by the most prominent statesmen of Great Britain. The English people, with their practical common sense, are aware that that reciprocal trade preference, while it would promote colonial trade, would also prompt other nations to fiercely retaliate. Let me quote from a speech delivered in June, 1901, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, speaking on the resolution of Mr. Fowler, M.P., asking for a 33⅓ per cent reduction of duty on sugar imported from the colonies or His Majesty's Dominions :—

> The Chancellor of the Exchequer said he did not see how it would be possible to make distinctions in the treatment of the colonial products ; and this opened up a prospect of material reductions in the yield of revenue. In pursuance of the same policy, Canada might ask that a duty should be imposed on all corn and flour imported not produced in Canada (hear, hear), and similar claims might be advanced on behalf of Canadian timber, Australian wool, and meat from New Zealand (hear, hear), and so on, through all articles preference would be claimed for colonial produce. (Hear, hear.) But this was not all. When he had done all that, which he supposed would be by mutual concessions, foreign countries would make similar offers for reciprocal treatment, and what would be the answer ? If we agreed, then the colonial preference in favour of the empire would disappear, and we would be caught in the meshes of the 'most favoured nation' clause. (Hear, hear.) If, on the other hand, we refuse to foreign nations the treatment extended to our colonies, what would happen ? We had an export trade with foreign countries double the amount of the trade with our colonies, and were we prepared to risk the loss of this trade by declining to give to foreign countries in return of the same concessions the treatment we gave to the colonies ? He warned the committee of this—that he was aware that while he was speaking there was a strong feeling in Germany upon this subject ; and, if parliament were so ill-advised as to adopt the proposal of his hon. friend, we would run very serious risk of losing that most-favoured-nation treatment for our commerce with Germany we now enjoyed. (Hear, hear.) Having regard to what he had said, he trusted the committee would refrain from imposing on a Chancellor of the Exchequer such difficult conditions as his hon. friend proposed. He believed they would be injurious both to this country and to the colonies, and were based on an entirely mistaken idea of the right fiscal policy. He said that apart from any antiquated notions of free trade to which his hon. friend had alluded and for the reason he had endeavoured to place before the committee, with every desire to assist West Indian trade, he declined to take a path which would lead to as bad a fiscal mistake as this country could make. (Hear, hear.) It would be a reversal of a policy which had been successful in promoting our foreign and colonial trade for the last 40 years. (Cheers.)

This reply from the Chancellor of the Exchequer ends the debate. I could also quote from the correspondence that passed two years ago between the Postmaster General of Canada and the Duke of Devonshire, and even from a speech recently delivered by Mr. Asquith, one of the leaders of the Liberal-Unionist party, for in both cases the plan of a reciprocal trade preference between Great Britain and her colonies was pronounced impracticable.

What is there left of all that agitation ? Sentimental imperialism.

That sentimental imperialism exists I admit, and I may add that should it rest upon the most absolute freedom, upon a mutual regard for the privileges of the various parts of the empire ; should it aim at a higher development of civilization, art and literature, I do not see any objection to it. What I dread is not words, but deeds. It must not be forgotten that Canada has freely and willingly done her large share to uphold and extend the influence of the empire on this continent. I shall quote a few figures from an eminent publicist :

Surrender of territory embracing Maine, Wisconsin, Oregon, etc., 300,000,000 acres at $1 per acre..	$300,000,000
Building of the Intercolonial Railway.	30,000,000
Expenditure incurred through the Fenian raid	2,000,000
African contingents	2,000,000

Purchase of the North-west	$ 1,500,000
Building of the C.P.R...	100,000,000
Expenditure on militia since 1867 ..	35,000,000
	$470,500,000

I have just mentioned the expenditure incurred through our sending contingents to South Africa. You should hear what the hon. gentlemen opposite have to say on that score in the province of Quebec. When a by-election took place in the county of Laval, in January last, Mr. Bergeron, the former member for Beauharnois, who was fighting by the side of his leader, the hon. member from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) publicly stated in my presence that the government had exacted a tribute of blood, by sending Canadian troops to a foreign land. However, that same Mr. Bergeron had said, in 1899, at a banquet in the province of New Brunswick, before an English audience, that the government was in duty bound to send to the Transvaal, not one thousand, but five thousand men.

Mr. MONK. Is the hon. gentleman aware that Mr. Bergeron has denied having uttered those words in the province of New Brunswick and in the county of Laval ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Bergeron did state at a banquet in Moncton, in the presence of Mr. Foster, the former Minister of Finance, that the Laurier administration should send five thousand men to the Transvaal. His statements were published in the leading Conservative organ, 'The Star', of Montreal. As to what he said in the county of Laval, I know this much. A meeting was held at St. Martin ; I was replying to my hon. friend, the member for Jacques Cartier, and Mr. Bergeron, who came next, made the statement which I have just attributed to him. I have still a vivid recollection of what transpired on that day.

The former member from Beauharnois took a very prominent part in the contest in Laval, and if I am correctly informed, he delivered similar utterances in other parishes of that constituency. That is the way our opponents wage war on the government in the province of Quebec.

True it is, Mr. Speaker, that I, as a Canadian, would rather see our volunteers go to the front to repel the enemy, should they ever invade our territory. However, I realize that being of French extraction, I cannot be moved by the same sentiments that cause my fellow-countrymen of English origin to tingle in sympathy with the mother country, when they hear of what takes place on the battlefields of South Africa. How could they remain insensible while this gigantic struggle is going on, in which England's supremacy is at stake ? I should be false to that old chivalrous spirit of France, which characterizes my own race, were I to deny them the privilege to go and fight for the flag of Great Britain.

The members of the contingents who are serving in South Africa are under no obligation to do so. They have volunteered their services, and how, I ask, could any one find fault with it ?

At all events, it is on record that when the secession war broke out no fewer than 35,000 Canadians enlisted in the American army. If these men were permitted to serve under a foreign flag how could we object to their enlisting under the British flag which, after all, is our own flag ? I, as a Canadian, love England because of her enlightened parliamentarism, and because for the last fifty years she has acknowledged our rights, privileges and political liberties. I know that in some quarters the sending of the contingents has given rise to a campaign of prejudices against the province of Quebec. My fellow-countrymen have been taunted with a lack of loyalty, on that occasion. At this late hour, I do not propose to refute those slanderous statements. In concluding, I shall merely quote one sentence from Gambetta. The war of 1870 was over, every Frenchman, irrespective of party ties, was weeping over the loss of Alsace and Lorraine. Every one was breathing 'revenge'. But soon after the political parties turned to practical use that rallying word to overthrow the republic. When addressing his constituents at Belleville, the great orator said : Revenge ! gentlemen, let us always think of it, but let us never mention it ! In Canada, we have too frequently made an abusive use of words and of the noblest feelings, therefore shall I say : Loyalty, gentlemen, let us always think of it, but let us never mention it !

Mr. RUFUS H. POPE (Compton). Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is scarcely necessary for me to apologize for rising at this late hour, or at this early hour, as an hon. gentleman reminds me, to make a few remarks in connection with the subject before the House. I sometimes regret, Sir, that the rules of this House do not permit morning meetings during a long debate of this character, as I think that possibly we might in this way dispose of these debates from day to day much more rapidly and without so much night work.

If it were necessary to seek something in support of the Conservative policy of the last twenty-five years, if we felt the need of arguments on which to base an opinion as to whether those men who preceded us in the leadership of that great party, placed before the people of this country a proper policy when they inaugurated and put in force the national policy, we could find nothing more convincing than the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite in the debate which is just about to close. Scarcely one of them dared to address the House without offering some excuse for supporting the government. From ocean to ocean, from all the provinces of Canada, they have come here, representing nearly all the varied interests of this country, and in advocating the requirements of those interests as affecting their various provinces and constituencies, they have pleaded with the government to do something, and finding all their pleadings futile and unheeded, they find themselves compelled to offer an apology to this House for the vote they are going to give on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker, the men who conceived and put in force the national policy have nearly all passed away from the political arena. They have nearly all retired from active political life, and consequently we who are in active political life to-day ought to be able to view their work dispassionately. Do we think, when we look at the upbuilding of Canada, which followed the great work of retrievement performed by the Conservative party as soon as they found themselves intrusted with power in 1878, when we remember the condition of Canada under the so-called tariff of free trade policy—if hon. gentlemen choose to call it so—of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie, and when we contrast that condition with the position of this country in 1896, when the late government left office, we cannot but admit that from 1878 to 1896 a glorious work was done as regards the development of the intelligence of our people, the increase of our prosperity, and the promotion of our better education. Look at our increase in wealth, as demonstrated by our bank account, look in any direction of life you choose, you cannot fail to recognize the immense benefits which this country has enjoyed through the policy and administration of the Conservative party. And during all that period of time from 1878 to 1896, the Conservative party were fought to the bitter end by hon. gentlemen upon the other side, and when I heard the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his valedictory remarks the other day, preparing for his departure from public life to that safe and comfortable seat which the right hon. the first minister has waiting for him in Toronto—and we must remember that no Liberal was ever known to leave one office on salary until he got his hands safely upon another—I could not help but think that that hon. gentleman might have spared himself some of the outbursts to which he gave vent upon that occasion. When he went back into the past history of Canada, even though that history was built up by the Conservative party—I would like to see any Liberal go back into a past history and not find it built up by the Conservative party, I would like to see him search for a page that he would not be ashamed of which could possibly belong to gentlemen on the other side—I say that when the hon. gentleman went back into our past history he might have done something more worthy of his valedictory remarks than to search out the darkest pages of corruption which he could find in connection with the Conservative administration of twenty years. It is not my intention to go very far in the direction of reply to that hon. gentleman, but as he stood there, engaged in this congenial occupation, I thought that there was some recent history more worthy of his vitriolic attack than that which he singled out for his splenetic outburst.

I fancied that there were other issues besides McGreevy and Langevin to which he could have applied his caustic speech. For, Sir Hector Langevin, Sir, is after all a man who did great public service to Canada, a man whose name, notwithstanding the misfortune he met with in political life, stands higher to-day in Canada than the name of Sir Richard Cartwright will ever stand. I say, Sir, that he might have thought of the names of Cap. Sullivan, of Bole, of Pritchard, of Vance, and of that kindly gentleman Mr. Preston, who hugged the whole machine as worthy of mention. He could have gone to the local amateurs in West Huron, or he might dabble in the graves of statesmen who have passed out, in the province of Quebec. He could have raked up the memory of the administration of the Hon. Henri Mercier. He could have placed that in the category of evil things. He could have told this House about Mr. Pacaud, a man without reputation when that hon. gentleman came into power and a pauper, and he could have told this House and this country that he stole from the province of Quebec thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, which he spent in an effort to put into power the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, and he might have said that the very deposit that was made in that hon. gentleman's interest in Richmond and Wolfe was some of that stolen money. Mr. Speaker, I will not follow this subject further. We know that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I regret to say it, is weakening physically and that with this physical decline possibly there comes mental decline as well. He is not now so capable of throwing off the spores of disease and contagion, and I think his weakness has had an effect upon his mind by absorption, the absorption of the corruption around him.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Chair, chair.

Mr. POPE. Chair, chair again.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This is disgraceful.

Mr. POPE. The hon. Minister of Justice seems somewhat angry. I am not referring to him. Why should he interrupt me? Cannot he stand a little reference of this sort? We stood it from the hon. gentleman the other day. Hon. gentlemen opposite will get from me precisely what they sent over across the floor of this House, and if I can give change back with interest I will do it. I am not selfish in that particular.

I cannot understand why the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce should have gone so far out of his way to offer what I consider insult upon insult to the history of certain hon. gentlemen who have passed out of political life in this country. Of these great men I call the late Rt. Hon. Sir John Macdonald, the greatest man who fought the battle of Canada against men who went around pleading to the electors of Canada to sell this country to the United States under commercial union, under any sort of flag, making their speeches and shouldering their muskets in the Saskatchewan, but the old Tory line that fought them inside and outside of this House was composed of the great men whose names will live down through history so long as Canadian history continues to be read. Now we will leave that hon. gentleman in that position with these kindly remarks that I have considered it my duty to bestow upon him.

In order to carry out any policy, be it free trade or national, it is essential that one party or the other shall agree upon a substantial line of principle that may be formulated into a policy and put into force for the advantage, or disadvantage, as the case may be, of the country. Consider the exhibition we have had from the other side of the House. Among the hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate we have seen differences of opinion, but, there is a vacant chair on the opposite side of the House that has not been occupied since the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke. I am now referring to the chair which belongs to the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte). He has not been in his chair. They dare not even bring him into this House. In fact, so great has the difference of opinion become between these hon. gentlemen that not only is this House not big enough for him, but they have had to ship him down to the United States. I would like to hear from the hon. Minister of Public Works. I would like to hear him stand up in this House and support the free trade doctrines and warnings given to the hon. gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of the House by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, if they dare to go one inch in advance in the direction of protection. They never can. However, we are to have an exhibition of what their principle is. We have been promised it but we have to wait twelve months, at the end of which time we are to hear again from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. Once more we are delayed from year to year, but I am here to say that with all the diversified opinions that exist on the other side of the House, with the differences that are to be found between the different provinces and between the different nationalities, represented on the other side of the House, with the jealousies, with the knives that are not always in the pockets of one minister but are directed against a colleague, we cannot expect them to bring down to this House a decided policy of protection for the benefit of the Canadian people. That, they cannot do. I do not take their past history into account. There was a day when I had some respect for those things which were called principles by hon. gentlemen opposite, but the last six years have entirely wiped that out. I am too busy a man to try to hunt up the history of these hon. gentlemen. We know that there is only this difference of opinion existing amongst these hon. gentlemen. There was that sympathetic meeting between the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleague the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), a few days ago, when the right hon. gentleman noticed with great pain that the face of the hon. Minister of Railways betokened illness, and he suggested a long rest and retirement from his portfolio. But the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, true as he ought to be to his chieftain, faithful as that hon. gentleman ought to be for the kind consideration that has been bestowed upon him by office by the right hon. gentleman, said : My dear premier, if I go we will go together. Then, they say that they are going twelve months from to-day to offer to this country a united and definite policy, that they are going to come down here twelve months from to-day and say to the people : We believe in protection. But there is not one of them who dared rise and speak except the hon. gentleman who gave us his valedictory, and say what we were going to have, and even he hesitated.

