To further illustrate the humiliation that must be felt by every Canadian when he looks into this aspect of the tariff, I may say that notwithstanding the fact that the smelters at Nelson and Trail have given to their customers a rate of freight and treatment more favourable by from $2 to $6 per ton than is given to the Cœur d'Alène miners by the institutions on the American side, yet the mines to which I have referred are practically idle—it is hard to say what the reason may be. But the American Lead Trust ignores the British Columbia ore. It will show you the discrepancy there is between the rates on the two sides, to show you that although it would pay the Americans to take the Canadian ore, yet they will not do it, and are succeeding in stifling a great industry in British Columbia ; and the government seem to shut their eyes to the fact. Take some of the items in the tariff of the United States, and compare them with similar items in our tariff. Pig lead we tax at 15 per cent ; in the United States it pays 2⅛ cents per pound, or something like 60 per cent. Bar and sheet lead pays 25 per cent in Canada ; in the United States it pays 2½ cents per pound, or about 70 per cent. Dry white lead in Canada pays 5 per cent ; in the United States it pays 2⅞ cents per pound, or 60 per cent. Mixed paint in Canada pays 25 per cent ; in the United States it pays 5 cents per pound. Lead ore comes into Canada free ; in the United States it pays 1½ cents per pound. Under the operation of this tariff the American Lead Trust are able to pay and are at the present time paying their miners in the Cœur d'Alène camps something like $3.50 per 100 pounds for the lead contents of their ore, and they maintain the price in the New York market uniformly at something like $4.15 per 100 pounds. That is to say, the Slocan miner only gets $1.46 per 100 pounds for his lead, as against $3.50 which the American miner gets. So great is the discrepancy that the American Lead Trust could afford to pay the duty of 1½ cents per pound, and yet pay to the British Columbia miner more than he is getting at the present time. Whether it is from loyalty to the United States or hatred to Canada, the American Lead Trust ignore the British Columbia ore, and refuse even to give quotations. They say : 'We do not want to treat with you or deal with you in any way.' In other words, they are absolutely stifling that important industry in British Columbia.

Now, I do not say that the full control of our own market would absolutely remedy this evil ; but I do say that of the 28,000 tons which were produced last year, if even half had been treated in this country, and the money spent here instead of sending it abroad to England, Germany and other countries, the condition would be eminently more satisfactory than it is. We have satisfactory railway and smelting facilities ; but the people of British Columbia think that owing to this defect in the tariff, this industry has suffered to the extent I have pointed out. On the other hand, owing to the action of the government in granting a very substantial bounty last year, a refinery is now being built at Trail, and before the present year is over, refined lead will be there treated, it is estimated, at the rate of 18,000 tons per annum. Before this bounty was paid, it was the custom to ship abroad the bullion for treatment at American refineries. This question of lead is a very serious one indeed, and I hope the government will give it their immediate attention.

We have in British Columbia another grievance ; and the remarks I now make have reference to the prosperity of the people of Canada as a whole. During the last 5 or 6 years our people have been particularly prosperous in many industries. That they are united in sentiment is as palpable as that they are obedient to the laws. I need only refer to the settlement of the Manitoba school question. If there is one thing that tended to unite the people of Canada, it was the settlement of that matter by the present administration. There are other directions in which the government might go to give an earnest of their desire to have the people of different portions of this country still further united. There is a danger on the Pacific coast of a difficulty arising in respect to Chinese and Japanese immigration, and I think that danger is menacing and imminent. In fact, the government considered the matter of such importance that last year at the instigation of my hon. friend from Burrard (Mr. Maxwell), myself, and other members from British Columbia, a commission was appointed to investigate the question of Chinese and Japanese immigration into Canada. That commission was appointed early in the year, and very shortly afterwards it proceeded to take evidence on the Pacific coast. That commission visited California, and only the other day made their report. That report is very voluminous, but unfortunately has not yet been published. It has, however, been handed in to the government, and I have had the opportunity of glancing through it. Of course, until it is published and distributed hon. gentlemen will not have that opportunity of discussing it, which I trust they will have this session, and which will be necessary in order to do the matter full justice. However, I may say that sufficient is known by the government and the people most immediately interested to justify the administration in taking immediate steps to cary out the findings of that commission. As far as I could see, there is not one word of information within the covers of that report, which every member, who has ever been returned to this House from the province of British Columbia, has not put before the government at one time or another. The report is simply a reiteration of the old story, and, unlike that made by hon. gentlemen opposite, decides emphatically and unmistakably against the continuance of Oriental immigration. The commissioners have reported that a tax of at least $500 per head should be imposed on every Mongolian coming into this country.

Some 131 witnesses were called. Out of that number 77 were for exclusion and restriction. Only 6 were in favour of unrestricted immigration. The balance were distributed between those in favour of the status quo, in favour of not allowing any more in but not interfering with those who are here, and those in favour of ridding this country of that immigration altogether.

Every line of the evidence, with the exception of the six witnesses I have referred to, goes to justify the administration in bringing down legislation in accord with recommendations made in that report.

The commissioners have the advantage of evidence taken on the American side as well, and there the same story is told. In fact I cannot conceive what argument can be presented against the findings of that report. Some gentlemen will say that there is a trade argument to be considered. They will plead that inasmuch as Canada bonuses steamships, such as the splendid 'Empress' boats, to develop trade between Canada and the Orient, we ought not to embroil ourselves with China by this policy of exclusion. But I would ask those gentlemen to remember that the United States passed an exclusion Act and that this year they have extended the scope of that Act, and yet in spite of that hostile legislation, their trade with China has increased. On the other hand, while Chinese immigration is comparatively unrestricted in Canada, while we have no Exclusion Act, our trade with China has decreased. In the United States the increase of trade with China amounted to $22,000,000 from 1891 to 1900, whereas in the same period the trade of Canada with China decreased from $1,900,000 in 1896 to $860,000 in 1900. So that there is really nothing in that trade argument.

It may be said, however, that it is necessary to have Chinamen in Canada and British Columbia, because there are large tracts of waste land which must be reclaimed, and in the reclaiming of which these Chinamen will do the same good service that they did in California. But there is no analogy in that respect between California and British Columbia. In California there were vast swamps of uncultivated land known as tule lands, and owing to the rush of the whites to the mines and the consequent scarcity of white labour, these Chinamen were serviceable in reclaiming these swamp lands. But no conditions of the kind exist in British Columbia. That province comprises some 300,000,000 acres of land. True many of those acres are mountains, but out of that quantity there must be, at the very lowest estimate, 10,000,000 to 20,000,000 acres of arable land, which we want to keep for white people, and not for Chinamen or Japanese. We do not require coolie labour to make these lands fit for the plough, because there is no better soil under the sun. Although not as extensive as the prairies of Manitoba and the North-west, let me tell you that our arable lands per acre can grow a much larger quantity of wheat than can the soil of Manitoba or the territories. These lands of British Columbia will produce something like 62 bushels to the acre. They will give 99 bushels of oats per acre, and 3½ to five tons of hay. That is a showing which no other lands in the Dominion can make, and we have 10,000,000 or 20,000,000, acres of such lands waiting for people to come in and cultivate them. For such lands as these, we have no need for coolie labour, but desire to preserve that earthly paradise for the people of our own race and blood. Statisticians tell us that an individual can sustain life upon three acres, without the proverbial cow, so that we have space enough for the sustenance of a prosperous community of 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 white people; and we want our government to assist us in bringing those people in and in excluding yellow labour. I do not see why the government will not exert themselves, as they have exerted themselves on behalf of Manitoba and the North-west, in bringing proper immigrants into British Columbia. We have a salubrious climate, and we have fruitful soil. Then—another condition to be considered—we have an advantageous position in regard to exports. To show how productive and prosperous that province is notwithstanding the small population, and notwithstanding what might be called adverse circumstances, I may say that we stand as the third province in our volume of exports in the Dominion. Our exports for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, were $21,648,000. Our imports amounted to $11,137,000. Our entries for consumption amounted to about $10,000,000. Of course, this does not represent all the imports for consumption into British Columbia, because great quantities of goods are consumed there that are imported from other provinces. The amount of duty collected on imports into British Columbia direct was $2,358,842. The other Dominion revenues from British Columbia make the total Dominion revenue from that province $2,530,000. Thus we are not only third in exports, but we are third in the amount of duty paid in imports and third in the amount of revenue. That is some ground for our coming here and asking this government to give us assistance in every way in which we can reasonably ask for assistance.

I trust that, when the report to which I have referred is distributed amongst hon. members, they will weigh carefully the evidence that appears there. And if, at present, they have any deep-rooted opinion that Oriental labour is necessary in British Columbia and in Canada, I am sure that that evidence will show them their mistake, and will convince them that steps should be taken at once to remedy evil under which that province exists. As I have said, I regret very much that I have not had time or opportunity to go through the report in order that I might present such an account of its contents as I should like to do, that I might convince hon. members of the truth of my statement that the finding of that commission is one upon which action should be taken by the government. In that commission's report, there is some very valuable material collected from reports made by United States commissions to investigate this question of Chinese immigration. There is one report, that of the commission which was appointed in 1878, which puts the case in favour of the exclusion of the Chinese in very succinct and unmistakable and incontestable form indeed. I crave leave to refer to it and read a few extracts. It is a very ably prepared report, and I wish to spread out part of it on 'Hansard' so that those who take an interest in this matter may read it:

1. That the presence of the Chinese has had a tendency to degrade and dishonour labour.

2. Their personal habits, peculiar institutions, and lax morals render them undesirable members of society.

3. They cannot and will not assimilate with our people, but remain unalterably aliens in habits, morals, politics and aspirations.

The principal facts upon which these three propositions rest will be briefly considered:

1. The Chinese labourer, in some respects is desirable. He is frugal, thrifty, patient, cheerful and obedient. He readily learns his trade and expertly performs any species of light work. Chinese cheap labour has worked great national benefit to California in its early history, digging its canals, delving in its mines, reclaiming its tule-lands, building its railroads, and in various other ways contributing to the rapid development of its wonderful natural resources. If, therefore, money-making were the only question involved in this contest between the American and Chinese races, it would, in its industrial or labour phase, be promptly decided in favour of the latter. The material advantages of this kind of labour, however, sink into insignificance when compared with the personal considerations at stake—the comfort, the self-respect and decent, honourable living of the labourer himself.

The Chinese labourer does not come up to the American standard of industry. The central idea of our system is that the labourer shall possess courage, self-respect and independence. To do this he must have a home. Home is the mold in which society is cast. There the habits are formed which give character. There the zest and wakeful interest of living center. There the fires of patriotism are kindled. There free institutions find their source and inspiration.

The Chinese who come to this country have no homes. They have neither home feelings nor home interests in any true acceptation of the words. With the conditions of their mode of life they never can have homes. They are willing to work for less wages than will secure homes or comfortably support white labour. In their own country they work patiently and obediently during twelve or thirteen hours for less than one-tenth of what the poorest class of white workingmen receive. In the Pacific states they are willing to work for about one-half the price paid to American operatives. They are able to live upon rice, tea and dried fish, costing upon an average from 20 to 30 cents a day. Underclothing is a luxury almost unknown to them. What clothing they wear is of the cheapest, simplest and coarsest character. They bring with them neither wives, families nor children. One hundred Chinese will occupy a room which, if subdivided, would not accommodate five American workingmen with their families. In such a small space they are packed like sardines in a box, and here they both sleep, eat and cook. Such a place does not deserve the name of home. No tender and loving interests cluster around it, and dull habit alone endears it to them. As enlightened statesmanship would suggest that no material advantages, however great, arising from Chinese frugality and industry, can compensate for the loss of the homes, the comforts and the appliances of personal civilization which have always been enjoyed by the labouring classes of America, and from which springs that spirit of self-respect and manly independence which is the highest result and best security of our political system.

2. Another and more serious objection urged against the Chinese is that their personal and moral habits make them undesirable members of society. The crowded condition in which they live renders the observance of hygienic laws and sanitary regulations almost an impossibility. Neatness and cleanliness is the exception. The air of their apartments is filled with noisome smells and pestilential vapours, threatening disease and death. Property occupied by them is consequently lessened in value and the locality itself is avoided by the white population.

Not only their personal habits, but their moral idea, methods and institutions directly antagonize our own. What we love, they hate; what we admire, they despise; what we regard as vices they practice as virtues or tolerate as necessities.

The religious ideas even of the higher and titled classes in China are pre-eminently wretched; their superstitions numerous and ludicrous, their educational system exceedingly defective, and their civilization effete and decaying. Among the labouring or 'coolie' classes the grade of morals is very low. One illustration of this is seen in their treatment of woman. Her birth is commonly regarded as a calamity. If not destroyed, which is not unusual, she is regarded as a slave and suffers privation, contempt and degradation from the cradle to the tomb. Instances are frequent of the sale for debt by parents of their daughters, and by husbands of their wives, and that too for the worst purposes. Infanticide of girls is practiced to some degree, in all parts of the empire, and in some sections to an alarming extent. Concubinage is a recognized institution. The sanctity and obligation of an oath are disregarded, and the torture is often employed to extort the truth.

Such are some of the characteristics of the class from which nine-tenths of our immigrants come. Respectable persons are deterred both by law and prejudice, and as a rule, only the most indigent and desperate consent to leave their native country. The female immigrants are bought and sold like chattels and practice the most revolting vices and immorality. Born and brought up under these heathenish influences, with these low ideas of law and virtue, coming to our country for the sole purpose of making money, without homes and families without domestic affections or interests; with no high incitements to duty or strong dissuasives from wrong doing; with no adequate sense of special obligation; with no property to pay a fine and with no fear of imprisonment since it brings no greater discomfort or confinement than his usual mode of life; with blunted or erroneous perceptions, grovelling thoughts, gross passions, parsimonious and degrading habits, the Chinaman in America cannot be considered a desirable member of society either from a physical or moral standpoint.

3. The third and principal objection, however, to the Chinese is the fact that they do not assimilate with our people, but remain a distinct and alien element. In this respect they differ from all other voluntary immigrants. The German, the Irishman, the Frenchman, have sought our country as a permanent home for themselves and their posterity. Promptly and cheerfully adopting our habits, customs, and political institutions, devoted to our people, to our government and the laws, they speedily become our worthiest and thriftiest citizens, vindicating in the council chambers of the nation their knowledge of our political principles, and illustrating upon every battlefield where liberty has been attacked the patriotism which such knowledge inspires.

It is not so with the Chinese. They have been in this country over a quarter of a century. Their employment as house-servants and labourers has brought them into close and immediate contact with our people, but no change in them has been produced. What they were when they came here they are to-day—the same in dress, the same in disposition, the same in language, the same in religion, the same in political feeling. They indicate no desire, either by word or action, to become identified with us. They came to us not because they were dissatisfied with the social or political institutions of their own country, but because they believed they could better their condition in life. To make money was their sole object. When they have accomplished this they do not invest their earnings in land or homesteads, but return with them to their native China. They come with no desire or purpose to make this their permanent home. So strong is their feeling in this respect that the poorest labourers stipulate, as a part of the contract by which they sell their services, that their dead bodies shall be carried back to China, and thousands have been thus exported. They have no conception of our judicial or legislative system. They cannot be relied on to perform military duty. They are incompetent as jurymen. Indeed, the only purpose in society for which they are available is to perform manual labour. They bring with them neither wives nor families, nor do they intermarry with the resident population. They have an inferior intelligence and a different civilization from our own. Mentally, morally, physically, socially and politically they have remained a distinct and antagonistic race.

Nor, in view of their strong national prejudices, is there any hope that the future will be different. Instances are numerous where an inferior race has been absorbed and improved by a superior one, but the condition precedent to such a result is the acknowledgment on the part of the lower race of such inferiority. Nations, as well as individuals, must conclude that they need help before they are willing to ask or receive it. The Chinese have not, and never will, come to such a conclusion. Their inordinate vanity leads them to believe their country to be the centre of the territorial system, and they therefore call it the 'midland or central nation.'

They boast a civilization which antedates the birth of Christ; they point with pride to a philosopher, Confucius, whose maxims, as the perfection of wisdom, have become their code of laws. They obey a government which, in their faith, is heaven-descended—an absolute despotism, vast, awful and impressive, whose tremendous and mysterious power regulates their lives or decrees their death, and under which liberty is an unknown idea.

Thus intrenched behind national prejudices, they are impregnable against all influences, and remain a great, united class, distinct from us in colour, in size, in feature, in dress, in language, in customs, in habits, and in social peculiarities. A nation to be strong must be homogeneous. All the elements that attach themselves to its society should be assimilated rapidly into one harmonious and congruous whole. It is neither possible nor desirable for two distinct races to live harmoniously in the same society and under the same government. If this single proposition be true, the conclusion is sound that Chinese immigration should be restricted or prohibited. This conclusion, however, is strengthened by the facts already stated, showing its evil effects upon the industrial and social interests of our people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the very able presentation made by this commission in 1878. The presentation made by the commission, which was handed down the other day, is equally strong, in fact, being more recent evidence, it is stronger than the previous presentation. Some people say: You must allow these Chinamen and Japanese into the country and treat them as the people of the United States treat the negroes. There is no analogy in the world between the negro question and the Chinese and Japanese question; there is no analogy inasmuch as the negroes were not a civilized people. They were not a civilized people when they were taken hold of. The first civilization they knew was the Christian civilization, and they submitted to it, and became incorporated in the body politic of the United States, or of any other Christian country to which they may have gone. That statement applies to any other savage nation; but the Chinese are an old civilized nation, they boast of an older civilization than our own. They have the idea ingrained in them that they are a superior people; and anybody who knows anything about a Chinaman is aware that a Chinaman looks with the utmost contempt, in nine cases out of ten, upon white people. They look with unconcealed contempt upon white women, and would show that contempt in various ways were they not in fear of chastisement from white men. So the case of the Chinaman is totally different from that of the negro. Some entertain the hope that in receiving the Chinaman and treating them well, we would be much more likely to engraft them upon our Christian civilization. Such a thing in my opinion is absolutely impossible; and I make the statement which may appear heterodox, and which I dislike to make very much indeed, that I do not think there is any chance of ever Christianizing a Chinaman whilst he holds the opinion that his religion is superior to the Christian religion. He will pretend that he is a Christian, because he is brainy enough and astute enough to know that he can thereby advance his own interests, and he knows that he is better off in a Christian country. In fact, I do not know of one argument that can be advanced in favour of Chinese immigration. However, the present administration, which has by its policy succeeded in uniting the people at home, I know will go a step further, and make our population more homogeneous by giving us relief against this Chinese onslaught upon the nation, a relief which the people of British Columbia so much desire.

The policy of the government in respect to labour questions is inconsistent with any policy admitting Chinese immigration. How can the government reconcile the labour policy of the Postmaster General with the policy of admitting these Oriental hordes? Of what avail is his 'Labour Gazette,' and his Labour Department, and his machinery for inaugurating and carrying out labour legislation, if, on the other hand, he permits such an anomaly in our political economy to remain as the existence of such an antagonistic element as the Chinese and Japanese? A government which has passed legislation in favour of labour, such as we have had, a government which has done away with the sweating system which grew up under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, a government which has done away with long hours and unsanitary conditions, a government that has inaugurated a system of current wages and has introduced a fair-wage clause in government contracts, a government that has adopted the policy of giving government work to Canadians, that has introduced the conciliation and arbitration principles into their platform, that has made provision for the safety of the labouring man in mines and on railways—surely a government that has done all these things cannot, consistently with their past and present policy, allow this Chinese and Oriental immigration into the country. We must, Mr. Speaker, perpetuate government by the people and for the people, and we cannot do that if we allow Chinese and Oriental immigration. We cannot do that if we allow an element which will destroy our political economy to become established in this country. The government must be an example in every way. It must be an exemplary employer, and I am sure that the government would not for one moment consider the advisability of allowing Chinamen to be employed upon its works, and if it does not allow Chinamen to be employed upon its works, why does it encourage the employment of Chinamen in the industries of the country? It is an absolute inconsistency, and I am quite sure the government will not do so. A Liberal government must preserve the government and resources of Canada for the people of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word in conclusion as to the way we are respected abroad. I have in a very slight way shown that we now enjoy a measure of prosperity unexampled in the history of Canada, that we are united and comparatively satisfied with our present state of affairs. To make the text complete I crave to refer very briefly to the way in which Canada is looked upon abroad. The London 'Times' after the preferential clauses of the tariff were introduced saw fit to make this reference:

> The new departure (the Preferential Tariff, 1897) is most gratifying to all who desire to see the empire knitted more closely together. It is the most remarkable step yet made towards the fiscal confederation of the empire.

The 'Daily News' said:

> As patriots we welcome this significant display of attachment from the greatest of our colonies, and as Liberals we congratulate the leader of the Liberal party of the Dominion.

The London correspondent of the New York 'Times' wrote:

> For the first time in my experience England and the English are regarding Canadians and the Dominion with affectionate enthusiasm.

The London 'Financial News,' a paper that the people of Canada should regard with a good deal of esteem, said:

> We are not grateful merely for what Canada is doing for the mother country in the field, or in the less glorious sphere of commerce. What appeals most strongly to our instincts is the splendid example Canada is giving to her younger sisters.

The 'Bullionist,' another financial paper, said:

> We make bold to say never in the history of an English dependency, and rarely in the history of the mother country, has a finance minister been able to conclude his annual statement with such a stirring peroration as Mr. Fielding in the Dominion of Canada on Friday.

Referring to the presentation of the budget on that occasion. Then, we have, in regard to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and his great work for knitting the empire together, the letter of Mr. Henniker Heaton in respect to the hon. Postmaster General's efforts in behalf of penny postage. He gives credit to the hon. Postmaster General for the inauguration of penny postage and to that extent taking another step towards unifying the empire. Now there is an abundance of evidence of the highest esteem in which the people of Canada are held abroad, and I am quite confident that I have conclusively shown that the people of Canada are obedient to the laws, that they are prosperous in their industry, that they are united at home and respected abroad. That being so, I am quite confident that you, Mr. Speaker, will agree with me that we are justified in assuming that the affairs of the people of Canada are in the hands of men of ability, experience and virtue.

Mr. JOHN CHARLTON (North Norfolk). Mr. Speaker, the fiscal relations of Canada with other countries and especially with the United States at the present time excite a very great degree of attention and interest in the public mind. It is a question which deserves and calls for our careful consideration and deliberation. It may not be, Sir, that revision of our policy at the present time, or definite action of any character is desirable, or called for, but some action of that character is inevitable in the near future, and it is in the highest degree important that the facts relating to our fiscal relations with various countries should be discussed, and should be made generally known to the public. I propose, to-day, Mr. Speaker, at the outset, to make a few references to some events in the past history of the legislation of this country which I think are, in the highest degree, pertinent to the condition of things that exists to-day. I had a great deal of pleasure a short time ago in listening to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), and I can endorse most fully his encomiums as to the good character of the administration of the Mackenzie government, and his speculations as to what would probably have been the outcome of that policy had they continued in power. There is one thing in connection with that administration which I think the administration in power may profitably take into consideration. We had, in Canada, in the early years of the Mackenzie administration, a strong protectionist feeling. That was a question which was discussed to some extent when I first entered politics in Canada in 1872. It was a question which received a good deal of attention in the years 1874, 1875 and 1876 in this Canadian House of Commons. There were in the Liberal party, among the supporters of Mr. Mackenzie, a number of members who believed that the duties should be advanced and that the government should adopt a protective policy of a moderate character and to a limited extent. This policy was advocated by the members for the city of Hamilton who were supporters of the government, by the members of the city of Montreal, who were supporters of the government, by the members of the city of Toronto, by the member for South Brant and by myself. The rate of duty upon the great mass of our importations then was 17½ per cent and the request made by the members of this House and supporters of the government who represented this demand for some advance in the duties was that the duties should be advanced from 17½ per cent to 25 per cent. But, it was well known that an advance to 22½ per cent would have been acceptable and it is even probable that an advance of 2½ per cent, or to 20 per cent, would have allayed the protectionist feeling that existed and would have been accepted with some degree of allowance and grumbling as a solution of the question by those who were demanding an increase of the duties. These demands, it is not necessary to say, were of the most moderate character. There were good reasons for adopting this policy. The revenue of the country was insufficient to meet the expenditure even with the careful and economical administration of Mr. Mackenzie. It was an era of deficits and it would have been the most proper thing in the world to have increased the revenue to a sufficient degree to meet the absolutely necessary expenditure of the government. It would have been done, and very little more than have been done, by the increase of the duties that was asked for.

I do not know—and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) is not present to say—I do not know what the actual desire of the Mackenzie government in reference to this matter was. I suspect however—and I think I have good reasons for the suspicion—that the Mackenzie government were willing to advance the duties to 20 per cent or even to 22½ per cent. But the Minister of Finance of that day was waited upon by a delegation of the members from the maritime provinces headed by the Hon. A. G. Jones, then member for Halifax, and was informed by that delegation that if any advance in the duties was made it simply meant that there would be a bolt of the supporters of the government from the maritime provinces. Well, the members who advocated this policy and who were the supporters of the government in the west, hardly felt justified in taking so extreme a position as to threaten the Mackenzie government with their condign displeasure if it did not meet their wishes, and consequently the government, if it had any intention to advance the duties, abandoned that intention and surrendered to the threats of the Liberal members from the maritime provinces.

At that time we were on the eve of a rearrangement of party issues. If the Liberal party had advanced the duties even by a bare 2½ per cent on the 17½ per cent list, we have reason to suppose that the then opposition would have met that advance by a denunciation of the adoption of a protective policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes. We have reason to suppose so. The advance of the duties, however, was not made. The Minister of Finance in his budget speech in 1876 set at rest our speculations, our doubts, our aspirations and our desires by announcing—as has been announced on the present occasion—that there would be no change in the tariff. That speech was made in the afternoon. The Finance Minister closed his remarks just a little before six o'clock, and in the interval betwen six o'clock and eight o'clock—unless the opposition had deliberated upon this question before, and had resolved what they would do in case the government did increase the duties, and had also made an alternative resolve as to what they would do if the government did not increase the duties, which I am doubtful of—in the space between six and eight o'clock the opposition had decided upon its course; had decided to strike out a bold course; had decided to adopt the policy of protection; had decided to denounce the position taken by the Finance Minister and the Mackenzie administration, and tabled a resolution calling for a readjustment of the tariff of Canada upon protectionist principles.

Well, Sir, we all know the result. Our chances were thrown away. I fought for an increase in the duties, for I believed that the salvation and the existence of the Liberal party depended upon the government taking the course that my friends and myself then advocated. We failed. The duties were not increased. The policy outlined by the resolution of Sir John Macdonald became the policy of the Conservative party. We went to the country upon that issue and we sustained a crushing defeat. Now, Sir, the leader of the Reform government of that day, and the ministers of his administration, in my belief had not the slightest anticipation that they were in danger. They had not the slightest degree of realization as to the character of public sentiment in the country. I felt it. I went to my constituency and held meetings for the two years that elapsed before the elections. I held twenty or thirty meetings in each year, because I felt that my position was in danger. I felt that as a supporter of the Mackenzie government I was liable to be defeated, and in June, 1878, I wrote to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I had previously implored our friends to go into the field, to hold meetings to combat this new principle, and I had warned them if this was not done they were in danger. I wrote as I say, to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie in June, 1878, telling him that in my opinion his government was in a dangerous position, that in my opinion they were resting in a fancied security, and might wake up upon the realization of disaster. I advised him to postpone the date of the elections and to take measures to have this question thoroughly discussed in every riding in the Dominion, and to have this protective policy combatted by good speakers everywhere. Well, I suppose that my good friend Mr. Mackenzie had some little sympathy for me, a poor deluded member from the west who had got scared and who did not realize fully how safe the government were, and how little danger there was of this heresy taking possession of the public mind. The hon. gentleman had the kindness to write me a long letter, to disabuse my mind of the false impressions I had imbibed; to show me that really I failed entirely to apprehend the drift of public sentiment; to assure me that the government was perfectly safe; that there was no danger at all; and that it was folly for me to borrow trouble. He went on to enter into details and to show me the ridings we were sure to carry, the ridings we might possibly loose, the ridings we might possibly gain, and he wound up his survey of the field by the assertion that he would come back to power with a majority of 60 members in the House of Commons. Well, I did not believe it, but when the thunderbolt fell on the 17th of September I must confess that I was paralyzed, for I had no anticipation that there would be a majority of 60 on the opposite side. But such was the case.

Now, the mistake of the government of that time was simply this. They underrated the force of the currents of public sentiment that pervaded the country. They did not realize how strong a hold this doctrine of protection had taken upon the public mind. They failed even to take advantage of the circumstances they might have taken advantage of, by combatting vigorously in every riding in the Dominion this so-called heresy. They failed to do it, and they were beaten.

The opposition party came into power, came into power largely because the Liberal party had failed to understand the drift of public sentiment, and because the Liberal party had refused to do what was a reasonable thing, and a thing they ought to have done. They had refused to make a slight concession to this protectionist sentiment that pervaded the country. What was the great difference between a tariff of 17½ per cent, and a tariff of 20 per cent or even 22 per cent. Each was a revenue tariff. The one was a little more protective than the other incidentally and that was all. However, this concession to public sentiment was refused by the Liberal party and the party fell. Sir John Macdonald came into power. Now, Sir, I am bound to say that the policy inaugurated by Sir John Macdonald—that the changes made by that hon. gentleman were not violent changes; that the changes were not in the strictest sense of the word what might be called radical. It is true that a protective policy was adopted; a moderately protective policy I am bound to say in the light of past events, and speaking as I want to speak candidly and with a desire to present the truth. The duties under the Sir John A. Macdonald tariff were about half as high as the duties in the United States under their protective tariff; they were what we may reasonably assert to have been moderate duties. We went on under that policy for eighteen years; and during all that time we had been dealing with states which, with the exception of Great Britain are protective states—the United States, Germany, France, Russia—all highly protected; only one example of a free trade nation standing out in the whole field—the example of Great Britain.

In dealing with this question, it is easy enough to take the position of a doctrinaire, and to say that this or that corresponds with the teaching of political economy, and that nothing else can be correct; but it seems to me that the proper course for us to pursue at this juncture is to be governed by practical conditions. Theories are all right, but theories may not be applicable to the conditions; and we should be governed by practical conditions. Now, I am afraid I shall be considered an inconsistent man.

Mr. EDWARDS. There is no trouble about that.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend says there is no trouble about that. I must confess that I cannot hold on to the doctrines of absolute free trade, as my hon. friend does, in the light of the experience I have passed through and the knowledge I have obtained. I am afraid that I must confess that I am slightly inconsistent, that I sometimes change and modify my opinions; and on this question I have reached conclusions by a process of reasoning founded on conditions which have come under my notice.

For instance, with regard to our trade relations with the United States, when I became a member of the Joint High Commission, I commenced to analyse the American trade returns; and I found before I had worked at them long, that I had been quite ignorant of our trade relations with the United States, and that the same degree of ignorance had characterized the great mass of the Canadian people. As I proceeded to analyze these trade returns, I found that the policy which the United States had pursued against Canada since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty had been a positively unfriendly and hostile policy—a policy conceived by the desire to keep us from growing and prospering; and that under the operation of that policy of repression they had kept our exports to the United States stationary from 1866 down to this present moment, while we had left our markets open to them through the operation of moderate duties, and they had marched in and practically monopolized the supply of manufactures to the Dominion of Canada. Well, I said, this is not right; something needs to be done. Whether I am a free trader or a protectionist, or whatever my antecedents may have been, this is a condition of things which requires readjustment; it is a condition of things which is not proper or desirable or in our interest to allow to continue. Thus, by a course of experience, of study, of inquiring into the facts, I confess that I have to some extent modified opinions which I may have entertained some years ago. Changed conditions and changing conditions must ever modify opinions; and the man who does not change or modify his opinions, is a man who does not grow—is not a progressive man; is not an intelligent man; is not a man who is influenced by his environment as he ought to be.

When I issued my address to my electors at the last general election, I was, I think, the first public man in Canada to give public utterance to the views which I entertained with regard to our American trade; and I judge that those views were acceptable to my constituents, because I was elected by acclamation; and I think I am justified in making the prediction that the views which were enunciated in that address, and were accepted by the electors of North Norfolk, Conservative and Liberal, are views which will be accepted by three-fourths of the electors of Canada. As a Liberal, I stand here to make these statements, because, so far as my own influence and voice can prevent it, I do not want my party to be in ignorance of these facts or to take a position or enter upon a line of action without being fully aware of the conditions that exist. The government, of course, are not, in my opinion, called upon to take definite action in this matter now. When I tabled a resolution here on the 24th of February, I did so, not for the purpose of defining an issue and challenging the issue as between the government and the opposite party. It was not with that intention at all. I approve of the policy of the government in taking this matter into consideration—in deferring their conclusions as to the course they will pursue, and in the meantime ascertaining what will be the result of the conference at London in regard to the relations of the various parts of the empire to each other. While I sustain my views by every argument which I can advance, while I believe in them and commend them to the consideration of the government, I do not expect that the government is to take them into consideration with a view to definite and final action this session.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHARLTON. I had stated, Mr. Speaker, just before you left the chair at six o'clock, that the change in our fiscal policy, consequent upon the success of the Conservative party in 1878, could not fairly be termed a radical one. And in the same connection, Sir, I would say that upon the defeat of the Conservative party in 1896 and the establishment of the present government, the changes made in the fiscal policy of the country were still not at all radical in their character, with the exception of the feature introduced into the tariff, termed 'the preferential policy.' With this exception, the changes were comparatively slight, and the policy pursued by the previous government was, in a large measure, continued. The promise of the Liberal party to reduce the taxation from the customs duties was, in a measure redeemed by the adoption of the preference in favour of Great Britain—the preference, first, of 12½ per cent, then increased to 25 per cent, and later to 33⅓ per cent. I have never been very enthusiastic about this preference. It was, of course, a method for reducing taxation. It was an indirect, but nevertheless an actual reduction of taxes from customs, so far as the importations from Great Britain are concerned. And to this extent and in this respect those who advocated the policy may feel justified. However, to me it has always seemed that we receive nothing in return for this concession. We are left in the English markets upon exactly the same footing as that occupied by all foreign states. The preference was a sentimental one, an evidence of our good will for England, it was accepted as such, it promotes good feeling, but I think that, so far as a mere expression of sentiment is concerned, a preference of 12½ per cent would have been just as effective as the highest preference. It has wrought consequences that are not such as we can felicitate ourselves upon, because it has reduced the protection enjoyed by certain manufacturing industries below the point this protection should stand at. For this reason I think it would have been a commendable act if some change had been made in the tariff this session to meet that condition of things which has been created by the unusualy reduced production to the woollen industries. However, it is difficult for a government to meddle with the tariff, and a government necessarily shrinks from such a step. It was specially natural for the government to shrink from interfering with the tariff in this case, when it avowed its intention, after the London conference was held and certain conditions settled, so that we may know where we are, to revise the fiscal policy of the country.

Mr. CLARKE. When was that avowal made ?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think we had from the Minister of Finance practically the statement that while the tariff would not be taken up and changes made this session, it would receive the attention of the government another session. And I do not think, if it should receive the attention of the government, that the government can fail to rectify certain abuses that now exist.

I, of course, differ in opinion from the Minister of Finance because it seems to me that the proper time to stop a leak in the roof is when it leaks. But that is a mere matter of opinion, and we will have the matter adjusted later on and in a way I trust satisfactory to all. Now, Sir, as I stated just before recess, it is evidently the intention of the government to carefully consider all these questions that are the subject of discussion at present. It is evidently the intention of the government to see what will be the outcome of the conference to be held in London before making any change in the tariff. It is evidently their intention to place themselves, first of all, in the position of knowing all the conditions and being able to deal intelligently with the fiscal question that may confront them when this House is convened again. In the meantime, I hope that the Minister of Finance in particular will ask himself the question and will proceed to make investigation for the purpose of answering that question satisfactorily to his own mind why nearly all the states, all the nations of christendom, are protective nations except Great Britain ? Is it some insane fatuity that prompts these countries to adopt protection? Are they utterly ignorant of what pertains to their best interests ? Are they rushing blindly and madly upon a course that will land them in serious difficulties and ruin ? Are we to suppose that all these governments are acting without a knowledge of the circumstances best calculated to promote their own interests ? Why, it is natural for a great nation to desire to be self-sustaining, to desire to create within its own borders every variety of industry, to seek to attain that position where it will be independent within itself, where it will have every branch of business carried on and every variety of working men employed in these various branches. And this realization may be attained, must be attained, at the cost of some sacrifice. The question is whether the result is worth the sacrifice. It is worth the while of a nation to impose upon itself conditions which temporarily cost money and entail difficulties and disabilities for the sake of the good that lies before it. That is a question worth while considering.

And how, at this present moment, is Great Britain standing up against this prevalent policy of protection, on the part of nearly every nation with which she has commercial transactions ? Is she maintaining her relative position that she occupied thirty years ago ? Has she command even of her own markets ? She has not. She finds her rivals, the manufacturers of Germany and United States and of France, selling goods in her own markets, underselling her own manufacturers. She meets in every common market the keen and bitter competition of Germany and the United States, and a competition which naturally is growing more formidable. She finds it difficult to maintain her position in many lines. The United States has obtained command of the iron and steel market. It has increased its exports and manufactures, within a very limited number of years, to over $400,000,000 per annum, and when the Isthmian canal is built, the United States will give Great Britain competition in the open door markets of Asia that will trouble not a little the British manufacturers. In our common markets to-day, Germany and the United States are the formidable competitors of Great Britain. Are these two great nations, are their institutions and their development, an evolution from the free trade ideas of Cobden? Not at all. These competitors of Great Britain have been created by a stringent and effective protection, and without the inauguration, adoption and continuance of that policy, these nations would never have attained the position they occupy to-day. These are matters for grave consideration. Why are nearly all the nations in the world protective? Why is it that some common impulse impels these nations to adopt a policy that will develop their resources and enlarge the operations of their labourers, give them a great variety of interests and multiply and fortify their industries? It is because they feel that this is necessary to their development as a nation.

Let us give some little attention to the effect of protection in the United States—the country with which we have the most intimate trade relations, with which we must in the future have the most intimate trade relations, that will have more influence on our destiny than all the rest of the world, in all probability.

Mr. CLARKE. Notwithstanding the preference.

Mr. CHARLTON. Notwithstanding any other influences which may intervene. The protective policy of the United States, I am free to say, has been an extravagant one. It has wrought many evils in that country.

An hon. MEMBER. It is doing so now.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, I admit the truth of that assertion. These evils have been wrought by the fact that the protective policy of the United States, the instrument they use, they applied with too great rigour; that, where moderate duties, such as we have in Canada were sufficient, they have adopted extravagant duties; where a 30 per cent duty was enough, they would have, perhaps, 60 per cent or 75 per cent. And manufacturers in the United States, where they have been able to combine, have been in a position to charge the domestic consumer very much higher prices than they could afford to export for, and did export for. These are evils attending the system, they are evils which are the consequence of the application of the system in a way which was beyond the means required for the development of the industries of the country. But, notwithstanding this, it would be folly to deny or to attempt to minimize the effects which protection has produced in the United States, a country which, to-day, is the greatest manufacturing nation on the face of the globe; a country which, last year, produced more goods than Great Britain and France combined; a country which produced, last year, $13,000,000,000 worth of manufactures; a country which, last year, exported $400,000,000 worth of manufactures; a country which is increasing its export of manufactures with marvellous rapidity. All these things, whether they make a desirable consummation or not, are the results of the system of protection which has been in vogue in the United States, and which has been continued continuously and consistently for over forty years.

It would be interesting to see what the condition of the American export and import trade has been in the period anterior to the period of protection and succeeding the adoption of protection. I draw the line between the two periods; at 1875, although the Morrill tariff was passed in 1861, but the civil war and the inflated currency prevented the system of protection from having its full effect at once. The full and fair results of protection were not attained until the country had emerged from the difficulties attendant upon the war and had resumed a specie payment. And, so I take the year 1875 as the beginning of the period when protection was in full force and the results of protection were fully attained. From 1790 to 1874 is a period of eighty-four years. During that period there were fifteen years when the United States had a balance of trade in its favour, the aggregate amount of these balances being $152,723,000. During the same period, there were sixty-nine years when the balances of trade were against the United States, and the aggregate amount of these balances was $2,150,000,000. Now, the period from 1875 to 1901 is a period of twenty-six years. During that time there were twenty-two years when the balance of trade was in favour of the United States, and four years when there was an adverse balance. The favourable balances aggregated nearly $5,000,000,000, while the adverse balances aggregated $69,000,000. In the last four years the favourable balances of trade in the United States aggregated $2,354,000,000, and, last year, the balance of trade in favour of the country was $664,500,000, and of that amount we provided $71,000,000. Now, these are conditions which I think must convince any candid mind that protection has wrought certain results in the United States; that, whatever may have been the abuses of the system, however crude and improper may have been the application of the details of the system, it has made of the United States the greatest manufacturing nation on the face of the globe. It has increased, as I shall show, presently, its output of manufactures at a marvellous ratio, and it has put the United States far in the van among the nations of the world in the productions of manufactures. In 1860, the census returns of that year gave the production of manufactures in the United States as $1,885,861,000. In 1890, the production of manufactures was $13,000,000,000. The increase of manufactures in this period was at the rate of 688 per cent. In 1860, the population of the United States was 31,000,000; in 1890, it was 76,000,000. The increase of population in that period, therefore, was 145 per cent, while the increase in the production of manufactures was 688 per cent. These figures tell their own story, and that story is that, protection has not been a failure in the United States; that story is that the United States has attained a position among the nations of the globe which makes it the wealthiest nation under the light of Heaven, the greatest manufacturing nation in the world, perhaps the most powerful nation in the world, a nation with its industries developed to the fullest extent, a nation supplying its own wants and seeking the markets of the world, a nation with an educated class of operatives, men of intellectual character, and capable of performing a great amount of work—for it is said that, notwithstanding the high rate of wages in the United States the dollar will purchase more work in the line of manufactures than in any other country. Now, the United States has reached at this moment the position where these excessive rates of protection are unnecessary, has reached a position where protection can be dispensed with, as that country can compete with every other country in the world on equal terms, and without favour either in her own markets or in the markets of the world.

Now, this is what I have to say with regard to protection in the broad field of its operation and application in the world. I have given more particularly and in detail the results in the United States, but the fact that this policy has been adopted and is continued in Germany, Russia and France is evidence, I think, that it must be producing practical results in the same line, or it should be repudiated in those countries.

Now, I come to the consideration of our own trade relations with the United States. I think, Sir, the spirit of the American policy towards us should affect the spirit that we show toward the United States and our policy toward them. I state that as a fact in my belief—that, whatever would be abstractly desirable, concrete conditions should govern our action rather than theories, and that the policy of the United States toward us, the conduct of the United States toward us, the spirit of the United States toward us should have an influence and a direct influence, upon our action, conduct and spirit toward the United States. What have been the salient features of the policy of the United States toward Canada? In 1854, we secured from that country a very desirable and favourable treaty. That treaty remained in operation for twelve years. Under its operation our export trade with the United States quadrupled, and our import trade with the United States increased in almost the same proportion. That treaty conferred upon both countries unmixed advantages and blessings. Although our exports to the United States were slightly in excess of our imports, that was owing to exceptional circumstances, the existence of the civil war in the United States and an abnormal demand for animal products and farm products. Yet, it is certain that, when the war had ended and matters had adjusted themselves to their usual level, our importations from the United States would at least have equalled our exports to that country.

Now, that treaty was abrogated in 1866 without cause, abrogated in a fit of spleen, abrogated in face of the fact that, to offset the exhibition in the Canadian Assembly at Quebec of a little pro-confederate feeling, we had sent 40,000 men to fight in the union armies; and that the great mass of the people of Canada sympathized with the north. I say in face of these facts that treaty was abrogated, avowedly because of some little exhibition of sympathy with the South in the Canadian legislature. Canadians made an effort to avert the loss of the treaty. They admitted that it might perhaps be advisable to enlarge its provisions, to include among the articles for reciprocal interchange, certain manufactured articles. They were ready to consent to any proposition within reason rather than have that treaty abrogated. They were spurned, no propositions were entertained, the fiat of the United States had gone forth that the treaty must be abrogated. The feeling in the country with regard to the Alabama matter and some other matters gave a hostile tinge to sentiment that rendered it impossible to secure any arrangement that would save the treaty.

Now, then, for thirty-five years since the abrogation of that treaty, what has been the policy of the United States? They have continually and continuously, consistently and persistently, adopted and continued a policy of repression. They have sought to shut out our imports from their markets, it has been their fixed and deliberate design to do this—no question about it. We sent to them, in 1866, $44,000,000 worth of the productions of Canada; we sent to them in 1901, aside from precious metals, less than that amount, trade had remained stationary during all these years. That was their policy toward us. What was our policy towards them? We had a scale of duties of about 15 per cent on their manufactured articles, we raised those duties in 1876 to 17½ per cent; we raised them under the policy of protection that was in vogue from 1878 to 1896 to less than one-half the rate of duties they imposed upon our exportations to that country; and to-day, under a Liberal policy, with as large a reduction made in our duties as is possible to make, larger perhaps than is advisable to make, their duties are still as high again as our own; and in consequence of that, while our exports to the United States have remained stationary, our imports from the United States have risen from $28,000,000 in 1866 to $119,000,000 in 1901. While in 1866 we sold them $25,000,000 worth of farm products, in 1901 we sold them a little more than $8,000,000; we had reduced our sale of farm products to one-third of what it was in 1866. But while we have given them a larger market for their farm products than they gave us, while we have increased our importations to three-fold, almost four-fold, what they were in 1866, they still continue this same policy, this deliberate policy of shutting us out of their markets.

Now, what are we going to do? Of course our tariff to-day does not exactly suit the United States, they would rather have us remove all duties and give them absolute control of our market. But the tariff suits the United States about as well as they can ever expect any tariff will suit them. It suits them so well that they are able to sell us three times as much as they buy from us; it suits them so well that they have control of our markets for manufactures; it suits them so well that while we are their third best customer in the world, their custom, so far as we are concerned, is of comparatively very small value indeed. And what we want to do is to avoid earning their contempt by refusing to stand this kind of treatment. And how will we do that? Well, we want to place ourselves in a good trading position, we want to place ourselves in a position where we have got something to offer in return for something that we ask. We have got nothing to offer now except that we might enlarge our free list, which is already too large. We might let down the bars, which are already too low, while our neighbour has a stake and ridered fence in front of us but it is not desirable to do this.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I do not suppose, sympathizes with my ideas; I gathered from what he said the other night that he scarcely does. I would not expect that the hon. gentleman would do so fully, for I do not think that he would voluntarily incur the odium of inconsistency that would attach to him if he who refused to advance the duties in 1876 to 2½ per cent to allay the protectionist sentiment, were to go as far as I am prepared to go to-day. I think he will maintain his consistency, nail his colours to the mast, and sink, colours and all, if it is necessary to do so. I was very much pleased with his speech the other night. I admired his masterly analysis of the census returns. If his premises were correct, it was a very marvellous exposure of a great outrage—and I have no reason to say that his premises were not correct. I endorse fully his admirable forecast of what would probably have been the outcome of the policy for the Mackenzie administration if it had continued in power. The common sense policy for the North-west was holding the land for the settler and the construction of a Canadian railway to be owned by the government, and I think the country would have profited vastly by the continuance of Mr. Mackenzie in power, even if he did not rise the duties 2½ per cent.

Mr. CLARKE. After the experience we have had of the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think perhaps we would have had a better experience, for the road would have been built under different auspices and by a different party. Then I admired the hon. gentleman's justification, plausible, to say the least, of the increase of the expenditure. I do not think that matter could have been presented in a better, a more ingenious, a more convincing light than it was presented by the Minister of Finance. I think so far as the hon. gentleman and myself are concerned that we might honestly reach different conclusions in measuring the effect of recent developments and influences. It is not necessary for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to believe as I do. I respect his convictions. It is not necessary for me to believe exactly as he does, and I trust that he will respect my convictions. I look upon the character of our trade with the United States with deep resentment, perhaps he does not. That is a matter for us to consider calmly, fully and fairly when we discuss this question, as we shall do for weeks and months to come.

And just here, by way of parenthesis, I may refer to a story my hon. friend told, a story in which I figured to some extent as one of the characters. The hon. gentleman said that I was a very devout man, that I had stated on several occasions in the House that I was. Well, I wish to affirm, Mr. Speaker, that I never said on several occasions, or on one occasion, in this House that I was a very devout man, and I have never claimed to be anything else than a very great sinner. It is very true, Mr. Speaker, that I have taken in charge, and to the best of my ability, promoted and urged certain legislation in this House. One Bill I did, after a long struggle, succeed in getting upon the statute-book. I took up another subject and I did not succeed with that. Now, I always realized, Mr. Speaker—I say this to you in confidence—I always realized in taking charge of these Bills, that I was doing a most unpopular thing, that I was losing caste with my fellow-members, that I was making myself a subject of ridicule. I felt that from the start, and I certainly did not go into this for the sake of popularity. I fought one Bill persistently, and I think courageously, until I secured a success.

I fought the other Bill in the same way until I came to the conclusion that success was hopeless and then I abandoned it. So far as any political return, or any return in the shape of popularity among my fellow members was concerned, I never expected to get it, I never did get it and it has been to me, as far as my position in this House is concerned, undoubtedly a detriment. I felt that to be the case then and I feel it still. In regard to the story of my hon. friend it was not exactly correct. He has a good sense of humour but he was guilty of attributing the vision of some person to me. I told the story as being the vision that somebody else had. I never had a vision myself and I do not ever expect to have one. If I were asked to tell the story again and to make the application now, I should say that the probability would be that the person having the vision would see the souls hung up to dry, because they were too green to burn, of men who were satisfied with our present trade relations with the United States and intend to permit them to continue and who had no idea of resenting the conduct of the country which treats us in such a manner.

I gave very careful attention and consideration to the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax). I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I entirely disapprove of his position on the reciprocity question. I disapprove of that position in toto. I am sorry to see an attempt to create in this country a sentiment adverse to the securing of reciprocity with the United States upon fair and reasonable terms. We are two countries, existing side by side, with the same boundary for 4,000 miles, each of us possessing about 3,000,000 square miles of the North American continent, with railways binding us together by networks for intercommunication, with water courses serving as a boundary between the two countries and inviting communication, with geographical conditions between the two countries knitting us closely together, with a similarity of races, laws, religions and institutions. Practically one people, nature designed that these two great countries should have intimate trade relations and the ingenuity of adverse and hostile fiscal legislation has not been able to prevent a large development of intercommunication between these countries. If we remove the barriers, if we place the fiscal relations of these two countries upon a mutually fair basis we will have an enormous development of commerce and one which would be profitable and advantageous to both peoples alike. We have obtained a very satisfactory development of trade with Great Britain. We have built up an export trade in farm products with that country of a most satisfactory character. We owe to Great Britain fair treatment, fraternal treatment, but, it is not necessary for us to confine our attempts to create a profitable market to one country, or one hemisphere; and while Great Britain with her forty million inhabitants is a good market, we compete with all the nations of the world, and we compete upon conditions which place us, in some cases, at a disadvantage. We cannot reach the markets of England as easily as can France, or Germany, or Russia, but, the United States with 76,000,000 inhabitants is at our doors. We can reach the markets of that country with a facility and ease that no other country can. We have here almost within telephone call—yes, within telephone call—teeming millions of people in great centres of population and markets that we can reach more readily than even the states of the west, and for people to say that we do not want trade relations with this country, that we do not want reciprocity, that we will throw the whole thing over and sacrifice this great American trade, is preposterous nonsense. What we want of the United States is not non-intercourse, not repression, but what we want of the United States is fair play, what we want of the United States is an equal chance with them, a chance to get into their markets on as good terms as they get into ours.

Mr. CLARKE. How do you hope to get it?

Mr. CHARLTON. If we cannot get it we can do the other thing. If we have to do the other thing we will do it, but I would deprecate it. I would adopt another course as a last resort. I would only resort to it if nothing better could be done. There is one thing to be borne in mind in connection with this American trade. If we adopt a system of protection in Canada, we do it for the purpose of manufacturing in our own country the goods that we import from abroad, of having in our own country the artisans who produce these goods so that we can feed them. One thing that affords us a cause of complaint against the United States is that we import over $60,000,000 worth of manufactures from that country, and we are not allowed to send to them even a small portion of the food that the operatives who produce these goods consume. What we want is a chance to reach that already created market, that market that exists to-day, that exists by virtue of the production of thirteen thousand million dollars' worth of manufactured goods. If we go to work to create a market we can do it, but it will not be as great a market, not as valuable a market, and it will take years and a vast sum of money to do it. If we can get access to the market of the United States, to the market that has been created by a period of forty years of protection, will it not be better to attempt to do that than to attempt to create a market ourselves ?

Mr. POPE. No sir.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is preposterous to say no. These, in brief, are the reasons why I deprecate the enunciation of a policy by the hon. leader of the opposition adverse to reciprocity. There never has been a time since the reciprocity treaty of 1854 was negotiated and went into force that Canada was not anxious for trade relations with the United States of a broad and liberal character. We enjoyed these relations for twelve years and profited immensly by them. We have been anxious to secure them ever since that time. We have sent deputation after deputation to Washington but we have not been able to get them up to this time. I do not want to give up the race yet. If we cannot get them we simply would have to do without them and adopt another policy if there is no other alternative.

Mr. CLARKE. Why did you not get them in 1898 when you were over there ?

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, we came very near getting a good treaty. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman (Mr.Clarke) what the details are, but, he would probably have been highly satisfied if it had not been for a little trouble that intervened between the trade treaty and something else. The condition of trade between these two countries at the present time warrants us in saying to the United States : Give us reciprocity in natural products. Not that we will promise you any mitigation of our tariff system. We will not agree to put a single article more on the free list. We will not agree to reduce our duties unless we choose to do so, we are entitled on the basis of the conditions as they exist to-day to reciprocity in natural products. If we can get it, it is all right ; if we cannot, we cannot get what we are entitled to. If we can get it what would be the result ? Would it be worth while ? Some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will say no, I presume. I cannot agree with that view of the case. If we could get reciprocity we would have free coal. We imported last year nearly 3,000,000 tons of bituminous coal for manufactures and railways and this paid a duty of fifty-three cents a ton. If we had reciprocity this coal would come in free and we would send to the United States, if their duty were removed, a much larger amount than we send now. We sent last year nearly $5,000,000 worth of coal to the American market ; we would vastly increase that business ; it would be a mutual advantage in the coal trade. If we had reciprocity in natural products we would have the competition of American buyers here for the purchase of all the articles we sell for export. We would have that competition for wheat, for oatmeal, for flour, for cheese, for butter, for meats, for fish, and the competition thus created in the matter of wheat for instance, would be worth more to the producer in Canada than a five per cent preferential duty in England would be. It would have the effect of raising the price of wheat to a greater extent than five per cent preference, because it brings in active competition, and it would be impossible to create a ring to put the price down (as now is sometimes the case) below the level at which it should be. We would have an increased price for lumber to the extent of the duty we now pay. We would have a vast trade in quarry products. We have, all along the northern shore of our lakes, quarries of sand stone, quarries of free stone, quarries of granite, quarries of marble, and on the other side of the lake we have vast cities like Milwaukee, Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland and Buffalo, that would furnish a market for millions of dollars worth of these quarry products where we now do not sell a ton. We would have a great market for our mine products ; a market for millions of tons of iron ore, besides what we need to use ourselves. We would have an increased and better market for fish, and we would have a market for our farmer's products and all kinds of products in these great cities which have congregated in them many millions of people within easy reach of us. We would have a market in these cities at American prices whereas, now we have to sell, if we sell at all, less the exorbitant duties charged. We would probably have free pulp and free paper in exchange possibly for free pulp wood. These are a few of the advantages that would accrue to Canada from reciprocal free trade in natural products.

Our trade with Great Britain has been built up by the adoption of business methods ; by cold storage, by pushing our trade intelligently, efficiently, energetically. The same course pursued with regard to the United States, if we had access to that market, would build up an enormous trade for us with that country and would add enormously to the wealth and prosperity of Canada.

My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, tells us in his resolution that he is in favour of 'reciprocal trade preference within the empire.' What does that mean ? What would literally 'reciprocal trade preference' be between Canada and Great Britain. Great Britain admits everything we send there free of duty, manufactures, natural products, anything and everything. A reciprocal preference for us would be to admit free everything coming here from England. Is that what is meant by the resolution ? Of course that is a policy that would be highly satisfactory to England, but would it be satisfactory to Canada? That is literally a reciprocal trade preference between the two countries. You cannot have it. We never can have it. What does the leader of the opposition mean? Does he mean that England is to readopt the corn laws?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. Well, I hope that is correct. I would not object to see the corn laws readopted and preferential duties imposed on wheat and lumber in favour of the colonies. But does any man here suppose that England is going to do that—that is to the extent of affording us any tangible advantage. Five per cent would be a mere bagatelle, a bauble. Ten per cent might be of some little advantage in wheat and lumber, but anything less than ten per cent would not be worth consideration.

Now, if my right hon. friend the leader of this government and those associated with him, when they visit London, can secure from Great Britain a concession of a tangible character that will give us a preference in the British market for our wheat, for our cheese, for our lumber, for the various products we send to that country; then we will stand the 33⅓ per cent preference and we will have then to face new conditions that will require a revision of our policy, or that at all events will require careful consideration. But I think perhaps we will have to wait until we see what success is scored by our representatives in this matter before we build very much expectations on the result of that conference.

Then as a corollary and necessary adjunct to this policy of reciprocity in preference, within the empire comes the question of Imperial defence. There is a great deal said about Imperial defence. A great many men are so ardent in their Imperial predilections that they want to see some kind of a legislative or defensive union existing between Great Britain and her colonies; some central authority that will designate what we shall pay and what we shall do. Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe Canada should preserve absolute autonomy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I have not the slightest doubt of that. The union between this country and Great Britain is a union of sentiment. The aid we have given to Great Britain in her emergency has been voluntarily rendered. Sir, while we are ready to make sacrifices; while we cherish the feelings we do towards the mother country, we can never allow the mother country, we can never allow anybody else to say how much we must do. It must rest upon the voluntary decision of ourselves as to what we will do, and nobody else must be in a position to say what we shall do.

We will make great sacrifices to preserve the empire. We realize the importance of this Imperial connection. We realize the importance of the English market that takes 82 per cent of our agricultural products. We realize that fully. We cannot afford to let Great Britain be blotted out. Why, Sir, if it comes to a question of life and death, Canada would give her last man and her last dollar to avert that calamity; but we cannot put ourselves in a position in which we will be deprived of the initiative in deciding what we shall do.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPROULE. We could discuss it.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have already made sacrifices; sacrifices of greater consequence than is generally imagined, for Imperial purposes. The Canadian Pacific Railway is really an Imperial road. Every dollar expended in that road is a dollar of expenditure that accrues to the advantage of the British empire. That is a military road; a military avenue of the greatest importance to England. If the time ever comes when the question arises as to whether this country shall be blotted out or not; if that time ever comes we have got to do the business of defending ourselves, to a large extent. That emergency will never confront us in any supposable event except in the case of war with the United States; and in case of war with the United States is it to be supposed that Canada would make smaller sacrifices, would make less exertions than England would. Why, Sir, we would have to put forth superhuman exertions. The brunt would fall upon us. I repeat that Canada never needs to put herself in a position where she would lose her autonomy.

We have the resources for a great nation; we will become a great nation. It should be our object to make this a nation that will be an example to the world—a nation possessing the best institutions and the best laws, and the freest population. We have a territory that gives us room for 100,000,000 people. We do not want to play second fiddle to any one. We do not want to be put into the position of a fifth wheel to any other combination or to any other nation. So much for these questions of reciprocal conditions within the empire; of reciprocity with the United States upon reasonable and favourable conditions, and of Imperial defence.

Now, it has been said, Mr. Speaker, that really this great import trade from the United States is a trade that we cannot dispense with; that although it is very large yet all these imports are indispensable to us; that we take them from the United States because we have to have them, and that there is no help for us. They may take more or they may take less from us, but we must take from them all that we now import. Now, our total free imports from the United States amount to $56,000,000, or eliminating coin and bullion, $53,549,000. On this free list the articles that are indispensible which we import from the United States include the following :—

Raw cotton..	$4,731,812
Tobacco leaf..	1,720,589
Wool..	389,289
Hides and skins..	2,432,297
Anthracite coal..	7,923,950
Coke..	679,915
Hardwood and manufactures of—axe handles, spokes, felloes, &c.. ..	1,500,000
Miscellaneous articles.. ..	2,000,000
Total..	$21,386,852

Thus there are $21,386,000 worth of indispensable articles which we import from the United States out of the free list of $53,500,000; and on that free list there are the following articles which we can dispense with :

Indian corn..	$6,484,181
Flax seed..	662,696
Miscellaneous articles	1,000,000
Free manufactures..	18,000,000
Total....	$36,146,877

This leaves $6,000,000 of the imports on the free list unclassified. Possibly one-half of these we could dispense with also.

Now, Sir, we import from the United States $65,000,000 worth of manufactures, of which $22,000,000 are free of duty. We can produce in this country at least $40,000,000 worth of that list. We can shut off the imports of Indian corn, flax seed, meats, and a lot of other things in the food line. If we adopt a policy towards the United States as stringent as theirs is towards us, we can reduce our imports from the United States from $50,000,000 to $55,000,000, and bring down our list of imports to the lean and beggarly dimensions of our list of exports. Now, Sir, we do not desire to do this. We would rather increase our exports to the United States by $55,000,000. That is what we want to do. This diminishing of our imports is a heroic remedy which we may adopt if we can do no better ; but we want to do better if we can, and the terms of my resolution submitted on the 24th of February, are directly along that line. It proposes to give to the United States the same status in our markets that England enjoys, if they give us the same treatment that England does, that is, the free admission of our natural products. It proposes to give to the United States the disability of forty or fifty per cent more taxes than Great Britain would pay, if they do not give us the same treatment. It is a plain and simple remedy. We are not called upon to impose it just now; but we may as well talk this matter over. We may as well talk it over a little among ourselves; we may as well talk it over a little with the United States.

I thought it desirable to present these views wherever I have had an opportunity. I have done it at various places in the United States before influential audiences, and I have never done it without producing a marked effect. I have never done it without having had the assurance given to me that this question had not been understood, that my views were correct, and that the United States ought to do exactly what I suggested—give us free trade in natural products, and if they did not do that, they would have no reason to complain if the very policy which I have foreshadowed were adopted.

We want to continue these missionary efforts in the United States; and if the American people come to understand the case, they will take a different position from what they have taken in ignorance of actual conditions. They have been led to suppose that the United States market was essential to Canada—that we lived and moved and breathed in their favour, and could take no line without them. We want them to understand that while the United States take 8 per cent of our exports, England takes 82 per cent; we want to let them know that we can get along without them as well as with them ; and if we take pains to present these views to the American people, we shall have a state of sentiment created in that country that will be favourable to a settlement of our trade relations on a basis that will be reasonable.

For these reasons I have not lost hope that the Joint High Commission has not yet exhausted its efforts or ceased its career of usefulness. I am in a position to say that it has had a career of usefulness. I cannot of course disclose to the public what was done. But I am anxious to see that Joint High Commission meet once more. I am anxious to ascertain, as a result of that meeting, whether these questions can be satisfactorily adjusted or not. When we have definitely ascertained one way or the other, we shall know what course we ought to pursue; and if we cannot get fair-play, we can at least place ourselves in a position where we shall not merit and receive the contempt of the American people.

These views and arguments are submitted simply for consideration. As I said before, while I would have been pleased to see the government make some concessions to satisfy the demands of the aggrieved industries of this country, in two or three cases at least, yet I understand how difficult and dangerous a task it is to re-open a tariff. And so I accept the situation. But I have placed my views before the House, and I will leave my statements and arguments to have such weight as they may have with the members of the government, and when the time comes, after the conference has met, when we shall know more definitely than we do now, where we stand, then the government will take its course and decide on its line of conduct, and every member of this House can take his course and decide whether he can support the line adopted by the government or not.

Mr. W. C. EDWARDS (Russell). Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in the introduction of his remarks, referred to the position of affairs prior to the time that Mr. Alexander Mackenzie went out of power in this country. He makes the statement that a request was made on the part of certain followers of Mr. Mackenzie to advance the customs duties 2½ per cent. He states that Mr. Mackenzie meant to accede to that request, but that because of certain representations made to him by members from the lower provinces, he abandoned that intention, and as a consequence a protective system was advocated by Sir John Macdonald, and in the election which ensued Mr. Alexander Mackenzie was defeated and Sir John Macdonald triumphantly elected. He attributes that defeat entirely to the fact that Sir John Macdonald had adopted protection as his policy, and that Mr. Alexander Mackenzie had adhered to his former views in favour of a low revenue tariff. He deprecates the action of Mr. Alexander Mackenzie at that time, not because of the principle involved, but because he was defeated at the polls as a consequence of his action. Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret to hear the statement the hon. gentleman has made, because I am one of those who believe, as I always have believed, if that was the cause of the defeat, that Alexander Mackenzie accepted defeat rather than give way for one moment on the principle which he held to be in the best interest of the Canadian people.

The hon. gentleman tells us that he advised the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie that he would be defeated if he did not accept the hon. gentleman's views on the tariff question. Well, Mr. Speaker, what value can we place on the opinions of the hon. gentleman, what reliance can we put in his professions, what credit can we give him for political honesty, when we follow his subsequent record? Since the day when he tells us he gave Mr. Mackenzie that advice, he has been in turn, according as the wind suited, a free trader, a commercial union man, an advocate of reciprocity, and to-day we find him blooming forth again in all the colours of a most pronounced protectionist. There is one quality for which we must give the hon. gentleman credit, and that is that whatever role he assumes, he plays with all the apparent sincerity of a consummate actor. In each particular phase, no matter what may be the particular policy he advocates at the moment, no matter how it may differ from views he held on any previous occasion, he addresses the House and seeks to impress on the government his momentary convictions with all the gravity and seriousness of a Nestor, and so to-day we find him exhorting the government in his usual fashion and threatening that if they do not accept his advice and adopt his views on protection, defeat stares them in the face at the next election. It would be interesting to have the hon. gentleman explain how it was that, in spite of his arguments against protection in the campaign of 1896, the protectionist government of that day met so crushing a defeat at the polls.

Referring again to the defeat of Mr. Mackenzie in 1878, the hon. gentleman went on to explain that while Sir John Macdonald on being returned to office, did adopt a protectionist tariff, it was but a moderate one—not half so high as that of the United States, and then proceeded to argue that if the United States have enjoyed very great prosperity, it is due to their high protection. And, he added, the conditions in that country are to-day such that protection is there no longer needed. In Canada, however, it is desirable that we should adopt as high a tariff as the Americans, and the adoption of such high protection, the hon. gentleman claimed, would be productive of equal prosperity. I dissent entirely from those views. My hon. friend, as he has very clearly shown the House to-night, is now a protectionist to the hilt. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am a free trader to the hilt. As such, I dissent entirely from the hon. gentleman's view on the question of the balance of trade. I deny that because the balance of trade is in favour of the United States, that it is any evidence of the prosperity of that country. That, in fact, is the only argument which the hon. gentleman used to show that the United States were enjoying a great measure of prosperity in consequence of high protection. If that argument be well founded, how is it that the balance of trade has been so enormously against Great Britain ever since the days of the introduction of the Corn laws? And no one will deny the great progress in manufactures, trade and commerce—a progress which has not been paralleled in any other country in the world—which has taken place in Great Britain since she adopted the policy of free trade. I take the contrary view to that taken by my hon. friend. I say that if the United States had made all the development and progress, which it should have made, the balance of trade would have been against it. In a new country like the United States, into which a large influx of population was yearly flowing, the balance of trade should have been against it, and the fact that it was not, is proof that the United States was not making the development and progress it should have made.

The hon. gentleman went on to point out that it is only in recent years that the United States had exported largely of manufactured goods. Every one who knows the condition of the country knows that to be true. Until very recently the United States paid for all its foreign purchases in agricultural products. And I ask how it is possible that the agriculturists of the United States could show their best results when they were taxed so largely and unduly in favour of the home manufacturers. While it is possible to protect the manufacturers, it is perfectly impossible to protect the agriculturists of a country like the United States, and equally impossible to protect the agriculturists of Canada. The conditions in Canada to-day are very similar to those in the United States. It is only within the past few years that we have begun to export in any degree manufactured goods. Our exports have been the products of the farm, fisheries, the forest, and the mines; and I ask you how are you going to enrich the farmers, the fishermen, the lumbermen, the miners, of Canada, by taxing them for the benefit of our manufacturers? Their products have to be sold in the markets of the world in competition with the products of the world; and if our farmers, fishermen, lumbermen and miners, are to make their best development and progress, they must be permitted to buy in the same way as they have to sell. They must be permitted to enjoy in their favour the same free competition that they have to fight against. Holding these views, I cannot agree with my hon. friend in the hope he expresses that after the London conference this government will raise the tariff. On the contrary, I, as a free trader, will not be able to support any government which raises the tariff any higher, as against the interests of the great producing and consuming masses of Canada. Let the agriculturists, the great producers of the wealth of Canada, have a chance to exist. Give them a chance to enjoy the results of their own labour. Give the producer of the natural wealth of Canada that position, and I am not afraid for the position of the manufacturers of Canada. I think I heard one of the speakers say this afternoon that certain factories in Canada that had very high protection were yet idle, and he thought that was a reason why the government, for the purpose of having these industries here, should raise the duties and give still further protection. I think the best reason that could be given why these factories should not be in Canada, at any rate to the extent to which they are developed, is the fact that they are not able to live under the high protection that they have to-day.

My hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) next came to the preference given to England, and stated that he was opposed to it, or, at least, did not particularly favour it. I am much surprised to hear a protectionist talk in that way, though such ideas would seem quite natural when expressed by a free trader like myself. I never was imbued with the idea of that preference, nor am I now. I think it is wrong in principle. In matters of trade, I am perfectly willing to buy from even the Chinese or the Japanese or from any other people who will sell to me the cheapest. No greater mistake has ever been made than to imagine for a moment that it is against the interest of Canada to buy the cheap productions of another country. What does such buying mean? It simply means that for the labour of Canada we are receiving a larger return than we otherwise would receive. Some hon. gentlemen who have spoken seem to be imbued with the idea that every country should be protected against every other country. What would that mean? It would simply mean the limiting of commerce. And, if the limiting of commerce is what is wanted, it would be as wise to protect individuals in a country against one another as to protect nations against one another, and that shows that the proposition is absolutely absurd—there is no common sense in it. The hon. member for North Norfolk spoke of the great prosperity that the United States enjoys. It is true that the United States has been prosperous. It is true also that the United States has had a protective tariff and has to-day. But it is also true that the United States has enjoyed a great measure of free trade, because the great north, the great south, the great east and the great west of the United States have been free to trade with one another. I would like to ask one question of those who think that the proposition of protection is a sound one. Suppose you move the boundary northward and take in the whole of Canada as part of the United States, would Canada enjoy greater prosperity in commercial matters? Every person would answer that question in the affirmative. There can be no doubt about it whatever. Then, what common sense can there be, as a matter of commerce, in placing these barriers to commerce between the two countries? There is no common sense in it at all. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) also advises that England should adopt the protective system. Well, I want to ask what, under the sun, England would do under such a condition as that? The hon. gentleman said that Germany, France and the United States were invading the English markets and that, therefore, protection should obtain in England, and let England trade with herself. This is in line with the idea of protection, which is simply that each country should confine itself to itself in trade. England would indeed be a great country under such conditions. I am surprised that any hon. gentleman who knows anything of commerce should support such a proposition. It is utterly childish. England would be absolutely ruined under such conditions. The hon. gentleman next came to the matter of our trade with the United States, our large purchases from that country and our small sales to that country. But he further stated what a splendid condition of affairs existed in our trade with England, because we were now exporting largely to that country, but, that notwithstanding the preference, we were not buying so largely from that country. Is it not natural that the country to which you export the larger portion of your goods should be the one from which you would buy what you require? That would be a much more natural proposition in our case than that we should send the goods to England, and that England should send the balance, if there be a balance, to the United States in liquidation of our trade balance due that country. Why does this condition exist between Canada and England ? I deny absolutely that it is because of the preferential tariff, but hold that it is simply because, being adjacent to the United States, bordering for hundreds and thousands of miles upon that country, our trade necessarily is greater with the United States than with a country more distant. Moreover, the goods manufactured in the United States are, very largely, the goods we require. Take for instance, in agricultural implements, which we buy very largely from the United States. Why are American agricultural implements bought in the western portion of Canada where implements are not manufactured ? Why, what would the protectionist want ? He would want the farmer of the Northwest to send his grain to the markets of the world and then buy what he required in the east to be transported to the west, instead of buying across the border which is the most natural thing to do.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) will allow me, I would like to ask him a question. Is he not aware that a large number of agricultural implements manufactured in the United States are brought into Ontario, although agricultural implements are manufactured in this province ?

Mr. EDWARDS. If large quantities of agricultural implements are being brought into Ontario from the United States, as I believe they are, all the more disgrace to the manufacturers of agricultural implements in Ontario. There could not be a better argument against their existence than that they are not able to compete with the American manufacturers, even with the protection that they have. Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) further says that he is opposed to reciprocity within the empire as suggested by the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition. It seems strange to me as a free trader that a protectionist should agree with me on that point. I also am opposed absolutely to any such proposition. While I am loyal to Great Britain in every way, while I am most desirous that the greatest glory and the greatest prosperity should attend the empire, I believe that every producer in Canada should be a free man and should be allowed to exercise his rights to sell where he pleases and to buy where it suits him.

What is commerce ? Commerce is an interchange of the surplus products of labour, and when you attack commerce you attack labour, yes, and when you attack commerce you attack the labouring man. The proposition, Mr. Speaker, that you can protect the labouring man is the greatest absurdity that ever was spoken. You can no more protect the labouring man than you can protect the farmer. You cannot protect the farmer of this country. Any man who pretends for a moment that he can protect the farmer of Canada knows nothing about the proposition. Any man who says he can protect the labourer in any country of the world knows nothing about the proposition. It is absolutely impossible to protect labour. Now I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if labour can be protected, why did not the United States, that great protectionist country, protect the labourer from 1873 to 1879 ? Taking the period from 1893 to 1898, I ask you why they did not protect labour in that great protectionist country ? Labour fell to a lower point even during those years than it did in Canada. I ask you why protection, in that great protectionist country, did not maintain continuously the good times that its friends claimed it would do ? Simply because under protection it is impossible for good times to be maintained. Under free trade conditions the labourer receives, and always will receive, the greatest reward for his labour. Protection simply means robbery of the labouring man, protection simply means robbery of the farmer, and of every man in Canada who is producing its natural resources. Protection in my estimation is nothing more or less than legalized robbery. Holding these views as strongly as I do, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. gentleman who spoke before me that he could change his views but I was not progressive enough to do so—I never will be progressive enough to join a band of robbers.

Mr. SPROULE. I want to ask the hon. gentleman one question. When he says that labour always fares best in a free trade country, why is it that labouring men come from England, the only free trade country in the world to Canada and the United States, which are protectionist countries, and do better here ?

Mr. EDWARDS. Germany is one of the highest protective countries in the world, England is free trade. In England the labourer receives 70 per cent more than he does in Germany. Will the hon. gentleman explain that ? Mr. Speaker, that is the effect of protection upon labour. Why do we have depressions in commerce ? We have depressions in commerce, and have them periodically, simply because, during those times which are called prosperous times, too many men are diverted from their proper channels of industry and go into the business of interchanging commodities, too many men go into trade and too few are engaged in producing the wealth of the world, and as a consequence we have depressions. We also observe that the most severe depressions always occur in protective countries, and they are always least in free trade countries; and as a consequence the labourer always enjoys, always will enjoy, and always must enjoy the best results in free trade countries.

Now, the hon. gentleman still clings to the idea that reciprocity with the United States is an absolute necessity to the well being of Canada. So far as I am concerned I deny that proposition absolutely. It is highly desirable that we should have the freest possible trade with the United States, but it is not essential to our existence. If they are determined to pursue the silly course which they have pursued for so many years, why let them do so. The hon. gentleman believes in reciprocity. While I would be glad to see free trade, while I would be glad to see the United States, in the best interests of the people of that country and in the best interests of mankind, living under free trade conditions, at the same time I believe that if they are not wise enough to adopt that policy, why should we, Mr. Speaker, adopt so foolish, so suicidal a policy as to punish Canadians severely because the people of the United States choose to punish themselves. In the United States every producer of the natural resources of the country is a slave. A slave to whom? A slave to relatively a few manufacturers in that country. Do we desire that Canadians should be placed in the same position? Not at all. What are we doing to-day? These men who advocate protection in Canada pretend that a great danger is threatening us from the United States because of the monopolies that exist there, they fear these monopolies are going to crush us in Canada. Sir, how have these monopolies been built up? They have been built up under the accursed system of protection, and that is why they exist in the United States. We are told that manufacturers in the United States sell cheaper to Canadians than they sell to their own people. Well, Sir, does it hurt the Canadian farmer, does it hurt the Canadian labourer, does it hurt anybody in Canada except a few protected manufacturers, if they do sell cheap goods to Canadians? It is a great benefit to the Canadian people, and we should be very foolish indeed if we did not allow them to sell us goods cheaper than they sell to their own people.

I believe that our duty is to legislate for the Canadian people without any regard to what the American people or any other people may do. I believe in legislating absolutely for Canada alone. I care not what other people do so far as their tariffs are concerned. I do care, of course, in a way, for the people who are suffering from monopolies; but having regard to the best interests of the people of Canada I never can support, and never will support, a condition of things which will levy a greater embargo upon the producers of wealth in Canada than is imposed to-day. Perhaps some gentleman will say: Why do you support the conditions that exist to-day? Well, Mr. Speaker, for years the Conservatives have been building up this system of iniquity in Canada. I understand something of commerce, and something of the effects that would attend the removal of such an embargo too hurriedly. I believe in reducing the tariff slowly. Free trader as I am, I am perfectly satisfied with the government as far as they have gone; but I say this, I cannot support you unless you go further. As time goes on you must go further, or I cannot support you.

Now what are the conditions in the United States? These monopolies have been built up so that there is to-day a tremendous centralization of wealth in the hands of a few people. Things have got to such a pass that I believe capital is going to be entirely unsafe in the United States; I believe that firmly. Some may say: What is the difference? Money is circulated anyway. These monopolists may be worth their hundreds of millions, but the people have the use of the money. Well, that is all very fine. The millionaire lives in luxury. Yes, many of them go to England and live in luxury. How do they do it? They live in luxury on the millions stolen from the labourers of the United States. I am absolutely opposed to the condition which brings about any such result. I believe each labourer should enjoy the benefits of his own labour. While I believe the employer should have his just share, I believe, at the same time, that the labourer should have his just share. This is one of the greatest propositions that stares us in the face to-day. The greatest question that we have before us in the world is this question of capital and labour. The conditions in the United States, perhaps over any other country in the world, are such that these enormous fortunes have been amassed through the protective system, and I believe they will bring about a state of things that will prove very dangerous to that country. We do not want any such conditions in Canada. What have we in Canada? We have, to-day, gentlemen who are giving very large sums to different institutions and they are looked upon as great philanthropists. They are nothing of the kind. They are simply giving back to the people a portion of the money, which through legislation, has been stolen from the people. That is all they have been doing. Now, Mr. Speaker, while I am a free trader, there is one thing I am willing to admit. I am willing to admit that free trade does not obtain in England because of any philanthropic motives. Free trade obtains in England from selfish motives. It was the selfish motives of the manufacturers of England which really brought about free trade in that country. That, I am perfectly willing to admit, but, I also believe that a very selfish motive has been the means of maintaining protection in the United States up to the present time. What are the conditions in the United States so far as this very question is concerned? The manufacturers have been in favour of protection and the farmers have been opposed to it. I foresee a change coming. Perhaps I do not go to certain portions of that country doing missionary work and making speeches, but I come in contact with perhaps as many business men as my hon. friend who sits beside me (Mr. Charlton), and I observe that a very great change is coming over the aspect of things in that country, and that it is drifting rapidly towards free trade. The change in that respect in the United States is enormous—and why? The selfish interest again is going to prevail. The people of the United States are manufacturing more than is required in that country, they have to seek foreign markets, and the moment they have to seek foreign markets, they become free traders, because in competition with the other nations of the world, they desire to produce in the cheapest possible way they can. If Canada does not look out, the United States, in a few years, will force her into free trade. To meet their duties, as in the past, with retaliatory duties is, to my mind, a perfect absurdity, and to attempt, to-day, to levy high duties because they are doing it in the United States is, to me, a perfect absurdity. If there is any one way in which you can fight the United States with tariffs, it is by adopting a very low tariff in Canada. That would be a very great menace to the United States, but, pretending to fight them with a high tariff, is simply committing suicide so far as Canada is concerned. I shall not delay the House any longer upon this subject. I do not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that you will hear as many outspoken free trade speeches as I am disposed to make. I do not for one moment believe that the Liberal party has become insane. I believe nothing of the kind. I cannot believe it. I believe that the old views prevail just as they have prevailed for many years and, perhaps, it is quite possible that the government may go a little slower than I would like to have them go, but, as long as they are moving in the right direction and advocating free trade, as far as I am concerned, they will find me a loyal supporter. But, if I hear protection advocated by any member of the Liberal government, you can depend upon it, that my faith will be found to be weakening. I am absolutely unable to join in a proposition that I believe to be so immoral, that leads to such a great wrong on the labouring men, the producers of the natural wealth of the country. It would be perfectly impossible for me to do it. Mr. Speaker, if ever I am going to be a thief, I will be a noble thief. I will join a band of highway robbers, I will put a pistol to a man's face and tell him to deliver up, but, I can never be a protectionist sneak thief.