I must not forget the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton)), I see he is not in his seat, but that is not my fault. I was interested and amused by the hon. member's speech. I have never been a great admirer of the hon. gentleman—I do not suppose he expects better of me—but with all the peculiar feeling I have toward that hon. gentleman, I do not wish him any worse luck or any greater punishment than to be obliged to sit with the mixture they have over there. I was reading—and I wish to apologize for it, I was going to say to you, Mr. Speaker, but I mean to this side of the House—the old speeches that have been delivered by the hon. member for North Norfolk when his party was previously in power from 1873 to 1878. I read also speeches of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and others. And as I read those speeches, I realized how true it is that history repeats itself. Elected by false promises, this government has a following of a most confiding character. As I read the speeches of the hon. member for North Norfolk, I observed that as a prophet he was a dead failure. My advice to any man in this country, if he does not want to get stuck is to be sure not to follow the advice of that hon. gentleman. If he does he will never get there—he will always be wrong. I heard the hon. gentleman with astonishment the other evening when he said, in effect: What is the use of trying to build up great industrial markets in this country north of the American line? He told us that it would cost us so much money to build factories in Canada, that Canada had better go back on her history and forget herself. So long as the hon. gentleman holds these opinions, and hon. gentlemen opposite are satisfied to have him hold them, we do not want him to change sides in this House. Sir, if the hour has arrived when we are afraid to face the responsibility of building a nation north of the American line; if we can see no better future than that which the hon. member for North Norfolk offers us, then I say let us give up the race by annexation to the United States—let us have a policy with some sort of a future to it. But I do not believe it. I believe that, with a bold policy for the upbuilding of our industries, for the protection of the labour and brain of young Canadians, with a strong, well-defined transportation policy; with a matured and definite policy for developing the resources of this country and the turning of our raw materials into finished goods for consumption here and for export to the outside world, we shall make our Canada a great nation. It is such a policy as that that I am prepared to support. That is the reason that I am prepared to vote for the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition. Not that it suited me altogether——

Mr. POPE. That is all right. The resolution that I would have preferred would be a resolution for a Chinese wall all round. I would have a resolution so framed that no immigrant should come in here who was not clean and capable of being made into a true citizen of Canada. I would have preferred a resolution saying that no man shall remain inside the Dominion of Canada who will not take up arms and fight for Canada and the empire. There are many things that I would have liked that resolution to contain. But the resolution declares plainly that the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite is not satisfactory. And I know that it is not satisfactory, and I know why. It is an imitation of the product of the weakest moments of the Conservative party when in power—it is an imitation of our faults, not our qualities. It was not a national policy we left them, in my judgment, but the wreck of what had been a national policy. We must not forget how hon. gentlemen opposite went up and down this country seeking to destroy that policy. We must not forget particularly how the Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke wherever he could get an audience, and wrote in any of the reviews that would publish his articles, doing everything he could to decry the country. He decried the great west, and he spoke of the provinces down by the sea as mere fragments. There was no element of the country from its manufacturers to the geographical divisions of the Dominion that the hon. gentleman did not decry. He did his best to convince the people that the national policy was made only for the manufacturers and the monopolists. And even the men who framed that policy, owing to the work of that hon. gentleman were not able to enforce as strong a policy as they would have liked to do. I am not ashamed to stand up here and say so. But when these gentlemen come to us now and say: By copying all the weakest elements of your history, by taking the most miserable of your products, we seek to win grace from the people of Canada, we ask the electors to bow to us, it is hardly to be wondered at that I will heartily support the resolution that condemns their policy.

Now, the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) dwelt upon the fact that we had not offered a resolution against the expenditure, and that this particular resolution had not embodied that idea. If we were to frame a resolution that would denounce all the faults of hon. gentlemen opposite there would not be paper enough manufactured at Eddy's mills during the next twenty days to print it all. The hon. gentleman should have been fair enough and reasonable enough to recognize the resolution that was moved in the House last session and that was read by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Henderson). I cannot forgive the hon. Minister of Customs for that. His memory went back for a period of twenty years and picked out many things that he desired to have remembered. Surely, a man with such a remarkable memory ought to have remembered the resolution of last session. Now, we do not object—at least speaking for myself, and though I can only speak for myself, I do not object—to the size of the expenditure. That is not what frightens me.

It is what we get for this $55,000,000. I say the Minister of Finance has no right to allow one dollar to go out of that treasury which does not go for a work that can be declared to be for the general benefit of Canada. When we see our money being used to build wharfs for private parties, wharfs down by the sea that lead to nowhere, that are only so much additional value to private property when we see them spending our money in every direction upon private works, municipal works and provincial works, and neglecting the great arteries of transportation by which the products of our great west may be carried to the seaboard, I say we have a right to protest, we have a right to cry: Halt, gentlemen, and show us what you are spending this money for.

Near the close of last session, before the Minister of Public Works became a resident of the United States, when it was possible for him to remain in this country, even amongst people who fight like blazes, this question came up, and I asked the hon. gentleman to show me where he was expending this money. I said, what are you doing with that 50,000,000 odd dollars that you are expending, in place of the $38,000,000 of a few years ago? He said, the hon. gentleman is intelligent? I said, not sufficiently intelligent for that. And he rose and informed me that he was deepening the St. Lawrence channel, that he was working in some harbours of the great lakes, and doing canal work as well. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what government since confederation has not been doing this kind of work and has not spent many millions upon it. Sir, it is astonishing to me to hear hon. gentlemen splitting up a cent into quarters and fractions even smaller, to prove whether taxation has been increased in this country or not. There has been some of the finest figuring done by hon. gentlemen opposite to prove that $57,000,000 is less than $38,000,000 that I ever saw.

Now, we know what the population of Canada is, it has just been counted. Of course hon. gentlemen are not satisfied with their count. They are grumbling and trying to blame it off on something that happened ten years ago. We had an exhibition here yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture, which was met to-day by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), and coming from the section of country from which the Minister of Agriculture comes, I am bound to recognize that hon. gentleman in the cabinet as my representative, but I must say, after the exposition that was given of the tactics of that hon. gentleman by the hon. member for Bothwell, even I myself, and that is going a long way, felt ashamed of him. That the hon. gentleman can understand how a family could increase so rapidly, I could appreciate that; he has not been in that business—at least I suppose he has not.

Now, Sir, the Minister of Customs made to the hon. gentlemen opposite a very strong appeal to support him. I was struck by the tone of his voice—I do not say his little voice—when he asked them to wait, grant us one year more. I believe he will get every Liberal vote in this House. I do not believe that even the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) who is known to be a free trader, will resist that appeal, not absolute, but so near absolute, that what was lacking was made up by the size of the voice that delivered it.

Now, Sir, if we wanted other evidence that hon. gentlemen opposite are divided we had it in the speech of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), and his description of the causes which lost them Laval. He says there were three candidates. Well, they are not only divided in Laval but they are divided in this House, and I came to the conclusion three years ago, and so stated publicly, that I did not believe we would ever have from hon. gentlemen opposite any other great proposition than one for them to remain in power. I am of that opinion still. I do not believe we will ever receive from them a change of policy excepting what is wrung from them. But that we shall ever receive from them a national policy worthy of the great and growing possibilities of Canada, as the national policy was worthy of Canada in 1878, I do not believe it. For that reason I am prepared to support the resolution of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, which says that the policy of the government is not satisfactory. We want a policy that will make it possible for Canada, not only to retain her own markets, but to encroach upon the markets of the world, instead of being a slaughter market for other countries. We want moreover a bold policy of transportation. This patch work policy of transportation which hon. gentlemen opposite are offering us, we want nothing of it. I would not like to say that they are not sincere in their peculiar propositions regarding transportation, but if they are sincere in the peculiarities of their proposition, they do not appreciate what transportation means in Canada. We must provide means to get out our grain products from the great west, that country which is to be the home of millions of people, and which is destined to make of Canada a far greater country than even its founders ever anticipated. There are many thousands of people going in there to-day, and I say that if the Conservative party was right in 1878 in building one railroad into that country before there was a solitary soul in it, the time has arrived, if we are going to relieve that country of the crop of four years hence and to take it down to the sea, when we must adopt some plan very different from that hon. gentlemen have suggested.

If we do not meet that situation with a bold national policy, a policy affecting not only the tariff but also the transportation question, we shall have a cry from the great western country far louder than we have heard hitherto. If the mere handful of people now settled there could overtax the capacity of the Canadian Pacific Railway, what will be the case after the hundreds of thousands of people who are now going in multiply the productions of the country. I may be told that we shall have the Canadian Northern Railway. You can put in the Canadian Northern, and then another Canadian Northern, and still you will be unable to meet the possibilities of that great country. More than that, when the product reaches Fort William, what preparation are you making for bringing it down through Canadian waters? And after you get it to Montreal or to Quebec, where is your fast line of steamers to take it across the Atlantic and land it in the European markets, so that the men who are living in the western part of Canada will be able to realize as good a price for their wheat as the people in the western states? If we expect to settle up our great west with people from the western states, as it is boasted we are doing, we must afford them facilities equal to those which they have left behind, or they will be dissatisfied; and it would be better that we had not 50 per cent of the immigration which we are boasting of to-day. The responsibility for all this rests on this government. I have the greatest possible confidence in that country. I have travelled over it many times, and always with the greatest pleasure—not alone to see the vast resources of the country and the fertility of the soil; but every time I travel over that railroad, it reminds me of the time when hon. gentlemen opposite sat on this side of the House and denounced our policy and belittled that country. It makes me proud that I am a Conservative, and proud of the history of the Conservative party. I believe hon. gentlemen opposite are in power at the right time. If there ever was a time in the history of Canada when the country ought to be governed by the Liberal party, it is in good times, when the country can take care of itself. It is a good thing for the Conservative party to have a rest on this side of the House, where we can formulate the larger national policy of an Imperial character, as we watch the gentlemen on the other side of the House amusing themselves after their peculiar manner. As we watch them, we will prepare the public mind of Canada to receive the broader ideas that will be forthcoming in the near future. When the hour arrives for Canada to move forward once more, she will have to turn to the party that has always been the progressive party of Canada; and we will give her a policy bold and well defined—a policy whose watchword will be Canada for the Canadians every time, which will hold the market of this country for our own people. What shall we say to England? Shall we say, as the right hon. gentleman did when he went over there: We have sacrificed ourselves at your feet, and we do not want anything in return? Not much; we will not say that. We will say to Mr. Chamberlain, who is in my judgment one of the brightest and cleverest men in public life anywhere on the globe to-day: What do you want to do with this empire? Do you want to build it strong in all its parts? You do not want to take our hearts out. No; you want our hearts; you want them to be kept loyal, because we never know when we may want to use them. We want to make Canada a great part of the empire. I know there are some gentlemen—supporters of the government—who do not like imperialism, and who are going through the province of Quebec attempting to scare the French Canadians at the results of imperialism. I say to the French Canadians, whether in this House or in the province of Quebec, are you not enjoying the greatest liberties that any Frenchman, either in France or in any other part of the world, are enjoying? And under what flag are you enjoying these great liberties? Under the British flag. Then let us fight for that flag. I have confidence in the sound sense of the French Canadians, and I do not believe that the three or four men to whom I have refered are going to shake the habitant from his good sense and clear sightedness. When he realizes that he is going to have a better price in the British market for his butter, his pork and his other products, under a commercial zollverein, nothing under the sun will induce me to believe that we shall not have behind us the French Canadians of the province of Quebec. I can understand that to-day, following the lead of the right hon. gentleman so faithfully as they have done, they are dazed. Why would they not be dazed? For twenty years they were taught the doctrine of free trade; for some years they were taught the doctrine of commercial union; other years it was unrestricted reciprocity; then they were led to give England a preference without getting anything in return. Do you suppose that the French Canadian people, who have followed the right hon. gentleman so sympathetically and so blindly, would not be dazed? I understand that at the moment I am speaking there are puzzling thoughts in their minds. But I have great faith in those people. They will realize that if Canada is to be great, it must be under an empire; if it is not under one empire, it must be under another; and I believe they will be as true and faithful under a flag which has given them so many blessings as the English speaking people of Canada are. I know that in the province of Quebec appeals have been made for many years to race prejudices and to nationalism. There has never been an election in the province of Quebec in which one side or the other has not been accused of making national speeches and appealing to national sentiments. Sir, we have to rear up in the province of Quebec men who are free from that sectionalism, and my belief is that we can do so by presenting to them broader and better ideas than those of provincialism or the narrowness of the confines of Canada, great as it is. But as a Canadian and a representative in this House, I fully realize the duty I have to perform. My salary is given to me as a member of the House of Commons of Canada, and in that capacity I have to bend all my energies to the accomplishment of that which is nearest to us, namely, the development of the country which we represent. Sir, in the resolution before us, I think more of the first part of it than I do of the last. I believe in a policy that will make Canada what we would like to see it become, a country worthy of the widest ambitions and thoughts of the great men who laid its foundations. And I trust that when the hour comes—it will not come to-night because I know that after the sympathetic appeal of the Minister of Customs we cannot expect a single vote from hon. gentlemen opposite—but the time is sure to come when public opinion will be found in our favour, and when that day comes we will formulate a policy for the government of Canada that will protect all interests in Canada, that will give Canadian markets to the Canadian people, be the duties we impose export or import, specific or ad valorem. That policy which we shall propound will be one which will carry out, only in a more extended degree, the objects aimed at by the policy which our political fathers adopted in 1878.

Mr. G. W. GANONG (Charlotte). At this late hour of the debate, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose taking up a great deal of time, and I assure you that I should not have ventured to address the House had I not believed that it was a duty I owed my constituents and the country as well. I believe that it is but just that I should give credit to the present government for the wonderful record of progress they have made in certain lines. Since this government has assumed office, it has assumed as well the functions of Divine Providence. Of that we have ample illustration in the speeches of the Ministers of Finance and Customs. My hon. friend from Halton (Mr. Henderson) wonders where the Minister of Customs can be. He is probably out giving Providence a few pointers. Or if not, he is praying that he may be forgiven, after the speech delivered by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), for if certainly anything can have the effect of converting that hon. gentleman, it will be that speech. These hon. gentlemen, since they have come into power, have not considered Providence at all. All our great crops were Grit crops; our increased productions of minerals were Grit minerals; the productions of our forests were Grit products. Well, they have indeed a lot on their hands, for the whole world is just in the position which Canada is enjoying, so that they must be running the rest of the world, including the great republic to the south, the United States.

But this is not the only point on which I wish to congratulate these hon. gentlemen. I am interested in trade matters, and I am always very much interested in seeing up-to-date methods in trade. In this country there was a certain line of trade which, up to within a few years ago, was done on two different principles. I refer to the clothing trade. One was the shoddy ready-made clothing, and the other clothing made to order, when a man went in and gave his measure. But in these late days, a new development has manifested itself, and we have now the fit-reform trade. Well, we had in 1896 what was termed the Reform party, but to-day we have a fit-reform government—nothing more, nothing less. Analyse the speeches delivered in this budget debate, and if they do not prove that we have to-day a fit-reform government, there never was a fit-reform business in this country.

The first principle laid down by these gentlemen is to be elected, no matter in what way or shape or form. First get your election, and as I listened to my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), whom I could not understand, unfortunately not being versed in the French tongue, I was wondering whether he was telling us anything about the election in Gaspé in 1896. I was wondering whether he told us what was represented to be correct—and I believe it is—that he is the only gentleman in the House of Commons of Canada whoever repudiated his own father. I wonder whether he told the House that his father had been sworn in as returning officer in his own district under a false name. I trow, Mr. Speaker, that he was careful not to say anything about that incident. We have also some hon. gentlemen in this House with records. What about the representative from the county of West Huron (Mr. Holmes)? No doubt he was told: Get elected and we have a fit-reform suit ready for you. We will fit you, and all you have to do is to get elected. We have also another gentleman who came here recently from the St. James division in Montreal (Mr. Brunet). It did not make much difference apparently how he got here. These hon. gentlemen opposite found a place for him, and you will no doubt find him voting to-night for this fit-reform government. Then there is the county of Victoria, N.B., where the worst fraud ever perpetrated on a community was perpetrated in the last election. I would not like to say that the hon. gentleman who sits in this House for that county to-day (Mr. Costigan) was conversant with all the facts, because I think he lived too long in a Tory administration to be guilty of what was done, but there are gentlemen in this House who could give you, Sir, a full account of all that took place. They could tell you that the day before the elections, the opposition candidate was bought off in order to obtain the hon. gentleman's election by acclamation in that county. No doubt he too will vote for this fit-reform government. They have a suit all ready for him. What about the representative from Nipissing (Mr. McCool)? The election in that county was a credit to the Liberal party, and you will find that hon. gentleman also with a fit-reform suit on voting with his party. Then there are West Queen's (Mr. Farquharson) and Westmoreland, N.B. (Mr. Emmerson). Why we had two would-be Ministers of Marine and Fisheries down there, and it is a surprising fact that when they got there they found another gentleman had the fit-reform suit on, a $7,000 suit. I really feel sorry for those two gentlemen. They have my sympathy, but they should have been honest and told the people that they never expected the portfolio, or else they should have held the government to its pledge and voted against it. The latter would have been the honourable part. I am sure that the hon. member for South Oxford (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) is another shining example. We have that hon. gentleman stating that he went back on all his principles for the sake of his party. It certainly is a great incentive to decency and honesty, when a gentleman who has occupied so high a position in the councils of his party, will make such a statement publicly, and when that statement was not only made by him but confirmed by his own leader.