Mr. JABEL ROBINSON (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, one would imagine from the tenor of the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Edwards) that he is thoroughly convinced, that the faith is in him, and that he never could believe anything but what he has told us to-night. He could not be changed; it is no use attempting to change him. He is thoroughly convicted, and it would not matter if the premier of this country and if all the Liberals of this country were to attempt to show him that he was wrong, he would still maintain that he was right. I have my opinion of a man who thinks he knows it all. I think I ought to be the proudest man in this House to-night. It is something over fourteen years ago since I had the pleasure of presiding, as president of the Farmers Institute in my county, at a farmers' meeting. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was invited to address those farmers. The hon. gentleman lives in the adjoining county, and he came to our meeting. He gave us a very different dissertation from that which he gave us this evening. He was then a strong advocate of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity. I was voted out of the chair on that occasion for the purpose of answering our friend from Norfolk. I had an opportunity of speaking, I think, for about my usual time of speaking, and it took the hon. gentleman half an hour to answer the points I produced against him. He was then strongly in favour of commercial union with the United States, and he showed us, at least he attempted to show us, the great advantages as farmers that we would derive by selling our produce in the American market. He illustrated his case that evening in a very striking manner. He said he wanted the Buffalo market, which was the nearest city to him, so that he could take his cattle there. The hon. gentleman raises cattle, and he stated that he had sent a drove of his cattle to the Buffalo market, but owing to the difficulty of getting them to that market they only returned him $30 each. I replied that the hon. gentleman either did not have the right kind of cattle, or else he did not take them to the right market, for I had just returned from Great Britain where I sold cattle of the same age in the Glasgow market for 21 pounds each. You see it makes a difference as to the market. Now, Mr. Speaker, when some gentlemen clamour so much for the American market, it seems to me that they do not know what they are talking about. If we had not the British market then we might clamour for the American market for our natural products, but so long as the British market is free to us we can always get a first class price for a first class article, and we can always have there the best market in the world. Britain is the best market for our natural products, and it seems to me that it is only fair that we should purchase all we want to import in the British market. I believe that the vessels that take away our cattle, and our cheese, and our butter, and our farm products of all kinds to England, should return laden with goods to Canada which the people of this country had bought in Great Britain. That is only fair play. I, for one, am not at all anxious for that great High Joint Commission to go back begging to Washington for reciprocity in natural products, especially when we have such a grand market open to us in the mother country. I heard a lot of talk here about the German market and other foreign markets, but what are these markets to us when we have the best market in the world open to us all the time in England? I am not in favour of the amendment which has been moved by the leader of the opposition, because it asks for high protection, but I would have supported a motion which censured the government for spending the enormous amount of money they do spend every year. There is no such resolution before us, unless my own will fill the Bill. I would propose the following as an amendment:

That in the opinion of this House the increased expenditure that is taking place from year to year is uncalled for and unwarranted and contrary to the professions of the Liberal party, because in accordance with these professions the expenditure of this country should not exceed the income. We believe that the time has arrived when the interests of the farmer should be considered, especially in view of the fact that government cannot protect to any great extent the productions of the farmer; and as a moderate step in such a direction, be it resolved the duty on agricultural implements shall be reduced to 15 per cent and the duty on coal oil shall be reduced to two cents per gallon.

I do not know if I will get a seconder for that or not. I do not think there are many independent men in the House. They all seem to be obliged either to vote for the government or to follow the leader of the opposition, but I am no servile follower. I suggest that motion because these are my sentiments, and I think that we are here as members of parliament, or we ought to be here to express our views as to what we think should be in the best interest of the country. It seems to be the object of this great House of Commons that when a resolution is brought in by one side, the other side must oppose it whether there is merit in that resoluton or not. That being the case, and the members being apparently bound to one party or the other, I expect that my resolution will not receive much favour here. I am thankful, Mr. Speaker, for one thing, and that is that however we have discussed questions during this session we have had no racial or religious cry mentioned. I am thankful for that. We have the right to come and discuss here all questions affecting the welfare of the country, and I am glad that no bitter feeling has been exhibited this session as has been the case at other times. I do not profess, like the member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) to know it all. I am ready to be converted to anything that is better than I believe. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) is not as the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who like the man who once attended a revival meeting, went to scoff, but remained to pray. I would not wonder if the hon. member for Russell would find himself in the same box sometimes.

Let me ask: How are the farmers going to be benefited by a high protective duty? If there is any gentleman in this House who can show me that, then as a representative of the farmers I will gladly fall in with his view. If it can be shown that the placing of a high protective duty on articles manufactured in this country will help the farmers, then I am ready to submit. But, I have never yet been convinced that the farmer who is obliged to sell his surplus products in the open market can in any way be protected by whatever duty a government may impose.

One hon. gentleman has said that the great evil we were suffering from were the American products which were coming in free of duty or at very low rates of duty. One hon. gentleman stated this afternoon that whilst the Americans imposed a duty of twenty-five per cent against our wheat we have only a duty of twelve and a half per cent against their wheat. Well, I would like to know what would be the difference if we increased the duty. We send no wheat to the American market when wheat is dearer in Buffalo and Chicago than it is in Toronto and Montreal. Then, we want men who have capital to come in and erect mills on our streams which have water powers, in order to grind up all the wheat they can get, whether it comes from Canada or the United States. There is no argument in that. The conditions are the same with regard to any product which the Americans have and which we have not. We are only doing ourselves an injury if we refuse to buy it when it will benefit us to get it. One hon. gentleman complained that we were allowing corn to come in free from the United States. If that hon. gentleman lived in the section I do and fed cattle, he would know that every year the farmers buy carloads of American corn to fatten their cattle ; and besides the profit they made upon the corn in that way, they also derive a benefit because of the manure it furnishes for the fields. Therefore I say there is no argument in that. But when the American people refuse to trade with us on equal terms, then I would treat them just as I would my neighbour if he refused to trade with me or have anything to do with me. I would try to do my business with some one else. That is just the way I feel like dealing with the American people. I think we should consult our own interests in framing a tariff against them. Our government ought to know that, and if they do not, let us put in a government that does.

Now, I do not know that it is necessary for me to talk much about my resolution. It speaks for itself. The infant industries of our country should be protected. Infant industries are something like a man's family. He has a lot of boys and girls, and he must raise them and raise them well ; but after he has raised them, then he is doing them and himself an injustice if he does not allow them to work for themselves. That is just what we are doing with many of the manufacturers of this country. We are just keeping them up, giving them the benefit of a higher tariff and enabling them to get rich, whilst the poor men who work for them are getting but a dole for their wages. I happened to be in Ohio a few years ago, and dined with the governor of that state. I am not saying this to boast ; I am merely stating the truth. He spoke of the immense amount of good he was doing in the state by building asylums and almshouses at different places. I said, 'governor, I think I can give you a better idea than that.' He said he would like to get it. I said, 'just take two or three dollars off every one of those machines next summer, and give the money to the farmers who are working for you.' It is from the farmers that the money is taken to build poor-houses and churches. It has been said in this debate that the Americans are growing immensely rich because of their high duties. I grant that some Americans are growing rich, but it is only those who have the inside track. The poor people of that country, especially the farmers, are not as well off as our own people. Some of these gentlemen are anxious to make a few people in Canada wealthy too. I am not. I want to see the wealth of the country fairly distributed among the people. I also want to see the taxes fairly collected, which they are not now under our present system of taxation. It seems that the system of customs and inland revenue duties is the only mode of collecting the taxes of this country ; but it is a very unjust method indeed. As I said a few days ago, a poor man, a labourer or a mechanic with a large family of eight or ten children, a man who is toiling and working every day to get sufficient to maintain his family, has to buy dutiable goods to the amount of perhaps his total wages, while some men who are wealthy with an income of perhaps $8,000 or $10,000 a year, have only a wife and one child, or perhaps no children, or perhaps are not married, do not contribute as much as the poor man to the revenue of this country. I say it is a very unfair and unjust system of taxation ; but it seems that that is the only way in which we can collect the money required to keep these gentlemen afloat. I am not casting any reflection upon them, because some gentlemen on this side of the House would like to be afloat too.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are many things which the farmers and every one else in this country requires which we can neither make nor grow, and consequently we have to buy them somewhere. It would be foolish for us to attempt to grow some things or to attempt to manufacture some things. Most gentlemen here are fond of bananas, oranges, figs and similar delicacies. Suppose some gentleman on this side of the House were to ask the government to give him a grant for the purpose of enabling him to start a conservatory or hot-house to grow these things. Would the government be foolish enough to give him a grant for that purpose? No, because the bananas would cost ten cents apiece and the oranges the same. Therefore we had better let them grow them where they can do it to advantage and we will grow something else. It is the very same with manufacturers. There is a village near my place where for many years there was a manufacturer who made excellent threshing machines, but he had to draw his coal and iron and everything that went into these machines a number of miles, as there was no railway near. He was consequently handicapped and found himself obliged to move his establishment where there were more facilities for his business. That same rule applies everywhere. In Ontario we have no coal, and it is no use in our attempting to go into manufacturing in that province in competition with those who have the coal and the iron at their very door. By putting on protection to foster such competition, we are only bolstering up an artificial industry that costs us more than it gives. What we want is to make Canada a cheap country to live in. That should be our great object. Every year we are spending half a million dollars on immigration, but one of the first things an immigrant will want to know is what is the taxation here. And when the agent tells him that it is $50 a head for every man, woman and child, and that the debt of the country is $268,000,000, which must be paid by somebody, he is not likely to have his imagination excited in favour of this country as a profitable one to settle in. Our Finance Minister has added to our debt $6,000,000 this year, and we do not know what he will do next. How is that debt to be met ?

Surely we are not going to tax the unborn generations to pay it, but that is what we will have to do. It is about time that we should reduce our expenditure. We cannot expect every year the immense crops we have had these last two years, and the sooner we trim our sails to suit the wind the better.

I do not wish to go over what other hon. members have discussed, but I would like to make a reference to the question of the census, which seemed to have agitated the Minister of Trade and Commerce more than any other. I differ with that hon. gentleman in his opinion that the census was not properly taken ten years ago. I know that in our county the men who were employed to take it were above suspicion, and I am equally confident that those who were employed to take the last census were equally free from reproach. I should be sorry indeed to have it said elsewhere that Canadians were perjurers and liars, who could not be trusted to enumerate their own people. If such a charge should be proved, I will sell out as soon as I can and leave the country.

I suppose I will make enemies of every man in this House, save a few independents, by what I am going to say, but I can not refrain from giving my opinion. I find that there is quite a number of independent members in the lobby and out in the streets of the city, but when they come here inside this Chamber—Oh dear! Only two weeks ago I asked where were certain members from both sides of the House, and I was told that they were out in Lisgar, where there was a big election going on. It seems to me that men elected to do their duty in this House could be much better employed attending to their duties here than trying to crush a poor little independent out in Lisgar. But if it be true that so many men voted the independent ticket in Lisgar, it shows that if the independent men in this country would all vote together, as they did at Lisgar, we would have in the next parliament some sixty independents on this side of the House. I do not find any cheering on either side at this remark. Let me say in conclusion that I do trust that when men are elected to any duty, they will try to discharge it.

Mr. W. R. BROCK (Centre Toronto). Before addressing myself, Mr. Speaker, to the particular questions before the House, I cannot refrain from paying a tribute of esteem to my hon. friend who has just preceded me. We must admit that he is the only independent member of this House, elected as such, who has the courage of his independence. He was returned as an independent, and during the two sessions he has been in this House he has not in any way departed from that line of policy and is to-day still as independent as he was when he first canvassed his electors.

Mr. ROBINSON (West Elgin).

I wish this afternoon to draw attention to some particular views which I hold, and which I believe are entertained to a considerable extent in this country, upon the budget which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has presented to us with all that beauty of diction and force which marks the hon. gentleman's utterances in this House. But, Sir, I must say that I was considerably surprised by the conclusions at which the hon. minister arrived. He did not seem to appreciate the condition to which his management of the country's finances has led this country. Some five or six years ago, the present government came into power. It was elected just at the close of a very serious state of affairs which had existed in this country and the United States. There had been a very great depression in business, not only in agriculture but in manufacturing. This government immediately investigated the conditions of affairs and introduced a revision of the tariff. That was followed by very great prosperity. For the last five years we have enjoyed unexampled prosperity. We have had an immense increase in our imports and exports. We have, undoubtedly, accumulated a large amount of money in this country. But, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman where he has left the finances of the Dominion? Have we been getting out of debt? What have we been doing with these enormous sums of money that have been taken from the people, these hundreds of millions? Every dollar has been expended, and yet, not only is our national debt greater, but we are very deeply in debt—several millions, I believe—to the banks. And the Finance Minister tells us that he is going to the financial centres of the world on a borrowing trip. That may not appear a very important matter practically, considering the tremendous revenues of this country. But if this were applied to private business, what would be thought of it? Suppose that a man, after conducting a private business for five years, found himself during a period of hard times with $5,000 in debt. He gets relief from his creditors and permission to try again. Immediately, times improve and business grows better. He buys more goods and sells more goods and makes more money. And, at the end of another five years he comes to his creditors, who wish to have a stock-taking and says: Gentlemen, I am in a magnificent position, I have been doing a great business, I have been earning a great deal of money. I have been spending a great deal of money, it is very true. But I have assets, though I can't exactly lay my hands upon them. I want you to understand that, instead of being $5,000 in debt I am now $10,000 in debt, and, over and above that I must go to the banks to borrow money to pay my current expenses. Would that be a very gratifying position for a private individual? But the government will say: Oh, we have great public works. So we have. We have the Intercolonial Railway. And the Intercolonial Railway has been a very serious liability, instead of an asset. We have spent more money on it every year than we have received from it or are likely to receive from it. We have been enormously increasing our liabilities, even at a time when, as the Minister of Finance says, we have been riding upon the crest of a wave of prosperity. What would the wise merchant or financier do during prosperous times ? Would he not prepare himself for the lean years that are to come ? I do not see any indication in the Public Accounts of any reserve fund accumulated by the Finance Minister for times of less prosperity. And, when that hon. gentleman came to the question of relieving certain industries in this country, he told them that there was no relief to be expected from him or from the government. In saying that he was taking advantage of the position he occupied in this House with an enormous majority at his back to positively refuse a demand that is coming up now, as an hon. gentleman said this evening, from nearly three-quarters of the people of this country. He is supported by some hon. gentlemen who call themselves free traders to the hilt. I notice that while they call themselves free traders to the hilt, they, are, on every occasion, prepared to support by their votes, the government that is not a free trade government, but has repudiated free trade and has told us that free trade is impossible in this country. I think it was my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Robinson) who spoke of a servile following. Nothing could be more servile than that. In matters of expenditure also, we are having some revelations before the Public Accounts committee which show that the money we have spent during the last five years has not all been spent judiciously, but that enormous sums have been squandered——

Mr. EDWARDS. Where ?

Mr. BROCK. I can take you to twenty or thirty wharfs and other works in different counties that were built just before election, and built not to serve any practical purpose for the people, but to buy votes for the government. And these works not only cost money to construct, but they form a liability, because the revenues from them are not sufficient to pay the expenses of operation. And, yet, when the city of Toronto asked the Minister of Public Works to consider the case they were in, that a little expenditure would make a harbour at that great city, where railroads are centering and commerce is increasing—a harbour that would be a credit and a benefit not to Toronto alone, but to the whole country—the government hesitates about spending even a small sum there. Why ? The hon. minister himself gives the answer in the question, 'What has Toronto done for me ?' Unfortunately—unfortunately for the harbour, but fortunately for Toronto and for the country, the city does not return to this House one representative of the same political complexion as the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches.

Now, what this country wants is what the leader of the Conservative party has stated by this resolution. The country wants a declared policy. I think it is due to the intelligence of this country that a government that has been in power between five or six years, should, by this time, be able to formulate a policy which they would not be afraid to declare. The policy of opportunism is a very poor one. That policy seems to have guided the government up to the present time. They are not at one among themselves. I suppose that that is why we have no declared policy from them. If they attempted to declare a policy that might happen again which the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) mentioned this evening as having happened to the government of Mr. Mackenzie. That government, it appears, made up their minds to a certain policy, but found it was going to be unpopular with the maritime provinces and might put them out of power. And so they let their principles slip and hung on to office for a short time. Therefore, I declare that the advice given by the hon. member for North Norfolk this evening to the present government is good advice. I think that the Prime Minister was taking note of it. A policy such as they have been going to the country with, such as they have maintained in this House, is not a policy that this country could respect. If they favour free trade, let them come out in an open, manly way, and declare for free trade. If they are not free traders, they must be protectionists. The medium course is not an honest course. This country is demanding that our industries should be protected. The Finance Minister says that he will take it into consideration and perhaps some way or other next year he will heal the leak. But, as the hon. member for North Norfolk says, if it is a leak, it should have been healed at once. That would have been the fair, the honest position to take. I alluded more particularly to an industry that I am not only interested in, but well acquainted with, the woollen industry. It is not an insignificant industry, not an industry supported by an unintelligent people. It is an industry that has been fostered in this country in years gone by, an industry that has been prosperous in the past and that could be prosperous to-day, were it not for the policy adopted and the tactics indulged in by the Prime Minister of giving to England a one-sided preference—a preference in this market for them but no preference whatever in their market for us. Immediately after the first 12½ per cent had been taken off, then commenced a gradual decrease in the woollen industry of this country. The woollen industry of England is probably one of the greatest industries of that country. They have absolutely perfect machinery, they have very cheap labour, they have very cheap money, they have the markets of the world open to them. We have not the markets of the world open to us, quite the contrary. A market that we might have had has been closed to us in consequence of the preference which the Prime Minister gave to Great Britain. And remember, Mr. Speaker, that preference is only a sentimental one. Unfortunately it is a sentiment that, though it may have been in favour of Great Britain, in favour of some industries in Great Britain, it was absolutely injurious to certain industries in this country.

I see occasionally in the papers that certain woollen mills are said to be working full time, some of them night and day. Great comfort is taken by members on the other side of the House with that statement. But I think any woollen manufacturer, or even an ordinary merchant, will know that you can be very busy indeed in losing money. The woollen mills of this country, as a rule, have been losing money, even those that have been working night and day, some of them doing the most business, have been doing it with the greatest loss. That has been caused largely, not so much by the large quantity of woollen goods that they have actually manufactured and sold, but largely through the enormous tons of samples of woollen goods, English and German, that come in here through the Post Office Department, and are scattered broadcast through the country. A gentleman not understanding the business, though he may be very learned in the law, may probably smile at that statement as being an exaggeration. But I know of it practically, and practical men know of it. When our manufacturers get out their samples and call upon the trade of this country to sell them, they are met at once by these samples of English and German goods sent out here, many of them marked at very low figures, and our manufacturers have to make a price to meet goods from a mill which is running on one kind of goods and running all the time, whereas a mill such as that of my hon. friend, Mr. Rosamond, turns out 1,200 or 1,500 different patterns of goods, and of a great many different qualities, and he finds that he cannot meet their prices. Why? Because our market is a limited market. Nothing was done to help us to a foreign market, therefore we have to content ourselves with the home market. English and German manufacturers sell their surplus stocks in this country, and make Canada a slaughter market. Any gentleman who understands the woollcn trade of this country is aware that there are many expert workmen employed in our woollen mills, such for instance as those employed by the gentleman who sits beside me (Mr. Rosamond). They dread losing these experienced workmen, and they actually keep them at work at a loss rather than have the mills closed and the men scattered.

Now, the Minister of Finance said that we should eat a little less and work a little harder. Well, that is very poor comfort, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that what the hon. member for North Norfolk says is absolutely true. Go where I will through the manufacturing districts of this country, I find there is a demand made for the policy announced in this resolution, that is ample protection. We do not ask ample protection for the woollen trade only, we know that would be futile; but we say that ample protection for the different industries of this country would protect the farmers of this country. The statement that the farmer cannot be protected is unfounded, because he can be protected. The best protection for a farmer in this country is to give him a good home market, and nobody knows that better than the member for Russell. There is not a farmer in his constituency who would not rather sell what he has to sell at home, than to be obliged to send it abroad. It is true, as the hon. gentleman says, that the market prices in this country are made by the prices in England, and we have got to meet those prices if we are to make any sales. Therefore, I say that in protecting the farming industry of this country we are actually protecting our greatest industry. The agricultural industry may not be so aggressive, perhaps, but it is a silent industry that the members of the government should take into their serious consideration. No country can be great if it has nothing to rely upon but its agricultural productions, to export. We would be able to buy nothing from foreign countries, and those countries like England, the United States or Germany, if we have nothing to buy from them, would not be so likely to buy from us.

Now, a great difficulty in connection with protection, as I can quite understand, is the way it is supposed to affect our friends from Manitoba and the North-west. When we get a little nearer to the coast that difficulty becomes less. I think I heard an hon. gentleman from British Columbia speak this evening who is not a protectionist at all, oh, no, but he insists upon getting protection for lumber and for lead. I have no doubt, when once we open the door, we will find that British Columbia wants protection on a great many things. The farmers of the North-west, which is exclusively a farming country, have got to be specially considered.

Now, Sir, there is a way, I think, of meeting the interests of the farmers of the North-west that will amply protect them, and place them in a position to put their grain into the Liverpool market at the same price, so far as the price is affected by transportation, as grain can be put in there from Minnesota, or Dakota, or Illinois, or any other western state. I contend that is a matter that should be taken hold of vigorously by the Minister of Public Works and the government; they should see that we have a properly developed system of transportation. The great calls that have been made upon the government during the last five years should have induced them ere this to give more attention to that matter than they have done. Of course the Minister of Public Works is very energetic, and suggests a scheme of transportation, but his scheme lacks comprehensiveness. The French River canal which he speaks of building is only sixty-five miles long, and it is really out of the question to talk about spending even the five or six millions which he speaks of, unless you have a more comprehensive scheme showing where you are going to start from and what sea port you are going to make for. If you give such transportation facilities that our farmers in the North-west can place their grain in the English market at a favourable price as compared with grain from the United States, I contend that the people of the North-west are big enough, and strong enough to stand a little duty on some kinds of imported goods. Give them this great boon of cheap transportation, and you will find them ready and willing to support any government that finds it necessary to give protection to manufacturing industries.

There is another thing to which I wish to direct attention in connection with our present rate of duty. This is essentially a slaughter market for certain kinds of goods manufactured in the United States. Those are not such goods as we do not make ourselves, in most cases they are the goods we are making to-day. The statement was made to me the other day that a large quantity of goods were being bought in the New York market, and when the question was asked why they were willing to sell so cheap, the parties stated that the mill had produced 4,800 cases of those goods, and they had 190 cases left. The 4,800 cases had been sold all through the United States in the usual way, that is with a guarantee that in the event of their taking any reduction off the price of any of those goods in the United States, they would give a credit note to their customers. This is continually done. Well, you can understand, it is a mere matter of the rule of three, that if they had gone to work to sell these goods left over, to sell them in their own market at a reduced price, they would have had to give a credit note on 4,800 cases of these goods. They therefore slaughtered them in the Canadian market. They gave us as a reason that there was some cotton print mills in this country that they would like to see closed, and they wished these goods sold cheaper than they could be made by the mills at Magog. This, as a matter of fact, is a transaction that I will be very happy to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance in order to show that this country is being made a slaughter market. Of course, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) says: Oh, our poor farmers are getting the advantage of these bargains, but they get no advantage if two hundred or three hundred people in the vicinity of Sherbrooke and Magog are obliged to go to the United States to get work when the mills are closed down as the Cornwall mills have been closed. It will not benefit the farmers about Cornwall to have the mills there closed, nor will it benefit the farmers of this country. Therefore, I contend that a fair measure of protection, surrounded with proper safeguards and judiciously applied, is an absolute benefit to the farmers of this country and to every other class. In conducting business, business men, in a small, or a large way, have a right to look to the hon. Minister of Finance, to the different departments and to the government, for an example in business methods. At the commencement of my remarks I gave an instance as to how business should be carried on, but, I contend that no merchant, conducting business in this country in bad times and particularly in good times as the hon. Minister of Finance and the government are conducting the financial affairs of this country, could possibly stand for a couple of decades. He would certainly become bankrupt. He would be living at too high a rate. This has brought more people to grief than anything else. Because they happened to have a good year or two they have their expenses up and we heard it said from the other side of the House last night, that once the expenses get up, it is hard to get them down again. If the hon. Minister of Finance had to cut down expenses, where would he begin? He would find it a difficult problem, a more difficult problem than meeting the manufacturers of this country who are asking for some little assistance at this time. I had intended to make some remarks based upon some statements made by the hon. member for North Norfolk which were put in the most admirable manner by him. His speech was most moderate considering the aggravation he has had, but, I admit that when he described what a great nation required to be a great nation, that it should have not only agriculture but that it should do its own manufacturing, as far as possible, he rose to a height of statesmanship that I am sorry to say members of the government are not prepared to climb to.

Our attention has been drawn to the enormous amount of money in the savings banks and other monetary institutions of this country and this was given as evidence of great prosperity. But, Sir, I may venture to say that this is also evidence of a considerable amount of want of confidence in the industrial and farming interests of this country. I contend, Sir, that if the farmers were properly encouraged, if the industrial interests were encouraged, a great deal of that money, instead of being left at 2½ and 3 per cent and a good deal at nothing at all in the savings banks and other banks, would find investment in trade and commerce, manufactures and agriculture. Nobody would think of leaving his money in a bank at 2½ or 3 per cent if he had any confidence that by investing it in the manufactures and other industries of the country, he would be able to get a better return for it. It is simply because people cannot get a better return that it is not so invested, and it is a sad commentary upon the management of public affairs, that so many men who have, by their industry and frugality managed to save some money are obliged to leave it at the small rate of 2½ and 3 per cent in the bank. The question was asked across the floor of the House by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) why the German workingman had smaller wages than the English workingman. The answer is quite plain. The German workingman will live on a franc a day and live well on a franc a day. The most expensive man on the face of the earth is the English mechanic. He demands more to eat and drink and therefore the mechanic in Germany can afford to take smaller wages and I believe in the end save more money. It is another case such as I have brought to the notice of the hon. Minister of Finance of living beyond your means. The man who lives beyond his means will come to grief, whereas, the man who saves a little even out of his small means is the best off in the long run. Some hon. gentlemen object to reciprocity, but a fair measure of reciprocity that will suit Canada, I am perfectly in favour of. But, such a measure of reciprocity as the United States will give us, hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches know we cannot touch. There is no use theorizing and talking about it and wasting money. The hon. member for North Norfolk, one of the commission, thinks that the right hon. Prime Minister and others should go to Washington again. We know what the return was. We were told this afternoon that the return was a bill for $36,000 and nothing more. I would not like to see another jaunt of that kind, because we know it is going to be useless. The best thing for us to do is to adopt the manly course of taking the matter into our own hands and legislating for this country to suit ourselves, and while suiting ourselves we will endeavour to work in harmony with the rest of the empire and make an international arrangement such as will suit ourselves. Probably some hon. gentlemen will say that England will have none of our protective ideas. England is rapidly advancing in the direction of protective ideas. Where they were not entertained a few years ago, you find them entertained now by some of the greatest minds in England. The hon. member for Russell said this evening that free trade was getting great headway in the United States. There is no doubt about it. They always had a great number of free traders there. One party is pledged to free trade or to move in that direction. We will get no reciprocity from the United States. There is a feeling of commercial hostility and a little more than commercial hostility, not only in the minds of the Irish residents of the United States, but in the old-fashioned residents of the United States as well. There is not that feeling of cordiality towards Canada that we should expect from the way in which we have treated the people of that country. The United States do not want to do anything to benefit Canada. Therefore, I think we need not waste much time upon any attempt to get reciprocity. I certainly myself felt very favourable towards the trade preference with Great Britain until it commenced to pinch.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BROCK. I suppose that is the way we all feel about these matters. The theory was very beautiful and the idea very grand; the whole thing was very pleasant to observe, but it is like these waters which are sparkling and clear to look on, but bitter when you swallow them. The trade preference with Great Britain, beautiful as it is on the outside, is beginning to pinch us hard, and we would like to get rid of it. However, I believe that to be an impossibility, and injudicious, and unwise at the present time. But I do contend, that the disadvantages should be met by the Finance Minister coming down with an extra measure of protection; a judicious addition to the protection that we now have, so as to bring it up to such a level that we can fairly compete in our own market for our own trade. We certainly cannot expect to compete with England abroad. I think if that were done, the people of this country would be contented. Probably my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards) would not be contented, but I believe that a great majority of the people of this country would be. At any rate, if the government adopted this suggestion, it would be doing what is fair and right and just, and the government need never be ashamed of having done that.

Mr. RALPH SMITH (Vancouver), moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Prime Minister, the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) moved :

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday next it stand adjourned to Tuesday, the first of April next.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. RALPH SMITH (Vancouver). Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of the question before the House I have noticed a desire on the part of several interests for higher protection. The business interests, the mine owners, the manufacturers, the lumbermen and other interests have approached the government in favour of the principle of higher protection.

Mr. EDWARDS. Did they do that ?

Mr. SMITH (Vancouver). Yes, I happened to be with the deputation last session that met the government on this question. I will say that I agree with the principle of protection to the extent that it prevents the coming into this country of manufactured articles produced under conditions of labour which are servile and impoverishing and which come into competition with the products of the labourers of this country. I agree also with the measure of protection which prevents the labourers of this country having to compete against the importation of servile labourers into the country. An important part of the question before the House is the consideration of the quality of the people that are brought into this country. The question of how to protect the labouring interests of this country is a very important one. It is supposed and believed by those who advocate the principle of high industrial protection that the principle of protection to the manufacturing interests of this country means in every case protection to the labourers who work in these industries. I do not think that always follows. As I have said, I believe in protection to the extent of keeping out of this country manufactured articles produced by servile labour in other countries and coming into competition with the product of the free labour of this country. I also believe in protection to the extent of protecting the labourers of this country who are British subjects, who are Canadians, and who are desirable settlers, against the importation of servile labour into the country. To that extent I am certainly a protectionist, but, on the question of protection as it is represented by the industrial interests of this country, it is very clear that there is a great diversity of opinion. If you take the question of protection in the province of Ontario, for instance, where, I suppose, the largest number of manufacturers exist in this country, taking the single question of protection itself, I am certain that you will not get anything like a unanimous opinion as to the necessity of having high protection even in that province. There is no question that has been discussed, or that has been presented in this debate, in regard to which you would be at all likely to get a very one-sided opinion from the people who are directly interested in it. Now, I have the good fortune to be in a position to discuss a question, which, in my opinion, means direct protection to the labouring interests of this country ; in fact, it involves the application of the principle of protection to every citizen of this country. In discussing that question, I have the privilege, or the benefit, of being supported almost unanimously by the people who are affected by the existence of a class of undesirable residents in this country. I do not think there is any other question that can be discussed in this House, I do not think there is any single demand that has been made or is being made upon the government by people who have a direct interest in having a grievance removed, that has behind it the unanimous feeling and desire that is behind the question of Chinese immigration into this country. Furthermore, I desire to say that the government considered it wise, although it increased the head tax on these people in 1900, to form a royal commission to look into that question.

The first part of the report of the Royal Commission to inquire into Chinese and Japanese immigration into British Columbia dealing with the Chinese has been presented to the House, and to any one reading the same it must be a perfect mine of information concerning every aspect of this question. The commissioners have spared no pains in gathering the facts, then in sifting, arranging and working up into intelligible readable shape. The evidence comprises eight volumes, in addition to the report proper. The care and impartiality with which the work has been done is manifested in the manner in which the views of all concerned have been recorded and every fact whether in favour of or hostile to the Chinese has been set forth fully. The commissioners have arrived at a unanimous decision that the Chinese ought to be prohibited from coming into British Columbia. The bad effects of this immigration has been traced step by step in every industry, trade and calling and must be a tremendous revelation to our friends in the east, who for the most part considered the agitation the work of a few, and have consequently not paid any real attention to the question. This report brings this question to its climax, as the commission have proven every particle of agitation in the shape of legislation by the province, resolutions passed by the provincial House and repeated petitions by the people for many years, praying the federal authorities to increase the tax at least to $500 and if possible to pass a law to prohibit them from coming into the country entirely. This the government, or at least parliament must do if they have any regard for the unanimous opinion of the people of the province suffering under the grievance.

Mr. Speaker, although the reports referred to have been placed on the Table of the House, I feel it my duty as a member from the province suffering under the presence of these people to discuss the question from the floor of the House. I desire to refer to the demands of British Columbia, as seen by the Acts and resolutions passed by the British Columbia legislature and forwarded to the government at Ottawa. For many years the legislature of British Columbia has been trying to protect the interests of their people by legislation, the most of which of course has been disallowed by the federal authority, sometimes on the ground that such legislation was ultra vires the provincial authority, and sometimes for the reason that such legislation tended to interfere with international consideration. This opinion being presented by the Imperial authorities. The point, however, I am anxious to present to the House for the purpose of showing the absolute unanimity of the provincial representatives of the people in the legislature, is the fact that there is scarcely an Act passed through that House for years in which there has not been some special provision against the employment of Chinese and Japanese. In very many instances these provisions were made to secure the safety to life and limb of Canadian subjects against the ignorance and incompetence of these people in the operation of local industries, the regulation of which is entirely within the power of the provincial parliament, and such legislation was proven necessary in many instances by serious disaster and death, brought about, in the opinion of the people, by the existence of Chinese being employed in certain callings. This legislation, however, has been disallowed repeatedly by the federal authorities at Ottawa, and thus in spite of the hard experiences of the people in British Columbia in the operation of these dangerous industries their desire for protective law against the Chinese and Japanese continues to be ignored on the ground that it includes the discrimination against a class, thus placing the power of legislation entirely with the Dominion authorities. There is not any possible phase of protection against the encroachments of these people in British Columbia that the legislators of that province have not repeatedly and in every case unanimously tried to have brought into force thus proving to the members of this parliament, who are all powerful in this matter, that if the power of entire self-protection against the presence of hordes of Orientals have been in the hands of the provincial parliament, this grievance would have been eliminated years ago. What is true of the province is of course true of the people.

In 1891 seventy petitions were presented from British Columbia to this parliament, praying for the prohibition of the importation of Chinese into Canada. In 1892 a larger number of petitions were presented. Year after year up to 1897 petitions signed by thousands of British subjects asking for a prohibitive tax against these people, and let me say also since this government raised the head tax from $50 to $100, the provincial legislature has unanimously asked for a tax which would be prohibitive. They have also passed an Act based on the lines of the Natal Act, known as the Immigration Restriction Act, which has also been disallowed. Very properly, therefore, we make our demands to this parliament, and if no other reason could be given more than the unanimous wish of that province for such legislation, that in my opinion would be a sufficiently good reason why this parliament should settle this question at once and for all, in compliance with the wish of the people of British Columbia.

Let us look for a minute at the action already taken by the Dominion government. The House is aware of course that the Dominion parliament on the finding of the commission of 1884 placed a head tax of $50 on the Chinese; after years of agitation by the people of British Columbia this tax was increased to $100, and in the meantime a Royal Commission was appointed to make full inquiry into the facts of this grievance.

This, Mr. Speaker, has been done, and a most exhaustive and complete report has been presented to this parliament. There is, therefore, placed in the hands of the members of this parliament a complete record of the facts associated with this great question, and I am glad to say that the final expression of opinion arrived at unanimously by the commissioners themselves proved conclusively the fairness of the demands which have been so repeatedly made to this House by the people of British Columbia, and making it in my opinion absolutely imperative for this parliament to at once comply with what has been proven to be the desire of the people, endorsed and confirmed by the Royal Commission after listening to evidence given on oath, and weighing evidence of this kind for many months.

This inquiry was not any slipshod attempt to deceive the people with a species of political manipulation for party interests, but a commission of large scope, formulating as they did, sets of questions touching every possible phase of the question, published these in the newspapers of the province, and thus prepared the mind of every person beforehand, making it impossible for any one connected with any interest to be overlooked in the inquiry. List of thirty-four questions can be found on pages 9, 10, 11 and 12 of the report. The commissioners appointed to inquire into Chinese and Japanese immigration desired information upon the following points, to be necessary to treat the various questions affecting Chinese and Japanese immigration separately. The object of the commissioners in suggesting the following subjects was to enable the witness to give them consideration before giving evidence touching such of them as may be within your knowledge. The following were the points:—

The commissioners will greatly appreciate any information you may be able to give bearing upon the subject.

1. The number of Chinese and Japanese in British Columbia.

2. What has been the annual immigration since 1884?

3. From what class in China and Japan are they principally drawn, and what was their condition before coming here?

4. What is their character for honesty, obedience, diligence, thrift, sobriety, and morality, and keeping of contracts?

5. How many are engaged in——
(a) The fisheries.
(b) The mines.
(c) The lumber business.
(d) Manufactures.
(e) Farming and market gardening.
(f) Domestic service.
(g) Other callings.

6. What is the difference in wages paid to Chinese and Japanese, and to the wages of white men in the same trade or calling?

7. Has any industry been called into existence by reason of their presence; and, if so, what industry, and how?

8. Is there any industry dependent upon their labour for its continuance; and, if so, what industry, and why?

9. How do they come, and under what terms?

10. What proportion bring their wives, or marry here, or attend school or churches, or become Christians?

11. What is their standard of living, compared with that of the white population—clothing, food, rent, &c.?

12. What is their moral and physical condition, their habits of cleanliness, and attention to sanitary regulations?

13. Do they live in different parts of the city, or in aggregations?

14. What effect has their residence in any place on the price of property in that locality?

15. What proportion live in separate houses and have families?

16. How many Chinese and Japanese women are there in this province; and for what purpose and under what terms were they brought here?

17. Are men and women brought here under servile or other contracts? What is their form and effect?

18. How many Chinese companies or other associations are there; what is their object? How do they affect immigration? Have the 'Six Companies' branches in British Columbia?

19. Do Chinese or Japanese immigrants take any interest in our laws and institutions? What proportion build up homes and become permanent citizens or residents?

20. Do they learn our language, customs, habits of living, and show signs that they will eventually assimilate and become an integral part of our race and nation, as Europeans do?

21. How have workmen been affected by Chinese and Japanese immigrants respectively?

22. How has Chinese and Japanese immigration affected white immigration?

23. What proportion of Chinese and Japanese return to their own country, and what proportion of their earnings do they take with them? Do they enrich or impoverish this country?

24. Are the Chinese and Japanese 'a menace to health?' And, if so, in what way?

25. Has trade and commerce between Canada and China and Japan been affected by Chinese and Japanese immigration? And how would restrictive or prohibitive measures affect it?

26. The effect of unlimited Chinese and Japanese immigration upon the country?

27. As to the sufficiency of white labour to supply the demands of the country?

28. The criminal class amongst Chinese and Japanese as compared with the white population; the nature of the offences; the number of convictions, &c.?

29. The relative amount of taxes paid, compared with their earning power?

30. With whom do the Chinese and Japanese trade; and to what extent does the country benefit thereby ? And what proportion of their earnings do they send or take out of this country ?

31. What proportion speak English, and read and write English ?

32. Do you make any distinction between Chinese and Japanese immigrants ?

33. Do you favour restriction or prohibition of this class of immigrants ?

34. How do you propose to prohibit with the existing treaties in force ?

In preparation for the meeting of the commission there was forwarded the following circular letters :—

1st. To every government agent and mining recorder at British Columbia, the following was presented:—

Royal Commission.—Chinese and Japanese Immigration.

Kamloops, B.C., Oct. 27, 1900.

Sir,—I beg leave to request that you favour me with any information in your possession, or obtainable by you, regarding Chinese and Japanese resident in your district. This information is required for the use of the Royal Commission to inquire into the subject of Chinese and Japanese immigration into British Columbia, and should, so far as possible, cover the following points :

Secretary to the Commission.

The following circular letter was sent to every saw-mill owner in British Columbia :—

Royal Commission.—Chinese and Japanese Immigration.

Kamloops, B.C., Oct. 24, 1900.

Sir,—I beg leave to request of you a statement of the number of Chinese and Japanese employed at your mill, each and every month in the year ended September 30th ult., and the number of Chinese and Japanese now employed in your mill ; also a statement of the wages paid to Chinese and Japanese labourers employed at your mill.

This information is required for the use of the Royal Commission to inquire into the subject of Chinese and Japanese immigration into British Columbia.

Trusting you will give this matter your earliest attention

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. J. DEANE,
Secretary to the Commission.

The different interests were also represented by counsel—Charles Wilson, K.C., represented the province, G. M. Bradburn represented the Chinese, Mr. R. Cassidy, K.C., represented the Japanese, Mr. D. C. Macdonell represented the Trades and Labour Council. These legal gentlemen were consulted all the time in the choice of witnesses, and were even requested to produce witnesses who might be expected to give absolutely impartial evidence. I will give the House a short summary of the witnesses to show how every diversified interest of every kind was represented.

On Vancouver Island, in my own constituency, the head representatives of the three largest exporting companies in British Columbia gave evidence to which are the representatives of the coal companies of Vancouver Island, each of which employ thousands of men, the output of which mines is a million and a quarter tons of coal every year. Mr. Palmer also, superintendent of the largest exporting company in British Columbia, several of the principal members of the legislative assembly of British Columbia, several of the principal business men in every city, some of the principal ministers of different denominations all over the province, the bishop, head of the British Columbia Anglican Church, the leading ministers in the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist Churches, the managers of all the leading industries of the province, mining, lumbering and fishing were all represented and gave evidence. So that the common statement or opinion that Chinese immigration was the cry only of a number of demagogues was demonstrated to be untrue, as every place, city and town, every conceivable provincial interest, was fully represented and is on record for or against the question at issue.

The scope of the commission was also national and international in its importance. Information of a national and international nature was acquired, extending to the Australasian colonies and the United States; the latter, of course, was of great importance, as the facts of the question in the western States referred to conditions exactly similar to those in British Columbia where the inquiry was held, and had the advantage of judging of the effects of legislation on the question similar to that which the evidence calls upon the commissioners to consider proper for Canada. I intend, however, later on to make more reference to the application of legislation against the Chinese in other countries and the consideration of the international aspect of the question.

I propose now to deal with the findings of the commission. The history of the Chinese dates back to the gold excitement period in the early sixties in British Columbia. They came over from California, but also large numbers came to the province, many left after the principal placer mines in Cariboo were worked out, so that twenty years after we had only a little over four thousand Chinese in the province. A short time afterwards large numbers were brought in to assist in the construction of the British Columbia section of the Canadian Pacific Railway; so that in 1884 there were over nine thousand in the province, and over three thousand were engaged in railway construction. Large numbers left after the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, so that in 1891 we had less than we had in 1884, still leaving, however, over nine thousand in 1891. In 1901, however, we find the number about 16,000 in British Columbia; in fact, we find that the growth of Chinese population increased in proportion to the white population of British Columbia, as seen by the census figures on page 19 of the report. In 1881, there were 49,000 whites and Indians, 4,350 Chinese; in 1891 there were 89,263 whites, exactly double, and 8,910 Chinamen, exactly double the number of Chinese; in 1901 there was 157,815 whites and about 15,000 Chinese, a proportionate increase in Chinese to whites. The explanation of this increase shows that Chinese labour contractors of British Columbia are in touch with the emigration agents in China, and thus keep full to overflowing the supply of Chinese cheap labour. This is very important, and I will refer to the same point later, the point being contrary to the commonly accepted dictum that this matter of Chinese competition would right itself and that white labour will eventually take the place of Chinese labour. The contrary is the fact, as there is an inexhaustible supply of these labourers who can be manipulated at any minute by the methods perfected by many years of experience. As it was expressed by one of the important witnesses, and an employer of labour at that, the Chinese labour supply is like a reservoir with a tap; when you get all you want you can turn off when they are satisfied.

Then, there is the quality of this immigration, whose supply is exhaustless, as shown by the report of the commission. Nearly all these labourers come from the eight counties in the province of Kwangtung, in the vicinity of Canton. In this province you have an area of 90,000 square miles and a population of over twenty million. The emigrants to Canada are mostly of the coolie class. Very extensive evidence of the nature of the Chinese who come to British Columbia is given in the report of the commission by authorities who have had years of experience in China. One of the witnesses, Mr. McLean, had lived many years in China (and who assisted counsel for the Chinese, being present throughout the investigation, was entirely favourable to the Chinese) gave a description of the value of their property, their houses costing from $5 to $15, the furniture $5, their wages per month from $2 to $3 to support a wife and family, forty or fifty of this class of people living together. Other witnesses of similar experience said that to their personal knowledge the large majority of Chinese who came to British Columbia are from the lowest coolie labour from China. The witness said this, he declared, because he had been in China himself, he had been there and seen these operations ; and they live here he said, in British Columbia, just as they lived there. An author, for many years interpreter and secretary of legation, acting minister of the United States, of Pekin, in his book said the word poverty does not convey at all the same idea in the two countries. In America a man is called poor who has a family to support on earnings of perhaps $2 a day. In China such a man would be regarded as living in the very lap of luxury. Here, when the labouring man cannot afford to have meat twice a day, said this author, he is supposed to be on the verge of hardship and destitution. In China, the labourer receiving what he considers good wages cannot afford to eat a pound a month. Poverty in this country means a narrow and limited supply of luxury ; poverty in China means actual hunger and nakedness, if not starvation within sight. In China they earn from 10 to 30 cents in silver each day. As silver is worth only half of our money, this means that they earn the equivalent of from 5 to 15 cents. The average is less than 20 cents silver, or 10 cents of our money. Unskilled labour in China sell their strength for from 5 to 10 cents each day. This, it must be remembered, is not only to support the man himself, but from one to four or five other persons. In China failure to be at work one day carries with it the inevitable consequence of want of any sort of food for the same period. It is difficult to realize, says the author, how they live at all. Their daily food, however, consists of steamed rice, boiled cabbage, bits of raw turnip pickled in strong brine, raw cucumbers, raw carrots or turnips. This is the description given by this author of the food consumption of the great masses of the Chinese people, not for the beggars or the poor, but the class of industrious working men and their families.

Rev. A. H. Smith, another author, twenty-one years a missionary in China, in his book of Chinese characteristics, corroborates all the statements given by the former author. He states also that in the northern parts of China the horse, the mule, the ox and the donkey are in universal use, and the Chinese economy is carried into the general practice of eating all these animals as soon as they expire, whether the cause of death be accident, old age or disease. Dead dogs and cats are subject to the same processes of absorbtion as dead horses. He says that he has personally seen several cases in which villagers cooked and ate dogs which had been purposely poisoned by strychnine to get rid of them. On one of these occasions some one was thoughtful enough to consult a foreign physician as to the probable results, but as the animal was already in the pot the survivors could not make up their minds to forego the luxury of a feast, and no harm appears to have come of their indulgence.

So important is the question of how these people live in China, what in short it costs to produce a competitor of white labour here, and what he can live upon in this country, that the above quotations from the report may not be out of place.

The evidence also proved that the Chinese labourers are sent here by companies, their passages were paid and head money coming into the country ; they have to serve their masters till the money is refunded.

Another witness, the Rev. Lewis W. Hall, Chinese missionary in British Columbia, had been in China two years, could speak the Chinese language, knew the district well where the Chinese labourers came from, said they lived on 2½ cents a day, that their yearly earnings were $5.88. He asks the question, is it advisable that the labourer of this country shall be brought in competition with such conditions ? In his experience these people continued in this condition of living in this country. Take the condition and position that they have made in the capital city of British Columbia, Victoria. In that city there is a total of 3,273 Chinamen, of whom 288 are merchants. There are only 92 women in a population of 3,273, there are only 63 native born male children and 82 native born females. There are 530 Chinese domestic servants employed by whites, 198 market gardeners, 84 tailors, 48 saw-mill hands, 886 workers in the canneries, 197 laundrymen, who operate 40 washhouses, 638 miscellaneous labourers, and 177 out of employment. Thus it is seen that out of a population of 3,273, there are 3,132 adult males. The disproportion of males to females is even greater in other places than it is in Victoria. Out of a Chinese population in Vancouver City of 2,080, there are only 27 females, and in many of the towns where there are hundreds of Chinamen there are no Chinese women at all. Out of a population of 16,000 in British Columbia there are only 122 Chinese children attending the public school. Now if we take the white population of British Columbia, there are 161,272. Out of this we have 54,500 adult males, 30,000 adult females, and 23,613 children attending the public schools. Thus it is seen, in connection with the white population of British Columbia, that, for every adult male, there are three inhabitants. If this proportion is applied to the Chinese there ought to be a Chinese population of 48,000, and at least 5,500 children. Supposing the entire Chinese population of Victoria were replaced by white adult males, under the present condition of the male white population this would represent a population of from 10,000 to 12,000, equal to one-half the present population of Victoria, with children attending the schools, the churches, building up homes, filling the conditions of citizenship, and giving that mutual support to all the avocations and trades necessary to the healthy growth of the community. Thus we can see clearly, as proven by the report, that the number of Chinese in British Columbia does not convey any accurate idea of the extent to which the white population is being replaced by Chinese ; for if you replaced all the Chinese with whites you would not only have their families, as indicated by the present average white family, but you would have the increase occasioned by their presence to supply their wants in every sense.

The unsanitary condition of these people is proven by the evidence given by the sanitary inspectors and the health officers of British Columbia. The story is told, the discription given, the evidence sworn to by responsible men, by the sanitary inspector of Victoria, James Wilson, by the health officers of the city of Vancouver, by the evidence of the several doctors of the province, by Dr. Roderick Fraser, medical health officer of Victoria. These doctors unanimously concur in the opinion that the Chinese are a menace to the health of the community.

Dr. Alfred T. Watt, superintendent of the quarantine for British Columbia, considers that the Chinese are especially subject to tuberculosis. He says that 19 out of 32 deaths of Chinamen were due to tuberculosis ; that there is more of this amongst the Chinamen than amongst other people.

Mr. Clive Phillips Wolley, an executive officer of the sanitary commission for the province, gives very strong evidence in favour of the position that the Chinese are a detriment to the health of the community. The unusual prevalence of consumption among the Chinese, coupled with the fact that the greater number of domestic servants sleep in herds in Chinatown and return to work directly from these places, according to the united opinion of the health officers and medical authorities of British Columbia, presents a great danger from a sanitary point of view. Their existence is constantly bringing about conditions favourable to the spread of the white plague, not only amongst themselves but amongst the white population. This is the class of people brought into the province of British Columbia amongst whom British subjects have to live and their wives and families, and against whom the permanent citizens of that province have to compete for a livelihood.

Take the Chinaman again in relation to the several trades and callings wherein he competes, how he affects the employer, how he affects the wage-earner, as seen in the development of the principal industries, such as land clearing, mining industry, the lumber industry and the fishing industry.

The commission has collected evidence of the operation of these several industries which demonstrates to us clearly the effect of Chinese coming into competition with the white labour of the province. It will be found that in all the principal industries and in every other trade and calling of unskilled labour he is not only employed, but has driven out the white man. To fully realize the extent to which this encroachment has been made and the injury it has wrought in keeping out permanent settlers and driving out those who are here, it is necessary that we should examine the facts in relation to each industry and calling wherein they are employed.

Take first the business of land clearing and land settlement, including agriculture and market gardening. The agricultural lands of British Columbia, while not as great in extent as in some of the other provinces, contain large areas of some of the richest lands in the world, the delta lands of the Fraser, and lands along the Fraser and other rivers, as well as high lands suitable for agricultural purposes and fruit growing. The heavy timbered uplands will be slowly cleared, because of the great expense. It does not pay now to employ Chinese labour for this purpose. Where it is to be done in large quantity machinery and explosives, used by white labour, must be employed, but in the meantime what is most desirable, even essential, to the settlement of the country, is that small holders should take up land, and while employed in other occupations, clear the land by degrees. Doubtless the delta lands will be first taken up, but were it not for the Mongolian labour rapid settlement would take place near the different downs and cities; why does it not? The reason is clearly set forth in the report of the commissioners. The would-be settler finds that the Chinese is employed in every field of unskilled labour, at a wage which even the employers admit, having regard to the present cost of living in British Columbia, precludes a white man to work for.

The manner of life and small cost of living enables the Chinaman to undersell in the market, and leave him a good profit. As the commissioners state in dealing with this question (page 185 of the report) :—

> They have no home to build up, they have no children to support, no contribution to churches, to schools, to make, cost of their clothes, board and lodging is trifling, they live in small shanties and crowd into rooms,—from ten to fifteen in a room. White labour will not hire where the neighbouring places have Chinese or Japs. On the other hand, settlement is prompted where farm labourers can take up land, where they can work for six months on their own land, and in other part of the year work for those who are able to hire them. The evidence goes to show that the presence of Chinamen retards settlement, promotes isolation and makes social life impossible, and the constant dread of this aggravated evil in the future in British Columbia there is no doubt discourages settlement.

Many of the land settlers in British Columbia have turned their attention to market gardening, as an incidental to their farm, but here again the Chinese control this part of the business by their cheap labour and their system of peddling their goods. This has made market gardening an impossibility to the white man, and although in the several cities of the province the principle of a public market has been established and in some instances public market buildings erected, almost in every case they have been a failure. It is well known in British Columbia that important land holdings upon which large sums of money and enterprise has been spent that settlers have had to abandon them and the mortgagee has been permitted to take possession, and in many instances these good settlers have crossed the line where the law excludes the Chinamen, where they are not employed in the mills, and where he knows that he has a better chance for work. There is no doubt at all that this state of things is becoming worse and worse every year. It retards the settlement of the country, prevents it from becoming self-supporting, and interferes with the prosperity of the people. In support of this fact we have the verdict of the great body of the agriculturists of the province of British Columbia in favour of higher restriction or total exclusion.

Let me now deal with another industry in relation to the Chinese question. The total output of coal for the year 1900 in the different collieries of British Columbia amounts to over a million and a half tons, showing an increase of over 180,000 tons over previous year, with a total export of about one million tons. Neither Chinese nor Japanese are employed in the Crow's Nest Pass colliery. They are employed to a limited extent on Vancouver island. By the Vancouver Coal Company they are only employed upon the surface, and the largest exporter is in favour of the exclusion of further immigration. The general manager of the Wellington Colliery Company thinks there should be no restriction whatever, but the manager of the Dunsmuir Extension Mine says : (Page 260 of the report) 'There is no difficulty in getting the number of Chinese we require. If no more Chinese came in it would not affect us.' And Mr. Dunsmuir himself, the premier of the province, the principal owner of the large coal mines of Vancouver island, in the document called the 'Demands of British Columbia on the Dominion Government,' says that he is in favour of an increase of the per capita tax in such a measure as to surely limit the number of immigrants, and by the enactment of legislation similar to the Natal Act to regulate their employment while in the country.

The superintendent of the New Vancouver Coal Company, whose mines produce 600,000 tons, gave his evidence entirely in favour of exclusion at once ; so that not only some of the owners of the coal mines, but the superintendents of all the mines support the provisions of greater restriction. In every case they declare that the present supply of Chinese labour is sufficient to meet the demand for many years to come ; so that this evidence proves complete justification to the conclusion that further restriction or even exclusion of Chinese labour will not cause any appreciable inconvenience or loss to this industry.

What is true of the coal mines is true also of the placer and of the quartz mines. There are very few Chinese or Japanese employed in any of these mines, except in the Cariboo district, where some of the old mines employ quite a number of Chinese, and as seen by the evidence, the managers of these mines are favourable to increased restriction.

The metalliferous mines of British Columbia yield the largest amount annually of any of the industries of the province. Out of a total output of all minerals in the province, including coal and coke, namely, sixteen millions for the year 1900, the metaliferous mines yielded ten millions. This industry is steadily increasing, has been worked from the beginning almost exclusively with white labour, and the evidence of the large employers of these mines was to the effect that if there was no further immigration of this class of labour it would not retard the development of the industry. We have almost the unanimous opinion by these mining operators in favour of the further exclusion of Chinese immigration.

The lumber business of British Columbia employs nearly two thousand men ; about four hundred of these are Chinese and Japanese. There is only one of these exporting mills employing Chinese to any extent, and the manager's evidence was the strongest of any mill man in the province in favour of entire exclusion.

The total exports of lumber last year in British Columbia was over eighty-four million feet. Three mills exported about 97 per cent of the whole. The largest exporting mill is on Vancouver island ; they export thirty-eight million or nearly half of the export trade. This is the mill that employs Chinese to a greater extent than the rest, and, as I have said, the manager of this mill is in favour of entire exclusion. It is therefore clear, so far as this branch of the industry is concerned, the exclusion of Chinese immigration would not injure their business, as they support it strongly. This is an important instance, and I desire to quote a few passages from the evidence of Mr. Palmer, manager of the Chemainus Saw-mill Company, from pages 289 and 290 of the report :

> I think there are sufficient Chinese here at the present to supply all demands. I think all the business men employing labour would be willing to pay as much again to white labour as they pay to Chinamen. I do not think that any inconvenience would arise in our business if the Chinese were excluded. The change would take place gradually, as there are such a large number of Chinese and Japs here already, and if no more came in we would undoubtedly get white men and their families to come into the country. I think that the presence of Chinese has a tendency to prevent white immigration. Chinese are no good to the country, spend very little of their earnings in the country, send all their savings to China, and trade entirely with their own people.

There are many other mills in the province engaged in the local and eastern trade, which employ altogether about 1,600 men, of whom about 400 are Chinese and Japs. Almost every one of the witnesses, managers of the mills, and in some instances, owners of the mills, were in a large majority of cases strongly in favour of exclusion and considered that there was an abundance of Chinese for all purposes in the province. The wages paid to white labour in Washington state are higher than they are in British Columbia. The general evidence given by the managers of the lumber industry was that there was an abundance of Chinese, that if no more Chinese or Japs were allowed in the country the industry would suffer no loss or even inconvenience, but on the other hand it would be a great benefit to the country. All agreed that this class of immigrants was undesirable as citizens, and all expressed strong opinions favourable to higher restriction. On the American side Chinese labour is not employed in this industry, and the American mill owners are strongly in favour of their present exclusion law.

The canning industry of British Columbia is as important as any of the great industries in the province. The number of Japanese and Chinese engaged in it greatly exceeds the number of them employed in any other industry. According to the evidence, more than one half of the labour employed in the canneries is Chinese labour ; in fact the canning process is almost entirely in the hands of the Chinese, and although the canners' evidence in some cases was strongly in favour of Chinese labour in this industry, it was admitted that the present supply already in the province was quite sufficient to meet all requirements and supply all demands for years to come ; and it is considered that the change by the process of only prohibiting Chinese from coming into the province, while such large numbers are already here, will make the change so gradual as to be all but imperceptible.

On the Sound where the Exclusion Act is applied it has not retarded the development of this industry.

If the present condition of things continues in this industry in British Columbia, it will not be long before the whole business of the country will be in the hands of a dozen exploiters and gangs of Chinese and Japanese.

It has been well established that the general industries referred to will not be interfered with by any exclusion law, the present supply being abundant for all purposes and for years to come ; this fact being well established beyond doubt by the employers themselves, and I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that even the employers of the province, whose position generally is one of taking every advantage of cheap labour have stated beyond doubt that it is desirable to restrict the inflow of Chinese and Japanese labour. The permanent settlers of that province are face to face with a serious effect upon two important factors of citizenship, namely, the unskilled labourer and the youth of the country. These are the people who ought to be encouraged to come to the country, but very many, both skilled and unskilled labourers, with women and children, already in the province and very many who have come to the province to seek employment have found the usual opportunities for it, especially in the lower grades of labour, already absorbed by Chinese and Japanese. Very many skilled workmen going to British Columbia find no opening in their trade. Being willing to take any position, these, with the larger class who have no special calling or trade, are debarred from almost every leading industry in the province, unless they are willing to compete at wages acceptable to Chinese and Japanese. In the city of Victoria alone there are 638 Chinese labourers, in Vancouver city there are 220 Chinese labourers, and by the evidence given by men in a position to know it is clearly proven that whilst there are many unskilled workmen in the cities, almost every avenue of work of this kind is already filled by Chinese or Japs. This evidence is beyond question as proving also the serious position that we have to face with regard to the employment of boys, girls and women, the occupations of this class being all taken up by the Chinese. This is especially important as it relates to the boys. I state on the floor of this parliament to-day that there are hundreds of boys, practically young men, who ought to be taking up the different kinds of labour in the province and thus assist their parents who are not in a position to keep them idle, who are completely shut out and wandering the streets without an aim or a purpose, because the Chinese are employed in the avocations rightly belonging to them. Thus the youth, the future hope of the country—are developing the character of idleness, and in every instance large numbers of them are going over into the United States. Very many have left British Columbia and have already gone there ; in fact I believe we are supplying that country on the other side, so far as the west is concerned, with the very best of our youthful labour and thus depleting our own country. I insist that this aspect of the question, depleting as it does this country of its future citizens, is a most serious grievance which ought to be at once rectified. As a matter of fact the employment of Chinese in all these grades of manual labour deters the youth from seeking employment because of the Chinese being employed at this work.

The Chinese monopolize entirely the position of domestic servants. It is considered by those who employ them in their homes that this is one of the instances where the Chinese are a great benefit to the country, and where it is repeatedly stated that it is impossible to get white females. We forget, however, that by the constant use and appropriation of Chinese labour in this business we are making the proper training of domestic servants of the female subjects of the country an impossibility. There are plenty of girls in British Columbia at liberty to work as domestic servants, but they have no encouragement, they have to compete against the regular, docile, slavish, condescending methods of the Chinese domestic. He is willing to be there at all times, to do all things, to meet all exactions, to answer every demand. He is not a servant, he is a slave. Thus, the daughters of citizens of the country, have to compete against this kind of thing. Many have tried to do it, but the people generally have got so well used to the Chinese domestic--the poor slave who answers every call, meets every demand—that it is an impossibility for the free, ambitious white female domestic to meet these demands. Thus we are closing up what ought to be a school of training for females of the country. We are shutting them out from their natural avocation and they wander the streets in idleness whilst the Chinaman occupies the home.

Look at the case of merchant tailors. The evidence given by the report of the commission proves conclusively that whilst the Chinese labour monopolizes the menial and unskilled employments, in some instances they have very dangerously encroached upon the different trades and callings where higher wages are paid. In the city of Victoria the tailoring business has almost entirely been handed over to the Chinese. In 1891 there were eighteen white tailor shops and 150 men and women employed, with a yearly wage of over $109,000, at an average weekly wage of from $18 for men and $10 for women. In 1900 there were only twenty-one white men and thirty women in the whole tailoring business of the city of Victoria, and the yearly wages were $22,000 as against $109,000 ten years previously. In the same decade the population of the city had doubled.

One witness who was a high class tailor and has carried on the business for many years says that the wages of the white tailor in that city have been reduced fifty per cent through Chinese competition, that he had been driven almost entirely out of the business.

The same thing is true of the wholesale manufacture of clothing. This work of course is done principally by women and Chinese. This again has been taken almost entirely out of the hands of the whites by the Chinese. One firm who put in a plant costing $2,000 with the latest machinery, employed over forty hands, and the Chinese killed the business completely. Every one of the employers in this business agreed that the present supply of Chinese was ample and that no injury would follow if the Chinese were entirely excluded.

The same thing holds good with regard to other trades and callings—the boot and shoe manufacture, the cigar making, the brick making, lime burning, cordwood cutting, railway construction, freighting; all these have been taken charge of by the Chinese, and all these are avenues of labour which very properly belong to the white labour of the country, labour which means permanence and stability to the country itself. In this again, let me add, the operations of any of these industries, according to the evidence given by interested persons, will not be even inconvenienced by the exclusion of the Chinese. In every instance in connection with every trade and every business the one conclusion is proved that the present supply of Chinese and Japanese in the province of British Columbia is quite sufficient to meet the demands of the business. The one argument in the past—it has been put up by Chinese advocates, an argument of course which the government has had to pay some regard to—has been that the industrial development of the province made Chinese immigration to the province absolutely necessary. If the truth of that position is admitted for the sake of argument, the time has come, as I have just said when all companies with large investments and interests, and all their managers responsible for the most economic results that their business can bring, the principal business men in all the cities, with their large investments, unitedly agree at the present time that there is a superabundance of Chinese and Japanese in the province. The argument then in favour of entire exclusion is absolutely conclusive.

The merchants and the traders in the province are unanimous in favour of Chinese exclusion, and I would recommend the House to read the Commission's Report from page 610 to page 624; every one of the witnesses, the leading business men in the Coast cities, are unanimously in favour of entire exclusion. In Victoria, according to the figures of the Chinese Board of Trade itself, there are 238 Chinese merchants, comprising 109 firms, and doing a business amounting to over a million dollars. In Vancouver there are 143 merchants, comprising forty-seven firms, doing a business of over one half a million dollars. At Nanaimo there are fourteen merchants, doing a yearly business of $163,000. At New Westminster there are twenty-nine Chinese merchants, doing a business of $317,000. And amongst the whole of the whites, merchants and traders, according to the evidence, they are unanimously opposed to the Chinese.

The question then is: Are the people of British Columbia or is the public opinion of that province, favourable to further restriction or entire exclusion of the Chinese? The important question is: Do the persons representing all classes of business interests in the province, favour further restriction or exclusion? For the present, I am shutting out of the argument bona fide employees, for the sake of avoiding commonly accepted opinion that this agitation for Chinese exclusion relates entirely to the trades unionists of the province. This class, I may say, whose evidence I consider is of as great an importance as others, I leave out of the present consideration for the reason that both skilled and unskilled labourers in the province are absolutely unanimous in favour of entire exclusion. But when I speak of the opinions of the others, I mean professional men, traders of every description; the largest employers of labour—the most of whom employ already in some degree Chinese and Japanese labour. What is the general opinion of these people, as the whole of their interests are at stake with regard to this question. Now, Sir, I have looked over the whole of that evidence, and there we have the heads of the principal dry goods merchants, the heads of the principal grocery merchants the head of the legal firms, the superintendents of the large coal mines, the superintendents of the metalliferous mines, the principal ministers of the principal churches, the managers of the lumber business, the representative men, and every conceivable interest in the province. Their evidence is there under oath, and almost unanimously they agree with the entire exclusion of the Chinese. If this request is not granted by this parliament, then the desire of the people of British Columbia is not answered. What good reason can any government give, what good reason can any parliament give, composed as it is, of the representatives of the people, for refusing to grant the people their desires ?

Similar agitations have been made on this self-same question in other countries, and what British Columbia is asking for and has been demanding for many years has been already accomplished and acquired in other countries. It is well known, and important for this House to consider, that in other countries where Chinese have emigrated to that their presence and exclusion has been agitated for very strongly. That is seen in the United States, Australia and Tasmania. As far back as 1876, a Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives was appointed to investigate the question of Chinese emigration, and I think it important that quotations from the report of that commission might be given to show that exactly a similar experience with our own was proven. The testimony of lawyers and of doctors, merchants, divines, judges, in fact of all classes, went to prove that there was no real prosperity derived from the presence of the Chinese, that they were ruinous to the industrious labouring classes, that they promoted a caste, that they were dangerous to free institutions, that they reduced wages to starvation point, that they made unskilled employments impossible, that they compelled young men to grow up in idleness, that the whole tendency was to turn industrial classes into an almost entirely servile class.

They found that the Chinese could subsist where the Americans would starve; they dispensed entirely with what was a necessity in modern civilization; to compete with them, said the American commission, is to drive out every American subject. It was also proven that the very presence of Chinese retarded white immigration to the Pacific States. This arose from the Chinese monopoly of farm and mechanical work, and the low price of their labour, which made it impossible for the new immigrant to live. This commission declared that free institutions, founded on free schools and intelligence, could only be maintained when based on intelligent and adequately paid labour; that adequate wages are necessary to give self-respect to the labourer and the means of education to his children; for family life is the great safeguard to political institutions. That Chinese immigration meant sordid wages, no public schools and the absence of the family; and they reported to Congress that this problem was too important to be treated with indifference, but that it was absolutely necessary to solve the difficulty unless their Pacific possessions were to be given over to an alien race. And in their concluding statements to congress they said it was the part of wisdom to anticipate the day when patience might cease, and that wise legislation ought to avert this evil, that impending difficulties of this character should not in this advanced age be left to the chance arbitrament of force, that these questions ought to be solved by the statesman and philanthropist, and not by the soldier. And the committee concluded its report by stating that in view of the fact that the well-known policy of the Chinese government is adverse to the immigration of its citizens, and that Great Britain has already, without offence to China, absolutely prohibited immigration to several of her colonies, we believe that similar action on our part will not destroy or disturb the friendly conditions now existing; but even if it were otherwise the harmony and perpetuity of our social and political institutions cannot be weighed in the same balance with mere material prosperity or commercial advancement. Your committee, therefore, unanimously recommend that immediate correspondence be opened up with the governments of China and Great Britain.

In 1879, a Restriction Act was passed in the United States, being vetoed by the President in the same year. A treaty, however, was entered into in 1880, ratified and proclaimed in 1881, between the United States and China, as to the exclusion of Chinese coming into the States. This, of course, especially provided for the immigration of Chinese labourers, and protecting as it did the Chinese already permenently residing in the States.

In 1882, an Act was passed giving effect to this treaty. In 1884 this Act was amended, suspending the immigration of Chinese into the States for ten years, and imposing a penalty of $500, or a term of imprisonment for one year for every Chinese labourer brought in by the master of any vessel. In 1892 a further Act was passed, continuing the operation of all restrictive laws then in force for a period of ten years, and making provision at the same time for deportations for breach of law.

This treaty was the result of nearly twenty years of agitation. It is also to be noticed that by a Joint Resolution of the House, July 7, 1898, it was declared that there should be no further immigration of Chinese into the Hawaiian islands, except upon the conditions allowed by the law of the United States. These acts and treaties, with the regulations to enforce the same, constitute the present law of the United States with respect to Chinese immigration.

In the report of the Philippine commission in 1900, (volume 2, page 432), there is a memorandum of the Chinese in the Philippines, and coming from such a trustworthy source it is worthy of special notice. Their report was: That the principle of political economy is well known, which lays down the rule that in order for a country to obtain advantages from immigration the immigration should bring in capital, new industries or superior knowledge to perfect industries already in existence, or at least that such immigrants should apply their energies to pursuits productive of gain, not only to the immigrants themselves, but to society in general in the country in which they have established themselves, or that they finally become assimilated with the people of the country, thus giving, although indirectly, stimulus to certain professions and industries whose progress is a consequence of the increase of the number of inhabitants of the town. Chinese said they, in going to the Philippines did not comply with any of the conditions of this well-known condition of political economy, which are desirable points to be looked for in immigrants. Why should they be allowed to emigrate to the Philippines when their presence was not a guarantee of prosperity and progress for the rest of the inhabitants. It is impossible, they said, on account of the competition in which they lived to attain a position in the middle class of society. It was the custom of the Chinese to consume, as far as the necessaries of life are concerned, food, clothing, and articles which they import from their own country for their own purpose.

The report of the Canadian Royal Commission has made extensive inquiry into the application of the exclusion principle in the United States, has taken most important evidence in Seattle, in Washington state, in Portland and in San Francisco, and there we have evidence of a most important kind, having had so many years' experience with this class of people in the western States, and also considerable experience with the application of an Exclusion Act, brought about by treaty between the governments of the United States and China. The general effect of this restrictive legislation in the United States has been to gradually decrease the number of Chinese on the west coast, the greatest reduction, of course, taking place in California, where they were reduced from 72,000 in 1890, to 45,000 in 1900. The population of the State of Washington has increased from 75,000 in 1880, to 518,000 in 1900, while the number of Chinese have only increased from 3,186 in 1880, to 3,629 in 1900; while the population of British Columbia has increased from 49,459 in 1880, to 177,272 in 1900; the Chinese population for that same period in British Columbia has increased from 4,550, to 16,000; so that whilst the increase in the general population of British Columbia has doubled, the Chinese population has more than trebled. In Seattle they have a population of 80,000, and they have less than 500 Chinamen; whilst in Victoria, the capital city of British Columbia, with a population of only 20,000, they have a Chinese population of 3,300.

The whole of the evidence taken in the western States was overwhelmingly in favour of the present operation of the exclusion law in the United States. This opinion was given principally by employers of labour. They stated plainly that the exclusion caused no shock to the various industries; the change was gradual; the effect was unnoticed. And in the western States, as proven by the evidence given to our Royal Commission, it was clear that they regarded the question as being closed, and it could not be found that there was any class of the populace but were in favour of Chinese exclusion. The consideration of the continuation of that treaty between the United States and China is being dealt with at the present time. Special reference was made to the importance of the subject by President Roosevelt in his annual address, and when he declared emphatically his anxiety for a continuation of the exclusive measures, and there was every evidence that that would be carried out according to the present discussion on the question.

The Australian colonies prior to the formation of their present commonwealth, had passed restrictive legislation against the Chinese. The colony of Victoria as far back as 1855 imposed a tax of $50 and limited the number to one Chinaman to every ten tons of the ship's burthen, and imposed a penalty on the master of the vessel of $50 for every passenger carried in excess. They imposed a resident license tax on the Chinese of $20. In 1881 the same colony passed an Act limiting the number of Chinamen to one in every 100 tons of the ship's burthen, and imposing a penalty of $500 for breach of the law and a tax of $50 for every immigrant arriving in the vessel. Similar legislation to this has been passed in Queensland, in South Australia, New South Wales, New Zealand, Western Australia, Tasmania; in fact, the whole of the colonies sent their representatives to a conference at Sydney, in June, 1888, and at this conference it was resolved that all the laws of the various colonies for the restriction of Chinese immigration should be assimilated upon a basis fixed by that meeting. The resolutions of that conference were embodied in a draft, which is as follows :

1st. That further restriction on Chinese immigration was absolutely necessary for the welfare of the people of Australasia.

2nd. That they considered that the desired restriction could be best secured through the diplomatic action of the Imperial government, and by uniform Australasian legislation.

3rd. That they make joint representations to the Imperial government for that purpose.

4th. That the Australian legislation must contain the following provisions :

(a) That it shall apply to all Chinese with specified exceptions.

(b) That the restriction shall be by limitation of the number of Chinese which any vessel may bring into the country, one passenger to every 500 tons of the ship's burthen.

(c) That the passage of Chinese from one colony to another, without the consent of the colony which they enter, be made a misdemeanour.

The first and fourth resolutions were endorsed by all the colonies except Tasmania and Western Australia; the third and the fourth resolutions were carried unanimously. As a whole, therefore, these principles represent the opinions of the people of Australia.

The Australian colonies felt that this was a serious question, and they made strong and decisive action to protect the interests of their people. They have of course considered Imperial interests and international obligations, and have always maintained the reputation of a law-abiding community, but they have insisted upon the exercise and operation of legislation which prevented their country from being overrun by an alien race, who were incapable of assimilation, who were strangers to their civilization, who were out of sympathy with their aspirations, who were unfit for free institutions, whose presence was a constant source of danger. As a consequence of this conference, the colonies of Victoria, South Australia, Queensland and Western Australia passed an Act prohibiting vessels from entering any of their ports in a larger number of Chinese than one for every 500 tons of the vessel, making a penalty of £500 for each Chinese in excess of that number. This Act was passed by these colonies in 1888 and 1889. In 1898 New South Wales passed an Act on the lines of the Natal Act, and attaching tremendous penalties to any breach of the Act. In 1888 New Zealand passed an Act imposing a head tax of $50, and one to every 100 tons of tonnage of such vessel; but in 1896 they increased poll tax to $500, and in 1899 passed an Act on the lines of the Natal Act, which was assented to in 1900. In Tasmania, an Act was passed in 1898 on the lines of the Natal Act; in fact, in 1888 the Australian colonies were urging the whole government to take diplomatic action with China to obtain treaties similar to those obtained by the United States in 1880. In spite of this correspondence, however, no progress was made to obtain such treaty.

In a letter dated April, 1888, by the attorney general and submitted by the premier of Tasmania in answer to the Secretary of State's circular on the subject of colonial legislation respecting Chinese immigration, the following statement was made :

The reference made by His Excellency the Chinese Minister to Her Majesty's international engagement induces me to observe that the exceptional legislation that has been adopted by the majority of the Australasian colonies on the subject of Chinese immigration does not violate any recognized rule of international comity, on the contrary it is a fundamental maxim of international law that every state has the right to regulate immigration to its territories as is most convenient to the safety and prosperity of the country, without regard to the municipal law of the country whence the foreign emigration proceeds.

Thus, the question in the Australasian colonies has been solved, and on December the 6th, 1901, the Alien Immigration Restriction Bill was passed by the parliament and the senate of the Australian Commonwealth.

The demands of British Columbia and its agitation on the question are exactly similar to those which agitated the people of the Australasian colonies and the United States. Strong action was taken by all the governments on the matter. Years of agitation have been made by petition, by provincial legislation of every description, by deputations of every kind, and at last the almost unanimous wish of the people of British Columbia has been given as evidence on oath before a Royal Commission appointed by this government; such evidence almost unanimously asking for immediate action, and either demanding much stronger restriction or entire exclusion; not only so, but the Royal Commission itself, after weighing all the evidence of that broad and expansive commission, have unanimously decided in favour of greater restriction, as follows :

1. We find that these representations of the people of British Columbia are substantially true and urgently call for a remedy.

2. We also find that the increase of the capitation tax from $50 to $100 is ineffective and inadequate.

3. We are of opinion that the further immigration of Chinese labourers into Canada ought to be prohibited.

4. That the most desirable and effective means of attaining this end is by treaty supported by suitable legislation.

5. That in the meantime and until this can be obtained the capitation tax should be raised to $500.

The only point of difference with the commissioners was the date when the capitation tax of $500 should come into effect. The majority of the commissioners agree that it should be done at once, a single commissioner thinks that $300 should be imposed pending the arrangements of a prohibitive treaty. If that is not accomplished in two years then he agrees to have the tax raised to $500.

This is the claim in the interests of British Columbia, and it seems to me this parliament should at once in this session carry into effect such a full and unanimous decision as arrived at by these commissioners after listening to all the evidence given under oath by the people in the province affected by these people.

For a few minutes I will deal with what I anticipate to be certain reasons that may be given by certain members of the House against further restriction or entire exclusion of Chinese. It may be said that this will affect our trade relations with China, and secondly, it may be said, and I have no doubt will be said, that this legislation is opposed to the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Let me first discuss the question of our trade relations with China.

There are several facts disclosed in the report of the commission with regard to the trade of this country with China that have an important bearing upon this question.

Canada's total trade with China in 1896: Imports equal $1,030,698; exports $659,758; total trade $1,690,456. In 1900: Imports equalled $643,433; exports for the same year equalled $256,307; total $880,704. The falling off of the imports relates chiefly to two items, sugar, molasses and tea. The falling off of the exports is covered principally by the item, cotton and cotton manufactures. It will be noticed that imports are more than double the exports, that the goods admitted free are double the dutiable goods. Notwithstanding the application of the Exclusion Act in the United States their trade with China has largely increased. The increase of their export trade is especially noticeable in the items cotton and wheat flour. The opinion of a number of prominent Americans, including the president of the Chamber of Commerce, Seattle, the Secretary of the Board of Trade and Commerce, Portland, and the Mayor of Portland, was that the Exclusion Act had not interfered at all with the trade of the United States and China; and after all the findings of the Royal Commission they report that they are of opinion that any further restriction or exclusion will not affect the trade with China.

The President of the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle in answer to the question as to whether he thought the Exclusion Law had interfered with the United States' trade with China he answered 'not at all.' He said it was altogether against the policy of the Chinese empire to allow their subjects to leave the country, and it is not regarded by any of the American authorities that the Act has been in any way injurious to trade. Their trade with China is consequently on the increase, that the trade is growing, and we do not think that the Exclusion Act affects in any way the trade question.

Mr. Masten, Secretary of the Board of Trade and Commerce, Portland, in answer to a similar question said 'I do not think that any action taken by this country against the importation of Chinese has affected the trade in any respect.'

The Mayor of Portland gave similar evidence. Prominent business men in San Francisco corroborated this opinion in every instance, so that I do not think there is any probability of any trouble arising on trade matter.

With regard to Imperial interests, the British government itself has appointed a commission to inquire into the whole question of immigration into Great Britain, with a view of excluding undesirable immigrants, and in considering the British Columbia legislation it is to be remembered that the Colonial Secretary has repeatedly suggested the application of the Natal Act even against Japanese. We contend that whilst the government of this country guards itself against being made a slaughter market for cheap goods whereby the manufacturer is able to limit supply and fix prices, on the question of the free importation of cheap labour we are asked to accept conditions where the supply is unlimited and the prices unfixed. The whole country admits that our competitor is not our equal, can never become a citizen, we debar him from the national privileges, it is admitted that British labour cannot live decently upon the ordinary remuneration given to him, yet we have to submit to this unequal and degrading competition and assume all the responsibilities. If normal conditions equal to the privileges given to commercial interests are to be brought about, then we must have an entire exclusion of Chinese labour. If we are to build up a nation and not to think of the exploitation of certain resources then we must think of settlers out of which we can make Canadian subjects in the highest and best sense of the word. Population is undoubtedly what is wanted, not only in British Columbia but in this country. There is plenty of room, there are boundless tracts of country yet unexplored, mountains of minerals undeveloped, large expanses of land not yet made to yield crops to the settler. We have good conditions, liberal laws, free institutions, and everything which makes the struggle for existence fair and moderately easy. One thing is wanted and that is population, and not the quantity of immigrants, but in every case the suitability of them. I am not sure that the nature of the immigrant brought in under the present emigration policy of the government is at all desirable. One thing is sure, whether he is suitable or otherwise, he is costly. If this parliament concludes in favour of Chinese and Japanese by refusing to exclude them, I do not see any reason that they can give for not throwing the gates wide open and admitting them as freely, not only as they would be willing to come, but making inducements for them to do so. If the decision of this parliament is in favour of Chinese immigration then the logical meaning of that ought to be that the enormous expense of the present immigration policy of the government in settling up the country is altogether unjustifiable when we have countless numbers of Chinese willing to come in without any expense at all to the country. That seems to me to be the logical position that this parliament ought to take, if it holds the view that entire exclusion against Chinamen is wrong. If we are to have a strong nation we must have a united people, thus the nature of the immigrant must be such as to make an affiliation possible with the present Canadians.

This does not exist at the present time in British Columbia. We are mixed up with large proportions of a servile race, and whatever permanently weakens British Columbia, weakens the Dominion, and weakens the empire, and any method of business operation which brings material gain to individual interests ought not to weigh for one moment against an injury to the nation.

Then as to the moral aspect of the question. I know it will be said by certain people that this question is opposed to the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. The morality of Chinese exclusion is not to be compared to the morality of international warfare. We do not propose to organize a system of slaughter against the Chinamen ; we do not even propose to expel those from our country who are already in it ; we have been and are quite ready to bestow on them the benefits of British institutions ; we are content at least to adopt nature's method of lessening the evil effects of a class of people by the ordinary process of natural destruction. We do not propose to send our armies to China ; we simply request them to stop at home. Honourable gentlemen who would sanction and endorse considerations readily in favour of international material warfare I suppose would hold up their hands in holy horror against the proposed legislation that we advocate. It is beyond the possibility of proof by those who oppose such legislation that it is possible to raise the Chinaman up to the appreciation of the moral and Christian people of this country or even to make him a good citizen. If that were possible to any conceivable extent it might be urged perhaps from a humanitarian standpoint that it would be our duty to receive them ; but as I look over the evidence of the late commission I find that the prominent Christian teachers in the province of British Columbia clearly show that it is not possible to make good citizens of the Chinese or in any perceptible degree to bring them under the influence of Christian teaching. I know in some cases where Christian teachers living in the east have held the contrary view, who have afterwards lived in the west and have changed their views. This is especially true to the politician of every grade. Whilst it has been difficult to have this legislation endorsed enthusiastically in this parliament, especially by the members of eastern Canada, it is not difficult and has never been difficult to get a favourable opinion from any of them when they are out in the west. I desire, therefore, to read some of the evidence of the leading ministers of the Christian churches in British Columbia.

It will be seen, by looking over that evidence and admitted by Christian teachers, that missionary work amongst the Chinese on the coast has met with little success, in fact where any of the ministers gave evidence at all favourable to the Chinese it was put on the ground that they were a servile class and that such a class was necessary to the higher development of the Anglo-Saxon race.

The Rev. W. Leslie Clay minister of the principal Presbyterian church in Victoria, who has lived there for seven years, states as follows : That where any single Chinese gives evidence of Christian reformation he is looked upon by his fellow Chinamen with great antipathy ; he is cast off by his friends because of having adopted Christian modes of thought and living. That he does not know of any of the educated classes of Chinese accepting Christianity. The presence of them in large numbers, he says, is not desirable, and states emphatically that he objects to more coming in. We should have a strong robust nation, he said, and our vast resources ought to be developed by our own citizens. He was asked the question on what ground would he exclude any part of God's creatures from any part of the world, and he answered that self-preservation was the first law of nature, that he would exclude them on that principle and that the Imperial government ought to make a treaty with China to that effect. They were a servile race. Asked as to what he thought the founder of the Christian religion would advise under the circumstances, he answered and said that he had endeavoured to interpret Christ's mind in the matter, and thought that Christ would approve of self-protection.

The Rev. A. S. Rowe, minister of the Metropolitan church, of Victoria, formerly of Toronto, considered that the presence of Chinese had a detrimental effect on the province and an injurious effect upon white labour and on the markets. Their presence is a decided injury to economic conditions, and altogether a disadvantage to the community. The Chinamen are driving the white men out of the country. The Chinaman can never be made a citizen, and that is what we want, people that will take an interest in our laws and institutions and be an integral part of our community and not a menace to the community. He said he believed entirely, not in restriction, but in prohibition, speaking from a national standpoint. He thought Canada would be much stronger by the exclusion of the Chinese race.

Bishop Perrin, head of the Anglican Church, says: They come without a cent and are under obligation to those who bring them here. I do not think, he says, that things ought to be allowed to go on as in the past. They are allowed to come in and arrive with nothing. I think our mission is to go to China because our religion is the universal religion. He thought the Chinese ought not to be allowed to interfere with the dignity of labour in the mind of a true ideal workman. He was opposed to the present immigration. Encroachment of Chinese on the occupations of the people of the country was a dangerous and objectionable condition. I may state, he said,—and this is a very important point—that, while I was in England I was unwilling to recommend labouring people to come to British Columbia. I think there is a great future for British Columbia when the population increases.

The Rev. Lewis W. Hall, Chinese missionary of the Presbyterian church, says: There are large numbers of Chinese employed in and about the Union Mines. When a Chinaman becomes a Christian he is ostracised, shut out from his family, cut off from all intercourse, is made an outcast of his own race. We have no converts from amongst the merchant class. I do not favour the formation of a coolie class at all.

The Rev. Mr. Scott, Methodist minister, the First Methodist church, Vancouver:—

> I do not think it desirable to have the Chinese come. They do not assimilate. It would not be desirable if they did. I have no ill-will to those who are here, but I wouldn't permit any more to come. I think their presence unnecessary. I do not think we need them here in order to reach the Chinese nation as a whole, from the Christian standpoint. We can take Christianity to China without their presence here.

The question was asked, 'Do you believe in the universal brotherhood of man?' 'I do,' he said, 'and I believe in the common Fatherhood of God.' And would you deny the right of any man to any portion of this earth?' He answered:

> We are not universal nations yet; universal nationality and universal brotherhood are two different things. We would like to see universal Christianity, but that is still in the distant future. I don't expect to live to see any great approach towards the universal brotherhood of man. When the Chinese come to the province by the thousands affecting the industrial work of the labourer then the first duty is for the national government to protect its own people and send the aliens back to their own land.

The Rev. McBeth, Presbyterian minister, Vancouver: Any alien race which refuses to assimilate is a menace to the nation. 'I think,' he said, 'we have all the Chinese we can digest. Looking at this question we must have regard for the future of the country. Our children must have room for livelihood. Domestic servants are held in low esteem in British Columbia on account of the presence of Chinese.'

The Rev. John Reid, Presbyterian church, believes the Chinese ought to be excluded.

The Rev. Roland Grant, Baptist minister, ten years on the coast, was also in America for years—had had large experience with Chinese, said:—Assimilation with other nationalities is forbidden. In Portland, he said, with a population of 20,000, in 1880, Chinese population was 6,000. Since the application of exclusion of Chinese, Portland has a population of 100,000 and only 5,000 Chinese. I think we have the moral right to exclude. I think the operation of the Exclusion Act would be quiet and unobserved. The Chinese coming to this country as they do have a deteriorating tendency. A tax of $100 will not keep them out. The Exclusion Act is the proper thing.

The Rev. Mr. Bowell, Methodist minister: I consider the immigration of Chinese and Japanese to be detrimental to the interests of the country. They control the work that ought to be in the hands of white people. Many people have left the province, large families, not being able to get work. I regard them as a menace to the future well-being of the nation, and very seriously interfere with the employment of the boys, which is a very serious matter for any country.

The Rev. Mr. Minchester, Toronto: The presence of Chinese in British Columbia in some cases affect the white wage-earners favourably; in others prejudicially. If Chinese were coming into the country in large numbers I would favour restriction, not of Chinese alone, but I would restrict the large influx of foreigners from any quarter. I would base terms of restriction upon character and education. Foreign immigrants should be able to read some European language, should come into the country for some stated purpose should show some reasonable prospect of becoming permanent citizens.

The evidence then of a large majority of the witnesses under this head goes to prove that, the opinions of the leading Christian ministers in British Columbia who understand the question, who know its effects, who are in a position to know all the facts relating to it, unite with those of others in the province in favour of the exclusion of Chinese. The opinion is practically unanimous that the work of Christianizing the Chinamen in the country is not attended with as satisfactory results as similar work in their own country. The great majority of these witnesses were positively opposed to a servile class or to the introduction in any way of a class that would tend to degrade or affect the welfare of the white labouring class. It is therefore clearly proven and reported so by the commissioners that in no appreciable measure will the missionary work with the Chinese as a nation be affected, and that the morality of this question is supported even by the leading Christian teachers in the province where the evil exists.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am drawing to a conclusion on this subject, and I desire to make a recapitulation of my points in order that they may be thoroughly clear to the mind of the House. I gave first a description of the quality of the report of that commission, which must be admitted by the House as being extensive and conclusive. Second, I presented the demands of British Columbia on this question, showing that for fifteen years the agitation has been going on, the unanimous voice of the provincial parliament by the passing of legislation of every description and resolutions and unanimous petitioning of the people. Third, I reviewed the work of the Dominion government on this question from 1884 up to the present time. Fourth, I described the scope of the inquiry and the finding of the commission, and proved conclusively that what the people of British Columbia had been demanding for many years had been demonstrated by the conclusion of the commissioners to be reasonable. Fifth, I showed how the Chinese affected the different industries: (a) how they affected the question of land clearing and land settlement, (b) how they affected the coal mining industry, (c) how they affected the lumber industry, (d) how they affected the fishing and canning industry. Sixth, I showed how the Chinese excluded unskilled labourers and displaced the boys, the great mass of British subjects, heads of families depending upon the operation of unskilled industries for a livelihood, but more especially the boys of the country, the future nation, driven to idleness, ought to be assisting the sustenance of their family, deprived of the ordinary employments of the province. Seventh, I showed how they affected the local industries; how local industries of many kinds had been entirely taken possession of by them, and how the whites had been driven out of the business altogether, as instanced by the merchant tailors, boot and shoe manufacturers, cigar makers, brickmaking, cordwood cutting, railway construction, freighting, and that in all the evidence given that the business would not be inconvenienced by Chinese exclusion. Eighth, I showed the opinion of the people of British Columbia—public opinion on the question; I demonstrated clearly that the evidence of every interest in the country, dry goods merchants, grocery merchants, lawyers and barristers, superintendents of large coal mines, superintendents of metalliferous mines, ministers of Christian churches, managers of the lumber business, representative men of every interest, were agreed for greater restriction and even exclusion. Ninth, I showed the agitation of the question in other countries, as seen in the United States, in Australia and Tasmania for many years back, how they accomplished and operated what we are now demanding; then the findings of our own commissioners, the unanimous decision in favour of an immediate increased restriction, and failing a prohibitive treaty, the law of exclusion. Tenth, I made some reference to the trade relations with China, showed the experience of the United States, operation of the Exclusion Act in that country had not in any way interfered with the trade, but on the other hand their trade connections had increased enormously. Then I looked at the moral aspect of the question, and by the production of evidence given under oath, by the leading ministers of the Christian churches of British Columbia, they were almost unanimous in favour of a prohibitive law, and very strongly in favour of an increased exclusion law.

I do not see how this parliament can refuse to at once comply with the wishes of the loyal and industrious subjects of British Columbia, and as the representative of that province, in complete accord with the opinion of the witnesses in the evidence given to the commission, and with the conclusion arrived at by the unanimous commissioners, I hope that this parliament at this session will take such immediate action as will comply with the requests of the people of British Columbia, and remove this grievance once and for all. I can assure this House that the feeling of British Columbia subjects on this question is intense, and whilst they have appreciated the increased head tax of 1900, and especially appreciated the appointment of the Royal Commission, and now that they find that the decision of that commission is entirely in accord with their experience and with their desire, it would be a most serious matter if this parliament does not immediately comply with their unanimous request.

Mr. E. F. CLARKE (West Toronto). I have listened attentively to the speech which the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Smith) has just delivered upon the question of the exclusion of Chinese from British Columbia. I have tried to follow him closely, and I think I express the opinions of a good many members on this side of the House when I say that we believe he has done his duty, and that he has made a very temperate as well as a very forcible presentation of the case from the standpoint of the province of which he is one of the representatives. I agree with him too, Sir, speaking for myself, and I concur in his opinion that he cannot see, in view of the report which the Royal Commission appointed by this government has made on that question, and in view of the unanimity of feeling which exists amongst the people of that province, how parliament can very much longer refuse to deal summarily and finally with this matter. I may remind my hon. friend that he has still another string to his bow. I think, if my memory serves me right, that immediately prior to the elections of 1896 the attention of the right hon. the First Minister was called to this question of Chinese immigration. His opinion on that matter was asked by some of his friends on the Pacific coast. I would not like to make any statement that was not in accordance with the facts, but I believe I am correct in saying that in response to the message which the right hon. gentleman received from his supporters in British Columbia on that occasion, he said that he would be guided by the opinions of his friends and supporters in that province in the action which he would take on that question if the Liberal party were returned to power. He has a number of able and loyal supporters from that province, and they have made a presentation of the case to him again and again. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has made an exhaustive and elaborate presentation of the case, and I would invite him now at the earliest moment to test the sincerity of his leader upon the question of the exclusion of Chinese from the province, by giving notice of a resolution to that effect, and having a vote of this parliament taken upon it.

I was much gratified to notice that the Minister of Labour was present during the whole time that my hon. friend was addressing the House. He has taken a good deal of interest on this question of protecting the rights of labour. I am sure that my hon. friend from Vancouver must have convinced him by the arguments which he has so temperately and so forcibly advanced to-day. I have no doubt that if the suggestion which I have taken the liberty of making to the hon. member for Vancouver is acted upon, and if he gives the House an opportunity of expressing its opinion on this matter, he may look for the cordial co-operation and support of the hon. Minister of Labour. At any rate, if the hon. member for Vancouver will do what I think he ought to do, implement his speech by action, if he will present to the House a resolution calling for the exclusion of the Chinese, he may be able to test the sincerity of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House and ascertain where they stand upon that question.

The hon. gentleman also made reference to the quality of our immigration, which I think is worthy of the very best consideration of hon. members on both sides of the House. He did not confine his remarks to Oriental immigration, he referred to other classes of immigration coming to this country from the east. I agree with him that quality in our immigration should not be overlooked, that we should endeavour to get the very best class of immigrants to come to Canada, and that the presence of undesirable classes, not only in British Columbia but in other provinces of the Dominion, acts as a deterrent to prevent the better classes that we desire to come to the Dominion, from entering our doors. I took the liberty already, during this session, of drawing the attention of the Minister of Agriculture, and I think of the Minister of Finance, to the allegations which were made in the annual report of the Commissioner of Immigration of the United States, as to the difficulty which the authorities on the other side of the line experience in keeping undesirable immigrants out of that country. In view of the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver has referred to the quality of immigration, I take the liberty again of drawing the attention of the government to the statements which the Commissioner General of Immigration for the United States has made in his report for the fiscal year ending June, 1901. After referring to the number of diseased immigrants who were returned by the officers of his department from United States ports to the countries whence they had come, he says :

> These represent, however, only such as applied for admission to the United States, and the bureau reiterates the opinion heretofore expressed that the vigilant inspection at our ports has resulted, to some extent, in diverting diseased aliens to Canada, whence they surreptitiously effect an entrance across our northern boundary line.

Now, Sir, in view of this statement of the hon. member for Vancouver, concerning the desirability of having none but the best class of immigrants coming to Canada, I think the extract I have read is worthy of the attention of the government, and I think they should direct their efforts to keeping out of our country this objectionable class, that, according to the report of the commissioner, is seeking entrance to the United States by way of Canada. I hope that the speech which has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver will have some effect upon the government, that it will stir up the Minister of Labour, that it will induce him to take some such steps as will meet with the reasonable demands which have been presented to the House by the hon. member for Vancouver.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some passing reference to an incident which is not, probably, unparalleled in the history of this House, but which is unique in its character, nevertheless, which took place during the sitting of this House yesterday. I refer to the extraordinary opinion which hon. gentlemen who occupy seats in this House entertain respecting each other; I refer to the extraordinary spectacle, if I may use that strong language, presented to the House and to the country yesterday by the hon. gentleman who represents North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in this House, and by his colleague who sits beside him, the hon. gentleman who represents the county of Russell (Mr. Edwards). The confession, if I may be permitted to use the term, which the hon. member for North Norfolk made, was certainly a most extraordinary one. I think it was well that even at this late date that confession should have been made, and I am glad that the hon. gentleman had the courage to make it. It is a most extraordinary one in its character. The hon. gentleman stated briefly to the House yesterday that he was a protectionist—a protectionist to the hilt—while his colleague at his right (Mr. Edwards) says he is a free trader to the hilt. The hon. member for North Norfolk declared that not only is he a protectionist now, but that he has been a protectionist steadily for the past twenty-five years and that he believes in moderate protection: that in 1875, 1876, and in 1877, he advised his leaders that the country required moderate protection and that the great bulk of the people of Canada were looking for legislation of that character. That statement was made by the hon. member for North Norfolk, if I understood what he said correctly in the House yesterday. He said that he had advised the government of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie that additional duties should be imposed in order that the interests of the country might be protected, and having made this statement, he made the still further and most extraordinary statement that the late Mr. Mackenzie and his colleagues were prepared to give the industries of this country an additional measure of protection and that the reason why they did not give that protection was because they met with so much opposition from their supporters from the maritime provinces. That, I believe, was, in brief, the statement which the hon. member made. Lest I should have misinterpreted what he said, with the permission of the House, I will read the 'Hansard' report of that particular part of his speech:

> I suspect, however, and I think I have good reasons for the suspicion—that the Mackenzie government were willing to advance the duties to 20 per cent or even to 22½ per cent. But, the Minister of Finance of that day——

I think the Minister of Finance of that day is the veteran parliamentarian who occupies the position of Minister of Trade and Commerce to-day.

> ——But the Finance Minister of that day was waited upon by a delegation of the members from the maritime provinces headed by the Hon. A. G. Jones, then member for Halifax, and was informed by that delegation that if any advance in the duties was made it simply meant that there would be a bolt of the supporters of the government from the maritime provinces.

So that, the honest convictions of the hon. member for North Norfolk and of the Liberal government of that day were set aside. The interests of the country were set aside. Patriotism on their part was set aside also in order that by acceding to the demands of the gentlemen who then represented the maritime provinces in this House, the Liberal party might secure a renewal of power from the electorate when the appeal was made in the summer of 1878. That seems to be the position in which the hon. member for North Norfolk has left his colleagues respecting their action in refusing the moderate demands of the country as far back as 1878 for a reasonable measure of protection to the industries of Canada. The hon. member for North Norfolk goes a little further and says:

> I wrote, as I say, to the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie in June 1878 . . . . . I advised him to postpone the date of the elections and to take measures to have this question thoroughly discussed in every riding in the Dominion and to have this protective policy combated by good speakers everywhere.

The hon. gentleman, who was in favour of the principle of moderate protection for the industries of Canada, this gentleman who thought that the interests of the country would be promoted by the adoption of a reasonable measure of protection, this gentleman who asked his leader, the late Mr. Mackenzie, to give that measure of protection, this gentleman who says that he believes that Mr. Mackenzie and his colleagues were in favour of giving a measure of protection to the industries of Canada and that the request was refused because the Liberal representatives from the maritime provinces figuratively put a pistol to the head of the government, says that he wrote to the late Hon. Mr. Mackenzie asking him to postpone the elections in order that a competent band of speakers might be sent out to convince the electors of Canada that the protection that he believed to be in their interest should not be granted them. I think this is a most extraordinary statement for an hon. gentleman to make. We are bound under the rules of parliament, and we unhesitatingly acquiesce in them, to accept that statement; but, I say that coming from an hon. gentleman occupying such an honourable and distinguished position as that hon. gentleman occupies in this House and in this country, it is one of the most extraordinary character for him to make. But, fortunately, or unfortunately, the hon. gentleman's statement can be buttressed by a statement made by an even more distinguished member of this House than himself, the statement of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads this House. He practically endorses the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk in sentiments which fell from his lips at the banquet which was given in the restaurant of the Senate to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) in May, 1900. If I have copied correctly from the Toronto 'Globe' of May 10th of that year, the utterances which are credited to the right hon. gentleman, he said on that occasion that :

> When the policy of the party was agreed upon Sir Richard Cartwright never wavered in his support of it . . In the days of Mr. Mackenzie, when the country was much depressed, there were many who believed that if the tariff was increased that policy would be justified by the necessities of the revenue, and that it would be a valuable policy for the country at large. . . . . but if the advice of Sir Richard had prevailed at that time this policy would have been adopted. If it was not accepted it was on account of other influences, which prevailed with the government of the day, and for 16 or 20 years Sir Richard bore the brunt of the obloquy of not having responded to public sentiment, whereas the truth was he was ready to respond to public sentiment.

That statement, it seems to me, confirms the statement which the hon. member for North Norfolk made respecting the action of the government of the late Mr. Mackenzie in dealing with the trade issues of this country. I say it with the greatest possible respect, it is a most extraordinary statement to have been made by the hon. gentleman who represents North Norfolk, but it seems to be confirmed by the statement which the right hon. leader of the government made at the banquet to which I have made reference. Patriotism and the interests of the country, so far as one may judge, were sacrificed on that occasion by hon. gentlemen opposite in the hope—the vain hope—that they might secure a renewal of office from the electors of this country. The hon. member for North Norfolk says that he was fully aware of the strength of the public opinion which existed in the country at that time, that he himself took time by the forelock, that he addressed many meetings in his own constituency against this very principle of protection in order that he might retain his seat in this House. We have the spectacle presented to us of an hon. gentleman who believed in the policy of protection from 1878 down to 1896, denouncing that policy and declaring against the legislation, brought in by the late Sir John Macdonald and the Conservative party, known as the national policy, which, he asserted, yesterday, in this House, was moderate in its character, was moderate protection, was protection in the interests of the people of this country. Is not that a most extraordinary spectacle for an hon. gentleman to present ? Is it not an extraordinary position for one to take who occupies the position that the hon. member for North Norfolk occupies in the House and in this country ? What an inspiration it will be to the young men of Canada to be told by the hon. member for North Norfolk that while he believed in moderate protection—and he tells us now that the legislation passed by the Conservative party was of this class, that it was moderate protection—that while he believed in that policy, that while he believed that a moderate measure of protection was necessary to promote the interests of the country, yet from 1878 down to 1896 he did not hesitate to condemn the policy of Sir John Macdonald, he did not hesitate to fulminate against protection and use his great power and influence throughout the Dominion to induce the people of Canada to desert the standard of Sir John Macdonald and give their support to himself and his colleagues.

Sir, the memory of Alexander Mackenzie is revered by the people of this country. There is a well known maxim which tells us : Speak nothing but good of the dead. I regret that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who was associated for years with Mr. Mackenzie in public life, who on many occasions expressed himself as favourable to the Mackenzie government, should be one of the first in this House to asperse the memory of Mr. Mackenzie. Colleagues of the late Alexander Mackenzie, who are equally responsible with that gentleman for the legislation of 1876, have now seats on the floor of this House, and some of them seats in the present administration. The hon. Alexander Mackenzie has passed over to the majority; he has entered into rest; he has gone to his reward, but his colleagues are here in the House to face the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) and, if he has vials of wrath to pour, it is on their heads he should pour them, and not on the head of the deceased statesman who cannot defend himself. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) before attacking the motives which prompted Mr. Mackenzie to decline to give that reasonable measure of protection to the industries of Canada, which he (Mr. Charlton) thought they should receive, used these words :

> I had a great deal of pleasure a short time ago in listening to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), and I can endorse most fully his encomiums as to the good character of the administration of the Mackenzie government, and as to his speculations as to what would probably have been the outcome of that policy had they continued in power.

These remarks seem to be quite inconsistent with these other quotations from the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) which I have read to the House. How can he eulogize and endorse the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) for the good acts of the Mackenzie government, when that gentleman held the portfolio of finance in that government; when he agreed with the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) that protection was necessary for the welfare of this country, but who, feeling that the interests of his party might be sacrificed if they gave that reasonable measure of protection which he believed in, denied his principles, stood beside his leader and refused to give the people what they desired and what was necessary for their welfare ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARKE. Surely if Mr. Mackenzie is to be condemned, equally deserving of condemnation, is the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the laches of the government in that great crisis in the history of our country ? If I am rightly informed, the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Ross) who sits on the left of the hon. member for Norfolk was a member of the Mackenzie government at that time, and he too is responsible for the action of that minister.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) No.

Mr. CLARKE. Then I have been misinformed.

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) My last session was in 1874.

Mr. CLARKE. Then the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Ross) got out before the threat was made against the Mackenzie government by the members from the maritime provinces ? However, there are some living representatives of the Mackenzie cabinet in the cabinet of the present day. There is the right hon. the Prime Minister.

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. CLARKE. I shall withdraw the accusation. I am glad that the right hon. Prime Minister is not responsible for the acts of the government of 1876; he has enough responsibility to assume for the acts of the present government. However, if the hon. member for Victoria (Hon. Mr. Ross) and if the right hon. the Prime Minister were not members of the Mackenzie cabinet of that date, we have at all events the noblest Roman of them all; we have the Minister of Trade and Commerce who was certainly a member of the Mackenzie administration in 1876.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE. Yes, and the hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) must be held responsible for the acts of that government. But, instead of condemning that hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), we find the member for North Norfolk endorsing him and praising him, and congratulating him on the speech he made in this House which he characterized as being a most ingenious deliverance. Well, it was an ingenious deliverance, and considering it from the standpoint of ingenuity alone, I join the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in congratulating the Minister of Trade and Commerce on that speech. But, Sir, between 1878 and 1896, let us remember that these two hon. gentlemen (Sir Richard Cartwright and Mr. Charlton) went throughout this country declaring that the policy of the Liberal party was a policy of free trade; that the policy of the Liberal party was opposed to protection; and in face of that we have the admission to-day from the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) that they both favoured a substantial addition to the tariff of 1878, and that the reason they were not able to accomplish a change in the fiscal policy of the Mackenzie government, was because of the threat made by the Liberal representatives from the maritime provinces that if it were done they would withdraw their support.

I do not think, Sir, that the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Charlton), is calculated to reflect credit on the character of the gentlemen who were concerned in the transaction, nor do I think it will add lustre to the achievements of the Liberal party of Canada. In what position is the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) ? Let us consider for a moment his position. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) declares that he is a protectionist to the hilt, while his desk mate from Russell, a gentleman who has represented that constituency for many years in this House, declares himself to be a free trader to the hilt. From 1878 to 1896, the hon. member for North Norfolk sat in his place in this House, and he consistently voted against the principle of protection during all that time. He never neglected an opportunity of condemning that policy, and of condemning those who framed it and put it into operation. His colleague from Russell who was a free trader then and says he is a free trader now, was consistent up to 1896 in voting against the protective policy, but he now plays a role almost as inconsistent as that of his hon. friend (Mr. Charlton), for since 1896—ignoring the pledges of the Liberal party, ignoring their promise of retrenchment, ignoring their declaration that they would destroy the policy of protection—he has since that time been one of the most faithful and steadfast supporters of the Liberal party who certainly have not adopted anything remotely approaching a free trade policy. Let us see what changes the Liberals have made in the Conservative protective tariff since they came into power. The Finance Minister told us in his budget speech that while in 1896 the duty collected on all importations into Canada was equal to 18·28 per cent; the duty collected in 1901 amounted 16·06 per cent. This statement shows us that a reduction of 2·22 per cent has been made by the Liberals on the tariff which was in existence in 1896, and under which tariff the Liberals out of office, said, the consumers and producers of this country were being robbed and crushed. A reduction was made in the Conservative tariff, therefore, only to the extent of 2·22 per cent, and the hon. member for Russell who still claims to be a free trader to the hilt, has no hesitation in supporting this government, and declaring by his vote that they have redeemed their pledges, when on their own statement they have only made this miserable reduction of 2·22 per cent on the duties imposed by the tariff of 1896. And, Sir, this miserable pittance of 2·22 per cent, includes the so-called British preference; includes the so-called preference which was given to the motherland as a proof of fidelity and attachment to British institutions. At least, so the ministers of the day say. Well, Sir, if that so-called preference had not been given, the reduction which the Liberal government has made in the tariff would be much smaller even than 2·22 per cent.

The hon. member for North Norfolk, while professing for 18 years to be a free trader, has now practically admitted that he was a protectionist, and we are bound to accept his statement. But, surely, if he is sincere, he must take one more step; he must dissociate himself from hon. gentlemen opposite, because he has given to us and the country the strongest possible evidence of their insincerity on this question of tariff reform. If the hon. gentleman believes in the principles he has enunciated, he certainly ought not longer to continue to support gentlemen who have no fixed principles respecting the tariff. We ought not to be surprised at the divergence of opinion that exists among the unofficial members of the Liberal party who occupy seats in this House, when we find so much divergence of opinion among the leaders of the party. We have had exhibitions of this divergence of opinion among them again and again. At the great banquet of the Manufacturer's Association of Canada, held in Montreal a few months ago, the Premier took to himself the credit of having a tariff that was almost perfect. He said:

> I do not know, you know better than I do because you have to deal with it more than I do—it may be that there are blemishes in it; but whether there are blemishes in it or not, I suppose on the whole the manufacturers are pretty well satisfied.

Upon several voices saying 'No, no,' the right hon. gentleman added:

> That only shows that there is room for improvement.

Naturally exception was taken to the statement that the tariff was almost perfect, and when the right hon. gentleman heard the cries of 'No, no,' he at once turned round and said, 'That only shows that there is room for improvement in it.' There is certainly a great deal of room for improvement in the tariff; and if the resolution presented by the hon. leader of the opposition met with the approval of the members of this House, a decided improvement would be made in the tariff, and substantial benefit done to the interests of the country thereby. The Minister of Finance was also present at that banquet in Montreal, and he said:

> A friend whom I met here to-night, an honoured member of your association, said: 'I want the tariff to be out of politics.' So do I; nay, more, I venture to say, and I hope I can say it without going beyond the line which no man should pass beyond at this non-political union, but I hope I can say that the tariff is largely out of politics to-day, and that if you will take the trouble to read the discussions at Ottawa you will come to the conclusion that there is not much difference of opinion between the two great political parties in Canada upon this great question.

Sir, the resolution which has been submitted by the leader of the opposition proves that there is a substantial difference between the two parties on this question of tariff reform. If that difference is not greater at the present time, it is due to the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have largely abandoned the position they held up to 1896, and have adopted the view of this side of the House, that a substantial measure of protection is necessary to the existence of the industries of the country. But there was another minister present at that banquet, and he gave no uncertain sound as to where he stood on this question of tariff reform. He said:

> The United States takes us by the throat every time in trade matters. I cannot see why our Canadian customs should not be as self-protecting as theirs. (Cheers.)
> I care not about words nor theories. The first principle is to defend ourselves. Do not think I belong to a government which thinks alike.

If we ever thought so, our minds have been disabused of that idea long ago. He went on:

> You have no idea what a cabinet meeting is. They fight like blazes sometimes. (Loud laughter.) I have been brought up in a protectionist school and I have not renounced my faith.

That is the attitude of a gentleman who occupies a very prominent position in the government of this country to-day; and I think I may say that that minister has no stauncher supporter in this House than the hon. member who represents the county of Russell (Mr. Edwards). We have thus the right hon. gentleman who occupies the position of premier claiming to be a free trader, and having associated with him in his cabinet men who are avowed out-and-out protectionists. This method of conducting the affairs of the country may be in accord with constitutional practice, but I think it is unique in the history of Canada.

The hon. member for North Norfolk referred to the Anglo American Commission. The important position that hon. gentleman occupies in the ranks of the Liberal party—or probably it would be fairer to say the important position he occupied in the ranks of the Liberal party two or three years ago—was seen in the fact that of all the able men in the party who are not members of the cabinet he was selected as the gentleman best qualified to deal with matters of such vital importance as those affecting the relations of Canada with the United States. He was selected from amongst all the followers of the government to become associated with two or three members of the cabinet in dealing with these perplexing questions. That hon. gentleman knows in his heart of hearts that if he were as frank on this subject as he was yesterday in declaring his protectionist principles he would tell this House that when that commission went to Washington, they were utterly at sea as to the wants and requirements of this country, and that he himself had very largely to prepare the statistics on which the commission depended for information as to the trade and trade interests of this country. These gentlemen were as indefatigable as their predecessors in endeavouring to bring about a settlement of the questions at issue between Canada and the United States; but what was the result of all their meetings? Practically nothing, and yet the hon. gentleman said in his speech yesterday:

> The condition of trade between these two countries at the present time warrants us in saying to the United States: Give us reciprocity in natural products. Not that we will promise you any mitigation of our tariff system. We will not agree to put a single article more on the free list. We will not agree to reduce our duties unless we choose to do so, we are entitled on the basis of the conditions as they are to-day to reciprocity in natural products.

Although that commission met again and again and failed to accomplish anything, and although the right hon. premier said it was not going to Washington any more, yet the hon. member for North Norfolk thinks that they ought to go once more. For what purpose? To try to negotiate a reciprocity treaty in natural products alone. He says:

> But I am anxious to see that Joint High Commission meet once more. I am anxious to ascertain, as a result of that meeting, whether these questions can be satisfactorily adjusted or not. When we have definitely ascertained one way or the other, we shall know what course we ought to pursue; and if we cannot get fair play, we can at least place ourselves in a position where we shall not receive the contempt of the American people and where we can at least resent an injury.

Sir, up to 1896 efforts were made time and again by those who were intrusted with the responsibility of administering public affairs in Canada, to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States on conditions such as are proposed to-day by the hon. member for North Norfolk—a limited reciprocity treaty. They went in 1892 or 1893, I forget which, with the object of endeavouring to obtain freer trade relations with the United States. But how were they criticised when they returned to this House, having failed in their mission, as the hon. gentleman and his colleagues failed also? They were told more than ten years ago by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the parliament of Canada that they were bound to fail because they did not approach the question of reciprocity from the proper standpoint. On that occasion the right hon. gentleman said:

> The hon. gentlemen did not want to succeed on the basis of unrestricted reciprocity; they wanted to negotiate only on the basis of restricted reciprocity; and as mentioned in the letter of Mr. Blaine to Congressman Baker, which it is useless to cite again in the House, the American government had intimated again and again that they would not negotiate on any other terms than that of unrestricted reciprocity. So their mission was bound to fail from the very outset.

That statement was made deliberately, with all the responsibility attaching to a statement made in this House, by the hon. gentleman who occupied the position of leader of the Liberal party at that time. And yet we have the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) opposing to-day, ten years after it had been declared by the First Minister that the American government would not negotiate on any other basis than unrestricted reciprocity, the amendment offered by the leader of the opposition, on the ground that we ought to make another attempt to obtain a trade arrangement with the United States on conditions which the leaders of the Liberal party have declared again and again to be absolutely impossible. I cannot understand why this commission should be asked to go to Washington to endeavour to obtain trade relations with the United States of a wider measure than those which exist to-day, if the statement of the right hon. the First Minister, made ten years ago, had any foundation in fact, and I am sure that he must have believed every word he said on that occasion.

But there is this point which strikes me forcibly. If Canadians desire to retain their self respect, they will stop sending delegations to Washington to ask for wider and better and closer trade relations with that country. My hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was quite right in saying that the policy which has prevailed among the politicians of the United States for nearly forty years has not been one of amity or friendship towards the people of Canada. Yet the people of Canada, notwithstanding this hostility, have been able to hold their own, and now, thanks to the tuition of the leaders of the Conservative party, they have found a market for their surplus products in the old land, which is now declared by the First Minister to be the best market for all our produce. Why, then, should we jeopardize or disorganize our trade with the mother country in the fatuous, futile attempt to get better terms from our American neighbours ?

One of the causes of the comparatively slow growth which has characterized the Dominion during the past twelve or fifteen years has been that hon. gentlemen, representing nearly one-half of the people, have declared again and again that access to the markets of the United States for our surplus products was essential to the prosperity of this country ; and no capitalists could be induced to invest in the industrial enterprises in Canada until the question of our tariff and trade relations with the United States was settled once and for all. The hon. gentleman who occupied the position of leader of the Liberal party, prior to the time when the right hon. gentleman assumed the responsibility of that position, expressed himself as follows, in his valedictory to the people of Canada, as far back as 1891 :—

> The writing of this letter is the most painful event in the political life of which it is the close. Absolute free trade or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States has been maintained as the sole plank of the Liberal party ever since 1887.

This statement was made on the 5th or 6th of March, 1891, and if that hon. gentleman had remained in Canada, he would have found out that unrestricted reciprocity continued to be the principal plank in the policy of the Liberal party until 1895. How could these gentlemen expect that this Dominion, notwithstanding the vastness of its resources and the possibilities of the future, would so develop industries as to keep pace with the times, when they were continually preaching that the only hope for Canada, that the panacea for all the trade evils under which this country was labouring, was free access to the United States markets, in return for which we were to give the United States manufacturers free access to our markets ? Substantial progress, under such conditions, was impossible.

Let me read a few passages more from this document, the valedictory of the Hon. Mr. Blake. He said :

> Permanence was essential to the success of unrestricted reciprocity. No manufacturer would fix or enlarge his capital in the country of five millions at the risk of being cut off from the country of sixty millions. Our neighbours, instead of engaging in manufacture here, would take our markets with goods manufactured there. And our raw materials instead of being manufactured on this ground, would be exported to be finished abroad.

That is the statement of a gentleman who occupied for years the position of leader of the Liberal party. He declared that this policy, under which it was impossible to promote the industrial development of the country, had been the sole plank of the Liberal party, and he concludes that valedictory by declaring :

> I believe absolute free trade with the United States, best described as commercial union, can only come as an incident or well understood precursor of political union.

He was sustained in the opinion that we could not make much progress without unrestricted reciprocity by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Speaking in 1894 in this House (see page 327, 'Hansard') that hon. gentleman said :

> Yet no great prosperity can be attained by the people of Canada, unless and until we establish friendly, amicable relations with the United States and obtain access to their markets.
> Canada, to-day, above all things and before all things, must be made—if it is going to prosper—a cheap country to live in and to produce in ; must have access to larger markets and notably the most important of all markets—that which lies to the south of us.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been in office since 1896. The responsibility of promoting the interests of this country has been in their hands since then. If they were sincere in the belief, to which they gave expression again and again, that this policy of absolute, unrestricted reciprocity was necessary for the development, welfare and prosperity of this country, what steps have they taken to bring it about ? They appointed a commission, which met again and again but which did nothing, and the statement has been made and repeated in this House that the deliberations of that commission came to naught because of the insuperable difficulty of the Alaskan boundary dispute. That is the statement made here and elsewhere during the last twelve or eighteen months. But it would not surprise me at all, when the whole history of the sessions of this commission both in Quebec and Washington is made known, to find that there were other matters besides the Alaskan boundary question which stood in the way of a settlement of the trade differences between the two countries. I have in my hand a journal called the 'Expansionist,' which has already been quoted with regard to the questions at issue between Canada and the United States. I find in it an article on Canada and the United States by Mr. Osborne Howe. In this article Mr. Howe says :

> It is no more than fair to say that the Maine congressman (referring to the late Mr. Dingley) so far appreciated the advantages of a trade policy which our country must later on adopt, that he proposed to the Canadian commissioners to recommend to congress the repeal of all customs duties upon Canadian products if the government of the Dominion would agree to make a like repeal of its duties upon merchandise, the products of the United States.

That statement is made by Mr. Osborne Howe. He declares that Mr. Dingley agreed to make a recommendation to congress to give us free access to the American markets provided we gave the Americans free access to our markets. Mr. Howe said further :

The present needs of revenue from the customs, and the discrimination which a practical carrying out of this plan would have made against imports coming from England, were considered by the Canadian commissioners to be sufficient justification for their refusal to favourably entertain this proposition. In effect it would have involved the adoption by Canada of the tariff system of the United States with a sensible loss of legislative independence. The sessions of the Joint High Commission apparently came to an end in consequence of an insuperable disagreement over the question of the Alaska boundary line ; but it is inherently probable that a method would have been found of compromising this difference if satisfactory headway had been made towards coming together for the formation of a reciprocal trade treaty. In the absence of this centripetal influence, it seemed, when a contention arose over the boundary question, that there was nothing to be gained by prolonged and inconclusive discussions, hence the sessions came to an end.

That is the statement made in this journal, the 'Expansionist,' by Mr. Osborne Howe, as to the real reason why the commission, appointed at the instance of hon. gentlemen opposite, came to naught. And in 1899, under date March 24th, I find in the London 'Times' this paragraph :

That Canada alone has much to gain from a satisfactory settlement of the trade and boundary questions in dispute is an entirely fallacious presentment of the case. The interests of the United States are quite as deeply involved as those of her continental neighbours, and many of the well informed advisors of the Canadian government perceiving this to be the case are exerting pressure rather to bring about a rupture of the negotiations than to contribute a settlement.

The hon. member for North Norfolk knows whether these statements are justified or not, but I would not be at all surprised, when the secret history of these negotiations comes to be known, to learn that there were other matters besides the Alaskan boundary question, upon which a very substantial disagreement took place between the commissioners of both countries.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

GRAND VALLEY TRACTION COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 21) respecting the Port Dover, Brantford, Berlin and Goderich Railway Company and to change its name to 'The Grand Valley Traction Company.'—Mr. Heyd.

On section 1.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Will the chairman of the committee (Mr. Hyman) kindly explain the changes made in this Bill.

Mr. C. S. HYMAN (London). The original Bill included a section, numbered four, to which some objection was taken by the committee on the ground that it allowed different bonding privileges in regard to different sections of the road. The committee felt that that was not in accordance with the usual custom ; and, after consideration it was withdrawn by the promoters. Then, under the last clause of the Bill, the company were asking for an extension of seven years, and the committee decided to give them an extension of two years to commence and five years to complete.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. The bonding privileges, I understand, extend to the whole road ?

Mr. HYMAN. Yes, just as they were originally.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

WINDSOR AND DETROIT UNION BRIDGE COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 24) respecting the Windsor and Detroit Union Bridge Company.—Mr. Cowan.

On section 1.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Will the chairman of the committee please explain the changes in this Bill ?

Mr. C. S. HYMAN (London). The original Bill proposed an extension of five and seven years. The committee, in accordance with the precedent that they have established in other bills of a like character, gave the committee five years to complete.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. And how many to commence ?

Mr. HYMAN. I may say that there were two other Bills practically of the same character considered by the committee, and as they were bridge Bills it was thought by the committee that the companies would be entitled to five years from the passing of the act. In the case of this particular company, it is really only four years, because they have come here almost a year before the expiration of their powers under their original charter.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. There is no time fixed for commencement.

Mr. HYMAN. No, but—

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). How then, is the time for commencement fixed ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. James Sutherland). May I be allowed to explain ? The company have to commence within two years from the time they receive powers—this being an international work—from the congress of the United States. And, to limit them, so that the charter may not be held if the conditions change, or the mind of this House should change regarding the granting of these powers, they have to complete the work within five years of that time. They have to commence within two years, which is our rule. They really have no existence and cannot do anything until they have acquired joint legislation from the United States.

Mr. SPROULE. There is nothing about when they are to commence.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. What is provided for in the charter is that they must commence within two years, and they cannot commence until they acquire legislation from the United States Congress. After they acquire that power, at any rate, they must complete the work within five years or return to this parliament for a renewal.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister says that our rule is that they commence within two years, but our rule has no force after this statute passes. We are amending the whole statute. Some of the other Acts which we passed provide that within two years after they got their charter from the American authorities they must commence work, and they must finish it within five years. This specifies it must be finished within five years, but says nothing with regard to when it shall commence after they get their authority from the United States.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I think that is provided for in the original charter.

Mr. SPROULE. We are amending that clause of the charter which relates to the beginning and finishing of the road, and after that is passed, it is the only law which will govern, I assume.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Perhaps the bridge is commenced.

Mr. HYMAN. No, the bridge is not commenced. The committee most carefully considered this whole matter, looking upon the undertaking as somewhat different from a railway company; and it being an international measure and dependent upon legislation from the United States, it was felt that five years ought to be put in instead of two. It might be impossible to get legislation within one year, and probably they are getting no more than they are entitled to in that sense.

Mr. SPROULE. We have not taken that view with regard to these Bills heretofore. We have always made their commencement contingent upon legislation in the United States, because that Act might be passed early or late, but it commenced to count from the time of passing.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am inclined to think, and I thought when I spoke before, that the charter was not amended, and had the original clause providing that they must commence two years after they receive their authority from the United States Congress. But the clause as drawn by the promoters of the Bill, I think, would meet the views of the hon. gentleman for this reason, that the work has to be built within five years from the granting of this charter, otherwise it becomes null and void. So they have only five years to procure legislation and finish the work. That is stricter than other Bills.

Mr. INGRAM. There are two other Bills on the same line.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. A charter of that kind might be held for a good many years, and it does not expire unless they receive legislation from the United States Congress. In this particular case, as the clause is drawn, the charter becomes null and void unless they commence the work within five years.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

QUEBEC AND LAKE HURON RAILWAY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 26) respecting the Quebec and Lake Huron Railway Company.—Mr. Malouin.

On section 1.

Mr. C. S. HYMAN (London). I will mention to the committee that the only amendments made to this Bill are one or two verbal changes. The promoters have asked for four and seven years for the extension, and the committee decided they should be given two and five years, which is the ordinary clause. The other change is in the wording of clause 2, by which the committee strike out the words 'in addition to,' and put in the words 'as well as,' giving the company power, if they desire hereafter, to make a gauge of six feet ; but they must have at least a standard gauge.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the object of a six foot gauge ?

Mr. HYMAN. That is explained by the promoters of the Bill. In certain contingencies they might require to carry very heavy loads over their road, therefore they simply ask for the privilege of laying another rail if they so desire. But they can only do that providing they have a standard gauge.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

BUFFALO AND INTERNATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANIES.

On section 1.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 31) respecting the Buffalo Railway Company and the International Railway Company.—Mr. Osler.

On section 1.

Mr. SPROULE. I think we should have some explanation in regard to this Bill.

Mr. C. S. HYMAN (London). This Bill simply provides for the substitution of another name, but a couple of amendments have been made as an addition, in the following terms :

But such substitution shall not in any way impair, alter or affect the liabilities of the Buffalo Railway Company, nor in any wise affect any suit or proceeding now pending, or judgment existing either by, or in favour of, or against the company, which notwithstanding such substitution may be prosecuted, continued, completed and enforced as if this Act had not been passed.

It was felt by the committee that there should be a clause of that kind inserted simply as a protection to any creditor that there might be of the road. In addition there is a second clause which is practically to the same effect as the provision of the Ontario statute :

2. The vesting in the said company of the business, profits, rights and incidents appurtenant thereto and all other things belonging to the Niagara Falls Park and River Railway Co., by any agreement made between it and the said company by the said statute of Canada does not deprive or assume to deprive the legislature of Ontario of its powers and rights in respect to the Niagara Falls Park and River Railway Co., or the jurisdiction and control of the commissioners for the Queen Victoria Niagara Falls Park as by the said statute provided.

I am inclined to think that is fully covered by the preceding clause, but there was a desire that this second clause should be inserted as an additional protection.

Mr. SPROULE. Why do you make provision against an action against one company and leave it out in the other case ?

Mr. HYMAN. I think that is precisely all covered by the original clause. I think the first clause covers the second one. The second clause I read is part of the original Ontario Act. I may say that it was the desire of the Ontario government that this should be inserted.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HYMAN.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 54) to incorporate the Essex Terminal Railway Company.—Mr. Cowan.

Bill (No. 55) respecting the Lake Erie and Detroit River Railway Company.—Mr. Sutherland (Essex).

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Indian River Railway Company.—Mr. Béland.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, I had been drawing the attention of the House to the position occupied by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and to the statement which he made respecting his relations to the adoption of a moderate policy of protection. He declared that he had favoured in 1876 a moderate policy of protection, a policy such as had been introduced by the Conservative party and carried in 1878 or 1879, while at the same time he steadily offered opposition to that policy from its adoption down to 1896. I was also drawing attention to the fact that, from the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was practically in the same position, and I quoted an extract from a speech delivered by the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on the occasion of a banquet tendered to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1900, to the effect that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had also favoured a moderate measure of protection, but, that he had been overruled, or coerced, by his colleagues in the House who then occupied seats and represented constituencies in the maritime provinces ; that from the adoption of that policy of protection down to 1896 he had been denouncing it, notwithstanding the allegation that prior to 1878 he had favoured it. I also referred to the statement made, and repeated again and again, that the Liberal party had declared that Canada could enjoy no general or real measure of prosperity unless and until we had obtained access to the markets of the great republic to the south of us for our surplus agricultural products ; that the Liberal party had charged that the Conservative delegates, who went to Washington again and again to try to secure a treaty that would enlarge trade between the two countries, did not go with the desire or the intention of being successful, because they had confined their efforts to offers of restricted reciprocity when the Liberal party, had declared that it was impossible to make any agreement with the statesmen of the United States except on the basis of unrestricted reciprocity. I quoted also from a statement of the 'Expansionist' newspaper to the effect that Mr. Dingley had favoured the passage of a measure through the congress of the United States that would provide for the free admission of Canadian products to the markets of that country on condition of our granting them a like privilege by the admission of American products free into the markets of Canada, but that the proposition had been declined. I may say here, Mr. Speaker, that, speaking for myself, and I believe, speaking for every hon. gentleman on this side of the House, if the Canadian commissioners who visited Washington in 1898, or 1899, were offered unrestricted reciprocity and refused to accept it, upon the conditions that I have named, they acted well and wisely in the interests of the country, because, I think it was better that in that case, as in many other cases that might be cited, that party should abandon its position rather than that the interests of the country should be sacrificed. I attribute their change of policy to the fact that having come into office, they realized the responsibility attaching to their position, they realized to a greater extent than previously that Canada has as much to lose as to gain by the adoption of the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, that Canada has as much to give as to obtain from that policy; and that having committed themselves to this policy of a so-called British preference they could not meet the views or wishes of their American colleagues on that Joint High Commission.

There are no two opinions to-day as to the fact that the country is prosperous. We rejoice in that fact and we can congratulate the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in being able to make the statement he made the other day as to the prosperity of the country. We hope that prosperity will continue for many years to come, but, we challenge the accuracy of the statements which have been made from time to time by hon. gentlemen opposite as to their part in bringing about that prosperity. We have invited them to make a statement as to what they have done to promote the prosperity of the country. Have they lowered the taxation of the people of this country? On the contrary, taxation has been very much larger than it was before they assumed office. They have not provided any new markets for the surplus products of the farmers of this country. Our farmers still find their market in the old land. They are not selling as much of their products in the United States; they certainly are not selling more in the United States than they did prior to 1896, while larger quantities of American food products are brought into Canada now than then. I invite hon. gentlemen on the other side, to point us to a single item of their policy by which they have provided any markets in addition to those in existence in 1896. I defy them to point to any such policy. Our Canadian farmers have been steadily cultivating the British market—a market which the Liberals out of power declared to be a second hand and second rate market. And, Sir, it was because the farmers of Canada turned a deaf ear to the representations made to them by the Liberals prior to 1896, and accepted the advice given by the leaders of the Conservative party, that they should cultivate the British market because it was the best and safest and likely to be the most abiding; it is due to that fact that we have such a development of trade with the English market to-day. The substantial increase which has taken place in the sale of Canadian agricultural products on the British market, has amply justified the predictions made by the Conservative party and has confounded the pessimistic prophecies made by the Liberals before they attained power.

And, Sir, to what is the present prosperity of Canada to be attributed? What have the Liberal government done to contribute to that prosperity? What policy have they put into force which would tend to make us prosper? Sir, the prosperity which has obtained on the American continent during these past five or six years, is due to other causes, and is not due to any policy propounded by the Canadian government. Let me quote the opinion of an American author on this point. He says:

> Prosperity must always begin with the producer. Something must be obtained from the soil which can be sold for money.

Canada has prospered since 1896 because of a succession of abundant harvests, because of the cultivation of a larger area of her fertile lands in the North-west, and because of other things which I shall take occasion to enumerate. The figures prepared by the Bureau of Statistics at Toronto reveal a wonderful condition. If you take the value of Ontario field crops, and of animals and their products, in 1896, and compare it with the value of the same products from 1897 to 1901, the gratifying fact is shown that while these products in 1896 were valued at $125,813,000, the average yearly value from 1897 to 1901 has been not less than $156,570,000, or, in other words, the agricultural products of Ontario have been worth $30,000,000 a year more from 1897 to the present date, than they were in 1896. That is a very substantial reason why this country has been blessed with great prosperity during the later period. If we take into consideration the further fact, that larger areas of land have been placed under cultivation in Manitoba and the North-west territories, we can realize why the volume of business has been steadily increasing from that part of our Dominion. There have been valuable discoveries and exploitations of mineral lands since 1896; the wonderful riches of the Klondike have been developed, and all these causes combined have brought about our prosperity. Is it not strange that hon. gentlemen opposite do not hesitate to take to themselves practically all the credit for this improved condition of things? I fancy that if they compared the improvement which has taken place in the United States with the improvement which has taken place in Canada, these gentlemen would not be so ready to congratulate themselves as they are. What has been the cause of the prosperity in the United States during the same period? You will recollect that as late as 1894 the condition of things in that great country was such as to cause general alarm—trade was prostrated; banks were failing every day, large industrial institutions were being closed. This unsatisfactory condition was due to a general depression, to the lack of a ready and profitable sale for the surplus food products of the country, and because of the failure of crops in certain sections. Let me quote to you the opinion of Mr. R. S. Baker, who has written very fully on the development of the trade of the United States, and on the causes which have led to the prosperity there since 1896. He says:

It is curious and wonderful to see how exactly the industries of the world tread in lock-step, and how the man of the soil, the farmer, towers huge and powerful at the head of the line. When his tread is slow and heavy, the iron master, the transporter, the miner, the manufacturer, must also tread slowly—and depression and hard times are abroad in the land. But when the man of the soil increases his speed, those behind him move more rapidly; for he represents the worlds primary need—food.

In the fall of 1897 there was an enormous crop of wheat in the United States, the largest by all odds in many years. At the same time the wheat crops in Russia and India were short, to the verge of famine in the last named country, and the great consumers of Europe, England especially, were compelled to turn to America for food to a much greater extent than usual.

Then in the fall of 1898 came another amazing wheat crop, more than 675,000,000 bushels, the largest wheat crop in the history of America.

There were also large and richly profitable corn and oat crops, and the south raised the greatest crop of cotton in its history, rising from 8,700,000 bales in 1897 to upwards of 11,000,000 bales in 1898.

The author of this work on the prosperity of the United States goes on to show what followed:

In less than three years time, between 1897 and 1900, so great were the trade balances in our favour that over a billion dollars of American indebtedness was wiped from the ledgers of Europe. Wages for labour increased rapidly in every part of the country, and never was there such a sudden and yet substantial expansion in the various manufacturing industries.

In the single state of Kansas, the farm mortgages which in 1890 amounted to the vast sum of $240,000,000, much of it bearing the exorbitant interest of 12 per cent, had been reduced in 1899 to less than $41,000,000.

On June 30, 1899, there were over 5,200,000 depositors in savings banks in the United States, compared with 4,800,000 in 1894 and 3,800,000 in 1889, a gain of 1,400,000 in ten years. And each of these depositors had more money to his account than ever before, the average amount on deposit rising from $369 for each person in 1894 to $419 in 1899.

The deposits in all the banks, national and state, as well as savings, representing upwards of 13,000,000 individual depositors, actually doubled in ten years, amounting in 1899 to the enormous sum of $7,514,000,000.

In 1893 no fewer than 74 railroad companies, representing the vast sum of $1,781,000,000 in stocks and bonds, went to the wall, and there were large numbers of failures in 1894, 1895 and 1896. In 1899, there were failures of only 10 roads with a little more than $50,000,000 in stocks and bonds, the best record by all odds since 1882.

A glance at the number of commercial failures will show how they decreased, from over 15,000 in 1893, with an enormous total of liabilities of nearly $347,000,000, to only 9,337 failures in 1899 with liabilities of less than $91,000,000.

If time permitted I might quote further reasons for that great prosperity in the United States, which has been brought about because of the redundant harvests which have blessed that country, because of the shortage of the crops in other parts of the world. The same reasons for our prosperity have obtained in this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not give credit for the prosperity to these causes, but they exultantly exclaim that Canada has made more progress during the last five years than during the previous twenty years. If they made a comparison of the trade of Canada with the trade of the United States during the same period we might not have so much reason to complain of their attitude in this respect.

But Canada has been prosperous and would have been prosperous without the assistance of hon. gentlemen opposite. The splendid harvests we have had would have caused the measure of prosperity we have enjoyed. The test of the soundness of the fiscal policy of this country is to be found rather in the condition which obtained in Canada from 1891 to 1896, when a period of universal depression prevailed throughout this continent. If hon. gentlemen will examine the record of the trade of Canada from 1891 to 1896, and compare it with the record of the trade of the United States for the same period, they will find that, slow as was the growth of this country, it was more satisfactory and substantial in proportion to our population than was the growth of the great republic to the south of us. In 1891 the total imports and exports of Canada amounted to $218,385,000, and for the next five years—that period of universal depression from 1892 to 1896—the average annual trade of Canada amounted to $238,690,000, an increase of $20,000,000 per annum during each year of that period of depression.

Now, let us turn to the trade statistics of the United States for the same period. In 1891 the imports and exports of the Republic amounted to $1,729,397,000, and for the next five years—1892, 1893, 1894, 1895 and 1896—there was no increase in the trade of the country. On the contrary, there was a decline of $65,000,000 per annum, the average annual imports and exports for the period being $1,664,144,000.

But hon. gentlemen say that Canada has made more progress in the last five years than she made in the preceding twenty years. Let us examine the record of Canada's trade for the fifteen years from 1881 to 1896. In 1881 the imports and exports of Canada amounted to $189,902,427, and for the succeeding fifteen years that trade averaged $211,537,804 per annum; in other words, it showed during that period an annual increase of nearly $22,000,000 over the total trade of the year 1881.

Now, we have heard a good deal about the prosperity of the United States. Let us make a comparison between the prosperity which obtained in Canada from 1881 to 1896 and the prosperity which obtained in the United States during the same period. In 1881 the total value of the United States imports and exports of merchandise was $1,545,041,974, while for the succeeding fifteen years up to 1896, the average trade of the Republic was $1,538,553,125. In other words, while the trade of Canada during that period of fifteen years showed an average annual increase of $22,000,00, the trade of the United States showed an average annual decline of no less than $6,500,000. If the policy which prevailed in Canada from 1891 to 1896, when depression was universal, enabled this country not only to hold its own, but to make reasonable progress, that fact affords the strongest possible evidence we can have as to the wisdom and the patriotism of those who framed the fiscal policy which then existed in this country.

But we have heard a great deal of the progress which has obtained in Canada since 1896. When hon. gentlemen opposite make a statement of that kind, they take good care not to tell us of the progress made in other countries during the same period. They used to be very fond of quoting statistics to show the progress of the United States. Let us look at the statistics of the trade of that country since 1896. We have seen that for the fifteen years prior to that year the average annual imports and exports of merchandise in the United States amounted to $1,538,553,125. The annual average during the five years since then has been no less a sum than $2,028,557,833, or an average annual increase of no less than $490,004,708. This is the strongest possible proof we can give of the enormous expansion which has taken place in the trade of that country during that period. The imports and exports of merchandise in the United States were $190,000,000 less in 1895 than they were in 1891, while they were $771,429,026 greater in 1901 than they were in 1895, an expansion equal to double the total value of the imports and exports of Canada in the past year.

But, Sir, this marvellous expansion was not confined to Canada or the United States. Let me quote a few figures to show how the trade of the United Kingdom expanded during the same period. I shall have to take the statistics from 1891 to 1900, because these are the latest I could get in the library. In 1891 the exports and imports of the United Kingdom amounted to $3,618,537,000; in 1893 they dropped down to $3,313,676,000, and in 1894 to $3,315,154,000; in 1896 they climbed up to $3,587,253,000; while in 1900 they amounted to the enormous sum of $4,267,974,000. The trade of the United Kingdom for 1900 exceeded that for 1894 by the enormous sum of $950,000,000, while the trade for 1900 exceeded the trade for 1896 by the sum of $680,000,000.

It is a singular fact that during the year 1891 Lord Salisbury was in office; it was the last full year in which he was premier prior to the advent of Mr. Gladstone. He was succeeded by Mr. Gladstone in 1892. The first full year of Mr. Gladstone was 1893. He was followed by Lord Rosebery in 1894, and Lord Rosebery was in turn succeeded by Lord Salisbury in 1895. In 1891, as I have pointed out, the total imports and exports of the United Kingdom amounted to $3,618,537,000.

During the first year of Mr. Gladstone's administration they decreased more than $300,000,000. The same story was told during the administration of Lord Rosebery. But after Lord Salisbury attained office, succeeding both Liberal premiers, the trade of the United Kingdom went up again by leaps and bounds. Yet we have never heard, either in Canada or the old land, that anybody attached any blame to Mr. Gladstone because of the shrinkage of trade after he assumed office or gave any particular credit to Lord Salisbury because of the enormous expansion of trade which took place since he assumed the premiership in the latter end of 1895. But hon. gentlemen opposite would like to make us believe that, by some political sleight of hand, they have been able to increase the trade of this country in the gratifying proportions in which it has increased from 1896 up to the present.

Let me point out that the wonderful expansion of trade which has taken place in the United States during the past five years has been rendered possible by the attention the Americans have given to the all important question of transportation. Mr.

Baker, whose work on the prosperity of the United States I have already quoted, declares that a bushel of wheat, or an equivalent quantity of flour, can be shipped from Minneapolis to almost any point in western Europe for about 20 cents. This includes no fewer than three transhipments—at Duluth, Buffalo and New York; and that it costs almost as much to ship the same wheat from Liverpool to Manchester, in England.

The Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) claims to be seized with the importance of this question of transportation. Might I ask him what scheme he has devised and perfected for the improvement of our transportation facilities? It is true that we have had the Intercolonial Railway brought into Montreal. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said that when the Liberal party came into office in 1896, they found the western terminus of the Intercolonial Railway in a ploughed field. Well, what special advantage has come to the taxpayers of Canada by reason of its having been extended to Montreal? Are the taxpayers, are the producers of the country, getting any benefit from the extension of the Intercolonial Railway into that city? If we examine the returns of the past year, I do not think we will find there any matter for congratulation. It seems to me it would have been better had these hon. gentlemen left the western terminus of the Intercolonial Railway in a ploughed field rather than incur the enormous expense and reap the meagre returns from that expenditure, which are shown in the Public Accounts.

We have heard a great deal about making Montreal the national port. For two or three years past we have been listening to schemes for the construction of additional wharfage and the erection of additional elevators and the equipment of that port generally. Well, I would like to know what has become of the Conners syndicate elevator scheme? We had that on the boards two or three years ago, but there seems to be nothing left of it now. We also had another proposition some time ago for the construction of elevators, which also seems to have fallen through; and the present condition of things in our so-called national port cannot be at all satisfactory, if we are to pay any attention to the statements made by those well qualified to judge. I take the liberty of reading to the House an extract from the address of the retiring President of the Board of Trade of Montreal, Mr. Henry Miles, delivered a few weeks ago. What does he say with regard to the equipment of the Montreal harbour:

> In regard to the equipment of our harbour, the position is unsatisfactory. The attitude prevailing in the direction of these affairs is such that I fear the alienation of the sympathies of parliament from our national port. Nothing has actually been accomplished towards this equipment, and the idea of a 'free port' is submerged for the time being. Differences of opinion and contention, I would like to see put to one side; let us have the work proceed.
> There is a great common interest involved, the welfare of the commerce of the country and of the welfare of our city. We have a right to demand the setting aside of everything that appears to delay the accomplishment of success in this great national undertaking.

The position of affairs in the port of Montreal must be a serious one or the retiring President of the Board of Trade would never have given utterance to the words I have just read. It is time something definite was done, some scheme of transportation laid out and completed. We have spent hundreds of thousands of dollars pottering here and there throughout the country, but no plan has yet been adopted which has given the producers of the west the slightest relief or assistance.

Does the management of our government railways during the past few years give any cause for rejoicing to those who advocate the nationalization of our railways, telegraphs and telephone lines? From 1892 to 1896, we spent on capital account on the Intercolonial Railway $1,643,074.65, and on the Prince Edward Island Railway $8,300.49, making a total expenditure from 1892 to 1896 on capital account of $1,651,375.14, and during those five years we lost in the operation of those two roads $943,552. Since hon. gentlemen opposite came into office what do the figures show? They show that the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway from 1897 to 1901 on capital account amounted to the enormous sum of $8,414,441.21, and on the Prince Edward Island Railway $373,261.83. Or, in the past five years, we have spent on capital account on both these lines, $8,787,703.04, and during those years we lost no less than $901,424 in the operation of those roads. In other words, in round figures, in the last ten years, we have spent over $10,000,000 on capital account on these two railways, and the receipts have fallen almost $2,000,000 short of the actual expenses in connection with their operation.

I would like to know how much longer this condition is going to last? Are we to go on spending, on an average $1,000,000 a year on capital account, more than one-half of which should be charged to operating expenses, and lose besides from $300,000 to $600,000 per year in the operation of these roads? It might be some consolation to us if we knew that our brothers down by the sea were getting some advantage in the shape of cheap freight and passenger rates, but I am told that the schedules of the Intercolonial Railway show that while the people of the maritime provinces have to stand, in common with the other provinces, an annual loss in the operation of the government roads, they are charged at least as much for freight and passenger service as are those served by roads not under the control or management of the government.

I wish now to refer briefly to the so-called British preference which is mentioned in the amendment presented by the hon. the leader of the opposition. I may say that the idea of giving a preference to the workingmen and the manufacturers of the old land was a rather popular idea. It seemed to be appreciated and accepted as a good policy by the great majority of Canadians, when that policy was inaugurated. But it was hoped that when the Liberal party came into office—accepting the statement of the right hon. gentleman who is now premier as being made in good faith—an effort would be made to secure for the products of Canada some preference in the markets of the old land. But, unfortunately, in that matter, as in many others, we were doomed to be disappointed. We know, that, in 1896, the premier declared in London that it would be a good thing to obtain a mutual preference, and that when the Liberal party should get into power they would send commissioners to try to obtain that mutual preference. Well, twelve months after, when the Prime Minister was on his way to attend the Jubilee in London, in 1897, he practically declined to accept any preference. He said :

> I claim for the present government of Canada that they have passed a resolution by which the products of Great Britain are admitted on the rate of their tariff, at 12½ per cent, and next year at 25 per cent reduction. This we have done, not asking any compensation.
> There is a class of our fellow citizens who ask that all such concessions should be made for 'quid pro quo.'
>
> The Canadian government has ignored all such sentiments.
>
> We have done it because we owe a debt of gratitude to Great Britain. We have done it because it is no intention of ours to disturb in any way the system of free trade which has done so much for England.
>
> What we give you by our tariff we give you in gratitude for the splendid freedom under which we have prospered. It is a free gift. We ask no compensation. Protection has been the curse of Canada. We would not see you come under its baneful influence—for what weakens you must weaken us.

That is the statement made by the right hon. gentleman at Liverpool, in June, 1897. On the 6th of October following, speaking in the city of Toronto, he declared :—

> If I had thought I could have obtained for the products of Canada preferential treatment in the markets of Great Britain, not only would I have been wanting in patriotism, but I would have been wanting in reason. I would have been simply an idiot if I had not obtained such preference for the products of Canada.

Sir, it is a difficult thing to reconcile these two statements. But we were disappointed, to say the least of it, when the distinguished Canadian who represented Canada on the occasion of the Jubilee did not make more strenuous efforts to obtain for the farmers and other producers in Canada some advantage in return for the advantages which, he claimed, the Canadian government had given to the manufacturers and workmen of the mother country. He entertained the view that he was giving something to Great Britain. But the Minister of Finance (Hon. W. S. Fielding) who, probably, knew better the effect of what was being done, said that they were giving nothing. He said :—

> We do not by our resolutions offer anything to Great Britain alone. We recognize the fact that Great Britain by her liberal policy is in a position to avail herself of this offer immediately, but we make our offer not to Great Britain only, but to every nation which is prepared to accept it. We make it to every country which is willing to establish fair and reasonable trade relations with Canada.

And the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said :—

> I say with respect to the offer we now make, that it is not a preferential offer at all in the true legal sense of the word. That offer is open to all the world. The Americans may avail themselves of it and so may the Germans and the Belgians.

And from all the statistics I have seen, the Germans and the Belgians are availing themselves of it.

> The whole world are welcome to avail themselves of it on the same terms and the same conditions on which England may take advantage of it. Where is the preference there ?

Where is the preference there ? In 1901, according to the statement made by an hon. gentleman since this debate began, the average rate of duty on all imports coming in from the United States was 12·05, while the percentage on all goods from Great Britain was 18·23, notwithstanding this wonderful preference. The British imports paid half as much more duty as the imports from the United States. And, if you take the dutiable imports entered for consumption in 1901, you find that, while the average rate from the United States was 24·83, the average rate on goods from Great Britain was 24·74. So nicely had the tariff been arranged before this so-called British preference came into force, that it was found and is found to-day that the average rate on dutiable goods from Great Britain is practically the same as that on dutiable goods from the United States, notwithstanding the so-called preference.

But we have testimony as to the effect of this preference, from a gentleman whose qualification to express an opinion will not be challenged in this House. We have the statement of the gentleman who was, and, I believe still is, the secretary of that great free trade organization, the Cobden Club, from which the right hon. premier deigned to accept a medal because of his services to the empire in giving this so-called British preference.

Writing to the 'London Times' on September 30th, 1898, this gentleman said :—

The two great competitors for the Canadian market are the United Kingdom and the United States. In spite of the so-called British preferential tariff, the proportion of the total trade secured by the United States continues to increase and the proportion secured by the United Kingdom continues to decline. The explanation of this fact is that the bulk of the goods exported from the United States to Canada are admitted free, whereas the bulk of the goods exported from the United Kingdom are heavily taxed. The Canadian financial policy is to encourage the trade of the United States and not that of the United Kingdom.

That is the deliberate statement of the secretary of the Cobden Club. And we are asked to continue to endorse and sustain that which, according to this statement, contributes to increase the volume of trade with the United States and to decrease proportionately that from the mother country. In 1901, the free goods from the United States were valued at $56,884,730, while for the same year the free goods from Great Britain amounted to $11,316,510. The free imports from the United States were five-fold greater than those from the United Kingdom. In 1896 thirty per cent of our imports were from Great Britain and fifty-three per cent were from the United States. In 1901, under the operation of the preference, our imports from Great Britain were twenty-four per cent, while our imports from the United States had increased to sixty-one per cent. This indicates that Mr. Harold Cox knew what he was writing about when he indited the epistle to the 'London Times' from which I have taken the liberty of making an extract. But what made the preference popular in Canada was the fact that it was declared that twenty-five per cent at least, of British labour must be put into the goods imported into Great Britain to be completed and exported to Canada before they could obtain the preference. I obtained a copy of the circular issued by the commissioner of customs to explain to the officers of the department what goods should be entitled to the preference. Here is part of what he says :—

In estimating the labour of the United Kingdom entering into the production of articles manufactured therein partly from imported material, the extent of such labour may be reckoned by the value of the manufactured article ready for shipment at the place of production after deducting therefrom the value on entering within the limits of the United Kingdom, represented by the component parts of such articles which are the produce of countries not entitled to the benefits of the preferential tariff.

That is a rather involved sentence, and it is difficult for a layman to interpret what it really means. But I believe, and I think my opinion will be sustained, that the clause when properly interpreted will mean—and it has been interpreted in that way by those who have taken advantage of the preference—that in estimating the proportion of value of British labour that must enter into the production, the person exporting may count his profit as part of the labour entering into the goods. If that is the case, British labour to the extent of even five per cent need not be employed in finishing or completing these goods, which may then be brought in under the preference. Goods have been brought in to the extent of hundreds of thousands or millions of dollars from the continent to England, assembled there, put into new packages and sent out here as the finished products of factories and workshops of Great Britain, to the great injury of many important industries of this country.

Sir, I think that in the matter of protection, the workingmen and manufacturers of Canada have a greater claim upon us than the workingmen and manufacturers of Germany, or of Belgium, or of Holland ; and if the preference is to be in name even a British preference, a much more substantial evidence of the value put upon it in the United Kingdom must be procured than that which is provided under the regulations adopted and in force in the Customs Department at the present time. But let me quote the opinion of one of the leading and most influential journals of the United Kingdom concerning the methods adopted to take advantage of this preference by the manufacturers of the continent. This is from the Belfast 'News' of January 23 last :—

How Foreigners Rob Canada.

Since Canada granted a preference tariff to Britain, tons upon tons of German and other foreign textiles have been brought over to England and reshipped to Canada, after a so-called process of 'finishing,' in order that they may be classed as goods partly of British manufacture. In some cases this 'finishing' in England consists simply in taking off the German, French, or Austrian labels, doing the goods up again, and then giving them a British name or label. There is no branch of trade in which this style of smuggling is carried on to the extent that it is in the textile trade.—(Belfast 'News,' January 23, 1902.

I will read a cable despatch which appeared in the Toronto 'Globe' of January 9, 1902. as to the condition of things which existed in England at that time :—

What is expected in England as a result of the prolongation of the period of economic disturbance in Germany is a conversion of the market here into a dumping ground for the surplus manufactures with which the fatherland is now heavily overstocked.

If the manufacturers of Britain, having the constituency to serve that they have, having the facilities to manufacture that they have, if they fear as a result of the prolongation of hard times in Germany that Britain would be made a slaughter market, have not the manufacturers of Canada a right to complain that advantage is being taken of this British preference, so-called, to make this country a slaughter market for the surplus products of Germany, that are doing such damage to the textile trade even of the old land itself ? In its review of the conditions of trade in 1901, the London 'Times' says :—

> The crisis in Germany was also not without its effect on the woollen industry, the Bradford trade especially suffering.

And, Sir, when our woollen manufacturers appealed to the government of the day and asked them for relief and assistance because of the unfair competition to which they are being subjected by the abuse of this so-called British preference, they are told that if a duty of 23 per cent is not sufficient to enable them to carry on their business, it had better be wiped out. Sir, it is said that this preference, so-called, has given Canada an advantage in the markets of Britain ; that to all intents and purposes Canada has a real preference in the British market. That assertion has been repeated again and again by hon. gentlemen. Our so-called British preference was introduced and came into force in Canada on April 23, 1897. For the year ending June 30, 1898, that is the year following the adoption of this British preference, the United States farmers sold $63,000,000 worth more to Britain than in 1897. The so-called preference was increased from 25 per cent to 33 per cent in July, 1900 ; and for the year ending June 30, 1901, the sales of Canadian farmers to Britain decreased $5,000,000 as compared with 1900, while the American farmers increased their sales to Britain by no less than $36,500,000. The American farmers sold Britain over $75,000,000 worth in 1901 more than they did in 1897. The increase in the sales of American farmers to Britain in 1901, as compared with 1897, when this tariff first came into force, exceeded by many millions our total sales of farm and animal products to Britain in any year since 1897. In all these calculations I have not taken into account one dollar of the sales of cotton or of tobacco leaf by the United States to Britain. The preference has not very seriously, so far, affected the farming interests of the United States. It is said that the preference would induce the British people to buy more largely from Canada than from any other country. That statement has been made on the authority of the First Minister. Speaking at Bowmanville in October, 1899, he made use of these words, as reported in the Toronto 'Globe' :—

> The merchants of England, the men who have to buy articles in the markets of the world no longer go to the United States to make their purchases. They come to Canada and this is the direct result of our preferential tariff.

Now, let us see how that works out. In 1901 the United States bought $27,000,000 worth less from Britain than in 1896, and they sold her $226,000,000 worth more, that increase for one year amounting to more than our total sales to Britain in any two years. That is how this British preference works out. Australia gives no preference to British goods. In 1900, the latest available return, Australia sold $10,000,000 worth more products to Britain than in 1895, and purchased almost $50,000,000 worth more. These figures show that the preference had very little if any effect in increasing our trade, only in so far as it has allowed continental and foreign goods to be shipped through Britain to Canada, and so reap the benefit of the lower duty to the detriment of our own manufacturers and workingmen.

We are being punished, Mr. Speaker, because of the adoption by Canada of this so-called preference. We have been and are being punished by the German Empire because of our desire to show our fealty and attachment, by means of this preference, to the United Kingdom. I find in a despatch to the Montreal 'Witness' February 12, 1902, that American commission merchants will in future have to give a certificate of the place where grain is grown before it will be admitted under the most favoured treaty into German ports. It has been asserted that an American commission merchant bought Canadian grain and shipped it from New York to German ports. The German authorities were advised that such was the fact, and the result has been that they now compel the commission merchant in New York to send a certificate or affidavit to show that the grain going into Germany has not been grown in Canada. Sir, it seems to me that such an insult to the people of this country should not be permitted any longer ; that we should treat Germany as Germany treated us, and is treating us ; that if Germany discriminates against our surplus products that are available for use in the fatherland, the Dominion of Canada should discriminate against the surplus products of Germany that might be imported into this country.

Sir, I do not know that I should say any more with regard to this question of the British preference. But before I sit down there are one or two more figures that I would like to quote. Notwithstanding this so-called preference, we did not buy a dollar's worth more from Britain in the last five years than we did in the five years preceding, when there was no preference. The figures are as follows : The imports from Great Britain, from 1892 to 1896, amounted to $187,325,594 ; from 1897 to 1902, they amounted to $186,781,122. Now, let us see how our purchases from the United States for the past five years increased. We have purchased $176,088,990 worth more from the United States during the past five years than we did in the five years preceding. The figures are : Imports from the United States, from 1892 to 1896, $277,602,193 ; from 1897 to 1901, they were $453,691,183. The increase in our imports from the United States during the past five years lacks only about $10,000,000 of being equal to our total imports from Britain during the same period. In 1896 the balance of trade against Canada in favour of the United States was $14,125,614, while in 1901 it had increased to $28,102,778, or within a fraction of 100 per cent. In the past five years our exports to Great Britain amounted to $494,383,499 and our imports from Great Britain amounted to $186,781,122. The balance of trade in our favour and against Great Britain was $207,602,377, while, in the same period, that is 1897 to 1901, our exports to the United States amounted to $281,213,582, and our imports from the United States to $453,691,183. The balance of trade in favour of the United States as against this country in five years, amounted to $172,477,601. In the last five years we sold $213,169,917 worth less to the United States than to Great Britain, and we bought $266,910,061 worth more from the United States than we did from Great Britain. That is the record which the past five years shows as to the trade between Canada and the United Kingdom on the one hand and the trade between Canada and the United States on the other. Yet, the government, through its mouthpiece, the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), says that we have nothing to reform, and the Finance Minister declares that the tariff has been practically taken out of politics. Well, Sir, I claim that there is a great deal to be reformed in the fiscal system of this country and that the resolution presented by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) is on the right line, that the time has come when a declaration of a definite policy of protection should be announced by the parliament of Canada, a policy under which we would not be meeting with appeals from year to year from manufacturers and workingmen asking for the reasonable measure of protection to which they are entitled to enable them to carry on their business against the fierce competition which exists in the United States and elsewhere throughout the world.

In making his Budget speech, the hon. Minister of Finance declared that the one disappointing feature of the year's affairs has been the census returns. I am sure that there can be no difference of opinion as to the sense of disappointment that we all experienced when the announcement was made as to the total population of Canada. We had been led to expect by the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the statements put in the mouth of His Excellency several years ago that we might look for a substantial increase during this decade in the population of the country. The increase from 1881 to 1891 was 508,429, and during the last decade from 1891 to 1901 it was only 505,644. I see that when the announcement of the figures in 1891 was made the right hon. gentleman who is now the premier, in his place in this House, said :

Mr CLARKE.

Is it possible that the advisors of His Excellency in putting the statement in his mouth that the country was prosperous, were really serious and sincere ? . . . . Is it possible that they can hold such an opinion in the face of the census returns ?

This last census has not even shown an increase of 508,429 that the preceding decade showed, or an increase of 11 or 12 per cent.

. . . . .In the last decade our population has grown just one bare half million. . . . . It is a mockery to speak of prosperity in the face of such a state of things . . . Why ; our population has increased at the rate of only 11 per cent. . . . . At the present time we should at least have six or seven millions, but we have not five ; and yet, forsooth, hon. gentlemen opposite talk of prosperity. . . . . I say it with all candour that if hon. gentlemen opposite were at all awake to the duty of the hour, they would . . . .frankly admit that for a young country which is bound to have a great future, it is in a lamentable condition when it cannot retain it's own population.

If that statement was true as to the condition of things in 1891, is it not lamentably true, in the face of the result of the taking of the last census ? The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) in 1891 declared :

I say, Sir, that there is no test of the real progress and advancement of a country like ours which can compare for one moment with the test applied by the growth of population, and when we see such results as those I have just depicted taking place in a country like this, with such unlimited resources and capacities for employing a large population, these facts alone condemn, as nothing else possibly could, the policy which has brought about these results.

What excuse have hon. gentlemen opposite to offer because of the meagre results which have been shown from this census ? All they can say now is that the census of 1891 was fraudulent, that the country made no increase in its population from 1891 to 1896 and that the increase in the population all occurred since they came into office. There is no proof of this statement except those pages which have been laid on the Table of the House alleging a certain condition of things to exist in certain municipalities in the province of Quebec. No proof has been offered except these sheets which are before us, and they have not been verified, as to the serious charges which have been made against those who were responsible for the taking of the census of 1891. We have within the sound of my voice in Ottawa the gentleman who was the chief census commissioner in 1891. He is the statistician of the Dominion of Canada. If, before these statements were laid on the Table of the House, he had been given an opportunity of examining them and of passing an opinion upon them, they might have been of some value. But, placed there as they are without being verified or examined by the chief census officers who have been and are being accused of the greatest fraud, I say that they are unworthy of the consideration of the House for a single minute. I have tried myself, in regard to one constituency in Quebec, to get some definite information, but, at the time I rose to address the House, I was not able to get the information which I desired and I cannot make any comparison respecting it. But, Sir, there was within reach of hon. gentlemen opposite means whereby they might have examined into the accuracy of the census returns for Ontario. They have been declaring that so far as the Dominion was concerned no progress was made in the matter of population until 1896. I have here the municipal statistics of Ontario. Hon. gentlemen opposite used to quote these statistics approvingly. They endorsed them, they banked upon them. These statistics are available to-day to the end of 1899. They contain statements as to the municipal population of the province of Ontario, and if hon. gentlemen opposite had been accurate in their statements, or if they had desired to be accurate, they would have consulted these municipal statistics before they made their statements as far as the population of Ontario was concerned. These statements disclose the fact that the population of Ontario, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen have been saying, has been increasing, not as rapidly as we could have wished, but, still increasing. I find that between 1891 and 1896, the period in which hon. gentlemen assert there was no increase, that there was an actual increase of over 50,000. In 1891 the population of the municipalities of Ontario was 1,922,121, while in 1896 the population of the municipalities of Ontario was 1,972,286, showing an increase in the municipal population of Ontario, in these five years in which hon. gentlemen opposite say there was no increase, of no less than 50,165. In 1896, according to the report of the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario, the population was 1,972.286. It had increased over 50,000 from 1891 to 1896, and from 1896 to 1899, the latest available statistics, the population increased from 1,972,286 to 2,010,748, showing an increase for the three years of 38,462 additional. According to the official census returns the province of Ontario has a population of 2,167,978, and the municipal census of the province for 1899 shows that it had a population of 2,010,748. If you take the increase which has occurred since 1899, together with the population of the unorganized territories and add it to the municipal census, you will have the strongest and best possible argument as to the unfairness and the untruthfulness of the statements which have been presented by hon. gentlemen opposite as to the stagnation which occurred in Ontario.

Now, a word about the exodus. The exodus was stopped ; at least, we were officially informed by the government that the exodus had stopped. In 1899 these words were put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General in the Speech from the Throne :

> It affords me great pleasure to be able to congratulate you upon the large degree of prosperity which the people of Canada at present enjoy as evidenced by . . . the increased number of immigrants who have become permanent settlers among us. To these evidences must be added another which is even more gratifying, the almost total cessation of the considerable exodus of our population which at one time was a regrettable feature of our affairs.

The hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island who moved the Address in reply said :

> Instead of the exodus repatriation has set in. We found after the census returns of 1891 came in—these cold, unfeeling and heartless census returns—that at the end of ten years we had lost not only all the immigrants that came into Canada, but half of the increase of our population besides. I am glad to be able to say that the exodus from this country to the United States has ceased and I trust has ceased for ever.

The seconder of the Address said :

> One of the most happy results of our policy has been to put a stop to the exodus which in years past has proved the curse of our country, and to induce our immigrants to settle down in our midst, instead of finding their way over the border to strengthen our rivals.

What must be the feelings of the hon. gentleman now in the quietude of his island home, when he peruses the result of the census for 1901 ? He was despondent over the result of the census of 1891. That census showed that from 1881 to 1891 his own province of Prince Edward Island had decreased in population by 227, but the last census returns show that during the past decade, Prince Edward Island decreased in population by 5,820. The decrease during the past ten years was twenty-five times greater than the decrease in the ten years preceding, and yet the hon. gentleman spoke of the census figures of 1891 as being cold and unfeeling and heartless. If we examine the condition of the maritime provinces, there is very little room for congratulation. The increase in Nova Scotia was 8,720 ; in New Brunswick 9,830, making a total for these two provinces of 18,550, and deducting the decrease in Prince Edward Island, the net increase of the three maritime provinces is 12,730 for the last decade, as compared with an increase of 10,041 in the decade preceding. But there is one important feature in connection with these census returns which I think ought to be emphasized. In 1891 Cape Breton county had a population of 34,244, and in 1901 the population had increased to 48,361. The increase in the population of Cape Breton was 14,117, while the increase in all the three provinces was only 12,730. Deducting the increase in Cape Breton county, all the rest of the maritime provinces show a decrease unfortunately of 1,387. Sir, what is the cause of the increase of population in Cape Breton county ? What kept that population there ; what caused it to increase so rapidly ? Let me quote to you a few words spoken by the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in 1897, which are to be found at page 1128 of 'Hansard' of that year :

> Hon. gentlemen opposite felt they were justified in entering on a policy for the special development of the iron industry, and in doing so they granted bonuses on iron and steel billets. . . . . We know that large sums have been invested in this industry. We know that large iron industries exist in the country, and while we may not approve of the policy under which they are established, we have no desire to see them snuffed out.