You can look over the whole combination, and you will find it in just about the same position. Take the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). In the statement he made, he told us that he was in accord with the right hon. leader of the government when he went over to the United States to talk. He might just as well have told us that he had a commission from that gentleman. Shortly after that, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) rose to speak, and while he was speaking the hon. member for North Norfolk was over receiving the congratulations of the First Minister, the Minister of Finance and other members of the government. And the hon. member for Russell talked against protection. Why, I heard that hon. gentleman deliver one of the strongest protection speeches ever heard in this House—but it was to protect W. C. Edwards. When it was proposed to build a railway to his timber limits, he spoke strongly. What was his excuse? Why, it would set fire to the neighbouring country. But, what cares he if you burn a workingman's heart out with the worst fire, the fear of starvation? Such is their consistency. Then we have the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd). His suit is fit-reform, and fits him to a nicety. All he asks is that the suit should be made in Brantford. He did not get through before he besought the government to hitch his cheap wagon and the cheap horse of the hon. member for Assiniboia. Then there is the hon. member for West York (Mr. Campbell) who has been so silent. You will not hear anything from him to-night. He is a great protectionist, but he will vote just the same. Then there is a gentleman from whom you heard years ago, long before I came here. You will find his speeches occupying pages of 'Hansard'—ten thousand of them or more—the hon. member for Yarmouth (Mr. Flint). Prohibition! but when he got here the chief artist, the right hon. leader of the government brought him into line, fitted his little suit upon him and told him that prohibition would not do for the province of Quebec. And the hon. gentleman has voted with them ever since—just the same old fit-reform suit. Then we have the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison). He does not care much if only you will load up lead heavily enough. All he asks is 'protect my own little interests.' I have for years felt sorry for that hon. gentleman. He went out to look over the Yukon, and came back conscientiously determined to get up and make a speech—the hardest effort of his life—to justify the government's management of that country. And I believe that he has regretted it ever since. No doubt he will be here with his new suit on. I do not pretend to know what the country thinks, but I believe that the country will say of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) that they have had more buffoonery from him on questions requiring thought than from any other hon. gentleman on either side of the House. I believe that the right hon. gentleman who runs the circus over there knew just what class of suit to put on that hon. gentleman. He also has his fit-reform suit. And the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade)—where does he find himself? He tells us that it is not correct to say that every man in this House is a protectionist to some extent, that there are men on that side that are protectionists to a certain degree and others who wish to be free traders as far as they possibly can be. They have all kinds over there, but they have all walked into the fit-reform place and been fitted. Then you will all vote right when the time comes. Then, there is the hon. senior member for Cape Breton (Mr. Kendall). I believe that he has some little wish to be honest once in a while. He says that he defies us on this side to show whereby a protective tariff can help the fishermen of this country, or the fruit-growers, or the gold miners, the silver or the lead miners. He does not agree with the hon. member for New Westminster. And, a little further on he says he accepts it as a tentative measure, and only for the present, when we find it difficult to keep our population at home and find it necessary in order to keep some of our manufactures going. He is honest. He says that it is necessary to keep the manufactures going in order to keep our people at home. Then I believe, we have an hon. gentleman in the House who has stated that the government could not change its policy faster than he could. We have not heard from that hon. gentleman, the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). I am afraid we shall not see our hon. friend, the minister who will have the making of these fit-reform suits next year. I believe that that duty is to be delegated to the Minister of Public Works (Hon.

Mr. Tarte). He is not here, we are not to have an opportunity of seeing him vote to-night. He probably would have voted with the opposition if he had been present. Outside of these I have mentioned, there are three types left on the other side of the House. In the opinion of the public, the fit-reform suits of some of the ministers are getting very baggy with the rake-off. I would not like to say they are, but it is easy to see, when you read the papers that there are suggestions coming from all quarters, even from good Liberal newspapers, that these trousers are getting very baggy with the rake-off. Then there is the class represented by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Maclaren). He does not want to do any thinking for himself, but is willing to let Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. Fielding think for him. There are quite a number who will vote on the opinions of others. Then, you have a much larger class typified by the hon. memeer for Stanstead (Mr. Lovell) who is wearing a fifty-three-thousand-dollar fit-reform suit. And this is the kind of mixture you have to run a government that is supposed to be in the best interests of the country. I would suggest that the right hon. gentleman put a sign up over the door 'Great Fit-Reform Government.' It is a shame to disgrace the Reform party any longer. Let you people take your proper title. And I am sure that when the respected leader of the government—for I am sure that we have all respect and regard for him—we hope when he goes to the other side of the water, as he is to do in the near future, he will take back the Cobden medal, and also that some of his good friends will furnish him with a banner bearing a legend to the effect that he is the leader of the greatest aggregation ever known in the world—the leader of the only fit-reform party the world has ever known. I think, that under these conditions, it is high time that some party had a declared policy, and so I shall be very glad indeed to support the resolution of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

Amendment (Mr. Borden, Halifax) negatived; main motion agreed to and House went into committee of Ways and Means.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). I do not imagine that at this hour the committee will desire to proceed with any business, I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at 3.15 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 9, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

RAILWAY COMMISSION.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 104) to revise and consolidate the law respecting railways. He said: In introducing this Bill, of which I have given notice, I shall have to ask the attention of the House while I endeavour to give a brief explanation of its general character. The object is to establish a railway commission in Canada. It is not my purpose at this stage to enter into any elaborate argument to convince the House that the principle of the measure is one which ought to receive the assent of parliament, because I feel warranted in assuming, from the very general expressions of opinion which, for the last three or four years, have been made by hon. members on both sides, that this branch of parliament is disposed to look with favour upon the establishment of a railway commission in Canada, and I think it may be fairly taken for granted that there is throughout Canada, especially in the province of Ontario and the western country, a very strong opinion indeed in the same direction. It may be said that there is not the same acute interest taken in the general question of a railway commission in the province of Quebec or in the maritime provinces, although I should be very loth to say that there might not be found also a strong feeling there. That feeling, however, has not found expression to the same extent. The newspaper press has not declared itself in the same pronounced manner in these provinces as it has in Ontario and the western portion of the Dominion.

There is also another reason which occurs to me why it is not needful that I should at this stage urge upon the House that the principle of the measure is one we ought to adopt. I take it that a study of the two very able reports made by Prof. Maclean, which have been generally distributed, must have tended to throw a flood of light on the question and have drawn the minds of hon. members, to a greater extent even than formerly, to the consideration of the principle of this Bill.

I would like to say, with reference to that report, that very much credit indeed devolves on the gentleman who made it. It would be difficult for any one to have approached the question with a more impartial mind and to have discussed it more judiciously, thoughtfully and exhaustively than it has been by Mr. Maclean. He does not appear to have been imbued with any determination to reach any particular results, but to have studied the whole question with a calm and judicial mind, and I believe that gentlemen who have studied his two reports will agree with me that he has presented his views in a moderate and modest manner and given only what conclusions he felt justified in reaching by reason of the facts of the case generally.

It will be my purpose, therefore, in the brief observations I may make on this Bill, to confine myself almost entirely to as clear an explanation as I can give of the general provisions of the measure. I shall not go into the various sections minutely, but shall endeavour to present to the House the general form in which the government has felt that it could properly present this measure, leaving—I think properly—the discussion of the details of the working out of the principle to a later period. One of the things that must naturally suggest itself to the mind of a person who has ever engaged in the preparation of a measure of this kind is that it is not always safe to be guided by the experience, or even by the action, of states and governments outside our own. The conditions which exist in Canada are very exceptional indeed. As our territory extends from one ocean to the other, our country must give rise, from a railroad point of view, to difficulties and must suggest problems which do not appear to the same extent in other countries. Another point of difficulty is that, as compared with other countries, our territory is sparsely settled. You have not the same body of population as you have in the United States to give local support to trans-continental lines. The object, therefore, of those who have to do with the operation of our great railway lines crossing the continent must be to realize the best results possible from their through traffic, as they cannot rely with confident expectation upon a sufficiency of local traffic for the railway. Then, of necessity, the enormous distance over which the produce of the west must be carried by rail before it can come into competition with the products of countries more favoured in that regard creates, no doubt, and 'naturally creates,' grievances and complaints among people who are not able, in their own individual cases, or in the case of their own class or section, to realize the effect upon the operation of the railway or the difficulties of the situation. Therefore, complaints against the railways, or against their rates or the manner in which they are operated, though they may be general are not necessarily well founded; and, having regard to the proper principle which should govern rates upon these lines, cannot necessarily be fully satisfied. I have in mind this leading fact—that the people of the western country regard the present condition of affairs as unsatisfactory because, they say, the rates which they must pay upon their products which seek a foreign market are more onerous than the traffic can properly bear, as they must compete in the open market with those whose products are carried at a less cost and can therefore be sold with a profit at lower prices, or at the same prices with a better profit. The people of the west feel that there must be something necessarily wrong in a system which subjects them to such burdens, and which cannot afford them what they regard as adequate protection. I am not going to say that there are not reasonable grounds for complaint—I am not going to deal with that point. It is proposed in this Bill that that question shall be dealt with by an independent, and we trust a competent tribunal. I only remark upon the point now for the purpose of directing the attention of the House to the fact that it does not follow, because there are complaints, that those complaints are capable of adequate relief. The long distances the products of the west have to be carried, the fact that the railways have to depend practically upon one-way traffic to the eastern seaboard, very little going westward except the supplies demanded by the producers—these things give rise to practical difficulties in railway experience and should be given reasonable consideration at the hands of parliament or of whoever is administering this law when it has been placed upon the statute-book. I think we may fairly keep in view the fact that the questions which will arise under such conditions are questions which can not be arbitrarily disposed of by specific action, but we must invest the men whom we may select and charge with the responsibility of carrying out the law with discretion as to how and to what extent the remedy can and ought to be applied. I do not wish, that, because this Bill is being introduced and because, as I imagine, it will ultimately find its way into the body of our laws, it should be thought that the government are under any misconception as to the results which may be expected to flow from it. I do not wish to encourage expectations on the part of the people at large that we are devising a scheme by which ideal results can be achieved and every grievance of a substantial character can be removed—a scheme whereby the disadvantages of distance, climatic conditions and of one-way traffic will be annihilated, a scheme whereby we can do all that people call upon us to in the premises. I say this in order that we may put ourselves fairly before parliament and the country. At the same time, while I give expression to this idea, I do not imagine that it will be found impossible with the proper working of the Bill that we are submitting for the consideration of parliament, that very large beneficial results will follow.

As I have remarked already, we see in the newspaper press of Ontario most widespread dissatisfaction with the administration of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council and strong and repeated calls upon parliament to pass a Bill which shall create a railway commission. The conditions which exist in Ontario are conditions which create naturally, and I had almost said necessarily, difficulties in the management and the operations of railways. We are so situated that the great railways which are traversing a large portion of the province of Ontario are looking for traffic from the United States at one end to be carried through Canada and deposited in the United States at the other end. In doing that they have to enter into active and keen competition with the railways which traverse wholly United States territory, and in that competition they are obliged to make such rates as will enable them to secure a portion of that business. Now these prevailing conditions of our railways in Canada give rise to this difficulty, that people who have the same classes of freights, are producing the same kind of goods and are desirous of reaching the same foreign markets, find that for the carriage of their products from points at a distance perhaps one-half or even less than the distance over which they have to pass when they traverse Canada from a point in the United States to another point in the United States, they are obliged to pay larger proportionate rates than those Canadian producers who are utilizing Canadian railways and whose products are seeking the same markets; and they draw the inference that there must be some defect in a system which permits Canadian railways to carry those products from United States territory into another point of United States territory at a less cost per ton or per mile than it costs Canadian producers to carry goods to the same points. Naturally, therefore, they complain, and they complain loudly, and they are looking forward to the establishment of a railway commission in the expectation that it will tend to relieve them, to some extent at least, of this burden which they regard as onerous and unfair. You will see in this fact a sufficient reason, I think, to justify the opinion which prevails so largely in the province of Ontario as to the necessity of a railway commission. I expect that a commission of this character will afford a considerable measure of relief to people who are complaining in this way, though I fear it will not relieve them to the extent which they expect.

Now, having by way of preliminary, outlined the object, let us turn to the Bill. The Bill is largely framed for the purpose of constituting and putting into operation a railway commission. It also makes provisions with regard to a great many other matters. While it is a Bill to create a railway commission, it is at the same time a complete revision and codification of the existing railway law passed in 1888, and of all the amendments which have since been made. We thought that it was no use taking the subject up at all unless we presented in one single measure all the provisions of a general character which relate to the construction, the maintenance, and operation of our railways. There was need for a considerable revision of the existing law, not in particulars of great moment, but in many minor particulars which would contribute to the convenience of the board in carrying out the work of the commission, and aid them more efficiently to enforce the regulations, and which would be at the same time explanatory of certain provisions in the existing law about which there may be doubt. We have, therefore, had this whole law carefully revised and consolidated, and although the creation of a railway commission is the chief object, this and other points have been taken up and dealt with at the same time. I think I may properly describe the Bill which is now submitted as a bona fide and earnest endeavour to create a railway commission with such powers and furnished with such jurisdiction as will afford the fullest possible opportunity of working out this question to a successful issue. We have had before us the experience of other countries, we have had before us the experience of England and of the various states of the union, as well as of the inter-State Commerce Law of the United States. These have been studied and their defects have been examined. The difficulties in enforcing their laws have been ascertained, and so far as it was possible in our judgment we have made better provisions for successfully operating a railway commission.

With the enactment of this Bill, therefore, and I may say as a consequence of it, the present Railway Committee of the Privy Council passes away. It was not thought desirable that we should retain the Railway Committee to exercise any of the powers which it now exercises. There are some directions in which I think one who has acted upon that committee for some years might fairly say that the committee has done efficient work. I am not going to say that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is an ideal tribunal. I think it would be impossible for any tribunal whose members are charged with all the duties and responsibilities of Ministers of the Crown, to do the work which devolves upon the Railway Committee in a thoroughly efficient manner. Still there are some branches of the duties heretofore imposed upon that committee which I claim they have most efficiently discharged. I think there has been, and there will be, no grave complaints made against the efficiency of the Railway Committee unless it be in respect of the regulation and control of freight rates upon railways. Outside of that subject, I think the Railway Committee has discharged its functions efficiently, and in saying this I refer to the Railway Committee as it has existed at any time in the past as well as to-day. For myself I would not be disposed to listen to any reason for the abolition of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council did I not recognize, and did we not all recognize, that that committee has not the time, nor the opportunity, nor the facilities for taking up minute questions respecting the control and regulation of traffic upon railways, and the rates and tolls to be charged by them; this is work that could be done more efficiently by a tribunal specially constituted for that purpose.