And the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) continued the bounty to promote the iron and steel industry in Cape Breton.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was no iron or steel industry in Cape Breton at that time. It all grew up under the present government.

Mr. CLARKE. It was to develop that industry that the Conservative government initiated a policy which the Liberals of the day said was a bad policy, and the Conservatives gave a bonus to promote this iron and steel industry, which the Liberals very fortunately continued, with the satisfactory result that the population of that county has increased by 14,000.

Sir, we on this side believe in a policy that will foster and develop industries not only in Cape Breton but in every other county in Canada where such industries can be developed. That is what the resolution of the leader of the opposition means, and notwithstanding the gratifying results which have been obtained from that policy in the past, I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance will vote against the resolution of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden).

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ?

Mr. CLARKE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). Does the hon. gentleman know what reason the president of the Dominion Iron and Steel industry gave as the chief cause that led to the establishment of the iron and steel industry in Cape Breton ?

Mr. CLARKE. I presume the primary reason was the advantageous situation of Cape Breton to the raw material which enters into that industry and to its shipping facilities. But added to that primary reason were the bounty and the protection which was accorded to that industry by the Conservative government of Canada.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). I would like to add that that is not in accordance with the statement made by the president of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, who ought to know.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Yes ; it was exactly what he said.

Mr. CLARKE. I would be glad if the hon. gentleman (Mr Johnston) would hand me that statement because I have not had the opportunity of seeing it and therefore I cannot say if the hon. gentleman is right or not. Now, let me say a few words about this exodus which was officially declared by the government to have stopped. In April, 1899, the attention of this House was drawn to the following despatch which appeared from Boston in the New York 'Commercial Advertiser' :

> Boston, April 19th, 1899.—The influx of Canadians to New England this spring is the heaviest known for many years and is causing the Canadian government officials some uneasiness. The backward spring in Canada, higher wages and improved outlook in manufacturing towns on this side of the line are the causes for the movement. It is estimated that almost twenty thousand persons, a large proportion of whom are French Canadians, have crossed the line this season. Usually at this time the tide of travel favours Canada, but this year the annual exodus is very limited.
> The influx has upset the plans of the Canadian government, which proposed to take thousands of French to Quebec and settle them on free land. The labour market here is oversupplied and lower wages for farm labourers are predicted. Many of the cotton mills report that they have more applications for employment than they can accept.

On the 26th of April of the same year, 1899, the hon. gentleman who then represented Restigouche drew the attention of the House to a despatch appearing in the press of the lower provinces and referring to the exodus which was taking place from Dorchester, Moncton, Sackville, Tignish, Fredericton, Truro and other places. In the following year Mr. H. F. McDougall, who represented Cape Breton drew attention to a despatch in a Montreal paper which read :

> St. John, N.B., April 4 (special).—The exodus from the maritime provinces to the United States is larger this spring than for many years. Every train and steamer leaving St. John for Boston carries away some young men and women from the city or the interior.

The hon. gentleman implemented that despatch by this statement :

> I may say that two or three weeks ago, I was travelling on the Intercolonial Railway train, and every car was so crowded that there was hardly standing room. The baggage car on that train broke down, and it took two hours at Rivière du Loup to transfer the baggage to another car to allow the train to proceed. I would like to ask if the government are doing anything to stop this exodus ?

These were the statements made, the despatches read and the reports presented to this House as to the increased exodus which was taking place in the maritime provinces in 1899 and 1900, notwithstanding the statement put into His Excellency's mouth that the exodus was a thing of the past. But let me refer to the Ontario statistics again for a few minutes. They show that for the last three years for which statistics are available since hon. gentlemen came into office—1897-8-9—the births exceeded the deaths by 56,017, while the immigrants who came into Ontario in those years numbered 11,091, making a total increase in the population of the province from 1897 to 1899 inclusive of 67,108, while the census shows the increase of the population of the whole province of Ontario for the ten years to be only 53,657.

Take the statistics of births and deaths in Ontario for the ten years from 1890 to 1899, and what do they show ? They show that during that period the number of births was 446,811, and the number of deaths, 244,060, or an excess of births over deaths in the province during those ten years of 202,751, while the immigration figures prepared under the auspices of hon. gentlemen's friends, the government of Ontario, show that for the same period 63,025 immigrants arrived in the province. If we take the excess of births over deaths and the number of immigrants together, we find that the population of the province increased from 1890 to 1899 by 265,796, while the official census returns show a gain for the ten years of only 53,657; so that there are 212,139 not accounted for.

When we ask hon. gentlemen opposite, in the face of these facts, to explain to us where these people have gone, the answer is that the census returns of 1891 were inaccurate, fraudulent, and not to be relied upon. I took the liberty two or three weeks ago to ask in the House the following questions :

1. What was the total number of replies, by provinces, received to the circular issued on or about the 1st day of March, 1901, by Mr. Thomas Coté, Assistant Census Commissioner, to certain clergymen, asking for the name, the age, and the occupation of every person formerly resident in the parish or territory over which such clergyman exercised spiritual oversight, who had emigrated to the United States during the twelve months preceding the said 1st day of March, 1901 ?

2. What was the total number of persons so reported as above as having emigrated to the United States from each province of the Dominion during the year ending with the 1st March, 1901 ?

The answers I received were as follows :—

1. Seventy replies in all were received, sixty-five from the province of Quebec, one from New Brunswick, three from Ontario, and one from Prince Edward Island.

2. The number of persons reported by the parish priests as having emigrated to the United States during the twelve months preceding the 1st day of March, 1901, is 870 ; twelve in New Brunswick, seventy-nine in Prince Edward Island, 779 in Quebec. There are also 108 families reported as having left the country, but their names and the number of their members were not given. One family was reported from Ontario and 107 from Quebec.

Sixty-five replies from Quebec, from sixty-five parishes, presumably disclose the regrettable fact that in one year, from the 1st of March, 1900, to the 1st of March, 1901, 779 individuals and 107 families left the country—two years after the hon. gentlemen had declared that the exodus had been put an end to. And yet hon. gentlemen lay the flattering unction to their souls and lead the people of Canada to believe that under their benign sway the exodus has become a thing of the past. A journal published at Huntingdon, in the province of Quebec, the Canadian 'Gleaner,' in November, 1901, referring to the statement of the right hon. premier that the exodus was past, made this statement :

We would like to call attention to a statement made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the truth of which is not borne out by every-day experience in this district.

We do not know whether it be true or not that Americans are going by shoals into the North-west, but we do know that there is no stop to the emigration of our young men and women from this district to the United States, and what is to be said of this district can be said of every section east of it, with this difference, that the outflow increases as you near the Atlantic.

The United States Industrial Commission's statistics of immigration contain some interesting particulars. The commissioners declare that had the immigration statistics from Canada been continued from 1885 down to the present time, the immigration from Canada would apparently have fully held its own. This report has only recently been issued, and it is available for the inspection of every hon. member of this House.

What do the last census returns of the United States show ? They show that in 1880 there were 717,157 Canadian-born persons resident in the United States; that in 1890 the number had increased to 980,938; and that in 1900 it had increased to 1,181,778. Of the total number of Canadians in the United States and Canada together in 1890, the numbers were, in every hundred, eighty-three in Canada and seventeen in the United States, while in 1900 the figures were : Eighty-two in Canada and eighteen in the United States. This does not look much like a stoppage of the exodus.

There is just one other test which I would like to apply to this question of the exodus. The official trade returns of the United States make the following showing as to the value of household goods and effects entered free of duty into the United States from Canada during the past five years :

1899	1,037,000
1901	1,042,237

These are the facts with regard to the exodus, and I am sorry to say they do not justify the roseate statements which hon. gentlemen opposite have made again and again to the effect that the exodus from Canada to the United States has entirely ceased. We all desire, Mr. Speaker, to see that exodus stopped, and stopped for ever. We desire to see a condition of things existing in Canada under which we can at least retain our own population. The great bulk of the people who leave Canada to go to the United States go there to engage, not in agriculture, but in industrial pursuits—in the factories, the mills, the foundries, the workshops and the mines of that country. They are a great loss to Canada, and our policy should be, by giving sufficient protection to our various industries, not only to retain in the country our own people, who are after the best class of settlers, but to see to it that those who come from the old world to make a home in the new world shall seek Canada rather than the great Republic to the south of us. That country's industries and interests have been built up very largely by the adoption of a policy of sufficient protection, and if the same policy were adopted in Canada—a policy such as that recommended in the resolution presented by the leader of the opposition—I believe that in a very short time the exodus would become a thing of the past and that every Canadian, able and willing to work, would find plenty to do in our own broad Dominion, and our population instead of, as in the past, creeping along at a rate of increase of from eight to ten per cent in ten years, would keep pace in growth with the population of the most virile countries in the world, and increase by at least 2 per cent per year. There is something wrong in the condition of affairs or our population would not continue to leave us as it has been doing. We should endeavor to retain that population in our own country, and that we can only do by so amending our tariff as to give that additional protection to our working people and farmers which will enable them to live on this side of the line in peace, prosperity and contentment.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's, P.E.I.) I listened, Mr. Speaker, with much attention to the very able speech delivered by my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). That hon. gentleman is not only among the ablest debaters upon the opposition side, but is one of the best informed men on that side, and distinguished as an astute and cunning parliamentarian, who can use to the best advantage the material at his service. And as I listened, I could not help thinking what an unanswerable argument he could have made had he only a good case.

During the course of his remarks he took occasion to have a tilt at the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) for the inconsistencies displayed by that hon. gentleman in his political career, and he also gave some attention to the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), but I have no doubt that these gentlemen will be able to answer for themselves. He also made some reference to what he was pleased to describe as the political inconsistencies of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, but he was very careful not to make any reference to the speech which that hon. gentleman delivered the other evening. He made not the slightest attempt to reply to the unanswerable argument made by that hon. gentleman with regard to the census of 1891, in which he proved how effectively that census had been stuffed by the enumerators employed by the late Conservative administration. But we have no need for reference to statistics, in order to know that our young men are no longer leaving in the numbers they did previous to 1896. We know, as a matter of fact, that although the exodus has not been entirely stopped, it has been considerably checked. We know that the waste lands of our North-west are being rapidly filled up. We know that the young men of the maritime provinces, and particularly Prince Edward Island, are remaining in greater numbers in Canada today than during former years. Many of those from Prince Edward Island have settled in Cape Breton, and many others are going to the North-west.

But the chief fault found by the opposition, so far as I have been able to gather from the present debate, with the present administration is that the taxation of the country has not been reduced. They claim that this government is taking from the people a very much larger sum than they ought. But these hon. gentlemen must not forget that it is this government which has reduced the taxation of the country. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House has admitted that the customs duties have been reduced some 10 or 12 per cent.

Mr. CLARKE. Two per cent.

Mr. HUGHES (King's). I beg my hon. friend's pardon. The rate of duty has been reduced by 2·63, which would make a total reduction in taxation of 10 or 12 per cent. And we must bear this fact in mind, that every reduction which this government has made in the rate of taxation has been opposed by the opposition. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, how then, with any show of consistency, can these hon. gentlemen claim that the taxation of the country ought to be reduced? In the one breath they oppose any reduction, and in the next they blame this government for not reducing the taxes still further. If these hon. gentlemen are sincere, let them bring in a resolution declaring that the duties are too high on certain articles and ought to be reduced. For it must not be forgotten that the customs and excise duties of this country are spread over a great number of articles ; and if these hon. gentlemen desire that any further reductions should be made they should mention on what class of goods they wish to have the rates of duty lowered. But so long as they decline to do this, they cannot be credited with any sincerity in the statements they make.

What does the resolution submitted by the hon. the leader of the opposition mean ? If it means anything, it means that if he and his party should be returned to power they will introduce higher taxation. What then becomes of their plea that our taxation is already too high? If anything were needed to show the political insincerity of these hon. gentlemen, if anything were required to show how utterly dishonest and inconsistent they are in their public policy, it is this plea on the one hand that the taxation of the country is too high and on the other hand that the present administration is to blame for not making it higher.

Then these hon. gentlemen complain that our expenditure is enormous. Well, Mr. Speaker, what is the amount of the expenditure of the present administration, over and above that of the previous one, on consolidated account. Taking service for service, it is just about $3,000,000. When hon. gentlemen opposite complain that our expenditure is enormous, they forget that the present government has had to undertake a great many services which the previous government was not burdened with at all. For instance, it has to expend $1,500,000 per annum on the administration of the Yukon, and it has placed to the credit of our sinking fund $500,000 more per year than did its predecessor. Our Post Office Department also costs $300,000 a year more than it did under the previous administration. Our railways are also costing more, but for all these expenditures returns are coming in which counter-balance them to some extent, and besides these expenditures are occasioned by the extra services which this government has to undertake, and I contend that for the extra $3,000,000 expended on consolidated account, ample returns have been given the country. Does not everybody know that as the country developes, as it increases in population, our expenditure must necessarily increase ?

This resolution, submitted by the hon. leader of the opposition, declares in favour of an adequate protection for the agricultural industry as well as the manufacture, but everybody knows that there is no possibility of protecting the agricultural industry by a custom tariff. If we are going to have protection for the agricultural industries, we must have it by a system of bounties. And, speaking on behalf of the province from which I come, which is exclusively devoted to agriculture and fishing, I claim our fair share of protection. If protection is to be given to other industries, we want a bounty of five or six cents a bushel on our potatoes, 10 cents a bushel on our oats, 15 or 25 cents a bushel on our wheat, a bounty on our horses, which are of excellent quality, a bounty on our horned cattle, on our cheese, butter, eggs and wool, and all the other products of the farm. And, I presume the same will be claimed by the farmers throughout the Dominion. The hon. leader of the opposition will find, if he has to face the question of giving the farmers and fishermen of this country adequate protection, that he will have to raise millions and millions of dollars over and above what is raised now. And, I suppose when everybody is taxed to make everybody else rich times will be very prosperous indeed.

Now, a word with regard to what has been said about outside manufacturers making this country a slaughter market. I suppose, if hon. gentlemen opposite were returned to power they would not and could not increase the taxation to any enormous extent, they probably would not increase it more than 10 or 15 per cent. And, if what they say is true, that the manufacturers of the United States and Great Britain are making a slaughter market of this country for the excess of their products, do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that a slight increase in the duty would prevent them from continuing that course ? On the other hand, if protection has the effect of enabling the manufacturers of a country to increase the prices of their products at home to such an extent that they can afford to sell in other countries at slaughter prices, the excess of their products, that, to my mind, is the strongest argument possible against this system of protection.

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) spoke of the large expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railway. Since these railways have come under the present management—I know, because I have travelled over them many times—they have been greatly improved. The equipment of the Intercolonial Railway, and even more on the Prince Edward Island Railway, had been allowed to fall into a deporable condition by the late administration. Under the present management, the rolling stock is improved the road-bed is improved, the service is improved in every respect, and these railways are now in a much more efficient condition than they were for many years before. All this costs money, of course. But the deficit on these railways is less than it was in previous years.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, comparing Canada with the United States in respect to manufactures, seem to think that we are in a very much worse position than the United States. But if we compare our population with that of the United States, we find that we are not very far behind them in the proportion of manufacturing carried on. There is this to say—the exports of our manufactures are increasing year after year, and they are increasing faster under the present administration than under the previous one. The whole country has prospered in a way unknown for years before. Our waste places are filling up, the granaries and elevators in the North-west are bursting with plenty; the banks of our country are filling up with the savings of the people; our manufacturers are extending their exports, while occupying the home market; and the home market is increasing with the growth of our population and the greater purchasing power of our people. Is not this state of things good enough? Is it possible to improve upon it? Why should hon. gentlemen opposite seek to disturb such a state of affairs? I consider the true national policy of this country is to give the manufacturers, so far as it is possible, their raw material free of duty, and then give to the farmers and fishermen the best possible transportation facilities that is in the power of the government to give them, so as to enable them to move their products to the seaboard and the markets of the world, and to give the farmers also the best facilities for placing their products in the markets of the world in the best possible condition. Having done that, the government can safely leave the rest to the brain and brawn of the people. I have no fear of the result. That is the policy that has been pursued for the last few years, and that will be pursued, no doubt, by this government while making such changes in the tariff as may be necessary when that subject comes up for consideration next year. With a continuance of that policy the prosperity of the country will continue. And when the appeal is made to the great jury, the electors, a few years hence, they will endorse the administration of this government as they have endorsed it in the past. For the reasons I have given, Mr. Speaker, I cannot vote for the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. ROBERT JOHNSTON (Cardwell). I have been delighted to listen to the grand speakers on both sides of the House. I take it that I am the second farmer to take part in the debate. The main argument from the government side of the House seems to be that we have good times. And the hon. gentlemen on this side who have spoken have agreed, and have voiced the general sentiment in declaring their gladness that prosperity reigns in Canada. But though I have listened carefully to hon. gentlemen who have spoken in support of the government, I have not heard one argument brought forward, one instance given, to show that the good times have been due to any action upon the part of the present government. There must be a reason for these good times, but I have yet to hear a single word that would go to show that the government has had anything to do with it. And, if the supporters of the government have tried to impress upon the people the idea that the prosperity is in any way due to the government, they have tried to convey a false impression, for the government has had no part in it. When the foundation of a house is well laid, the builder can put a good house upon that foundation. But how would you like it, Mr. Speaker, if a man you employed last in building a house and who did nothing but put a few rows of shingles on the roof, should stand around and compliment himself by saying 'I made a grand job of that house'? The late Sir John A. Macdonald laid the grand foundation for this Canada of ours. He inaugurated that grand national policy that brought the people prosperity and built up the country. The attitude of this government to those matters reminds me of a case in my own neighbourhood. There was a tenant farmer, and a good farmer, who cultivated his land in the very best shape. He put in about sixty acres of fall wheat. But, for some reason he had to leave in the winter. Another farmer came in, and he cut the crop, which gave a magnificent return. He did nothing but harvest the crop, and he said, 'Ain't I a splendid farmer?' reaping the benefit of other men's judgment in good agriculture. The present government stand in a very strange position when they claim we have good times. They cannot tell us the first thing they have done to make times better.

Now, I have noticed from time to time our hon. friends opposite claim that the farmer cannot be protected. I do not agree with that statement for a moment, and no honest farmer in Ontario will agree with it. Why did the last representative of the county of Peel in this House rise and ask this government for more protection on pork? That is the manliest and best thing that he did during all the time that he represented that delightful county of Peel, and he got more credit from the farmers of that county for that one act than he did for everything else that he did during ten years. The Minister of Commerce asked not very long ago for protection on biscuits. Biscuits are made from wheat grown by our farmers. If protection to the biscuit maker does not benefit the farmer that raises the wheat to make the flour for those biscuits, then I do not know anything about protection. The more biscuits he makes out of wheat grown in this country, the better for the farmers who grow the wheat.

Now, we hear a good deal about free corn brought into Canada. I ask if Canada cannot produce the feed that we need. I put that plain question to the government. What is the effect in Canada when our farmers have a large crop of coarse grain in the shape of oats ? Do not oats have a tendency to decline in price ? There is not an hon. gentleman in this House who will deny that. When the crop of oats is small the tendency is for the price to rise ; there is not a gentleman in the House who will deny that either. Now, when we have a small crop and let in American corn, it has a tendency to keep the price of our grain down even though we do have a small crop. Every sensible farmer knows that. Our corn should be protected, not only by the 15 cents a bushel which the Americans put upon Canadian corn going into that country, but our corn should be protected to such a degree that American corn cannot come in and spoil our prices. Our people now have got to turn their attention to coarse grain, because we are not good at growing wheat in the east, and the west is going to supply our wheat. Everybody knows that a close market is the best market for a farmer, and if you give the Americans a close market in Canada for their surplus corn, how can you expect our coarse grains to go up in price ? A rich man who has paid for his land, and has got his family well settled, can afford to buy corn to feed cattle. But is that fair to the man who is dependent on the grain he grows ? For example, this year there was little corn brought into Ontario because there was a short crop in the United States ; consequently our farmers get better prices in the province of Ontario for oats and barley than they did when the corn crop was good in the United States. Is that not a sufficient proof that we need protection on coarse grains ?

Then take the article of pork on which the late member for Peel asked for protection. It is a well known fact that the Americans cannot produce as good pork made out of their corn as we can produce made out of barley, oats, wheat and so forth. When a man comes into this country he buys a lot of land, puts up a warm pen, buys American corn and feeds it to Canadian pigs, and it takes a mighty good man to tell whether a hog has been fed on corn, or on barley, oats and wheat. These pigs go into the British markets and they have a great tendency to destroy the value of our pork in the British markets. That is another great evil that American corn has done to Canada. Buyers in the city of Toronto refuse to buy Essex county pork, because it is fed on corn, and pay the same price we get in the central counties of Ontario. Everybody in Ontario knows that it is a fact that buyers refuse to take corn fed pigs from Essex and prefer pigs fed in the middle counties of the province.

We hear people from the west talking about free trade, but still they want protection on horses. They do not use the word 'protection,' because they do not like it, neither do they like the words 'national policy.' But they want in some way or other to get protection from the scrub American horses that come into Manitoba, and into the east also. They do not want any horse allowed to come in unless he is valued at $50. Now, that is what I call a fraudulent protection. The fair, square and honest way would be to put on a good protection that will keep out scrub horses as well as corn, for scrub horses hurt our native market in the same way as corn hurts our coarse grains in Ontario. So there is another way in which the farmers of Canada can be protected. We do not need to go to the west to see the evil that scrub horses are doing in Canada. In the province of Ontario, in some of the towns near my own constituency, this fall there were 20, 30 or 40 scrub ponies from Texas. They are bought in Texas for a dollar or two each, put on the train and brought over to the border, they pay $2 customs, and are sold for $15 to $30, taking away our cash to the United States. Can you not protect us on horses ? I think we need it.

Now, there is another thing I have noticed since this session began. Petitions have been pouring in here daily from the farmers of this country asking for protection. Protection for what ? Protection for our cattle and horses from the railroads, and asking that the railroads be compelled to build such cattle guards as the law provided they should. But I notice this government did not seem anxious to promote that Bill last year, because it was sent to the committee, which is the burying ground of cattle-guards. This year it was again sent to the same burying ground, notwithstanding that petitions in its favour came in from farmers from almost every county in the province. I hope the government will at least give us that protection.

Now, I have noticed a tendency towards protection on the government side of the House. The Minister of Finance came out last year bold and strong, not a knee shaking, and said there was going to be no more tinkering with the tariff. This year he comes out and says the tariff might be materially changed towards greater protection. At the same time we see some hon. gentlemen opposite declaring for free trade and others for a higher protection. For instance, the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) advocated protection, and he said he represents a farming constituency extending for 20 miles round his town. These things ought to encourage the government to give us more protection.

I think that the farmers of this country are broad-minded men. If they cannot see at once that they are going to derive a benefit from a high protective tariff, they are broad enough minded to see that the home market is the best market and that the more people we can induce to remain in the cities and produce the articles that they require, at the same time consuming the commodities that the farmers produce, thus affording a home market, the better it will be for them. The more prosperous the cities are the more prosperous will the farmers be and if we can establish cities with manufacturing industries as large and important as those of the city of Toronto, for instance, we will benefit from the home market which will be afforded us. We know that we would be able to get better goods from those industries than we could get abroad, while, at the same time, we would have the advantage of the home market. Is there an hon. member in this House who can say that the reduction of the tariff has enabled the farmers to get their machinery cheaper? Have binders been reduced in price? They have not. Has barbed wire been any cheaper? Every man in this House knows that it is dearer, that it is now manufactured in the United States and that the factories here are closed up. Is that an advantage to the Dominion of Canada? Every industry that we can secure for Canada, the better it will be for the country because it will afford employment for an increased population. And instead of spending millions of money in bringing foreigners into Canada who, I am afraid, will not do much good in this country, we should make an effort to keep our young men, by increasing the opportunities for work. I notice that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has for twenty-five years declared himself against his own will, against his own judgment; yet, I look upon him as a man of good judgment. There is no better debater in the House and there is no broader-minded man than he. But, he is only now where I have been since I have been a boy. I claim that I have been honest since I was a boy up to this time in holding the views that I think are in the interest of the country to which I belong. I am afraid, I am sorry to have to say it, that if this is a sample of the feeling of the Liberal party which aspired to be at the head of public affairs during all these twenty-five years, the country could not expect much from that party. That hon. gentleman said that the preference was given to Great Britain to show good will. Who ever showed bad will to Great Britain? If there was bad will who caused that bad will? If there were any utterances by public men in the Dominion of Canada to cause bad will, they were the utterances of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) when he said that a customer in the United States was worth three in Great Britain. That statement can be found in the 'Hansard' of the House. More than that he said that we owed Great Britain nothing, except for bungling the affairs of the Dominion of Canada. If there was anything to create bad feeling instead of good will, this is the man who created it. Such men as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and the hon. member for North Norfolk, who were serving their party instead of their country, are the men who are responsible for that if there is any responsibility for it at all. I come now to one hon. member of this House who is an ardent supporter of the government. I have watched him since he came into the House. He gets up, shakes his finger at the government and says that they can go so far and no farther. He is a free trader up to the hilt, and he dares the Prime Minister, points his finger at him and says: I will leave you, but he does not say how far he will go. He says that he does not believe in stealing, but that if he steals he will go out on the highway and do it like a man. He says that the millionaries of the United States have stolen the millions they possess; yet he proposes to let down the fence, admit these millionaries to a larger territory so that they can accumulate more millions in the Dominion of Canada. What do hon. gentlemen think of such a policy as that? I cannot see any reason why that hon. gentleman is such an ardent free trader, or why this government should admit corn free of duty, because, in our section of the country they do not want it. We do not understand why this course should be pursued, unless it be that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) had influence enough with the government to let corn in free, so that he could feed the high-bred cattle that he was able to purchase in Chicago at $6,000 a head. It may be that he wants cheap corn to feed these cattle upon. Is this policy fair towards the men who produce and sell cattle where they can and who feed them on grain raised in the Dominion of Canada? It is not fair to the ordinary farmer. Was it the influence of the same hon. gentleman which secured so many positions for the veterinary surgeons, or is it the intention of the government to do something for every candidate who was defeated in the last election? I can remember a short time ago when a rich man who sold pure bred cattle in this country was at the expense of getting these animals examined. Who should pay for the examination of an animal when it is sold? A breeder may sell an animal for $1,000 or $2,000, or $1,700 or $1,800, and if he does who should pay for the examination of that beast? Certainly, the man who sold the beast. There is not an hon. member who dares to stand up in this House and state that the country should pay for the examination of that beast. Yet, the government must provide places for these defunct and defeated candidates and heelers and we are now paying a large amount every year to veterinaries to examine rich men's cattle; men, who do not pay as much to the country as I do. The hon. Minister of Agriculture may think it was a good thing when he put this large burden on the people. His ladyship is not in the House at present. You will excuse me, Mr. Speaker. He being small of statute, and having his hair parted in the centre, I could hardly help it. We are told, continuously that the people ought to be everlastingly obliged to the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) for giving us penny postage. I will ask a fair question. There are farmers in this House. How many letters a year does the ordinary farmer post? Every man who has a farm, or was raised on a farm, knows how many letters a farmer posts. Will the number average twenty-five, or thirty, or forty, or one hundred? There is a dollar a farmer has made out of postage. How much will the monopolies, the millionaries, the trusts, the loan companies, the bankers, the lawyers, the merchants gain? Who gains by penny postage? Is it not the merchant, the banker, the lawyer, and the departmental store in the city? Do not they gain enormously by the penny postage?

Therefore, we see that the poor farmer is protected to the extent of $1 a year, while the merchants in the cities are protected to the extent of thousands of dollars. And this is done by the Liberal government, who tell us that monopolies and rich corporations should not be encouraged. The Minister of Finance told us that he would not tinker with the tariff. I agree with him that it is a bad thing to do so, but I am afraid that my faith in his statement will be shaken, for I believe that he is going to tinker with the tariff in the interest of the tobacco manufacturers who waited upon him to-day, and who represent the same ends as the great tobacco monopoly which has been introduced into England. The more you tinker with tariffs the more you will have to tinker with them. I believe the tariff policy of a government should be on a solid foundation, because if you change the tariff from time to time it creates unrest in the country and leads to very injurious results to our general trade. The amendment of the leader of the opposition speaks of a 'declared policy,' and when the Conservative party in Canada makes the announcement that they are going to do such and such a thing, and when they declare that they will carry out a certain policy when they get into power, the people of Canada may rest assured that the Conservatives will carry out their pledges. The Conservatives differ from the Liberals in that respect it will be noticed. I have often been asked why it is that wages are higher now than they were when Sir John Macdonald was in power. That I can answer easily. Sir John Macdonald built the Canadian Pacific Railway, and he opened the rich lands of Manitoba and the North-west to which our young men and young women in the older provinces are going, thus creating in the older provinces a scarcity of labour. That is one reason why wages are high now. Another reason is that the war in South Africa has taken away a number of our young men, and that money is being circulated in this country for the purposes of war supplies, giving increased employment, and so this war, unfortunate in many respects, has been to that extent a benefit to us. Not one of these gentlemen opposite has been honest enough to acknowledge the part that the war in South Africa has played in contributing to our present prosperity. Now, Sir, I cannot see for the life of me why politicians should not be as honest as clergymen. I believe that every man should be honest. Was not Sir John Macdonald an example of honesty in public life? For years and years he devoted his life to the conduct of the affairs of this country, and he died in harness, a poor man without a dollar in the bank. There was a man to be looked up to by the people of Canada. Where will you find a clergyman of any denomination more honest than he? But what do you see going on to-day. Why, we see gentlemen on the other side of the House dodging and shifting from one position to the other. We see some members of the government holding different views from the other ministers. We see one Liberal getting up in the House to announce a policy utterly at variance with the policy announced by his leader. That is not honest, and I venture to think that the leader of the government does not believe that it is honest. When he sees one of his supporters rising in the House and shaking his hand at him as much as to say: I will not follow you, but when the vote comes voting blindly for whatever the Liberal party announces, what opinion can the right hon. gentleman have of such a man. I hope, Sir, that the time will come when the Conservative party will be in power with a declared policy, such as is announced in the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition, for which I shall have much pleasure in voting.

Mr. FRANK OLIVER (Alberta). Mr. Speaker, this debate has taken a strange turn and a wide range. It has become the occasion of the profession of political faith as regards trade and tariff matters. The House has had some surprises in that connection. We have found that certain gentlemen, who we supposed held fixed views in regard to tariff questions for many years, not only do not hold these views now, but that they never held them. The House was surprised to hear that statement from one gentleman of prominence, and for my part I must refuse to that hon. gentleman the merit of inconsistency which he claimed for himself. He was not inconsistent, on his own showing. He was not inconsistent in his belief; he was only inconsistent in his profession. That is not generally called inconsistency; it has another name—hon. gentlemen can apply that name for themselves. I do not think, however, that the hon. member who put himself in that light before this House and before the country, is now in a position to demand credence for any form of political belief that he may see fit to enunciate. He wound up his remarks by probably the strongest protectionist speech ever heard in this House, and taking the hon. member at his own valuation, we know exactly what value to put on his arguments in favour of protection. In political life it is not only the speech that counts; it is the man behind the speech. And, Sir, when a man declares himself not be honest in his profession, then, no matter what he says or how well he says it, it falls with light effect on the public ear.

This being an occasion of professions and of surprises, as I have said, I will add my contribution to the general interest by declaring myself a protectionist. I read the resolution submitted by the leader of the opposition in which he calls for a 'declared policy of adequate protection to the labour, agriculture, manufactures and industries of Canada.' I endorse the principle of protection to the labour, agriculture, manufactures and industries of Canada, but I am sorry to say—this may be another surprise—that I cannot vote for the resolution just the same. The reason for that is, that judging from what the leader of the opposition said, possibly we do not give the same meaning to the word 'protection.' Possibly what he calls protection I would call robbery. When I speak of protection, I speak of protection to the general interests of the country, but when he speaks of protection, he speaks of protection to a special interest in the country. I am anxious to protect the labour, the agriculture, the manufactures and the general industries of this country; but if I interpreted correctly the remarks of the hon. member and the remarks of every hon. member who supported him, whether on this side of the House or on the other. I would infer that his understanding of protection was protection to manufactures by means of high tariffs—that and nothing more. I cannot agree that that is protection, or that such a policy is a national policy. I will not trouble the House with many figures in dealing with this question to-night; but I find, in reading carefully the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition, that that hon. gentleman quoted figures as to the exports of Canada. Now, the exports of Canada are not the whole of the products of Canada. But I will assume—and I think it will be admitted that it is sufficiently close for the purpose of the argument—that the proportion shown by the exports of our country is a fair indication of the actual production of the country. I find that in 1901 Canada exported as follows:

Products of the mine..	$40,000,000
Products of the fisheries	10,000,000
Products of the forest.... ..	30,000,000
Animals and their products..	56,000,000
Agricultural products..	38,000,000
Manufactures	17,000,000

The five producing industries which I have first mentioned exported a total of $174,000,000 and the manufacturing industries exported $17,000,000 in that year. My idea of protection, then, differs from that of the hon. leader of the opposition in this. He wishes to protect those industries which produce a total of $17,000,000 of exports at the expense of those industries which produce $174,000,000 of exports. I would protect all the industries. He would protect ten per cent of our industries at the expense of the other ninety per cent. I do not call that protection. I call it robbery.

There is another feature of the hon. gentleman's resolution to which I will draw attention, which I confess I do not exactly understand, when I read it in the light of the remarks which he made in introducing it. While he believes in a declared policy of high tariff in favour of manufactures, he also believes in a policy of reciprocal trade preferences within the empire. The one idea does not go with the other. He said that it was possible that a preference to Great Britain which would be of inappreciable benefit to her might still be injurious to Canada by reason of its closing one manufactory. If that occurs under our present preference, how is he going to prevent it occuring under the reciprocal preference which he proposes to bring about? If it is an injury to Canada to close one of its manufactories, then how is he going to prevent hundreds of those manufactories being closed by admitting not only British goods, but goods from every other British colony into Canada on terms of reciprocal preference? It is no use for the hon. member to say that he can at once protect his friends, the manufacturers, by a high tariff, and at the same time give the other producing industries of Canada the benefits of free trade within the empire. The one condition does not go with the other. It is impossible that the one can go with the other. If he is in favour of the one, he is against the other. For these reasons, although I am a protectionist, and also an imperialist in trade as in loyalty, I am sorry to say that I cannot support the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition.

It is not, however, with regard to this resolution that I desire especially to speak to-night. When the hon. Finance Minister began his presentation of the budget, I think there was a general feeling that it was an uneventful matter. It was, as he said, another chapter in the continued story of Canada's prosperity—something that is very pleasant, but is not wildly exciting. But before the hon. minister concluded his presentation, and particularly since other members have taken part in the debate, it appears to me that we are possibly on the verge of a radical departure in our tariff policy and in our trade relations, if not in our political organization. The remarks of the hon. the Finance Minister upon which I base this statement were as follows :—

I have occasionally pointed out the desirability of a reasonable measure of tariff stability. Nothing would be more likely to unsettle business than a practice of introducing frequent tariff changes. Hence, we have resisted applications for many small changes and we think it well to do so to-day. But I would not have it understood that this view can always be held. As time passes, conditions change in our own country and it will be well for us to take note of this, so that we may adjust the tariff accordingly. Nor is that the only reason that might require some change. Conditions arise in other countries of which we are obliged to take account. We do not propose that we shall stand still and that this tariff shall remain unchanged, but we think the time is not opportune for making changes at present.

There are several reasons which operate in our minds against entering upon a policy of tariff changes to-day. We have just completed the taking of a census, and while some of the results are available others of much importance have yet to be prepared. Among these are the returns of the operations of our industries. In considering the tariff in relation to the industries of the country, it is desirable that we should have before us, with ample time for consideration, the industrial statistics of the recent census. A further reason against present change is that we are having certain negotiations with other countries in regard to trade of a more or less formal character.

The first point that strikes me in regard to this announcement of the hon. Finance Minister is that it took a great many reasons to prevent changes, and radical changes in the tariff being made this session—changes which would include our relations with other countries; changes which would be particularly arranged to suit our own industries, using the word 'industries' in exactly the same sense as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition uses it, namely, as relating only to the manufacturing industries of the country. Why do I reach that conclusion ? The hon. the Finance Minister did not say so. I reach it for this reason. Because, although those of us in this House who are, by reason of circumstances or otherwise, in favour of a low tariff, have accepted the present tariff, we have not done so because it fully meets our views, and yet, so far as I have heard, not one of us has approached the Minister of Finance to demand radical or far reaching changes, or in fact any changes at all. Therefore, when the Finance Minister speaks of changes, he is not referring to changes brought to his notice by the low tariff friends of the government. Consequently he must refer to those asked for by their high tariff friends. I may say that I do not think that the high tariff friends of the government are at all confined to this side of the House. I am perfectly satisfied that all the Finance Minister and his colleagues have to do is to bring down a tariff with sufficiently protective features in favour of the manufacturing industries of this country, and they can have the support of three-fourths of the opposition in carrying those measures through and keeping the government in office afterwards. That has been the political history of the manufacturers of Canada in the past. If I do not read history wrongly, in 1878 the manufacturers of Canada sold themselves for a protective duty, and I believe that to-day, judging by their utterances in this House and elsewhere, they are just as ready to sell themselves again politically for a further increase in the tariff.

Those of us then who are in favour of a low tariff are in a serious position, and I would like to say to the Minister of Finance that in making the announcement which he did, in his presentation of the budget, he has placed every supporter of the government, representing a constituency in which the low tariff idea predominates, upon the defensive in his own constituency before his own friends. It is, therefore, necessary on this occasion that members holding that position should make themselves understood, so that whatever misunderstanding there may be as to the intentions of the government, there should be none as to their position with regard to those proposed changes. Speaking then on behalf of a constituency in which the industries are not such as are susceptible of protection by high tariff as are the manufacturing industries, I am compelled to voice my objection to any changes in the tariff which will be in the direction of protecting still further and unduly our manufacturing industries at the expense of the other industries of this country. There was a time when it was believed that a high tariff could be made to protect every industry. That time has gone by. We have had the experience of years since then, and we know that not only has a high tariff been unable to secure prosperity to the general industries of the country, but has even been unable to support and uphold the manufacturing industry itself. Instead of a high tariff being a protection against the failure of industry, it has been a failure itself. So that to-day there is no chance of any man or set of men going up and down the length and breadth of this country and persuading the representatives of the great producing industry that there is any benefit to them in the protection of manufactures. The manufacturer must be judged on his own merits, He must not expect in the future to ride, as he has done in the past, into popular favour on the backs of those industries which really are the foundation of the greatness of our country.

I was struck very much by the powerful arguments brought to bear on this as well as on the other side of the House, in favour of an increased tariff on imported manufactures. I was struck by the argument which went to prove the tremendous preponderance of wealth and manufacturing enterprise in the United States. It was held out to us that we must increase our protection or our country would be made a slaughter market by the manufacturers of the United States. That was the argument, but really, reading between the lines, following that argument out in detail, it struck me that the trouble was not at all with the manufacturers of the United States but with the manufacturers of Britain, under the British preference which prevails to-day. And that while our hon. friends were proclaiming themselves in favour of Britain, and possibly to some extent of British preference, they were really trying to get public sentiment worked up in favour of a high tariff, so that the British preference would be put an end to. They were using arguments against the United States for the purpose of raising an additional tariff in all against England. Did any of these gentlemen who held out to us so strongly the danger of our makets being slaughtered by the products of the United States advocate the desirability of a retaliatory tariff against the United States which would not apply to the rest of the world? They did not. The idea was that we should retaliate against the United States by protecting ourselves against Britain.

Now, a word as to the extent to which the manufacturers of the United States are slaughtering their goods in Canada. Let us take, first, the case of agricultural implements. The sales in Canada of agricultural implements made in the United States are increasing greatly, they are increasing greatly in the North-west. In the town in which I live, there are four implement agencies, two representing Canadian manufacturers and two representing American manufacturers. All four are doing a good business. And to-day the American harvester, the McCormick or the Deering, is worth just ten dollars more than the Massey or the Frost and Wood implement in that town. Do you call that slaughtering the American product in the Canadian market? I do not. To-day, I am credibly informed, our friends of the Imperial—otherwise the Standard—Oil Company are peddling oil throughout the towns of Ontario in double-barrelled tank wagons. In one barrel is Canadian oil, and in the other is American oil. And the American oil costs the consumer just five cents a gallon more than the Canadian oil—just the amount of the duty. Mr. Speaker. Is American oil being slaughtered in the Canadian market to the detriment of Canadian oil? We have heard a good deal in previous sessions of the necessity of protecting the shirt and collar manufacturers in Montreal. There was some inequality in the tariff—I do not know what it was—that had to be adjusted in favour of these people, otherwise, they would be driven out of business because the Canadian market was being slaughtered by the foreign manufacturers. I happened in to a store on Sparks Street the other day to make a purchase. I was anxious to patronize Canadian industry, but the merchant who kept the store said he did not keep Canadian goods; that he kept only German and English goods. I found, on further inquiry, that I could buy a Canadian-made shirt for seventy-five cents; and my friend who did not keep Canadian goods, and who was doing business right along was selling English and Austrian-made goods for $1.25 to $1.50. Were these goods being slaughtered on the Canadian market? Now, let us have a word with our friends the manufacturers—just a word—with regard to this matter. These three lines of goods that I have mentioned—and I take it that they are only sample cases of the whole line of manufactures—are sold in Canada at higher prices than the Canadian products. Why? Simply because the Canadian product is inferior. There is no getting away from that conclusion. Why is the Canadian product inferior? Is it because the Canadian is not equal in skill to the Austrian, or the Britisher, or the American? Is it because there is not sufficient capital in Canada to carry out these enterprises? The Bank of Montreal lends money by the million in the city of Chicago and the city of New York, and is not the only Canadian bank that does so. Then, why are not the Canadian manufactures as good as the foreign? There is no cause but that the Canadian manufacturer went into business, in many cases, with the intention of making his profit out of the tariff and not out of his business, and because he was able to come back year after year to this House and get the protection he saw fit to claim. He did not consider that he had to manufacture in competition with the outside, and he did not do it, nor is he doing it to-day. And, until the manufacturer of Canada rises to the occasion and uses the mechanical skill that is here, uses the capital that is here, uses the opportunity that is here to give the Canadian customer as good an article as that customer can buy from the outside, he is not entitled to protective consideration by this House. I said a minute ago that I was a protectionist. I am a protectionist, and when Canada becomes a slaughter market for another country I shall be prepared to consider measures to prevent that from taking place. But that is not taking place to-day; we are not even in danger of it taking place to-day. It is Britain that is selling us cheap goods and not the United States. And when these men come to us and ask an increase of tariff in favour of their manufactures, they are using false arguments, as I have shown, and are asking us to do what was done for them during the time of the so-called and mis-called national policy, which I hope this government will never consent to. I should be proud as a Canadian to know that the label 'made in Canada' was a guarantee of a good article. But I am ashamed, as a Canadian, that it is not so. And, if Canadian goods are not of good enough quality to sell in Canada in competition with outside manufactured goods, how are we to expect our Canadian trade in manufactured articles with the outside world to increase? We are to put up the duties on manufactured articles and squeeze the limit out of $174,000,000 worth of trade of our mines, fisheries, animals and agriculture. And for what? Will it increase by one cent the wages of the operatives in the mills and factories? It never did before. No; the object is to increase the dividends of the capitalists engaged in these industries—capital which is so fully represented in this House and so strongly represented on the other side particularly.

It seems, there has been a special attack made upon the government by our friends who are in the woollen industry. The woollen industry it appears, is hard hit by the British preference, and it cannot survive——

Mr. HOLMES. Pretends to be hard hit.

Mr. OLIVER. I am giving it credit for honesty. It is hard hit and cannot survive, if the preference is continued. Our woollen mills are being shut up, and the operatives thrown out of employment and compelled to seek employment in the United States. We are called upon to give adequate protection to the woollen industry. I took the trouble to look up the customs tariff and to make some little inquiry with regard to this woollen industry, and I would like to know what the woollen manufacturers want. Remember that Canada is a country with a long winter. Canada is a country where cheap woollens is of the highest importance to the people. Where a very trifling difference in the cost means a tremendous tax, particularly upon the labouring and poorer classes of this country. Woollen goods are a prime necessity, an absolute necessity, a universal necessity. Lower the cost of woollens and you benefit everybody, and particularly you benefit these great producing industries that I have mentioned. Increase the cost of woollens, and you injure everybody, and you especially injure these great producing industries that I have mentioned. You injure the labouring people; the poorer classes above all others. I say that when men come to this House and demand an increase in the duties on woollens, it is for them to show good cause why those duties should be increased.

Now, what are the duties on woollens to-day? In the customs tariff there is a duty in favour of the woollen manufacturers, if I read it right, of 35 per cent; 35 per cent against the world, 35 per cent against the danger of this country being used as a slaughter market by the woollen manufactures of the United States, a danger which, I may say, does not exist, as woollens are much dearer in the United States than they are in Canada. However, we have a tariff of 35 per cent in favour of woollens against the world, and with the British preference taken off we have a duty of 23 per cent against Great Britain, on woollen manufactures at large. I find that where other articles are required to enter into the manufactures of wool, such as alpaca, camel's wool, &c., these are admitted free for the benefit of our friends the woollen manufacturers—very properly so, too, I think. I do not know how many of our woollen manufacturers make shoddy, I hope none of them do. But I notice that probably in response to their request woollen rags were put on the free list. So they get a considerable part of their raw material free; they get protection of more than one-third against the world, and 23 per cent against Great Britain, 3 per cent more than the manufacturers of agricultural implements get to-day, 3 per cent more than the horse-raisers of the North-west, or of Canada generally get to-day, 3 per cent more, I may mention, than the raw wool, the product of the farm, receives to-day. That is to say, raw wool gets a protection of 3 cents a pound, and giving an estimated price of 15 cents a pound for wool, that leaves 20 per cent in favour of the farmer, while the manufacturer gets 23 per cent under the preferential tariff. I notice also that woollen yarn is protected to the extent of 30 per cent, while yarn which comes in for the purpose of manufacture pays only 20 per cent.

Now, I ask in all conscience, if these woollen manufacturers are not satisfied at present, what do they want? They are protected against the slaughter market of the United States by more than one-third of the cost of the imported article; they have cheap food, cheaper than it is in Great Britain; they have water power such as does not exist in Great Britain; they have capital in this country ample for all needs; they have protection more than many other industries have. Now, what more do they want? Do they want these great producing industries of the mine, the forest, the sea and the farm, to pay such extra price on the goods which they manufacture as will enable them to carry on their business by antiquated methods and antiquated means? If their demand means anything it means that, and I am here to say that in my humble estimation that demand should be refused in the interest of the whole of the people of this country.

I will carry the argument further. I am quite aware that you cannot eat your cake and have it. I want to be understood as saying that if this woollen manufacturing industry cannot exist in Canada under all the favourable conditions which it has at present, better that it should pass out of existence, that the capital employed in it should find other fields of employment, that the labour employed in it should find other fields, than that the people of this country at large should have to pay an unreasonable amount for one of the greatest necessities of their lives, and particularly that the poorer classes should be taxed unduly for the benefit of a few capitalists. I do not think that any such conclusion is in prospect, I do not think that we stand in any such danger. But I certainly say that if the choice has to be made, let these gentlemen understand distinctly that there are men in this House prepard to make it. They themselves are to be the judges. When we in the Northwest find that a certain article of our production cannot find a market, we are told to change our production, and we do. We have to; and if we do not, I do not know any tariff on earth that would save us. We did not find that our friends, the opposition, when they were in power, ever took the trouble to try to shape the tariff so as to save us when we were badly off in regard to markets. Neither have they a right to demand that we should do unreasonable things simply because they are incompetent in the management of their own business.

I notice that one of our friends alluded to protection on buggies. He claimed that the buggy industry was in danger of serious damage because of a lack of protection. I find that buggies have 35 per cent protection. That if you buy a buggy in the United States and bring it over to Canada, you have to pay one-third of the original cost to our hon. friend the Minister of Customs, before you can bring that buggy in. Now, if that is not a sufficient protection to Canadian buggy manufacturers, I want to know what they desire. For I find that the wood, even, though in a partly manufactured state, that is required for the making of that buggy, is allowed to come in free. I heard one of our friends speak on the subject of cutlery, our cutlery trade was going to be ruined. I find that cutlery has a protection of 30 per cent, very nearly one-third. I find further that if our friends the manufacturers of cutlery only desire to do a finishing business and do not really desire to go into the business of actually manufacturing the article which they sell as of Canadian make, they have the privilege of importing those parts of cutlery which go to make up the finished article, under a duty of 10 per cent.

I won't trouble the House by going through the whole tariff list. But I will say that my study of the present tariff has led me to the belief that it has been a subject of more careful adjustment than I ever thought it was, and that there has been more done to relieve the tax on the consumer and at the same time help the manufacturer—which we all wish to do—than a careless glance at the tariff pages would give anybody to understand. In regard to the reductions in duties that have taken place, and in regard to the effect of these reductions it has been said that the reductions only amounted to such and such a per cent. I do not know whether that calculation is correct or not, and I do not care, but I do know that the reductions of the protective duties on iron and steel, which had done no good to this country and had simply been a tax upon it, were a benefit to our manufacturers which they certainly availed themselves of and which we are all very glad of. There was an advantage, a distinct advantage to the country in the readjustment of these iron duties, the story of which is not told by the mere amount of the reduction.

I am no enemy of the manufacturers. I am anxious to see the manufacturing interests of this country prosper, as I am anxious to see every other industry prosper, but, I cannot agree to a declaration of policy whereby that industry is to be singled out to be benefited at the expense of all others. You say that it is not, in terms. Well, it does not need to be in terms. There is a difference between an industry which is chiefly an exporting industry and an industry which chiefly finds a home market. The one is capable of being affected by a protective tariff, and the other is not correspondingly capable of being affected by a protective tariff. If you put a duty on woollen goods, you enable the price of woollen goods to be raised, but if you put a duty on wheat you do not raise the price of the wheat of the farmer as long as he has to export the millions and millions of bushels that he raises. I was struck by the argument of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) where he said that the population of Canada consumes 22,000,000 bushels of wheat a year, and that it should be possible to ensure a home market to our people to that extent. Possibly it would, but what about the balance of the crop? What is he going to do about that? Is he going to protect the farmer on 20,000,000 bushels of his crop, enable the farmer to bleed every other industry in the country and still compel him to sell the balance of his product in the world's market at the world's price? That is the best he can do for the farmer, but it is not the best he can do for the woollen manufacturer who makes only for the home market. Every cent which is added to the duty is a cent in the pocket of the capitalist who owns the woollen mill. That is the difference between protection as applied to the manufacturers and protection as applied to a great producing industry.

I said that I was a protectionist. Mr. Speaker, I am a protectionist. I believe in the policy of protection. I believe it is the first business of a government to do what lies in its power by legislation, administration or otherwise to protect and advance the interest of the people of the country of which it has charge. I want to see a protectionist policy on behalf of labour in this country. I want to see a policy that will protect labour against the degredation of unfair competition. We have heard a great deal on the subject of Chinese labour in British Columbia. Let me say that if there are 16,000 adult working Chinamen in British Columbia that displaces, possibly, not 16,000, but, certainly 8,000 adult white labourers, taking one white man to be as good as two Chinamen. Sixteen thousand Chinamen displace 8,000 white men, but, the 8,000 white men would probably be 8,000 heads of families and would mean not 8,000 people, but 40,000 people in that province—40,000 added to the strength of our nation; instead of 16,000 towards the weakness of our nation. For the labour of the country is the vitality of the country. It is on the strength and force of the labour of the world that the industrial machine depends just as much as it is on the pressure of steam in the boiler that we depend for the running of our machinery. If we have plenty of the right kind of people we can do business, and if we have not, we cannot. If we allow the right kind of people to be displaced by the wrong kind of people we do ourselves an injury. I say that I am in favour of a policy of protection to labour, protecting labour from the degradation of low wages and unfair competition in so far as that can be done. It is all a mistake for us to consider that it is merely the capitalist and his capital that has to be considered in the successful running of the affairs of the country.

The foundation of everything is the labourer and his labour and any system of taxation which takes an unfair proportion of the public revenue from the labourer is an injury to the country as much as it is to the labourers themselves. Last night, or the night before, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) asked: How is it that there is only one free trade country in the world, that all the other countries of Europe and America are protectionist? How can it be that these are all wrong and that Great Britain alone is right? On the other hand, let me ask him in what other country has there been, under paralleled circumstances, any such industrial or commercial development as there has been in Great Britain under the system which has prevailed there. There is no comparison between the progress of Great Britain and the progress of any other country, and the one thing in which Great Britain is placed above any other protective country is that the British workingman is the man who pays the least taxes of any one in the British islands. He is the man, who by the British system is relieved of taxation practically, and there you have the secret of Britain's industrial supremacy so far as that supremacy has been achieved, and so far as it has been maintained. I say that in this country, our system of tariff and our system of taxation ought above all things be framed so as to lay the least burden upon the labouring man and upon the results of his labour to himself and his family.

I am a protectionist in this: That I wish to see our country grow, and grow great I submit that there is nothing in which our country has lost so much, and has fallen so far short of achieving greatness, as in the stupendous loss of population which has taken place within the last thirty years. During that period Canada has lost over a million of her native born children. Canada has been losing them decade after decade, and if she is not losing them to-day then we have reason to be pleased. But we have more than reason to fear that she is still losing them in larger numbers than is good for the country. I am in favour of a policy which will actively endeavour to retain our own population in our own country for its advancement and its building up. I heard my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) say that he was in favour of that idea, and he proposed to attain it by providing protection to manufacturing industries. Well, my hon. friend's friends were in power for nearly twenty years. They had a policy which they called the national policy and one of the great purposes of that policy was to do that very thing. They had time enough to work it out to a successful conclusion if success was possible under it. The result of the census has shown that success was not achieved, and therefore I believe that success under that policy was not possible. It is impossible to herd the surplus people of this country in manufacturing centres, which manufacturing centres depend on the balance of the people for their support and their prosperity. The thing is an impossibility. Let me place this fact before hon. gentlemen: Canada offers to-day the greatest field for the employment of intelligent labour that is offered by any country in the world. Canada has opportunity for every one of her children and will have such an opportunity for decades and decades to come. That opportunity lies in the country west of Lake Superior—in Manitoba, in British Columbia, in the North-west Territories and in the Yukon. It is by attracting the overflow of the people of our eastern provinces to our western provinces that we will retain their nationality and retain their labour and their enterprise for the benefit of our own country. That is the way in which we can do it, and that is the only way in which we can do it. You may say: Why is it not being done; why has it not been done; or perhaps you may say: Is it not being done. Well, I am sorry to say Mr. Speaker, that it is not being done, that it has not been done, and that it has been the declared policy of the government of Canada for many years—the declared policy of the present government and of the preceding government—not to use means to induce the removal of population from one part of the Dominion to the other. I stand here to-night to say that that declared policy has been the greatest curse from which our Dominion has suffered; that that policy of knowing nothing and doing nothing in regard to the removal of our population from one part of the country where they had not opportunity to the other part of the country where they had boundless opportunity, has been the reason why so many of our people have gone to that other country where they had opportunity as well. In view of the census returns, in view of the facts which are now before us, I say that it is time for our country to drop its know nothing and do nothing policy in regard to retaining our own people for our own country, and to recognize the fact that of all the countries in the known world, this Canada of ours is the country which sends out the greatest proportion of its people as emigrants to other countries. If we realize that, and if we realize as I believe—and as I think we all believe—that our own people are the best people we can have for the settlement and development of our country; surely here is a policy that is worthy of the best attention of our best minds and the best efforts that our government can put forth. There is only one means by which the exodus can be checked, can be stopped, and that is by turning our overflow of population into the field which we acquired for that very purpose thirty or forty years ago. If we did not acquire the North-west for that purpose we did not acquire it for any reasonable purpose; because, if you settle that country with an alien people it has such a preponderance of resources and of opportunities that the question presents itself: What becomes of your Dominion; what becomes of the country that you are supposed to be building up? How long can you hold it as a part of this Dominion when that country is filled with an alien people and outnumbers the population of Eastern Canada by ten or twenty to one. It is of the first necessity towards the building up of a Canadian nation that you must use every endeavour to put every son of Canadian soil into that western country where, and where only within your borders there is room and opportunity suited to his intellect and ability. You must do that if you are to retain Canada as a great country and build it up as a united Canada.

I am a protectionist in other ways. In view of the developments; the industrial, commercial and transportation developments which have taken place in the country to the south of us; in view of the developments along similar lines which have taken place in Canada; in view of the march of events throughout the world, I say that the policy of protection which requires most urgent attention at the hands of this government of Canada, is the protection of the masses of the people engaged in these great producing industries—the mines, the fisheries, the forest, and the farm—the protection of the masses of the people from the transportation monopolies, from the manufacturing monopolies, from the capitalistic monopolies, of every kind which are riding the United States to death and which will ride us to death if we let them. This is the danger in which we stand in Canada to-day, and this is the protection we require. It is not that our manufactures need protection against those of the United States, but it is that our people need protection against combinations of capital applied to transportation, industrial, and commercial development, along all lines. These are the questions which I urge upon the government of the day the necessity of considering. I ask for protection of interests which have added to the wealth of this country $174,000,000 in one year rather than that those interests shall be sacrificed at the demand of interests which have added only $17,000,000 to the wealth of the country in the same time. I ask that the greater interest be considered and not the lesser. I ask that these interests be considered fairly and equitably, and that no injustice be done them. I ask for no injustice against the manufacturing industry either; but I object entirely to that industry being spoken of as the industry, and every other industry being set to one side.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, March 24, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Macdonald, East Huron) moved:

That the Select Committee to whom was referred Bill (No. 11), an Act to provide for the establishment of a medical council in Canada be empowered to employ a shorthand reporter.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 68) respecting the Central Counties Railway Company.—Mr. Edwards.

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Guthrie.

Bill (No. 70) to incorporate the Ross Rifle Company.—Mr. Thompson.

Bill (No. 71) respecting the Dominion Cotton Company, Limited.—Mr. Legris.

Bill (No. 72) to incorporate the Pacific Northern and Omineca Railway Company.—Mr. Morrison.

Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the North Shore Power Railway and Navigation Company.—Mr. McCarthy.

Bill (No. 74) respecting the Ottawa, Brockville, and St. Lawrence Railway Company.—Mr. Thompson.

Bill (No. 75) to incorporate the Knapp Tubular Steamship Company.—Mr. Calvert.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. L. N. CHAMPAGNE (Wright) moved:

That the third report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the debates of the House for the present session be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PILOTAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 76) further to amend the Pilotage Act.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Explain.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. This is a Bill introduced to amend the statute of 1900, and it has for its object to do away with compulsory pilotage on vessels drawing less than 16 feet of water sailing between the great lakes and ports on the St. Lawrence.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPREME COURT—ASSISTANT JUDGES.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 77) to provide for the appointment of assistant judges of the Supreme Court of Canada in certain cases.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Explain.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The object of this Bill is to provide that in case of a judge of the Supreme Court being disqualified by reason of illness, or because he is interested in a case pending in the court, it may be in the power of the Governor General in Council to appoint a judge to take the place of the judge who is so disqualified. This is to prevent certain inconveniences to which the Bar has been subjected in the past. It is provided in the Bill that the judge to be appointed shall be selected from the same province to which the judge who is disqualified belongs.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Of what rank ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The High Court, of course. The proposed law is similar to that which we have in the province of Quebec and also in the province of Ontario.

Mr. SPROULE. What kind of disqualification does it apply to ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Illness or absence; the ordinary reasons which apply in the other provinces.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

THE CENSUS—DESCRIPTION OF THE METIS.

Mr. A. A. C. LaRIVIERE (Provencher). Before the Orders of the Day are called, Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail of the very first opportunity to call attention to what I consider to be an improper description of a certain class of our community, which is to be found in the seventh bulletin of the census for the year 1901, which has just been placed in my hands.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Had not my hon. friend better wait until the motion is made to go into Committee of Ways and Means ?

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I have only a few words to say, and I do not wish to make a motion or to raise a debate. On the second page of this bulletin, the Metis of the Dominion of Canada, or, what are commonly called the half-breeds, are described as Indians. I do not say that this was intended to be an insult, because I believe it was unintentional, but nevertheless the description is incorrect. The Metis do not deny their Indian blood; in fact they are proud of it, but at the same time they object very properly to be called Indians. I see no reason why, because some of them happen to have perhaps one-hundred and twenty-eighth part of Indian blood in their veins, they should be described as Indians, which to a certain extent would brand them in the public mind as belonging to an uncivilized portion of the community. I protest against the half-breeds of Manitoba—more properly called the Metis—whether French, Scotch, Irish, or any other nationality, being described in the census returns as Indians. Now that attention has been called to this mistake, I trust it will be corrected at once, and that another bulletin will be issued properly describing the Metis. In the name of the Metis, I protest against that mistake in the census, and I believe my hon. friends from the west will join me in that protest.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I understand there is no motion before the Chair, Mr. Speaker, but I propose to put myself in order by moving—

The PRIME MINISTER. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Davis) not to move the adjournment of the House now. The hon. gentleman can make his remarks when the House is moved into Committee of Ways and Means.

SPRAGUE'S FALLS MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 37) to incorporate the Sprague's Falls Manufacturing Company, Limited.—Mr. Emmerson.

On section 10,

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Is there any provincial legislation in New Brunswick upon this subject? In the province of Nova Scotia there are provincial enactments governing the rights of persons to secure their logs upon rivers and to drive their logs down the streams. In incorporating a company of this kind, I think we should be careful to have regard to provincial legislation of a general character which might control the operations of the company, and not insert any provision which would be inconsistent with such legislation.

Mr. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmoreland). That subject was considered by the subcommittee which had charge of this Bill. These are international waters which are referred to in the Bill. In the province of New Brunswick we have of course enactments governing the rights of lumbermen who use inland waters.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not see that the Bill restricts the operations of the company to international waters. The powers given to the company may be exercised on waters under the direct control of the provincial legislature of New Brunswick. Section 10 purports to deal with the mode in which persons having property that comes within the booms of the company shall retain their property. We should be careful not to frame the Bill in such a way that the company would assume the position of being beyond the control of provincial enactments with regard to that particular subject. I would like to hear from my hon. friend the Minister of Justice on this matter. Does he not think that provincial legislation with regard to a matter of this kind should be left severely alone?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon Charles Fitzpatrick). If my hon. friend will read section 10, he will see that it does not interfere with provincial legislation at all. It says:

> The company shall not take or hold within its booms any prize or unmarked logs. Any person interested may go upon the property of the company at any reasonable time and in any reasonable manner, search for such prize or unmarked logs, but the company shall have its proper proportion of the proceeds therefrom.

I apprehend that the draftsman must have had in view the idea that the provincial legislature would determine what the proper proportion is, because the words are so vague that they do not mean anything unless the provincial legislation is borne in mind.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would it not be well to insert a clause to make the matter plain. For instance, the provincial legislature may have fixed limits of time or may prescribe what is a reasonable manner for going on the property of the company to search for logs. If so, I think the company should be confined to those regulations. Would my hon. friend who has charge of the Bill have any objection to insert words to make that clear?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. We might go through the other provisions of the Bill, and then have the committee rise and report progress for the purpose of having that question looked into.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Very well.

On section 12,

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not exactly understand why those words should be embodied in the Bill. If a line of poles is to be erected on the company's own property, these words are not required. If they are to be erected on the public highway, the consent of the municipality should be obtained. If on the property of others, the company should pay any damages caused.

Mr. EMMERSON. The parties interested went before the committee, where the whole matter was fully discussed. Then it was referred to a special sub-committee and all agreed upon these provisions.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). This is a question which is exciting a good deal of attention, namely, the right of telegraph and telephone companies to put up their poles and wires on streets and highways, regardless of the rights which municipalities were heretofore supposed to possess. The easiest way to secure to the municipalities those rights would be to include in the Bill a provision making the putting up of poles and lines subject to the approval of the municipal corporation interested and under its direction.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. A great deal of misapprehension exists with respect to the rights of municipalities over telephone and telegraph companies. Chapter 37 of 62-63 Victoria makes it absolutely impossible for these companies to enter streets or highways or public parks under control of municipalities without the consent of these municipalities.

Mr. SPROULE. And the work must be done under their direction.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Certainly.

Mr. SPROULE. How is it then that this Bell Telephone Company is asserting in the courts its right to erect its poles and lines without the consent of the municipalities ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The Bell Telephone Company was incorporated previous to this enactment, and they say it does not apply to them.

Mr. SPROULE. Then it does not matter whether we put the clause suggested or not, the municipalities still have control and can exercise it.

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. Certainly. I am not prepared to say that the Bell Telephone Company does not come within the provisions of the statute I have just referred to, but I am not expressing any opinion on that point.

Mr. F. B. WADE (Annapolis). This Bill was referred to a sub-committee and a clause was there incorporated in it which removes the objection of the leader of the opposition. That is section 9, which has not yet been read, and which is the model clause adopted in the Bill incorporating the St. Lawrence Power Company last year.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Do I understand from the promoter of the Bill that this clause, which gave the company the power of expropriating mill sites at certain places, has been eliminated ?

Mr. WADE. Yes, it has. The company is given the power to expropriate land for its tramway and on which to erect its mills and dams, but these it has to expropriate under the provisions of the Railway Act. It is the same as the model clause adopted last session with regard to the St. Lawrence Power Company.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Is there a general clause at the end giving us jurisdiction if we have it not ?

Mr. WADE. No, there was some doubt as to whether this parliament has jurisdiction to pass this legislation, and the promoters decided that they would go to the provincial legislature.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think clause 13 might remove the objection, but would suggest that clause 12 stand until clause 13 is discussed.

Clause 12 allowed to stand.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The original clause 13 is struck out and the following substituted :

The company, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining its works, may, with the consent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over the same, enter on any highway, square or any other public place, and as often as the company thinks proper, may, with the like consent, break up and open any highway or public place, subject however to the following provisions :

(a.) The company shall not interfere with the public right of travel, or in any way obstruct the entrance to any door or gateway, or free access to any building ;

(b.) The company shall not permit any wire to be less than twenty-two feet above such highway or public place ;

(c.) All poles shall be as nearly as possible straight and perpendicular, and shall, in cities, be painted, if so required by any by-law of the council ;

(d.) The company shall not be entitled to damages on account of its poles or wires being cut by direction of the officer in charge of the fire brigade at any fire if, in the opinion of such officer, it is advisable that such poles or wires be cut ;

(e.) The company shall not cut down or mutilate any shade, fruit or ornamental tree without the approval of the corporation of the municipality in which it is situate, and then only so far as it may be necessary ;

(f.) The opening up of streets for the erection of poles, or for carrying wires under ground, shall be subject to the direction and approval of such person as the municipal council directs ; the council may also designate the places where such poles shall be erected ; and such street, square or other public place shall, without any unnecessary delay, be restored, as far as possible, to its former condition by and at the expense of the company ;

(g.) Nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize the company to enter upon any private property for the purpose of erecting, maintaining or repairing any of its works, without the previous assent of the owner or occupant of the property for the time being ;

(h.) If, for the purpose of removing buildings, or in the exercise of the public right of travel, it is necessary that the said wires or poles be temporarily removed, by cutting or otherwise, the company shall, at its own expense, upon reasonable notice in writing from any person requiring it, remove such wires and poles, and in default of the company so doing, such person may remove such wires and poles at the expense of the company. The said notice may be given either at any office of the company, or to any agent or officer of the company in the municipality wherein are the wires or poles required to be removed, or, in the case of a municipality wherein there is no such agent or officer, then, either at the head office, or to any agent or officer of the company in the nearest or any adjoining municipality to that in which such wires or poles are ;

(i.) The company shall be responsible for all damage which it causes to ornamental, shade, or fruit trees, and otherwise for all unnecessary damages it causes in carrying out or maintaining any of its said works.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like to know if the Minister of Justice has considered whether this should or should not be a provincial Bill. There is nothing in the Bill, as I understand it, that would lead one to suppose that it was other than a provincial corporation. Its operations seem to be confined to one province, and it does not seem to propose to branch out into agencies. On what ground does the company seek to establish incorporation here ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE. The justification for the introduction of the Bill here is found in the fact that the St. Croix river on which the company's operations are to be carried on, and in connection with which alterations are to be made, is an international river, dividing Canada from the United States.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Still, I would suggest to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice that the company is being granted power extending far beyond the St. Croix river. Its business might be carried on elsewhere than on this river. It seems to me, without having given the subject very much consideration, that the proper way to deal with a scheme of this kind would be for the company to secure a provincial charter giving it the powers that are covered by this Bill, and then, if it should become necessary, on account of the enterprise of the company extending to the St. Croix river, to secure a very brief Act from this parliament giving any necessary powers which only this parliament could give. But, so far as nine-tenths of the matters covered by this Bill are concerned, the provincial legislature is the body that should regulate the future business of this company, I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that he should take this matter into consideration and have some general practice established as to matters of that kind. It occurs to me at the moment that the plan I propose is the more logical plan of the two. Pursuing the course that is asked for here, you have this parliament invading the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature simply for the reason that some portion of the company's works may touch a subject which is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of this parliament.

Mr. EMMERSON. I may say that the whole question arose two or three years ago in connection with the Tobique Manufacturing Company. The government of New Brunswick, protested officially against the granting of such powers by this parliament. The Bill is in this position, that the promoters, when the suggestion was made, said that it was their intention to apply at once to the provincial legislature, and that they would have two charters.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER.

Mr. WADE. They are anxious to get to work early in the spring, and they felt that if they waited till they got a charter from the New Brunswick legislature they might be delayed. It does not make much difference whether they get here first or there.

Progress reported.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 57) respecting the Ontario Power Company of Niagara Falls.—Mr. German.

Bill (No. 59) respecting the James Bay Railway Company.—Mr. McCormick.

QUESTIONS.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH THE MAGDALEN ISLANDS.

Mr. HACKETT asked :

1. How many trips were made by the steamship 'Amelia' to the Magdalen Islands in the season of 1901 ?

2. What is the tonnage and carrying capacity of said steamship with regard to freight and passenger accommodation ?

3. Have any improvements been made to her in the winter of 1900 ?

4. If so, what is the nature of such ameliorations or improvements ?

5. Is it the intention of the government to give the people of the Magdalen Islands a more frequent service ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) :

1. The steamer 'Amelia' made thirty-five trips to Magdalen islands and return during the season of 1901.

2. The tonnage is 356 gross and 103 net ; cargo capacity, 15,000 cubic feet or equal to about 2,000 barrels ; holds certificate for 250 passengers ; sleeping berth for 20 passengers in saloon and same number in forecabin.

3. and 4. The further additions made to the steamer last year for passenger accommodation were three private cabins in the saloon amidship, fitted with two berths each, also there was rearranged a large cabin aft which was used for officers' quarters with sleeping berths for 10—both saloons steam heated, electric lighted and connected with electric bells. It is claimed that the accommodations have been more than adequate for the number of passengers carried. The berths were not all occupied on any trip last season.

5. It is not at present in contemplation to do so.

MAIL CARRIAGE—ANTEN MILLS AND HENDRIE.

Mr. BENNETT,—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. Who is contractor for carrying of mails between Anten Mills and Hendrie, County of Simcoe ?

2. What is paid to contractor per annum for such service ?

3. (a.) When was contract let ? (b.) How many tenders were received ? (c.) Was the lowest tender accepted ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Wm. Mulock). Tenders for this service were invited. Two were received, one tender being for $24.96 and another, that of Mr. James McLaughlin at $29. The inspector reported the tenderer at $24.96 to be incompetent to perform the service, and accordingly the contract has been awarded to Mr. James McLaughlin, who is also postmaster at Anten Mills, at $29. The inspector has been instructed to complete the contract with Mr. McLaughlin, and the necessary contract for this purpose has been sent for execution, but the department has not been advised whether it has been executed.

INDIAN TREATY NUMBER THREE.

Mr. CLANCY asked :

1. What is the approximate amount of the claim of the Dominion against the province of Ontario, under the Indian Treaty number three (referred to in the report of the Deputy Minister of Finance for 1900, up to the 31st December, 1901 ?

2. At what dates were the claim of the Dominion and the answer of the province filed with the arbitrators ?

3. Are any steps being taken to have the matter determined ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) :

1. No claim has been filed by the Dominion made up to the date named in the honourable gentleman's question. The approximate amount of the claim of the Dominion against the province is $322,000, which, with interest up to the time of the filing of the claim by the Dominion, made then an approximate claim of $475,000.

2. Claim of the Dominion filed 18th October, 1893 ; answer of the province of Ontario filed 6th November, 1895.

3. The claim was brought before the arbitrators by the Dominion and postponed at the request of the Ontario government. Subsequently a date for hearing was fixed, but owing to the illness of one of the arbitrators the case was not proceeded with. An application will shortly be made for a further hearing.

MANITOBA LIQUOR ACT.

Mr. McCREARY asked :

Has the Manitoba branch of the Dominion Alliance, or any one acting for them or on their behalf, in the city of Winnipeg or the Province of Manitoba, remitted to the government any brief, letter or statement dealing with the unconstitutionality of the Referendum about to be taken on the Manitoba Liquor Act ? If so, what reply has been sent, or what action does the government intend taking in the matter ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). Yes, copy of the petition for disallowance has, following the usual practice, been transferred to the government of Manitoba for their observations. The statute itself has not yet been transmitted to this government. When it is received, and the reply of the Manitoba government, the matter will be considered in the usual way.

THE CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. FLINT asked :

What counties, districts or municipalities in Canada are at present under the operation of the Canada Temperance Act.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The Canada Temperance Act is in force in the following electoral districts :—

Nova Scotia.	N. Brunswick	P.E. Island.	Manitoba.
Annapolis.	Albert.	King's.	Lisgar.

IMPORTATION OF FLAX SEED.

Mr. McGOWAN—by Mr. Lancaster—asked :

1. What is the amount of flax seed, in bushels, imported into Canada from the United States since the 30th June last ?

2. What are the ports in Canada, and the quantities at each port at which it was entered?

3. What is the value of such flax seed at each port, respectively ?

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). The quantity and value of flax seed imported into each port in Canada, from the United States, from July 1, to March 1, 1902, were as follows :—

Port.	Quantity.	Value.

WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. LANCASTER asked :

1. What is the minimum depth of water on the mitre sills of the entrance locks of the Welland Canal at Port Colborne and Port Dalhousie that will be available for navigation this season ?

2. What is the number of cubic feet of water per second (or minute) granted up to the present date from the Welland Canal by lease, Order in Council, or otherwise, to the Hamilton Cataract Power Company ?

3. What is the quantity of water allowed to pass per second (or minute) from the Welland Canal into the hydraulic race of the said company ?

4. What is the quantity of water passing at present per second (or minute) northward through the guard lock of the old Welland Canal at Thorold ?

5. Why has not the Order in Council been passed granting to the corporation of St. Catharines for power purposes six thousand cubic feet of water per minute from the old Welland Canal, as petitioned for by the said corporation and Board of Trade of the said city of St. Catharines, and referred to by the Prime Minister on 18th February, 1901, as reported in 'Hansard' on page 109 of that year ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. At Port Colborne, fourteen feet on the mitre sill ; at Port Dalhousie, fourteen feet on the mitre sill.

2. One hundred cubic feet per second.

3. One hundred cubic feet per second.

4. Five hundred and seventy-five cubic feet per second.

5. I have observed that the fifth answer has not been put in my hand and I will furnish it on Wednesday.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—FERRY BETWEEN MULGRAVE AND POINT TUPPER.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

1. What has been the cost of the improved ferry service of the Intercolonial Railway between Mulgrave and Point Tupper to date, including the cost of the new ferry boat, and of the improvements at these in connection with the ferry service ?

2. When was the ferry boat for this service delivered by the contractors at Mulgrave ?

3. Has this boat been tested, and is she of sufficient strength to confront the ice conditions in winter, referred to by the Minister of Railways in his speech in this House ?

4. How many trains or how many cars have been transferred by this boat to date ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. $419,382.48.

2. 28th September, 1901.

3. This boat has been tested and is of sufficient strength to confront the ice conditions in winter at the Strait of Canso.

4. No trains have been transferred because the bridges connecting the boat with the land are not yet ready.

COMMISSION ON WEIGHING OF BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Mr. ROBINSON (Elgin) asked :

When will the report of the commission on the weighing of butter and cheese be laid on the Table ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). The investigation is not yet completed. The commissioner's time has been occupied with other matters since the meeting of parliament. He has not had the opportunity of finishing up, but hopes to do so within a few days. The report will be forthcoming as soon as possible.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY—AGREEMENT WITH SIGNOR MARCONI.

Mr. MACKINNON—by Mr. Johnston (Cape Breton)—asked :

In the agreement between the government and Signor Marconi re wireless telegraphy, is there any provision respecting the extension of that system to Prince Edward Island ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). There is no special provision in the agreement with respect to Prince Edward Island, but the main purpose of the agreement was to secure, in the event of the enterprise proving successful, cheap telegraph rates from shore to shore across the Atlantic. There is a provision, however, for the use of the Marconi system for the lighthouse service of Canada and other government works, and that will apply to Prince Edward Island as well as to other parts of the Dominion. The agreement as it has been signed, will be laid before the House.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CANADIAN CONTINGENTS.

Mr. KEMP asked :

1. Did the government arm, equip and transport by land and sea, at its own expense, the various contingents of troops which were despatched to the seat of war in South Africa, to assist in subduing the enemies of the King ?

2. If not, what are the different conditions respecting arming, equipping and transporting the several contingents ?

3. If the government did not, at its own expense, arm, equip and transport any one or more of the contingents, what was the reason for such action ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) :

1. The government did arm, equip and transport, by land and sea at its own expense, the two contingents of troops which were despatched to the seat of war in South Africa, from Canada, in 1899 and 1900.

2. The arming, equipping and transporting of all corps were carried out at the expense of the Imperial authorities, as proposed by them.

3. The reason is that the government deemed it in the public interest to act as they did, and if the hon. member is not satisfied with that course, it is open to him to affirm by motion, the policy which, in his opinion, ought to have been adopted.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is not necessary to go very fully into the discussion of the budget after we have had a week of very full and careful discussion of that subject in which views have been presented of the most divergent character, so that, I presume, almost every opinion that can be readily advanced on the subject has already been laid before the House. There are, however, reasons why we should pay a great deal of attention to the matter of treating with proper interest the important occasion recurring annually in our affairs when we have our national balance sheet laid before us, and to a certain extent, having the confidence of the government, have some opportunity of learning in what directions, if any, the government propose to make a change of policy during the coming year. I am delighted to be in a position on this occasion to congratulate the government and the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) on the fact that he has again an opportunity of bringing into the House and placing before the country a statement in which is evidenced the fact that Canada is prosperous in a very high degree indeed. The surpluses with which the hon. gentleman has been favoured since he had the honour of occupying the position of Finance Minister of Canada, have been almost annually recurring and I dare say, that, to him, they are becoming an old story. However, it is not well that either the government, or the House, or the country, should acquire the idea, or hold the opinion, that such a state of affairs as has existed in Canada since 1898 is going to continue for ever. We have unquestionably had a series of most fortunate and prosperous years, and in the year which has passed we have had the magnificent surplus of $5,648,000, which places the government of the day in such a position that they should not be short of money. Their revenue exceeds $50,000,000, reaching $52,514,000, but, I find that although they have this enormous sum of money placed in their hands by the contributions of the people of Canada, they have still found it necessary to incur a very large expenditure on capital account and in respect to this matter, I think the government are fairly open to criticism, because, I think that many items have, in the course of the past year, been charged to capital, which should, properly speaking, have been charged to consolidated revenue account, and if that course had been pursued, if all the items which could be fairly proven to be chargeable to consolidated fund account had been charged to that account, the hon. Minister of Finance would not have had nearly so large a surplus as he has. The expenditure has been very large, on consolidated fund account nearly $49,000,000, and on capital account, about $11,000,000, showing either that the demands upon the government from their supporters are enormously large, or that the government are in an exceedingly pliant humour and are endeavouring to make all their friends share in the good times which are at present prevailing throughout Canada. It is rather an extraordiary thing in the face of such a showing as we have had this year—a rather unexpected showing I believe, because I do not think the hon. Minister of Finance anticipated quite so great a success in the matter of money—to see after all the debt of Canada has increased to $268,000,000 and that during the past year it has been increased to the amount of nearly $3,000,000. It is very evident that the system under which the hon. gentleman has conducted the affairs of Canada during the past year is one in which he is going to continue for at least a year to come, for he tells us and the country that while he estimates the revenue in the year now very nearly coming to a close at $56,800,000, or, $4,300,000 more than his very great good fortune gave him this year, he expects to have an expenditure of not $49,000,000 but of $51,000,000. On capital account, the expenditure which certainly stood at an enormously high point last year when it was about $11,000,000, is to be increased to $14,250,000. Therefore, the total expenditure of Canada in the coming year will be $62,250,000, and the debt of Canada, in such marvellously good times as we are enjoying, will be increased by $6,000,000. That is a very extraordinary showing, because at the present time we are not having any very remarkably large expenditures. There is no Intercolonial Railway to be built; there is no Canadian Pacific Railway being paid for; there is no great work in connection with the canal development of Canada; there is nothing that will occur to the ordinary citizen of the country, to account for the fact that in the face of such enormous revenues as Canada has enjoyed for the last two years, it should be necessary to increase the debt in Canada in these two years by $8,986,196. Of course, the Minister of Finance has very much better opportunities to know what is likely coming, than has an ordinary member of parliament and more particularly one who sits in the cold shades of opposition and does not receive his information so readily or perhaps so correctly as do the members supporting the government; but it does strike me that the government has shown an alacrity, a readiness, a cheerfulness in going forward with its policy of tremendous expenditure which will require more careful consideration.

There are indications that Canada has reached the highest point in this period of prosperity in which we have been living for some years past. The total trade of Canada is a very good indication of the state of affairs in the country. The total trade of Canada has for the last three or four years increased by enormous sums annually, but in the last year a different showing occurred and the total trade of this country increased by only about $5,000,000—a very significant fact which would seem to show that the great swelling tide of business which has been sending our figures up in such an extraordinary fashion has to a certain extent reached its full, and that we may expect—in view of the experiences of the past which have never failed to be uniform—we may expect that in a very short time the tide will be ebbing, and the shrinkage in our figures may perhaps be quite as rapid as was the increase. I, of course, Mr. Speaker, do not anticipate that we are going back to the lowest figures of former days; that has not been the history of the business of Canada. Although it has had periods of inflation and periods of depression, still, during the periods of depression there has been a steady upward progress—Canada was prospering, was adding to its population, was adding to its wealth, was developing its industries and was constantly increasing its volume of business. That increase we may expect to continue to some extent; but that we shall have such revenues and such trade as we have had for the past two years is too much to hope.

Now, what has probably created the extraordinary good times on which I felicitate the Laurier administration—if the premier will pardon me for introducing his name—and which good times have so far pursued the existence of this government? I think there can be no question at all that the fact which is revealed to us; the one significant fact which to my mind accounts for all that we have seen; is the fact that the production of the country has enormously increased; that its exports in consequence have reached a point they never reached before and may possibly not attain to again for some time. In reference to this matter of exports, the figures are even more significant than they are when you look at the aggregate trade of the country. We find that while the exports of Canada grew from 1899 to 1900 by $33,000,000; that between 1900 and 1901 they increased by only about $4,500,000. It seems to me there can be no question whatever that the fact that we have had these enormous exports, (showing what is generally spoken of as the balance of trade enormously in our favour); has accounted for Canada being in a position to buy so enormously as she has done from abroad, and has accounted for the people of this country being able to pour into the coffers of the Dominion treasury this enormous amount of money which they have paid in excise and in customs taxation to the credit of the present government.

The whole history of the trade of Canada shows that while Canada has always been a steadily growing and prosperous country, yet the balance of trade has stood against her during all the years since confederation, somewhere about $13,000,000 per year. That is to say, that Canada did and could purchase from abroad and pay with her resources some $13,000,000 more than the value of the exports which she sent out of the country. And while the balance of trade is now so enormously in her favour, it must be that we have accumulated, and will have to draw upon in some of the years in the immediate future, a great credit out of which the imports of the country can be maintained for some considerable time. But the fact that we see that that great source of national strength and prosperity, that enormous volume of production and enormous volume of exports is diminishing, should, I think, be sufficient warrant for the government of the day to look carefully to the future and to consider the ways and means, so that they may not be caught by a sudden depression, as we know depressions very frequently come in the most sudden fashion.

I suppose that this House is not anxious to hear many more figures, and for my part I do not intend to quote very many more. Figures may be produced, as from Holy Writ arguments may be produced, to support any cause. From one side of the House and from the other you will hear arguments based upon figures which seem to sustain most contradictory contentions. The question as to whether or not Canada is being economically governed and governed in the interest of her people, has been endeavoured to be answered by pointing to the great prosperity of the time on the one hand; while the argument of those who believe that Canada might possibly be better governed if she had a Conservative administration in power, has been sustained largely by pointing out that the burdens which are imposed on the country at this time are very heavy; that the debt of the country is climbing upward steadily; that the expenditure of the country is very large. After all, perhaps the truest way of estimating what is the position of the country and what is the position of the individual citizen of the country upon whose shoulders rest the burden of government, is to consider what it costs him. What does the government take from that citizen every year in the shape of taxation? It is perfectly proper to argue—as our friend the Minister of Finance and our friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce did the other day—that there are certain expenditures of the government, on railways, on postal service, on the Yukon, which are recouped; that you pay out a certain sum of money and for services rendered to the country you receive a certain amount of money in return.

But there is one portion of the revenue of the government which is not given in return for any services rendered by it except of course the service of maintaining the government of the country. Now, the figures of the Year-book, supplemented for last year by the figures given by the Minister of Finance, show that although Canada may perhaps, in this period of great prosperity, be able to bear heavy taxation, without feeling the load very much or showing any distress, yet there can be no question that the taxation of the people under the present administration is steadily mounting upwards. Since 1896 the taxation of the people of Canada per head has been as follows:—

Year	Customs	Excise.	Total.
1896..	$3 87	$1 55	$5 42
1897..	3 76	1 77	5 53
1898..	4 14	1 50	5 64
1899..	4 77	1 81	6 58
1900..	5 28	1 83	7 11

And in 1901, taking the figures given by the Minister of Finance in the budget speech, and dividing them by the population as given by the latest census returns, the total taxation—I have not separated customs and excise in this case—amounts to $7.21 per head. That means an increase of 33⅓ per cent in the per capita taxation of the people of this country over that of 1896.

I do not mean for a moment to say that the country cannot bear this taxation. The country unquestionably is bearing it. But I think it might not perhaps be amiss once more—although to the government this may be an oft-told and not very welcome tale—to recall to the House and the country the fact that the hon. gentlemen now administering the affairs of Canada, under whose control the expenditure and the taxation have advanced to the figures I have quoted, are of the same party who in opposition denounced taxation and condemned every increase of the debt, and maintained that if they were returned to power they would reduce the expenditure of Canada by two, three, four or five millions of dollars per year. I do not know that the government would have acted very wisely if they had endeavoured to carry out this prediction when they came to power. Unquestionably this matter received consideration at their first council meeting, and renewed consideration at subsequent council meetings; and there can be no doubt that the collective wisdom which has ruled Canada since 1896 decided emphatically that it would not be in the best interests of the government itself, whatever might be the case with the people of Canada, to endeavour to carry out that programme which they sought to force on the Conservative administration which preceded them. On the contrary, they have entered upon a course of very rapidly increasing expenditure. There are some directions in which perhaps this increased expenditure might be justified. The country requires public works and development; let us admit that; and when is it to get these public works and this development if not at a time when the revenue is buoyant? But the fact cannot be lost sight of that the controllable, the routine expenditure of the country in every department shows an increase which is utterly unjustifiable. In those matters in respect to which a close economy would make itself felt, it is only too apparent that no economy whatever is being exercised by the government of the day.

A great many of the matters which have been touched upon in the budget speech and in the various replies to it are of a more or less routine character. There are a great many other matters which have not been touched upon in the budget speech this year which I would have liked very much to have heard something about from the administration. One great and important question which is attracting a great deal of attention in this House and throughout Canada, on which the government has not made any statement or given any information is the tariff question. But there are other matters engaging the attention of the country on which I had hoped something would have been said in the budget speech. There are the enormous and important interests which could be developed by a closer trade and perhaps closer political connection betwen the Dominion of Canada and the West Indian Islands. To my mind confederation will never be rounded or complete until that day comes when all the British possessions on the North American continent and the islands adjacent thereto shall come under one government. Then, the question of bringing Newfoundland into the confederation is one than which I am sure nothing could be more important. But we have no mention of either of these very important matters in the budget speech. It may be that some effort is being made to develop the trade of this country with Newfoundland, and to bring that portion of the British empire, which must remain under the control of a friendly power, within our political limits. If so, there is no mention of it in the budget speech. For those who are aware of the uncomfortable and deplorable situation in which Canada finds itself with regard to the Alaskan frontier, it is easy to realize what the awful consequences would be if the control of Newfoundland, lying at the mouth of the St. Lawrence and holding the keys to Canada, should pass into the hands of a power not friendly to ourselves. It may possibly be a very difficult matter to secure the admission of Newfoundland into the confederation ; but it is a matter of such great importance that to my mind all succeeding administrations in Canada should devote to that object a large part of their attention, and should never rest without using every available means to bring it about. Then, how complete would the inclusion of the West Indies make us as a people. We have everything which a northern people might desire—enormous resources of the mine, extensive forests, great wheat fields; we can produce every product of the temperate zone in abundance ; but there are products which we cannot produce, but which the West India islands could supply us with in abundance. We would be as completely self-supporting as the United States, with all the advantages it has in possessing the southern states. The only reference in the budget speech that might indirectly be supposed to affect the question of policy regarding the West India islands is the reference to the question of a bounty on beet root sugar. The Finance Minister did not commit himself at all to any such scheme and I think in this he did well. To my mind it is far more important to devote our energies to affording the West India islands relief by accepting from them, free of duty if necessary, their sugar or by such reciprocal arrangements as would leave to them the profit of producing the sugar required in the Dominion and encourage them to look towards this country for a political alliance.

However, the great question of interest in the budget speech was the trade question. There was no doubt a great deal of anxiety in the country to know whether the government would make any changes in the tariff: And until the hon. Finance Minister finally informed the House that there would be no tariff changes this year, considerable uncertainty as to whether the government was going to change its attitude on the tariff question or not. A review of our history will satisfy any reasonable man that the tariff question has been, and is likely to continue for some time, the great question at issue in this country. If I have not read history amiss, the various changes of government which have occurred in Canada since confederation have largely turned on the tariff policy of the government. The first defeat of a Canadian administration, since confederation, occurred in 1872, over the policy of the government of Sir John Macdonald in building the Canadian Pacific Railway. But it must be borne in mind that at that time political parties in Canada had not settled down into the well-defined position in which we find them to-day. The first government after confederation was a coalition one, and many of the men who supported Sir John Macdonald and his Conservative administration were not Conservatives by tradition, history and party feeling, but men who had been dislodged from their fixed places by the coalition necessary to bring about confederation. With such supporters, the administration of Sir John Macdonald was not so strong as it would have been, if he had been supported by a phalanx of men who had been associated with him on party lines, and the cause of his defeat undoubtedly was the very large defections which took place from the ranks of his supporters—a defection for which no parallel can be found in the history of Canada, either in the central parliament or any of the provincial legislatures. This defeat of the Conservative chieftain restored the two parties to their old positions and arrayed them fairly against each other. What was the issue which then divided the two parties and on which the fate of each was decided ? The information given us the other night by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) goes to show that at the time there was a certain openness to conviction in the minds of both Liberals and Conservatives on the question of the tariff. Generally speaking, in the ranks of Mr. Mackenzie's supporters were men who would have welcomed a change in the direction of protection, and among whom considerable dissatisfaction was created when the Finance Minister announced that no tariff changes would be made. The Mackenzie government was made up almost exclusively, as far as its leading members are concerned, of men who had been actively engaged in the political contests in the upper provinces of Canada, such as the hon. member for South Oxford (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), the Hon. Edward Blake, Mr. Mackenzie, aided by that great power outside the House, Mr. Brown, who largely directed the Liberal party of that day. These gentlemen had been accustomed in the upper provinces to a certain degree of protection. They had been accustomed to a 20 per cent tariff, whereas from the lower provinces there was a band of free traders, to whom the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) attributed that change of purpose which led Mr. Mackenzie to nail his free trade flag to the mast. In the lower provinces practically free trade prevailed. My native province of Nova Scotia knew only a 10 per cent tariff, and never, until the construction of railways was deemed necessary in that province, was such a thing as the raising of the tariff looked upon except with the greatest disfavour. We were an agricultural, fishing and mining people. We had no manufactures and were not aware that we needed any, and certainly the idea of protection might well have been expected to find a place much more readily in the minds of that array of men of ability who formed the Mackenzie cabinet, and who came from the upper provinces, than among the men who came from the lower provinces, and who composed, to a large extent, the opposition led by Sir John Macdonald at that time. The government of Mr. Mackenzie decided, in view of this free trade sentiment in the lower provinces, to stand by its so-called free trade policy. It had advanced the duties from 15 per cent to 16⅔ per cent and then to 17½ per cent, finding that the lower rate was not sufficient to furnish the revenues required for carrying on the business of the country. But that was not at all a position acceptable to the men who held that the time had come when protection was required. The tariff then in existence was held out to the country as a revenue tariff, which probably it was. It gave no encouragement to the manufacturers, and the result was that the Mackenzie government, instead of being sustained by a majority of sixty, found itself in opposition with a majority of sixty against it. The Canadian people evidently decided most positively that, in their opinion, a certain measure of protection was necessary.

Now, from 1878, when the government of Mr. Mackenzie was defeated, until 1896, when the government of Sir Charles Tupper was defeated, there was a constant keeping of that trade question to the front. Those who spoke on behalf of the Liberal party may have varied their statements, but throughout that time they constantly maintained that they were in favour of free trade. In consequence of the fact that they seemed to think they could gain advantage for their party, and, perhaps press their opponents somewhat closely by exaggerating the importance of the trade which might be done between Canada and the United States, in consequence of the extraordinary stress which they laid upon the feature of the matter, in consequence of the fact that they pressed home the view that the trade of the United States was worth a great deal more to Canada than the trade of the mother country or any other part of the world, it came about that they were led on step by step, until finally their programme was not free trade alone, but it was a policy which would give to us trade with the other part of this continent, trade that, while giving us access to the markets of the United States, would practically make us one people with the people of the United States. And that was so far pressed by these gentlemen that, in 1891, Edward Blake, who had been their leader, withdrew from them, on the ground that such a policy as was advocated and pressed upon the people of Canada by these gentlemen, if adopted, could not fail to be the precursor of political union. Now, why did these hon. gentlemen attach such enormous importance to the trade that this country might do with the United States as compared with that it might do with Great Britain or any other country under the sun? It seems to me, in the light of events as we now know them, that they were endeavouring to gain a certain advantage in the struggle they were carrying on against Sir John Macdonald. But, knowing, as they probably did then, and as they certainly do now, that any kind of fair trade arrangement with the United States was impossible of accomplishment, that no trade arrangement could be affected with that country without our surrendering our commercial and even our political liberties, they felt that Sir John Macdonald never could make an arrangement with the United States that would be acceptable to the people of Canada. Therefore, they insisted and charged home upon the government of that day that it was their fault that they did not succeed in effecting a reciprocity treaty. They attributed this failure not to the unwillingness of the American people and government but to the maladroitness of the Conservative administration because it asserted Canadian commercial independence and spoke in no submissive terms through representatives it sent to Washington. It was stated by these gentlemen that, when they came into power and sent men to Washington who would show the legislators and statesmen of the United States that there were men in Canada who were friends of that country, the United States would be ready to effect a trade arrangement that would be desirable for Canada. That is my surmise as to why the gentlemen who are now in power, and who were then in opposition laid enormous stress upon the importance and the absolute necessity of securing some reciprocal arrangement with the people of the United States. That is why they were willing—so far as man could judge—to place the fiscal affairs of Canada absolutely in the hands of the people of the United States. Because, as was well observed by Mr. Blake, there could be no question what the result would be when the representatives of Canada and the representatives of the United States sat down to frame a tariff for the two countries—it would be an American tariff and a tariff favourable to the United States, a tariff which would give the United States the trade of Canada, while excluding the trade of the mother country. Now the time has come—and passed, I may say—when this administration has had an opportunity of showing whether or not it was right in its estimate of American public men, and whether or not those gentlemen would be ready, if approached in what the government held to be a proper spirit, to accept the overtures of Canada and give us a fair measure of trade. We know that the government sent its ablest men, including the leader of the government himself, to Washington. And these hon. gentlemen have come here and confessed absolute, complete and unqualified failure in respect of that matter, and have said, that so far as they were concerned there was no occasion to resume the sittings of that joint commission, that they expected nothing further from it and, in fact, did not desire to resume negotiations at all. Thus we have come to the point where the leader of the government, having failed to do that which he insisted the government of Sir John Macdonald could do, and being shut out from the market which he and his lieutenants for eighteen years proclaimed was the one thing necessary for Canada, now the hour has arrived when we have a right to ask of that right hon. gentleman if, being unable to secure that arrangement of the United States which he maintained he could effect, what is he going to do about the situation of affairs in this country and between this country and the United States? That state of affairs has been described on two occasions in the course of this session, as carefully and truly, and, possibly with as much completeness as could be expected of a gentleman who sat on that high commission, a gentleman who is an American by birth and whose business interests have led him to become familiar not only with the business situation in Canada, but with the business situation in the United States. And that hon. gentleman tells us that the situation to-day is intolerable for Canada. Therefore, we ask, what is the government going to do about it? We have reached the point when some decision must be come to by those who are in a position to give a decision—the government of Canada. Now, what do we see occurring not only in this House but in the country as well? We see this question which, as I have said, has been one of the great questions from the time Canada became a nation, which has been the maker and unmaker of governments in the past, we see that question pressing to the front. Now, the government of the day has not made any great or fundamental changes in the tariff and—to their great credit be it said—has continued, in the main, the tariff as it was before. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) said of himself the other day, they have not treated the manufacturers unfairly, and are prepared, when the matter comes up for consideration, to take into account their interests and wants in a friendly way. But, that is not enough. The hour has come when the representatives of Canada in this House are of opinion that a step forward should be taken. The government that rules Canada to-day, it appears, is not a free trade government, and is not prepared to adopt that revenue tariff on which it appealed to the people in 1896. Of the quality and nature of that revenue tariff these gentlemen cannot be in doubt, because they were most explicit in defining it, declaring that they appealed to the people to support a revenue tariff such as they have in England. These gentlemen, it appears, are not prepared to give this country a revenue tariff such as they have in England, a tariff which would admit the manufactures of every country, which would lighten the burdens of the working people as much as possible, will make food cheap, will admit the wheat of every country free, and manufactures and all products of every country free, that will rely for a revenue to carry on the affairs of the country upon a tariff, imposing such duties upon such articles of general consumption as will furnish the government the money to carry on the affairs of the country while as little as possible disturbing any industry and the balance between industries.

I say if the government of Canada to-day is not prepared to live up to the programme with which they went to the people of Canada in 1896, and upon which presumably they secured a verdict, and returned to power, then I say the time has come when it is necessary that we should have such a resolution as that moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and when we should have a declared policy. So far as we on this side of the House are concerned, we are free to say that we desire a policy that shall declare and shall establish such a system of protection as will sustain and protect every industry in Canada to-day, and will, as rapidly as possible, develop within our country such industries as are likely to succeed in it; and that as soon as possible Canada shall, in the matter of manufacturing, supply all her own wants, and shall buy as little as possible from the outside world.

Now a great many speeches have been made in the course of this debate which have touched upon the question of protection, and they have done so in such a fashion as to show that almost without exception members on both sides of this House are protectionists. They are not, some of them, prepared to protect everything, but there is not one man among them who has not declared himself ready to protect every interest in which his constituents are more particularly concerned. Every one of them is prepared to adopt the principle of protection, if I may except my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Edwards). I do not know that I could except him; if I had an opportunity to know his business interests as well as he knows them, possibly I might find that there was even in his case a nigger in the fence. But be that as it may, there can be no question that the speeches made in this House in the course of this debate have been those that might have been made by men who believed in protection. The hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) said the other night, and he reiterated his statement, 'I am a protectionist.' It is true he was one of a somewhat peculiar kind, he was of that brand which, I may say, is largely to be found on the other side of the House. He was prepared to protect everything that his constituents wanted protected, but nothing more. He would stand up for protection to labour, for the exclusion of cheap labour from the country. Now that is a very high form, in one sense, of protection. But every man who has spoken on this subject except the hon. member for Russell, is in favour of some kind of protection. Possibly the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), if he had spoken, might have opposed it, I do not know what declaration he would have made. But throughout the whole of this discussion it is perfectly clear that we are all protectionists, as it was many times in a former parliament, when this question came up, and when man after man who was arrayed against the Conservative government and who was nominally a free trader, was himself ready at once to stand up for protection to those interests in which his constituents were particularly interested, as did the late member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), for a most extravagant protection to coal oil, and as did the hon. member for Queens, Sir Louis Davies, who now graces the bench of this country, and who could not for a moment think of withdrawing that protection which was necessary to the pork industry of his native province. Throughout the whole of this discussion it has become clear that we are practically all in favour of protection.

Now then why should not this government take us more fully into their confidence and inform us as to what they are going to do. They did certainly furnish us with one or two good reasons why we should delay a little to press the question at this time. They suggested that in a short time a conference would take place in London where this, and perhaps some other questions, would be discussed at great length, and it would be better that the representative of Canada should go to a certain extent with a free hand. They furthermore suggest that the results of the census might to a certain extent affect the conclusions to which they might come. But on the whole I am pleased indeed to observe that not only the supporters of the government but the members of the government themselves, so far as they have spoken, have not altogether discouraged the idea that they are going to move onward in this matter, and give to Canada a more perfect and more comprehensive system of protection than that we have to-day; although I am prepared to say this as a protectionist, that I am not altogether disposed to find much fault in the gross with the present system, which is very fair in its effects, and it has done a great deal to maintain the interests of this country.

Now the question as to what the government will do upon this matter is one of the very highest importance to us, and it is dealt with by the resolution moved by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. That resolution voices the fact that to a certain extent the people of Canada, as represented by the opposition in this House at least, are not altogether satisfied with the condition of affairs that we find in Canada to-day. We cannot make the assertion that Canada has no protection. Many industries have adequate protection probably; but there are some industries which have no adequate protection, there are some industries in Canada to-day which languish, there are factories which are closed, and there is no reason why such a state of things should exist. If we are going to have protection at all, then let it be such as is called for in the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition, one which, in the first place, declares protection to be the declared policy of the government, and secondly, that it shall be adequate and sufficient protection. Now in respect to free trade with the United States, it is perfectly clear from the figures given us in the course of this debate by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that we have not sufficient protection. That hon. gentleman makes the statement that no less than $22,000,000 of manufactures are coming into Canada from the United States every year, that pay no duties. If that be the case, then it seems to me that there is a large field in which the government might very well move, within which it might carry out such a system as it has in force in reference to other industries, and might secure and retain for the people of this country the privilege of manufacturing that large amount of goods which are imported.

However, so far as we have gone, I, as a protectionist, I have no great reason to be discouraged by the attitude of the government. The hon. Minister of Finance was of course non-committal, as I presume he should be; but at the same time he rather held out the hope that after certain preliminaries had been completed we should then have a revision of the tariff in which all industries, particularly all industries requiring care or assistance, should receive that assistance at his hands. Even the Minister of Trade and Commerce who used to fulminate so loudly and so fiercely against protection, was certainly much more moderate and much milder on this occasion than he used to be. His language was not at all threatening, in fact he was apparently so au fait with the system of protection that in a most cavalier fashion he tendered his services to the leader of the opposition, and proffered his assistance, assuring him he would give him two or three lessons on the subject of protection which would enable him to produce any kind of tariff whatever that Canada might want. This is not a cause of surprise, because we have reason to know from the revelations made at one time or another, that unless we are very much mistaken and misinformed, that hon. gentleman did, upon one occasion at least, prepare and complete a protective tariff for the use of the Dominion of Canada. Now, however, while he will not go further than to tender his services to the leader of the opposition in a somewhat jocose fashion, he has not said anything at all that would give the members of the manufacturing fraternity in Canada very great concern. He has spoken to them in a very kindly fashion indeed. He says to them of course you have been very well off, and you cannot deny that. As he has said himself he has, at sometimes, been looked upon as an enemy to the manufacturers of Canada, but, he has not proved to be such a bad enemy after all. He has treated them with a fair amount of kindness, and, reading between the lines, I have every reason to hope and to believe that the government of the day is prepared, in so far as this question is concerned, to adopt a policy which will be in keeping with its conduct since it came into power, and give us a system of adequate protection which it will avow openly to be its policy.

There are one or two points to which I wish to make reference in connection with this question of protection which came up repeatedly in the course of the discussion before the House. It has been repeated that you cannot protect certain interests, that you cannot protect the farmer, the miner, or the fisherman. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) reduced that matter to an absurdity by proposing what he called a very moderate scheme of protection to the farmers which might involve an expenditure of $50,000,000. Those who have taken that line have thought that some power in Canada might have to be given to us to impose a system of protection upon the farmers, the fishermen, the miners and producing bodies. What power can be conceived of in this country that would be in a position to impose its will upon the classes I have just enumerated? There can be no question at all of the fact that power in Canada is in the hands of those very classes. If that power is not entirely in the hands of the farmers, the miners and the fishermen, if they should think, or if they should conceive that their interests, or their welfare, were in danger there can be no question whatever that without the consent of these great classes we could never have any policy of any kind. And you could certainly never have a protective policy in Canada. To make such a statement as that seems to be begging the whole question. If these great producing classes are not to be benefited by protection in the limited form in which we speak of it in this discussion, which means particularly protection to the manufacturers for the purpose of developing the manufacturing industries of the country, if you cannot secure the assent of these great producing classes to the proposition which benefits them by developing the manufacturing interests of the country, thereby adding to the welfare of these great producing classes, if you cannot succeed in doing that, then it would be hopeless and absurd to suggest any policy of protection in any country whatever. But, the view held by every one who is in favour of protection in a proper and limited sense is that while its particular advantages are directed towards the establishment of manufacturers, by the establishment of such manufacturers you add directly to the welfare and revenue of these great producing classes in the country. The system has other advantages as well. You diversify your interests you introduce a great variety of interests, a great variety of employments into the country and you develop a very much more highly organized, progressive and advanced community in that way. That, perhaps, is not a sufficiently practical argument with which to appeal to people who work for their bread, who till the farms, who net our seas, and who mine our minerals. The great argument that has always succeeded in persuading the people to accept protection in the past and it will induce them to accept it in future, if I am not mistaken, is that by developing a manufacturing population in the country they add value to every dollar's worth of the products which they gather from the bountiful hands of nature. How much would be gained by the farmers of the North-west Territories, if, instead of having to send their wheat to the British market, where it competes with wheat grown by the coolie labour of India, they could have that wheat sold in Canada in the form of bread to the men whose wages have risen, as they have in almost every country where manufacturing industries are developed, to the highest possible point? We find that in every country in which manufactures are highly developed that instead of the working classes being depressed or injured, the wage earner is the man who, in the end, has the advantage and that no matter how prices of commodities may fluctuate in all these countries wages go upwards and upwards steadily and in the end it is the workingman who has the advantage, to whom in all cases is the residuary advantage given. If you can give us a market in Canada as the United States have now furnished, to a great extent, a market in the New England states for a large portion of the wheat produced in the western districts, if you can provide a market in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario, in which the wheat of the North-west Territories would be consumed instead of being exported, can there be any question that you would add many cents a bushel to every bushel of grain that the North-west farmer garners ? There can be no question about it. If you cannot propound such a system of protection in a democratic country like this in which every man has control of his own interests I say it would be futile to suggest such a policy of protection. Instead of the mass of the people being injured by the protective tariff retained in force until 1896, I say that they were benefited by their own act because they maintained it in power. It must be remembered that since 1878, however those other questions and subordinate interests that were presented to the electors might change from time to time, the great and important and over-ruling question in all cases, so far as the government of Sir John Macdonald and his successors was then concerned, was the question of the maintenance of the national policy intact and on that policy upon which he in successive years appealed to the people, in every successive election, until his death, he was sustained by the voice of the people, not by the votes of the cities, at all, but by the support of the agricultural counties, the fishing counties and the mining counties. He did not rely when he was returned to power, as far as the returns go to show, on the votes of the manufacturing classes, but he was returned to power by the unanimous voice of the people of Canada.

In the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), as presented to the House, it is held that there is a certain amount of contradictions. The argument has been put forward by the other side of the House that, whereas, in its first portion it appeals for a system of adequate protection of the industries of Canada and for the maintenance of the Canadian market for Canadian products, that in so far as it later on suggests a preference within the empire there is involved a contradiction. I cannot see that this is a legitimate argument. It might as well be held that during all the years in which the United States has been a highly protective country there has been an inconsistency in that policy in going to South American governments and to a certain extent of listening to the overtures of Canada in the direction of reciprocity. There is no inconsistency to my mind, in the matter at all. In fact, it would rather appear as if reciprocity were the necessary and natural incident of a protective tariff. Without a protective tariff you could practically get no reciprocity. Lord Salisbury, himself, in speaking of the position of England in dealing with this matter, said that England has nothing to offer, that England has nothing to exchange. England, which is a free trade country has given everything to the countries with which it might enter negotiations and has nothing to offer, whereas, the country which has adopted a protective tariff has something to offer. It has concessions to make. It is entirely within its power to make such a treaty of reciprocity with any other country as would involve a letting down, to a certain extent, of the barriers put up in the way of trade and as would confer a certain amount of advantage on the country with which it was negotiating. I am prepared to recognize that there are very great difficulties in the way of working out a satisfactory preference within the British empire. At the same time it would be a very foolish thing on the part of the government of Canada, or the people of Canada, or the parliament of Canada, to, for a moment admit, that such a thing cannot be accomplished. There were in operation a few years ago the Belgian and German treaties; treaties which Canada had for years asked should be denounced; treaties which were discussed at the Inter-colonial conference here ; treaties whose denunciation had been pressed upon the Imperial government, and which the Imperial government in the most formal fashion on the report of one of its leading statesmen refused to denounce. Yet, although it seemed, up to the last moment, that the denunciation of these treaties was a concession that would not be made, the time came when by pressure of circumstances it was made. These treaties are now denounced and business is readjusting itself very rapidly and it is very difficult to say that any interest in Canada has suffered in consequence thereof—except that we may perhaps suffer somewhat from the unfriendly attitude of the German government.

I maintain that in the same way, it is going to be possible for our colonial governments of Australia and Canada, and that government which we may hope to see soon established at the Cape, working in concert with the British government, to devise some method by which there may be a system of preferential trade within the empire. The simplest way in which that could be done is the way which I suppose we would not accept at all; that is, to adopt the suggestion made by one of the British statesmen and enact free trade within the empire. I do not know that his suggestion was exactly that, but it was, I think, that all the colonies should adopt free trade. Of course, in order to do that it would be necessary for Canada to repudiate that policy which has been maintained by successive governments in this country, not only by the Conservative government but by the Liberal government which succeeded. I should think, that would be entirely out of the question. The great difficulty that lies in the way of accomplishing a preference within the empire, unquestionably must lie in the fact that Great Britain is so confirmed in her belief apparently, that free trade such as she has to-day, is that which best suits her interests; that we can scarcely expect the mother country, with her experience, with the enormous measure of prosperity she has enjoyed under free trade, to abandon that system even if it could be shown that it would very largely be in the interest of her colonies for her to do so. The men who have charge of these matters in England have always treated this question on a business principle. They have balanced the trade which they might hope to develop with the colonies, against that enormous trade which they do with the rest of the world, and so far they always seem to have made up their mind that whatever they might hope to gain from the colonies they would more than lose in some other direction. That is perhaps the proper view for a British statesman to take. I have always been disposed to think, that when we were in this country discussing protection, as we did in 1878; and when the argument was advanced that protection was not a good thing because we should follow the example of the mother country and adopt free trade under which Great Britain has achieved such enormous success; had risen to such a position among the nations of the world, outranking beyond all comparison the others, and being facile princeps in the world from a manufacturing and commercial point of view—it always seemed to me that such an argument as that was absolutely out of the question so far as we were concerned. There was little reason to doubt that a country which had commenced her manufacturing career as a protective country and had with skill, courage, boldness among her seafaring population obtained control of all the seas, had shown that capacity for commerce which was evidenced by the enormous development of her trading companies—for instance the East India Company—I say that it always seemed to me that that country had laid sure and fast the foundation of her industries during a period of protection, and that now was ready to come into the arena armed at all points with success, braced, strengthened and fortified, with capital abundant; it always seemed to me that it was naturally the most obvious thing in the world for Great Britain to invite other countries to come into the free trade arena with her, because there she was a Triton amongst the minnows, without any opponents. There was neither industry, nor experience, nor capital elsewhere in the world that could compete with her. The consequence was that the countries which did engage in this free trade dance with Great Britain did very soon find that they were paying the piper. But, the case of Great Britain is not ours; was not ours in 1878 when we adopted the protective system; is not ours to-day. Those other countries which did listen to the blandishments of Great Britain and did endeavour to compete with her under free trade conditions; where are they to-day? Have they continued the merry dance? Each one of them has had good reasons to change its opinion. Each one is now as rapidly as possible withdrawing from that position into which it was led, and as rapidly as possible placing itself in the position in which Great Britain was when she commenced her career. They are pressing Great Britain as hard as they can in the markets of the world, and are taking advantage of her adherence to her old system in her own markets, and are closing their markets absolutely against her. Under those circumstances it cannot be expected that for some time to come—although the date may not be so far distant as at this moment it seems—it cannot be expected that Great Britain should reverse or much modify her free trade system. She believes it is the best for her and very possibly it is the best for her, situated as she is. And so long as it is so, it is better in the interest of the empire; it is better in our interest (to the great extent to which we rely upon the support and protection of that great country); it is better for us all that she should maintain that course which would keep her at the zenith of her power and wealth and prestige. But, if we are to concede to the mother country that right; if we are going to justify in her the course by which she shapes her policy, by the rule that she shall do that which is best for her own people living within her own borders; then I say unquestionably, following her example, it is our duty as component parts of the empire—even looking at it as an Imperial matter—to develop our country and to follow that course of policy in this country which will give us the greatest possible gain, advantage, and development in the Canada in which we are living.

It seems perfectly clear that every component part of the empire, even regarding it from an Imperial standpoint, can best serve the interests of all, can best strengthen that great and world-wide empire which we recognize to-day, by each within its own sphere, under that policy which is best adapted to it, developing its powers, its wealth, its resources, and its population. So far we must stand firmly upon the principle that Canada must be for the Canadians, and that we cannot in respect of such a matter as the convenience of the mother country give such a preference as will imperil, or injure, or weaken, in any respect our own industrial life. The highest and truest loyalty to the mother country and to the empire of which she is the head, requires that. And, if in the concessions we have made in this trade matter, we have made the mistake of having gone so far as to have weakened Canada's resources in any respect whatever, then it is our duty, in so far as it is possible, to correct that mistake.

I am not going to argue for a moment that it is not rather a difficult matter, that the administration having made the concessions it has made to the mother country, having made a straight cut in the duty of 33⅓ per cent, and having received a great deal of credit, and to a certain extent the warm thanks of the mother country for that act—I am not going to say that it is not difficult, while giving this 33⅓ per cent, to raise the tariff so high that the 33⅓ per cent will not be sufficient to serve the purpose of developing the trade of the mother country with us. I will not say that it is not going to be difficult to take away with one hand what you have given with the other. I am always free to believe that in this matter our government has made the mistake of being too generous, and did not in the full realize, as it now does, the consequence of it.

I presume that we must stand where we are as far as that is concerned, but not with respect to any other country in the world. If this preference, having been given is not to be withdrawn—although I would fain see it withdrawn if it has done injury to any Canadian interest—I maintain that with respect to the United States, which has profited so much by our trade, it is the duty of the Canadian administration to raise the tariff to such a point that our own people will be protected in their own markets and will not be beaten in those markets by their American competitors. I do not of course know what the intention of the government was in giving the preference to Great Britain. I presume that it was to acquire a certain amount of the gratitude of the mother country. I presume that the premier of Canada had no objection to become a persona grata to the people of the mother country ; and I dare say it has been worth all it may have cost us, to have placed ourselves in a position to ascertain—that is where I see the great value of the preference—the fact that a preferential can be given within the empire. The right hon. gentleman has established that ; and the preferential having been given, can it not be extended ? I admit that it is a matter of extreme difficulty. I admit that the adjustment of the relations between all the colonies and the mother country will involve considerations which cannot be dealt with in a hurry. But I maintain that they can be dealt with, and I maintain that it is the duty of the government of Canada to see that our tariff is so changed and modified that it will secure the Canadian markets for ourselves while at the same time giving a preference within our markets to every other part of the empire. It is too late in the day to enter upon a discussion that would be at all exhaustive as to the manner in which that object would be effected, but it seems to me that it can never be effected by giving a straight cut of one-fourth or one-third off the customs duties of the country. The industries of the country are so involved with one another, our commercial relations are so intimate, you shake so many portions of the edifice of our tariff when you touch one of them, that such a tariff as I am suggesting could only be arrived at by having an exhaustive examination of all imports, all the industries, and all those innumerable circumstances which affect the flow of commerce. Then, we should have in this country a maximum and a minimum tariff. Every item of the tariff should be dealt with separately, and should be so adjusted that we would maintain to the greatest possible extent the trade of Canada for the Canadian people, and at the same time develop in every possible way the commerce between the other colonies of the empire and ourselves, and between the mother country and ourselves. That, it seems to me, is not an impossible thing, although it involves great difficulty. But let us hope that after the premier has had the conference which he is to have with representatives of the other colonies and with the leading public men of the empire at the approaching coronation, he will be able to report to the people of Canada that if no elaborate scheme has been developed, sufficient progress has been made to justify him in announcing that the day is not far distant when such a result may be attained.

In the discussion on this budget a great deal of interest has been attached to the criticism of the census figures in which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce indulged. I was sorry that my hon. friend dealt so harshly with one of the standard publications of the government. After my hon. friend the leader of the opposition had informed the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that he placed some reliance on the official Year-book of the government, in which respect I thought the leader of the opposition was only paying a compliment which was due to hon. gentlemen opposite, he was, I presume rather discomfited by the manner in which the Minister of Trade and Commerce threw a great deal of doubt on the accuracy of the figures contained in that book, and rather discredited the publication. Having been in the habit of relying on the figures of this publication, I was somewhat astonished at finding that the government continued to publish a work which contained so many errors, and were willing to lead the members of this House and the citizens of Canada generally so far astray. I was not less surprised when I came to look at the figures of the Year-book to find that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had done scant justice, if justice at all, to the compiler of that volume. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said :—

The Year-book may be a very valuable document. I will give a few illustrations of what the Year-book was worth a little while ago. I remember that this same document—I thought that that was what my hon. friend referred to—estimated, in 1887, that the population of Canada was 4,856,226. In 1888 the Year-book's estimation of the population of Canada was 4,946,497. In 1899, it had risen to 5,075,855. They suppressed 1890 and 1891, but I will carry out the calculation. On the same line of calculation, the Year-book would have given us a population of 5,210,000 for 1890, and 5,345,000 for 1891—just ten years ahead of time. These are the 'official statistics' that the hon. gentleman relied upon for the purpose of contradicting what, as I shall show presently, was a very well-reasoned hypothesis on the part of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding).

Mr. Fielding's hypothesis being that Canada had increased in population as much in the last five years, from 1896 to 1901, as it had done in the preceding fifteen years. Now, I always like to do justice as far as possible ; and, where an accusation is made, especially against an unpretending volume, which has no tongue except those silent ones which are found in its pages, I like to see whether there is any reason to doubt the accuracy of the statements made. Comparing the figures given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with those of the Year-book, I have discovered some surprising discrepancies. The hon. minister says that the Year-book gives the population of Canada in 1887 as 4,856,226. But I find, on referring to the Year-book, that it gives the population of that year as 4,638,109. Then, in 1881, the hon. minister said that the year book gives the population as 4,946,497, but I find that it gives it as 4,688,147. In 1889, the hon. minister says that, according to the Year-book, the population of Canada was 5,075,855, but I find, on referring to that same book, that it gives the population as only 4,739,617.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. What copy is my hon. friend quoting from ?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). The edition of 1900.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend had better quote the volume that I quoted from.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Perhaps the hon. Minister will be kind enough to lay his volume on the table so that we may all see it. Then the minister went on to say that in 1890 the year-book, for some reason or other, suppressed the figures, and he supplied the figures himself. He said that the population of Canada during that year, according to the process of figuring adopted by the year-book, was 5,210,000. But I find that the year-book gives the population as 4,792,605. In 1891, the hon. gentleman represents the Year-book as giving our population at 5,345,000—ten years too soon, as he said—but I find that it gives the population as 4,846,377. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is therefore out in his count as follows :—

1889..	336,000

And in 1900, when he supplied the figures off his own bat, he is out 417,000, and in 1891, 498,623.

I think it but right to call the attention of the minister to these facts, and the only reason I can suggest for the discrepancies, is that possibly he may have discovered some edition of the year-book not issued for general use.

But my hon. friend was not satisfied with simply discrediting the year-book. He proceeded to discredit every one who had anything whatever to do with the taking of the census in 1891. He attributed motives, in the most reckless and unlimited fashion, to every one who had anything to do with it. He told us that when the census of 1891 was taken the Conservative party was in a discreditable position, and that the enumerators were presumably men in close contact with the powers at Ottawa who knew that Sir John Macdonald's government was in a desperate position and that it was necessary to place before the people census returns which would show that the national policy had been a success. Now, what possible connection could the census of 1891 have had with the election which was run by the Conservative party under Sir John Macdonald in that year. The general election took place on the 5th March, 1891, and the census enumerators were not appointed until April, 1891. And so far from Sir John Macdonald having been in a desperate position then, we find that the very first division in the House of Commons, after that general election, gave him a majority of 29, which was increased at every subsequent by election, until at the end of the term beginning 1891, the Conservative party had a majority in this House of 46.

I think my hon. friend will find it rather difficult to atone for his strictures with respect to the census of 1891. According to him Canada is not at all a desirable place for immigrants and he should not be surprised if they do not come in greater numbers. If it be correct that some 2,500 enumerators in 1891,—there were 5,000 last year, violated their solemn oath, we must conclude that perjurers are as common in this country as black flies in May. Not only have the enumerators, according to the hon. gentleman, violated their oath, but so have the commissioners and the other census officials, every one of whom was sworn to do his duty faithfully and make no return which was not absolutely correct.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce deliberately asks the people of Canada to believe that you can find in this country, in every province, enumerators who are willing and ready to perjure themselves simply to serve the purposes of the administration of the day. I think that is the most monstrous charge that was ever made by any public man in Canada. Judging by the lengths to which the hon. gentleman had gone when in opposition in extravagant denunciation of his opponents, almost anything might have been expected of him, but this last outrage against the people is by far the worst of all, and the matter will not be allowed to rest there.

The hon. gentleman caused an investigation to be made in the province of Quebec into the taking of the census of 1891. Judging from the return which has been laid upon the Table, the government put it in the hon. gentleman's power, or the power of the commissioner who acted for him, to violate public confidence by disclosing private information given to the census enumerators in the belief that the confidential nature of this information would be respected. The evidence of this is to be seen in the documents placed upon the Table the other day. These schedules have been taken from the custody of the census officer and have been exposed to the public. I will read a paragraph from the one for the county of Bagot :—

> The stuffing in the town of Acton Vale and in the parish of St. André of Acton, is still larger, and the evidence of it is absolutely undeniable.
> Mr. J. E. Marcil, M.P., for Bagot, is residing in Acton Vale for the last forty years, and for thirty years he has been engaged in business, either as a clerk or as a merchant. He has consequently, opportunity of knowing every one in the locality. Mr. Marcil examined in our office the schedules of 1891, and has pointed out to us the names of those who had left the town of Acton Vale for the parish of St. Andre of Acton many years previous to the census of ten years ago.

These schedules, collected by the census officers in 1891, contained information entrusted to them by the people of Canada under the seal of confidence. But, for party purposes, they have been hawked about and exposed to the gaze of all and sundry, in order to discredit the census of 1891. It will not do for the government to leave this matter where it is. If there is to be an investigation, it will not do to have that investigation held by an officer of the government; it must be held by a commission of men whose reputation shall be beyond reproach or question. And not only the census of 1891 must be inquired into, but the census of 1901 also. And, indeed, in order to a thorough investigation, perhaps the census of 1881 and the census of 1871, if investigated, might yield valuable information. But, after the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the facts revealed by him in that speech and in the papers laid upon the Table, nothing will satisfy the people but a searching inquiry into the census of 1891 and 1901 as well. It was not necessary for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to go as far as he did. I suppose these Star Chamber inquiries might have been made, perhaps are made frequently—and if the matter had been kept quiet, if it had not been so trumpeted abroad, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce had not been given this opportunity of showing his eloquence, his bitterness, and his capacity for going beyond all reasonable length in attacking his opponents, the present position need not have been reached. But the hon. minister has brought these matters forward deliberately; and I maintain that it is incumbent upon this administration to set at rest, as far as they can, this question as to the honesty of the enumerators, as to the motives that influenced the different administrations that held these censuses as to the instructions they gave their officers, as to the good faith in which the information, given in good faith by the people of Canada in these decennial censuses, has been received and treated. Now, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, apparently to serve his own purpose for the moment, discredits the census of 1891. He maintains that the number of the people returned by that census was altogether too high. The hon. gentleman knows—no man better—that the census of 1891 was taken under precisely the same conditions, precisely the same instructions to enumerators, as was the census of 1901, which has just been taken by the government of which the hon. gentleman is a member. More than that, the hon. member must know that, if there were any error at all, it was not likely to be found by searching through the census of 1891. If he remembers the debates in which he took part in the House of Commons from 1882 to 1885, he will remember that it was admitted at the time that the census of 1881 was, probably, largely inaccurate and represented the people of Canada as having a larger population than was actually living in Canada at the time. There can be no question about that. Not the census of 1891, but the census of 1881, was the census that was exaggerated—and, probably also the census of 1871. In the discussions engaged in by Mr. Blake and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), Mr. Blake stated in most explicit language that the census of 1881 was stuffed largely with the names of people who had not been resident in Canada for ten, fifteen or twenty years. He states that most clearly in a discussion which took place in the House, in which he shows the practice of the enumerators was to go to a house and say: 'Have you a son or daughter?' 'Are they in the States?' 'Yes.' 'How long have they been there?' 'Ten' or 'fifteen' or 'twenty years.' 'Do you expect them to return?' 'Oh, yes, I hope to see them again.' And so that name went down. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce knows that, in taking the census of 1891 that system was changed. Though the de jure system continued in force, yet in addition to the questions formerly asked by the enumerators, which might lead to a dialogue such as was suggested by Mr. Blake and the enumeration of people who had not been resident in Canada for ten, fifteen or twenty years, a new question was added to those to be put by the census enumerators. It was made the business of the enumerators to ask whether the absent members of the family had been away for over a year, and if they had they were not to be counted. Whereas, in the census of 1881, it was possible to have persons counted who has been ten, fifteen or twenty years away from the country. Under the rules of the census of 1891, no person was likely to be counted who had been away for more than twelve months. Now, as it happens, this instruction to the enumerators was adopted with the consent of the government of Sir John Macdonald. The census officer of that day suggested this, and said to Sir John Macdonald: This will make a more accurate census, but it will have the effect of reducing the population of Canada as compared with the census of 1881. And Sir John Macdonald said: What we want is an accurate census. And the government of Sir John Macdonald consented to this change in the instructions. That government contained two future premiers, representatives of the Conservative party, Sir John Abbott and Sir John Thompson, and these gentlemen consented to this method, which had for its object the learning of the truth regarding the population that the men at the head of affairs might intelligently legislate for the country they were to lead. Now, as it happens, I think it would not be difficult to bring to the recollection of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the fact that he himself was consulted upon that subject, and he agreed that it would be a rational and advisable improvement, though it would have the effect of diminishing the population of Canada as revealed by the census of 1891. In respect to another matter, in respect to the instructions issued to the enumerators as to taking persons who were not living at home, such as domestic servants and clerks in the employ of other persons, in respect to that matter as well, a change was made in the census instructions so as to secure greater accuracy by providing against duplications and counting the same individual in two different census divisions.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BELL. The chief interest in the discussion of the census arises of course from the statements made in reference thereto by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Trade and Commerce accused the government and their subordinate officials who took the census of 1891, with having perpetrated a fraud upon the people of Canada, and he took the trouble to explain his reasons for thinking so, and the reasons which, in his opinion, induced the government and their subordinates to perpetrate this fraud. That statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in the House, I see, is echoed by the press supporting the government outside the House. The Montreal 'Herald' has a leading article on census stuffing in 1891, in which, referring to the statements of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, it says that he has made out such a case as would justify and require that the government of the day should proceed to investigate the matter fully. In that opinion I agree, as I think it is in the interests of the people of Canada that that investigation should be made complete. However, I think I will be able to show the House, before I conclude my remarks, that there is no warrant, at least no sufficient warrant, for the mischevious and improper statement made in this House by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The census of 1891, as I was pointing out when the House rose at six o'clock, was taken more carefully and on a system calculated to give more accurate results than the census of 1881, although the principle on which the two censuses were taken was identical. The de jure system was adopted in both cases. But special pains were taken by the commissioner who took the census of 1891 to avoid, as far as possible, errors arising from duplication and from counting individuals who had gone off for a long time beyond the confines of Canada. I propose to quote now from the manual which was issued as a body of instructions for the use of the enumerators. The matter of duplication is dealt with in this manual under the head of domestic servants:

> Domestic servants come under three classes: 1st. Those who have homes within Canada from which they are temporarily absent; 2. Those who have no homes at all in Canada; 3rd. Those in settled employment and resident with families other than their own.

The instructions go on to describe how these are to be taken. The first class are to be taken with the families from which they are temporarily absent; then the second and third class, those who have no homes at all in Canada except where they are living and finding employment, and those who are in settled employment and resident with families other than their own, are to be taken with those families. In order to make the matter perfectly plain and eliminate error as much as possible, the census commissioner proceeds to give instructions to the enumerators :

Family, as understood for the purposes of the census, may consist of one person living alone, or of any number of persons living together under one roof, and having their food provided together. For example: One man, say a shopkeeper, or a woman, say a seamstress, living alone in a separate house, or in a distinctly separate part of a house, would constitute a census family; but any number of persons living together in a boarding house, several of them being parents, having children and servants, would only constitute one census family, provide they have no home elsewhere.

So that by a careful description of the different classes under which the population would likely be found, and particularly of those that are liable to duplication, and by furnishing examples and instructions to the enumerators, every possible pains was taken to avoid duplication. Now what would be the results of such a course as that laid down here by the different census officials? It would be to introduce a system of taking the census which would eliminate errors which may have been committed in 1881, by which the census of 1881 may have been enlarged ; and in consequence, the system adopted by the government in 1891 was one that would reduce the number of people apparently residing in Canada, and instead of having the effect of showing a population larger than was actually here, it would come nearer to showing what the actual population of Canada was. Now, it must be borne in mind that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has made the charge, and has most deliberately made it, that a fraudulent census was taken, and in order to confirm what I said, I will quote his own words taken from his speech :

If they were capable, in a case where detection was almost certain, of perpetrating the gross and impudent frauds I have just narrated, think you, they would hesitate to add here and there a man to the members of a family where detection was almost impossible.

There can be no question about the gravamen of the charge made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has fortified his case with proof, or so-called proof. He said that in one case in the discussion which arose in the House of Commons in regard to the census of 1891 it had been charged that there was reason to believe that gross frauds were perpetrated in the county of King's, N.S., and that this matter was brought to the notice of the House by the member representing that county. He said : What did the government do ? They set every difficulty in the way of investigation. The fact of the case is that there was a fraud committed in the county of King's. There was sufficient evidence brought to show that one enumerator in King's had probably falsified the census and had probably done it by neglecting, or ignoring, the instructions he had received not to enumerate any individuals who had been away from the province for twelve months. The Department of Agriculture which had charge of the taking of the census, investigated that charge and was sufficiently satisfied that it was thoroughly proved that the census enumerator would have been punished if he had not gone out of the country and thereby escaped the consequences of his act of wrong-doing. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce makes the charge deliberately that the government of the day opposed an inquiry. That is not sustained by any proof advanced by the hon. minister, but, it is, to my knowledge and belief, entirely opposed to the fact. A thorough investigation was made, and it is a matter of knowledge that the only fact upon which the hon. gentleman can rest his charge is that the census officer refused to allow these returns, which had come into his hands from the enumerators and which were regarded as confidential, to be submitted to the House, a course in which I think he was absolutely justified and one I would have very much preferred to see adopted by the government of the day rather than to take these confidential communications and submit them to the inspection of unauthorized and improper persons. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to have a very pleasant quarter of an hour prefacing his remarks by this statement :

As it happens we are in possession of very perfect evidence as to the means they adopted for the purpose of glorifying the national policy.

I find that in 1891 the census of that day enumerated in Antigonish county seventy carpet factories with sixty-nine operatives, and the hon. gentleman indulged in a great deal of jocosity in connection with the fact that one individual was apparently running two factories. Now, in respect to this matter the hon. gentleman practically accuses the enumerators of having, for the purpose of glorifying the national policy and of vindicating the course which had been adopted by the Conservative administration in giving to Canada a protective policy, fraudulently filled up the census return with a list of industries which were not in existence. I regret very much that a minister and a gentleman in his position should make such a charge, because it is entirely at variance with the facts. The enumerators were instructed to take all the industries they found in the country within the limit fixed for them by their instructions, and they were to be guided by the Act and by the manual from which I have read which was made an Order in Council in order to make it binding upon them. They were to take every industry which they found in the country and which had an output of $200 per annum. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, throughout his remarks, seemd to contrast the United States census very favourably to that of Canada, and sought to give the impression to the House that the taking of such industries set down by the enumerators of Canada, carpet factories in Antigonish, knitting factories in Shelburne and basket factories in some other counties, is a practice not followed by the United States enumerators. The instructions given to the United States enumerators are precisely the same as in this country. They are instructed to take every industry they find but when they come to the matter of tabulation there is a difference. In the United States they do not tabulate any industry which has an output of less than $500, while in Canada with its comparatively less advanced development it is thought well to tabulate industries that have an annual output of $200. There is no harm in that. There is no deception in any way. It was not professed by each of these industries taken down by the enumerator represented a factory with a tall chimney, with a large number of employees and a large pay-list. The enumerators were careful to put down nothing but what was absolutely true in the enumeration of industries, and therefore, a more unwarranted use of the term fraud or fraudulent when applied to the facts collected by the enumerators of the census of 1891 was never used by any one particularly by any public man in this or any other country. I believe you will search the annals of parliamentary utterances the world over without finding a parallel for such an argument as was addressed to the House of Commons by a leading minister of the administration. But, the hon. gentleman says that this was for a purpose. The purpose was to glorify the national policy. The purpose was to grossly magnify the rate of progress made by Canada through the national policy. Well, if that hon. gentleman had taken the trouble to inform himself or had not forgotten the facts that came to his knowledge when he discussed this matter years ago, he would have recollected that the theory was put forward by him at that time and was answered and utterly exploded. Instead of magnifying the advancement made by the country, instead of exaggerating the rate of progress made by the country under the national policy, the including of these small industries has the very opposite effect, as I shall proceed to prove to the House. I have already explained that in the United States the practice is to tabulate industries down to $500 of an annual output, and in this country down to $200. Now, taking the industries—I am now quoting from that invaluable third volume of the census from which the hon. gentleman derived so much comfort. I am referring to the total which will be found in the fourth volume, although the materials for it are found in the third volume. In 1881 the number of these industries from $2,000 down, referring to their annual output, was 32,072. In 1891 the number had increased to 50,777 from which it appears that the census of 1891 was not the first in which the practice was adopted of enumerating these smaller industries. The same practice had been followed as it necessarily would be under the same instructions in the census of 1881. Therefore, the government in 1881, two years after the inauguration of the national policy, adopted this very same principle—and I believe it was in force in 1871 as well—by which all industries with an annual output of $200 or upwards would be included.

Under this heading of industries, with an output of $2,000 a year, there were in 1881, 32,072; and in 1891, 50,777; an increase of 18 per cent. The value of the produce of these factories had increased from $20,734,080 in 1881, to $32,195,192 in 1891. Of industries with an output of from $2,000 to $12,000 annually, there were 13,514 in 1881, and 19,629 in 1901; the annual output of these being $64,939,604 in 1881, and $93,260,957 in 1891.

Of industries with an output of from $12,000 to $25,000 per annum, there were 2,061 in 1881, and 2,679 in 1891. The annual output of these industries was $36,808,242 in 1881, and $47,709,005 in 1891.

Take the industries with an annual output of from $25,000 to $50,000, and there were 967 in 1881, which had increased to 1,208 in 1891. The annual output of these factories was $33,482,170 in 1881, and $42,238,542 in 1891.

Take the large class of factories; the great industries that have been established and brought into existence by the national policy; the industries with an annual output of $50,000 and upwards, and of these factories there were 1,108 in 1881, and 1,675 in 1891; the total output being $153,767,771 in 1881, and $260,795,190 in 1891.

If we take these for the purpose of comparison it will be seen at a glance that the effect of including all these small industries, which were so provocative of merriment to the Minister of Trade and Commerce; instead of showing a largely increased rate of progress and a greatly increased output; instead of glorifying the national policy, have the opposite effect. The inevitable result of that consideration is to show that there was no fraud in this matter; that it was not a new feature of the census of 1891; that it had been done in the census of 1881, and was done innocently in both cases, the census enumerators simply doing their duty according to their instructions and placing upon their schedules precisely the same information that is placed upon the schedules of the United States census, simply to show us the value of the annual work of those who may be classed as engaged in industrial occupations in Canada. In order to make the matter clearer, let us take the total increase of all the factories of all classes. In 1881, the total output was $309,731,867, and in 1891 that had increased to $476,198,886. That includes all industries, and it includes these very industries against which the Minister of Trade and Commerce is so much opposed. That shows an increased output in Canada of $166,467,019 and a percentage of 53·74. Let us deduct all these small factories with an output of $200 annually and it will leave the production of these industries—exclusive of the smaller ones—at $288,997,787 in 1881, as against $444,003,694 in 1891, a difference in favour of the latter year of $155,005,907, or an increase of 53·63 per cent, almost identical with the increased percentage when we include the smaller factories. Deducting another class of factories and we bring down the total output to $224,058,183 in 1881 as against $350,742,737 in 1891, there is shown there an increase of $126,684,544, and a percentage increase of 56·4. But if you throw out all these small industries and take simply the great industries of the country, you will find that these factories which produced $50,000 a year and upwards, give us an increase of $107,027,419 in 1891 as compared with 1881, and that would show (for the glorification of the national policy and the justification of the administration of that day) a percentage increase in the industries of the country, not of 53 per cent, which would be secured by taking these fraudulent means charged against the government by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but a percentage of 69·60 per cent.

The result of that investigation is to show that if it were the intention of the government of that day to have committed a fraud in this matter, then the means that they adopted were such as to completely defeat their purpose. It is only fair to ask the hon. minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) to furnish us with some further and better evidence why he should ask us to make our minds that the census of 1891 was fraudulent, and also better evidence to establish his contention that there was an increase in the last five years under this government, equal to the increase which took place in Canada for the fifteen years previous.

As bearing upon that question, it happens that there are some figures which tend to show that the very opposite is the case. Instead of being apparent from any evidence that can be discovered that the increase of population was greater in Canada during the last five years, there is evidence to show that it was less; or at least, that the exodus to which the Minister (Sir Richard Cartwright) attributes the loss of the population of this country, was in some respects greater in the last five years than it was during the other period. I read from a return which I think is authentic :

> The question is often asked : Is the movement of our Canadian population to the United States increasing or decreasing.

That was precisely the question that was raised. The question whether or not the exodus is less or greater, will, I assume, show whether there is any ground of justification for the boast of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the whole progress of Canada during the last twenty-five years has been within the last five years, and that for fifteen years from 1881 onward to 1896, Canada has made no progress and has remained with her population stationary.

> The state of Massachusetts takes a census on a comprehensive scale independent of the federal census. An analysis of the population statistics of the state of Massachusetts in combination with those of the Federal authorities for the same state supplies an answer to the question above asked (as to whether the exodus has increased or decreased) so far as relates to that state. The number of Canadians in Massachusetts in 1900 according to the Federal census (which is taken in the tens) was 293,169. In 1895, by the state census it was 243,732. In 1890, according to the national census, the number was 207,601, and in 1885 by the state census was 147,352. During the first five years, from 1885 to 1890, the number increased by 60,249 ; during the second period, from 1890 to 1895, by 36,131 ; and during the third period, from 1895 to 1900, by 49,437. In the first period Canadians went to the state of Massachusetts, according to the statistics of that state, at the rate of 12,050 a year ; in the second period, at the rate of 7,236 a year, and in the third period at the rate of 9,888 a year.

If these figures are right, there was a larger exodus from Canada to the state of Massachusetts in the last five years ending with 1900 than there was in the preceding five years ; and these happen to be the five years during which it is claimed by the members of the present government that there was practically no exodus, and during which Canada made greater growth than during the previous fifteen years. The result, while not conclusive, goes a long way to show to my mind that there is no foundation whatever for the statements made by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce on this subject.

The hon. gentlemen apparently rely very largely for some kind of support for their statements on the fact that we have had good times in Canada in the last five years ; and for that reason they contend that the citizens of Canada had no need to go abroad. But there have been good times in the United States also during the past five years, perhaps better than there has been in Canada. Employment has been easily secured there, wages have been high, and the inducements offered to citizens of Canada to go to the United States have been if possible greater than they were before.

There is another point bearing on this matter which should not be lost sight of. The recovery from bad times comes earlier in the United States than it does in Canada, and the difference between periods of inflation and periods of depression is more marked there than it is in this country. Cases have come within my own knowledge of sons and daughters returning to their homes in Canada to spend the lean years with their parents on the farm, and to wait until an improved state of affairs in the United States induces them to go abroad again. The mere fact that we have had good times in Canada is not sufficient to affect the exodus. Speaking from my own experience —and I presume it will be borne out by that of nearly every person present—there has been a greater scarcity of labour, a greater difficulty in finding men, either for the farm or for railroad construction, during the past five years, than there was previously. It is well known too to almost every one that it is almost impossible to obtain a sufficient supply of domestic servants in this country. So that there is no evidence to sustain or to justify for one moment the amazing contention of the government that all the growth of population between 1880 and 1900 is to be credited to the party in power. It is a monstrous proposition for which there is no warrant whatever.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce quoted figures to show that the city of Toronto had a larger number of unoccupied houses four or five years ago than it has to-day. We all know that. But the argument borrowed from the experience of the city of Toronto is a perfectly fallacious one. There was a boom in that city some years ago, resulting in a temporary increase of population and the erection of a large number of houses. But the boom broke with the usual consequences. There was widespread loss, many men gave up buildings they had erected, losing them altogether, and a great many people who had been attracted to the city by the boom left. There can be no question that for a number of years there was a great depression in the city of Toronto. But that city is now gradually overtaking the excessive rate at which it advanced for a short time, and by a healthy natural growth the population has once more overtaken the supply of buildings, which accounts for the condition of affairs that exists there to-day.

But the Minister of Trade and Commerce is sure that there was an exodus, and he furnishes a reason which to my mind is conclusive. I believe there was a large exodus between 1881 and 1891. I do not accept many of the arguments of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but there was one which struck me as being most convincing. He said that from 1881 to 1891 he went backwards and forwards in the province of Ontario a great many times. He denounced the government of Canada, he cursed protection in all the moods and tenses. He preached to the people of Ontario that they were being ruined, bled white, that the government was in alliance with combinesters, that the whole thing was an organized conspiracy to make the poor man poorer and the rich man richer. Is it not fair to conclude that when the hon gentleman spent his time in thus proving to the people of Ontario that this was a poor country to live in, that there was scarcely any security for life, and none for property in this country, he must have had considerable influence in driving the people of Ontario across the border ? If I had time, I would like, in support of the argument I have just advanced, to furnish the House with some of the speeches delivered by Sir Richard Cartwright on the stump at that time ; but I will quote a few words which he uttered in this House in 1885 in reply to the budget, shortly after the first minister of that day had been to London and had there urged the claims of Canada for a share of the emigration from the mother country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, standing in his place as a critic of the administration said :

> I doubt if the First Minister were well advised when he intimated that it was desirable that there should be a large immigration to Canada.

He goes on to say :

> If many had come to Canada, even to Ontario——

Which he seemed to think the best part of Canada——

> —they would have found themselves in a position where they could only be provided for by displacing the native population.

The fact that the hon. gentleman, standing here as the critic of the administration, could deliberately challenge the conduct of the First Minister in asking that immigrants of the most desirable kind should come to this country, and could warn them against coming, is sufficient to give us some idea of the kind of arguments he would address to the people on the stump, without the controlling and modifying influence of the fact that in this House men's speeches are reported, and there is a chance of their being held to account for their utterances. So that the only thing his argument that the population of this country had not increased, but that there was an exodus, proves is that he was busy in the province of Ontario, during the period from 1881 to 1891, in endeavouring to convince people that Canada was not a good place to live in and was a good place to live out of. I think I have said enough with regard to the census to show that there is not much basis for the figures and criticisms given us by the hon. minister. And if we are to be asked to believe that Canada stood still from 1881 to 1895, it will be necessary for some better arguments than have been given us by the hon. minister.

In rebuttal of the hon. minister's statements, there is a host of facts. For instance, there are the voters' lists. We find that the voters' lists in Canada showed :

In 1887..	993,914	names.
1891..	1,132,201	"
1895..	1,353,735	"

In Ontario the voters' lists showed as follows :

In 1882..	406,000	names.
1887..	495,000	"
1891..	568,000	"

Then this government came into power—this government which has so enormously added to our population and increased our prosperity—this government which has increased our population at the rate of 100,000 a year. Well, you will find that the voters' lists show just the opposite. They show a decline in population since that date. In 1895 there were 650,000 names on the Ontario lists. In 1898 this number had decreased to 576,000. That was the list prepared specially for the plebiscite on prohibition. And in 1900, at the last general election, the number of voters on the Ontario lists stood at 580,000. Where then were these hundreds of thousands who were pouring into Canada in order to swell our population and add to the glory of this government ? They are conspicuous by their absence. They are not to be found in the voters' lists, and I am sure that there is no place where these hon. gentlemen would better like to have them. Because had these hundreds of thousands been brought into the country under the happy circumstances that have prevailed since the advent of this government and been growing richer every day since owing to the wonderful administration of this wonderful government, they would certainly support the regime to which they owed their good fortune, and our hon. friends opposite would have been very careful to see that their names were down on the voters' lists. But where are they ? The voters' lists say no where.

Then going back to his old love, playing again the old tune he is unable to forget, the Minister of Trade and Commerce proceeded to magnify the United States at the expense of Canada. He compared the Dakotas and Minnesota with the province of Manitoba. Again I find that the hon. gentleman's figures do not correspond, as they should, with the official returns. According to him the Dakotas gained 120,000 families from 1881 to 1891, or in all 600,000 people, allowing five to a family. But the official returns of the United States census show that the Dakotas, instead of gaining 600,000 in that period, only gained 376,000, or not very much more than one-half the figures given us by the hon. minister. The state of Minnesota he credited with a gain of 200,000 families or a million souls. But taking the figures from the United States census, I find that the actual increase of Minnesota in that period was from 780,000 to 1,301,003, or an increase of 521,103, just about half the amount given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On the other hand, Manitoba had increased from 62,000 to 152,000, the exact increase in the ten years being 90,246, or a percentage of 144 between 1881 to 1891. I think I have said quite enough to show that we should hesitate considerably before accepting the figures given us by my hon. friend, and the conclusions based thereon. It is always possible for any of us to make mistakes, and it is quite easy to go wrong in figures, but I think that before a gentleman so prominent in the administration should venture to attack so important a document as the census of the country and openly charge thousands of his fellow citizens with deliberate fraud, perjury, connivance and conspiracy, he should endeavour to be at least accurate in his statements. I should hardly be willing to accept as conclusive the statements of an hon. gentleman, based on statistics which fail so completely to correspond with the official returns.

The hon. gentleman was rather inclined to be jocose in the course of his speech, and told a story rather at the expense of our hon. friend the member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He said that he once had a vision, during which he passed through the different circles of Inferno, and that when passing through the circle reserved for faithless souls, he came to an apartment in which he found a number of figures hanging up in unaccustomed and extraordinary attitudes. They proved to be the souls of farmers who had believed in protection, and being too green to burn, were hung up there to prepare them for the furnace. I wonder if the hon. minister is to be rewarded, according to Dante's conception, by being placed in that circle destined for faithless souls. If he should come into that quarter of the Inferno, he will find there a number of figures hanging up in anything but comfortable attitudes, and will find out that these are the souls of the sons and daughters of the great province of Ontario who were so green as to believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he told them that, if returned to power, he would destroy the microbe of protection, drive out of the country the combinsters, revise the tariff and give the people all the commodities of life at prices free from the increases caused by the iniquitous protectionist system.

I well believe that that may be his experience ; and, if so, of all the tortures the hon. minister will suffer when he finds himself in that place reserved for faithless souls, souls that have violated the trust placed in them by confiding friends, his greatest torture will be the anguish, the appealing, pitiful expression, of those poor souls, men and women from Ontario, who will look upon him with eyes of reproach and say : You brought us hither ; I am that lady of Oxford county who gave you your tea after you had held forth and explained how you were going to do away with the duty on coal oil, how you were going to give us our glassware free—no more 30 per cent on lamp chimneys or six cents a gallon on coal oil; we trusted you and here we are in torment. That will be the worst punishment of the hon. gentleman when he finds himself in the inferno for faithless souls. And, if there is one man in that government who, more than another has broken every promise he made to the people, and betrayed every confidence reposed in him, it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That hon. gentleman is unfair to his country to this day. I called attention a few moments ago to the manner in which he manufactured the figures for Dakota and Minnesota to the disadvantage of our fair province of Manitoba. He compared the growth and progress of these new countries. Why did he not do it fairly? What were the states of Dakota and Minnesota? They were a territory lying at the outskirts of the union, the only place left to be filled up by the overflowing population pressing upon them from the south. On the other hand, the province of Manitoba, with which he compared them, was cut off from eastern Canada by that long, desert, rocky district which intervenes between it and the thickly settled parts of Ontario—no border settlement, no possibility of people flowing in from over-populated provinces adjacent. Nothing could be done for that province until the government of the day had succeeded, by completing the Canadian Pacific Railway, in bringing it into a position where it could be filled. And, of the enormous progress made by the province between 1881 and 1891, amounting to 144 per cent, practically the whole of that ought to be credited to the last five years of that period when, the railway being finished, it was possible for population to flow into that province. I have said enough—and more will be said by hon. gentlemen on this side who will complete the demonstration I have started—to indicate the absolute futility, folly, and inaccuracy of the statements of the hon. gentleman. It would be better, far better if both government and opposition, instead of trying, for petty party purposes, to show that our country was not progressing, or to try for similar purposes to show that it had progressed only when men of our political stripe were in office, were we to recognize the fact that in Canada we have a country so fine, opportunities so great, that nothing can keep down the growth and development of the Dominion. I cannot, for my part, conceive how advantage is to come to our country from such criticism as has been, at times, indulged in by hon. members of this House. For myself, I am glad—and this is characteristic of all hon. members on this side—I am delighted at the progress made by Canada whether under a Liberal or under a Conservative administration. That progress is admirable, it is what we all wish to see; and we should join hand in hand to make still greater the speed with which our country is advancing to the front rank among the nations of the world.

Mr. ALEXANDER JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) addressed the House a few evenings ago he likened the debate to a revival meeting, the chief business of which was a political confession of faith. The comparison was not inapt. We have had this programme continued this afternoon and evening, and it is likely that it will be continued for some days. This afternoon and evening, we have had a confession of faith from the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). There is nothing extraordinary about that confession of faith, except that it differs somewhat from a confession of faith we have heard from that hon. gentleman on some former occasions. However, it may be fashionable in those days to change opinions, and I have no doubt that the hon. member for Pictou has found that ample reason to change from his profession of faith some years ago. It is not my purpose to find fault with anything the hon. gentleman has said, because it differs from what he said on the occasions I have referred to. But, now that the hon. gentleman has concluded his observations I must confess that, for my part, I am somewhat in doubt as to whether he is a protectionist or, like myself, a revenue tariff man. The speeches that have preceded that of the hon. member for Pictou on that side have made several things abundantly plain. They struck me as being somewhat contradictory, because they went to prove different things. Some of these speeches went to prove, in the first place, that Canada is prosperous and, in the second place, that the government which hon. members on this side are supporting is in no way responsible for the prosperity Canada is now enjoying. In the third place, these speeches went to prove that this country is not prosperous; and in the fourth place they went to prove that the government is entirely responsible for the want of prosperity which characterizes the country. And, in the fifth place, some of these speeches made it abundantly clear that hon. members on the opposite side are not satisfied with the present government. It is not my intention to quarrel with hon. gentlemen opposite because of that, and I think I speak for hon. members on this side when I say that there is not much worry on this side over the matter. It is of far more importance to myself, and, I take it, of far greater importance to every hon. member on this side that the people generally are satisfied with the government. And we have had opportunities, not so long ago, of ascertaining very clearly, that the country is satisfied with the manner in which the present government has administered public affairs since 1896.

I am like my hon. friend from Pictou in recognizing that, this discussion having gone on for upwards of a week, it is very difficult to contribute anything new to the debate. It is, therefore, my purpose not to delay the House long, but to be as brief as I can. I shall try to emulate the example of my hon. friend from Pictou and not inflict upon the House any large array of figures. We have had to listen to a considerable number of figures during the past week, and it will be my aim to give as few figures as I possibly can. With regard to the prosperity of the country, I think there are some evidences that it exists. Hon. members opposite invariably open their speeches by the admission that the country is prosperous, but almost invariably they conclude their speeches, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat, by asserting that the country is not prosperous. For my part I am satisfied to take the trade returns as a proof that there is prosperity in this country. It is not denied that trade during the past five or six years has increased tremendously, and relying upon the trade returns for the proof of my statement, I should not dwell at any greater length upon it.

Our hon. friends opposite, both in the House and outside of it, have had a good deal to say during the past five or six years with regard to the expenditure of public money in this country. We hear from day to day charges made against the government that the expenditure is growing. I am going to admit, if it is any consolation to my hon. friends opposite, that the expenditure is growing ; and for my part I am satisfied that the expenditure should keep on growing, provided always that we have good results from it. I take it that a young country like our own must, if its resources are to be developed, expend a good deal of money in their development, and for my part I am prepared to support a policy of a generous expenditure of public money throughout this country.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). I am glad that my hon. friends opposite are prepared to support the policy of a generous expenditure of public money. I was saying that if the resources of this country are to be developed, an expenditure of public money is necessary. We have a great country to the west, stretching to the shores of the Pacific ocean, a country of marvellous resources ; and if that country is to be developed the government must be generous in the expenditure of public money for that purpose, but without forgetting at the same time the necessities of the older provinces. In the province from which I come we are not satisfied that the time has been reached when there should be no further expenditure for the development of its resources, and I think the general opinion throughout all parts of the Dominion is that the time has not yet arrived when the expenditure of public money should be curtailed.

But while our friends opposite are profuse in their criticisms of this expenditure, they take very good care, both in the House and outside of it, not to particularize, not to single out any particular item to which they object. Now, Sir, if they expect their criticisms to have any weight it will be necessary for them to point out the particular items in the expenditure to which they object. I sat in this House during the whole of last session, and I do not now recollect that during the whole of that session our hon. friends opposite put themselves on record as opposed to any particular item in the expenditure made by this government. I say if they expect their criticisms to bear fruit and to be taken seriously by the people, they must point out the items to which they object. That is the position which hon. members on the government side of the House will take, and that is the position which people generally throughout the country will expect the opposition to take.

We have been told that the public debt of this country has been increased. I am not going to deny that it has increased. But it has not been increased to any alarming extent, and I do not think that there is anybody in this country who seriously believes that the increase in the public debt during the past five years has been an alarming feature of the present administration. I think most people, when they calmly reflect upon the question, will conclude that the increase has been a very moderate one. If hon. gentlemen will compare the increase in the debt during the last five years with the increase during the period our hon. friends opposite were in power, they will find that the increase during the last five years has been very slow compared with that during the eighteen previous years. For every dollar that the present government has added to the debt, they have added very largely to the trade of the country ; while for every dollar that the government supported by our friends opposite added to the debt, there was no corresponding increase in the trade of the country. The hon. member who has just taken his seat is not very hopeful it seems to me, of the conditions which obtain in this country. I am not disposed to agree with him that the situation in Canada to-day is without some hope. I am not disposed to agree with him that Canada has not a bright future ; or that we have any reason to expect that we should not witness a continuation of the prosperity which we are at present enjoying. For my part I would be sorry indeed to sound a note of alarm throughout the country at this particular time.

On the question of the tariff I shall have very little to say. I suppose I shall be expected to make my profession of faith on the question of the tariff, and I shall do so by saying that I am perfectly satisfied that the present government will so adjust the tariff that it will meet with the requirements of every class in this country. It is somewhat difficult, and has been difficult ever since 1896, to ascertain just what position our hon. friends opposite take upon the tariff question. It is not very easy to locate just where they stand on the subject. We all know that when the present Minister of Finance brought down his tariff resolutions in 1897, the leader of the opposition at that time declared that the tariff then brought down was destined to bring ruin to every industry in this country. Let me trouble the House while I read the declaration which was made on that occasion by the then leader of the opposition. He said :

> The result is that this tariff goes into operation, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) knows that the industries of this country are already paralyzed in consequence. While hon. members opposite gloat over the destruction of Canadian industries, I was reading the wail, the sorrowful wail of those industries in the Montreal 'Gazette,' where one manufacturer after another declared that those industries were ruined, that their mills must close, and that they saw staring them in the face a return of the deplorable state of things that existed when the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House, was in charge of the fiscal policy of the country. I say that a deeper wrong was never inflicted upon Canada.

I need not remind the House, and it is not necessary to remind the country, upon this occasion, how far from fulfilment that prediction of the then leader of the opposition fell. How did the industries of Canada suffer ? They did not suffer. They prospered as they never prospered before, but, when it was found that the industries had not suffered as the result of the tariff which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance brought down in 1897, there was then, in the House of Commons, as there was throughout the country, a claim set up by the Conservative party that the Liberal party had taken up the tariff of the government which had preceded them and that if prosperity had prevailed in this country since 1896 it was due entirely to the fact that the government had taken up the policy and followed in the footsteps of their predecessors. I have a distinct recollection of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) addressing this House the other evening and he went on to point out that if we did have any degree of prosperity since 1896, it was owing in no small degree to the fact that the government of the day were simply travelling in the footsteps of the government which preceded them and which went out in 1896. He went on to say that if there was any difference between the policy of the present government and the policy of that which preceded them, it was slight indeed, and that the difference simply amounted to 2 per cent. He went further and said that if you take the preference into consideration the difference between the two policies is less still. On the other hand, we had the declaration from some hon. members on the other side of the House that the tariff of the present government is not satisfactory. They want a declaration of policy as to the tariff, and as I said when I commenced my observations in respect to this tariff matter, so far as I am concerned, I have some considerable difficulty in determining just exactly where our friends opposite and their followers throughout the country are on this question of the tariff.

There is one matter to which I propose addressing myself for a little while. It has become a fashionable thing during the past few years and even this session in the House of Commons to assail the expenditure of money on the Intercolonial Railway. I propose for a few minutes to point out to this House and to the country that the expenditure of money on the Intercolonial Railway since 1896 has been in every respect justifiable. Need I remind the House that the condition of the Intercolonial Railway, when this government came into power in 1896, was entirely unsatisfactory to that portion of country through which the Intercolonial Railway runs ? I need not remind the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) that he was dissatisfied with the condition of the Intercolonial Railway in 1896. I am sure that he will be the first to admit that so far as the portion of the province from which he comes is concerned, the Intercolonial Railway was not satisfactory to the people. I need not remind the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) that to the constituency which he represents the Intercolonial Railway and its condition was unsatisfactory in 1896. From every constituency through which the Intercolonial Railway runs in the province of Nova Scotia there came the cry that it was not in the condition that a great railway ought to be in. The present Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) went to some trouble to ascertain the exact condition of the Intercolonial Railway and he went to some trouble to put the road in the state that we find it in to-day. We find the Intercolonial Railway to-day in a condition second to no road in Canada. Was the condition of the Intercolonial Railway in 1896 satisfactory to any person who was doing business with it ? Was the rolling stock satisfactory to the people of the country ? Was the freight service on the road satisfactory to the people ? Was the passenger service satisfactory ? I say most unhesitatingly, and, I think the opinion is universal, throughout the constituencies of this country through which the Intercolonial Railway passes, that not one of these services was satisfactory in 1896. I am glad to know that the condition which obtains to-day on the Intercolonial Railway is entirely different from that which existed in 1896. Have we the poor condition today in respect to the freight service that we had in 1896 ? Have we the poor condition in respect to the passenger service that we had in 1896 ? I think not, but, on the contrary, travel where you will on this continent and you will find that the Intercolonial Railway passenger service is looked on as one of the very best passenger services you can find anywhere in the country, better, perhaps, than anything you can find in Canada, equal to anything you can find in America, and perhaps, for that matter you might go farther, and eliminating the question of speed, you might go so far as to say that in the whole world you cannot find a better passenger service than that which you have now from the city of Montreal to the city of Halifax. It is of a character that the management of the Intercolonial Railway and the Minister of Railways and Canals may well take credit to themselves for having brought about. We will be told that this has cost money.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). It is quite true, and I am not going to deny that it has cost money. But, there was no other way of bringing this condition of affairs about, but by the generous expenditure of money. That expenditure has been made and for my part, and I am speaking for the province of Nova Scotia, from which the hon. member for Pictou comes, and I speak for Nova Scotia because I have more knowledge of the situation as it affects the province, I will say that Nova Scotia is satisfied that the expenditure of money on the Intercolonial Railway since 1896 has not been an unjustifiable expenditure. It is quite true that the government is not making any money out of the operation of the Intercolonial Railway. I am freely admitting that it is so. I would prefer, and every hon. gentleman on this side of the House would prefer, that the Intercolonial Railway should be a money earner. Before I sit down I propose to point out that there are other services that are not money earners and yet we are content that they should be maintained at the expense of the people. The Intercolonial Railway, I regard as a part of the great transportation system of this country. It is an important link in the transportation system. It has a good deal to do with determining what the rate of transportation shall be. And for my part I wish to say that I give my strict adherence to the doctrine that the government should continue to hold the Intercolonial Railway. It is not only important to the sections of the country through which it runs, but I take it that it is important to every section of this Dominion that the Intercolonial Railway should be owned and operated by the government of the country.

I regard the Intercolonial Railway as a necessary part of the great transportation system of Canada, and I regard it further as a complement of our canal system. That, I do not think is an extravagant claim, and probably even the hon. gentlemen from Ontario on the other side of the House, who seem to take special delight in criticising the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, will admit that claim. Let me remind the House that while we hear a great deal from hon. gentlemen opposite from the west, with respect of the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway we never hear their voices raised against the expenditure of public money on the canal system of Canada. Let it not be understood for a moment that I am in any way opposed to justifiable expenditure on our canals. I am prepared to support a policy which will maintain the efficiency of our canal system, and even if it does cost money, as it does cost considerable money, and more money than it costs to operate the Intercolonial Railway, I, speaking for myself, (and I think I may safely say that I speak for other members who come from the lower provinces) will support and endorse any expenditure which is necessary to efficiently maintain our canals. I do not mean to be understood as saying that the time has arrived when the government of this country shall cease spending money on the Intercolonial Railway. On the contrary, I believe that there is yet a good deal to be done in the matter of perfecting the service which that railway owes to the people of Canada. Let me remind my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell) of the fact that there has been a considerable expenditure of money on the Intercolonial Railway in his county during the past year. It will be interesting for his constituents to know; it will be interesting for this House to know, whether that hon. gentleman joins with his political friends who surround him in condemnation of this expenditure. During the past year there has been considerable expenditure in connection with the Intercolonial Railway in the town of Stellarton, and in the town of Westville, and in the town of Pictou, all in his own constituency. In these places there has been a very generous expenditure of public money during the past year. I have no doubt that the constituents of the hon. gentleman will be interested to know whether he supports the contention of those friends of his who sit behind him and around him, and who condemn the expenditure of public money in this connection. I have no doubt that some day his constituents will be curious enough to assertain from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell), whether he opposes or endorses that outlay. He did not find it convenient to make a declaration on this question during his speech, but he must know that the matter is of considerable interest to those who returned him to this House, and no doubt before the session terminates the hon. gentleman will ventilate his views in respect to the matter. I may remark that the sum of $63,975,261.73 has been expended altogether on our government railways, and I do not think for my part that this is a very alarming figure.