Now we propose to transfer to the board which constitutes the railway commission all the powers which are now possessed by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and as I shall point out to you, we are extending and enlarging these powers. As far as we have been able to gather from the experience of other railway courts of commission we have felt that there were defects which it would be possible to remedy and by extending and enlarging the powers of the railway commission over those which have been hitherto or elsewhere constituted we have thought that we have made a judicious move in the direction of improvement and greater efficiency. We have, therefore, given them all the powers hitherto possessed by the Railway Committee, and added to those powers. We have introduced, it will be found, no doubt, entirely new provisions, and some perhaps which may be regarded by some hon. gentlemen as extremely radical. Some of these provisions we will examine a little later on. The chief features of this Bill then are the constitution of a railway commission and the regulation of tolls. These are the two main and capital features of the measure. As to the board of railway commission, we have defined what the constitution shall be and we have in this Bill defined the number of the commisioners, we have defined the tenure of office, we have declared under what conditions changes may take place and we have introduced other necessary provisions of that character, but, we have done so, I want to say now, with this intention in our minds: We have reached the best conclusion which we have been able to reach as to the constitution of the board and as to the other features which I have just mentioned, but, the main principle being maintained, we are not at all deceiving ourselves with the idea that we have exhausted all the wisdom in the particular detailed provisions that we make in respect to these matters and we will be quite prepared in a spirit of fairness and liberality to listen, to weigh and to judge any suggestions which may be made to us from either side of the House. We have thought it necessary, in constituting a commission of this kind, that it should be so constituted as that we will be able to secure the very best material which our country affords for this purpose. We feel that we ought to afford the widest possible opportunity within it to make the choice, because, Mr. Speaker, as this question impresses itself upon my mind, the character, the capacity, the wisdom and the selection of the men is everything. Unless this country can afford us men of the right stamp, men of independence of character, of firmness and of fairness, men who have experience in business, experience in railway operation, experience in law, unless the country can afford us these conditions, then, we cannot look with any reasonable hope to find that the operation of the commision will be successful. We have, therefore, to give to these men such a tenure as will invite the men that we want to come and take their seats upon this board. We have to give them a tenure long enough to induce them to give up any business in which they may be engaged and which may be profitable. Then, we have to pay them well. We have to give them a long enough tenure and we have to pay them reasonably well, because, if we do not do both of these things we cannot with confidence hope to secure men of the capacity and of the calibre that we require. Further, we propose that the board shall consist of three members. Perhaps, in the opinion of some hon. gentlemen, that will not be enough. That is a question that we are not unwilling to consider, but it appears to us that three members of the commission, rightly selected and chosen are enough to dispose of the questions which will come before the commission, and to do it efficiently. We propose that the term of office of the three commissioners will be ten years, with eligibility to be reappointed, and that no member of the commission may be removed except upon an address of both Houses of parliament. We have not, in the Bill which will be laid on the Table, filled the blanks as to the age limit. We have not filled the blanks as to the salaries which will be attached, but it appears to us reasonable that with the commission constituted, the chairman, upon whom will devolve, I suppose, naturally, a somewhat heavier responsibility than that which will fall to other members, such as the responsibility which devolves upon judges and so forth, should be allowed an additional salary beyond that which we will allow to the other two members of the board. We have not filled the blanks, however, in regard to the age limit or to the amount of the salary.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the qualifications of the men, the personnel?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We have not defined the qualifications of the men. I was going on to say that in our minds, and it is proper that I should state it, because I am speaking with the authority of the government, and therefore what is said as respects the selection of the men for this purpose would be as binding as if it were contained in the statute, at all events, as it affects our appointments, that there ought to be on that commission one person having a somewhat lengthened experience in law, a man who would be qualified to fill a position on the bench. We have thought that if we could get a man who has had some railway experience, some experience as to railway legislation and railway operation, and as to questions arising in connection with railway controversies, so much the better. If such a man can be found, we ought to find him and he ought to be appointed. We think we ought to have a railway man also, and when I say a railway man I mean one who has not only been trained in railway work in all its branches, but one who would have considerable knowledge in reference to matters of transportation, traffic arrangements, freight rates and questions of that kind. We have thought that the third member of the commission should be selected from the general community, a man having some business experience in reference to transportation. I do not care to what particular class of business he may belong. I do not say that such a man need necessarily have been in merchantile life, that he need necessarily have been a manufacturer, or a large producer, a farmer for instance, who has had large business with railways, but I would leave it open so that any one of that character, in any of these classes, who was found or believed to possess the necessary qualifications, might be chosen as a member of the commission. The powers conferred upon the board, I think I have already sufficiently indicated, and that I need not weary the House at greater length upon that point, further than to say this: That we have made some material changes in the existing law in a direction which we believe will commend them to all who have had anything to do with railway business and railway controversy. We are proposing that the railway commission shall have power finally to determine all questions of fact subject only to an appeal to the Governor General in Council. We do not believe that it would be expedient that this tribunal should have its decision on questions of fact subject to any revision by the courts, and for several reasons. In the first place, surely three gentlemen of the standing and character that I have named ought to be as competent as any tribunal you could set up to determine what the facts are in any given case which may come before them. If you grant an appeal, you allow a tribunal which has not heard the witnesses, and which has not special training and experience to determine upon the matter and to sit in judgment upon the findings of this specially qualified commission. I do not think that is expedient. Moreover, we hope that this measure will have the effect of very materially restricting litigation, which has been found to be a serious menace to the successful operation of the railway commission in the United States. Any one who has read the report of Mr. McLean will recollect his statement that taking the years in which railway commissions have been in operation in the United States, there has been an average of four years between the time when litigation is commenced and when it has terminated. We think it is desirable; indeed we think it imperative on us to prevent the possibility of persons who feel they may have grievances against railways not being able to have their cases determined within a reasonable time. We have therefore asked parliament to say that the decision of this tribunal shall be final, subject only to revision by the Privy Council, and that there shall be an appeal to no other tribunal.

We propose in this Bill to give the power to the railway commission to control the rates. Under the present law the Privy Council fixes the maxima and minima rates—very seldom of course fixing minima rates but there are cases. Any variation which the railway company wishes to make within the maximum rate, they have it in their power at present to make that variation. We have provided here a new way by which we think that we will afford the fullest measure of protection to the persons who are using the railway and to the railway itself. We propose to divide the traffic upon the railway into three distinct classes. First, there is the ordinary traffic; second there is the commodity traffic; and next there is the competitive traffic. With respect to the ordinary traffic which I think will be the largest portion of the traffic, we propose to confer upon the railway commission the power to fix or sanction what rates shall be charged. We propose to say that upon a schedule of tariff for ordinary traffic being submitted by the railway company to the board, the board may say that that rate shall be charged and that no higher rate or no lower rate shall be charged—except under conditions which are subsequently provided for. The railway commission will fix and control the rate for the ordinary traffic which embraces everything that is not specially regarded as competitive, and which is not specially included in the commodity traffic. What the commodity class means is this: The board may authorize certain classes of merchandise to be taken out of the ordinary traffic class and put in a special class to be called the commodity class; or, having once put a certain article in the commodity class it may retransfer it to the ordinary class. As to the commodity class the board declares what shall be the maxima and minima rates and it is only with respect to the commodity class that that varying rate is permissive.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What constitutes the commodity class?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. All classes of goods which at the request of the shipper or at the request of the railway company, the board may think it desirable to take out of the ordinary class which is at a fixed rate of freight, and transfer to this commodity class. This commodity class is very well known in the operation of railways. We have decided that as to the control the board may exercise over this commodity traffic, it would be well that it should have the power to fix a maximum or minimum rate and between these the railway company may make its choice. When the company does make its choice, then while the schedule is in force it must publish that schedule in the fullest possible manner; post it in the offices and otherwise bring it to the knowledge of the public so that every one may know what the commodity rate is.

The competitive class is a class which it will be seen at once arises in connection with business to which no regular tariff can possibly be made to apply. We have got to recognize that the conditions are constantly varying and altering; new competitors are coming into the field, and a railway company cannot possibly be held strictly and rigidly to any particular rate when it is confronted with a keen and vigorous competitor. As to competitive business, all laws recognize that there can be no arbitrary hard and fast rule laid down.

We are proposing to do in this regard what can only be done if you are to establish a working system at all, that is, to vest in the commission in whom we would be presumed to have confidence, the discretion of fixing the rate to be allowed to be charged by a railway in respect to its competitive business. The competition arises immediately in our own country, and also from outside in many cases. It may arise from railroads of from any other kind of transportation; but the competition existing and being made known to the commission, it becomes the duty and the power of the commission to say what rate may be made; and, in order that there may be no improper restraint upon the operating of the railways and the arranging of their rates, in order that the business may not be blocked, we have a clause which allows the railway company, when it is applied to for a competitive rate, to give it without consultation with the board; but it immediately notifies the board of the rate fixed, and, if, the board approves of it, it remains the rate as respects competitive business on that class of goods until some other conditions arise. We have endeavoured to provide in the Bill against any unnecessary hampering of the operations of the railroads, and to afford them every means of meeting urgent, pressing demands, as they may arise.

We are proposing to impose somewhat heavy penalties on the railroads in case they violate the provisions of this law. In order that the public may be kept fully informed of the tariffs that are in operation, we impose a penalty on any railway company which does not see that every station is supplied with adequate notices of what these rates are.

The classification of freight traffic is another subject. At present all freight classification is practically determined by the Governor in Council. The railways now meet in their associations for the purpose of determining business. They agree among themselves upon what they call a joint freight classification, which is applicable to all the railways unless some are specially excepted; and under the existing law the Governor in Council may confirm or may refuse confirmation of this classification, and changes may have to be made to meet the views of the government. We propose to transfer that power from the Governor in Council to the railway commission.

We have made provisions which we trust and believe will be found useful in respect to foreign traffic, as to which a great many complicated questions arise. We have vested a very large discretion, I may say full discretion, in the commission, as respects the regulation of both traffic from foreign countries into and through Canada, and traffic from Canada into foreign countries. We have provisions which, if enforced, will compel railway companies which have connections with lines running into other countries, to make proper and regular arrangements with those lines, so that there may be some uniformity and equity in the rates imposed on that portion of the traffic which may be Canadian and on that portion which may be carried through Canadian territory.

We have thought a good deal on the question of the long and the short haul, a question which is fruitful of complaint and a very difficult one to solve. The provision which we have made covering that intricate and complicated problem is to leave the railway commission to deal with each case as it arises, save and except that we forbid the imposition of higher rates for the shorter distance as compared with the longer distance when the shorter is included in the longer; and we only except from the general operation of that clause those instances in which it has been made to appear—

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Does that apply to foreign traffic?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The long and the short haul question arises more especially in our own country.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. It arises principally in competition with foreign traffic. Suppose there is a shorter distance within our own territory as compared with the foreign traffic, would you apply the rule then?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We cannot apply exactly the same rule, because we do not control the whole traffic. I have already stated that as respects traffic to and from foreign countries, we have given the board powers which, if they are exercised, would be found, I think, to ensure equitable rates and equitable connections between railroads that are carrying our produce and connecting with outside roads and roads carrrying into the country and connecting with inside roads. But in respect to the long and the short haul generally, we control all lines in our own country, and it is only there that we can legislate in respect to these matters.

Mr. BARKER. Will this commission cover lake, canal and river navigation as well?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, we have clauses which embrace water communication. I think I have pretty well covered the important features of the Bill. I have gone into these matters perhaps at undue length. I have not done so with a view of having a discussion upon the measure now. I know that such a discussion could not conveniently take place. The Bill will be in the hands of hon. members as speedily as it can possibly be supplied, and I hope at an early day to be able to move it to a second reading.

Mr. INGRAM. Is it the intention to have this railway commission control or manage the government railways of Canada ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It does not embrace the management of the Canadian government railways.

Mr. INGRAM. That is to say, it would have no more to do with the government railways than with any other railway in the Dominion ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Nothing more.

Mr. INGRAM. Another question I would like to ask the hon. gentleman. Is it proposed that the classification of freights shall be in the hands of the commission, and that the railway associations which have heretofore classified the rates and the grades of freight subject to the approval of the Governor in Council shall not continue to do so without the approval of the commission ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They do not classify the rates. They simply classify the freights.

Mr. INGRAM. And they state what the rates shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. What I want to know is whether it is the intention that the commission shall classify these rates and compel the railway companies to adopt them ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It is contemplated that the railway companies will continue, as they have done in the past, to submit their classifications for approval, but instead of submitting them for the approval of the Governor in Council they will submit them for the approval of the railway board.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the commission have any control over the freight rates on the government railways ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not heard any complaints of the freight rates on government railways, except by some gentlemen who think they are too low. The commission will have the general powers vested in the Railway Committee, but in a larger degree.

Mr. SPROULE. Will these powers apply to government railways as well as those controlled by private companies ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not stated specifically in the Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If they are to have any application whatever to government railways, it seems to me that that ought to be specially mentioned. The ordinary principles of construction would lead to the conclusion, that, unless specially mentioned, they would not be included. If the hon. minister thinks that there have been no complaints with regard to the rates on government railways, I can assure him he is mistaken.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not heard of any.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) I know that it was broadly asserted in Nova Scotia, a year and a half or two years ago, that the rate on freight from Montreal to Sydney was lower than the rate from Halifax to Sydney. I do not know whether that was the case or not, but I know that it was complained of. What we desire to know is whether complaints of that kind regarding the Intercolonial Railway will be dealt with by this railway commission, or whether its jurisdiction is to be restricted to railways owned by private corporations. The provisions of the Bill should be made perfectly plain.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The government railways are not specially mentioned in the Bill, nor are they specifically mentioned in the law constituting the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. But the government railways have always deferred to the tariff schedules adopted by the Governor in Council. There never has been any question raised as regards the jurisdiction of the Governor in Council in the matter. I think that the hon. member is correct in saying that complaints have been made that the rates have been too low on the Intercolonial Railway, but I have not heard any complaints, which we would regard seriously, that our rates are too high.

Hon. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). We would like to know distinctly if the hon. gentleman proposes to give this commission the same control over the government railways as he does over all others ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am leaving that question just exactly where it is now. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council have control over railways generally, and the same conditions which exist now will exist under this Bill. If, as a matter of absolute law, the Railway Committee of the Privy Council has jurisdiction over the government railways, the railway commission will have like jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. That does not answer the question. The hon. minister has told us that he is going to give this commission new and extensive powers, and I ask him whether or not he proposes to give it the same power over government railways that he does over other railways, or does he propose to let the government manage their railways without reference to the railway commission, unless they please to let that commission say something about them?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not proposed making any specific provision at all with reference to government railways. At the same time, when we get into committee on the Bill, we might fairly discuss that point.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he is going to do away with what is called the classification of rates ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the hon. gentleman propose to follow the principle adopted by the commission in the United States, and compel the railway companies to hang up a schedule of their freight rates in all their railway stations and compel the government railways to do the same ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We compel all the railway companies to do that and impose penalties when they do not, and we are giving the railway board power to enforce all orders and regulations which they deem necessary to prevent any infraction or evasion of the law.

Mr. E. B. OSLER (West Toronto). Must the government freight rate schedules be hung up in the Intercolonial Railway station so that the public may know what rates they are paying ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No doubt the schedules of rates are hung up in the Intercolonial Railway stations, and we are not making any change in that respect. I have seen them hung up myself.

Mr. OSLER. The question is, does the government intend, when this commission is appointed, to enforce the same rule in connection with government railways as they do in connection with private railways, namely, to see that at every station the rates are hung up, whether they be hung up now or not ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have said that I am not making any special provisions regarding government railways at all, but I am leaving the matter in that respect exactly as it is to-day under the present Railway Committee.

Mr. OSLER. That does not answer the question in any shape or form, I want to know whether in the future this will be done ? I should judge from his answer that it will not.

Mr. SAMUEL BARKER (Hamilton). I understand the hon. minister to propose to leave the government railways outside the powers of this commission. I cannot understand his language in any other way, and we should be quite clear on that point. I would also ask him whether this commission will have power, in any way, to deal with vessel rates ? For example a railway may make a through rate, partly on rail and partly on vessel and again on rail. Will the commission have power to deal with such questions as that ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It will have the fullest possible powers we can give it, and if the hon. gentleman finds that these powers are not as complete as they ought to be, I would gladly consider any suggestion coming from him.

Mr. BARKER. It may be important that we should have this information early, because there are many interests involved. There are vessels that are owned in Canada by companies that run in connection with railways, there are vessels owned by railways; and I think it would be important to know whether the hon. gentleman proposes to treat these vessel owners practically as railway companies. I also understood the hon. gentleman to say that he does not intend that the government railway shall be subject to the orders of this commission, but that the government railway shall remain as it is to-day, subject only to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. If I am wrong in that——

Mr. SPROULE. I think he said that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council was to be done away with.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Barker) will find, when the Bill is put in his hands, that there is a section or a portion of a section—somewhere between section 275 and section 280, I think—which specifically deals with the class of traffic to which he refers—traffic which is part water and part railway, or railway at the two ends and water in the middle.