I propose, just for a moment, to make a comparison between the cost of operating the Intercolonial Railway to-day, and the cost of operating it during the period which preceded the coming into power of this government. I take the five years preceding 1896, and I find that there was an average annual deficit on the Intercolonial Railway including the Windsor branch of $88,232. I am not quarrelling with that deficit; I have nothing to say with respect to it; I simply say that there was such a deficit, and that the people of this country paid for that deficit, and I will proceed to make the comparison. I take the period from 1896 when the present government came into power, down to the present day, and I find that there has been an average annual deficit on the Intercolonial Railway including the Windsor branch of $51,358.60, as compared with an average yearly deficit during the five years of the Conservative regime of $88,282.34. I do not think that these figures form a sufficient justification for the extravagant and reckless criticism that has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite with respect of the expenditure of public money on the Intercolonial Railway. There is one other feature of this question to which I shall call the attention of the House, and the comparison which I am able to make is also favourable to the administration of the present Minister of Railways (Hon. Mr. Blair). When this government came into power in 1896 it was found that the Intercolonial Railway had an earning capacity of $2,994,201.93; a very respectable amount indeed. But those of us who remember these times, and those of us who had anything to do with the Intercolonial Railway then, remember well that the resources of the railway were taxed to the utmost in order that it might earn that sum of $2,994,201 in a year. What is the condition of the Intercolonial Railway to-day? During the past year the earning capacity of the Intercolonial Railway was $5,019,497.76, or an increase of nearly 100 per cent. Now, in order to bring about this state of affairs; in order to increase the earning capacity of the Intercolonial Railway in five years by 100 per cent, my hon. friends opposite will agree with me that it was necessary there should be a generous expenditure of public money on that road. It will therefore be evident that there is nothing in these figures to justify the criticisms of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House in regard to the present management of that road.

I propose to follow this matter up a little further and to point out some figures in connection with the expenditure on our canal system. I said, and I repeat, that the Intercolonial Railway is a part of the general transportation system of this country, and is a complement of our canal system. On the canals of this country there has been expended $81,404,543.98, and it has cost this country $16,985,997.66 to operate the canals. The revenue that the public treasury derived from these canals was $12,717,343, leaving a deficit of $4,268,254.65 as between the actual revenue and actual expense of operation. That is the exact position with respect to our canals. As I have said, I do not wish to be understood as finding fault in any way with this expenditure, and I repeat that I will willingly endorse any policy which has for its object the efficient maintenance of the canals. I take the five years previous to the coming into power of this government; that is from 1892 to 1896; and I find that there was an average yearly deficit of $298,841 during that period, on the operation of our canals. I take the period from 1896 down to the present time, and I find that the annual average deficit was $238,655.10. That is a record which I think the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) and which hon. members supporting the ministry have no reason whatever to be ashamed of. It is a record, Sir, which the people of this country are prepared to support comparing more than favourably with the record of the gentlemen who administered our canals and our railways previous to 1896.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose passing on to another matter. The hon member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) in his address to the House a few evenings ago, made some observations respecting the county of Cape Breton, which I have the honour to represent in this House, and I propose to deal for a few minutes with that portion of the hon. member's speech. He tried to prove that the great prosperity which had come to the county of Cape Breton during recent years was due entirely to the fiscal policy of the Conservative government. On that occasion I asked the hon. gentleman this question:

> Does the hon. gentleman know what reason the president of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company gave as the chief cause that led to the establishment of the iron and steel industry in Cape Breton?

The answer given by the hon. member for West Toronto was as follows:—

> I presume the primary cause was the advantageous situation of Cape Breton to the raw material which enters into that industry and to its shiping facilities. But added to that primary cause was the bounty and the protection which was accorded to that industry by the Conservative government of Canada.

I added:

> I would like to add that that is not in accordance with the statement made by the president of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, who ought to know.

The hon. the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Haggart) is reported in 'Hansard' as having said: 'Yes; it was exactly what he said.' My recollection was that it was the hon. leader of the opposition who made this statement. Of this, however, I was not sure. Until I read the report in 'Hansard,' I was under that impression.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I made no observation.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). The statement was made, then, by the hon. ex-Minister of Railways and Canals. He evidently did not know very much about it. I am pleased to know that the hon. leader of the opposition, who I am sure would know better, did not make the observation. Now, if we have to-day in the county of Cape Breton a magnificent iron and steel industry, it is not due to the reason advanced by the hon. member for West Toronto in this House a few evenings ago. In order to point out the true reasons, it is necessary for me to go back a few years. In 1891, and for a year or two afterwards, the coal trade in the county of Cape Breton was not in a very flourishing condition. As a consequence there was a good deal of discontent not only in Cape Breton, but throughout the province of Nova Scotia. The output of coal in the province in 1891 reached the highest figure that had been reached up to that time, being 1,849,945 tons. The following year, 1892, showed a very marked decrease, and in the year after, 1893, a still further decrease—a decrease which alarmed the people of Cape Breton and the people of Nova Scotia generally. The output for that year had fallen to 1,485,924 tons. I have a very lively recollection of that time. The coal miners of Cape Breton were dissatisfied. For half the year they had no work. If they got work for four or five or six months, they considered themselves very fortunate indeed. A good deal of discontent prevailed everywhere throughout the country, and representations in reference to the matter were made to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), who was then leading the government of Nova Scotia. We were told by our Conservative friends previous to 1892 and 1893, and for that matter down to 1896, that the national policy was sufficient to develop the coal trade of this country. If my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, when he was approached at that time, had followed the example of the Conservative government, he would have said: 'You have the national policy, which is sufficient to develop the coal trade of the country and why should I be asked to interfere?' That is exactly what he would have said if he had followed the lines laid down by the gentlemen of the Conservative party. But he did not choose to do that. He entered into negotiations with certain gentlemen of the city of Boston and with the gentlemen who then owned and controlled the coal mines of Cape Breton. The result was the formation of the Dominion Coal Company. I may be asked why I am referring to this matter. My purpose is to point out the position taken by the Conservative party of Nova Scotia on the question, as to what has brought about the present flourishing state of affairs in Cape Breton to which the hon. member for West Toronto referred a few evenings ago. I wish to show that the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia opposed the formation of the Dominion Coal Company. I am not stating anything new, for it is well known that the Conservative party time and again opposed this measure in the legislative assembly at Halifax. They put themselves on record against it. They pointed out that the formation of the Dominion Coal Company would mean the abandonment of the coal fields of Nova Scotia, and particularly of Cape Breton, to American speculators. Well, Mr. Speaker, that prediction has fallen as far from fulfilment as have the predictions of the late leader of the opposition with regard to the tariff policy of this administration. The coal trade of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton did not suffer from the policy inaugurated by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. On the contrary, it has since prospered as it never did before in the history of the country. In 1893, just a year before the organization of the Dominion Coal Company, the output had fallen to 1,485,924 tons. Last year the output rose to 3,625,865 tons or more than double that of 1893. That is not a very bad record, and if the Minister of Finance were not here I would enlarge at much more considerable length on the advantages of the policy inaugurated by him. But let me simply say that it is one which will redound to his everlasting credit and which he succeeded in causing to be adopted against the most determined and strenuous opposition of the Conservative party.

I wish to refer now to the position taken by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) on this iron and steel industry. When asked what were the reasons which had brought about the establishment of this industry, he replied that no doubt it was the advantageous position of Cape Breton with regard to the raw material which enters into that industry and its shipping facilities. Let me say that during the eighteen years in which the Conservative party was in power, Cape Breton was just as near the raw material as she is to-day and the shipping facilities were just as good. There was a bounty on iron and steel for years previous to 1896. Did that bring about the establishment of the iron and steel industry in Cape Breton? It did nothing of the kind. On the contrary, the position of Sydney was not as good perhaps in 1896 as it was some years previous. The hon. member for West Toronto said that the establishment of this industry was also due to the bounty policy of the government. But that bounty was not a new thing. It was in existence under the late government. All these advantages then existed. The coal was just where it is now, the iron ore was there, the shipping facilities were there, all during these eighteen years of Conservative administration, but there was no iron or steel industry established. Let us come a little nearer the reasons which were important factors in the establishment of that industry. In the month of August, 1899, the mayor and council of the town of Sydney tendered Mr. Henry M. Whitney an address in the town hall. Mr. Whitney, in reply to that address, made the following observations :

> You have referred, Sir, to my connection with the mineral resources of Cape Breton, which I take to mean my connection with the Dominion Coal Company. It is now some six years ago that I first beheld your beautiful country, and then I came in connection with this enterprise. I was little aware at that time what the future had in store for me in connection with that undertaking. It has brought me many trials, many cares and few compensations. I saw in consequence of the changing conditions of trade here and elsewhere and in the carrying out of the necessary programme by which the trade might be extended and the men receive employment the year through, it had fallen to our lot to perform many an unpleasant duty and to receive more or less your criticism, but I believe now that everybody here will agree that the policy that was adopted by us was intended for good and has been for the greatest good of the greatest number, and now it can be shown that it is owing to that policy that we are now enabled to start this great enterprise. I hope that in your minds will be full justification for things that have been done in the past which did not meet the approval of you all.

That is what Mr. Whitney, who is the president of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and also the Dominion Coal Company, said with respect to the establishment of the iron industry. And I have no doubt if the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) were in his seat, he would be glad to admit that he was mistaken in his view of the causes which brought about the establishment of this industry in the county of Cape Breton.

The organ of the Conservative party in the town of Sydney, at that time, made these comments on this address to Mr. Whitney :

> Whatever commercial greatness is in store for Cape Breton it is due to his (Mr. Whitney's) initiative. Whatever progressive changes are taking place in this staid old town are due to his high capacity and potential energy.

That is the testimony given by the organ of the Conservative party in August, 1899, in the town of Sydney, and I am prepared to rest my case there. I have pointed out to you, Sir,—and I shall conclude my observations presently—that Nova Scotia has, during the past five or six years, in common with the rest of Canada, enjoyed a very general measure of prosperity. Our coal resources, our iron resources and our agricultural resources are being developed as they never were before. And let me tell you, Sir, that the fishing industry is in better condition to-day in Cape Breton than it was in 1896, when the present government took office. I have in my possession letters from people engaged in that industry, pointing out that the regulations enacted by the present government are far more satisfactory than were those governing this industry during the preceding years. As I have said, Nova Scotia is enjoying to-day a very general measure of prosperity. In the county of Cape Breton there are public works, which were neglected before 1896, but which are now being actively prosecuted. I speak more particularly with reference to my own county of which I have personal knowledge. And I can say, without fear of being contradicted successfully that, in the county of Cape Breton there are public works that were neglected by the late government before 1896, notwithstanding that from 1878, in almost unbroken succession to that day, the county had given the government two members to support it. The government of this day has been generous in the matter of looking after the requirements of that constituency with respect to public works. It must not be supposed, however, that the list has been completed. We expect that attention to public works will continue in the future as in the past, and I have no doubt whatever that it will.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have about finished the discussion of the matters which I intended to discuss when I arose. I wished particularly to speak about the Intercolonial Railway. And, permit me to say to our hon. friends on the opposite side of the House that they should be a little more generous in their treatment of that road. While the record of the Intercolonial Railway in the matter of earning money is not as satisfactory as we could all wish to have it, for my part I am not alarmed. I think we may well have faith that the future has much better things in store for us with respect to this matter. I have no doubt that the next report of the Intercolonial Railway will show that the present year has been a far more prosperous one for the road than last year. As I have said, I want the Intercolonial Railway still further developed. In my constituency, I want a considerable amount spent on the railway to protect its terminals. The road has terminals at Sydney and at North Sydney, and we are not satisfied that those terminals should remain as they are. The importance of the harbour at Sydney and the future it has in store for it, make it necessary that the Intercolonial Railway should have more commodious terminals both at Sydney and at North Sydney than it has. And I take it that the government and the hon. Minister of Railways will regard in a favourable light the proposal to provide the accommodation for which I ask.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston) has treated the House to a somewhat lengthy dissertation upon the development of the coal mines, the iron mines, the fisheries and the Intercolonial Railway. How far these subjects might be allowed to be discussed, were you, Mr. Speaker, to give a rigid interpretation to the rule that would confine the discussion to the amendment before the House, I would not like to be obliged to say. But in your generosity, you allowed the hon. gentleman to wander far afield. I do not regret it. All the hon. gentlemen who preceded the hon. member for Pictou have modelled their addresses upon similarly Liberal lines. We had some apprehensions as to the wisdom of moving our resolution so early in the debate, for fear that we might be confined by yourself, under the rules of the House, strictly to a discussion of that amendment, and not allowed to engage in the general criticism of a budget debate. But, remembering that a custom has been followed of moving the amendment early without, in practice, interfering with the rights of members to travel over the whole domain of finance and the condition of the country, we felt that we might draw upon the patience of the House and not follow strictly the rule laid down. I trust that you will show the same liberality to me as you have shown to hon. members who have preceded me.

I shall say but little with regard to the criticism of the hon. member from Cape Breton. He said there were evidences of prosperity throughout the country generally. We on this side agree with the hon. gentleman in that. It is quite enough to be obliged to deal with subjects on which we disagree without taking up time with those in which we agree. The hon. gentleman declared that he believed in free expenditure of public money. The Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) will agree with him there, and so will any of his political friends. There will be no dispute on this point from the government side of the House, but there may be a large class of people in the country who will not quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the free expenditure of public money which has characterized the management of the public affairs for the last four or five years is the very best thing in the interests of the country. But I might remind the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton that when he speaks in this way he is very severe on the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) who, for eighteen years, with his stentorian voice, with his extreme adjectives and with the invective which is peculiar to himself, condemned this free expenditure of public money in the very strongest terms, moved resolutions against it—in which his party supported him. He declared that the expenditure was entirely too heavy, when it was more than $10,000,000 less than it is to-day, and said it could be cut down, two, three or even four millions a year. He told us that the country was going to the bad on account of the extravagant expenditure of public money. And, when we take exception to the present heavy expenditure the member asks us why we do not come down to particulars, name the items to which we object and move to have them struck out. I would like to draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Johnston, Cape Breton) and the attention of the leader of the government (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who is sitting before me, and listening to me, to the fact that, during the eighteen years when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was in opposition, there were only about three times, if my memory is correct, when he came down to particulars and moved to have items struck out. The hon. gentleman represented that it was not the duty of an opposition to come down to particulars, but it was their business, when the expenditure was too great to condemn the expenditures generally. So, before the hon. member for Cape Breton reads lectures to this side, he had better read up the 'Hansard' reports of the past and note the lesson which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) gave in those days, of the duty of an opposition.

The hon. member for Cape Breton says it is difficult to locate the members of the opposition on the tariff. Is the resolution we moved not concrete enough? How can the hon. member ask for more than that? But can the hon. gentleman locate members on his own side? Where, for instance, does he put the hon. member for South Oxford, who, in that valedictory address, which sounded so sweetly because it was likely to be his last, declared that he was now as he had ever been in favour of free trade, and had never changed his principles? How is that hon. gentleman in accord with the hon. Minister of Public Works who says: I am a protectionist; I was brought up in a protectionist school and have never abandoned my principles; and who practically declares that the leaven which he has introduced into the cabinet will leaven the whole lump and that he will make them all protectionists after a while. Then I ask my hon. friend, do they come down to particulars? Is he able to locate his friends? Can he locate the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who says he is a free trader up to the hilt? Can he locate the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd) who says he is a protectionist? He is not a free trader, but he is in favour of protecting the manufacturers of our country. I can go over the whole list, and I find there are scarcely three of them who agree upon one particular. They are as divergent one from the other as day is from night or as darkness from light. Then will my young friend from Cape Breton try and locate his friends and tell us where they stand on this question, and after that he can direct his attention to hon. members on this side of the House.

The hon. member said the Intercolonial Railway management was perfectly satisfactory to him. I have no doubt of that. He told us in the beginning of his speech that he liked a heavy expenditure, and that is what is taking place on the Intercolonial Railway, and it is a benefit to the people down there. But I thought at the time he was praising the present management of the Intercolonial Railway, and saying it was so far ahead of what it had been before, that he forgot to tell the House, or could not be aware of the fact, that only this last year we paid $488,186 for expenses of management and running that railway, over and above all it earned. Is that satisfactory to him? If it is, I tell him it is not satisfactory to the country by any means. He nods his head in assent; then I can only tell him that his views differ from those of the great majority of the people of this country, because they would like to see all these great public undertakings pay their own way if possible. I think that good management would make the Intercolonial Railway pay its own way, and the fact that it has not been paying its own way is the best evidence that it is not properly managed. Besides the $488,186 that the management is behind in running that railway, at the same time they spent $3,652,000 on capital account within the last year. Yet the hon. member says it is perfectly satisfactory to him. Well, I can tell him that there are not many people who will agree with him.

He tells us that the Conservatives opposed the Dominion Coal Company; that it was one of the best things that happened to the country, the Conservatives were the only parties that opposed it. Where was the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Russell) who sits beside him—where was he on this question? There was not a Conservative in this House, or outside of it who opposed that more strongly than the hon. member for Hants. The hon. member's criticisms would have much greater force if they were directed towards his own friends than against any member on this side of the House. He says that the policy followed by the present government has developed the iron industry, the coal industry, the fishing industry, the agricultural industry, How have they been developed? By the policy of the present government, he says. Well, if they have, then he ought to be satisfied. But what have they done for the farmer, for the fisherman? What have they done to develop the coal industries of the country, or the iron industries, beyond putting a bounty on iron? I fail to see that they have done anything, and I think the country fails to see it. I would like the hon. gentleman, when he makes that statement again, to come down to particulars, and to tell us what they have done which has favoured the development of those mines; until he does that we will be inclined to disagree with him in his conclusions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct attention for a short time to the budget speech. The Minister of Finance, in delivering his budget speech to this House, painted a glowing picture of the prosperity of the country and the condition of the people. Now, we agree with all that. No one is better pleased than we are to find the condition of the country so satisfactory, to see the people so prosperous and happy. We have no quarrel with the Minister of Finance in that respect; but the difference of opinion comes in when we inquire into the causes that brought about that prosperity, that is where we take issue with the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance and his friends attribute that prosperity to the businesslike management of the present government; they take credit to themselves for that prosperity because of the management of the affairs of this country during the last five or six years. We say that the prosperity is due to causes over which they had little or no control. Can we verify that statement? I think we can. Now, to begin with, I ask them what they did to bring about good times? They did nothing, so far as I know, to bring about good times, except in one particular—they have made a heavy expenditure of money. What did they do for the people? They did not give the people more employment, except in so far as this heavy expenditure of money by the government gave employment. They did nothing to make wages higher, they procured no new markets for the people, they secured no better values for the products of the people. Therefore, in all these lines they can take no credit to themselves for the good times. Neither did they reduce the cost of living to the people, nor the cost of transportation of the people's products from the place of production to the place of sale, or the place of shipment, so that they might get larger profits. In none of these respects have the present government contributed in any material sense to give prosperity to the country. They did not materially improve the method of transportation—no fast Atlantic service, no better transportation facilities, no reciprocity treaty so that the people could have better markets, although they promised if they came to power they would get such a treaty. They did nothing to makes times better except to spend enormous sums of the people's money during the time they have been in power.

Now, let me ask, What makes good times? We may reasonably answer, first, good crops. Who gave the good crops? They would like to say they did, but it was Providence gave the good crops. Providence has given us good crops for several years past, and we are reaping to-day the results of these crops. But I think the most sanguine of the supporters of the government would hardly have the audacity to stand up and say that the government were in any respect responsible for the good crops. The next thing to cause good times are good prices. The supply and demand the world over regulate prices. Owing to the hard times we had for several years before this government came to power, the large surplus of manufactured goods in the country which had accumulated from over-production was used up, and a better demand arose for our products, then values went up and better prices obtained; then the people had a larger return for their labour and consequently enjoyed good times. There was also better employment for labour, because, following a cycle of hard times, better times prevailed in the United States and in Europe, as well as in Canada, and of course we had better times. But that was not at all in consequence of the management of the present government, they had nothing to do with it, but I say, it was the natural consequence of good times following a cycle of bad times, when consumption had overtaken production, and when manufacturers were therefore prepared to go on again, and the people on their part were ready to absorb the heavy output of the mills and factories of the country. There was a better market for labcur, because there was an increased demand for labour all over the world, and that also helped to make good times. Then we have to fall back on the one single item in which, as I admit, the government may take credit for having contributed to good times, and that is by the heavy expenditure of money that they have made.

What have they done? They have expended very heavily and very liberally throughout their term of office. I take the gross receipts and expenditures of the country from the time they came into power and the statement is as follows: In 1897 they received $37,829,778, but they expended $42,972,755, very much more than they received. In 1898 they collected $40,556,510, but they expended $45,334,281, showing a very heavy expenditure. In 1899 they collected $46,743,102, but they spent $51,542,635, a very heavy expenditure. In 1900 they collected $51,031,466, but they spent that year $52,717,466. In 1901 they collected $52,516,332, but they spent $57,982,866. And in the year 1902 they will have collected $52,516,332, but they will have spent $65,250,000. I merely read these figures to let the House and the country see to what an extent they have contributed to good times. They have contributed to good times by the heavy expenditures they have made during these six years. I take the six years before they came into power and what do I find? I find that the expenditure in 1891 was $40,793,208, in 1892, $42,272,136, in 1893, $40,853,727, in 1894, $43,008,233, in 1895, $42,872,338, and in 1896, $44,096,383. The average expenditure for these six years under the Conservative administration was $42,316,000, while the average expenditure of the present government for the last six years was $52,633,334 a year, or an expenditure each year of $10,317,204 more for these six years than their predecessors expended in the previous six years when hon. gentlemen now on the other side of the House said that the expenditure was $4,000,000 too high. When we consider the $10,000,000 of an expenditure over and above the average expenditure of the predecessors of hon. gentlemen we can easily see how it has helped to some extent in creating good times and giving employment to labour. If you put that amount of money into circulation every year throughout the country, $10,000,000 more than their predecessors spent, it is bound to bring about better times. Then I say that this is the only particular in which these hon. gentlemen have assisted in bringing about better times than those which existed formerly. Although they said that the expenditure of their predecessors was $4,000,000 too high, they have expended $10,000,000 a year more than their predecessors during the last six years.

Now, the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) treats us to a lot of figures concerning the trade and commerce of the country to show that the financial transactions of the country all point to good times. We do not dispute that, so it is quite unnecessary to waste time as to that. There is no doubt about that. We agree with him and we are as much pleased as the hon. gentleman is that such a showing is able to be made at the present time. But, what we do take exception to is his manipulation of the figures and the selection of the periods which he made for his comparison with the showing which he made for his own party. The ingenuity displayed by the hon. gentleman is worthy a magician, for, if you look at it, you cannot help but be struck by the ingenuity of the hon. gentleman, although it is not what we would expect from a Minister of Finance. In making his comparison in regard to the annual increase of the debt he said that under the Conservative party which was in power for 18 years, the average increase in the debt during that time was $6,563,075 a year, while, under the Liberal party, during the six years which they have been in power, the average increase of the debt was $1,996,514 a year. He took in one instance 18 years and in the other six years. But he forgot to tell the House and the country that in those 18 years there were included five or six years of the very worst times that Canada has experienced. In our county, on account of the drought, the people were obliged to sell their cattle at from $5 a head upwards to keep them from starving. There was no food for them. The people were bringing feed all the way from the Ottawa valley. The province of Ontario was in a most abject condition on account of the drought which prevailed that season and in addition to this there was a bad season before this one and a bad season succeeding it. During these three years the crops were destroyed, yet the hon. Minister of Finance compares these three years with three of the most prosperous years during the time that the present government has been in power and thinks that the comparison is a fair one. Then, he takes the public debt, and what is contained in that? There is included the operations of these six years. He stops at the very year when there is a small addition to the debt of $2,000,000. He tells us that before this year is out he will have to add $6,000,000 more to the debt, and he tells us as well that he has $6,000,000 of borrowed capital from the banks, for which we have to pay 3½ per cent interest, and which is due on the 1st of July. Why did he not add that to his statement of the debt? It is borrowed, it has been spent, and we must borrow money to pay it. It should have been added to the debt, and if he had done that what would have been the result? The result would have been that the average increase of the debt during this six-year period, instead of being as he says, $1,996,514, would have been $2,332,567. That is what the House and the country should have been told, because the hon. gentleman should not have undertaken to deceive the country. He knows that the money is spent, he knows that this $6,000,000 which have been borrowed to meet the expenditure will be due in a few months. We are now in March and there are only April, May and June until the year is up. When the year is up he will have to add this $6,000,000 to the debt, and he will have to provide $6,000,000 to pay the temporary loan which he has borrowed from the bank and on which he is paying 3½ per cent interest. He did not tell the House or the country that, but he tried to make the House and the country believe that he had only increased the debt to the small extent of $1,996,514 a year. He forgot to tell the people of this country that in these 18 years were included these three years during which were incurred the heavy expenditure on capital account for the Canadian Pacific Railway—1884, 1885 and 1886. We spent in 1884, $23,695,135 on capital account, nearly all of which went for the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1885 we spent $14,245,841 on capital account, and in 1886, $26,751,414. the year in which we took back from the Canadian Pacific Railway land for which we gave them $10,195,520 of money to help tide them over the temporary embarrassment in their financial condition. He forgot to tell the people that these were included in these eighteen years to make up the average increase in the debt of the Conservative party of $6,000,000, whereas, according to the hon. gentleman, their increase is not quite $2,000,000 a year.

That was an unfair thing for the Minister of Finance to do. It was something that the people of this country and the members of this House did not expect from him. It is a most ingenious way of presenting figures, but it is an unfair way. It reminds me of an incident I once heard on the platform. A gentleman was quoting figures which were about as unfair as those quoted by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, and this man said: I challenge any man to contradict me; these are figures and figures don't lie. The reply came: No, but liars will figure. When a man in the high position of the Finance Minister places such misleading figures before the country, he is doing a great injustice to his opponents, and he is doing less than justice to his own friends because when the electorate discover the deception they will be likely to visit their indignation on the Finance Minister and on the party he belongs to. Take the expenditure of these three years on capital account, and it will run up the public debt at an average of $3,593,000 a year for each year of the 18 years. But the Finance Minister spreads the deficit over 18 years, whereas if he had taken out these three exceptional years the increase under the Conservative government would be only $3,454,000 a year instead of $6,000,000. Does the Minister of Finance think that he has done his full duty in hiding these facts from the House? I repeat that his arrangement of these figures is very unfair, and we would have expected better from him. The Minister of Finance claims that his government since they came into power have had aggregate surpluses amounting to $19,000,000. Well, what of that? Did they put these surpluses to good use. If that aggregate surplus were applied to reducing the public debt it would have made an admirable showing for them, but the fact is that their extravagant expenditure has used up all these surpluses, and instead of reducing the public debt as they should have done, they have increased it. But the Finance Minister did not tell the country that. Not at all. It would not have suited his purpose.

The comparison which the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) made with regard to our trade with Great Britain was also unfair. He wanted to show that the tariff preference his government had given to England had increased our trade with Great Britain, and had resulted in some substantial good to the mother country, but the figures which he quoted to prove this were tainted with the same defect of unfairness.

When he mentioned the figures of our trade with Great Britain, I asked the hon. gentleman if he would be good enough to give us the figures of our trade with the United States, because I knew that if he did so they would show that the proportionate increase of our trade with the United States was greater than it was with Great Britain, and therefore that his whole argument would have been destroyed. But what was the reply of the Finance Minister ? He said that I had asked him the same question exactly at the same stage of the budget speech last year, and he did not answer it then nor would he answer it now. If the Finance Minister desired to be fair why did he not reply. In that respect his argument was defective and again it was unfair. But I will supply the figures for the Finance Minister, and I think they will convince the House that his government cannot pride themselves much on the alleged benefits which the preferential tariff has conferred on Great Britain. Our import trade with Great Britain in 1898, under the preferential tariff, was $27,000,000, and with the United States it was $43,000,000. In 1899 our trade with Great Britain under the preference was $37,000,000, and with the United States it was $54,000,000. In 1900 our trade with Great Britain under the preference was $37,000,000, and with the United States it was $62,000,000. In 1901, when Great Britain was receiving the full benefit of the preferential tariff, our trade with Great Britain had dropped from $37,985,000 in 1900 to $37,270,000 in 1901, while during the same period our trade with the United States had increased from $62,000,000 in 1900 to $65,500,000 in 1901. The Finance Minister did not tell the people of the country that. The only conclusion that can be drawn from such a state of affairs is that the preference which the government have been boasting has done so much for the mother country, has done absolutely nothing at all for the mother country. On the other had, it has done a great injustice to the manufacturers of Canada, and it has helped the labouring men in Germany who are sending goods here through the ports of Great Britain to get the benefit of the preference, and to sell their goods in Canada to the detriment of our own working people. But the Finance Minister told us that we had a large revenue now. Yes, we have a large revenue and we have a large expenditure as well. While the revenue is very large on the one hand, the expenditure is very large on the other, and there is no saving on that account. The policy of this government has been that the larger the revenue they get, the greater the expenditure they make. When the people are told by this government that they have collected $10,000,000 a year more than did their predecessors, and that they have had a surplus of over $3,000,000 a year, the people will naturally expect that that surplus should be applied to reducing the national debt. But the people can ask in vain for that to be done. The surplus has not gone to reduce the national debt ; it has been wiped out by extravagant expenditure. No matter how much taxes this government collects from the people the debt runs up year after year, and there is no lessening of the burdens of taxation. If I were to ask in my county of a farmer there : What do you think of your neighbour who had good crops for the last six years, who got good prices for the products he sold, but who still increases the mortgage of $1,000 which he had on his farm. Suppose I said : This farmer has made more money by several hundred dollars a year than he ever made before, but he has been adding a hundred dollars a year to the mortgage ; it was $1,000 the first year, $1,100 the next year, $1,200 the next year, $1,300 the next year, and at the end of six years during which time he had better crops than ever before and larger returns, the mortgage was $1,600. Suppose I asked what do you think of that kind of a farmer. Surely the reply would be : That man must soon go to the poor-house, because if he cannot reduce the mortgage during good times he can never hope to do so in bad times. Well, the Finance Minister is administering the affairs of this country somewhat on a par with that improvident farmer. During all these good years when he has taken $10,000,000 a year more out of the pockets of the people, he did not reduce the mortgage, but on the contrary added to it to the extent of $3,000,000 a year. That is what a farmer would call very improvident farming, and that is the kind of thing that would compel the farmer who would do that, to lose his farm and clear out of the country. Let us apply the same principle to a merchant. During the last five years he has done a larger business, and made larger profits, but nevertheless he has not saved a cent, and his expenses have been running up all the time. The creditors of such a merchant would naturally say : Go into insolvency ; you are not fit to control a business ; your whole management proclaims that you are in no sense of the word a business man. If you cannot pay off your indebtedness during good times, it is utterly impossible for you to maintain your standing in hard times, and the result will be that sooner or later you must go into insolvency, because you are bankrupt. The same thing is true of a country, and that must be the result of the way in which the hon. the Finance Minister has managed the affairs of the country for the past five years.

He goes on to tell us that there are heavy liabilities maturing in the next few years which must be provided for. In 1903 there are liabilities falling due to the amount of $9,733,000. Suppose we have hard times and money becomes scarce and the rate of interest goes up, and the hon. gentleman goes into the money market to borrow. Our credit will not be so good as it would be if we had saved in good times. But instead of saving the surplus which he has had from year to year and applying it on the debt, he is increasing the expenditure and adding large sums to the debt. In 1904 he says he will have to provide for $20,926,000. Is he likely to do that successfully if hard times come? What is he doing to-day to improve the credit of the country? He told us that the credit of Canada was not quite as good to-day as it was when he negotiated the last loan.

Mr. EDWARDS. He did not say that. He said that the condition of the money market was not quite as good.

Mr. SPROULE. He said it could not be expected that our securities, quoted along side of British consols, would show as well now as they did then, because the condition of the money market is not as good. What is that but saying that our credit does not stand as high? If our securities will not sell at as high a figure, our credit cannot be as good. The hon. gentleman, knowing that he must within the next two years provide for obligations amounting to $30,000,000, goes on with his extravagant expenditure, and makes no provision for these heavy obligations. If the day of adversity comes and we are likely to have bad times in the near future, because the cycle of bad times follows the cycle of good times as surely as night follows day—we shall be obliged to pay dear for it.

The hon. Minister of Finance said that the Postmaster General had made a favourable showing in his department, and was entitled to a great deal of credit. He said: 'Look what he has done, he has thrown off one-third of the postage and yet has made the Post Office Department almost self-sustaining.' The Postmaster General was in my riding in the last election, and said there that when the Liberals came to power there was a deficit of $700,000 in the Post Office Department, but he had wiped it out and made the department self-sustaining. I said at a meeting at the same place that the department was to-day over $300,000 behind, and I was flatly contradicted by a gentleman in the audience, who said that the Postmaster General would not lie. How much was the deficit last year? The Minister of Finance referred to it, but he did not tell us how much it was. It was $461,000. That is the way the Post Office Department has been made self-sustaining. How did the Postmaster General succeed in making a good showing for a year or two? He did it, to Canada's disgrace, by getting out the Jubilee stamps, which he sold for $300,000 or $400,000; and the money came out of people who got no return for it in the world.

Mr. COCHRANE. Out of his dupes.

Mr. SPROULE. Out of his dupes, as my hon. friend says; and he put the money into the treasury to wipe out the deficit, and then boasted that he had made a splendid showing by his economy and that in future the Post Office Department would be self-sustaining. My opponent and also the reform paper in my riding said the same thing. As I have shown, there was last year a deficit of $488,000 on the Intercolonial Railway and a deficit of $461,000 in the Post Office Department. That is the economy, the good management of these hon. gentlemen.

We have been told that the government have been very successful with their immigration policy. I have here the figures of the number of immigrants they have brought into Canada and what do they show? But first I will give the amounts of money spent on immigration. The Conservative government, in its last year, spent $120,000 on immigration, which hon. gentlemen opposite said was entirely too much. The year previous the Conservative government spent $127,000. Every year hon. gentlemen opposite were decrying the expenditure on immigration, declaring that it was money thrown away. But in 1896, the first year of the reform government, they spent on immigration $127,000. The next year they spent $261,000, more than double the amount; the next year they spent $355,000; the next year, $434,000; and the next year, 1901, $444,729. They declared, when the Conservative government were in power, that $120,000 was too much to spend on immigration, that it was money thrown away; and yet in six years they have run the expenditure up to nearly four times that amount. These are the men of economy. They boast of the large number of immigrants they have brought into the country—16,800 in 1896 and 49,000 in 1901; but remember that they spent four times as much money in 1901 while there are not four times as many immigrants brought in. So that they have no right to take any credit to themselves for any great good they have done to the country in this respect. An hon. gentleman draws my attention to the quality of the immigrants. As that subject has been very ably and fully dealt with already, I need do no more than remind the House and the country that in bringing in Doukhobors, Galicians, Poles and Finns, the government will not elevate the standard of civilization in this country. If there is any fusion of these people with the Anglo-Saxon race, the effect must be to lower the high standard of our people. This is not the kind of immigration that this country requires, and I was glad to hear the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) condemn it in strong language the other evening.

Every word he said with regard to it was entitled to respect in this House and the country. How did hon. gentlemen opposite run up that heavy expenditure? They ran it up largely in paying salaries. When they came into office, we had in Great Britain, Ireland, on the continent and in the United States agents and we paid out in salaries $15,000. How many did we have in that year, when these hon. gentlemen took office? We had eleven, and we paid them salaries amounting to $15,000. The next year they had forty-three, and paid them in salaries $36,497. The year following the number was thirty-nine, and the salaries $35,728. The year after that they had thirty agents, and paid them $36,294. Then the next year, the number was raised to forty-three, and the salaries increased to $40,570. So that from $15,000, which was the amount paid in the last year of the late government, the expenditure was increased to $40,500. And that only represents the amount paid to the salaried agents. Over and above those, there are 250 agents in the United States who are working on commission. These hon. gentlemen boast about the results they have accomplished in immigration, but taking into account the additional number of agents they employ and the vast increase in the expenditure and the quality of the immigrants they have brought in, the country will be inclined to give them blame rather than credit for the policy they have pursued.

Towards the close of his budget speech, the hon. Minister of Finance let us into a little secret. He told us that he had decided not to touch the tariff. Some people, he said, were complaining, but on the whole the tariff was doing justice to all. And he told us this, knowing well that by his preferential tariff with England the woollen men were being forced to the wall, the operators forced out of employment, their mills kept on short time, some working on less than half time, and their output largely reduced. Deputations had waited on the minister and made to him the strongest representations; but in the hardness of his heart he decided to do nothing. Neither will he do anything for the lumbermen, who pleaded to have the tariff raised in their interests. Nor will he do anything for the agriculturalists, although he told them how much he intended doing for them when in power. And he will give nothing to the implement manufacturers, notwithstanding the fact that last year nearly $2,000,000 of machines were imported from the United States, thus displacing our own to that extent, to the advantage of the American agriculturalists, to whom the labourers employed in these American implement factories furnish a home market. Nor will he do anything for the beet-root sugar men, notwithstanding the importance of that industry. He has allowed them to bring in their machinery free of duty for one year, but refuses to do anything more. He will neither give them a bounty nor raise the duty on imported sugar, and if that industry cannot succeed with the advantages it has, it may die. He is determined not to give it any bounty to keep it alive. I ask why not do for the beet-root sugar men what he has done for the iron and steel men? Is the farmer not as important as the iron men? If a bounty were paid on the manufacture of beet-root sugar, the farmers would get 60 cents of every dollar invested in that industry. But the hon. gentleman stiffens his neck and hardens his heart, when the agricultural industry is in question, and says he will do nothing.

Then we had a valedictory address from the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). We had heard threatening and mutterings of thunder for some days previous. When the hon. the Minister of Public Works was giving out his views as a protectionist, we tried to draw out the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and did succeed in drawing him out, to this extent, that he told us the time would come when he should pronounce himself with no uncertain sound. That day came and with it came his valedictory address, for we are told that that was the last time we should hear his melodious voice in this House on the tariff. These hon. gentlemen opposite kept his mouth closed the last six years, and if they thought they were going to the country very shortly, they would have muzzled him again. The hon. gentleman has been obliged to be silent all these years and content himself with simply drawing his salary in a position, which he himself declared was an utterly useless one. He told us that he was a free trader on principle, that he had never changed his views, and that those who had changed theirs were going on a very unsound principle. Then he proceeded to give us some information about Conservative scandals, and even brought poor old Thomas McGreevy out of his grave. If anything could show how uncomfortable the hon. gentleman must be in his present position it was this seeking to revive again a dead issue in the person of Thomas McGreevy, who has long ago gone to answer for whatever sins he may have committed. The hon. gentleman gave us an epitaph appropriate to McGreevy, but I think it would have been more appropriate had he given the House an epitaph that would have suited his own career and demise. I think that when the hon. gentleman does leave the political stage, his country would be disposed to put on his tomb stone the epitaph which a Cornishman placed over his departed wife, only changing the name:

> My wife is dead, here she lies,
> Nobody laughs, and nobody cries,
> Where she has gone and how she fares,
> Nobody knows and nobody cares.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to discuss the census and to revamp his old favourite argument about the census of 1891. But in telling us how disappointing it was, he forget to say anything about the cost. What did the census of 1891 cost? It cost $532,000 all told. And the Minister of Finance told us the other day that on the present census we have already spent $948,510, and there is a lot more in the estimates. I am told that the expenditure will amount to over one and a quarter million dollars before we are through with it, so that while the census of 1891 only cost the country half a million dollars, the present census will cost over a million and a quarter. The hon. gentleman was careful to say nothing about that. He said that the last census taken was a better one. Well, so it ought to be, for it cost so much more. Why, there are twice as many enumerators, and the expenditure is still going on.

The hon. gentleman next took up the exodus. He said that the census was most dishonestly taken in 1891. He gave no evidence whatever, but simply made this gratuitous statement, insulting these 350 people who were sworn to do their duty, and who, I believe, did honestly do their duty. Many of these men were just as honest, I am sure, as he was, just as desirous of doing right and of acting conscientiously as the hon. gentleman ever was. He insulted them, declared publicly before the world, in effect, that they were dishonest, that they were untruthful, that they were perjurers, in that they had fraudulently and dishonestly packed the census. And what have they done this for, according to the hon. gentleman? To make a good showing for the Conservative party and to prove that the national policy had done a great deal for the industries of this country. The hon. member for Pictou reminded him that this could not be the case, because the election of 1891 was over before the taking of the census began. The hon. gentleman went on to dilate upon the exodus. What brought about the exodus? he asks. When he told us that the exodus was great during the time when the Conservatives were in power, my mind followed the same train of thought as that of the hon. member for Pictou. I thought it was not hard to find out what was the cause of that exodus. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) himself told us that he had travelled five times the length of Canada and had talked to hundreds of thousands of people dilating on the curse of the national policy and of advantage of free trade, and trying to educate the people up to the belief that Canada was a most undesirable place, that the Elysian fields lay to the south, and that the worst thing for Canada was the national policy. Was it a wonder that the people took the hon. gentleman at his word? Was it a wonder that they came to the conclusion that Canada was not a good place to live in, and so left for the United States in hundreds and thousands? But he did not content himself with lecturing and speaking to the people who came to hear him in different parts of the country. He made known his views to the people abroad. I have here 'The Economist,' of the 13th of Februray, 1892, with an article signed Richard J. Cartwright. Here are the opinions of the hon. gentleman given over his own name. The hon. gentleman was blaming the Conservative party for not bringing in immigrants. Now, this article was going to the very place whence we desire to draw immigrants, and this is what the article says:

> But it is not equally well known on your side of the Atlantic that it has become painfully apparent for some time back, to every one who has been at the pains to examine the evidence which has accumulated on the subject, that, even in that comparatively short space of time, this most ill-advised policy——

This refers to the national policy—— > —has resulted in a tremendous exodus of the very choicest portion of the population of Canada, and in a very grave depreciation in the selling value of farm lands and of town and village property throughout all the older sections of the Dominion, including Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward.

The hon. gentleman says that there is an exodus, but he had been for years before telling the people that Canada was not a desirable country to live in, because people were ground down with taxes:

> This has been accompanied, as is usual in such cases by an immense increase in the aggregate indebtedness of the Dominion in the shape of large additions to its federal, provincial and municipal debts, and also to the mortgage debts incurred by private individuals, and liabilities incurred for the construction of railroads—by far the greater part of all which obligations are held abroad.
> Briefly, in these thirteen years, there has been a great displacement of wealth, caused mainly by artificial legislation but (as regards the older provinces) absolutely no increase at all of the collective wealth of the community. Two or three cities and perhaps a score of towns, have increased considerably, and a few hundred individuals (who have been privileged to tax their fellows for their private advantages) have grown rich by this system of legalized robbery; but the great mass of the population and notably the agriculture class are distinctly poorer and less prosperous than they were twelve years ago.

We had been inviting the English farmers to come out and settle in our country, but the hon. gentleman steps in and says: Consider the condition of the country you are asked to go to. Were they likely to come after what the hon. gentleman said? This article was copied in the newspapers all over England, and it was copied in the newspapers of the continent of Europe, the very places where we were looking for immigrants.

> Take the returns of the recent census, New Brunswick, with an area of 30,000 square miles inhabited by about 60,000 families has added just sixty-one souls to her population from 1881 to 1891.

Then he goes on to speak of Nova Scotia. I do not wish to go over the whole argument. It is interesting, but largely in the same line. He goes on to say:

As to the amount of taxation, the agriculture class has been simply bled white.

Over and above the taxes actually paid into the Dominion treasury to be expended for so called federal purposes, they have been mulcted during all these years under the protective system of at least an equal amount, which is either totally wasted or goes into the pockets of a very small number of protected manufacturers.

The exact amount levied, or, to speak more accurately, pilaged, in this way can hardly be estimated; but it is known not to be less than a sum fully equal to the entire amount credited to the treasury, and probably much exceeds it. In fact, the Canadian tariff (which has been, in the most literal manner dictated by the protected manufacturers) is so constructed that there are innumerable cases in which for each single dollar paid into the treasury, three, four, five, and even ten dollars are taken out of the pockets of the consumer; nay, in many instances the tax is made absolutely prohibitive, so that the public are heavily taxed without any benefit to the revenue.

Then he goes on to speak of the duty on sugar, and proceeds:

Taken altogether, it is well within the mark to say that while the present nominal amount of the taxation of the Dominion is about thirty-one millions of dollars, the genuine actual taxation, i.e., the sum taken out of the pockets of the people for the benefit of the manufacturers in addition to that paid into the treasury is certainly not less and is probably a good deal more than sixty millions.

That is over and above the amount actually taken for revenue purposes. Is it any wonder that we did not get immigrants or that the people left the country? The hon. gentleman goes on:

It would be well if this were all, but, unfortunately, the economic results of the protective system adopted by Canada in 1879, grievous as they are, fade almost into insignificance compared with the moral and political pollution it has brought in its train.

Then he says:

One thing, I think, ought to be clear to all intelligent Englishmen, and that is, that it is utterly impossible that Canada can prosper under her present condition—isolated and in danger of being still more completely isolated from the trade and commerce with the entire continent to which she belongs geographically, losing her population at the rate of one million and a half in ten years (if the official statements of the present government are to be relied upon) and subject, at the same time, to a system of taxation and of organized political corruption such as you have happily been strangers to since the days of Walpole or Charles II.

Then he goes on to say:

The Liberal party of Canada, and, indeed, the great bulk of the people of the Dominion wish well to the mother country, and it is very far from their desire to do anything which in the long run can injure her interests, but their duty in the premises is plain.

As Canadians, they must consult the advantage of Canada first, and if it be,—as it appears to them it is beyond all possible controversy—for the best moral and material interests of Canada to form a commercial treaty which will ensure perfect free trade with the United States, you on your side must be content to allow them to try the experiment. It is, and always has been, my own very strong desire that this measure should be so conducted that it might ultimately result in removing all possible causes of conflict between the two great divisions of the British race, and end in bringing them together in a firm and durable alliance.

That is, the Americans and us. Mr. Blake said it would bring them together in a firm manner, because if they ever succeeded in getting it, it must ultimately result not only in commercial union but in political union. He goes on to say:

I see every reason to hope that that end may be accomplished; but, whether or no, I see still more clearly that some very radical change in the position of affairs in Canada must be brought about, and that very speedily, or else that the Canadian confederation must perish, rotten before it has had time to become even half ripe, as the result of the vice and folly with which its affairs have been administered.

This is the information he gives the people in England. Then he goes on to say:

But in truth the question between the two Canadian parties is in reality an economic one, and in the long run resolves itself into this—shall Canada be governed for the benefit of the people of Canada, or for the profit of a few hundred protected manufacturers, backed by a subsidized press and a purchased majority in the legislature? To talk of loyalty in such a connection is little short of political blasphemy, and I can only express my surprise that such a shallow subterfuge should have obtained even a momentary credence in the mind of any Englishman of even average intelligence.

I have the honour to remain,
Your obedient servant,
RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT.

That is the hon. gentleman who, as I say, for 18 years went up and down this country declaring that a protective policy was ruining it, was bleeding the farmers white, was taking $60,000,000 out of the pockets of the people for every $30,000,000 that was gathered in revenue, and that the only solution was commercial union with the people of the United States. And yet we are told that he sat on that Joint High Commission, and if the information we have is correct, when he was offered unrestricted commercial union with the people of the United States, he had not the hardihood to accept it. When we get these papers we will no doubt find that to be the case. But, as I say, the policy which he declared Canada required, and which he preached for years to the people of Canada and to the people of the mother country, that very policy, when it was offered to him, he dare not accept. Then what will the people of Canada think of his integrity, think of his intelligence, think of his consistency? I am afraid they will not give him much credit for either. Then I take up the 'Economist,' and it comments upon that article:

The Liberal party which Sir Richard thinks is not sufficiently understood in this country, partly as the result of deliberate misrepresentation. That policy he states 'lies in introducing a system of perfect continental free trade, or unrestricted reciprocity with the United States.'

The 'Economist' goes on to say :

Such a commercial union with the States as he proposes would not ultimately be prejudicial to Great Britain. Even if it were otherwise, however, 'as Canadians they must consult the advantage of Canada first, and if it be—as it appears to them it is beyond all possible controversey—for the best moral and material interests of Canada' to effect such a union, we on our side must be content to let them try the experiment.

Such in brief are the commercial policy Sir Richard Cartwright advocates and the reasons he urges for its adoption. That it is a wise policy we cannot however admit.

Now then I read that for the purpose of letting the people of Canada see why we did not get immigrants. The fact is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce and his friends, during all those years, were educating the people of Canada to believe that Canada was not a fit place to live in, and the result was that in many constituencies their electors believed them and left the country in such large numbers that when the election came around in 1891 they were defeated, defeated as I believe in consequence of the education which had been given the people by the Minister of Trade and Commerce himself when he was travelling up and down the country, as he told us the other night he had travelled from one end of Canada to the other. Is it to be wondered at that the people left the country, that we did not get immigrants from England or Ireland, or Scotland, or the continent ? Why, this letter was reproduced in different parts of the United States to show the inferior conditions prevailing in Canada, and I am told the Yankees had the photograph of the hon. minister on the top of the letter, showing that the United States was the most desirable country for immigrants to go to, and that Canada was the last place in the world for them to go to. That is the work of the hon. member for South Oxford, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who gave us his valedictory address the other night.

Well, we are told by these hon. gentleman that it is impossible to do anything to protect the farmer, because, they say, if the farmer has more than he can use he must send the surplus abroad, and as long as he has a surplus you cannot protect him. I heard the hon. member for Russell say the same the other night, and I heard another hon. member from the west say the same thing. I ask the attention of the House for a moment to the result of the duty that was put on pork in 1890. I looked at the quantity of pork brought into the country in 1887, 1888 and 1889. I find that during those three years before the duty was put on, 72,480,606 pounds of pork and pork products were brought into Canada. After putting on a duty of 2 cents a pound on cured meats and 3 cents on fresh meats, what was the result ? During the three years subsequent, instead of 72,000,000 pounds being brought in, only 25,000,000 pounds were brought in, about one-third of what it was before. Then can you not protect the farmer ? Can you not do him some good ? Pork is one of the lines which the farmer depends on in this country, one of the lines out of which he makes his money ; and while this immense quantity of pork was being brought into this country to feed the labouring men, the lumbermen and the fishermen, the Canadian farmer was obliged to find a market for his pork in Britain and to deduct the cost of transport from the profits he would have received if he could have sold his pork at home. We find to-day that only a few thousand pounds are coming into this country instead of the millions of pounds that were coming in before. I find that in 1878, years before that duty was put on, the amount brought in was 17,717,628 pounds. Take 1895, a year or two after it was put on, and only 4,259,697 pounds was brought in. Now the conditions were much the same, and the amount of imports would doubtless have increased every year had it not been for the duty. In face of these facts will any one say that the farmers of Canada cannot be protected ? If hon. gentlemen opposite believe that, why don't they take the duty off pork to-day ? They dare not do it ; yet they have the hardihood to tell the farmers that they cannot be protected, that you cannot increase the value of his product by putting on a duty, because, as long as he has a surplus to export, the home market is no better for him than a foreign market.

I said at the beginning of my speech that there was no agreement between hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to what trade policy this country should adopt. The Minister of Finance has one policy, the Minister of Trade and Commerce has another policy, the Minister of Public Works has a totally different one. One wants free trade, another protection and another a revenue tariff. The hon. gentleman who spoke last said he was in favour of a revenue tariff. What is a revenue tariff ? It was a protective tariff under the old government, but it is called a revenue tariff under the present government. Yet, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce denounced that for years as legalized robbery. Then, if we take some of the members of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite, we find, as for instance the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd), that they are in favour of protection. Each one is in favour of protecting a line of industry in which he, himself, is interested. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Smith) is in favour of the protection of labour, in favour of keeping out Chinamen and Japanese. He is in favour of protecting the labourers in so far as keeping out that servile labour that comes into competition with our own labourers is concerned, and he is in favour of protection to labour so far as keeping out the products of servile, or convict, labour is concerned. But, he will not go any further. He is only in favour of protection for the line in which he is most interested. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) was a member of a deputation that came to Ottawa to ask that a duty be put on lumber, yet he is not in favour of protection. He is only in favour of protection on lumber. There is no settled or definite policy with hon. gentlemen opposite. Their ministry have no agreement. We have always been told that cabinet ministers ought to be agreed upon the same thing, that there should not be any diversity of opinion amongst them, because if they disagree with each other they ought to resign. Why does not the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) resign. He is one of the most out-and-out protectionists in Canada to-day. If this policy prevails, why does not the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce resign, because his policy is the antipodes of it? They have all agreed to hang together but they have no definite policy except to hold on to office and divide the spoils. They will hold on to office as long as they can and as long as there are any spoils to divide. They say that they have a transportation policy. We have heard of that for six years. It is as indefinite to-day as ever it was. They were going to build up Montreal, going to make a fine harbour there, going to build elevators, and they were going to do wonderful things, but they are living in the future, and that policy is indefinite to-day. At that time they were going to extend the work on the Welland canal, they were going to improve Port Colborne, the Rideau canal, the St. Lawrence canal, they were going to improve the French river and the harbours of the Georgian bay, but they have no definite or fixed policy and there is no agreement between them as to what their policy is to be. They have no national pride. If they have they have never shown it. They have no national aspiration. If they have they have not shown it and they do not give the people any evidence of it. National aspiration and ambition have no attraction for them. There is no union amongst them. They proclaim themselves as loyal, yet, they are afraid to say that they are in favour of Great Britain. The right hon. Prime Minister, tells us that he is going home to the coronation ceremony. He told the House a few days ago that he has been invited to go to England, and while there to consider the question of Imperial defence, but, he says he does not want to do it and he refuses to do it. Yet he will go over there and tell them about his loyalty, and he will be put in the front rank of the celebration as he was at the jubilee. He is right in the band wagon as representing the first colony in the empire, yet, he tells us that he will not go home and discuss Imperial defence.

Mr. DAVIS. He won't go home till morning.

Mr. SPROULE. I am inclined to think that with this situation and what the people think of it he will be inclined to stay out all night and think it over till morning. The opposition have a definite policy. They have a policy that is embodied in the resolution now before the House. Will any one say that they are not agreed on that policy? Hon. members will see when the vote comes that we are all agreed upon it. Has there been one dissenting voice in this House raised in objection to that policy? Is it not concrete enough? I think it will suit the most fastidious. Put it alongside of the various and diversified policies that hon. gentlemen opposite have had.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What duty will you put on coal oil?

Mr. SPROULE. Our policy is a protective policy in the interests of the people of the country. What did the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) do? He told the people that when he was brought to power he would take the duty off coal oil. There is a duty on coal oil to-day. The hon. gentleman did not keep his word. He was either dishonest then or he is untruthful now, because he told the people that he would take the duty off coal oil and he has not done it.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. What duty are you going to put on?

Mr. SPROULE. The policy that we have submitted to this House and to the country aims at keeping Canada for the Canadians.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. How much duty on coal oil?

Mr. SPROULE. It aims at building up and developing Canada on broad national lines, not upon sectional lines as does the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. It aims at keeping the market of Canada for Canada's own people and not giving it to the people of the United States, or the people of Germany or to the people even of England. Our first duty is to look after the interests of our own people. It aims at protecting the labour of the country, it aims at protecting the manufacturers of the country and not allowing this country to be made a slaughter market for the surplus products of foreign countries. It aims at protecting the mechanics of the country, at developing the mining industries of the country and lastly it aims at protecting the most important class of all, the farmers of the country on the lines I have indicated. This is our policy. I claim that it is a definite policy and one that in my judgment will commend itself to the respect of the people of Canada. Put that beside the vaccilating policy that the government have carried out for the last six years and it will compare favourably in any part of the country. We have no reason to be afraid or ashamed of it. We are prepared to stand up in favour of it in any part of the country and to tell the people that this is the policy that Canada requires and that the statesmen found among the opposition in this House will be prepared to carry it out just as soon as they are returned to power.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) who has just taken his seat treated us to a lot of figures. The hon. gentleman has a great aptitude for figures, but, I remember in reading in one of Dickens's novels of a party who figured out that he was worth £10,000, but when he came to look at his pocket he did not have enough to pay for his breakfast. There was only one other gentleman who had as great an aptitude for figures as the hon. member for East Grey, and that was the hon. gentleman who at one time occupied the position of Finance Minister in this House (Mr. Foster). I remember, on one occasion when the immigrants that we had got into the North-west, were leaving in thousands on account of the hard times, that hon. gentleman came up to that country and travelled through the country holding meetings. He had a great deal of trouble by figures to convince the people that they were well off, because as a matter of fact they had hardly enough to take them out of the country.

The hon. member for East Grey has alluded to two or three things that I wish to refer to in passing.

In making his comparisons as to the expenditure, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) was very unfair. He said that the average expenditure under the Conservative regime was $44,000,000 a year as against $52,000,000 since the Liberals came into power, but the hon. gentleman forgot to turn to the other side of the ledger, and he never told us how much money was taken in. Let me give him the figures. When the Conservatives were spending $44,000,000 a year they were taking in about $36,000,000, but if the Liberals have been spending $52,000,000 a year they are taking in more than that sum. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) also knows that this government has to provide for services like the Yukon, which the Conservative government had not to provide for, and that if the money is going out on the one hand it is coming in on the other. The trade of the country under Liberal rule has been increasing by $30,000,000 a year as against about $3,500,000 when the Conservatives were running the machinery of the country, and surely the hon. member does not expect us to do such a vastly increased business without an extra outlay. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) told us that the Postmaster General stated in his constituency that he found the deficit in the Post Office Department to be $700,000 a year when he came into office, and that he had wiped out all that deficit. Well, we know the Postmaster General too well to believe that he would make a statement of that kind. It is true that he found a deficit of $700,000 a year when he came into office, and although he did not wipe it out entirely he reduced it to something like $43,000 a year. But the Postmaster General gave the people of this country the benefit of the penny postage not only in Canada but within all the empire. I remember when the proposal for penny postage was first made, the Hon. Geo. E. Foster then stated in the House, that it would result in a deficit of from $800,000 to $1,000,000 a year. Well, that prophecy of Mr. Foster has fallen very far from being verified, and notwithstanding that the Hon. Mr. Mulock has given us penny postage within the empire, the deficit is not $1,000,000 a year, but only $400,000 a year as against $700,000 a year when the Conservatives were in power and when we had no penny postage. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) following his leader, said that the Ministers of this Cabinet could not agree amongst themselves as to a policy. Let me remind these gentlemen that last election a trio composed of Sir Charles Tupper, Mr. Geo. E. Foster and a certain Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, campaigned through Ontario, and let us see how these gentlemen agreed as to their policy. Let me interject the remark that these three gentlemen were left at home at the general elections. Well, while Mr. Foster was promising an increase of duty on agricultural implements, Mr. Hugh John Macdonald who was slated as being the Minister of the Interior in the new Cabinet was declaring in favour of free agricultural implements.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. They are going to have both now.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose they will have both, but it will be a long time before they have a chance of interfering with the tariff in any way. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) told us that the Conservatives were not able to get settlers in the North-west and Manitoba because of the speeches made by Sir Richard Cartwright. If the hon. gentleman looks at the record he will find that there was immigration to a certain extent when the Conservatives were in power, but when the census of 1891 was taken it was found that these people had evaporated, and the reason was, not because of the speeches of Sir Richard Cartwright, but because they were starved out under the Conservative policy and had to leave the country. The hon. gentleman from Pictou (Mr. Bell) tried to dispute the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that the census of 1891 had been padded, and he took up the voters' lists of Ontario to prove this. But the hon. gentleman forgot that in the meantime that beautiful franchise Act under which the Conservatives got votes from the graveyards and from the United States had been done away with, and that the names of the Indians had been taken off the lists, which would account for the decrease in numbers in 1901 as compared with 1891. And now as to the tariff. How remarkable is the change of front these hon. gentlemen have made with regard to the tariff ? When the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding) brought down the tariff in 1897, Sir Charles Tupper, then leader of the Conservative party declared that it would ruin the industries of Canada although there was then only a 12½ per cent preference. All his lieutenants backed him up in this declaration. Next session these gentlemen raked up the old stock arguments about hard times and soup kitchens, but when they found that their prophesies did not turn out, then the next session they declared that we had adopted their national policy, had stolen their clothes, and the Hon. Geo. E. Foster declared that the Liberal government had only reduced the Conservative tariff to the extent of one sixteenth hundredth of one per cent. Others of these gentlemen opposite said that we had given no preference but that what we did was to put up the tariff and then to reduce it by the preference to the level of the Conservative tariff. Again this year these gentlemen have a new cry and they say that some of our manufacturing industries are going to be ruined, and we have the leader of the opposition moving a new resolution in favour of what he calls 'adequate protection.' Coming as I do from the west where we are perhaps more interested in the tariff than in any other part of the Dominion, I would like to have a statement from the hon. gentleman as to what he means by 'adequate protection.' For my part I think we have 'adequate protection' now. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock) who represents the woollen industries in this House no doubt thinks that 50 per cent would be 'adequate protection' on woollens, whereas some of his farmer friends behind him might think that 15 per cent might be adequate enough. I would like the leader of the opposition to come down off his perch and tell us exactly what he means. Does he mean to repeal the preference that is given to Great Britain ? He has not said anything at all about that, although he has skated all around the water-hole, and spoken of a number of industries that are in danger of being ruined. I would like him to tell us also whether he advocates increasing the duties on agricultural implements or on the other necessaries of life if he had the opportunity of doing so ? The hon. leader of the opposition says nothing about his intentions in these matters. I would like to know what he means by adequate protection ? That might mean a great deal or it might mean nothing at all ; it is beautifully indefinite. What the people of the North-west Territories would like to have from the leader of the opposition is a definite statement of exactly what he means. He reminds me of a Yankee pedlar who had only one suit of clothes in his pack. If he called at a house where there was a big man, he said it would suit the man, and if he called at a house where there was only a boy, he said it would fit the boy. This policy of the leader of the opposition is something like that suit of clothes; it is big enough for any man and small enough for any boy; but that is not what the people of the North-west want.

Mr. Speaker, as it is rather late, and as I want to make a somewhat lengthy address, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the House adjourns, I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance, who is leading the House at this time, a communication which I observe in 'La Patrie' of this evening. As that paper has somewhat the character of an official organ, I attached more weight to this communication than I would to one in some other newspapers. The communication, which I will translate, is as follows :

> I have nothing official, but I am under the impression that if the pending negotiations between Kitchener and the Boers are not successful, a new contingent will be recruited in Canada at the expense of the War Office. It is even said that in case of peace this contingent will serve as police, and will replace troops whom it is desired to retire from active service.

I wish to inquire of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance whether there have been any negotiations or whether any circumstances have taken place to lend any warrant to this communication in 'La Patrie' ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It would be obviously inconvenient for us to be held answerable for everything that appears in the newspapers, even in so excellent a paper as 'La Patrie.' I would not like to discuss the matter on the basis of a newspaper report, and I think my hon. friend will see that that is a wise and proper course.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 25, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 78) respecting the Trans-Canada Railway Company.—Mr. Malouin.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I have a word or two of personal explanation to make. Yesterday an hon. member of this House was pleased to state in his place, that I had been guilty of making certain statements equivalent to falsifying the record, and had quoted figures from a certain document which he named, which I could not produce or verify. Sir, that is a peculiarly odious kind of charge, and I may add a peculiarly silly one; for I do not suppose that many members of this House are less likely to make statements and quote figures from a document such as the Statstical Year-book without being able to verify them, than myself. I sent word to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) who is the party in question just now, that I was going to bring this matter up, and I am sorry he is not here. I did not expose the matter yesterday afternoon, because I wanted to see how far stupidity and party spite would drive these gentlemen ; and I also wanted to see that they should be so committed that there could be no possible quibbling and no possible wriggling out of the position in which they had placed themselves. I will proceed briefly to give the House the authority on which I made the statements I did with respect to what appears in the Statistical Year-book for the year 1889. The House will recollect that I gave certain estimates of the population of Canada in the course of my remarks on the budget, and I stated that those had been derived from the Statistical Year-book of the year 1889. The House will also recollect that yesterday it was stated in this House, that these figures were not to be found in the Statistical Year-book, that other figures were given, and a long deduction was made therefrom. Sir, I have here the Statistical Year-book for 1889, printed for the Department of Agriculture by 'Mr. Brown Chamberlain, printer to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty in the year of Grace 1890.' On page 116, of this valuable and veracious document will be found the following statement: In the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1887, the estimated population of Canada is given at 4,875,005 souls. Immediately thereafter, for the fiscal year 1888, the population is given at 4,972,101, and for 1889, the population is given at 5,075,555. I call the special attention of the hon. leader of the opposition to these facts, as he appeared to be under the impression that his colleague from Pictou had been making a correct statement when he disputed the authenticity of my remarks. Sir, that is enough in itself, but there is more also. I stated besides, that these hon. gentlemen—at least, the predecessors of these hon. gentlemen—had carried out the calculation, at any rate as regards one year, and that they had produced the results of showing that in 1890 or thereabouts, the population estimated by them for Canada would exceed 5,200,000. I have here, Sir, the Trade and Navigation tables for the Dominion of Canada for the year 1890, countersigned by Sir Mackenzie Bowell, then Minister of Customs, under date of the 29th December, 1890. On page X, the total duty collected from customs is put down at $24,014,908. On the opposite page, you will find the amount of customs duties paid per head of the population put down at $4.60. You will further find at the bottom of the page this statement :

> The calculations in this column are based on the estimated population of the Dominion in each year as published by the Department of Agriculture and statistics in the statistical Year book. See Pages 116 and 180 of that book for 1889, the figures this year having been corrected to correspond with those in the said statistical Year-book.

Now, I suppose it is possible for these two. hon. gentlemen to go through the profound arithmetical calculation of dividing $24,014,-908 by $4.60, and if they do, they will find by the quotient that the estimated population of Canada, according to the customs returns and the Statistical Year-book, amounted to 5,220,632. Sir, I leave the House to say who has falsified the statements in the Year-book.

Mr. A. C. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I did not hear the first part of the remarks of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and furthermore that I am compelled to leave the city on the first outgoing train, and therefore have not time just now to reply adequately to what the hon. minister says. I regret that I am called away by circumstances over which I have no control, the death of a near relative, to go out of the city immediately; but on my return I will deal with this matter, and I trust that the question may be settled satisfactorily to the House and the country.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that I stated to the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce that I quoted from the Year-book of 1889. It does not appear from what the hon. gentleman himself says that he has any fault to find with the Year-book of last year or that of the previous year, which were the Year-books I referred to. The statistics of these

Year-books are set out in the returns which have been laid on the Table of the House by members of the government in the past two years, and they were the very statistics to which I had reference. I therefore insist that the figures which I quoted and on which I relied, are figures furnished by this government to the country and paid for by this government out of the country's money, and figures which any member desiring to address the House has a perfectly legitimate right to rely upon. If I had told the hon. gentleman that I was quoting from the Year-book of 1889, the observations which he has made might have some relevance; but as he knows that that was not the Year-book to which I referred——

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I had nothing to say to the hon. gentleman. I referred to his friend from Pictou.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). But the hon. gentleman did in the course of his speech refer to my having relied on figures on which he said I should not rely at all. He turned with a great wave of his arm to his followers, and said 'I thought so,' because I used figures which he and his colleagues printed and paid for out of the public moneys of this country, and because I placed some slight reliance upon them. Perhaps I should not have done so, considering the record of hon. gentlemen opposite in the past. Possibly I should apologize to the House and the country for having placed the slightest reliance on any figures which these hon. gentlemen furnish to the House and the country. But in my simplicity and ignorance as a young man in public life, I thought that when the hon. gentleman and his colleagues placed these figures before the House, we might place some reliance upon them. The hon. gentleman with great force and eloquence has pointed out that I had no possible right or reason to do so, and I accept his word with regard to that. If there is any consolation in all this to my hon. friend for having administered the reproof which he did to myself and the hon. member for Pictou, I am sure that as far as our side of the House is concerned, he is entirely and perfectly welcome to it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I beg to state to the hon. gentleman that his friend from Pictou deliberately charged me with falsifying the record. That is what I called attention to, and, if he possessed any sense of honour, he would withdraw the charge.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I draw attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman is falsifying the record which his own colleagues presented to the country.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am not.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding):

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night, I was alluding to the resolution which the hon. leader of the opposition has placed in your hands, in which he professes to outline the policy of the Conservative party on the question of the tariff. I said that as far as I was concerned, I might be very dense, but I would like a little more information from the hon. gentleman as to what he meant by adequate protection to the industries of this country. I pointed out that adequate protection might mean almost anything—that while the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock), who represents the woollen industries in this House, might consider 50 per cent adequate protection to the woollen industry, the farmers who sit on the opposition side of the House might think 15 per cent adequate protection. The people in the North-west are as much if not more interested in the tariff question than the people of any other section of this country, and what we would like is a definite statement from the leader of the opposition as to what he would do if his party got into power. We would like to know whether he would repeal the preferential tariff. That is one thing we in the west are interested in. It has enabled us to get woollen goods at a much lower price than before on account of the 33⅓ per cent preference, which has been a great relief so far. I would like to know also from the hon. leader of the opposition whether he proposes to increase the duty on agricultural implements, on which this government materially reduced the duty. We would be glad to know what the hon. gentleman would do in regard to these and a number of other prime necessaries of life? The hon. gentleman's followers would then be in a position to go round and tell the people exactly what the hon. gentleman's resolution meant. The hon. gentleman has pointed out that if the duty were increased on certain commodities, the result would be to build up certain manufacturing industries, which would be a benefit to the agriculturists in the older provinces, inasmuch as they would provide a home market for their products. But we in the west have to export everything we produce beyond what we consume ourselves, and find a market for it outside of the shores of this Dominion. We have to send our wheat, our butter, our cattle, and everything else to the English market; whereas we have to pay a duty on everything we consume, whether under a protective tariff or under a revenue tariff. We have a revenue tariff to-day, and we do not complain of that, because we know that we have obligations to the nation and we have to bear our share of the taxation. We are willing to do that, and do it cheerfully; but we think the line should be drawn somewhere. When the present tariff was brought down in 1897, a great many of our people in the west were a little dissatisfied, because they thought it should have gone a little further in the direction of tariff reform; but when the matter was pointed out to them, and they realized the advantage they got from the preference, our people were satisfied with the tariff as a revenue tariff. But we are told that there are rumours in the air that there is likely to be an increase in the tariff in the near future. I have heard nothing that would lead me to believe that there will be anything of the kind. My hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), in addressing the House a few nights ago, read from the speech of the Minister of Finance a passage which led him to believe that the government did intend in the near future to increase the duties on certain commodities. Here is what the Finance Minister said, and I do not see anything in it to cause any alarm lest he should raise the tariff :

> We do not propose to make any changes in the tariff this session. I do not for a moment claim that the tariff is perfect. I think, that, on the whole, it has proved a very good tariff. Indeed, when we recall the circumstances, under which our tariff revision took place, when we remember the very complicated and difficult problem with which we had to deal, we may well congratulate ourselves upon our success in devising a tariff so well adapted to the requirements of the country, a tariff under which Canada has prospered in a greater degree than in any period in her history. I have occasionally pointed out the desirability of a reasonable measure of tariff stability. Nothing would be more likely to unsettle business than a practice of introducing frequent tariff changes. Hence, we have resisted applications for many small changes and we think it well to do so to-day. But I would not have it understood that this view can always be held.

I suppose that last phrase is what agitated my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver) : 'I would not have it understood that this view can always be held.' Then the Finance Minister proceeded to say :

> As time passes, conditions change in our own country and it will be well for us to take note of this, so that we may adjust the tariff accordingly. Nor is that the only reason that might require some change. Conditions arise in other countries of which we are obliged to take account. We do not propose that we shall stand still and that this tariff shall remain unchanged, but we think the time is not opportune for making changes at present.

That is all the Finance Minister said with regard to the revision of the tariff. And there are no doubt many things in the tariff that could be improved. For instance, some of our manufacturers are paying thirty-five per cent on their raw material while they are only getting twenty-five per cent protection on their manufactured products. Such a case is a very fit subject for revision. Take again the article of oatmeal. The raw material is taxed more than the manufactured product. This year, owing to Providence having given us a great harvest, our people do not require to buy any oats, but sometimes we have to buy them from the United States, and under our tariff our millers are practically prevented from making the manufactured article. A revision is therefore necessary in the item of oats. A revision of the tariff might be made, which would not increase the amount of taxation on the people in any part of the country. Take the article of coal oil. We are paying at present something like five cents a gallon on all the coal oil consumed in this country. As this subject has already been warmly discussed, I do not propose to go into it at any great length now, but when we consider that in order to benefit some 10,000 people, who are directly and indirectly living out of the coal oil industry, the balance of the population of this country, or 5,300,000 people, is taxed at the rate of five cents a gallon, it is evident that there is need here for revision. It is evident that the knife might be applied to this item, and that the taxation taken off coal oil might be added to some other article in order to protect some other industry, requiring more assistance. So long as you do not increase the general amount of taxation which the people have to pay, there is no objection to you re-adjusting the tariff. We do not care if you take the duty off some commodity which our agriculturists and labourers have to use, and add it on to those consumed by the wealthy. If, for instance, you leave the duty as it is on the coarser grades of woollen manufactures made in this country, which are the only ones that our people can manufacture at a profit, and raise the duties on the finer qualities worn by the rich, there would be no objection on the part of the west. But we do not want the duties raised on the ordinary classes of goods we have to use. We are paying our share of taxation and strongly object to paying anything more.

I listened a few nights ago to the speech made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He made two speeches in this House, as he found one was not sufficient to explain why he had gone back on the faith of his fathers and the faith he had professed during the last fifteen years. I remember in days gone by, before I was in active politics, I used to read the speeches of my hon. friend with pleasure. I used to lie in bed reading them ; I was so proud of them I used to repeat his stories too, they were such good stories. When he was discussing the balance of trade the other night and trying to convince the House that it would be a good thing to cut off our nose to spite our face—or, in other words, because the Americans have a high tariff we should raise our tariff against them in order to get even—I was reminded of a story which he used formerly to tell illustrating that very point. He told us about a farmer, in the old days, when we were selling barley to the United States, who started out with a carload of barley for the American market. At the boundary line he met a gentleman with a lot of gold braid around his hat who asked him where he was going. I am going, replied the farmer, across the line with a carload of barley. You cannot cross with that barley, said the officer, before you give one third of your load as duty. The Canadian farmer protested, but in vain, he had to hand over the one-third and was not very well pleased. He crossed the line and sold the balance which remained to him in the American market, and with the proceeds he bought some nice American buggies with which he started home. When he came to the line again, he was very pleased to see his own native soil, and the first man he met was a Canadian customs officer, with the badge of office around his hat. The Canadian told this customs officer what awful robbers the Yankees were, how they had mulcted him of one third of his load, and the Canadian officer gave him every sympathy. He said: Yes, that is perfectly ture, these Yankees are villains, but we will get even with them. I will take half your buggies from you, and in that way we will get square. That is the story which our hon. friend from North Norfolk used to tell with great gusto, but he has lately seen new light. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not at all interested in the balance of trade as the hon. gentleman puts it. To my mind when people have something to sell, they should sell it in the best market they can find, and when they have something to buy they should buy it where they can get it the cheapest. If they can sell their grain in England at a better price than in Germany, they should do so; and if they can buy in the United States cheaper than somewhere else, they should give the American market the preference. Surely the hon. member for North Norfolk will not maintain that when we have to get certain raw material from the United States, we ought to impose a duty on that raw material coming into this country, and for the reason forsooth that the Americans charge a high tariff on other commodities which they require from us.

Now, if the hon. gentleman should go before a British audience and discuss this balance of trade question in this way, what would he find? He would find that the people there would not listen to a doctrine of that kind; for every person knows that the people of England have to buy raw material from the United States, and, to put on a duty with the idea of getting even with the people of the United States would be merely to work against their own interest. I was going to say that, though we from the west do not take up a great deal of time in discussing questions in this House, yet I notice that whatever question is discussed, nearly every gentleman who rises to take part in the debate speaks of the great west and of the great future of the west. The west has a great future. When you consider that we have there only four hundred thousand people all told, including the people in the cities and towns and people in every line in business, and that these four hundred thousand people have produced in one year one hundred million bushels of grain and a vast amount of wealth in the shape of cattle, dairy produce and so on, making a total of over $60,000,000, I think, hon. members of this House will agree that we have become a factor in the affairs of this country, and one that must be considered whatever question may be taken up. And, when it comes to the question of taxation, the voice of the west will have to be heard. As I have said, we do not expect anything unreasonable; we expect to pay our portion of the taxation necessary to meet expenses of the country. We are practically satisfied with the tariff as it is now. But, if it comes to anything like an increase, I am afraid there is apt to be some grumbling in the country west of Lake Superior. I think I could show by figures, if time would permit, that the tariff is a reasonable one and one under which our industries may prosper. But, when the manufacturers, the woollen men, or the leather men, or the machine men, come asking for an increase of duties, they must remember that the people do not feel called upon to submit to taxation for their benefit. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), the other night closed his remarks with a great flourish about wanting a policy of Canada for the Canadians. I agree with the hon. gentleman. The only difference between the leader of the opposition and myself is that he wants a policy for the minority of Canadians, and I want a policy for the majority of Canadians.

This tariff was accepted by the people of the west as a revenue tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite have changed their position on this tariff question so often, that it is pretty hard to put your finger on them. When the tariff was first brought down they raised a howl and declared that we were going to ruin all the industries of the country. Though we then gave a preference of only 12½ per cent to Great Britain, they predicted that the country would go to the dogs under the new tariff. But when, after a year, they found the country prosperous to a degree it had never attained before, when they found that the mills, instead of being closed were running day and night, and the working people, instead of being out of employment, were earning 20 per cent more wages than when the Conservative government were in power, they changed their ground and said: Oh, this is the national policy; you have only continued the old tariff; you have done nothing to help the country, but have simply continued our policy. I have already pointed out that Mr. Foster, the Finance Minister of the late government, and the man who, while he sat in this House, spoke for the Conservative party on fiscal matters, tried to prove, not only in this House but through the press that we had only reduced the tariff by the one sixteen-hundredth part of one per cent, and that the preference was a sham because we had first increased the tariff and then taken off a slice—in fact he tried to show that it was the same national policy. But when they found in the election of 1900, that the country took no stock in their cry of stolen clothes, we find them changing their position again, and now the leader of the opposition comes down with a policy of adequate protection to the labour, agriculture products, manufactures and industries of this country. I have already shown that a resolution like that means anything or nothing, as you choose to take it.

As showing how the country has prospered, I think it would be easy to point out in what way practical relief has been given to the people—speaking particularly for the people of the west—under this tariff, thereby causing a prosperity such as has never been known in this country before. This tariff, brought down in 1897, and in operation ever since, has been the means of reducing the taxation upon the people to the extent of $10,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about the expenditure, and say that we are spending an awful lot of money. So we are spending an awful lot of money. But if we did not get the money in we could not spend it. In order to make a fair and reasonable comparison between this government and the late government on this point, you must consider not merely the expenditure, but also the revenue in the two regimes. Under this tariff, as I have said, over $10,000,000 have been saved to the people within the last five years. That means that this government, by taking the shackles off trade and allowing goods to come into the country more freely than before, have not merely reduced the taxation of the people by $10,000,000 but have been the means of placing over $50,000,000 a year in the treasury, as against $36,000,000 which was the amount when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. If you take the importations of last year, you find that a saving of nearly $4,000,000 was made by the people as compared with what they would have paid under the old tariff. Exclusive of coin and bullion and of Indian corn, which was simply imported and exported, the duty on the total importations last year made an average rate of 16·90 per cent, as against a rate in 1896, which was the last year of Conservative administration, of 19·19 per cent. That is a reduction of 2·29 per cent in the rate of duty which is equivalent to a reduction, in proportion to the existing rate, of 12 per cent. There is one reduction of duty which, while it was not made for the benefit of the west particularly, has been taken advantage of by the people of the west to a considerable extent. That is, the placing of Indian corn on the free list. I think this is one of the best pieces of legislation proposed by this government. Properly considered, the farmer is a manufacturer. He must finish his cattle if he is to export them to the British market, and, in order to do that, he must be in a position to get his feed at as cheap a rate as does his competitor across the line, who sends his commodity to the same market. Without this, our farmer is not in a position to compete. Our people asked to have barbed wire to be put on the free list, and that was done, and the people have taken advantage of it. Of course, for a year or two after this commodity was placed on the free list, an increase in the price of the raw material had the effect of keeping up the price of the manufactured article so that the people did not see the benefit of the reduction of duty at the time if the duty had not been taken off they would have had to pay 12½ per cent more.

But it has come down again, and people in the west at least realize that benefit was conferred on them when cream separators were placed on the free list. Now $500,000 have been saved to the farmers on these four commodities alone, on binder twine, Indian corn, barbed wire and cream separators. The duties have been reduced on a lot of other articles besides. I know our friends in the west belonging to the Conservative party assert that the government did not do anything in the way of reducing the duty on agricultural implements. As far as a few lines are concerned, such as binders and mowers, that is perfectly true. But there is another large list of agricultural implements that people have to buy, and that perhaps are not so well known as binders and mowing machines, on which the government did reduce the duty. I present this table to the House:

	Per cent.	Per cent.
Implements, farm road or steel rollers	35	25
Forks, pronged	35	25
Hay tedders	35	25
Hoes	35	25
Knives, hay or straw	35	25
Knives, edging	35	25
Potato diggers	35	25
Rakes	35	25
Scythes and snaths, sickles or reaping hooks	35	25
Spades and shovels	38	35
Butts and hinges	32½	30
Wind mills	30	25

	Per cent.	Per cent.
Grain crushers	35	25
Farming mills	35	25
Threshers and separators	30	25
Wire nails	1 c. p. lb	⅝ c. p. lb.
Nails and spikes	¾ c. p. lb.	½ c. p. lb.
Carriage hardware	32½	30
Table cutlery	32½	30
Axes	35	25
Saws	32½	30
Rakes, of wood	35	25

33⅓ per cent off general tariff on all articles.

Now, the item of threshers and separators to which I call particular attention, there is a difference of duty of between 30 and 25 per cent. That does not look very much like a reduction; but when you take into consideration the fact that a threshing machine cost about $2,000, and you figure 5 per cent on that sum, it amounts to a snug amount of money that every man saves who has to buy a threshing mill and separator in the west. Now the manufacturers have nothing to complain of, because, while these reductions were made in the interests of the farmers, there was a certain reduction made on the raw material that entered into the manufacture of agricultural implements in this country, and which enabled the manufacturer to make them a little cheaper than he did before. I do not object to that, but as to reducing the duty any below the present rate, I would object to that.

Now, the duty on coal has been reduced, and the duty on iron and steel. Let me show the average rate or duty under the old tariff and the average rate under the present tariff, on the following articles:

Bituminous coal reduced from 60 cents to 53 cents per ton.

Pig iron reduced from $4 to $2.50 per ton.

Puddled bars, ingots, billets and slabs from $5 to $2 per ton.

Bar iron or steel from $10 to $7 per ton.

Steel shafting from 35 per cent to 30 per cent.

Rolled iron or steel from $10 to $7 per ton.

The rates on these articles are also subject to a further reduction of 32⅓ when the articles are imported from Great Britain.

The outstanding feature of the Liberal policy was the preferential tariff. No step which was ever taken by the government of the country was more popular or has redounded more to the credit of the country. It was the best advertisement Canada ever received and has been productive of the most beneficial results alike to Canada and the empire. The effects of it may be summarized as follows:

It effected a large reduction in duties paid by the Canadian consumer as compared with the duties paid by him under the Conservative tariff. This is illustrated by the following figures:

Articles.	Average rate of duty under the Conservative Tariff, on importations of 1896.	Average rate of duty on importations under the Preferential Tariff, 1901.
Iron or steel manufactures.	25·65	11·56
Woollen goods	31·71	23·00
Cottons	28·53	20·43
Earthenware, chinaware	30·20	20·02
Manufactures of flax, hemp and jute	22·25	18·00
Glass and manufactures of	25·60	17·11
Hats, caps and bonnets	30·00	20·00
Gloves and mitts	35·00	25·55
Leather and manufactures of	20·11	10·70

When we take into consideration the 23 per cent that the woollen manufacturers have in favour of their commodities, I say that is a fair amount of incidental protection, and they ought to be satisfied with it. We find on going over the list that there is a substantial amount of incidental protection on all the manufacturing industries of this country. Now, under the operation of the old Conservative tariff importations from Great Britain dwindled from $52,000,000 in 1883 to $29,000,000 in 1897, which was the last year prior to the coming into force of the preferential tariff. As to the British preference, although our friends opposite say it has not done the English people any good, still under that preference we find that importations from Great Britain have gone up from $29,000,000 in 1897 to $43,000,000 last year. Now it may be that the preferential tariff has not greatly stimulated importations from Great Britain, still I believe that it has been a great benefit to our own people. It has already been pointed out in this House that it would benefit the consumers in this country if we did not import a thousand dollars worth of stuff under the preferential tariff. The very fact of the tariff being in existence, the fact that the wholesale men and others importing goods can import from Great Britain at a certain rate of duty and can lay down the goods at a certain rate at their warehouses, establishes the price, not only of all American goods sold in this market, but it also establishes the price at which the manufacturer in this country has to sell his goods. If that were not so, why would these woollen men be squealing? The very fact of woollen goods coming to this country from Great Britain reduces the price at which they are obliged to sell, and the consumer in this country reaps the benefit to that extent.

I think also that we have done very well in our exports to Great Britain, and there is no doubt that our granting that preference to Great Britain has led the English people to buy more of our stuff. The hon.

gentlemen opposite have time and again challenged the government to show what they have done to improve Canada's exports, what they have done to bring about this measure of prosperity that we enjoy to-day. I say they have done a great deal to bring about this measure of prosperity for the very reason that they have adopted up-to-date methods in running the affairs of this country. They have done as any business man would do in his business, they have made our capabilities known, they have advertised our wares, they have advertised our produce in the English market and other markets, and in that way they have been able to find new markets and to enlarge the old ones for the producers of this country. That is one of the reasons why our export trade has swollen to its present enormous proportions. Let me show you how our exports have grown :

Exports—Canadian Produce to Great Britain.
1898	93,065,019
1899	85,114,555
1900	96,562,875
1901	92,857,525

In 1897 the exports of animals and their produce and agricultural products the produce of Canada, were $47,000,000. In 1901 they amounted to $66,000,000. Canadian butter to the amount of 10,413,131 pounds was sent to Great Britain in 1897, whereas in 1901 we sent 15,602,445 pounds. For the year 1900 we sent 24,317,436 pounds. Cheese in 1897, 163,942,649 pounds, in 1901, 195,-125,317 pounds. Eggs in 1897, 6,939,496 dozen, in 1901, 11,273,452 dozen. Bacon in 1897, 59,552,464 pounds, in 1901, 102,709,560 pounds. Beef in 1897, 363,533 pounds, in 1901, 8,819,213 pounds.

Now as regards foreign trade, I present a summary statement showing the progress and prosperity of the country under Liberal rule indicating the wisdom of the Liberal fiscal policy.

Statement showing the foreign trade of Canada by five-year periods :—that is to say, the five years from 1897 to 1901, inclusive, being the last five years of the Conservative administration :

I think that all goes to show that this country has been progressing fairly under the rule of my hon. friends who now occupy the treasury benches, and I think, that, while it may be that hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied with the government of the day, it has been shown that whenever an opportunity has been given the electorate to pronounce upon the policy of the government, they have intimated that they are entirely satisfied with the manner in which the affairs of the country are being conducted at the present time. There is no doubt that there are hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who are not satisfied. They are in the cold shades of opposition and they cannot be expected to enthuse over the immense trade of this country as they might have done if their leaders in the past had adopted the astute methods of the present administration and had thereby brought about a similar condition of prosperity, because, by reason of advertising our goods in foreign markets and adopting a proper trade policy the government has, in large measure, brought about this state of prosperity. I do not say that the government of the day causes the rain to fall or the sun to shine. No government can do that, although hon. gentlemen opposite used to make the claim in the days of the old national policy that the Conservative party made the hens lay big eggs. This may be ancient history, but in the days of poor old Alex. Mackenzie, when the times were hard and there was a great depression in the United States and all over the world, these hon. gentlemen did not make any allowance for this condition of affairs, but they told the people that through Mr. Mackenzie's bungling and stupidity this state of affairs had been brought about and they said if you put us in we have a panacea for all the ills that man is heir to in the national policy. We do not claim, as I have said before, that the government can make the rain to fall or the sun to shine, thus causing the crops to grow, but the government can do a great deal by assisting to open up the country, by improving the transportation facilities, by giving the people lower freight rates and in various other ways, and a great deal has been done in these directions by the present government.

A good deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the expenditure of the country. I do not want to take up the time of the House in discussing this question which has been threshed out very thoroughly already, but, I may say that we are quite willing to compare the record of this government with the record of its predecessor in the matter of expenditure. How do we make that comparison? The only proper way to get at that is to find the difference between the expenditure and the revenue. The receipts of this country have increased from $38,000,000, in round numbers, in 1895, to over $52,000,000, which we expect to get during the present year. Hon. gentlemen opposite say: Yes, that is very true, but you are taxing the people more. The census has shown that the increase of population does not warrant that increase in expenditure. I have already shown that we are taxing the people less than hon. gentlemen opposite did because we have taken $10,000,000 out of the people less than would have been taken if the old tariff had been in operation. But, neither this government nor any other government ever taxes the people. The government never goes to each man's door and collects the taxes from him. The very fact that the revenue was increased from $38,000,000 to $52,000,000 is the strongest possible proof of the value to the country of the policy of the present government. It goes to show that the government has brought prosperity to the country and for that reason money is flowing into the public treasury. But, if the government were to raise the rate of duty 5 per cent, instead of the money going into the treasury to be spent in the interests of the people in proper public improvements, it would divert it into the pockets of a few manufacturers for the benefit of a few individuals. The policy at present in operation has brought about the present satisfactory state of affairs. Why are we getting this $52,000,000? We do not send tax collectors round to the people's doors to collect the taxes. We are getting this revenue because the people are taxing themselves, because the people are able to tax themselves, because, under the policy of this government, the people have been able to buy luxuries for their families that they were not able to buy under the national policy, because, they are able to dress their families as they never dressed them before, because they are able to buy articles that under the national policy they never were able to buy. If a man is now able to buy two binders, where before under the national policy, he had to cut his crop with a cradle or a scythe and these binders are imported he pays more taxes. If he buys two ploughs with which to cultivate his land, if these ploughs are imported he pays more taxes. If he buys two dresses for his wife, where he had hard work to buy one when the Conservatives were in power and if the goods out of which these dresses are made are imported he is paying more taxes. If hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House were able to show that the money has not been properly expended, then, it would be a fair proposition, but, the proper time, as has been pointed out here before, to do that is when the estimates are under discussion. If any item in the estimates which are brought down here, does not meet the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, they are in a position to move to have that item struck out. I have sat here for five or six years and I have never heard them ask to have very much struck out. On the other hand, they are always asking for more money, and when they are tired badgering the Minister of Public Works to make greater expenditures, then they come down at the end of the session with a resolution in favour of retrenchment and economy, trying to hoodwink the people of this country. I will read a few items showing the difference between the expenditure and the revenue during several years for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite. First I will take the years when the Conservatives were in power. In the year 1884 the difference between expenditure and revenue was $23,695,135.80. Just think of that, $23,000,000. Why, there was as much difference between the revenue and expenditure that year as the whole revenue of the country practically amounted to then. In 1885 the difference between the revenue and expenditure was $14,245,841; in 1886 it was $26,751,414; in 1887 it was $4,500,000, and the last year the Conservatives were in power it was about $6,000,000. Now, let us look at what has been the case since the Liberal government came into power. The first year the difference between the revenue and expenditure amounted to $3,041,164; the next year it was $2,417,802, and the next year it was $2,317,047. These gentlemen opposite now argue that we should keep only one set of books and put down on one side all our expenditure and on the other side all we take in, no matter from what source we receive it. Well, if that is the proper system, the Conservatives were in power for eighteen years, and why did not they adopt it? We never heard a word about it until they got into the cold shades of opposition, and then they commenced to talk. I took a little pains to go through the debates of last session in order to get extracts from the speeches of hon. gentlemen opposite to show the applications they have made to the Minister of Public Works for further public expenditures. These statements, I think, will show how sincere these gentlemen are when they talk about economy. You will notice that their cry is always money, more money. The first on the list is a gentleman named Mr. Blain, and he wants improvements in the Brampton armoury. Next, a gentleman by the name of Mr. Wilson said:

I would call the attention of the minister to the Napanee public building. It requires some pointing, and some outside painting.

Then a gentleman named Mr. Bennett, who is very prominent on the other side of the House, said:

The hon. minister will remember that there was a dock built there last year. Perhaps it would be better to have the dredging done to get at the dock.

He wanted money spent on dredging. Then we come to a gentleman by the name of Mr. Kemp, who represents the large city of Toronto. There is no city in the world that is looking for more expenditure than the city of Toronto. There are more delegations here from the city of Toronto than from any other city in the Dominion. They are here all the time badgering the Minister of Public Works for more money. But, at the end of the session when the leader of the opposition brings in a general resolution in favour of economy, all the members for Toronto vote for it. Here is what Mr. Kemp said:

During the time of the administration of the government which was in office previous to the present government, vessels of the capacity of the St. Lawrence canals in those days were able to come into the harbour of Toronto, but since last fall vessels of 14 feet capacity have been able to pass through the St. Lawrence canals, but they are not able to get into the harbour of Toronto. Now, we contend that a harbour of such importance as that of Toronto should receive the consideration of the government, and that it should be dredged to the depth of the capacity of the St. Lawrence canals.

This gentleman, who is an apostle of economy, wanted the whole harbour of Toronto dredged to a depth of fourteen feet, and I suppose it would cost some millions of dollars, but at the end of the session he was voting for a resolution declaring for economy. Then Mr. Bennett crops up again with another request for public expenditure and he said:

I would ask the Minister of Militia and Defence to consider the claims of the town of Orillia for an armoury. In the county of Simcoe there is an armoury at Barrie which serves the purposes of the town companies, and if my memory serves me right, there is also one a few miles out in a neighbouring township. In the town of Orillia there are two companies, and right across the bay, in the county of Ontario, there is a company in the Rama reserve.

Then we have Mr. Clarke, who represents an important division in the city of Toronto, and he wants more money spent too. He said:

The minister must not forget the great point in connection with the necessity for deepening the harbour of Toronto. My hon. friend (Mr. Kemp) has pointed out that Toronto is the largest distributing point, possibly, in the Dominion of Canada, and if we are going to get the advantage which the hon. gentleman hopes, and which we all hope will result from the completion of these transportation routes, it is absolutely necessary that during the period of navigation we should have at Toronto facilities sufficient to enable vessels which can navigate the canal system to its fullest extent, to take cargoes from Toronto to Quebec and the lower provinces and to bring return cargoes back again.

Then Mr. Maclean, the apostle of government ownership, wanted more money expended, and he said:

Then why not give us $50,000.

Then Mr. Clarke is not satisfied with asking that the whole harbour of Toronto should be dredged to fourteen feet, but he asks further :

Before this item is passed, is it any use to ask the Minister of Public Works if there are to be further supplementary estimates to provide for needed accommodation at the Toronto drill shed ?

He was looking ahead to the supplementaries even, to see if he could get a rake-off there to provide for the Toronto drill shed. Then there is a gentleman named Taylor on the other side, who is another apostle of economy, and when he wanted more money expended by the government, he said :

I do not see any item here for improvements about the two public buildings—post office and custom-house in Gananoque. A drain was put down from the post office, and a granolithic pavement over it, but it has dipped so that it now has become dangerous.

Mr. Fowler wanted more money expended, and he said :

You are taking a vote of $1,000 for repairs to Dalhousie wharf. My information is that it is simply wasting money to be dribbling it out in this way, that is instead of making these repairs the department should make repairs of a permanent character. I do not know any thing personally about it ; I am only giving the information I have respecting it. I am told that $2,500 or $3,000 would make permanent repairs.

This gentleman by the name of Bennett crops up again, and he said :

In order that the minister may not over look it, I would ask him to consider the claim of the town of Orillia, which is the headquarters of two large companies, and which is a town of about 6,500.

Mr. Hughes (Victoria) wanted more money expended, and this is the way he put it :

One of the oldest, if not the oldest, portions of Canada, the site of the old Huguenot French-landing is at the north of the River St. John, and is in a dilapidated condition. Inasmuch as it concerns the race to which the hon. gentleman belongs, and the early history of the country, I would suggest that the government should expropriate that for and preserve it as a public work.

Then, there is a gentleman here who takes a very prominent part in the debates on the other side of the House, named Mr. Osler, and he was asking for something. He said :

With the permission of the committee, I would revert to the Kingston vote, for the purpose of asking a question. I have heard that there was a great want in the college of proper accommodation for the cadets in winter. I am told that there is no skating rink and only a very inferior gymnasium. In fact, there is no place where they can amuse themselves unless they go into town.

Here is a gentleman who is always talking economy, but he was not satisfied with expenditure on ordinary public works, but he wanted the government to spend money on gymnasiums and skating rinks. If he had asked the government to build a wharf on some river or harbour, or to do some work in the interests of the agriculturists of this country, I would not raise any objection; but he wanted them to build a skating rink or a gymnasium at Kingston at the public expense. Another gentleman, who takes a very prominent part in the discussions in this House, Mr. Clancy, said :

There is another matter which the hon. minister seems to have forgotten — Little Bear Creek. I think the locality had the honour of a visit from him at one time. I do not know how far he was impressed, but I have a very strong belief that he was not impressed favourably, because the vote which formerly appeared has disappeared from the estimates.

The Minister of Public Works said he was not impressed with Little Bear Creek, and then the hon. gentleman said : 'Well, I suppose I may as well subside.' I have only broken the crust; I could go on all night reading speeches of gentlemen on the other side of the House asking for more money to be spent. And yet they go out on the platform and talk of the enormous expenditures and the extravagance of this government. When these estimates appear before the House, if the hon. gentlemen are not satisfied with any of the items, they can oppose them and move that they be struck out; but after they agree to all the items, and also get up time and again and ask for the expenditure of more money, it does not look very well for them at the end of the session to trump a bogus resolution in favour of economy. There are certain gentlemen on the other side of the House who have been advocating a vast expenditure of public money for the purpose of building the Georgian Bay canal. A very prominent member on the other side moved a resolution in favour of the country spending something like $65,000,000 on that canal. If the money that comes into the treasury and the money that we have to borrow for the purpose of making necessary improvements is properly spent, I think there will be no kick against it in the country. When hon. gentlemen opposite are criticising the expenditure they should remember that they are living in glass houses. If I wanted to take up the time of the House to go over the expenditures of the eighteen years during which they were in power, I could show up certain expenditures, like that on the St. Charles Branch Railway, which would not warrant the country in giving them a return of its confidence. When we show that they increased the debt by $100,000,000, they answer, see what we have got for it—that magnificent steel band which traverses the continent, the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a great work, and of great advantage to the country; but I do not see how these gentlemen can call it an asset when it belongs to somebody else. If you went over their whole record, you would find such expenditures as those on the Tay canal, the St. Charles Branch, the Langevin block and the Curran bridge; but I need not go over all these cases, because the House knows all about them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have taken up enough of the time of this House. I have spoken at greater length than I intended. In conclusion, I want to refer to what I consider the proper policy for this country to pursue. Instead of manufacturers coming down here and asking the government for more protection, we should turn our attention to the opening up and developing of the vast heritage which we possess beyond the great lakes, and I am glad to see the government doing this to a large extent. In that way we would be furnishing a market for our manufacturers at our own doors. At the present time people in the west are consumers of the greater part of the things which are made in eastern Canada. Your travellers and agents are going all over that country buzzing like flies around a honey pot. They find that $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 of cold cash which our people get for their produce is worth looking after. Therefore, I say that the judicious expenditure of more money on immigration and on improving the transportation facilities to open up that country, is the proper policy to adopt. If the gentlemen who are hunting for a little more protection would work as hard to make a success of their business as the farmers have to do, they would not be coming down here harassing the government for more protection. The farmers have to work day and night to make their farms pay. They do not come down to Ottawa harassing the government for more protection; but these gentlemen, if their machinery gets a little antiquated, or if they get a little old themselves, do not buy new machinery, but come for more protection. I remember a little story, of a gentleman who came down here on a delegation that wanted more protection for woollen goods. A gentleman said to him: 'You get 23 per cent protection against English goods, and you have besides the freight between Great Britain and Canada, which is equivalent to 3 or 4 per cent more; why are you not satisfied?' He said: 'We cannot compete with the manufacturers in the old country.' 'Why?' 'Because our machinery is not as good.' He was asked: 'Why not put in new machinery?' He said: 'I am too old.' It was easier to come down here and ask for more protection than to put in new machinery. The true policy in the interest of this country is to open up and develop our North-west Territories, and in that way provide an enlarged market for our manufacturers. We are getting producers into that country at the rate of 50,000 a year. I am quite satisfied that this year we will get 75,000 if not 100,000 people in there, and these people are bringing in large amounts of money. They are not poor people who are coming from the United States, but are well-to-do people. If we spend $500,000 to bring in 75,000 people, and they bring into the country $10,000,000 of money and goods, they are increasing the wealth of this country to that extent. If we spent $1,000,000 on immigration, and brought in 150,000 people, and they brought in with them $20,000,000, that would be a good policy for this country.

Hon. gentlemen on the other side say that we are not getting in the proper class of immigrants. Well, I am in a position to know more than do these hon. gentlemen who talk so flippantly. I have personal knowledge of the fact that we are bringing in the proper class of immigrants. These immigrants are producing millions of bushels of wheat. Why, there is a little town in my riding, which five years ago was a wilderness, and in that town there are five large elevators this year, and the export of wheat from it was something like a million bushels. That is the kind of people which my hon. friends opposite are so fond of abusing—Doukhobors, Galicians, Germans and other foreigners. What we want is men willing to take off their coats and go to work. We do not want gentlemen with eye glasses. They may be very desirable in the clubs, but in our country we want men who will tear up the prairie and produce wealth, who will take off their coats and apply their muscles to the plough. And that is the class of men we are getting, and the money spent on immigration is the best expenditure that we are making in the interests of the country. and if we were to increase that expenditure, we would be adopting a wise policy.

Then take our transportation facilities, we must have some other method of getting our stuff out of the country. The other day I was taken to task by the Minister of Public Works because I said that the canal system had outlived its usefulness. Well, that system may be all right to relieve the congestion of traffic, but it is not to be compared with railways. We are told that our canals are valuable because were it not for them, our railway rates would be much higher. We are told that the railway rates are regulated by the rates on the canals. It is a sad admission that we should have spent some $90,000,000 on canals for the purpose of regulating our railway rates. It seems to me that we ought to have devised some system of regulating these rates without having had to spend $100,000,000 for that purpose. What we want is a continuous line of railway which can be operated twelve months in the year and double tracked if necessary. Last year four hundred thousand people in the west produced 100,000,000 bushels of grain. We are going to get people in there at the rate of 100,000 per year, and in eight or ten years the production in that country will be increased to 400,000,000 or 500,000,000 bushels, which will have to be carried to the seaboard, and that cannot be done over our canals when they are frozen up six months in the year. What we want is to be able to put our wheat on the car and run it through to the seaboard. There has been too much money spent trying to compete against nature. We have been spending millions of dollars in Montreal trying to create an artificial port—trying to make an ocean port out of something that was never intended to be so by nature. If half that money had been spent on the port of Quebec in providing proper facilities there, where we have a port that can float the largest ship that will be built in the next twenty years, and if we had a railway running from the centre of the territories right into that port, from which our produce could be shipped twelve months in the year, you would not hear anything about the car shortage that we hear so much about at present.

Then we have to take into account the depreciation in the value of wheat and the charges for interest and insurance, when it has to be stored over during the winter, which must amount to at least 6 cents a bushel. There is also this further point to be considered. If we have to depend wholly on our canals, we will have to store an immense quantity of wheat in the elevators at the head of Lake Superior, and when navigation opens in the spring and we throw that on the markets of the world, down goes the price, so that the farmers will be out, not only the loss in storage and insurance, but also the depreciation in value on account of such an immense quantity being thrown on the market.

What we want is a continuous line of railway from the west to some ocean port, and Quebec is the proper place. This would enable us to send our commodities to a port which could be kept open twelve months in the year, and in this way we would stimulate the production of grain and other products in the North-west, and thus not only increase the trade of that part of the country but the trade and wealth of the whole Dominion. This government has still a large domain of public lands at its disposal, notwithstanding the 70,000,000 acres which our hon. friends opposite gave away to railways. Notwithstanding their extravagance in this respect, we have still left millions of acres of fertile land, the property of the people of this country, and by providing proper transportation facilities, by opening up and developing the country, by getting immigrants in there, we will increase the value of our own public domain to such an extent that we will have sufficient in ten years to pay the whole public debt of the country. That is if we keep these lands ourselves and do not give them away to railway corporations. What we want is to get settlers into that country, and if we are not spending enough money at present on immigration, we should spend more. If five and a half million people in round figures are paying now $52,000,000 or $53,000,000 into the public treasury, and 5,000,000 more west of the lakes, and you will double the revenue and thus furnish the means to pay the interest on any amount of money to be spent in developing this country.

I wish to say a word or two on railway subsidies. I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite condemn the system of railway subsidies and advocate government ownership of railways. That policy of government ownership is a new fad put before the people of the west, but I submit that we need only turn our attention to the government railway which we are now operating to show that such a policy is not practicable. If the railways of a country could be run by the government outside of politics, no doubt that would be a good thing, but with our present experience of an expenditure of over $50,000,000 on the Intercolonial Railway, without ever getting back a cent of interest besides being obliged to operate the road at a loss, I do not think it would be wise on our part to extend that experience. Even if it were shown that the people along the line of that railway are getting the benefit in the shape of cheaper rates, that would be some compensation, but that is not shown. It is not proved that our government railway is carrying freights or passengers at cheaper rates than other lines. And yet still the country has to face a heavy deficit in the operating of that line besides not getting any interest on the capital investment. These hon. gentlemen who advocate government ownership point to Australia. Well, I do not know much about Australia, having never been there, but I find that the per capita expenditure of that country is $38 per head as against $10 in Canada. How comes it that these people have to pay $38 per head.

Hon Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.). Because they own the railways.

Mr. DAVIS. Then we do not want to own any railways, if such ownership is going to entail a rate of taxation amounting to $38 per head. But there is such a thing as regulating the railways without government ownership. I do not think that it is advisable for a government to run railways, but it is high time that the government had control over them and forced them to treat the people as they should. In every state of the American union there is a railway commission which controls the railways, and there is besides the Interstate Commission which settles all disputes between the states. But on this side of the line, although our exports are greater per head than on the other side, we are still without any means of controlling our railways, and I hope the government will take action for the appointment of a railway commission. We are told that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council attends to this matter. No doubt, Mr.

Speaker, that has been a very efficient body during the last five years.

Take for instance the railway rates on coal oil. In that case the committee did their duty to the people. I know that in other cases they have proven themselves to be an efficient court. But this country is growing, new transportation companies are being started, we are going ahead by leaps and bounds; and the time has come when we must have somebody, as they have in England and in other countries, to regulate the traffic on the railroads of this country. I pointed out in this House last session, that, west of Lake Superior we were paying double what they were paying in the east as a local rate. We do not expect, in a country like that where there is little local traffic, to get a rate as cheap as in this part of the country. But we do expect fair treatment, and I believe that we cannot get that fair treatment until we get that railway commission. There are a hundred and one things for that commission to deal with. The cattle-guards question for instance, should be under their control. Such a commission should take means to find out the kinds of cattle-guards in use in the United States and other parts of the world, learn which is the best form of cattle-guard and make a recommendation to the government accordingly. This done, the government would be in a position to legislate intelligently upon this important question. Then there is the question of shortage of cars. There is an evil which we have felt very keenly in the west this year. For, after all, the grain bill has nothing to do with it. I do not blame the railroads for the shortage of cars altogether. We raised two crops in one year in that country, and it was not to be expected that any railroad could take that out of the country in a month or two. But what I do complain of is that the railroads discriminate against the farmer and small dealers in favour of the elevator man and the man who was in a position to ship large quantities of grain. But the railroad people say that they did this in the interest of the country, because cars in the hands of big shippers were loaded more quickly and so there was less delay and, on the whole, more grain was shipped out than could have been shipped out if the cars had been given to the farmer. It may be that there is something in that argument. But I have known cases where the railroad has refused point blank to give a man a car. These things need to be inquired into and regulated. And the sooner the government take steps to appoint a commission to control the transportation companies, the better it will be for all concerned. Another thing that the commission should do is to see to it that a uniform system of book-keeping is adopted by the transportation companies, so that the public may know exactly how much capital these companies have invested in their enterprises. Nobody wants capitalists to put money into railroads without getting a fair return. But we want to know how much they have put in, so that we may know what is a fair return. They may say that they have, for instance, $65,000,000 worth of stock, but we may know that that is half water, and still they are paying five per cent on the whole, and, in order to do that, charging rates which, we contend are too high. The commission should be empowered to examine the books of every transportation company, to ascertain how much money has been invested, and allow them to charge such rates as will give a fair return.

Mr. Speaker, I have taken up more time than I intended to. I hope and believe that, in the season now opening, we are to have a great influx of population into the western part of this country. I hope that, in dealing with all the questions I have spoken about, the government of the day will recognize the fact that we are 'getting a big boy now' in the west, and that, when it comes to questions of taxation and other things of that kind, our interests must be consulted. When delegations of manufacturers come for increased duty, or delegations of promoters come for subsidies for Georgian Bay canals and other works, the government must take into consideration that their friends, and not their friends only but the people, the great producing people of the west, are interested in these questions and that the position and interests of those people must have consideration at the hands of the government of this country.

Mr. A. E. KEMP (East Toronto). Mr. Speaker, considering the marked ability with which this debate has been conducted by hon. gentlemen on both sides, it would be presumptious in me to think that I could add any interest to it by any remarks of mine at this stage. At the same time, I feel that I should not be doing justice to myself if I did not express my views on certain public questions which have been before the House for the last few days. We are trying in this country to solve various problems according to the light that is thrown upon them, considering the whole field of our trade and commerce and our fiscal arrangements, and also the field of foreign trade and commerce. My hon. friend (Mr. Davis) who has just resumed his seat has charged the leader of the opposition with not stating what changes he would make in the tariff. That hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) himself has ventured to state, in respect of certain items, just what, in his opinion, the tariff should be. It seems to me that the way to frame a tariff is to take evidence from various quarters, and, after carefully weighing it, and considering it from every point of view, to decide what each tariff item should be. We are a great confederation, and I hope that this confederation of ours is bound together by bonds as strong as those which unite the various states of the United States of America. And I hope that the policy which will guide us in the future in determining these various questions regarding our trade policy, will be one which will result in benefit to the people taken as a whole. In dealing with this question we must take into our earnest consideration our geographical position, our national position and our sentimental position. Sentimentally, I take it, we are pretty well agreed that the country will remain British and that we need not go into any discussion as to that. Geographically, however, I have no hesitation in saying, if there were no sentiment in the question, that, after a few years, we would become a part of the United States. I do not think there is any intermediate line—either we are to be British or we are to be American, and I believe we are to remain British. But we have to ask ourselves the question : Are we in a position to grant to our people, through legislation, as much as possible, those material blessings with which the people to the south of us are favoured. I say we are. Unfortunately, however, for a long term of years we have been witnessing conditions which have been very distasteful to us, which have grated upon our finer feelings. Our pride has risen in us, and we have as it were set our teeth, when we have witnessed what has been going on in this country for the last fifty years. I refer to the exodus which has been talked of in this House under the administration of various governments. We have not faced the question as we should have faced it. We have been living alongside this agressive people to the south of us who have studied our trade conditions and have decided what will be in their best interests, and have proceeded to put upon their statute-book laws which were very much against our interests and very much in favour of their own. It seems to me that, in considering this matter, we have not taken advantage of our opportunities. When we discuss this question in this House, we would not like every observation we make to reach the ears of our friends to the south of us.

We are sorry to have to face the present situation, I very much regret for myself that I have to admit that this country has been a breeding ground for the United States for many years past. We are a young country with great natural resources, and with a people eminently fitted to develop these resources. We have hitherto occupied in this country a position similar to the position which the thickly populated nations of Europe have occupied, for Canada, as well as they, has had to witness great numbers of her population going into the United States. In the European countries, however, population has been overcrowded, and there has been reason for the large immigration to the United States, a reason which does not exist in Canada. There is room enough here for every one of our sons born in this country, and in view of the heavy losses we have sustained by immigration I think the time has come when we should make a determined effort to prevent that drain upon our population. We educate our young men in this country, and as soon as they come to years of maturity they flit away to the United States. Our universities, I am sorry to say, contribute to the same result by the high class education which it gives them. As soon as our young men go to the United States they immediately are sought for to fill the highest and most important positions in that country. It is evident that young Canadians are of more value to the United States than the men who come to that country from Europe. I say that we are becoming weary of witnessing this kind of thing. There is no doubt that our young men who go to the United States are more highly prized than the men from any other nation in the world, owing, I presume, to their home training, and to the surroundings in the midst of which they were brought up in Canada.

Now, the United States seem to know, as shown by their legislation, what is in the best interest of the American people ; but we cannot say that of our own legislation hitherto. I think, Mr. Speaker, the time has come when we should set ourselves to the task of looking after our own interests, and of retaining our population at home. I admit that the task is a very serious one, and requires careful study, but I think that it is quite possible to improve our condition. In discussing this question we must consider it on broad national grounds. I have no sympathy whatever with those petty and sectional considerations which are sometimes imported into the discussion of our public questions. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is a feeling of friendliness existing throughout this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, among all sections of our population. We are a great confederation, and we are bound together by bonds which will not and cannot grow any less in the future. The business men in the industrial centres of Quebec, such as Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers, St. Hyacinthe and Sherbrooke, are found extending their operations from one end of this Dominion to the other, trading with business men in the far west, and with business men of Ontario and the maritime provinces. In fact the commercial interests of the people in all sections of this country are intermingling and becoming mutually more dependent on each other. We all desire to develop the great North-west of which my hon. friend from Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) has spoken with such marked ability this afternoon. We are bound to develop the North-west, and we must ask our friends from the North-west to assist us in developing the east. I am sure that their loyalty to our common country will lead them in the future as it has in the past, to see that it is only by a common policy that our common interests can be subserved and the whole country developed.

During the budget speech the hon. Minister of Finance gave us the usual statistics regarding our foreign trade and the figures of receipts and expenditure. These figures were very interesting. I was somewhat astonished at the liberty which the Minister of Finance took in some of his statements. It seems to me he was taking great liberty with an over ruling providence in failing sufficiently to attribute our prosperity to the productiveness of the soil, and the development of our natural resources during the last few years. The first matter to which I shall refer in reference to the budget speech is the manner of bookkeeping as applied to our public accounts. A great deal has been said about surpluses. I understand a surplus from a business standpoint, the same as a business man would understand it. I do not think people in general understand what the Minister of Finance was trying to make out when he spoke of the question of surpluses ; but I notice that the press of this country who support the government have tried to make a great deal of credit for the government out of this question of surpluses. In discussing this question I do not propose to deal with consolidated revenue, capital account, or matters of that kind ; I am simply going to draw attention to what our income and receipts have been during the last six years, and to compare them with the income and receipts during the last six years of Conservative administration. I propose to take these figures, because they comprise all the moneys which we have received and that have already been used. Now, as comparisons are in order, I would like to direct the attention of the House to these figures :

Total income or receipts, 6 years.

1892	36,921,871
1893	38,208,608
1894	36,374,883
1895	33,978,129
1896	36,618,590
	$220,681,394
Average, 6 years	$36,780,232

Total income or receipts, 6 years.

1897	$37,829,778
1898	40,556,510
1899	46,743,102
1900	51,031,466
1901	52,516,332
1902 (estimate)	56,800,000
	$285,477,190
Average six years	47,579,531

The average during the last six years of the Conservative administration per annum was $36,780,232 and the average during the past six years of the present administration was $47,579,531. That is to say that the present administration, during the term they have been in office, have taken from the people $64,795,796 in excess of what the Conservative administration took from the people in the last six years of their regime. But Sir, with this great increase in the expenditure which we see, has the debt decreased ? Has the debt stood still ? The debt, to-day, is $15,982,570 in excess of what it was in 1896. The public debt at the end of the present fiscal year adding the increase according to estimate of the Minister of Finance of $6,000,000 will stand $274,480,003. Therefore, we have here all the money that has been received and we have a tremendous increase in the debt also. Therefore, I submit under all these circumstances there is no real surplus. The expenditure in 1896, taking out the North Shore Railway subsidy charged in that year was $41,702,383. In 1901 it had risen to $57,982,866, and in 1902, we are informed by the hon. Finance Minister, that the government, proposes to expend $65,000,000. Now, Sir, I submit that this is an alarming condition of affairs, because we remember that in the time when hon. gentlemen who are now holding the reins of power were in opposition, and when the expenditure was $38,000,000 per annum, said to the people of the country that if they would put them in power they would reduce this expenditure by $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 per annum. Now, Mr. Speaker, the question arises : Were these hon. gentlemen sincere ? As far as I am concerned I do not want to say that they were insincere in respect to their promises to the people in those days. They went up and down the country and they did appeal to the people and tried to frighten them at the enormous expenditure of that day. They alarmed the people and they were pictured in those days as going about the country with tears in their eyes bewailing this tremendous expenditure. But, I venture to say, while I do not accuse them of insincerity, that the tears which were pictured as steaming down their countenances were all crocodile tears. I believe, in view of what has happened since they came into office, that there is reason to justify that belief. The debt per capita has increased from $8.22 in 1896 to about $12 per capita at the present time. Notwithstanding that I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that during the Conservative regime a tremendous amount of money had to be expended on public works which the present government have not had to expend since they came into power. During the Conservative regime from 1878 to 1896 they spent on the Canadian Pacific Railway $65,000,000, while the Liberal government have only had to expend $33,000. On canals the Conservative government had to expend $36,000,000 while the Liberal government have only had to expend $14,250,000. On account of the debt of the provinces the Conservative government had to expend $10,300,000 as against $267,000 expended by the Liberal government. and on the Intercolonial Railway the Conservative government had to expend $20,500,000, instead of $8,250,000 expended by the Liberal government.

Now, I admit that the tariff is specially arranged for revenue purposes. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) has stated that the tariff is so arranged as to bring in a revenue. His theory is that the first and most important object to be sought is framing a tariff is to so frame it as to raise a revenue regardless of any other consideration, and we have had it from the lips of the right hon. Prime Minister that :

> Our first consideration in imposing duties, is to produce revenue, and if, as an incident, the manufacturers derive advantage, they are welcome to it. But, gentlemen on the other side impose duties, not with a view of levying a revenue and putting money into the treasury, but of putting money in the pockets of private individuals.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce also pointed out in respect to that question :—

> Would it surprise him——

Referring to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax)—— > ——to know that it would be equally easy to double, treble and to quadruple the actual taxation of the people of the country and at the same time to reduce their nominal taxation to one-half or one-third of what it now is ? Would it surprise him to know that ?

I submit to hon. gentlemen opposite right here, when they say the tariff is a revenue tariff that it is a tariff which is calculated to take large sums of money out of the pockets of the people and they do not consider that the chief object is one for the promotion of our industries, but that the chief object is to raise revenue, that, on the other hand, we differ, and we say that the chief object should be to protect the industries of this country, to pursue such a policy as will give employment to our people, in order that we may be able to keep them in this country. I say that it would be in the interests of the people of this country, in the interest of public economy, and it would be good policy at the present time to have less money flowing into the treasury. It would be a good thing if the government were occasionally hard up and had very little money to spend. I think we would carry on the affairs of the country much more economically if that were the case. In reference to the pledges of the party which is now in power, I do not intend to say very much. I have no doubt that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce feels very keenly on this subject and we listened with a very great deal of interest to what he had to say a few days ago. It was said in some quarters owing to the peculiar character of the speech which he made, that it was his valedictory, and that perhaps he would be translated to a higher position in the eyes of the government where he could be of greater use to the country during the coming years. He was reminiscent in what he said and I felt some degree of sympathy for the hon. ministers who surrounded him, when he made the statement :

> That even the best government that ever existed, even a government like that of the late Alexander Mackenzie, could not have averted the disaster which overspread the whole world, although it might have greatly modified it.

It seems a peculiar thing that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce should have taken this opportunity to bring the attention of the House to the fact that the Mackenzie administration was the best government that ever existed, and, therefore, I say that perhaps the hon. gentleman may be translated to a higher position. But, before he is translated and before he leaves this House, I hope he will tell us what he thinks of this $65,250,000 of an expenditure, or nearly double what it was in the years when he advocated economy in the way in which he did. Regarding our trade a good deal has been said in respect to it being on a satisfactory footing. I contend that there are signs that it is not altogether on a satisfactory footing. The balance of trade is against us at the present time and it is made up as follows : Our exports in 1900, deducting gold bearing quartz, silver concentrates, coin and bullion, amounted to $167,735,057, and our imports, deducting the same things, amounted to $186,878,231, leaving a balance against us of $19,234,994. The United States exports were in excess of their imports during the year 1901 by $664,592,826. In so far as we have in this country to export very many of the same commodities which the United States have, and if our industries were developed to the extent to which I think they will be, and to which I think they ought to be, there is no reason why we should continue to have this balance of trade against us. We look at the United States exports to Great Britain and we find that in 1901 they increased by $93,272,475, while the exports of Canada decreased by $2,407,412. That is not a picture which is very satisfactory and I do not think that the government can take much comfort out of it. Indeed I am surprised that the Minister of Finance dwelt upon these matters to the extent to which he did.

Then as regards our trade with the United States it is not in a satisfactory condition. Our exports to the United States, deducting gold bearing quartz, silver concentrates, coin and bullion, in 1900 amounted to $44,477,451, and in 1901 our exports to the United States amounted to $43,795,001; a decrease of $682,150, while during the same period our imports from the United States had increased by $6,762,733. I think the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is responsible for the following figures. We export to the United States farm products to the value of $8,096,092, which is 10 cents a head of the population of the United States, while we are taking of such farm products from the United States $19,147,732, or $3.48 per head of our population. My object in giving these figures is to draw attention to the fact that our present trade conditions must be considered if we are to develop this country in the way in which we hope to. In this connection I would like to draw attention to the industrial development in the United States. At the National Reciprocity Convention held at Washington last year, it was pointed out that the manufactured products of the United States amounted to $13,000,000,000, and that they exported of that $412,000,000 or from 3 to 4 per cent. In 1890, ten years previous, the manufactured products of the United States amounted to $9,000,000,000, and they thus had increased in the ten years 45 per cent. If the industries of the United States go on increasing in that ratio which is quite probable, then in another ten years instead of having a total production of thirteen billions they will produce nineteen and a half billions. It therefore becomes an interesting question for us as to what is to become of their surplus output. Our geographical position towards the United States would lead one to suppose that if they have a surplus which they are bound to get rid of, Canada is the easiest and most likely place in which they will try to find a market. I do not need to-day to give illustrations of what we mean when we refer to this question of slaughtering American products in Canada. I have only to refer to the illustration which the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Heyd) gave to this House in reference to the article of shears, which any gentlemen by referring to 'Hansard' can see for themselves. I need not take up the time of the House discussing this question, because it already has been dealt with, but I will emphasize the fact that we must consider this question very seriously, and we have come to a time, when, I believe we must take prompt action in order to protect our own industries and our own people from the over production of the United States. We do not fear United States competition under equal conditions. We want Americans to come and locate their industries in Canada, but we do not want them to carry on operations against Canada from across the border, where they are not liable to the laws of this country, and where they do not contribute to the revenue of this country and do not help in any way to make of Canada a great and strong nation. Before disposing of this question in reference to trade, I would like to refer to certain words contained in the first presidential message of Mr. Roosevelt in reference to the attitude of the United States so far as they are concerned, in protecting their home market. He said :

Mr. KEMP.

It is most important that we should maintain the high level of our present prosperity. We have now reached the point in the development of our interests where we are not only able to supply our own markets, but to produce a constantly growing surplus for which we must find markets abroad. To secure these markets we can utilize existing duties in any case where they are no longer needed for the purpose of protection, or in any case where the article is not produced here and the duty is no longer necessary for revenue, as giving us something to offer in exchange for what we ask. The cordial relations with other nations which are so desirable will naturally be promoted by the course thus required by our own interests.

I need not repeat what was said by the late President McKinley in his remarkable speech at Buffalo, and which was referred to by the hon. leader of the opposition, but I would like to read an extract which is a characteristic one so far as the Americans are concerned, and which appeared in the 'Implement Age,' August 15, 1901, published in Philadelphia :

It is safe to assume that, under the present condition of affairs in Canada, some tariff agreement which would make the road into Canada easier for our manufacturers would be greatly to the advantage of this country, as we could not only hold our ground but invade Canada with our manufactures. In proof of this claim it may be stated that for the nine months ending with March, 1901, we sold implements and machinery to British North America to the value of $1,368,000, while Canadian manufacturers sold nothing in such lines in this country. If the tariff should be reduced our manufacturers would no doubt increase their sales in Canada while Canadian manufacturers would be unable to meet the American manufacturers in the United States markets under any kind of tariff.

In reference to the question of protection in our own country, we have heard from the Minister of Finance that the policy that we should pursue was the policy of teaching Canadians to use Canadian goods. That is a very nice theory indeed, but it is a very impracticable one. I have heard it often spoken of before, but when I consider the great competition there is between merchants, how anxious every merchant is to get something a little different from his neighbour and to buy a little cheaper; when I realize how little attention the merchant pays to mere sentiment in his dealings, and how he proceeds to supply himself with these articles which are most suitable to his trade regardless of where they are produced; when I think of this, I am not inclined to put much faith in the policy outlined for us by the Minister of Finance. I believe that in the whole consumption of this Dominion of Canada there would not be $50,000 worth a year of goods sold on account of a sentiment of that kind. Therefore, so far as that peculiar sentiment is concerned, we need not pay much attention to it, although no doubt the recommendation of the Minister of Finance is a very loyal utterance, and one which I would be glad the people of this country would adopt. I do not think, however, that there is any reason to hope that our people will buy Canadian goods simply because they are Canadian goods.

The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is also responsible for this statement, that we could produce, of our imports from the United States, about $65,000,000 worth of manufactured products. Now, I am not sure but what that is a little larger sum than we could hope to produce. I think perhaps that of the imports of the manufactured goods into this country from the United States, we might reasonably produce upwards of $40,000,000 worth, and if we produce $40,000,000 worth of manufactured goods in this country more than we are producing now, I submit that it would give employment to a great many more people, and to that extent there would be fewer people to emigrate to the United States and find homes there.

I have also heard the statement made by an authority on this subject, that if that amount of goods were produced in this country affording employment to the extra number of people required to produce them, there would be a consumption of farm products in Canada to the extent of $11,000,000 worth more than at present.

I regret that I cannot believe that the exodus to the United States has been stopped or indeed diminished to any great degree. From information which I have had from various parts of the country, I am told that the exodus is still going on, and those whom I know in the United States and who formerly lived here, tell me that the exodus is continuing.

The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) was very anxious to know what the government are going to do with regard to the tariff. He was trying to find some proof that the tariff was not going to be raised. I do not see any reason why the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davis) should be alarmed. He has the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) with a policy on this question, and on the other hand he has the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) with an entirely different policy from his other two colleagues. But as there are two ministers against one, they ought be able to win the day, and leave the mind of the hon. member (Mr. Davis) at peace as to the tariff. We will not deal with the other members of the cabinet as to their attitude on this question, because we have not been able to get from them a definite announcement of their opinion. But, Sir, the time has come when we should have a cabinet which would have but one opinion as to our fiscal policy. The time has come when different members of the cabinet should not advocate different policies in different parts of the country. The crisis is too serious for that. We have alongside of us a nation which is trying to get hold of the business of this country; a nation which pays no attention to the economic theories which were discussed by the hon. gentleman from Saskatchewan. The Americans disregard such theories, but they aim at practical results; an example which I hope this country will follow in reference to our fiscal legislation in the future. Let me refer to an observation which was made by the Prime Minister—an observation which was made by him recently on more than one occasion—namely, that we have turned our face from Washington. It seems to me that is a very remarkable statement for the Prime Minister to have made in view of his past record. At the same time I was glad to hear him say it, because it will be better for this country if we do to some extent turn our face from Washington. At the same time I am prepared to believe that there are certain questions of difference between this country and the United States, which it should be the duty of our statesmen to have settled. I remember in years gone by, before hon. gentlemen who are now in power occupying the treasury benches, that they were never tired of telling the people of this country that if they came into power they would settle all these questions. I have here a copy of the Liberal platform of 1893, which has been given to me by a good Liberal. He has been studying it and reading it all these years, and it is almost worn out; but I think I can make out from it what was said in those days by hon. gentlemen opposite, who were then in opposition, about the government going to Washington :

> That no sincere effort has been made by them to obtain a treaty, but that on the contrary it is manifest that the present government, controlled as they are by monopolies and combines, are not desirous of securing such a treaty ;
> That the first step towards obtaining the end in view is to place a party in power who are sincerely desirous of promoting a treaty on terms honourable to both countries.

While I have this remarkable document in my hand, I would like to refer to another statement in it, in regard to economy and expenditure :

> We cannot but view with alarm the large increase of the public debt and of the controllable annual expenditure of the Dominion and the consequent undue taxation of the people under the governments that have been continuously in power since 1878, and we demand the strictest economy in the administration of the government of the country.

Now, with regard to having turned our faces away from Washington, we have been told only within the last few months that this is the policy of the present government. Therefore we may take it for granted that the various questions still in dispute between this country and the United States are not going to be settled, and that no attempt is going to be made to settle them. The 'Globe' of August 19, 1898, said:

It is ten years since the last international conference was held on this side of the Atlantic and on that occasion, although Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Bayard and the other conferees laboured faithfully to settle the Atlantic fisheries difficulties, the settlement was contemptuously tossed aside by the Senate of the United States. The present conference assembles under happier auspices than the Fisheries Commission, because the relations between the United States and Canada are distinctly cordial instead of being dangerously strained as they were in 1888.

The Anglo-American entente also is an element that can scarcely be left out of the calculation in estimating the probable result of the gathering.

Now, we have the fact before us that the conditions were peculiarly favourable to the present government for procuring a settlement of the various questions pending between the two countries. What were those questions? They were the following:

1. The Behring Sea difficulty—fur seal fishery.
2. Reciprocity in trade.
3. The Atlantic and Pacific coast fisheries.
4. The Alaskan boundary.
5. The bonding privileges.
6. The preservation of fish in contiguous waters.
7. The maintenance of naval vessels on the great lakes.
8. The alien labour law.
9. The wrecking laws.
10. Transit of merchandise.
11. Mining rights.
12. Definition of marking of frontiers.
13. Conveyance of persons in custody.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the government take the ground that none of these questions are capable of solution, I submit that we must question very much their ability as negotiators. I hope, however, that the government, if they cannot solve all of these questions, will at least take up some of them and dispose of them during the term of their administration.

As we have turned our faces away from Washington, I think we should at the present time turn them towards Germany, which is discriminating against this country in trade matters. During the last day or two I noticed a press despatch saying:

A special to the 'Herald' from Washington says:—Secretary Wilson is preparing to enforce retaliatory measures against Germany. He is formulating regulations for the exclusion of any products of that and any other countries which are preserved or in which boracic acid has been used.

This is the direct result of the decree issued by Emperor William prohibiting the importation of American meats upon which boracic acid has been employed as a preservative. The Department of Agriculture holds that boracic acid is not injurious, and it is satisfied that German action is due to the pressure of the Agrarian party. As the secretary pointed out in his memorandum to the Department of State, there are many articles of German exportation which this government can exclude for clear sanitary reasons. These include German wines and German malt liquors.

Thus, you see that the moment Germany or any other nation in the world, attempts to discriminate against the people of the United States, the United States government proceeds to act. But Germany has been discriminating against this country for the last three or four years, and all that this government have been doing apparently is taking the matter into their consideration. We ought to be in a position to do something to bring Germany to time. She is discriminating against our wheat as compared with that of the United States to the extent of 50 per cent, against our rye 40 per cent, against out oats 50 per cent, and against our peas 40 per cent. Our exports of wheat and other products to Great Britain show a decline. Why should we not be able to take advantage of the German market upon the same terms as the United States where we would find a market for those products which in volume are declining in the British market? Why does the government not make some effort to have Germany remove this discrimination? I contend that in this matter we occupy a very humiliating position, and I hope that the government will take steps to place Canada in a right attitude towards Germany or any other nation that attempts to discriminate against our trade.

A good deal of discussion has taken place in reference of the preferential tariff in favour of Great Britain. I would like to show the House exactly what benefit this preferential tariff has been to Great Britain. In 1901 our total imports from Great Britain, dutiable and free, amounted to $43,164,297, of which there came in under the preferential tariff $25,905,721. Now, if there had been no preference it is safe to estimate that we would have brought from Great Britain at least two-thirds of that amount, or $17,270,481, in any case, which leaves as the extra amount which we bring in because of the preference, $8,635,240. If we deduct from that amount those goods which are not British, but which are manufactures of Germany, Belgium and other European countries, and into which a moderate or 'substantial portion' of British labour has entered, estimated at $3,635,240, we have left only $5,000,000, the product of British labour, which we actually bring in from Great Britain as a result of the preferential tariff. The government in their wisdom saw fit to change somewhat the conditions under which British goods under the preferential tariff would come in, and I contend that the Order in Council of June 13, 1898, is of such a loose character that it enables the goods of various European countries to come into this country under the preferential tariff.

Mr. WRIGHT. How does the hon. gentleman ascertain the amount of goods imported from England that have been partially made in Germany ?

Mr. KEMP. I am making an estimate, which I think is a safe one. I believe that if there were no preference, we would import two-thirds of what we now bring in, which would be $17,270,481 as compared with $25,905,721. It is impossible for any one to calculate what the hon. gentleman asks, but I think that the estimate I have made is a safe one.

I do not think there can be any doubt that our woollen people have suffered under the preferential tariff, and that some relief should have been given before this. The United States import about $14.000,000 worth of woollen goods annually. This Canada of ours imports about $10,000,000 annually. The American people therefore import to the extent of about twenty cents per capita while in Canada we import to the extent of $2 per capita, or ten times as much. There is no reason why these goods cannot be produced here, and it seems to me that if we are truly loyal to the British empire and to this country we will strengthen our own industries and in so doing strengthen the whole empire, for it can be no benefit to Great Britain that we should destroy an industry in this country when in so doing we do not appreciably affect any interest in Great Britain.

But hon. gentlemen opposite want to know if we mean to do away with this tariff. Well, my policy would be to make every thing we possibly can in this country, to give to Great Britain a substantial preference over her competitors in such things as we do not produce, and allow no foreign goods whatever to come in under the preferential tariff. I do not believe that what the Minister of Interior told us last year meets with the approval of this country. He said :

> When we give a preference, if it is to be at any one's expense, it is at the expense of the manufacturer and workingmen of Canada. We go a little further, and say that it is the policy of the Liberal party of Canada to reduce the duties and to remove to some extent the burden of the excessive tariff which was imposed on imported goods by the late Conservative government.

What have we gained by this preferential tariff ? We have gained the discrimination of Germany against us. We have thrown our workingmen out of employment to some extent. True, we have got the clauses in the German and Belgian treaties denounced, but up to the present of what advantage has that denunciation been to us ? It may be in the future, but so far it has been of no benefit to this country whatever. I would advocate a reciprocal preference in trade matters between the different parts of this empire on entirely broader lines than those which exist at present.

Let me draw attention to a press despatch which appeared coming from London to the ' New York Post ' a day or two ago :

> So far as concerns the preferential tariff proposals now coming from Canada and Australia, designed to make the empire more or less a trade unit, in view of the coronation conference in June, it is understood that the cabinet is inclined to agree to submit the whole question to a Royal Commission, upon which the colonies shall be represented.

I wish to point out that the idea of a royal commission is one which unanimously gained the approval of the chambers of commerce that met in London in 1900, and the British government has been strongly pressed to appoint this commission. If the right hon. the Prime Minister can accomplish nothing further, when he attends the intercolonial council in Great Britain, I hope he will at least advocate the appointment of a royal commission, composed of home and colonial delegates, to consider this question of preferential trade. I think that we ought to join hands with Australia in trying to work out reciprocal trade giving preference to the products of the empire. I believe that in the future Britain's trade policy will be considered upon the true basis of expediency. I believe that she will have to do something, and what we want to do is to make ourselves more independent of other countries, as an empire, in trade matters. We should place ourselves in closer touch with the 400,000,000 people of this British empire. We should stand shoulder to shoulder in matters of trade as well as in matters of war, and make it our object to keep British capital and labour within the empire.

In discussing this preferential tariff we always come to the question of the debt of gratitude which we owe Great Britain and how we should repay it, and hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that this preference was given Great Britain because of the support she has given us by her army and navy, and in every other respect. That brings me to the question of the colonial conference, and it seems to me that the attitude of the government in that respect is a very peculiar one. I have here a copy of the cablegram sent on the 23rd January to His Excellency the Governor General by the Colonial Secretary, in which the Colonial Secretary asked that certain questions be discussed at this colonial conference. The cablegram reads as follows :

> It is proposed by His Majesty's government to take advantage of the presence of the premiers at the coronation to discuss with them the questions of political relations between the mother country and the colonies, Imperial defence, commercial relations of the empire, and other matters of general interest.

These are the questions which the Colonial secretary was desirous of having discussed. The Governor General's reply was :

> Referring to the several questions mentioned in your despatch of 23rd January, the only one which, in the opinion of my ministers gives promise of useful discussion is that of the commercial relations between the various sections of the empire.

The British people must have been greatly disappointed when they found that this government will not even discuss the question of defence. The government state very clearly that that is a question which they do not intend to discuss. I would like to ask the right hon. the First Minister how it is possible for him to consider the question of preferential trade within the empire or of getting a preference for our products in Great Britain, if he is not prepared to discuss the question of defence, and if he takes the position that Canada will do nothing for herself in that respect? Not only must the British people be disappointed, but our own people feel humiliated at this attitude of the government. We know that Cape Colony and Australia have been assisting in Imperial defence. I do not say that we should follow the example of any of these colonies. I do not say that we should tax our people for the purpose of the British navy. I do not say that we should bind ourselves to do whatever the British parliament might tell us to do. But I contend that we have come to that period in our history, as a nation, when we should be willing to assume some of the burdens which other nations have to assume with regard to their own defence. How can we, with the population which we have to-day, expect to escape the responsibilities which other nations have to assume? Do we expect to enjoy all the advantages of being a part of the British Empire and share none of the burdens? Do we expect the British navy to continue to protect our shores while we simply do nothing to help ourselves? I think this is a question which we should face in a manly way, which we should be willing to discuss openly in this House in order to come to some conclusion. This country is practically, in the matter of defence, in the same position as the most helpless, recently acquired colony of Great Britain. We are not doing anything in the direction of coast defence or of building up a navy of our own, and I submit that the figures I have shown with respect to the operation of the preferential tariff are not a sufficient return to Great Britain for the advantages she is giving us. We find Great Britain overwhelmed with responsibilities and taxation, and I believe that if we had been obliged to go through a similar experience to that which the people of South Africa have been undergoing, if this country had been attacked by a foe, Great Britain would have done as much for us, and more than she has done in South Africa. The time, I consider, has come, when we should consider our relations with respect to this question. We are a part of the British Empire, and the question to my mind is this: Are we going to remain a part of the empire or to become absorbed by the United States? There is no medium course. And I think that the consensus of opinion in this country is that we shall remain British. I believe that the people of this country from one end of it to the other, unanimously are in favour of British connection, so strongly in favour of it, that they will not listen to any other course. I do not wish to take up the time of this House in discussing this question at any great length at this time. But I think that the Premier should tell us, before he goes to this colonial conference, what his ideas are with respect to this question of defence. In looking up 'Hansard,' I find that the Prime Minister, in 1892, stated in this House:

> I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspirations is the independence of Canada, to see Canada an independent nation in due course of time.

I would be the last one to accuse the Prime Minister of harbouring any such sentiments at this day. I do not think that it is possible for any public man in Canada to hold such sentiments. But, in view of our peculiar trade relations and of the attitude of the United States with regard to us, in view of the fact that the question of defence has been suggested by the Colonial Secretary for discussion, we should have a pronouncement by the Prime Minister before he goes to London, upon the question of our political relations to the mother country, and upon that of defence. Yesterday I asked a question with regard to the contingents which had been sent to South Africa, with the object of finding out which contingent we had assumed the cost of transporting, arming and equipping and which we had not. I will read the question and the answer in order that the House may understand my object in referring to them now:

> Mr. KEMP asked:
> 1. Did the government arm, equip and transport by land and sea, at its own expense, the various contingents of troops which were despatched to the seat of war in South Africa, to assist in subduing the enemies of the King?
>
> 2. If not, what are the different conditions respecting arming, equipping and transporting the several contingents?
>
> 3. If the government did not, at its own expense, arm, equip and transport any one or more of the contingents, what was the reason for such action?
>
> The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier):
>
> 1. The government did arm, equip and transport, by land and sea at its own expense, the two contingents of troops which were despatched to the seat of war in South Africa, from Canada, in 1899 and 1900.
>
> 2. The arming, equipping and transporting of all other corps were carried out at the expense of the Imperial authorities, as proposed by them.
>

that course, it is open to him to affirm by motion, the policy which, in his opinion, ought to have been adopted.

I am a comparatively new member of this House, and may not know as well as the right hon. gentleman the rules of debate. But, I knew it was open to me to proceed to take such a course as the Prime Minister pointed out. But, without having before me the particulars which he has given, it would have been a rash thing for me to bring about a discussion of the subject in this House. Therefore, I asked the question in order to ascertain the facts so that I might judge what my course should be. My opinion is that it is quite clear that, in respect to this matter, we have done very little and that we should have done very much more. I think it was a reflection upon our soldiers who were sent to South Africa to put them absolutely in the position of mercenaries. These men would never have gone to South Africa to fight for any other flag except that under which we live. They went there to assist in protecting the flag and in subduing the enemies to the King. The government put them in the position of mercenaries, and that, I say is a reflection upon them which they did not deserve. I hope that when the cheque comes out paying the government for the transportation of these men from the inland parts of Canada to the seaboard and equipping them, that the cheque will be returned, and that we shall assume our fair share of responsibility. Consider what New Zealand has done. The little colony of New Zealand has sent to South Africa more troops than we have sent. It is proposed to send to Great Britain, with our premier when he goes, a body guard of nine hundred soldiers. When those soldiers go through the streets of London, it is not unlikely that the people will draw a comparison and say : The British government, of course, are not paying for these troops, but they are paying for the troops that the Canadians have sent to South Africa. It is unfortunate to find that we can send to London such a body guard of our soldiers—and I am glad that our representatives will have such a noble body guard, and that we should refuse to pay the petty amount, the paltry amount required for the last contingent sent to South Africa. What is the position of Australia ? It might be interesting to the House to hear the expression of the Prime Minister of Australia with regard to the relations between Australia and the empire. Speaking at a recent gathering at Melbourne, Premier Barton voiced the opinion of Australia on the subject of British unity. He said :

> It was not true that this country would not remain a part of the British Empire, or would not be so loyal a part of it if it advanced in its democracy. The tendency of the British Empire was clearly toward the advancement of individual liberty. In taking up arms for the empire, the states had acted with alacrity and brilliance. Did it mean a subservient adherence to old forms and traditions inconsistent with British liberty ? Not a bit of it. Did it mean that we were becoming an independent country not only in thought, but in action and would forget those from whom we sprang ? No. It meant neither a grovelling subserviency on the one hand nor an ill-considered, unthinking resort to a separate republicanism on the other. The truth was that the Australian character laid down its own lines of demarcation, and Britain's attitude to her colonies since the one great mistake at the end of the eighteenth century was to help them to realize their aspirations for freedom.

Now, while I am prepared to say that we should not give away any of our liberties, and while I am as strong a believer as anyone in retaining the rights we have under the British North America Act, and while I would not leave it to the British parliament to say when and where and how we should serve, the time has come when we should consider to what extent we are going to help to defend ourselves and to defend our own commerce. We should take a strong, a manly stand, upon that question. Australia has a navy. She is now spending $20,000,000 upon new ships and $5,000,000 annually on maintenance. Cape Colony has done something along the same line, as well as Natal. The people of Great Britain spend no less a sum—not in war time, but before the South African war broke out—than $5.40 per capita on the army and navy. The people of the United States spend about the same amount, or about $5.50 per head. If we spent in proportion to the amount spent by Great Britain or the United States, we should have an expenditure of about $30,000,000 for defence. We actually spend about 40 cents or 50 cents per head. Every civilized nation in the world spends from $2 to $5 on arms and defence. On the basis of our export trade, as compared with Great Britain, if we spent at their rate, we should spend about $25,000,000 annually on defence. We need not go into any such extraordinary expenditure, and I am not giving these figures for the purpose of showing that we should. I do say, however, that we should to some extent start the nucleus of a fund for the purpose of building up a navy of our own, and taking such steps as may in some degree protect ourselves and protect our commerce, that we may occupy a more manly position within the empire than we do at the present time.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy the time of the House any longer; but before resuming my seat I would like to refer to one more matter. The Prime Minister said in Toronto that there was nothing to reform; he has also said that there were no burning questions in this country. Now, I would like to submit for the consideration of the government some burning questions which I think the government might well take into their consideration, with the view of developing the country and acquitting themselves of their responsibilities. There is the question of the exodus; there is the question of defence; there is the question of purity in elections; there is the question of purchasing supplies and doing public works by tender; there is the question of strictest economy in the administration of the affairs of the country; there is the question of reduction in freight rates on farm and other products; there is the question of building up our foreign trade in the ratio of that of the United States; there is the question of improving our transportation facilities so that our produce may go out via Canadian instead of United States ports; there is the question of inducing Germany to stop discriminating against our farm products; there is the question of framing our trade policy so as to give more employment to our own people and thus keep them in this country; we require a definite and aggressive trade policy based upon the necessities of the country; and we should endeavour to frame such a policy within the British Empire, based upon reciprocal trade preferences which will bring us into closer touch with its 400,000,000 inhabitants, and render us more independent in trade matters than we are at the present time. We should also endeavour to settle the various questions in dispute between Canada and the United States. Sir, I submit these are matters that may be considered as burning questions, and I hope the government will consider them as such. It is not necessary for me to say that I shall support heartily the amendment submitted by the hon. leader of the opposition ; and I do not see why such an amendment as that should not commend itself to many hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. R. F. SUTHERLAND (North Essex). Mr. Speaker, while thus far I have not burdened the House at any considerable length, I, nevertheless, like the last speaker (Mr. Kemp), have some little hesitation after so much ground has been covered and so many very excellent speeches have been made in attempting for the first time to participate in a budget debate here. I believe it is the duty of all new members of this House for a time, at all events, to endeavour to watch the operations and business of the House, in order to attempt to get well acquainted with the duties that a representative of the people should be acquainted with in order to properly discharge the service which he should render to the country. During last session and this, there are two things which I have been attempting to do as well as I was able.

One was to observe the conduct, the capacity and the operations of the members of the government behind which I sit in order to ascertain, how, in my humble judgment, they were discharging their duties which would be properly discharged by them, and another was to ascertain just what was the nature, the character of the criticism which leading members on the opposite side of the House evinced from time to time. If I were to judge from the criticisms I have heard from the other side of the House I would have commenced by this time to believe that this government was not the government that I had supposed it to be. I well recollect in 1896 that when the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was called upon to select a government, with what joy, with what satisfaction and confidence the Liberal party throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and also, I believe a great many of the independent Conservatives throughout the country, looked over the personnel of that government. They expected from their record, from their business capacity and ability, from their integrity and honesty that the government would take hold of the affairs of this country with a good grip, with an honest desire to serve the country and with a great deal of business capacity. After watching them for four or five years from outside this House and at long range, and during the past year from inside of this House at close range, the only opinion that I have been able to form in connection with the matter is, that the government has answered the expectations that the Liberals of this country had in 1896 when it entered upon its career, and I believe, also, has lived up to the expectations that many Conservatives formed of that government at that time. On the other hand, if I were to express the opinion which I had formed from an observation of the criticisms of the leading members on the other side of the House during last session and this, it would be to the effect that they seem rather more to confine their attention to matters of small moment, to items of small detail, than to dealing with the large questions that the members of the government deal with from time to time. For example, just within this session, on a certain evening, an item was up for consideration amounting to $5,000, and we were shortly engaged in a debate upon that item. The minister in charge gave his word, in view of the criticism of the item, that not one dollar of the $5,000 would be expended until he had an opportunity of looking into the matter and deciding whether it was an expenditure that should be made. While that was his representation to the House, hours were taken up after he had made that statement in a continuance of the debate upon the question of that particular item, although items of very large concern were passed without any comment at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, is this quite in order ?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sutherland, Essex) is referring to a previous debate which is contrary to the rule.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Essex). Possibly I may be doing so in going into the details of that matter, but, as a matter of general comment, that has been the opinion I have formed from observing the criticisms of hon. gentlemen opposite during the past session and during this session. Now, while I have tried, as I think, to examine and follow the record of the government as carefully as possible, I have also sought in the best way I could to examine the amendment which the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) moved some few days ago. Although, gentlemen who have participated in this debate from this side of the House, almost without a single exception, have asked speakers on the other side of the House to come down to details, and to something definite in regard to what their leader meant and to what they meant, not one of them up to this time has acceeded to that request. We are told in this amendment that the present tariff is unsatisfactory, but I do not know in what respect hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House consider it unsatisfactory. Not one of them has come down to details upon the matter at all. We are told also that the trade of the country needs for its development a policy of adequate protection, but what are the items of protection, what are the particular commodities upon which this duty is required, are unknown up to this moment. It does seem to me that the legal ingenuity and political sagacity of the hon. leader of the opposition have been used for the purpose of framing an amendment which is almost unintelligible and which would leave him all sorts of scope in the future, and in so far as its being a declared policy of a definite character is concerned, it is quite the reverse, and one which does not lay down any definite policy at all. It has been stated from time to time in this House and in the country that this is a country of wonderfully different classes; that we have a great agricultural class in one part of the country, a great mining industry in another part of the country, a great fishing industry in another part of the country and the needs of these industries and of the people from one end of the country to the other are diverse. It does seem to me that no policy can have any great force, or be of any great benefit to the country, that does not recognize that the first principle which should characterize that policy must be one of moderation, one of general application rather than one by which a particular interest, or a particular class, would be benefited to the disadvantage and detriment of other great classes in the community. It seems to me that if there is one thing that characterizes the policy of the present government more than another, it is that mark of moderation and regard for the interests of all classes. If I were asked what was the character of the industries of this country, I would naturally say that they are, agricultural, manufacturing, mining, lumbering and fishing. There is another great interest, that of the labouring classes, and I shall show in a few moments that this government has not been at all slow to recognize the duty it owes to the great labouring interests, and that from time to time it has done many things which are for the particular benefit and in the interests of that great class. If we look for a few moments over these various great industries to which I have adverted, we will ascertain the condition of our commerce as represented by the exports from this country in 1896 and again in 1901. If we look at the exports of animals and their produce we find that they amounted to $37,000,000 in 1896, while in 1901 they have increased to $56,000,000. If we look at agricultural products we find that in 1896 the exports were $17,000,000, and in 1901 $38,000,000. If we look at manufactures we find that in 1896 the exports were $10,000,000, and in 1901 $17,000,000. If we look to the exports in connection with the mining industry we find that in 1896 they were $8.000,000, and in 1901 $40,000,000. The only industry which, in a comparison between these two particular years, 1896 and 1901, does not show a marked increase, but rather a slight diminution, is the fishing industry, the exports of which in 1896 amounted to $11,000,000, and in 1901 to $10,000,000. But we all know that that industry is marked by great fluctuations. We know that, for example, in British Columbia for several years there has been great falling off in the catch of salmon, but we know also that the largest catch of salmon the country has ever seen will be that of the year we are in. What I want to try to make out is, that this policy is a general policy working for the interest and advantage of all classes as shown by the fact that each and every of the great industries of the country during these past five or six years, has shown a steady, a gradual and a very large increase. So that, instead of this policy being one for one particular class, it is a policy in the interests of all classes. There is another point which is very akin to this. One would expect for five or six years, in order to ascertain whether this policy was a general policy, a moderate policy and one in the interest of all classes, that if you apply these tests which are ordinarily applied to ascertain whether a country is prospering or not, whether the policy that is in vogue has worked in the interest of the country; that if you apply these tests, some at all events of the tests will show that the country was or was not prospering under that policy.

The first of these tests is as to a general and steady increase of trade. If we apply that test, then unquestionably the policy inaugurated in 1896 and continued to the present has been satisfactory and useful to the country. If we apply the second test: That of an increasing population, I do not think that any one that listened to the speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) during this debate, can come to any other conclusion but that for the last five or six years while this government has been in power and while its policy has been in force, the depopulation of the country which was occurring during the Conservative regime has been gradually ceasing, and that a great change for the better has come over the country in that respect.

Again let us apply the test as to whether the value of lands has been increased. I doubt if there is a single member of this House who has had any practical knowledge, who cannot say that in his vicinity the fact is patent that land values are steadily going up for the last five years, while prior to that they were practically at a standstill. Again, if we look at the savings of the people as evidenced by their deposits in the savings banks, has it not been made apparent time and again that the people of Canada are rapidly becoming wealthy and are putting by far more of their earnings as savings, than they ever did before. Again, I have no doubt that many of the hon. gentlemen in this House can testify, as I can myself, that the liabilities which existed upon the property of the Canadian people are largely being reduced under the present condition of things. If I were to speak from my own knowledge I could name many cases in the county from which I came where farmers have during this year come in and paid off as much as $1,000 or $1,200 of the mortgage which was upon their lands for many years. that is evidence that the agricultural classes are now prosperous as never before and that the result of that prosperity is enabling them to wipe out the mortgage incumbrances which had been upon their lands for many years. Again, take the business failures of this country. Any one who studies the records of these failures in Canada for the past five years will see that the number of failures and the amounts involved in 1896, were far greater than they are at the present day. That tells in favour of this government as do all these other tests of prosperity which I have applied. Therefore, as I say, applying to this general moderate policy which the government inaugurated in 1896 and has persisted in, up to this day—with such slight changes as were rendered necessary from time to time—applying any or applying all of the tests which are ordinarily applied to show whether the policy of a government which has been in operation for a reasonable number of years, has been successful or not; then undoubtedly the policy of this government has proven to be eminently successful. The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) in the course of his speech asked the question: What has this government done to promote the prosperity of this country? I shall endeavour to tell him. There is one thing that the prosperity of a country depends upon as does the prosperity of an individual, and that is reputation and credit. These are qualities which stand as high and are as useful to a country in its operations, as they are to a private individual in his business. Reputation and credit are necessary to the private individual in the conduct of his business, and they are also necessary to a government which frames measures for the welfare of a country. We cannot perhaps answer this question, free from any partisan bias, but we may go across the sea and ask, what was the credit and what was the reputation of Canada when the Conservative government went out of power in 1896. We know that in 1896 that great newspaper, the London 'Times,' said:—

> Here in the mother country, there is only a feeling of deep regret for the wrong done to the fair fame of the oldest of her daughters.

And the London 'Chronicle' said in 1896:—

> It is no longer possible to doubt that corruption in its worst form is rampant in a large portion of the Canadian civil service.

Now, after six years, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite, can it be said with the slightest degree of truth that that is the reputation of the Liberal party, of this government, or of Canada in the year 1902. I have given you definite and positive evidence that outside of this country and among our kin across the water, that was the reputation which Canada unfortunately had in 1896.

I submit that if this government had done nothing more than to wipe out that stigma which rested upon the people of this country, they have done very much to secure our thanks, and they have done much also to promote our prosperity.

What has this government done for the country? I think that the speech made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce served a very wise and very useful purpose in showing what this government has done for the good of Canada. In periods of prosperity like this, and when we are swimming along in a very happy and progressive way, we sometimes are prone to forget what were the conditions which existed in other days; and when the Minister of Trade and Commerce pointed out, that prior to 1896 there was an era of deficits which has been replaced by an era of surpluses; that there was an era of stagnation in trade which has been replaced by a period of enterprising progress; that there is more work for the working men now than there was in those days ; that wages are higher now than they were then ; that the great agricultural industry and other business was at a low ebb then as compared with now ; I say that in pointing out those things and drawing a contrast between the conditions that exist now and the conditions that existed then, the Minister of Trade and Commerce served a very good purpose. But there is another thing which the people of a country are apt to forget and which it is well perhaps for public men to advert to from time to time. We are too apt to forget the services this government has rendered to the country ; the practical legislation which it has introduced and the various other beneficial administrative acts which the government has performed during the past five or six years. With the permission of the House I shall for a moment call attention to these. In considering whether the government has served the people wisely and well, and whether it merits the criticism that has been levelled against it by its opponents, it is well that we should look to its record and see whether the ministers of the Crown have lived up to the ideal we had of them in 1896, as a cabinet of business men who would govern the country on business principles. Here are some of the things which this government has applied itself to, and which in my judgment it is entitled to a good deal of credit for. There was the settlement of the Manitoba school question ; There was the reform of the tariff and the reduction in taxation ; there was the preferential tariff introduced ; there was the development of transportation facilities ; there was the abolition of Canadian quarantine on cattle exported to the United States ; there was the development of cold storage facilities ; there was the fostering of agricultural interests ; there was the adopting of a vigorous immigration policy ; there was the reduction in the postage rate ; there was the inauguration of increased postal facilities ; there was the reduction of the post office department deficit ; there was the government loan secured in the British market on most favourable terms ; there was the denunciation of the German and Belgian treaties ; there was the fact that Canadian government securities were listed in Great Britain ; there was the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal ; there was the development of the iron and steel industries in Canada ; there was the establishment of creameries in the North-west Territories ; there was the establishment of the assay office in Vancouver ; there was the maintenance of the principle that government lands should be held for the settler alone ; there was the preparation of better trade statistics than we ever had before ; there was the principle of a fair wages to labour ; there was the establishment of the department of labour ; there was the publication of the 'Labour Gazette;' there was the introduction of a form of conciliation for the settlement of labour disputes ; there was the abolition of the sweating system on government contracts ; there was the development of the Yukon on the principle that the Yukon must pay for the Yukon ; there was the establishment of cold storage for the preservation of bait for the fishermen of the lower provinces ; there was the appointment of an officer to prevent the infraction of Alien Labour Laws ; there was the construction of the telegraph line to the Yukon ; there was the extension of the government telegraph line to the Straits of Belle Isle ; there was the attempt to prevent the discrimination of rates by railway companies ; there was the large purchases of food stuffs made by the British government in Canada. I submit that the recital of these various things done, works accomplished and legislation enacted by this government shows a record that has not been equalled by any previous government that Canada ever had.

I have sought in a few words to show that no policy can be effective in this country, whether in respect to trade or anything else, except a policy which is moderate and which is not confined to any one class, but is for all; and I am bound to say, in respect to another matter which the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me spoke of, the leader of this government and the government itself have made a record of which they may well feel proud. During the progress of this debate a great deal of attention has been directed to the United States and its people. There is no doubt that the United States is a country peculiarly favoured, having a splendid range of natural advantages and products, an immense population which has flowed to their shores, and another thing which we are often apt to forget, a great deal of British capital to assist in developing the resources of the country. We are sometimes told in this House as well as elsewhere in the country that we have reason to fear an influx of capital from the United States. Did the people of the United States ever take that attitude towards the influx of British capital ? On the contrary, was it not gladly received in the United States, and was it not one of the most potent influences in the development of all the industries of that country ? And if at the present time we see signs of United States capital coming into Canada, and if in the future we are to see more, as I am satisfied we shall, we may say that in this respect at all events we desire the fullest reciprocity that we can have with the United States. Just as they gladly received British capital into their country, we should gladly receive United States capital to assist in building up this country.

The people of the United States have afforded us an example in another respect which we may well imitate. Whatever their little differences with each other may be, they have in commercial matters and in national feeling shown a united front to the rest of the world. They have fused into one people the various elements of which their population is composed, and have shown a kindly spirit to each other. In that respect they have taught the people of Canada a lesson which they may well take to heart. And when the history of this country for the past few years comes to be written, in the light of cool, calm reflection, I believe that this government, and particularly the Prime Minister, will be credited with an honest, hearty and satisfactory attempt to fuse the different sections of the people of Canada and to make them, what I believe hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House desire them to be—a united, contented and happy people. Not long since I was reading the life of that distinguished and eminent statesman, lawyer and judge, the late Earl Russell; and in that work I came across some lines which he is said to have been fond of repeating, and which, though intended for Ireland, are equally applicable to this country. The words are these :

> What matter if at different shrines
> They prayed unto one God ;
> What matter if at different times
> Their fathers won the sod ;
>
> In fortune and in fame they're joined
> By stronger links than steel,
> And neither could be safe or sound
> Save in the other's weal.

So I believe that, with the keen competition of the people of the United States to face, what we in Canada must have is a hearty, united sentiment to enable us most successfully to meet that competition in the future.

We have heard a good deal during this debate about the various censuses that have been taken; but there is one thing which struck me which has not yet been adverted to. We all know, when the census returns of 1881 appeared, with what gloom and disappointment they were received in this country. We know that when the census returns of 1891 appeared they were received with the same gloom and disappointment. But whether hon. gentlemen opposite are correct in assuming that the last few years have not shown a great increase of population, or whether we on this side are correct in saying the opposite, we can at least say confidently that no gloom or disappointment is abroad in the land on account of the census returns of 1901. The condition of the country has changed; there is a feeling of buoyancy and satisfaction and confidence such as did not exist in 1881 or 1891. When there is a difference of opinion on a matter of this kind, as to whether during the past five or six years the population of this country has increased or decreased or been stationary, if you can get an admission from an opponent or a rival, it seems to me you have the most cogent and powerful argument you could possibly desire. Not long since I read an article from the Boston 'News Bureau' in which I found the most absolute proof of the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other night. It says with reference to immigration from Canada to the United States :

> The tide of immigration from Canada to the United States has been checked and she has an expanding population.

Now, what possible object could the Boston 'News Bureau' have in making this statement, desirous as it must naturally be of seeing the United States get as many immigrants as possible from Canada ? There is a proof, not from hon. gentlemen opposite or from hon. gentlemen on this side, but from our keen business rivals on the other side of the line, who would desire to make the very reverse statement if they could possibly reconcile it with the facts.

When one looks at the amendment that has been introduced by the hon. leader of the opposition, and sees that upon the face of it there appears to be a statement that the policy which he proposes to introduce, whatever that policy is—we have not got any particulars of it yet—is to be in the interest of the labour, the agricultural products and the manufacturing industries of the country, it seems to be on the face of it a general policy ; yet those who spoke in favour of that amendment have constantly reiterated that it was the same old policy they had been advocating for years. If that be the case, is there not something a little disingenuous in the wording of the amendment ? Do we not know that the policy which was in operation prior to 1896 was not one of general application to all the industries of the country but only to a few of the leading manufacturing industries. But if the policy which these gentlemen are now seeking to inaugurate is the same old policy that existed previous to 1896, then it follows that instead of being a broad, fair minded policy, suitable for east and west, north and south, it is simply a return to the old policy which applied to a particular class rather than to all classes. Such a policy as that the country pronounced against some time ago and does not want now.

We ought not to be surprised when a gentleman from the west or some border constituency desires that our trade should be as free as possible, whereas another from a manufacturing centre wants higher protection on some particular product. That is just what we may expect in a country with such wonderfully diverse institutions and industries as this country possesses, and no policy that is not favourable to the agricultural, fishing and mining classes, as well as to the manufacturers, will be acceptable to the people.

We heard a good deal from the hon. gentleman who preceded me about the question of national defence. It has been well pointed out, from time to time, that this country has done something in the way of national defence. The construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, for instance, is a great link which might be utilized in time of war for the transportation of troops. The military expenditures which this government has, from time to time, been making have no doubt had the effect of fitting the young men of the country to take their place in time of war alongside of British regulars, and we have seen that this training has enabled them to turn out capital soldiers in South Africa. These things show what we have done in the matter of military defence, but perhaps the best possible way in which we can do our share in the matter is not so much by direct participation in a common fund as by indirect means. We know that at present the government is concerning itself about enlarging our trade in different directions. We know that it is seeking to enlarge our trade with the old land and Australia and South Africa, and it does seem to me that if we would spend more money in subsidizing vessels of such a character as in time of war might be utilized for war purposes and in the time of peace be used for commercial purposes—if we could devise a system of subsidizing boats of that sort, which would be utilized in time of war, and in connection with which the subsidies might in time of peace make a considerable reduction in the transportation charges, we would be doing a great work for the people of this country by enabling them to compete on better terms, so far as transportation is concerned, with the people of the United States. That is a policy which would appeal to this country and redound greatly to our benefit.