Mr. F. B. WADE (Annapolis). I desire to ask a question with regard to a point which may be found important. As I understand it, this Bill proposes to abolish the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. It might be important to the interests of the government that certain provisions of the Railway Act—that is, certain powers of that committee—should be conferred upon the proposed Board, so as to enable it to deal with the government railways. I refer particularly to the matter of through rating, and of facilities. It might be desirable that this commission should have compulsory powers in matters of through rating and granting of facilities in connection with and in the interest of the government railways. I would ask the minister if, in the discussion of the Bill at a later stage, he is prepared to consider a matter of that sort, so that the House may be entirely free to discuss this phase of the matter, which may prove very important ?

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). I do not intend to discuss this Bill at this stage. I am afraid that some utterances of mine in this House may be found on record in favour of a railway commission. But they are utterances of long ago. At present I have a leaning in the same direction as the Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair), believing that the proper power to regulate these things, after all, is the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, a body that is more directly responsible to parliament, and not a commission appointed as a judge is or as the Auditor General is, and not subject to our correction or revision, not subject, above all, to our removal. As I understand it, the powers the hon. minister attempts to give to this commission include the power to fix tolls, and not only the fixing of the tolls submitted to them by a company for their approval, but the power of saying to a railway company : You shall charge no other rate than the rate we think is the right one. They are to have the fixing of the tolls for the traffic of all the railways throughout the Dominion. I suppose that when the power is given to that commission of fixing maximum and minimum rates, they shall be rates that shall apply equally, pari passu, to every railway in the Dominion, that they shall not have the right to say to one company : You shall charge such and such tolls and to another : You shall charge such and such tolls, but that there shall be a maximum and a minimum for distance, with the consideration which the minister proposes that there shall be this one class of freight and another that he calls commodity freight and another which he calls international or competitive. And I suppose that these rates, the maximum and the minimum, once fixed, shall be applied to all the railroads throughout the Dominion.

An hon. MEMBER. Government railways, too.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. As I understand the minister, he does not intend it to apply to government railways, but it is only applicable to other railways throughout the Dominion. I have not looked into the Bill, do not know its scope, but, to my mind, if that is the scope he proposes it to have, the Bill is a very dangerous one. It may interfere seriously with private rights; it may interfere with contracts which, at present exist between different railways and the government of Canada. It is true, we have the power of eminent domain in this parliament as much as they have in the Imperial parliament, and can exercise it as we please. But that right should never be exercised or be attempted to be exercised when it interferes with a contract solemnly entered into between the people of Canada and the different railways. I venture to say that a power of that kind given to a commission to fix rates absolutely at their own volition is a power which will interfere seriously with several such contracts which now exist. I shall not discuss the question fully, but shall look into this measure. But, generally, my predilection in these matters is the same as that of the minister. The hon. gentleman says that this Bill has been virtually urged upon him by petitions from the people of Ontario and the North-west, and that he doubts very much if the results which they anticipate will flow from the Act. I have no doubt whatever that those results will not flow from the Act. I am a firm believer in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and would prefer that, even as it is now constituted, to a commission. I think every considerable element in the country have confidence in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, aside from all questions of which government may be in power, believing that both the interests of the railways and the interests of the public will be guarded and that justice will be faithfully administered. There is also the fact that I have just stated—that they are amenable to parliament and the people. But, this commission will be entirely independent of parliament, and I do not believe in constituting such a tribunal. I believe in not binding the future parliaments of Canada. I believe that future parliaments should be left with absolute power, as we have, and that we should not impose upon them a tribunal which they cannot alter or remove at any time. I do not believe in these officers being permanent officers receiving large salaries and not removable. That is the primary objection I have to the Bill. It has not been shown that this commission is a necessity in this country. I think the present tribunal which steps in between the railways and individuals in reference to freight, is a good one. If the Minister of Railways and Canals had a branch attached to his department specially for the purpose of looking into freight rates and correcting anomalies such as he mentions, it might be an advantage and assistance to the department. The minister states that another part of the Bill codifies the laws at present in force in order to simplify them, but without making any material change. The only real change, he says, the establishment of this commission, is called for by public opinion in Ontario and the North-west ; he does not say that in Quebec and the lower provinces there is any growing sentiment in favour of this commission. He hardly boasts of being the parent of the Bill he introduces. It is evidently as he says, a Bill forced on him by public opinion, and one to which he does not give a very hearty sanction. I agree with him that there is not at present sufficient public opinion urging such a radical change as giving over the control of railways to a commission. As I understand him, this commission has larger powers than any other commission in the world. It has absolute power on every railroad in this country of fixing the maximum and minimum rates. If the law, or an Order in Council, fixed the maximum and minimum rates, and the regulation of the tolls within those extremes were left to a commission, it would be all right ; but to give to three or four men in this country the power of holding up every railroad in the country, without keeping them under parliamentary control, is a very serious matter. As I understand the minister, this commission are to have full jurisdiction over every question left to them, the only appeal is to the Governor in Council. Surely if the commission infringe upon any law of the country they ought to be subject to the courts of the land. I think they would be subject to the courts, notwithstanding this Bill, if the commission assumed to interpret a law, or if they did any act contrary to the law of the land ; I think then the court would step in and declare what the law actually is. However, it is an extraordinary power to give them. I suppose they have power to decide every question of fact. I do not know whether this Bill could remove that power from the courts altogether, I think the courts would decide whether the commission could exercise that jurisdiction. But so far as possible it is made a final court of appeal. It may be necessary in certain cases that it should be a court of final appeal. As I said before, I do not intend to discuss the Bill fully until I have seen all its provisions. But as far as I have heard the Minister of Railways and Canals, he has not yet offered any sufficient justification for the introduction of the measure which he proposes.

Mr. A. E. KEMP (East Toronto). Without seeing the Bill, of course I cannot say very much about it at present. I would like to ask the minister if I understood him right when he said there were two reports of Prof. McLean, and if so, are they both included in this pamphlet.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes.

Mr. KEMP. I think the minister ought to make up his mind that so far as the regulation of tolls is concerned upon government railways, they ought to come within the scope of this commission, if it is created. So far as the general management of government railways is concerned, I do not think that would be a reasonable proposition ; but government railways are in competition with other railways, and if the rates of these other railways are regulated by the commission, it is only fair that the rates made by officers of the government railways should be under the same control. I think the Bill would be very defective, and would not appeal to the sense of this House, if such an exception were made. I have heard a good deal of discussion in regard to the creation of a railway commission, and I have at times taken part in such discussion. I have never consented, in any observations that I have made, to the appointment of a railway commission, although perhaps a railway commission, organized under certain conditions, might be of great benefit. It would depend altogether on the constitution of the commission, and upon the powers delegated to it. The hon. minister, in describing the constitution of the commission, as I understood him, said that it would be composed first of all of a gentleman versed in the law, another member would be a railway man, and in regard to the third appointment it seemed to me that the hon. minister was a little vague. It appears that the agitation which has brought this Bill into existence has come from the public and not from the railways. I take it that the railways have not pressed upon the minister the establishment of a commission such as he has outlined. Now, I consider that the most important appointment upon that commission would be a business man, a shipper, a man who has had large experience in dealing with railways from a shipper's standpoint. As I said before, the composition of this commission is a very important matter, it needs to be composed of strong men mentally, intelligent men, men with broad views, and men who will be able to face, in the discussion of railway rates, some of the most difficult problems that have to be faced in commercial life. I confess that at this stage it is impossible for me to give my consent to this Bill, and later on I shall have more to say about it. I would like, however, to inquire from the minister what provision he has made for the public being heard before this commission. So far as the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is concerned, I understand the greatest complaint of the public has been that they have not had an opportunity of being represented at the meetings of the railway committee, to make their interests heard and to see that such interests are considered. I think the Bill should have some provision in it by which the public may be represented in some manner.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It has. I may say moreover, that there is a provision that the commission may be migratory in its sittings, they may go wherever necessity may arise.

Mr. KEMP. It would be a very serious thing, if the members constituting this commission, being independent of parliament, should be able, as they might, as the hon. member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) has said, to actually hold up our railways. But there is another side to this question. At present while the only controlling power over railways is the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, it is quite possible for the railways to hold up the public ; and I have no hesitation in saying that the public can give very good evidence that they have in many cases been held up. I do not care, Mr. Speaker, to make any further remarks upon this subject now, but I will reserve my further remarks until the Bill is printed.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, I think it would be better to allow the minister to introduce his Bill and then we will have an opportunity of reading the Bill and finding out exactly what it contains so that we may be able to discuss it intelligently afterwards. We are only wasting time.

Mr. A. B. INGRAM (East Elgin). Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson) I think I am quite within my rights in discussing this Bill in this House when I think proper to do so, and I propose to discuss it so long as I am complying with the rules of the House. I would like to say to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair), that so far as I have been able to follow the statement he has made to-day, it is not clear as to whether the commission will have the power or the right to control the rates on government railways. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that unless his Bill is perfectly clear that the commission will have power to control the rates on government railways this Bill is of no use whatever, and he is making no improvement on the present system. I will show the hon. gentleman why I make that statement. This commission has power to control the rates of the railways in this country. The Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway run east of Montreal to certain points. The Canadian Pacific Railway state to a man who wishes to ship freight, that they will ship that freight for so much a pound to an eastern point. The shipper may not be satisfied with the rate given by the Canadian Pacific Railway. He goes to the Grand Trunk Railway and asks them for their best rate on that freight. The Grand Trunk Railway get from that shipper the amount the Canadian Pacific Railway are going to charge him and they say to the shipper that the Canadian Pacific Railway are violating the law by giving him a rate of that description. Under these circumstances their only redress is to appeal to the railway commission. They will enter a complaint before the commissioners and they will expect to get redress. If they are dissatisfied they will appeal to the Governor in Council, which is the last court of appeal. The government railway is running out of Montreal. Does the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals mean to tell me, that, in case of an appeal being entered before him as one of those interested in the decision of the Governor in Council, he and his friends who have control of the government railway, are in possession of information which shows that notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway had violated the law in giving a rate which it should not have given the government railways are giving a rate that is much less than the rate given by the Canadian Pacific Railway ? The whole thing would be a farce, and let me ask if, in the framing of these rates, of which the commission have to approve, the hon. gentleman means to say that the government railways of this country are going to get an interchange of freight with western railways if they themselves are allowed to violate any rules they wish. They certainly would not. The only way you can administer the rates properly is by classifying the freights and rates uniformly, thus making every railway in the Dominion of Canada subject to the commisssioners. The commissioners must have full control, and if you do that, you can control the government railways. They certainly have been violating rates every year since I have been in parliament. The commissioners should be given the sole control, and there must be no indefinite sound on that question. I want to say that I did not rise for the purpose of discussing the Bill, but I wish to take this opportunity of impressing upon the hon. minister the fact that if he wants to meet the wishes of a large portion of the people of this country he must see to it that government railways must be more subject to the commission than they have been subject to the head of the department in the past.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to know that the government have at last seen fit to bring down this measure providing for the appointment of a railway commission. I have not had the opportunity of going through the Bill, and therefore I am not in a position to say anything in regard to the details. But, the fact that the Bill has been brought down is sufficient for the time being. Later on when we shall have had an opportunity of going through the provisions of the Bill, I think it will be found to be fairly workable. In reference to the criticism of some hon. gentlemen, and more particularly to that of the hon. member for Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart), I would say that it is very evident that that hon. gentleman is not in favour of an appointment of a railway commission at all. He seems to think that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is sufficient. As I have stated before in this House, it is a well known fact that the trade and business of this country have grown at such a rate that it is impossible for the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to handle the business it should handle in connection with matters of this kind that come before it. As a matter of fact, we know, from our own experience in the west this year, that the people there have lost a great amount of money from the fact that we have had no body of this kind to regulate the railways of the country. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp) alluded to the fact that the pressure of public opinion had been brought to bear on the government and that it had a great deal to do with the bringing down of this measure. I think it is gratifying to know that the government are awake to the fact that a commission of this kind is necessary and that they are ready and anxious to meet the opinions of the people. The hon. gentleman said that the railways are not asking for this commission. I do not think that any hon. gentleman in this House, or out of it, believes that the railway companies want a railway commission. They have had everything their own way for a great many years and they are perfectly satisfied, but the people who are advocating this measure believe that it is about time that railway companies were placed under proper regulation. We want a body appointed that will see that there is no discrimination in rates. I suppose that the people of the older portions of the country have not suffered as much as we have in the west, because, in a great many cases, we in the west have been paying double the freight rates that have been paid by the people in the east. I suppose this is a matter that might have been brought before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, still, it can be better dealt with by a commission on the spot. I have alluded to the fact that the people in the west this last season lost a great deal of money on account of not having proper control over the railways of the North-west Territories. I do not blame the Canadian Pacific Railway for not being able to move the crop we had this last season in the short time at their disposal, but I do blame the Canadian Pacific Railway for one thing, and it is the fact that while they had 7,000 freight cars in that part of the country during the time the grain was being moved out of the country, 4,000 cars were used for the purpose of hauling merchandise, and only 3,000 were left for the use of the people to take out grain. Further than that, some of these cars that went through with grain to Fort William were allowed to remain there for days and days. Sometimes 8 or 10 days would elapse before these freight cars were returned, waiting for return freights instead of being sent back to assist the people in getting the grain out of the country. The loss to which I have referred occurs in this way: The people who buy grain buy it on the basis of December delivery. If the grain buyers know that they can get the grain out of the country before the close of navigation they will pay 6 cents a bushel more than they will pay if the grain is to be stored at the head of the lakes over the winter. The grain buyers, knowing that there was going to be a congestion and that the grain was not going to be taken out of the country before the close of navigation, started in October buying on the basis of having to store the grain at the head of the lakes during the winter. While I do not expect that the Canadian Pacific Railway would be able to move all the grain out in the short time at their disposal, still, I think they could have made a better arrangement in that direction than they did, and if there had been a proper distribution of cars so that the people who are entitled to get cars, the farmers and small traders, could receive a fair supply, they would have been able to obtain a greater price for the grain than they did, and the people would have benefited to a great extent by that fact. If there had been a proper distribution of cars so that the farmers and small traders could get cars when they required them, the people of the western country would have received a better price for their grain, and they would have been much better off than they are. I think this railway commission will be beneficial to the people for the settlement of small disputes. There are a certain class of disputes between individuals and railway companies which can be settled by this commission and which could not be settled by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Claims against railway companies burning buildings and for killing cattle can be submitted to this commission, whereas the ordinary man is not able to come to Ottawa to present his claim before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council here, and if he goes to the courts he knows that these wealthy corporations will drag him from court to court to the Privy Council in England itself, and bankrupt him before he can obtain justice. If this commission is properly constituted, as I hope it will, it can consider all these complaints, and in this way a great many claims against railway companies will be settled which otherwise would not be settled. Nothwithstanding what the ex-Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Haggart) has said, I believe that the feeling of this House on both sides, as evidenced by the resolution passed by it some time ago, is strongly in favour of the appointment of a railway commission. I believe that when this Bill comes to be considered in detail, the joint wisdom of both sides of the House can make a very good and wise law out of it.

I fancy that three commissioners will be sufficient, and I would be in favour of getting the very best men we can get. Even if we had to pay $40,000 a year for a really first-class railway man to put at the head of that commission as chairman, it would be money well spent and the people of this country would reap immense advantage from it. When we come to discuss the Bill in detail all these matters will of course be considered.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE ACT, 1890—AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 105) to amend the Bills of Exchange Act, 1890.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The Bill is intended to amend section 42 of the Bills of Exchange Act. It is intended to settle a doubtful point as to the rights of the drawee with respect to the dating of his acceptance of a sight draft. Section 42 is as follows :—

When a Bill is duly presented for acceptance and is not accepted on the date of presentment or within two days thereafter the person presenting it must treat it as dishonoured by not accepting it ; if he does not the holder shall loose his right of recourse against the drawer and endorser.

A doubt has arisen with respect of the right of the drawee to date the acceptance. The acceptance must be within the date of acceptance or two days thereafter. A doubt has arisen as to whether if he accepts within the two days he must date his acceptance of the date of presentment, or as the date he actually accepts. It appears that the lawyers have managed to find elements of controversy on that point, and in order to put it beyond dispute, and at the request of the Bankers' Association, I have introduced this Bill.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). What does it provide ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. On the date of actual acceptance.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT FARM AT LONGUEUIL.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. At whose request was the property known as the government farm, in Longueuil, county of Chambly, put up at auction ?
2. Were any private offers made for the land, and if so, by whom, and when ?
3. By whom was the land purchased ?
4. In whose name is the deed thereof ?
5. What was the purchase, and how much has the government received in cash for the same ?
6. How much of said farm was reserved, and to whom, and why was any portion so reserved?

Mr. DAVIS.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton) :

1. Mr. Geoffrion, M.P.
2. No.
3. Robert Campbell.
4. Land has not been patented.
5. $31,100, of which $7,750 has been paid.
6. About seven acres, three acres each to the Protestant and the Roman Catholic School Commissioners of Longueuil, P.Q., for the purposes of a school site, and a small triangular piece of land deeded to the Crown on condition it would never be disposed of.

THE TREADGOLD CONCESSION.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

1. What interpretation has the Gold Commissioner of the Yukon placed upon the Orders in Council of June 12th and 29th, and December 7th, 1901, granting certain rights known as the Treadgold Concession ?
2. Has the Gold Commissioner interpreted these Orders in Council as granting to the concessionaries all lapsed claims ?
3. If so, what has been the effect of such interpretation ?
4. Has such interpretation, or any other interpretation or ruling by the Gold Commissioner, had the effect of closing any and what mining claims or areas of the central or other portions of the Klondyke mining district to locations by free miners ?
5. How many claims have already fallen into the concession under any such ruling or interpretation of the Gold Commissioner ?
6. Is it true that about 3,500 claims have already fallen into the concession under such ruling or interpretation ?
7. What is the total area of the claims which have already fallen into the concession under such ruling or interpretation ?
8. Does the government consider that the Gold Commissioner's interpretation or ruling is correct ?
9. What are the exact terms of the Orders in Council above referred to ?
10. What are the exact terms of the concession known as the Treadgold Concession ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton) :

1. The gold commissioner interpreted that clause 10 of the Order in Council of the 12th of June, 1901, did not give exclusive right to Treadgold Concession to re-locate claims. No report has been received from the gold commissioner as to his interpretation of the orders of the 29th of June and 7th of December, 1901.
2. The answer to No. 1 replies to this question.
3. No report has been received from the gold commissioner as to the effect of the interpretation placed by him on the order of the 12th of June, 1901.

4. The gold commissioner has not reported the number of claims and area closed under the interpretation placed by him on the Order in Council of the 12th of June, 1901.

5. No report has been received from the gold commissioner as to the number of claims which fell into the concession under his interpretation of the Order in Council of the 12th of June, 1901.

6. The reply to question No. 5 is an answer to this question.

7. The reply to question No. 5 is in answer to this question.

8. The Department of the Interior considered that the gold commissioner's interpretation of the Order in Council of the 12th of June, 1901, was correct.

9. The Order in Council, copies of which have been laid on the Table of the House, give the exact terms.

10. The terms of the concession are specified in the Orders in Council which have been laid on the Table of the House.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—ARREARS OF WAGES.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Are there any arrears of wages due workmen in the Department of Public Works ?

2. Why is the department in arrears with regard to the payment of its workmen ?

3. How many workmen are employed by the Department of Public Works in the county of Beauharnois ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) :

1. Yes, the heating staff at Ottawa was not paid for March.

2. The firing season being longer than usual this year and the price of coal higher, the appropriation was exhausted.

3. None.

THE INSPECTOR OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES FOR THREE RIVERS.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Does Mr. Gravel, inspector of weights and measures for the district of Three Rivers, reside and keep his office at the chief place of his district ?

2. Does he make the inspections himself, or by whom has he them made ?

3. Where does he live ?

4. What amount has he received for salary, &c., from the government since July, 1901, up to the present ?

5. What amount has he collected for the public treasury since July, 1901, up to the present ?

6. What work has he done since July, 1901, up to the present ?

The MINISTER OF INLAND REVENUE (Hon. M. E. Bernier) :

1. The head office is at Three Rivers, but he does not reside there.

2. The inspections are made by Mr. Gravel and his two assistants.

3. Louiseville.

4. Mr. Gravel has, since July 1st, last, received as salary $749.97 and contingencies $237.70.

5. Collections for work performed by himself were, for same period, $549.55.

6. Has inspected the counties of Champlain, Richelieu, Maskinonge, St. Maurice and at head office at Three Rivers.

ISSUE OF A CIRCULAR.

Mr. BELAND asked :

1. Is the government aware that the following circular, signed 'P. Landry,' has been sent from the Senate of Canada into the counties of the province of Quebec :—

'(Confidential.) Ottawa, Senate, April, 1902.

'Sir,—I send you a form which I ask you to be good enough to fill in as soon as possible.

'1st. By putting down the names and surnames of the persons engaged in the employments mentioned in the form.

'2nd. By having each of these names followed by one of the following marks :—

'X. If he is a Conservative.

'O. If he is a Liberal.

'?. If he is doubtful.

'3rd. By distinguishing the councillors as follows, placing the names on the lines A for the councillors elected this year ; on the lines B for the councillors elected last year ; on the lines C for the councillors elected in 1900 ; and by placing after the name of the mayor one of the three letters A, B or C, according as the mayor has been elected this year, last year or in 1900.

'4th. By naming the hotelkeepers and drivers according to their importance and efficiency, beginning with the most commendable.

'5th. By naming the two most prominent Conservative leaders and the two most prominent Liberal leaders.

'6th. By adding after the name of the secretary-treasurer your estimation of that officer, who may be an intelligent partisan, scrupulous, or a skilful, dangerous adversary, to be watched.

'7th. By giving information, as far as possible, of the number of copies of each of the newspapers received in the parish.

'8th. By supplying in the space reserved for remarks all that you think has been omitted in this form and which might be considered as useful information. I shall be happy to receive any suggestions you may be pleased to make. You need not prepay your reply if you address it to me at the Senate, Ottawa. I will ask you as a favour to have your reply reach me as soon as possible.

'I remain, sir, your obedient servant,

'P. LANDRY.

'To avoid any possible misunderstanding, do not forget to place after each name the mark suggested in paragraph No. 2.'

2. Is the signer, P. Landry, employed by the government in connection with the census ?

3. If so, since when, and what is his salary ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I beg to give the answer, which is: No.

CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR OF PULLMAN CARS.

Mr. MONK asked:

1. Does the government know that for the past three years the Pullman Car Company has constructed and repaired all the Pullman cars in use in this country in the United States, instead of having them constructed and repaired in the Grand Trunk Company's workshops at Montreal, as was practised for a number of years?

2. Does the government know that this change deprives the workmen of Montreal of several hundred thousands of dollars, which was expended there before the change in question?

3. Does the government know that this change, injurious to the working class, is due to the alteration of the Canadian tariff made by the present administration?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). No representations to this effect have been made to the government.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—PENSIONS.

Mr. OLIVER asked:

Has the government decided to give pensions to partially or totally disabled members of the several Canadian contingents serving in South Africa; or to the relatives of members of those contingents who lost their lives during term of service?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). Under the terms of enlistment, members of the Canadian contingents are entitled to the same pensions from the Imperial government as members of Imperial corps. The government has not considered the question of adding to such pensions so granted.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—PURCHASE OF HORSES.

Mr. OLIVER asked:

Why were no western horses purchased for the third contingent?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). The horses for the second Canadian Mounted Rifles were purchased and paid for by the Imperial government, and the contractor was at liberty to purchase where he chose. I am informed that 200 horses were purchased at Brandon.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

George M. Loy, Esq., member for the electoral district of Beauharnois, introduced by Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. Mr. Bernier.

THE CORONATION CONTINGENT.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, in the event of a military force being sent from Canada to the approaching Coronation ceremonies, such force should be composed in its entirety of officers and men who have seen active service on Canadian contingents in South Africa.

He said: Mr. Speaker, when I had the honour of placing this resolution on the Order paper I thought I was doing an almost unnecessary act. But, to my amazement, I have seen within the past few weeks a statement made—whether officially or not, I am not prepared to say, but, no doubt, we shall hear this afternoon—that the men who placed their services at the disposal of the country in the hour of need are not to be regarded in the contingent that is to be sent to the coming Coronation ceremonies. It will be a matter of surprise to the people if the fact is officially stated that those who, in the hour of the country's extremity without fear gave their services to the empire, are to be passed over when this contingent is to be sent to Great Britain. Scarce can be found a city, town or hamlet in this whole Dominion in which since this unfortunate war has arisen, there are not people who have sorrowed at the loss of relatives in that far away land or have not rejoiced at the safe return of their kinsmen who had gone upon their perilous errand to uphold the country's flag. I can hardly believe the statement, which, from time to time, appears in the press, that the Minister of Militia and Defence (Hon. Mr. Borden), I suppose, in consonance with the wishes of the ministry, intends to ignore the application of those who served with these contingents in South Africa and to give places on the Coronation contingent to men who have not seen active service. It will be rather startling to know that the men who have returned from South Africa are to be left aside, and that carpet knights are to engage in the festivities that are to attend the great pageant which is to take place in Great Britain. I cannot and will not believe that this is to be done until I hear the statement made by the Minister of Militia and Defence himself. I trust that when the minister makes his official statement on this subject the House and the country will be gratified by learning that every man who went forth in the hour of trial—for it was an hour of trial for Great Britain and her colonies—are to be first considered in forming the Coronation contingent, and that their places are not to be taken by men who were not, I will not say brave enough, but who were not ready, to go on that occasion. I await with considerable anxiety, as I know the whole country does, the statement of the minister. And, in the further remarks which I may make, I trust that I shall be able to offer commendation and congratulation to the minister that he has made the statement that every man who tendered his services on the contingents for South Africa, whether as a private or as an officer, and who wishes to go to Great Britain as a member of the contingent on the occasion of the Coronation, will be accepted, provided that he had the honour and glory of serving on behalf of his country in the South Africa troubles.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). I have a great deal of pleasure in at once putting an end to that anxiety which my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) has been labouring under so long. This notice has been on the paper since the first week of the session, and I am sorry that my hon. friend should have kept himself unnecessarily in that condition of anxiety, when, by moving this motion at any one of the opportunities that have offered—probably a dozen—he could have terminated—

Mr. BENNETT. If the minister will pardon me for a moment, I would say that, several times when the Order was called, it stood at the request of the government.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I was here at least half a dozen of times when the hon. gentleman could have moved it. However, that does not matter very much. My hon. friend says that, in his opinion, the contingent that is to be sent to the Coronation to represent the Canadian militia should be composed exclusively of men who have served in South Africa. I would like to ask my hon. friend why he would exclude the men who served, for instance, in the North-west rebellion? They served their country as faithfully as did those who went to South Africa. It seems to me that to state the proposition of my hon. friend is to at once make evident the answer, and that answer is that, while we should include in the Coronation contingent representatives of the different corps that have served in South Africa, it is equally important that we should include representatives of every part of the Dominion and all branches of the militia—that, in fact, you should make this Coronation contingent thoroughly representative of the militia of Canada as far as possible. My hon. friend speaks of ignoring the men who fought in South Africa. There is no intention of ignoring them. But my hon. friend wants to ignore the scores of men who wished to go to South Africa but could not get an opportunity to do so. I think that those men who were denied the opportunity of going to South Africa have a right to representation on the Coronation contingent as well as those who did go to South Africa. All I can say now to my hon. friend and to the House is that I propose to recommend to the government that we should send a contingent composed of 580 men, representative of all the different branches of the Canadian militia; that the different corps in the various districts of Canada should be fairly represented numerically; that the selection should be made with reference to the numbers enrolled in the militia in each district; and that we will endeavour to have it truly representative of the force of this Dominion which will show to the people of England and to the people of the empire as clearly as possible the kind of militia force we have in this country. I repeat that we shall take care that fair representation is given the men who have done such splendid service in the war in South Africa.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I would like to ask the minister what period these men are likely to be away, and who is to pay them?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The Imperial government have offered, as in the case of the jubilee contingent, free lodgings, barracks, and rations to the men for one month, and barrack accommodation for the officers. We have not really developed the scheme yet, but my present idea is that the force should sail for England about the 7th of June, and leave England to return during the first week in July. The men will be paid by the Canadian government.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). While I would not feel like going quite as far as the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), still I think there is a good deal in his contention, that other things being equal, preference should be given to those members of the militia who went to South Africa. There is no doubt that the eyes and the attention of the Canadian people are to-day very much on those men. They have given evidence, not only of their loyalty to the country, but of their desire to maintain the prestige of the country, to maintain British law and British order in a very distant part of the empire. In doing so they have been obliged to undergo perils and hardships that are not usually incident to the militia service of the country; and if any recognition could be shown them beyond that which is shown the ordinary militia man in Canada, I am quite sure it would meet with the approval of the Canadian people, and agree with what they regard as a sense of justice. I think there is a good deal in the contention of the hon. minister that the various portions of the militia force should be fairly represented, because in going there they will be regarded as samples of the militia of Canada belonging to the various branches. But it might not be possible to do that properly if you confined the selection to those who went out to South Africa. Still, there is no doubt many will have the privilege of going by virtue of the influence they will be able to bring to bear upon the Minister of Militia and Defence, and the influence which these young men can bring to bear upon that same power if they desire to go. While the South African men might not command the same attention and indulgence that others do, I think that in consideration of what they have done for the country, every allowance should be made for them, and other things being equal, as many as possible of the young men who went out to maintain law and order in that distant country should be selected for the contingent.

Mr. BENNETT. When I placed the order on the paper, I was at a loss to know how many men would compose this contingent, and therefore I thought it well to say that it should be composed exclusively of men who had returned from South Africa. I was aware of the fact that in that unfortunate trouble some 5,000 of Canada's best men had answered to the call of duty, and I am thankful to know to-day, from all the information I have heard, that over 500 of those young men have returned safe to Canada. When I placed the order on the paper in that way, saying that the force should be composed in its entirety of those men, it was because I did not know how many the government proposed to send, and I thought that, of all others, those who had gone out to South Africa should have the first claim. Talk about the corps being representative, talk about it being regarded with great applause in Great Britain by reason of its being representative of all the various corps of the militia, I tell the minister that if it were known that every man who marched in procession under the Canadian flag and under the British flag, had borne arms in South Africa, the hurrahs of the crowd would be much greater than if it were known that they were simply marching as representatives of the different militia corps of this country. The minister smiles. Well, Sir, all I can say is that I do not believe it will be regarded as a smiling matter throughout this country when it is known that gentlemen are about to attach themselves to the corps of this country in order to take part in this most peaceful errand. on this junketing tour, at this time when everything of the best will be at their disposal, and who, I am bound to say, in many instances, never threatened the government or any department of the government with an intimation that they wished to go under the guns in South Africa. Now, regarding the question of the North-west representatives, the force is going to be a large one, some 550 men, and I am bound to say that if other applications are received than exclusively from men who have been to South Africa, there will not be many vacant places for men who are in the North-west. Once again let me say there are young men in every town and county in all the provinces who have been to South Africa, and I say it is unfair to them, when they were prepared to give up the best they had, to risk their lives and give up their situations in many cases, that now when there is to be this gorgeous pageant in Great Britain, these young men are to be told by the minister that because they are not representative Canadians from a militia point of view, a place of honour is to be denied them. I say the feeling in Canada is universal that no more representative men could be found for the contingent than the men who, in the hour of trial, were ready to go under the guns and under the British flag in South Africa. I trust that even yet the minister will change his opinion, and will say that every man who can show that he has been in the South African war will be given an opportunity of going.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) will withdraw his motion under the circumstances ?

Mr. BENNETT. If the hon. minister will add to his former statement that any man who has seen active service in the troubles in South Africa shall have the first claim, then I will seriously consider it.

Mr. M. V. AVERY (Addington). I would suggest that an addition be made to those eligible to go. There are quite a number who would like to go and I think I would extend the limit so that it would give more of the members of the militia who wish to go an opportunity of going. I would suggest making the force a little larger.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. The number is fixed by the war office, or by the Imperial government. Five hundred and eighty is the maximum number that we are allowed to send.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would like to understand from the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence whether any special consideration is to be given to the men who served in South Africa. Is there any consideration, in sending this force to London, to be given to the men who served in South Africa, or who tendered their services ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I think I stated that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I did not quite understand it.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I will repeat it then. What I said, or what I intended to say, was that the corps which had been sent to South Africa would be represented on this contingent. That is what I intended to say and that statement I will repeat. As to special consideration, I scarcely understand how any further special consideration could be given than that. We wish to make it a thoroughly representative corps and it will of necessity include representatives from every one of the contingents that went to South Africa including that of Lord Strathcona.

Mr. BENNETT. Under these circumstances it is quite plain to my mind that the men who offered their services and who have been in South Africa are not to be accorded the place of honour, because it would be the place of honour, as a matter of right and consequently I must ask for a division.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Before the motion is put, I would like to ask the hon. minister another question, if it would not result in the divulging of any secrets. Is it true that the minister has applications from several thousand officers and men to go on that contingent, and that only about 60 applications have been received to go to South Africa with the contingent to be sent out? Is it true that there are these large numbers who want to go on a junketing tour and only 60 who want to go to South Africa?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I am happy to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria), that we have more applications to go to South Africa than we have to go with the Coronation contingent.

Mr. BENNETT. They know that there is a better chance.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. And that a great many officers who did want to go on the Coronation contingent, since the determination has been arrived at to send another contingent to South Africa, have withdrawn their names and now wish to be sent to South Africa.

Hon. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). I want to say one or two words before this motion is put and to make a suggestion. If the hon. minister will put it to the applicants who are anxious to go to the Coronation, I have sufficient confidence in the appreciation of the volunteers of Canada to feel that they will all give way so that those who stood under the guns, to use that expression, and went out and risked their lives, while many of their comrades remained at home, may have an opportunity of going and that they will all say: 'If there are not enough places to go around, send the boys who went out and represented the country in this war. I cannot see why those who served in South Africa ought not to have the first choice? I do not believe it is probable that as many as 580 will apply but if we did not give any special recognition to those who had performed that splendid service in South Africa, I think it would show that we were wanting in appreciation. It is all very well for us here in this happy land, in this peaceful country, so far away that we cannot hear the thunder of the guns there; we remain here, but those boys of their own accord went out and represented us as volunteers. If we had sent out 5,000 instead of 1,000, and I would like to have seen 5,000 sent out, or 10,000, they would have rallied as is shown by the number mustering for this latest contingent. It is only fair that we should extend some consideration to these volunteers and if we did not do so I think we would be wanting in appreciation. That is the only reason why I am saying this just now. I am sure that if there are enough of those who performed this voluntary service in South Africa to fill the contingent, that others will be willing to take second place and allow them to go. Let me add one word to what was said by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) who brought this motion forward. If you send 580 of the boys who were in South Africa with their uniforms they wore when they came back, many of them soiled, some of them blood stained, nothing would be a greater addition to the parade and nothing would more please the people of Canada and the people of the British empire than an exhibition of that sort. I would not care if the contingent were not quite so representative in one sense as in another. What do they represent? How did we get our liberties and how have they been held? How have Christianity and civilization been spread? We have helped to hold them. We have helped by legislating here but had it not been for the men who have gone without consideration of danger of hardship or death to bear their share in battle this British empire would not have been what it is, and but for such actions could not remain. So, I say that we should offer the first choice to the boys who deserve it most, and if they do not fill the places, then send others.

Mr. A. T. THOMPSON (Haldimand and Monck). Mr. Speaker, I claim to be second to none in appreciation of the services that the brave men who fought for Canada and for the empire in South Africa rendered, but it seems to me that the hon. gentlemen opposite have not well considered the motion before the House when they speak for it and when they propose to support it. Not only have we these men in Canada who have seen service in South Africa, but we have large numbers of men who saw service in the North-west rebellion, and before that in the Fenian raids. Had the motion of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) been to the effect that those men should be chosen from the thousands of men who had seen active service in defence of Canada or the empire, then, I would have felt disposed to support it, but as I understand it he wishes the whole contingent to be drawn from those men who saw service in South Africa. To me this seems to be a decided reflection upon the rest of the militia force in Canada. We have in the active militia to-day some 40,000 men all told and but a small portion of these men have seen service in South Africa. Whenever a call has been issued to the volunteers for active service in South Africa that call has been responded to by two or three times the number of men who were able to go, and yet this resolution would prevent the acceptance of those men who volunteered for service but whose services were not accepted simply because the number was limited.

Mr. BENNETT. If the House will consent I will propose a change in the motion by substituting for the words 'should be composed in its entirety,' 'should be composed in the main.' I would be quite willing to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman and make that amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. I fancy that the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence is the proper person to consider any proposition of that kind, and I would wish to go on with my remarks as it is nearly six o'clock, for only two or three minutes more. I would say that not only have we the men who went to South Africa, but there are the men who fought in the North-west rebellion and the men who fought in the Fenian raid. There are many good men to-day in the active militia who went out in the Fenian raids. I have them in my own regiment and if there was a large number of men in the militia who never volunteered to go to South Africa I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to say that it was cowardice that kept them from volunteering. They did not volunteer to go to South Africa for the good and sufficient reason that in many cases they had obligations at home which made it impossible for them to volunteer. And yet for years past these same men have been keeping up the militia force of Canada and have made it possible to send to South Africa these contingents which have brought such credit to our arms. This resolution proposes to turn down some 30,000 active militia men in Canada. It proposes in the case of the fine regiment in the county which my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) represents, to select some eight or ten men and to exclude 400 men who have done good service in the militia ranks of this country. In the case of my own regiment we have had some fifteen who volunteered and accepted service in South Africa, but we have 400 others to consider, and I for one would never consent to a motion of this kind which would debar these brave men from any participation in this Coronation trip, which has been so disrespectfully spoken of by the hon. member for East Simcoe as a junketing tour.

Mr. A. BRODER (Dundas). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Thompson) has taken too much credit to the different militia corps because as a matter of fact a great many of the boys who went to South Africa were not connected with the militia at all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Ninety per cent of them.

Mr. BRODER. I can recall a good many who were not connected with any corps.

Mr. HEYD. How many ?

Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. BRODER. The hon. gentleman is so bad at figures that there is no use counting them for him. He would not be in the number any way. I do not think that you should get together a lot of young men some five feet and some six feet in height, and send them over on this contingent. I think that the question of physique and appearance as well as bravery comes in on an occasion like this. I can quite understand the pride of Canadians in seeing that their country is represented by fine looking men at this ceremony, and for that reason a little latitude should be given in the choice. Sometimes a very small man may be a very good fighter, but he would not be taken as a specimen of the physique of the Canadian people. I am not boasting because I happen to be tall myself, but I take a little pride in the fact that the stateliness and athletic appearance of our Canadian people ought to be represented in that corps. For that reason we should modify this resolution. While we may give the small men a chance later on we want to give the big fellows a chance now.

Mr. F. B. WADE (Annapolis). I would draw attention to the fact that outside of the Canadian contingents that have gone to South Africa, quite a large number of our young Canadians have been serving the empire in the imperial army. To-day, I believe, a sad funeral cortege will be wending its way through the city of Halifax to the county of King's, which the Minister of Militia represents, bearing the body of young Lieut. Beverley Webster, late of the King's Own Regiment (a son of the opponent of the present Minister of Militia at the last election), a young officer who lost his life in the service of his country while holding a commission in the imperial service, which I believe was secured for him by the Minister of Militia. Two of three of our young men in Halifax have sacrificed their lives for their country while connected with the imperial troops. I may mention the names of young Lieut. Wood and Lieut. Hensley, who offered up their lives for their country in the South African war. Surely it is not well that we should forget that these young men have added lustre to the name of Canada. Surely it is not necessary for us to pass a resolution here to say that any particular branch of the service should be exclusively represented in the corps to be sent to the Coronation. I might also say that in the regiment at present garrisoning Halifax nine-tenths of the men would be delighted to be allowed to go to South Africa.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. They have all volunteered now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WADE. They have all volunteered for South Africa now and there are thousands and tens of thousands of men in our Canadian Militia who are as anxious to go to South Africa as the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) was anxious to go, and who I believe would do as much credit to Canada as he did while he was there. I therefore say that it is not proper that we should make any distinction on this occasion. I believe we can safely leave it to that minister, who has laid upon the altar of his country such a great sacrifice, to select such men as he may deem proper to represent Canada. And if it should be a question of physique, then you had better take all the men from the province of Nova Scotia.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. I beg to move an amendment which I think will meet the views of those who have offered objection to the resolution as proposed. This amendment I think meets with the approval of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). I move :

That the word 'entirely' in the main motion be expunged and the word 'principally' be substituted in lieu thereof.

I feel much sympathy with the motion as moved, for I believe that something is due to those brave men who fought for the empire in South Africa. I am of opinion that they should have an opportunity of visiting the mother country to which they rendered such glorious service.

Mr. W. A. GALLIHER (Yale and Cariboo). The object of sending this contingent to the Coronation, as I understand it is, that every branch of the military service of Canada may be represented. The object is not to show to the people of Great Britain the physique of Canadians, because they are already well satisfied with that. The object being therefore to send representatives from every branch of the service, that can only be attained by following the suggestion offered by the Minister of Militia. No one would be more delighted than I, to give due preference to those Canadians who have served in the defence of the empire. No doubt the hon. minister will select, as he has stated he will, principally from the ranks of those who have served in South Africa ; and I for one would say, select liberally from those ranks, while at the same time giving others in the different branches of the service a right to be selected.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not quite understand why the contingent will not be representative of all the branches of the service in Canada if the men are selected in accordance with the suggestions made in this amendment. We are told by the hon. Minister of Militia that he desires this body of troops to be a fair representation of all the branches of the service in Canada. Well, I ask him whether it is not true that the contingents which have already gone to South Africa do fairly represent all the branches of the service in Canada ? If that is true, it seems to dispose of every objection raised also on that score by the hon. member for Haldimand, who states that 90 per cent of the men who have gone to South Africa are from volunteer regiments. That being the case, you have all branches of the service—infantry, cavalry, and artillery represented by them. My hon. friend from Annapolis (Mr. Wade) made a suggestion which does not seem to have any practical bearing on this matter. He says that a number of our young men are serving in the imperial forces. That is true, but I do not see how the government of Canada can select them for this purpose. The motion of my hon. friend from East Simcoe probably required some modification. I agree that the men who served in the defence of their country in the North-west rebellion should be considered. But this particular occasion is one with which the empire is specially concerned, and the war in South Africa was one in which the whole empire was concerned. The ceremony that is to take place in London will have a particular significance in that respect, inasmuch as it concerns not the British Islands alone, but every portion of the empire as well. Therefore, I did regret to hear the Minister of Militia say that no special recognition is on this occasion to be given to the services of the Canadian troops in South Africa. It seems to me, without slighting for a moment the services performed by the gallant sons of Canada in the North-west in 1885, that the service in South Africa is one to which special significance should be attached in connection with the ceremony which is to take place in June next ; and when that force comes to be constituted, I hope special consideration will be given to the men who were engaged in that service. I do not for a moment desire to say a word in depreciation of the volunteer force of Canada or of the men who sought to serve in South Africa and were not afforded an opportunity to do so. I know that there are many such men in Canada—men who deserve well of the country ; but, notwithstanding that, I think the men who did go to South Africa and face the foe there and who performed their duty in such a way as to make the name of Canada a household word throughout the length and breadth of the empire, should be principally considered in the making up of this contingent which is to visit the mother country. I say that from the standpoint of the best interests of Canada and the empire. I think there is a great deal in the observation which has been made to-day that special attention would be given to our Canadian troops in June next in London if it were known that those troops were selected principally from among the men who had fought for the empire in South Africa. I hope, therefore, that the minister will give this matter a little further consideration, and that the expression of opinion he has made to-day will not be regarded by him as final.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. I do not wish this debate to end with the impression given to the country which would be given by the statement that has just been made by the hon. leader of the opposition, that I had spoken in any way slightingly of the men who have served in South Africa.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Oh, no, I did not suggest that. All I said was that I understood the minister to say that no special consideration would be given to the Canadian troops who had served in South Africa; at least, I understood that he was not prepared to say that any special consideration would be given to them.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE. What I did was to ask what was meant, by special consideration. As I understand, knowing something about military organizations, men who have served in the field receive medals for their service, and when they go on parade they wear those medals. They have that special distinction; but I never knew, in the imperial army, or anywhere else, any case in which a number of men were put together in a body as representing any particular battle or any particular service in which they had been engaged. I was going on to say that I think this House and this country will acquit me at any rate of any desire to say anything or do anything that would appear in any way to slight the men who have served in South Africa. I propose to put those men on a fair footing in relation to the other men who may compose the contingent; and those men are not the men to ask for anything more than that. The question has been asked, what remains of the objection? I ask, after the modification proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, what remains of the resolution? And surely, Mr. Speaker, after the six years of service that I have given, and after the record that the Militia Department has made in this country, it is not too much for me to ask that in this matter I be allowed to use my own discretion.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

Copies of all correspondence, letters, claims, &c., addressed to the government in regard to the indemnity of Treffle Nantel, a guard at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, who died on or about the 12th September, 1900; as well as all documents relating to that matter.—Mr. Léonard.

Return of any communications, reports, or other documents received by the government, or any member or department thereof, from Colonel Taylor, of Pittsburg, U.S.A., with reference to the deposits of coal and coal mining in South British Columbia, particularly the Crow's Nest Pass coal fields.—Mr. Bennett.

Copies of all letters, telegrams, and other correspondence between the Department of Labour and the officers of the Rossland Miners' Union and other persons, in reference to the alleged violations of the Alien Labour Act in connection with the Rossland miners' strike.—Mr. Smith (Vancouver).

3. The name, residence and salary of each of those of the second class.
4. The number of those of the third class, and the total amount of the yearly salary paid them.—Mr. Léonard.

Return showing:—

1. The number of cattle, sheep and horses killed by engines on all Canadian railways during each year since 1890; (a) at points of intersection of highways; (b) elsewhere on the lines.
2. How many engines and cars, if any, were derailed or disabled on all Canadian railways during each year since 1890, owing to their striking cattle, sheep and horses; (a) at points of intersection of highways; (b) elsewhere on the lines.
3. How many railway employees and passengers, if any, were killed or injured on all Canadian railways during each year since 1890, on account of engines striking cattle, sheep and horses; (a) at points of intersection of highways; (b) elsewhere on the lines.
4. What is the total estimated value of the cattle, sheep and horses killed on all Canadian railways, during each year since 1890, owing to their being struck by engines.
5. What is the total estimated damage to rolling stock and other railway property on all Canadian railways during each year since 1890, caused by collisions with cattle, sheep and horses.
6. How many trains have been derailed or partly derailed on all Canadian railways during each year since 1890, owing to the action of frost on the road-bed at points where the old pit cattle-guards were in existence.—Mr. Erb.

1. For copies of all Orders in Council, petitions, applications, reports, telegrams, correspondence, grants, contracts, agreements, documents, and communications in writing relating to or concerning the grant to or concession to A. N. C. Treadgold, or to the Hydraulic Mining Syndicate, either separately or associated with A. N. C. Treadgold, of any claims, rights, and privileges on Bonanza, Bear and Hunker Creeks, or their tributaries, or elsewhere in the Yukon Territory.

2. A description and plan showing the situation, location, area, and other particulars of all the claims, rights, and privileges so granted or conceded to the said A. N. C. Treadgold, or to the said Hydraulic Mining Syndicate, as aforesaid.—Mr. Borden (Halifax).

Return showing what licenses, during the year 1900, were issued, entitling the persons named therein to fish for oysters on the beds planted by the government in the harbour of Shediac. And also, showing to whom such licenses were issued, and on what dates they were respectively issued, and by whose authority they were issued in each instance, and whether such licenses, or any, and which of them were cancelled; and if so, how many, and on what date, and for what reason such licenses were cancelled; and what quantity of oysters was secured under such licenses during the period they were in force.—Mr. Borden (Halifax).

Statement of all moneys paid by the Dominion government to the province of Ontario during the calendar years 1900 and 1901, respectively; stating in each case how much of such moneys so paid was on account of subsidy, allowance for government, and interest, respectively. Also, copies of all telegrams, letters, or correspondence of any kind in any way relating to or connected with the transmission of such moneys.—Mr. Henderson.

Copies of all correspondence, petitions, affidavits and documents relating to the dismissal of Alphonse Thomas, as postmaster at La Prairie, P.Q.—Mr. Monk.

Copies of contracts by this government with Messrs. Poupore & Malone, for construction of wharf below Montreal; and also for construction of wharf at Sorel; and copies of specifications relating to both said works.—Mr. Monk.

Copy of petition dated on or about November 29, 1901, from the president of the Quebec Trades and Labour Council to the Department of Labour, and of all documents connected with said petition or mentioned therein, or correspondence ensuing therefrom in reference to the arbitration controversy or conflict between the Shoe Workers' Union of Quebec city and Mgr. L. N. Bégin, Archbishop of Quebec.—Mr. Puttee.

Copy of the report of Inspector McRae of the Indian Department relating to the investigation held by him respecting the complaint by the Restigouche Indians against Indian Agent Peters, together with all correspondence and documents in connection therewith.—Mr. Fowler.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 99) respecting the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company.—Mr. Demers (St. Johns and Iberville).

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate the Nepigon Railway Company.—Mr. Campbell.

Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Gaspé and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Gauvreau.

MEDICAL COUNCIL IN CANADA.

House in committee on Bill (No. 11) to provide for the establishment of a medical council in Canada.—Mr. Roddick.

On section 6,

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). What is the effect of sub-clause 3 ?

Mr. RODDICK. It means that this work cannot be begun until five provinces have decided to come into the council, and no province is obliged to enter the compact, but may go on giving licenses within its own provincial boundaries as at present. By paragraph F of section 4, I have met the objection regarding unconstitutionality. It is quite clear that this enactment cannot be ultra vires when each province affected by it must pass concurrent legislation before it can come into effect.

On section 10,

Mr. FRASER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill if he thinks this will enable the graduates of any one province to practice in another without difficulty. I notice there has been some difficulty in South Africa over the fact that the British doctors think they are so far in advance of our Canadian doctors that the Canadians should not be allowed to practice. I think it would be well if some provision could be made in this Bill, whereby a graduate, for example, of Nova Scotia, if he has a certificate from the governing body in Nova Scotia, could practice in Ontario, and vice versa. I think perhaps in this growing Dominion that both doctors and lawyers should be recognized in all the provinces, except in so far as may relate to the particular course of study required in each province. I think that would do much to facilitate matters. I think the certificate of any well known college in any province of this Dominion ought to be sufficient to permit the holder to practice in any part of the Dominion.

Mr. RODDICK. I may say in answer to my hon. friend that in order to get reciprocity with Great Britain, to which he evidently refers, and to be able to register in Great Britain so as to practice in South Africa or any other part of the empire, it will simply be necessary to pass a central examining board such as we propose to make.

Mr. FRASER. Will they accept it in Great Britain ?

Mr. RODDICK. At once. In 1886 they decided by Act of parliament that so soon as we had in this country a Dominion or central examining board, they would give registration to those having qualified before that board for any part of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FRASER. How about the provinces ?

Mr. RODDICK. They would come in under the same arrangement.

On section 10, subsection (iii).

The possession of a Canadian university degree alone, or of a certificate of provincial registration founded on such possession, obtained subject to the passage of this Act, shall not entitle the possessor thereof to be registered under this Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Should that not be 'subsequent' to the passage of this Act instead of 'subject' to the passage of this Act ?

Mr. RODDICK. Yes, that is quite right—'subsequent to.' I think, however, the meaning is the same.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to designate a time after the passage of the Act and the only proper word would be 'subsequent.'

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I think 'subsequent' would be better.

On section 16, subsection 3,

Mr. VROOMAN. I think under this clause that there would possibly be an injustice inflicted upon students who are engaged in the study of medicine. If this Bill becomes law, any young man obtaining a degree between now and the time that the local legislature legislates on this Bill, would not be able to receive a degree from this council until he passes his examination before this council. I think that would hardly be just to the young man. There should be some provision made for these young men who are studying medicine and passing their examination between now and the time the legislature legislates on this Bill. A young man who is studying medicine in the province of Ontario now, may get his license to practice, but possibly the province does not adopt this Bill for five years and then he will have to go up for examination before this council to get his degree. I think that would be an injustice to the young man.

Mr. RODDICK. How would you propose to deal with that ?

Mr. VROOMAN. If he has practised for six years he should be allowed to come under the operation of this Bill. A young man in Ontario could not be examined before this council until the local legislature has enacted this Bill which might be ten years hence.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. If we knew what was wanted we might be able to frame the language to suit.

Mr. SPROULE. There will be a number of young men who will pass their examinations in their own province which will entitle them to register before this medical council is established. What Dr. Vrooman wants is to provide that when these young men have practiced six years they shall by virtue of the length of time they have been practicing come under this Act without going before the council for examination.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The fixed date is not to be from the passing of this Act, but from the date of the provincial legislation.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

On section 20,

The PRIME MINISTER. I would suggest to my hon. friend that this Bill be not further proceeded with this evening, but that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. The reason I make this appeal to my hon. friend is that I have been appealed to myself, especially from my own province, against the passage of the Bill ; and, to be perfectly candid, I must say to my hon. friend that I was a little prejudiced against it before I had taken cognizance of it. I was under the impression that it was going so far as to compel the medical profession in all parts of Canada nolens volens, to be incorporated ; but I see that subsection 3 of section 6 contains a provision which leaves the medical profession in any province free not to become part of this corporation. This in my estimation ought largely to remove the objection which existed in some quarters against the wide scope of this Bill. Therefore, I would suggest to my hon. friend that the Bill be left on the Order paper, so that before it goes to the final stage it may circulate amongst the medical profession, especially in the province from which he and I come, in order that they may become acquainted with it ; for I think my hon. friend will agree with me that it would be exceedingly inadvisable to carry the Bill to a hasty conclusion, without giving the profession ample opportunity to familiarize themselves with it, and, if it is not absolutely free from objections, to make suggestions which would render it acceptable. The Bill is a very wide one, but I think it will on the whole serve a good purpose if it can be shown to be free from the objections which have been urged against it. Therefore, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. BROCK. Before the suggestion of the Prime Minister is adopted, I wish to say that for some years past a very great interest has been taken in this measure in the province of Ontario, where the medical profession generally are very anxious that it should pass. I have seen some communications from the province of Quebec, signed by a few medical men who are opposed to it for some reason or other ; but, outside of these few men, I believe the great bulk of the medical profession throughout Canada are strongly in favour of it, and I do not think it should be delayed except for really important reasons. The hon. premier has indicated that he himself had some little prejudice against it, but that that prejudice has now been removed. That being the case, I think he might now urge upon his friends from the province of Quebec the great desirability of this measure. I think I am safe in saying that not only thousands of medical men in the other provinces, but also the vast majority of the profession in the province of Quebec, are in favour of it ; and its passage should not be delayed except for some good and valid reason, and not because of some little prejudice by which the medical profession are sometimes liable to be actuated—I say that with all respect to my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Roddick). The demand for this measure comes from one end of the Dominion of Canada to the other. I believe it will be found that one thousand medical men are in favour of it for every one who is opposed to it. Therefore, I would ask my hon. friend the leader of the government to facilitate the passage of this Bill at the earliest possible moment. I think I am safe in urging this, on the authority of the total medical profession of the province of Ontario and right through to the Pacific Ocean. Our desire is that Canada should be one country, and this Bill is one of the means of bringing about that end, and it should not be hampered by any little prejudices. Therefore, I would appeal to the premier to endeavour to remove the objections which are entertained against the Bill, and to allow it to go through at the earliest possible moment.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. I do not think my hon. friend takes the proper view when he imagines that there is any desire to obstruct in any way the adoption of this measure. But it is a departure from the principle that has held in this country since confederation. We are departing from the principle that has hitherto existed governing the medical profession, and therefore I think that before it becomes law we should take care that all parties interested be made fully conversant with its provisions and be given the opportunity of expressing their views should they object to any of them. The Bill before the committee is not that which was introduced, as considerable modifications have been made. It provides specifically for provincial co-operation, in order to make it effective, we should see that the medical bodies which exist in the provinces, whose co-operation is required, should be given every opportunity to give it their careful study. It is not a question of consulting a few people in the province of Quebec. This is considered a serious matter in many of the provinces outside Quebec, and what we have to do is to educate the people of the different provinces to the idea that this is intended for their benefit, and to remove from them any idea that it in any way affects the privileges they now possess.

Mr. BROCK. I quite appreciate that this measure is considered very desirable, not only in the western provinces but in the province of Quebec as well, and I am anxious that no impression should be allowed to be created that it may be injurious to them in any way.

Mr. SPROULE. As there are many important amendments in the Bill as introduced, I would suggest that a sufficient number of copies be struck off to afford medical men all over the country an opportunity of examining it. I do not see any reasonable objection to holding it over so long as it can be got through some time this session.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Have copies been sent to the different provincial governments ?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know, but I believe that members of this House have sent out copies to the medical men in their respective localities.

Mr. WADE. I would like copies to be sent to the medical boards in my province.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Would it not be well to have a number of copies put at the disposal of each member to send out to those interested in the constituency he represents ?

Mr. PARMELEE. As chairman of the Printing Committee, knowing that this was an important Bill, I took the precaution of having a sufficient quantity printed to reach every medical man in Canada. I do not know that hon. members generally have perhaps appreciated sufficiently the importance of this measure, and sent it out to the medical boards in their different counties. The difficulty that I see in connection with the Bill is simply that it is dealing with the subject of education, which is one of those that have been delegated to the provinces.

If I felt sure that this was no encroachment on provincial autonomy, I should gladly support it. I think that the medical profession of the province of Quebec are largely in support of this measure, but we are naturally and reasonably jealous of any encroachment on the rights specially delegated to the provinces by the British North America Act. If that objection be removed, I believe that the Bill will be beneficial in its operation, and perhaps the medical profession in Quebec would realize more advantage from it than the medical profession in other parts of the Dominion, for this reason that our young men are proficient in both languages, and as in all our provinces there are localities where there is a mixed population, a young doctor from the province of Quebec could practice his profession in such mixed communities with greater chance of success than a practitioner tied down to one language. On the other hand, however, I believe in provincial autonomy. I believe in preserving all the rights guaranteed to us under the constitution, and if there was any possibility of this measure being an invasion of that automony, I should be opposed to it. I think that the suggestion of the right hon. the Prime Minister that this Bill should stand over until the medical profession in the various provinces have had time to study it in all its bearings, is a wise one. Nobody is anxious to take any hasty step or to invade in the slightest degree provincial rights or autonomy, and I am therefore quite willing to support the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman that the Bill should stand over for the time necessary to give the different medical boards the opportunity of studying all its provisions.

Mr. MONK. I would like very much to see the Bill stand over, because I believe that some members of the medical profession in Montreal have not appeared before the committee owing to a misunderstanding. I am fully convinced that when they have examined the Bill, probably some notions they have concerning it will disappear. Several French Canadian practitioners in the city of Montreal have told me that they were anxious to see it passed, as they believed it would be of great use to themselves, but none the less is it desirable that all parties interested should be given an opportunity of thoroughly studying it. I see no objection to our letting it stand over for the short delay required. I do not agree with the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Parmelee) that the question of education is touched by this measure. So far as I can understand, the Bill is not an educational Bill in any sense of the word. We would oppose it if it were. I think it is more a Bill coming within the purview of this legislature under the first part of section 91 of the British North America Act. It does not come under section 93 in any way, and I do not think it comes under section 92, but, as I have stated, under the opening lines of section 91. A subject which is for the general interest of Canada, I should call it. However, I should be glad to have a few days in order that our medical practitioners in Montreal may have a chance to see the Bill.

Mr. RODDICK. I accede with pleasure to the wish of the right hon. Prime Minister to postpone further consideration of the Bill. I may say that I have taken some trouble to distribute this Bill—not the very last edition, because it has only been here a few days—but with each fresh edition, I have taken the trouble to distribute it pretty generally in all the provinces. I am quite aware that sufficient time has hardly elapsed yet to allow the profession in distant parts of the country to fully consider the Bill. At the same time, I may say that I have telegrams or other communications from the various boards of the Dominion, practically all to the effect that they have no objection to the Bill. It is true I have nothing from the province of Quebec officially. I am exceedingly sorry that some leaders of the profession, including Dr. Lachapelle, who is the president of the council of the province of Quebec, could not find it convenient to be present at the committee meeting. He is looking into the matter. He has been always in favour of something of this kind, if autonomy is not disturbed. I feel that we shall have in a short time the entire profession of Quebec in our favour.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We had, last night, a rather late sitting, and, perhaps, I should best consult the interest and the wishes of the hon. members by moving the adjournment of the House, which I do.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up to-morrow ?

The PRIME MINISTER. First, we shall take up some Bills, and then go into supply taking up the militia estimates.

Mr. EDWARD A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). Before that motion is put, I would ask the right hon. leader of the government, as it is now only ten minutes past nine, to dispose of the next item, No. 3 of the Public Bills and Orders, which is my Bill to amend the Railway Act. I do not think the discussion will take long. As the matter will have to be disposed of some time this session, and as the hour is still early, I would ask the right hon. leader of the government to be kind enough to allow us to proceed with it before insisting on the adjournment of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER. I see by the Order paper that the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) has been reported on adversely by the committee—that is, the committee recommend that it be not proceeded with further during the present session. As I understand the hon. gentleman wishes to have this reversed and to have the Bill proceeded with this session. The House is very thin—for due cause which we can all appreciate—and I would hope that my hon. friend would not bring such an important question as asking the reversal of the decision of a committee before such a thin House. That is why it seems to me better to adjourn.

Mr. LANCASTER. May I say, then, that I would ask the right hon. Prime Minister to facilitate my going on with this Bill at an early day. Thursday is now taken by the government, to-morrow being the first Thursday so taken. Otherwise this Bill would have come up to-morrow. So, it is pretty hard for one advocating this Bill to have it put off to-night when it could be taken up, unless the government will assist me to go on with it at an early day. I think I am entitled to ask that.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not think that the hon. gentleman requires any pledge from me. I believe that if he is here on Monday evening this item will, in all probability be reached.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). I would like to call the attention of the First Minister to the fact that there are a number of Private Bills on the Order paper. I understand that we are likely to have but one day a week devoted to business other than government business. If that is the case, it seems to me we might subject ourselves to the penance of doing a little work to-night.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Those who sat here until three o'clock this morning will hardly think so.

Mr. CHARLTON. But, if we have but one day a week, we shall have but little opportunity to do this public business.

The PRIME MINISTER. But my hon. friend has had Monday after Monday and other days as well to bring up the business, and again and again the House has adjourned at nine or ten o'clock having exhausted the Order paper. We are coming to the point of the session, when I think we can reasonably hope for the blessing of prorogation. But, if my hon. friend is here on Monday evening, probably the order of Public Bills and Orders will be reached. I see on the Order paper very few notices of motion that are likely to be debated. Of course, I cannot say with certainty, but I think it probable that Public Bills and Orders will be reached, and then my hon. friend will have an opportunity to discuss the items to which he refers.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 9.25 p.m.