We are beginning to realize that trade with Australia is a matter in which we are very much concerned and I am glad to learn that the government is taking this matter up in a live manner. The people of the United States are very much alive to the importance of this trade, as I will show by an extract from the 'Philadelphia Record.' The 'Record' says:

> The government of Canada is to send a commercial commission to South Africa in the near future to make a report on trade conditions, with a view to securing for the Dominion some of the African trade which now comes to the United States. At the present time the total trade of Canada with South Africa amounts to but $60,000 in value, while that of the United States with British Africa alone amounts to nearly $20,000,000.
> While the endeavour of enterprising Canadian manufacturers to secure a wider share of the African trade is highly praiseworthy, the manufacturers of the United States should be wide-awake to the possibilities of danger to them embodied in this particular feature of Canadian commercial activity. It cannot be denied that natural conditions are as favourable in Canada for many classes of manufactures as they are in this country, while the fostering influence of Great Britain may be exerted in the colonial behalf.
> In view of the increasing necessity for trade expansion in all directions in order that production may be maintained at home and the present prosperity continued, the United States cannot afford to look with indifference upon any movement tending to counteract the advantages which our manufacturers have already gained.

That is the opinion of the people of the United States and I am glad to see that this government intends sending some one to South Africa to promote as much as possible trade between us and our fellow colonists over there. We all know that the war must soon come to an end; and when it does and when the beneficient institutions of Great Britain will have their sway in that country, the result will be the same as followed in India after the battle of Plassey. After that event, the great Mr. Burke said that he saw one of the nations of Europe casting into the heart of Asia new manners, customs and institutions, and we know that the result made for the development, prosperity and freedom of that country. We know what the taking hold of Egypt by British statesmen did for the land of the Pharoahs, and we may look into the immediate future, when the war in South Africa will have ended, to an immense revival of trade and prosperity in that part of the world. This government ought to be equal to the occasion and endeavour to get in early so as to get as much of the trade of that country in the future as possible. One would think, from the criticisms of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the manufacturing establishments of this country were not prosperous and that no new industries were being started. Well, one can speak perhaps better of his own locality than of others. We have in the county of Essex a town called Walkerville, which is rapidly becoming one of our great manufacturing centres. It is not as yet a very large town, but has some splendid manufacturing establishments, and we have little or no complaint from the manufacturers of that enterprising town that they are being prejudicially affected by the policy of this government.

I know that those factories are, nearly all, working night and day, and that the difficulty they experienced is that of getting men to do the work they have on hand rather than that they are not being properly treated by this government. I know also that, so far from it being a fact that industries are not coming to this country, within the last two or three years a splendid industry has been established at Walkerville, the Walkerville Steel Bridge Company. That company already employes two or three hundred hands; and the manager told me not long since that he had an immense number of contracts on hand. I would scarcely like to reveal what he told me about the enormous quantity of contracts which they had secured. The owners of that concern, who within the last few years have come into this country and set up that establishment and already have it on a splendid business basis. I might take you to Windsor and Sandwich, where you would find a similar state of affairs. For instance, at Sandwich there is the J. H. Bishop Fur Company, which has been established as a new concern, an offshoot from an establishment at Wyandotte, Michigan. That concern has been established since 1896. I have it on the authority of their manager that their business has steadily grown from the day the establishment was started. Far from not prospering under this government, it has prospered constantly and steadily. I might refer to one or two industries in the city of Windsor, which were running along in a small way up to 1896 but which, since that date have developed so largely that old buildings have had to be enlarged, old plants discarded and newer and larger plants installed, while a larger number of employees have been kept busy. This will give some idea of the condition of the manufacturing industries in that part of Canada. I am satisfied that the great bulk of the manufacturers in this Dominion believe that the incidental protection which is given in connection with the revenue tariff of this government enables them to get along very well and to prosper, notwithstanding what hon. gentlemen opposite say to the contrary.

There is another question I would like to speak about for a few minutes, and one which is attracting a great deal of attention, and that is the transportation question. One would think, at times, that this was a comparatively new question, and that the statesmen of this country were only now commencing to realize the importance of it. It is hardly that. Many years ago, this question was agitating the minds of statesmen both on this side of the line and on the other. For example I will read some words which might well have been used by the Prime Minister of this country to-day or the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Public Works instead of having been used years ago, as they were. In 1865, which, as you will remember, was the last year before the abrogation of the reciprocity with the United States, the Board of Trade of the city of Detroit, which is just opposite the city in which I live, called a great convention to discuss certain matters. The board of trade passed a resolution which they embodied in the letter calling delegates together. It was stated that the object for which the convention was called were commerce, finance and communications of transit from the west to the seaboard. And the president of the Detroit Board of Trade in welcoming the delegates to that convention used the following words in connection with the transportation question :

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Essex).

Communications of transit between the Great Lakes and the sea-board is of vital importance to the North-west. The continued prosperity of the great west demands additional outlets to the sea-board and to the markets of the world for its agricultural, mineral and other products, which will crowd every outlet as fast as constituted.

Again he says :

Any measures which can be devised to ensure the west cheap and speedy transportation of its products to tide water will promote the immediate prosperity of the people east and west.

And again :

But as the natural outlet of the Great Lakes the navigation—— that is of the St. Lawrence.

——is capable of being improved to give a safe and clear depth of fourteen feet to tide water, which to the future of the great and growing west is imperative.

The president elected by these delegates used these words :

Gentlemen, when I stand here and look to the resources of the illimitable west, capable of sustaining one hundred millions of men here, and also capable of feeding another one hundred millions of men on the European continent, I ask you to multiply the facilities for placing this grain on the European markets at a price below what it can be grown there. Do your best; this mighty west will crowd these avenues to the sea-board to place this food in the eastern markets.

Such were the words of the men of that day. No doubt, these Americans were speaking, at that time, more particularly of their own great North-west. But times have changed, and we know that not only the trade of the North-west of the United States but the immense trade of the North-west of Canada is commencing to come down this great natural outlet to the sea. In my opinion, those who are taking this question up—and the government and the Minister of Public Works have been taking it up, and the hon. member for South Lanark (Hon. Mr. Haggart) made an excellent speech on it last year as did also the present Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick)—should advocate every reasonable expenditure to make the outlet from the St. Lawrence and down to the ocean as speedy, as rapid and as cheap as possible. These men are doing a great work for the present and even a greater work for the future of this country. I agree also with something said by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston) the other night. Speaking of the deficit in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, and referring also to the administration of the canal system, the hon. gentleman said in effect : We in the maritime provinces are willing that you should go on and administer the canals of Ontario, we are willing to go on with that expenditure believing it to be the complement of the Intercolonial Railway and railway transportation to the sea. I agree that that is the principle which must actuate us in this country, whether we are from the west or from the east, whether we are from British Columbia, the North-west, Ontario, Quebec or the maritime provinces. We must be prepared to yield a little to one another, we must be prepared as the Finance Minister so aptly put it, to bear one anothers burdens in this country. It is in that way that the country will be able to prosper and progress as it has done in the last four or five years. A part of this transportation question is the railway rate question. I am glad to welcome the statement of the Minister of Railways that we are on the eve of having a railway commission in this country, or are seeking to have it. I do not imagine for a moment that a railway commission will cure all the ills of which we complain in connection with railway rates. It is not possible, in a country like this, for that to be accomplished. But, if a few men, wisely selected and having opportunities to study the matters, apply themselves carefully and systematically to that question, there is no reason, as I see it why they should not gain information that would enable them to make much better practical arrangements than those existing at the present time. I am glad that the government appointed a man to go all over the country and get as accurate information as possible in this direction. In my section we have a condition of affairs in relation to railway rates of which we think we have a right to complain, and I am glad the government are taking hold of the matter. We complain that Windsor and all that district of Essex county is being discriminated against by some of the railways as compared with Detroit. One would naturally expect that if manufacturers or farmers wished to ship their products from the city of Windsor or from that section of the county of Essex, to the interior, they would be given a lower rate than on goods shipped from Detroit, for, it naturally costs something to transport merchandise across the Detroit river. Yet the fact was brought out by investigation held by this government officer, and also by the investigation held by the Windsor Board of Trade, that, in many directions the people of Windsor and locality have to pay a higher rate for the transportation of their commodities than do the people of Detroit or, for that matter people at points a good deal further in the interior of Michigan. A gentleman who is in a position to speak with authority on the fruit trade said :

> The rate on a American fruit on a long haul is often less than for a short haul over a Canadian line, thus neutralizing the effect of the import duty. Peaches can be shipped from Grand Rapids, Michigan—that is about a couple of hundred miles, I think, from Detroit—— > ——to points east of Toronto at a lower rate than from Leamington, Ontario.

That is a condition of things that we do not like to see and are desirous of having modified, if possible. Again I quote a statement made by the secretary of the Windsor Board of Trade in connection with this matter :

> The most serious case of individual discrimination presented to the notice of the board is of a manufacturing company doing business in this city. This company contends that manufacturers and shippers in the east get rates coming this way from 20 to 40 per cent better than from Windsor to points east ; that this discrimination enables the Montreal and Toronto business concerns to do business right in this county upon an equality with local manufacturers, while the excessive rates east prevents our entering their market and doing business at a profit.

Now that is a condition of things which I think ought not to obtain. In the same report I read this :

> What we in this locality have to protest and do protest most emphatically against is the absolutely unfair and unjust discrimination which exists as between the shippers of the United States and Canada (notably as between Detroit and Windsor) in favour of the former. The question of water competition does not enter here, being common to both.

I am very glad that the government are alive to this matter, and are seeking to get at the facts in order to apply a remedy, if one can be found and applied. I believe they desire to establish a railway commission, and if we are to have one, it will do much to remedy some of the things we complain of.

I notice in the speech of the hon. gentleman who preceded me, he said that the exportation of wheat from Canada in 1896 was greater than in 1901. Well, perhaps that is correct, the exact figures being 9,919,000 bushels in the former year, and 9,739,000 in 1901. The difference is so small that the argument is rather disingenuous. If we look at flour exports and see the enormous increase which has occurred, one would see where much of our wheat goes to. In 1896 our export of barrels of flour was 186,716; in 1901 that exportation had run up to 1,118,700; showing that while the exportation of wheat was almost stationary, there was an enormous advance in the output of flour which came from the same commodity.

Now from time to time I have read during the past three or four years the glowing accounts which the Minister of Finance has been giving us of the present and future outlook of this country, and I am very glad to note that such is the case. I am reminded of a little story which illustrates my views in the matter. It is said that a certain clergyman was writing a sermon one day, and after he had proceeded a certain distance he penned this sentence: 'I never see a young man with fine physique, and with all his splendid possibilities standing out before him, but I am struck with great admiration.' It is said that the moment after he had penned this sentence he was called away, and immediately after his young daughter came in, and with that curiosity which the fair sex possesses as well as we, she went and looked at what her father had written, and when she saw these words: 'I never see a young man with fine physique, with all his splendid possibilities standing out before him, but I am struck with great admiration,' she wrote below: 'Those are my sentiments, father.' So when I heard the Minister of Finance speaking of the splendid condition of this country, and of its splendid possibilities and prospects for the future, I felt, and I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite feel the same way, if they would express their real sentiments, that I could join with him and say: 'Those are my sentiments.'

Mr. E. HACKETT (Prince West, P.E.I.) In rising to make a few observations on the question before the House I need make no apology. The question we are discussing is one of very great importance to the people of Canada. The question of the fiscal policy of this country, and our trade relations with the nations of the world, is certainly one of the very highest moment, and it behooves every representative of the people to express his views upon it. I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat in the very lengthy speech he has made. He commenced by talking about the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition, and closed up by quoting from a sermon by some minister in times past. It will be impossible for me to follow him all through. He commenced by saying that the leader of the opposition had moved an amendment to the motion made by the Minister of Finance, that he could not understand. He said he did not know what was meant by the amendment, that he did not know what particular industry required protection. That is the statement he made. The amendment moved by the leader of the opposition means this: That adequate protection ought to be given to all the industries of Canada, and that the markets of Canada should be preserved for the Canadian people, keeping in view the fact that we are prepared to grant preferential trade within the empire. But if the hon. gentleman requires any information as to what particular industry is suffering in Canada, all he has to do is to sit down beside the Minister of Finance for a short time, and he will tell him what industries are suffering; because we have seen in the newspapers, and it is known to be a fact, that during the last month delegation after delegation has waited upon the minister asking him to make changes in the tariff, and assuring him that the present tariff has been found very unsatisfactory and requires amending at an early date. Not only has this taken place the present year, but last year also, delegations came to Ottawa with the same object. Yet the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Sutherland) does not know what particular industry requires protection.

The hon. gentleman went on to refer to the great prosperity of Canada under the policy of this government. He spoke of the savings of the people, and he said: Look at the savings banks, look at the amount in the chartered banks where the savings of the people are deposited, and you will see clear evidence of the great prosperity of the people of Canada. Sir, as an old member of this House, I remember many years ago when the people of Canada were putting their earnings in the savings bank, and when we were told by the hon. gentlemen opposite, then sitting on this side of the House, that these savings showed want of confidence on the part of the people in the business of the country, that people would not be placing their savings in these banks if they could employ them in any other industry in which they had confidence. But now we find these gentlemen pointing to these savings of the people as an evidence of the great prosperity of the country. It is an easy matter for them to change front, they have changed their base so often that it has become easy for them to do so.

Another thing the hon. gentlemen referred to was the surpluses. That is another old story. We were told in those days, especially by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, that surpluses showed bad statesmanship; they showed that the gentlemen who were conducting the business of the country could not make a fair estimate of expenditure and revenue; that they were taking from the people millions of dollars every year that should have remained in their pockets, and they had failed to take a clear view of the situation.

Hon. gentlemen opposite say now: What a great thing it is to have a surplus! They did not say that ten or fifteen years ago. The hon. gentleman speaks of their policy when they have no policy. They are opportunists of the worst kind and change their views on every question in connection with the affairs of Canada. He referred also to the exodus being checked. What figures did he give us to show that emigration had been checked? I can only speak for the province of Prince Edward Island and I will tell him that there has been a larger exodus of men and women from that province since this government came into office than ever before. That will be shown by the census returns. I believe we had a fair count down there, but it has been shown by the lack of growth of population within the last ten years that this exodus has not been checked by the policy of the government. I was pleased, however, to find that the hon. gentleman gave credit in one particular to the Liberal-Conservative party, and that was in regard to the building of the great Canadian Pacific Railway. He told us that that was a great work of national defence and he said that that great work was carried through in the interests of affording transportation for the products of the west and that it was a work of national importance as a means of defence. I remember, Mr. Speaker, that I was a member of this House and that the proudest thing I ever did—I am proud of it to-day and I am getting pretty well advanced in years—was when I voted for the building of that great work which was inaugurated and carried through by that great statesman, the late Sir John A. Macdonald and the Liberal-Conservative party and opposed by hon. gentlemen who are now sitting on the treasury benches. That great statesman was the means of building that great highway through Canada binding with bands of steel this country from ocean to ocean. He was the man who was the means of opening up the whole of the great North-west country and he carried this great work to a successful conclusion beating down the opposition of these hon. gentlemen as well. He built that railway. Day after day, in the House of Commons, I remember, in 1880, when the most factious opposition was offered to the building of that great highway when bogus syndicates were formed and brought here to make offers that could not possibly be carried out, that the Liberal-Conservative party, under the leadership of that great statesman Sir John A. Macdonald, having as his first lieutenant Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., in spite of this opposition, carried through that great work of which the hon. gentleman now speaks as being a work of national importance. Hon. gentlemen opposite opposed it to the utmost of their ability and by every means possible. They opposed it but the good sense of the people of Canada, having every faith and confidence in the leadership of the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, supported him in carrying through his great enterprise in face of the opposition of these hon. gentlemen. I do not think I need refer any more to what was said by the hon. member for North Essex.

In connection with the tariff policy, I wish to say here, Mr. Speaker, that I have referred to my being here and voting for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Another proud moment of my life was when the question of the national policy was introduced by the Liberal-Conservative party under the leadership of Sir John A. Macdonald and of Sir Leonard Tilley in 1879. That policy was the policy of this country after having experience of hon. gentlemen opposite who occupied the treasury benches from 1873 to 1878, during which time every industry in this country was depressed, when everything was going to ruin, when every man in the country had no confidence in his neighbour, when there was no confidence in business, and when the business men of the country approached the hon. Minister of Finance, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) and asked that the government should do something for them, he said: We are flies on the wheel; you can go some other place and we cannot do anything for you. Sir John A. Macdonald introduced his resolution in the session of 1878 and it became the law of the land in 1879. Under the national policy protection was given to every industry in the Dominion of Canada, the farmer, the miner, the lumberman, the fisherman—all classes of the people were protected by that policy and that policy has a place deep down in the hearts of the people of Canada to-day. I tell the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) and the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that their government would not exist for twenty-four hours, unless the fundamental and underlying principle of protection was in their present tariff. Now, speaking of this question, they say that they have a revenue tariff. It is a revenue tariff, but the old national policy was also a revenue tariff. It protected the industries of the country and it brought in sufficient money to meet the expenditures of the country and maintain the public works. While hon. gentlemen have in many ways emasculated the national policy, while the preferential tariff, which has not been of any advantage to Canada, which allows goods, manufactured in foreign countries by foreign labour, to be brought into competition with the workingmen of Canada, closing up the mills of Canada, while they have emasculated that policy, while they have reduced the protection, they still maintain in their policy, protection to certain industries. I ask them why, when the hon. Minister of Finance was waited on by a deputation of woollen manufacturers, he should not have paid some attention to their requests. Why should he allow this great industry, employing thousands of men in Canada, to suffer, and pay no attention to the request of the people engaged in it. I saw, a few days ago, reading in a paper, that a woollen mill established by Lord Strathcona and Lord Mount-Stephen in Cornwall had been closed and that a hundred men had been thrown out of employment and forced to seek employment in a foreign land. They were allowed to go away and the request of the woollen manufacturers was not listened to. The mill was closed and the people employed in it had to seek homes in a foreign clime as a consequence. As to the protective features of the tariff, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce the other evening, when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) was referring to the tariff, and speaking about the tariff being a protectionist tariff, retorted: You do not know the difference between a protectionist tariff and a revenue tariff. It was a very nice statement to make. There are certain features of this tariff that are strongly protectionist, and if you give protection to one industry you must give it to all the rest of the industries. I find that flour pays a duty of 60 cents per barrel. That is for the purpose of protecting the milling industry in Canada. I remember when the duty was placed on flour in 1879 the government were told that they were taxing the bread of the poor man. In the province of Prince Edward Island large importations of flour are made because we do not raise sufficient wheat to supply bread to the people. We were told there, and even in this House as well, that we were imposing a tax upon the working men, that this was one of the prime necessaries of life, but, in answer to that, we told these hon. gentlemen that we could raise sufficient wheat in Canada to make bread for the people of Canada. It was protected and encouraged by the imposition of this duty and instead of our people in Prince Edward Island receiving the rotten maggoty flour they used to get in former days from Boston and New York, they now receive fresh Canadian flour.

Mr. ROSAMOND. And it kept you in good health.

Mr. HACKETT. It kept us in good health and made us strong. We also find in this tariff of the Liberal government, another feature of the old tariff that has not been eradicated, and that is the duty of two cents a pound on pork. When Sir Louis Davies, who has lately been promoted to the Supreme Court of Canada, was a member of this House, although he posed as a free trader, yet he favoured this duty of two cents a pound on pork because it was going to protect the farmers of Prince Edward Island against the corn-fed pork raised in the United States. He posed as a free trader in everything else but he supported the Conservative government in its proposal to put a duty of two cents a pound on pork. I regret that my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Heyd) is not in his seat, because I want to tell him that during my long experience of fifteen sessions in this House, I never heard such an amusing speech as his. He was walking upon the edge of a precipice not knowing what moment he might fall into the abyss below. He commenced by telling us that he was a free trader, but by and by he turned around and said he wanted protection on buggies so as to prevent cheap American buggies competing with the buggies made in Canada. Here was this free trader, this quasi protectionist; this man who will vote for the government whether they have a policy of protection or free trade; here he was standing up in the House and advocating an increased duty on buggies. I am a protectionist, and if the government find that our workmen in Canada cannot compete with the cheap buggies made in the States, then I hope they will increase the duty; but it is entirely inconsistent for a gentleman who pretends to be a free trader and who supports what he calls a revenue tariff government, to make such a statement in this House.

Let us look for a moment at what was done in the case of printed cotton on which this government has imposed a protective duty of 35 per cent. Printed cotton had a 30 per cent duty under the old tariff; but this revenue tariff government, this free trade-as-they-have-it-in-England government, increased the duty from 30 to 35 per cent. Why was that done? It was done to benefit the printed cotton mills at Magog, and it was done knowing that the product of these mills would by the preferential tariff come into competition with printed cottons imported from England, and so the duty was increased by 5 per cent. But they did not do the same thing in the case of woollen goods. They allowed the woollen manufacturers to be slaughtered while under the special protection of the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) the duty on printed cotton was increased.

The hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston) made a long speech last night principally about the Intercolonial Railway and coal. He was endeavouring to defend by some means or other the conduct of the government in having a deficit last year of $500,000 on government railways; but he principally spoke of coal. We find that there is a duty on bituminous coal of 53 cents per ton. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Johnston) be in his seat at the present time, I would like to ask him if he wants to have that duty removed? Is it there for revenue or for protection?

Mr. KENDALL. Revenue entirely.

Mr. HACKETT. Revenue entirely! And we were told in this House by the Liberals that when the Conservative government imposed a duty of 53 cents a ton on coal they were robbing the workingmen of Canada. But this government has large surpluses, and yet they go on exacting from the poor people of the country 53 cents a ton on coal entirely for revenue purposes, as the hon. member (Mr. Kendall) says. Surely the hon. member does not seriously mean that.

Mr. COCHRANE. He made a mistake.

Mr. HACKETT. Yes, he made a mistake. I understand this coal business just as well as the member for Cape Breton does. Let me tell him that the sale of coal in Nova Scotia amounted to 771,259 tons in 1879, the year the national policy was put in force. A duty was placed on coal then, to protect that industry because it had been languishing for years, and as a result of that protection the sale of coal in the province of Nova Scotia increased from 771,259 tons in 1879 to 2,071,938 tons in 1891.

If that increase had gone on in the same ratio up to this date, the sales of Nova Scotia coal would be just as large as they are to-day. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Johnston) was pleased to compliment the Minister of Finance on what he had done for the province of Nova Scotia in this respect. That gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fielding) entered into an agreement with the Whitney people, called the Dominion Coal Company, and by that agreement he received into the treasury of the province of Nova Scotia a royalty which was placed on the coal mines——

Hon. Mr. ROSS (Victoria, N.S.) He received a higher royalty than was charged to other mines.

Mr. HACKETT. Oh, yes, that strengthens my argument. He was getting more money and that was what he was after at the time, but he placed the coal mines of Cape Breton in the hands of this American monopoly and they are shipping coal to-day to supply the gas companies in Boston and vicinity at the low rate of something over $1 per ton, and they are carrying it thousands of miles along the Atlantic coast for that price. They are doing it at a loss, of course, and the consumers of coal in the maritime provinces are in consequence obliged to pay $1 per ton more for their coal than they were paying before this monopoly got hold of the mines.

Mr. KENDALL. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question ?

Mr. HACKETT. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. Admitting that the price of coal in Nova Scotia is 50 cents or $1 too high, which company of all the companies in Nova Scotia to-day supplies the people and the government at the lowest rate ? Is it the Dominion Coal Company or the other concerns ?

Mr. HACKETT. That is a speech and not a question, and it has nothing to do with my argument, which is that the consumers of coal in the maritime provinces to-day are paying $1 a ton more for coal than they were paying before. They are paying that extra price in order that this monopoly may carry coal for the Boston gas works at a very low price.

Now Sir, these gentlemen opposite speak of the taxes of the country. We were told by them in former days, that the people were taxed to death ; that they were being bled white, that the workingmen of the country had to leave it on account of the excessive taxation. What do we find ? We find by their own statements that the taxes of the people of Canada per head in 1896 amounted to $5.42, and in 1901 amounted to $7.21, or an increase of $1.79 per head under the present government, which is equivalent to an increase of $8.95 for every family of five. Yet we were told that these hon. gentlemen were going to reduce the taxes, and that Canada was going to be a cheap country to live in. Instead of that every head of a family has to pay a higher price for all the commodities he uses than he did before these hon. gentlemen came into power. By repealing the specific duties and placing ad valorem duties on the importations of Canada they have taken more taxes out of the people than was done under the tariff policy of the late government.

Then we had a great deal of talk about the expenditure of Canada. We were told that it was far beyond what we could afford, and that if they were returned to power they would reduce it—one said by $2,000,000, another said by $3,000,000, and another had the boldness to say by $5,000,000, a year. What do we find ? The total expenditure of Canada in 1897 amounted to $42,972,000. In 1901, under this government, it increased to $57,928,866, or an increase of $15,000,000 since they came into power. Is that carrying out the promises they made to the people of Canada ? Sir, we want honest government in this country. We want men who, when they make promises to the people of this country, will carry out those promises. We know how a great deal of the public money is used. I had an experience myself of how the money which was extracted from the pockets of the people was used against me in 1900 ; but I, having the confidence of the people of West Prince, was returned at the head of the poll, notwithstanding the fact that public moneys were being corruptly used in digging holes and building breakwaters around the shores. The very fact that these moneys were being used in that way acted as a boomerang and cut off the head of my opponent.

The Finance Minister estimates that for the next fiscal year the expenditure will amount to the enormous sum of $65.250,000. This is something unprecedented. The government have nothing to show for it. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat read a list of the great things they had done ; but he did not show that there was any great public work being carried on to warrant an expenditure of $65,000,000 next year.

The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis), to-day in speaking of the expenditures of both governments, made what I consider a very unfair statement. He singled out a few years during which the late government were engaged in building the Canadian Pacific Railway—that gigantic work which the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie said would tax the resources of the British Empire—and he compared the expenditures of those years with the expenditures of the present government—a very unfair statement. The hon. gentleman knows that but for that expenditure the fertile lands of the North-west would have remained unoccupied until the present time. We might have built a few miles over the prairie, but the railway would never have pierced the Rocky Mountains or reached the Pacific Coast, except for the great enterprise displayed by the government of Sir John Macdonald and the men who built that railway. The Mackenzie government were building the railway across the prairie at the rate of 100 miles a year; but Sir John Macdonald grasped the whole question. He knew the millions of acres of fertile lands which were lying untilled in that great country, untrod by any creature but the buffalo and the Indian. He saw that that country would become the happy home of millions of people, and he brought about the building of that great railroad. The hon. member for Saskatchewan should be the last man in the country to compare the expenditure of those days with the expenditure of the present government, because he cannot point to a great public work which has been constructed by them during their tenure of office.

Then, what was done in connection with the Intercolonial Railway by the late government, those progressive gentlemen who were then carrying on the affairs of Canada. Those who had to travel over it had a good railway from Moncton to Rivière du Loup; but from that point to Point Lévis, a distance of 120 miles, we had to pass over a rickety railway owned by the Grand Trunk Railway. The late progressive government of Sir John Macdonald purchased that part of the Grand Trunk and made it a part of the Intercolonial Railway. We have that also to show for the expenditure of those days. Then, we have another great work connected with the great transportation system—that is, the Sault Ste Marie canal, which was built by the late government on Canadian soil, to avoid the necessity of Canadian ships having to pass through the American canal. In addition to that, they went on improving the canals of Canada and thus making it possible for the products of the west to reach a market by the best means possible.

The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston) last night said to us: For 18 years you were in power, and you did nothing to increase the facilities for the people of Prince Edward Island, and nothing was done to develop the great coal and steel industry of Cape Breton. What are the facts? I would be ashamed, if I were in the hon. gentleman's place, to make such a statement as that. I see the hon. gentleman's colleague, and I am sure he will agree with me. The late government, under the leadership of Sir John Macdonald and having Sir Charles Tupper as its minister of railways, built a railway from the straits of Canso to Sydney; and if there has been a boom of late years in the coal and steel industry of Cape Breton, it has been largely due to the building of that railway.

The manufacturers of Sydney have this accommodation from Sydney to Port Mulgrave on the north-east side. It promoted transportation as far as it could be done on Prince Edward Island and yet this hon. gentleman, who comes from the country, said that nothing had been done in those eighteen years to develop the resources of the country. I would be ashamed, if I were in his place, to make any such statement.

I find also that the public debt has been largely increased. We were told by hon. gentlemen opposite, when in opposition, that the public debt was altogether out of proportion to the population, and that if elected to office they would reduce it. What do we find? We find that notwithstanding the pledges of these hon. gentlemen and notwithstanding the surpluses which the Minister of Finance has had during the past four years, our public debt has been increased over $10,000,000, and next year the Finance Minister tells us he will increase it $6,000,000. So that we have the public debt increasing by leaps and bounds in spite of the great surpluses that we have been enjoying.

I wish to say a word in connection with the transportation question. That is one of the most important before the country to-day, and one which must be grappled with in the near future by this government. Should we have another harvest in the west such as we had last year, unless some preparations be made for moving it out of the country, there will be a congestion of freight and great loss to the farmers. I am therefore in full sympathy with anything that can be done for the purpose of facilitating transportation from the fields of the North-west.

But I propose to diverge for a moment in order to speak of a local matter, in which I am interested, as representing a portion of the people of Prince Edward Island. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) is not in his seat, but I see his colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) there, and I would remind him that we were promised last year direct steam communication between Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton for the purpose of conveying the products of the Island to the markets of Cape Breton. The sum of $5,000 had been previously voted for that line of steamships, but that sum was found insufficient, and last session a subsidy of $10,000 was voted. The people of Prince Edward Island naturally expected to have regular steam communication last year, but during the busy season, when every facility was required for the export of produce, no steamer visited our shores, and it was only in December that a boat was provided to call at the island and take a load of freight. That steamer carried away a cargo amounting to nearly one-quarter of a million dollars worth of all kinds of produce. Had she made regular trips in the summer season, I have no doubt that she would have had full cargoes all the time. I would urge on the government to have a direct line of steamers put on the route next year, fitted up with cold storage, and I am sure that Prince Edward Island, although not very large in area, is entitled to as much consideration as the people of the North-west.

But there is another matter to which I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, and that is the fast Atlantic service. We know that before Sir Charles Tupper left office, a contract had been arranged with a wealthy corporation for the purpose of providing this fast Atlantic service between Canada and Great Britain. That contract was never completed because hon. gentlemen opposite, when they came to office, were averse to carrying out the arrangement entered into. Instead of that they allowed years to pass, during which they experimented with bottle-necked and all kinds of steamships, and did nothing. Six years have passed and we are still without this fast Atlantic line. I would ask permission to bring to the notice of the government, and especially the Minister of Finance, the resolution passed by the Maritime Board of Trade during last summer. This board of trade is composed of gentlemen from each of the different boards of trade in the maritime provinces. The Boards of Trade of Halifax, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island—each sends its delegates in annual session to this Maritime Board of Trade. That board is therefore composed of active, up-to-date business men, who see the necessity for this fast Atlantic service, and the following resolution was passed by them at their meeting at Chatham, New Brunswick, in August last:

> Whereas, the construction of the Intercolonial and Canadian Pacific Railways was considered in the light of great national undertakings for the development of the foreign and international trade of Canada, and
> Whereas, the vast and rapidly-growing development of the trade and resources of our country under these great transport facilities confirms the wisdom of parliament in pledging the revenues of the country in aid of their construction, therefore
>
> Resolved, that in the opinion of this board our national pride is affected and our commercial progress retarded in consequence of the delay in our federal government in establishing this fast atlantic service, and further,
>
> Resolved, that in the opinion of this board there is a sufficient guarantee in the magnificent results which have followed the construction of our railways to warrant the government in carrying out the completion of our national transportation facilities by pledging the revenues of our country to an extent sufficient to carry out without further delay the establishment of the fast Atlantic service, and further
> Resolved, that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the federal government, the several boards of trade in Toronto, Montreal and Quebec; also the members of parliament from the maritime provinces.

I want to bring these resolutions to the notice of the Minister of Finance, who comes from the maritime provinces himself and knows the gentlemen composing this Maritime Board of Trade, and I trust he will pay attention to this resolution passed by them at their annual meeting.

My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Hughes) delivered the other evening his maiden speech in parliament. I have nothing to say with regard to the manner of his delivery, but I must say that the matter was entirely wrong. He spoke of the increase in our imports and exports, and attributed the whole of that increase to our present tariff. Sir, the hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken when he attributed our good harvest, our successful mining and lumber operations, the good catches of our fishermen and everything else good in Canada to the policy and administration of the government. He said:

> How can any reasonable man say that the operation of the tariff is unsatisfactory, under which the trade of the country has increased $150,000,000 in round numbers in five years.

The hon. gentleman forgot to thank Divine Providence for the bountiful harvest we have had. He forgot to thank the late government for having built the Canadian Pacific Railway and developed that western country. He forgot also to thank the people of Canada who, by their energy and industry, unassisted by this government, produced that large quantity of goods which were exported from Canada. The hon. gentleman had no recognition for any of these influences, but he gave the full credit for everything to the government. He spoke of the increase in exports and also of our success in making cheese. He says that cheese had increased in quantity and value. A large increase has taken place in the export of cheese. But, so far as the province from which the hon. gentleman comes is concerned, he has nothing to thank the government for in that. Before this government came into power the late government had sent Professor Robertson, and he had established cheese factories all over Prince Edward Island. And these cheese factories were in operation and the people were reaping the benefit of them before this government came into power. Can the hon. gentleman show that this government has found a market for a pound of cheese for which there was not a market under the late government. Then the hon. gentleman spoke of eggs, and said that there had been an increased export in this line. If he were in his seat, I would ask him to tell me if anything had been done by this government to cause the hens to lay a dozen eggs more than they did, or to find a market for a dozen eggs more than could be sold before. Before the McKinley tariff, we had a market for our eggs in the United States, paying a duty of five cents a dozen. That was increased to fifteen cents a dozen, a prohibitive duty. Mr. Foster, the Finance Minister of the government of that day, said that we must find a market for our eggs, and the government sent agents to England to open a market there. And hon. gentlemen opposite, then sitting on this side of the House, scoffed at the idea of his being able to transport eggs three thousand miles to England and put them on the market in good condition. But the government of that day succeeded in opening that market and the hon. gentlemen now on the treasury benches are getting the benefit of what was done by their predecessors, they having done nothing themselves. But the hon. member for King's, Prince Edward Island, did not refer to the most important question in the eyes of the people of his own province, and that is having a representative of that province in the Cabinet. These hon. gentlemen can speak of eggs and butter and everything else, but they have not a word to say with regard to this important question of a seat in the Cabinet for Prince Edward Island. One singular thing about that is that when the hon. member for West Queen's (Mr. Farquharson) whom I see in his seat, ran his election, one of the reasons held out why the people should vote for him was that he was to have a seat in the Cabinet. It was said that this was a government of premiers, and the hon. gentleman, as a premier of the province, was naturally entitled to a seat in this Cabinet. A few days before the election, the 'Charlottetown Patriot,' the organ of the government, the pocket organ of the hon. member for West Queen's had something to say on this subject. At this time, the friends of the hon. gentleman were appealing to Conservatives to let him in without opposition on the ground that this would strengthen his chances. This is what it said :—

Again, the fact that Premier Farquharson goes o Ottawa without opposition will do much to strengthen his claim to a cabinet position and apart entirely from political leaning, this is what every voter in Prince Edward Island desires. It would be detrimental to our interest if this province were left without a cabinet representative, but difficulty in securing representation will of necessity be encountered. In sending the strongest man available, one who if elected by acclamation is consequently acknowledged strong by both political parties our claims from that standpoint will be greatly strengthened.

The hon. gentleman was not elected by acclamation ; but this editorial shows you how the editor of that government organ regarded this matter at the time. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Farquharson) is here, and occupies a comfortable seat and is not yet in the Cabinet. I think that is very unfair. The day before the election Mr. Dobell was killed in England, and it was placarded in front of the 'Patriot' office that Mr. Farquharson would go into the Cabinet, Mr. Dobell being dead. The hon. gentleman is not yet in the Cabinet. The government is very unfair to the hon. member to keep him looking over the wall so long. He sits there apparently very placid, but he must be murmuring to himself 'so near and yet so far.'

Another point to which I wish to refer is that of bonusing the sugar industry in this country. Several applications have reached me asking me to bring this important matter before the House. Down in Prince Edward Island, Mr. Callaghan, a strong Liberal traversed the province, held public meetings, received subscriptions in the form of agreements to set apart and cultivate land for the production of the beet, for the purpose of creating there a beet sugar industry. It appears that the plant for this industry will cost at the beginning a very large amount of money and the people of Prince Edward Island are asking that the promoters should be granted a small vote for the first two or three years, to enable them to carry out their scheme. But, from the budget speech, it appears that the government will do nothing. The Finance Minister tells us that the Ontario government are bonusing the beet and sugar industry in that province, I would ask the Minister of Finance what benefit it will be to the farmers of Prince Edward Island that this bonus is being given to the province of Ontario ? We want the government to assist the farmer. We know that the payment of steel, iron, silver-lead and other bounties already promised will have the effect of adding $50,000,000 to the debt of the Dominion. Why should not the farmer be given a share of these bonuses ? A very silly remark was made the other evening in this debate to the effect that a bounty should be extended to the farmer for their potatoes, oats, and other products. That, of course, is nonsense. The farmer does not want it. But when the farmer sees a valuable industry that could be created in the province and asks assistance from the government in the same way as it has been given to the steel men and silver-lead people, they feel that they are entitled to consideration. And it is very unfair to the farmer to deprive him of his rights. Who will pay these enormous bounties on steel and silver-lead ? The farmers of Canada. It is the farmer who has his stakes deep down in the soil, whose home is here and who expects to bring up his family here who pays the taxes from which those bonuses come. Yet, while demanding these bounties from him for the benefit of other industries, the government refuses absolutely a bounty in this industry which the farmer believes to be of great advantage to him.

Now, I wish to refer for a moment to the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition. It is a reasonable and fair amendment. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said it was an old friend, and he recognized it. He is a friend of this old friend. It was that old friend that drove him out of power, and this new friend is going to do the same thing. This is an amendment asking for protection for the agriculturist, for the manufacturer, for the lumberman, for the fisherman, for the miner, for all the classes and all the people of Canada. Therefore, it is an amendment that is going to be accepted by the people of Canada. We have on this side of the House a leader that we are proud of. The hon. gentleman is present, I do not want to flatter him; but, Sir, he is young Canada, he represents young Canada. He is progressive, we are proud of him as a man, and as an able man, and he is going to lead in the near future the government of this Dominion. The people of this country will understand who their friend is, and, Sir, ere long you will find those treasury benches occupied by the gentlemen who are now sitting on this side of the House.

Sir, we have in this Canada of ours great natural resources of which we as a people should be proud. We were left by our fathers a precious heritage which it is our duty to develop. We were left, through the statesmanship of Sir John A. Macdonald, the immense prairies of the North-west purchased from the Hudson Bay Company, Those great fields, those fertile prairies are capable, as I said before, of supporting millions of people; and you will find there before twenty years, Mr. Speaker, when many of us will have passed away, millions of prosperous and happy people. To bring that about the great North-west must be properly developed, the east and the west must join together and work for the upbuilding, of all parts of this confederation. We have also the richest mines in the world, mines in the development of which we have scarcely touched the fringe, yet mines yielding gold, silver, coal, iron and other metals in rich profusion. We have forests and the finest lumber in the world, as yet untouched by the axe of the woodman. We have in addition, surrounding our shores on the east and on the west, the most valuable and extensive fisheries in the world. Having those great resources it behooves us as a people to go on united and work together as one man. We may have our differences in politics. What we need, if we are going to make Canada a great nation, is to strike at the root of corruption that is now prevailing in this government, and to install an honest government in this country. We have the freest institutions in the world, where almost every man has a vote. We have an intelligent population composed of the descendants of the best races of the old world, the Englishman, the Scotchman, the Frenchman, the Irishman, the German, and men of other nationalities of the continent of Europe. Having that great heritage and that intelligent population, why should we not hope in the near future to see Canada take her place amongst the great nations of the world ?

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). It is not my intention to follow the hon. gentleman in that lengthy portion of his speech which was devoted particularly to the interests of the island province from which he comes. It is not my intention either to go into a lengthy discussion of the merits of free trade or protection. It is astonishing to me, Sir, that every year the budget of Canada is discussed in this House, we have to listen to long arguments presented in what I might call an academic form, setting forth the theoretical merits of the policy of protection or the policy of free trade. On one side we hear hon. gentlemen telling us how the policy of free trade has built up England, and that therefore it is one that we should adopt. On the other side hon. gentlemen expatiate on the advantages that the United States have derived from a policy of protection. It seems to me it is about time that we, instead of looking either to England or to the United States for a trade policy, should confine our attention to our own interests, and to an inquiry as to what policy would best suit our special conditions. We are told by one party that we should be free traders because England is free trader ; we are told by another party that we should be protectionists because the United States are protectionists. But it strikes me that the defenders of both systems seem to disregard the fact that these two entirely different systems have both proved eminently successful in the two countries where they are respectively in force. Free trade has been a good policy in England because it was the policy that suited the conditions of England at the time it was adopted; and protection has been a good policy in the United States because it suited the conditions of that country at the time it was adopted. The same inconveniences that are pointed to in the United States by the defenders of a free trade system as resulting from a protectionist policy, have also manifested themselves in free trade England. The concentration of wealth, the undue development of manufacturing industries, the movement of population from the country to the city, have taken place in England just as they have taken place in the United States. Therefore, I am obliged to come to the conclusion that many public men in this country lack confidence in their own country, they seem to be always looking abroad to discover a policy.

For myself, I have never concealed the fact that I am a protectionist in Canada; not because I believe that a system of protection in itself is superior to a system of free trade. In theory I am a free trader, and were I living in England I would stick to the policy of free trade. But protection is forced upon us, not because it has been advocated by so many theorists and economists, but because it is indicated by our circumstances. I fully realize the force of the argument made in this House that under a policy of protection the consuming population of Canada, to a certain extent, contribute to the enrichment of a small number of men; in other words, that the large consuming classes of Canada contribute to enriching the Canadian manufacturers. This is not a question of personal interest in my case. I represent a county composed almost entirely of consumers; and certainly regret when I see the people of my county contributing so large an amount of money for the enrichment of a small number of men. But certainly I prefer to see our people give their money to enriching Canadian manufacturers, than to see it go to the United States, to Germany, to England, or to any other foreign manufacturers. When we pay our money to Canadian manufacturers it remains in this country, and goes to swell the capital of Canadians, the capital available for the development of Canadian industries, of Canadian mines, of transportation facilities within our own country, to the employment of Canadian labour. I fully sympathize, from a theoretical point of view, with the argument made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that it would be foolish for us to complain that foreign goods are allowed to come into this country and to be sold at a cheaper price than Canadian goods. But I am alive to the fact that should we leave our doors open and allow foreign manufacturers to make a slaughter market of Canada, the consequence would be the closing up of our own manufactories; and after that result had come about, the consuming classes in Canada would be left entirely in the hands of those very monopolists who have been created by a policy of protection in the United States. So I say I would rather stand a little protection in Canada in order to get competition with American trade, than to buy American goods a little cheaper for some time and to put our consumers entirely at the mercy of American monopolists.

I say that I would rather stand a little protection in Canada to get competition against the Americans than pay a little less for four, five, or six years for American goods and then be left entirely in the hands of American monopolists. If I have to choose between two monopolies, I would rather choose the monopoly that would be developed in my own country and which will help to develop the resources of my own country, than, for the purpose of saving a little money for a few years, bring nearer to the fate of the people of this country the day when the whole of this country will be left in the hands of foreign monopolists.

The sooner we realize on both sides of this House that the policy of protection is not a question of choice for the Canadian people, the better it will be for us. The moment hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House realize that the policy of protection was forced upon their party by the popular sentiment and the moment hon. gentlemen on this side of the House realize that the same popular sentiment has forced them to stick to that policy, the better it will be for the people of this country. I am told that the day is coming when the United States will be free traders, or freer traders. Well, let that day come, and I am the first man to say, when we can afford to lower our tariff, when we can afford to stand the competition of American manufacturers, when the American manufacturers themselves stand the competition of the foreign world. Let us open our ports. But, when we are a nation of 5,000,000 which has so much to do yet to develop its natural resources alongside of a nation of 80,000,000 of people, we cannot take upon ourselves to say that we are going to inaugurate upon this continent a policy that will have for its result to give that nation of 80,000,000 of people full control of trade on the American continent.

Now, Sir, I fully agree also with the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) that a protection policy is apt to give rise to more causes of corruption on the part of the government, and I find myself in this strange position that I am standing here to defend the policy, and the virtue of the government against one of its own members. I admit that the policy of protection may be a cause of temptation to the government, but, are we going to be told by one of the members of the government that the virtue of the government is so weak that it cannot stand the policy that is imposed upon it by the will of the people? The hon. gentleman has referred to the causes of the corruption of the previous government. No doubt the Conservative government, in the last years of its regime, was corrupt, and it is for that reason that the people changed it. But, all the examples which have been given by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, pointing to the corruption of their predecessors, were owing to causes arising, not from the application of the fiscal policy, but owing to the construction of certain public works. Public works, also, are causes of corruption and may be causes of temptation to the government. Is this government going to abandon the construction of public works in this country? Are we going to abandon the development of the improvements of transportation, are we going to abandon the policy of deepening the St. Lawrence channel, and of diverting our trade which is going through American means of transportation, because the construction of great public works may be causes of corruption? I have more confidence than that in the virtue of the men that the people put at the head of their affairs; and I hope that in carrying out what is the will of the people to-day, as far as the fiscal policy of the country is concerned, as well as in carrying out the big works which have been imposed on them by the interests of the country, the hon. gentlemen now in power will have the courage to face the situation—though at some times, I quite admit, it might be a little hurtful to the old fighters who have proclaimed principles which they are debarred from applying to stick to that policy.

There is one point, however, upon which I cannot agree with the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding), and that is as to the stability of the tariff. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that once the tariff has been changed it should not be changed without proper reason, but, though I am a protectionist for the time being, though I am not a free trader on principle, I am not a protectionist to the point that I think our tariff should remain without being changed. Having, I confess it very humbly, no principle upon this question, being a protectionist because I think the policy of protection is imposed upon us by circumstances, I say that our tariff should change according to circumstances—not according to slight circumstances, but I think the government should be alive to the fact that when the circumstances change which impose upon us a higher tariff, they should not be afraid to raise the tariff, and that when circumstances, on the other side, impose a lowering of the tariff, they should not be afraid to lower the tariff if necessary. We are told of the tremendous results that have been produced in the United States by protection, and of the wonderful achievements of the policy of free trade in England. But, there is another country with which I am going to make a comparison and to which I will point as a good example of a country where a varying tariff policy is the cause of great prosperity. The outside trade of France has not increased very much, but the stability which is marked in the outside trade of France, is also marked in the balancing of capital within the country itself, which, to my mind, is the greatest sign of prosperity. I do not care how many millions of dollars worth may be manufactured, I do not care how many millions are gathered in the banks in one country, I do not care what the figures may show as to the richness of one country or the other : I say the most prosperous country is that in which money, capital and energy are most equally balanced between the greatest number of people living in that country, where you can point to every community, to every city, to every town and to every village and say that there is prosperity. Foreign trade with France is certainly not as big as the English trade or the American trade, or even the German trade, but France stands to-day as the only country where the servant girl, where the farmer, where the little merchant, has always a little money in hand, not only to look to the future of the family, but to lend money to the government when money is needed. After the Franco-Prussian war, when France was bound, after one of the most disastrous wars that ever occurred in any country, to pay an indemnity of 5,000,000,000 francs, twice the total sum was subscribed by the men on the street. Every public loan that has been made in France for the last thirty years has been entirely, and more than entirely subscribed by her own people and by what would be thought elsewhere the poorer classes who always have a few hundred francs and who are able to lend money to their own government. Therefore, I say, that we should be prepared, according to circumstances, either to raise, or to lower, our tariff when we know that one industry or the other for the general good of the country requires it.

Now, Sir, I will come to the second part of the resolution moved by the hon. leader of the opposition which pronounces in favour of preferential trade within the empire. I quite agree with the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) that the only feature in our present policy which appears to be on free trade lines is in fact the most protective feature in it, and the most protective feature we have had in our fiscal policy for some years back. The only difference is, that as it stands now, it does not mean protection in favour of the Canadian manufacturer at the expense of the Canadian consumer, but unfortunately it turns out to be protection in favour of the English and German manufacturer at the expense of the Canadian manufacturer, Take the case of the woollen industry and it goes even further than that. It enables the English manufacturer who cannot compete with the German manufacturer, to import from Germany into England articles manufactured to nine-tenths of their value in Germany, finishing them in England and shipping them to Canada under the preferential clause. Such goods included in the total trade figures of Great Britain, thus getting the benefit which we give to British trade and in reality forcing the deluded Canadian consumer to reduce one-third of his duty in favour of one of the countries that is most inimicable towards Canada. I have inquired a great deal for the last ten months from business men of various kinds, and I find that in the case of many articles that used to be imported from Great Britain at a certain price, the British tradesman or manufacturer, beginning to feel the difference in price caused by the preferential clause has raised his price to our merchants ; or rather, he has abolished the discount which he used to give Canadian buyers for cash. Hence, the benefit which should be given to the Canadian consumer because of the preferential tariff is in fact given to the British or German manufacturer. I therefore hold that the Canadian consumer gets very little benefit from the present preferential clause as it stands.

When that provision was introduced in the tariff of 1897 I voted for it gladly, because, although a protectionist, I am a free trader to the extent that I would like Canada to trade with as many countries as possible on the principle laid down as the basis of clause 17 of the Tariff Act of 1897 ; and hence I then approved of it entirely. But we have changed that policy year after year. What was the principle of clause 17 of the Tariff Act of 1897 ? It was that every country that would offer to Canada any trade advantages similar to those we offered them would be received by us under the preferential clause and that we would gladly trade with them. But afterwards came our fit of sentimentality ; we have changed that clause, and we have said to the entire world : We are so devoted to Great Britain ; we are so loyal, that we are willing to trade only with the mother country, and we shut our doors to the rest of the world.'

Now, Sir, I claim that this was a retrogressive policy. I claim that the policy of the future, for some time to come at all events, is going to be a policy of protection for every country, but it will take from the theory of free trade the very principle which was at the bottom of the doctrines of Cobden : That freedom of trade being impossible between individuals, the greatest freedom of trade possible will be attained between nations. However, as the hon, member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) pointed out, it is impossible to get to that degree of freedom of trade and to that reciprocal policy between different nations unless one nation has something to offer to the other. We had something to offer ; we still have something to offer if we want to ; but, if we are ready to offer anything to foreign nations and to take something from foreign nations we must stop saying that we are so loyal, and that we are so British—much more so indeed than any Englishman or any Scotchman is in the old country because there they open their ports to every nation in the world. We must stop making ourselves the laughing stock of the whole world, the British people included ; and we must begin to say : We are a common sense nation, we will trade with every people who are ready to trade with us—with the English first because they are the easiest people to trade with, but after that, ready to trade with any reasonable nation that has something to offer us and to which we are ready to offer something.

Take the case of Germany. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have expressed great indignation because Germany has taken from us the advantages she used to give us and that she is now giving to Great Britain. Well, Germany has simply acted as any common sense country and any common sense business man would act. We had, under clause 17 of the Tariff of 1897 a provision which would have enabled us to trade with Germany or with France or with any other country, but now we have taken that provision out. We have said to Germany : We will not have anything to do with you. We have said the same thing to France, and to Italy, and to every country with which we could trade and that would be ready to trade with us. We have said : We only want to trade with Great Britain ; like the child who at the first little noise runs to hide itself under its mother's apron. We are retrograding in our national aspirations, and so far as that is concerned I cannot agree either with the policy of the government or with the policy of the opposition. We have said that we had opened to a certain extent our doors to Great Britain, because Great Britain opens her doors to us. Do we really believe that the Canadian people ignore the history of the trade policy of Great Britain ? It is true that the ports of Great Britain are free to our trade, but they are equally and to the same degree free to the trade of every country on earth, whether that country be friendly or inimicable to Great Britain. As the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) properly said : Great Britain has not adopted this policy of free trade in order to make a display of loyalty—the people of Great Britain are too intelligent and too business-like to do that. They have opened their ports to the trade of the world because it was a policy that suited them ; and at the time they abolished the corn laws, there was a flame or indignation in the colonies and especially in Canada, and some of the political ancestors of the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House signed at that time an annexation manifesto because the British people did not see fit any longer to tax themselves in order to take our wheat. Any fiscal policy that Great Britain has adopted was adopted in the interest of the people in Great Britain. They have done their duty in that respect, and I stand here as a constant admirer of British policy because the British people have always common sense enough to frame their policy for themselves.

But I say, Sir, that the best way of proving our loyalty to Great Britain, to the British government, and to the British people, is to show them that we are as intelligent and as patriotic as they are, and that we will frame our policy not to suit or to please the British manufacturer, but in order to please and to suit and to benefit the Canadian people at large. It is all very well to say that England is the only country that admits our goods free, and that therefore we should give to England a trade advantage which we will not give to any other people; but I will take the very argument that was made here by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on that point. Figures have a value only when you take into consideration their relative position in any problem. A country may admit our goods free, and yet not be as favourable to us as another country which taxes our goods, but taxes those of some other country at a higher rate. I do not know what the general tariff rate in Germany is; but suppose Germany has a general or maximum rate of 50 per cent, and grants us a minimum rate of 35 per cent. I say that Germany would be treating us with greater favour than Great Britain does when she admits our goods free, and admits with the same freedom American goods, German goods and French goods, most of which, having the advantage of closer communications and much larger markets at home, are in a much better position to be sold cheaply in Great Britain than our goods.

Now, we are told that our trade has increased immensely in Great Britain. I am glad of it, proud of it. But is that really because we have granted a preference to British goods ? Sir, if our exports to Great Britain have developed so largely, it is due to a considerable extent, I am glad to say, to the intelligent efforts of the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher). It is because we have sent a better class of goods and have shipped them in better order. The English consumer has too much common sense, and understands his interest too well, to buy bad butter and bad eggs because they come from the loyal colony of Canada. He will buy butter, and eggs, and flour, and anything else that comes from Canada, as long as he gets these things as good and as cheap as he can get them elsewhere ; and the moment that he can get them cheaper and better elsewhere than he can in Canada, he will buy them elsewhere, as he has done in the past.

But there is another consideration—we know it from the authorities on British industry and British politics, British industry is to-day passing through a very trying crisis. Will it last, or is it only temporary ? We do not know ; but we do know that British production in manufacturing is going down all the time, while British trade is increasing. What does that mean ? It means that Great Britain is becoming less a manufacturing country, and more a trading country. Great Britain is doing to-day more business as what I might call the foreign traveller of other nations than she is doing from her own industries. Out of the many millions of our exports that go to Great Britain—I found it out when in England last summer—a large proportion go to the European continent, where the intelligent traders have the skill to sell them as British goods, and we do not get the benefit of selling them as Canadian products. We imagine that we are selling all these products to England, whilst we are selling a considerable proportion to France, Germany, Belgium and Holland, and at the same time we are deprived of the opportunity of going to those countries and saying to them : ' You take so much from us and we take so much from you, let us trade together.' All this because we are more loyal than the King of England and the people of the British Islands.

Sir, to my mind the great danger of our present position is that we do not rely enough upon our own strength. For a certain time, as the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said very properly, the Conservative party had a great inclination to look to the United States as their example. At the same time the Liberal party may have had some inclination to look to Great Britain as their example. But even at that time there was much more national feeling in the political parties of Canada than there is now. Have the hon. gentlemen on the opposition side forgotten the day when their great leader, and one of the greatest statesmen of this country, Sir John Macdonald, when accused of discriminating against Great Britain and British connection, said, ' So much the worse for British connection !' Have the hon. gentlemen on the government side forgotten that when the leader of the government was accused of sacrificing British interests in favour of American interests, he said : ' I do not mind where the money comes from ; I prefer the American dollar to the British shilling.' I do not know what is passing over this country, but it seems that for some years we have been acting as if we regretted that our manhood was coming to us, and wanted to go back to our childhood. We are afraid of relying upon our own strength as Canadians. We talk of our great resources and of having a policy for Canada ; but when the time comes for applying such a policy, both parties are so much afraid of being accused of disloyalty that they will go back on their records of the past 50 years.

I am a great admirer of the British people ; and after a visit which I made last summer to England and which I enjoyed greatly, I came back with still greater admiration and sympathy for the British people. The reason is that they are a proud and strong people, and they like a people who are proud and strong. We may get a great many paper compliments for the policy we have adopted, but we do not get any greater esteem than we did when we said to John Bull : 'We are a worthy son of yours, but we are looking to our own interests first and last.'

I was very much surprised yesterday to hear the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). With good, common sense argument—in which, like myself, be gave a good deal of credit to both parties and some blame to both—he proved that it was to our interest to trade all over the world, and a great mistake to stake our policy upon the preference for Great Britain ; and then he concluded by saying that it would not be proper for the people of Canada to repeal the preference. I am prepared to go further and say that the moment we find that the preference policy does not suit us, we should repeal it.

The time is coming when both parties in this country will come to their cool senses. That wave of extraordinary poetical loyalty, as I may call it, is going to die out, and both parties will have to come to the point of standing for Canada and Canada alone. One cannot serve two countries any more than one can serve two masters. We may have our blood sympathies, and I have as much esteem and respect as any man in this House for the man who has a strong love for his mother land; but I will say that there is not one among 10,000 French Canadians who would think of making the slightest sacrifice in favour of France at the expense of the Canadian people, even if we should be in the majority in this country.

What has been the result of the present preferential policy? Five years ago we inaugurated this policy. That was before the South African war. We gave first a preference of 12½ per cent, then 25 per cent, and then 33⅓ per cent to British goods. After having started that policy with the intention of applying it to all nations who would be willing to trade fairly with us, we decided that we were too loyal and would only apply it to the motherland.

Then we entered into the Pacific cable contract. We were told by the greatest advocate of that scheme, Sir Sandford Fleming, that we were interested in that project, not because of any practical benefit to be derived from it, but because of our great love and loyalty to the motherland, and we took the responsibility of five-eighteenths of the capital stock of that company, or £1,700,000 sterling. A contract was signed by the four Australian colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania and New Zealand, which took in all eight-eighteenths, by Canada which took five-eighteenths, and by Great Brtain which took five-eighteenths. Yet, after this contract had been voted unanimously through the two Houses of this parliament, and 'God Save the Queen' had, of course, been sung; and after, in the exuberance of our loyalty and generosity, we had consented to Great Britain being represented by three directors and ourselves only by two, although we had subscribed the same amount, and the Australian colonies by three, what happened? Two of the Australian colonies, with the cognizance and approval of the British government, made a contract with a telegraph monopoly, in violation of the terms of the agreement, and contrary to the pledge of the British and Australian governments; and a year later the loyal Canadian people were asked to assume the responsibility of five-eighteenths of £300,000 sterling additional, because two of the most interested parties, with the consent of the paramount power, Great Britain, had seen fit to go back on their own word, fifteen days after the contract had been signed. That was the second feature of that policy.

I have spoken of the South African war and need not go back to that subject. But I think I may say, with all due respect to the majority of this House, that Canada has done her duty towards the motherland. We voted money for her relief; we allowed her to come and enlist our young men—a thing which Great Britain herself has acknowledged she was not allowed to do at a time when we were but a Crown colony; we allowed our young men, on whom Canada depended to develop her resources, to go and shed their blood in a foreign land. We allowed millions of dollars of the people's money, that could have been certainly well employed in Canada, to be expended in Africa. I respect and admire the feelings of those who were in favour of these sacrifices purely out of patriotism and not merely for the sake of getting votes. But what has been the result of all this?

We are told that we have got, through our loyalty an increased trade in Great Britain. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think as much of that increase is due to the intelligence, energy and skill of the Canadian people, as shown by their sending better products to the old country, than to anything else. And, as I have said, a good deal of that increased trade goes upon the European markets without our getting the credit of it, because our British cousin is skilful enough to keep the whole credit for himself.

Then we are told that Great Britain, having given us military protection for so many years, the least we can do is to help her in her difficulties. I am not going to discuss the views of those who are ready to stand up for Great Britain in her hour of distress. As far as that is concerned, I am much more reasonable than people may think; but what I say is that we should not enter into a general policy of contributing to the military expenditure of Great Britain without knowing where we are. As regards the great expenditure borne by the British people for the defence of Canada, I might refer gentlemen on this side to authorities I think they will not dispute. Without going back to the history of England, where I could find hundreds of authorities, I might simply quote one who is now pretty much outside both parties in England, but who is acknowledged in Great Britain to be an authority on military matters. I refer to Sir Charles Dilke, himself an Imperialist, in favour of getting from the colonies military help, but who admitted last year, in the parliament of Great Britain:

> Our fleet is not necessitated by the colonies but by our position and trade, apart from the question of whether we possess these colonies or not.

The organ of military men in England, the 'Army and Navy Gazette,' said on the 30th March, 1891:

> The Canadians have not yet risen to a proper sense of their obligations to the navy; they contribute nothing to the maintenance of the fleet and the preservation of their sea trade.

On the other hand, it is unwise to lose sight of the consideration that the United Kingdom could ill afford to reduce its navy even if we lost most of our colonies. This aspect of the question is seldom dealt with by the reformers.

I might also quote one of the prophets of the new Imperialism in England, Mr. Asquith, who said last fall at Edinburgh :

Why, if you once lost command of the sea, you would be starved into submission before a single foreign soldier had occasion to set his foot on your shores.

To hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, I might quote an authority that they accepted during many years, though perhaps not without some feeling of revolt, Sir Charles Tupper. Speaking in Winnipeg in 1893 on the argument that Canada should contribute to the British army and navy, and answering the objection to which I am replying that we are such a burden on the British taxpayer, Sir Charles Tupper said :

I deny that we are a burden to the empire. I say that if to-morrow Canada was dissevered from the Crown of England, if to-morrow Canada became a portion of that great republic which lies to the south of us, England could not reduce her army by a man, nor her navy by a ship. She would want more soldiers, and sailors and iron-clads than she has to-day in order to maintain her prestige.

These should prevent me from feeling too uneasy about the obligations and the burdens we are putting on the shoulders of the British taxpayer.

Now, let us look at the other side of the question, and see what has happened since we have shown so much love and devotion to the British taxpayer.

First, as a straight reply to the preference granted to British goods, we have received from the British representatives assembled in parliament three blank refusals to any consideration whatever of the question of preferential trade within the empire. In 1897, Sir Howard Vincent presented in the House of Commons a motion in favour of a preferential tariff on goods manufactured within the empire. Well, the House would not listen to the question. I admit that this was before the jubilee and before the South African war. But Imperial feeling had not made itself felt in Great Britain. Mr. Balfour simply set aside the motion and Sir Howard Vincent withdrew it.

But in 1899 we had adopted our preferential trade policy, the British people had assembled around the Throne, not merely to celebrate the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign, but to tell each other how much love and good feeling there was throughout the empire. Sir Howard Vincent brought the same motion on a question of duty on foreign wines. Then British opinion was a little more decided. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said :

It is not a financial matter of any great importance, but my hon. friend has raised a principle, the importance of which I do not think he has adequately represented to the committee, and it is for that reason, and not on account of the small sum involved, that I feel compelled to object to his proposal. . . . . What my hon friend . . . . asks me to do is to adopt a precedent which would involve a return to a system of differential duties in regard to our colonies, which was abolished forty years ago. . . . . Is my hon. friend prepared, or is the committee prepared, to impose a differential duty—which will have to be of a substantial amount to be of any use—on corn and timber from foreign countries in favour of corn or timber from Canada ? . . . . Now, whatever the force of sentiment in this matter, and I admit the force is very great indeed, surely the sentiment might be tempered with a little business-like consideration , ...

He then spoke of the high protective duties imposed by the colonies on British goods, completely forgetting that Canada was granting at the time a reduction of 25 per cent on British goods, and added :

I say that in such a case as this, to my mind it would be utterly unreasonable that we who bear the burdens of empire should surrender our fiscal freedom in the way my hon. friend proposes. . . . .

I wish to add here the opinion of a gentleman who has become very prominent as a leader of this Imperialistic movement, as an example of what is at the foundation of the moment. I refer to Sir Henry Fowler, who is now a strong supporter of Lord Rosebery :

. . . . I hope every gentleman on this side of the House will support the government——

—he was, ordinarily, an opponent of the government——

—in its resistance to the retrogade policy which is involved in the proposal of the hon. member.

But, of course, a few months later, this same gentleman exclaimed, speaking of the colonies—not of the colonies asking for any preference, not of the colonies asking for fair treatment, but of the colonies shedding their blood and giving their men for the defence of the empire——

These independent, self-governing communities have shown not merely by eloquent words or by enthusiastic cheers, but by spontaneously sending forth thousands of their sons to fight and to die for their fatherland—that our empire is one and indivisable, and that if ever it should be in peril from stress or storm it can summon to its defence a vast army of men of every class and creed and clime. . . . .

Our determination is to maintain our colonies, and to link them to each other and to us by even closer ties. . . . .

—but not to the point of giving us one atom of the favour we give to the British people. I could quote hundreds of extracts of this kind, but I do not think it is necessary.

This last summer, after our repeated proofs of devotion to the empire, the same question, or rather a question involving the same principle, was brought up in the British parliament. It was brought up by Mr. Fowler, the member for West Bradford, in the form of a proposal that the duty on sugar imported from the colonies should be reduced by 33⅓ per cent, thereby granting to one colonial article the same rate of preference that we have granted to so many British products. And this is what he said :

Canada had carried out a proposal which had extorted enthusiasm from this country ; and he submitted that, in view not only of what Canada had done but of what Australia was capable of doing, the Chancellor of the Exchequer should make a serious attempt to consider the question of an inter-empire preferential tariff. If our colonies were prepared on certain questions to meet us, ought we not to be prepared to meet them ? . . . . The time was ripe for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to respond in a sympathetic spirit to the proposals of the colonies. . . . .

And what did Sir Michael Hicks-Beach reply to that sympathetic appeal ? This :

In pursuance of the same policy, Canada might ask that a duty should be imposed on our corn and flour imported not produced in Canada, and similar claims might be advanced on behalf of Canadian timber, Australian wool, and meat from New Zealand, and so on, through all articles preference would be claimed for colonial produce. . . . . If, on the other hand, we refused to foreign nations the treatment extended to our colonies, what would happen ? We had an export trade with foreign countries double the amount of the trade with our colonies, and were we prepared to risk the loss of this trade by declining to give foreign countries in return for the same concessions the treatment we gave to the colonies ?

There, the principle was laid down straight that Great Britain was not ready to make any sacrifices of foreign relations in favour of her colonies. Then Sir Howard Vincent arose and said :

They owed an enormous debt to Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the boldness with which he had advocated these proposals and for his firm attitude during the general election last year. . . . .

And Sir William Harcourt said :

They all recognized the zeal and valour with which the empire across the seas had sent their forces to aid in this war ; but the taxation for the war would not fall upon them, but upon the petty population of 40,000,000 who occupied little England. And the proposal was that the workingmen, on whom this taxation would fall, were to have an additional burden put upon them in order to give relief to those who did not pay the taxes. . . . .

And Mr. Henniker Heaton said :

If the Chancellor of the Exchequer could see his way to agree to the amendment the greatest enthusiasm would be felt. . . . . A motion such as that which was now before the committee would promote kindly feeling towards England, and its rejection, after such a sacrifice as Canada has made, would cause great disappointment in that part of the empire. It would be thought that we did not care about the colonies when dealing with questions of taxation.

But the Chancellor of the Exchequer replied :

He felt strongly the kindliness and good will shown by the action of Canada. But, greatly as he valued that kindness, he thought the action itself was of far more importance than the actual effect it would have upon a great industry.

What was the result ? In 1897, after appealing to the House, the motion was withdrawn. In 1899, after the Jubilee, but before our proofs of loyalty had been given in the war, that motion was defeated by a vote of 192 to 37. But after the development of the feeling of reciprocity, after the feeling of love growing up among the members of the empire had produced such good and great results, the representatives of the British people crushed the motion in favour of the principle of any advantage being given to the colonies by a vote of 366 to 16. Sir, that has been the result of the development of love of the mother country for the colonies. And we are told now that we should not stand up in the Canadian parliament and say that we have at least one-tenth the feeling of pride in our own country that the British representatives have in theirs ! I think that is but a poor way to prove to Great Britain that we have profited by her example.

The Prime Minister of Ontario was in the old country last winter, and, with his eloquence, with his skill, with his wide knowledge of Canadian affairs, he spoke at a great number of meetings in England. One of the questions he took up was this question of the preference, and another was the question of immigration to Canada. The hon. gentleman has put in pamphlet form and published within the last few weeks some of his addresses in England. It is very amusing to bring together a few paragraphs to see how the expressions of opinion coming from a colonial representative are received in the old country when, on the one hand he expresses a desire to help Great Britain, and, on the other hand, a desire of being helped. Speaking in London on the 25th of July, Mr. Ross said :

I do not think we can keep a standing army for the defence of the empire, but I believe we can contribute something for a naval reserve. We have 50,000 fishermen who, with a little training, could be drawn on liberally for the navy.

Mr. Ross is an acute politician : he knew this would not affect very much his province, and he was ready to grant 50,000 fishermen from Quebec and the maritime provinces to prove our love towards Great Britain. But a few days later, speaking at Manchester on the 31st of July he said :—

I say to you here in Manchester that we are willing—I think we are willing—in Canada to impose a duty of 5 per cent on all importations from any foreign country, excepting the colonies of the empire, the money to be applied as a war tax or as a defence fund for the defence of the empire. Will you reciprocate that ? Will you impose a 5 per cent tax on all imports from foreign countries, excluding the colonies, as a defence fund for the defence of the empire ? Surely that is a practical basis.

And from the meeting came the cries : No ! No ! Sir, when the colonial statesman was offering freely our blood, was offering freely the arms, and strength, and energy of our youth, his words were accepted graciously ; but when he asked the British people to grant us, not anything comparable with that youth, not anything comparable with the gift we were asked to make, when he simply asked them to impose a small rate of duty, 5 per cent, of which they would get the benefit as a defence fund for the empire, the answer he gets is, no, no. That is imperialism as it is understood on the other side.

An hon. MEMBER. Why talk so much about it ?

Mr. BOURASSA. Why ? In order to make the Canadian people understand what is the real aim of the imperialist party in Great Britain, to show that by sacrificing the blood and the money of this country we are simply playing into the hands of politicians who are trying to make the British people shut their eyes to the iniquities in South Africa.

Sir, there was also the question of the embargo on Canadian cattle to which I referred some days ago. Here is a question upon which we do not ask for a great sacrifice from the British people ; we simply ask that the British government should not wilfully brand our cattle throughout the whole world as being poisoned. The Minister of Agriculture has brought the correspondence before the House. Much of it was brought down in previous years ; but I find here that the hon. minister submitted to the Privy Council of Canada a report in which he made what I may call a summary of the whole question.

Mr. COWAN. Read it.

Mr. BOURASSA. No, it is too long. It is laid on the Table of the House and the hon. member can read it. It might help him to understand many things that he does not understand now. As I said on a previous occasion, the Minister of Agriculture made a splendid campaign in England on behalf of Canadian interests, a campaign of which I was to some extent a witness, because I had an opportunity of speaking with a good many Englishmen, traders and stock raisers, who told me of the most intelligent and persistent efforts made by the Minister of Agriculture. I see that before going to England he had a report adopted by the Privy Council in which I read this :

The minister recommends that urgent representations be made to the Imperial government that the present embargo placed on Canadian cattle by the United Kingdom is not only a serious detriment from a financial point of view to the Canadian cattle trade and the farmers and stock raisers of Canada, and to the purchasers of beef, cattle and stockers in the United Kingdom, but that it is a most unfair and unjust aspersion on the health and reputation of Canadian cattle. It is a publication to all the markets of the world to which Canadian cattle could be exported that in the opinion of the authorities of the United Kingdom it is dangerous to import Canadian cattle. The minister also observes that were this justified by the facts of the case, or the condition of our cattle during many years past, no exception could be taken to it, but with the knowledge of the foregoing facts he desires to press most strenuously the equity and policy of removing Canada from the schedule.

Therefore not only was the case presented to the British public by the Minister of Agriculture, but it was presented officially to the British government by the Canadian government. What was the reply ? In a letter from the Board of Agriculture communicated to this government by Mr. Chamberlain, this is what I find written by Mr. Elliott, secretary of the Board, under date of June 12, 1901 :

The requirement that imported animals must be landed at a foreign animals wharf for slaughter there, is now a statutory one of general application to all imported animals alike, irrespective of any question of the particular country from which they arrive, as will be seen by reference to the Diseases of Animals Act, 1896. The free importation of animals into the United Kingdom is therefore no longer permissible in the case of any country, nor have the board any power to relax the requirements above referred to, or to differentiate between one country and another in that respect—— ——it is not probable that parliament would support, nor could the board propose, the modifications or appeal of the Act which was passed five years ago after full consideration and discussion at the hands of those concerned.

Well, Sir, now we are told that because in 1896 the British parliament passed a statute, it must stand for all time to come, sacred as the Bible. But the other day when it was found that the British government could not accept sailors from the colony of Newfoundland for their navy, owing to some obstacle in the constitution of the colony, they said they would remove the obstacle, not only from Newfoundland but from all British colonies, so that in future the British government could come into all the colonies and get sailors for their navy. Bnt when it is a question of removing from a British statute a clause which is an unjustifiable slander upon Canadian cattle, and an impediment to the trade of the loyal Canadian people—no, it is a British statute, it is sacred and cannot be touched ! Are we going to stand that treatment ? We are told we should not stand the treatment that is given to us by Germany. Sir, Germany is a foreign country. We have not shed our blood for Germany, we have not paid any money to Germany, we have treated Germany like a foreign country, we have asked Great Britain to disallow a treaty made with Germany. But, Sir, the British people have received a little help from the Canadian people. British statesmen, and especially Mr. Chamberlain, were very proud to be able to say upon public platforms in England that the people of the colonies were helping them, that the Liberals of England had no right to denounce the South African war because the whole Canadian people was at the back of England. But when it comes to a question, not of granting us any favours, but of simply doing us justice, when we ask them not to treat us as aliens, the answer is: No there is the British statute. And the British Board of Agriculture will not even take the trouble to ask parliament to repeal an unjust law.

I need not refer to the Alaskan boundary question, I have talked sufficiently about that. Shall I refer to the question of immigration into Canada? Here is a question upon which the British people are as much interested as we are. Mr. Ross wrote in the month of September last a very eloquent letter to the British people, published in the 'London Times,' in which he said it was in the interest of the British people to direct British immigration into the British colonies. He pointed out that during the last ten years, out of 726,000 emigrants, 520,000, or 72 per cent had gone to the United States, while only 90,000, or 13 per cent had gone to British North America. In order to induce the British government to take a hand in the matter he pointed out the advantage, from the military point of view, that she would derive in the future, and he said:—

> Canada would furnish a basis for the food supplies of the empire, and an admirable recruiting ground for the army and navy. Moreover (and this is of great importance), with an addition to our population of such persons as would naturally emigrate from the United Kingdom, the attachment of Canadians to the empire would be greatly and permanently strengthened.

From the general feeling in this country, one would think that this would bring a very enthusiastic reply from the great English organ. Well, it said that it was desirable that the British emigrant should go to the British colonies. But, it said:

> His going to the United States rather than to the Dominion, to South Africa, or to Australia is probably much less an affair of the flag than it is of latitude and longitude. South Africa is closed for the present, though we all hope that before long new openings and brighter prospects will be found there. Australia is a long way off, while the American continent, is, by comparison, close at hand. Canada, as we know, is not 'Our Lady of the Snows,' but nothing can alter the fact that the United States lie south of the Dominion nor its influence on the stream of emigration. If Canada were a part of the United States, or if the British flag waved undisputed from the Arctic ocean to the Gulf of Mexico, the stream of European emigration would probably still flow mainly to the middle latitudes of the North American Continent. No improved 'teaching of the geography and resources of the British Empire' can alter the fundamental fact that temperate zones best suit the people of these islands.

As you see, in the case of South Africa, the present state of the war was shown as the only obstacle in the way of the British emigrant going there; and in the case of Australia it was the long distance that might be shortened by improved means of transportation; but, as far as Canada is concerned, our case is that it is because we are not a temperate country. That is the greatest encouragement received from that great organ of public opinion, when the Prime Minister of one of the provinces tried to attract British emigration to that province. But, there is a higher authority as to the climate of our country. When those Welsh emigrants wanted to come to Canada and when they appealed to the master of the empire, the great prophet who rules over the destinies of this whole empire, who has framed the policy of the colonies for the last four years, the reason given by Mr. Chamberlain why these Welsh emigrants should not come here was that they would require too many woollen clothes! But when it came to a question of emigration to South Africa, to a point where the British government want settlers to go and take the places of these people who had been deprived of their farms, of those people who have been slaughtered, that was the purpose that was to be achieved. Their British blood was wanted to serve Mr. Chamberlain's purpose, and what the British government was not ready to do for the loyal colony of Canada, for the loyal colony of Australia, or for the loyal colony of New Zealand, the British government was ready to do for South Africa. What did we read in the Toronto 'Globe' of 2nd July last?

> Advices received from England intimate that the consent of the Imperial government has been given to a scheme for state aided emigration to South Africa. This news will be received with much regret in Canada and the other colonies which are looking to the British Isles for settlers to occupy and till their vacant lands. After the sacrifices which the colonies have made in blood and treasure to help the mother country, it seems but a poor return for the latter to throw its mighty influence into the scale in favour of emigration to South Africa. Canada has a special reason to feel annoyance.

But, as long as we feel only and we do not give more evidence of our feelings than we have done for the last four years the result will be nil. It is useless talk to go on telling the British government and the British people: 'You may do what you like, you can rely upon us; you can get everything from us. If you do anything against us we will enter a little protest outside of parliament, but both parties are so loyal that no one will dare to stand up in the Canadian parliament and tell you the truth.' The British government are a very practical and businesslike government: as long as our annoyance is intimated only through newspaper articles, you may rest assured that our men and our money will be well received, but that we will not get anything more satisfactory in the way of help towards immigration, towards the removal of the embargo on cattle, towards anything, not of favour, but of equal treatment and justice.

Now, I come to the question of Chinese and Japanese immigration. It is not my purpose to go into the merits of the question. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Smith), the other day, dealt lengthily with the question. He gave us the argument that there was nothing contrary to Imperial policy in dealing with that question. He quoted a letter from Mr. Chamberlain to the Governor of Tasmania, written in 1898, saying that it was the undoubted right of every British colony to adopt the immigration policy as they saw fit. But, Sir, Mr. Chamberlain has written many letters since that time. Now, the Imperialistic feeling has developed. The result of the South African war has been felt. What is the result? On the 19th of August last, the London 'Times,' published a letter from a gentleman from British Columbia, Mr. David Falconer, editor of the 'Outlook,' in which I find:

> Sir Wilfrid Laurier, our premier, has said that he thinks British Columbia is entitled to a larger share of the head tax on Chinamen, but, that nothing can be done to stop the emigration of the Japanese for 'Imperial reasons.' Yet, notwithstanding this opinion of Sir Wilfrid's, it seems incredible that Great Britain will deliberately permit the progressive and loyal people of any of her colonies to be plundered by an industrial Mongolian invasion for 'Imperial' or any other reasons if the matter be placed clearly before her.

Now, in an article published on the 2nd of September, the London 'Times' discussed the statement of Mr. Falconer, that the people of British Columbia were united on that point, and the 'Times' added:

> But, if it were so, we should still urge our Canadian fellow countrymen to give a more patient hearing to the 'Imperial considerations' of which Sir Wilfrid Laurier has spoken in connection with this question than Mr. Falconer seems inclined to do.

I suppose most of the members of this House know that in the commonwealth of Australia the parliament has adopted, not a prohibitive law, but a law putting such a test upon the Mongolian emigrant that he is practically excluded. There was a good deal of protest, too, from the British government. Mr. Chamberlain wrote to the governor of Australia, Lord Hopetoun, asking the Australian government to change their policy. The Australian government replied, that they would try to do so, but the moment the Australian parliament was called together, the leader of the opposition, Mr. Reid, denounced the Australian government in such terms that they had to go back to the resolution and carry out their law. Even then the influence of the British government was felt. The motion in favour of prohibition was pressed, and it was defeated only by five or six votes. It was defeated because the Australian government asserted that should it be carried it would be disallowed by the King, a proceeding which has not been adopted for a long time by the British Crown. At first the Australian government tried to make it apply to all emigrants by imposing an English language test, but at the request of the labour party, they framed it in such a way as to apply only to Asiatics. Protests were entered by the Japanese government and a letter was sent by Mr. Chamberlain to the Australian government saying that the Japanese government were threatening to cancel the mail contracts between Australia and Japan, but, the Australian government stood by its law and it is in operation now.

What happened here? As early as the month of October last, not three weeks after the Bill had passed in British Columbia, Mr. Chamberlain wrote at once to the Canadian government to look into the matter. I must say that the Minister of Justice recommended the disallowance of the law, but it was not disallowed immediately, and on the 22nd of January, 1901, Mr. Chamberlain wrote to Lord Minto:

>
> My Lord,—With reference to my despatch No. 25 of even date respecting the British Columbia Immigration Act, 1900, I have the honour to request that you will invite the serious attention of your ministers to the question of the competence of a provincial legislature to pass such legislation.
>
> 2. It is understood from press reports that the Act is of a restrictive nature, based on the Natal, and having regard to the general principles on which the British North America Act is based, it would appear that such a measure is ultra vires for any legislative body in Canada other than the Dominion parliament.
>
> 3. The whole scheme of the British North America Act implies the exclusive exercise by the Dominion of all 'national' powers, and though the power to legislate for the promotion and encouragement of immigration into the provinces may have been properly given to the provincial legislatures, the right of entry into Canada of persons voluntarily seeking such entry is obviously a purely national matter, affecting as it does directly the relations of the empire.
>
> I have the honour to be, my Lord,
> Your Lordship's most obedient servant,
> (Sgd.) J. CHAMBERLAIN.

Now, Sir, we have the principle laid down in this whole question in dispute between Imperial rights and provincial rights. In 1894 the Imperial government acknowledged, in their treaty with Japan, that every British colony had the undoubted right of excluding Japanese immigrants if it choose to do so, and that it was a power appertaining to every colony. Now, eight years later, we have the Colonial Secretary writing to a free colonial government telling them that they should take from one of their free provinces the right to say on what principle the basis of the population of that province should be fixed, because it might affect imperial interests. To-day it is a question of Japan. Suppose that to-morrow it is in the interest of the British government to make a treaty with China in order to check what may be considered by England as a hostile invasion of Russia in China; are we, in Canada, going to pay for that? Are we going to let the Chinese come into Canada because Mr. Chamberlain may choose to make a treaty with China? Every time that the British government have a treaty to make with a foreign country, are we going to be told that we have not the right to legislate as to the kind of people that will form the basis of the poulation that will live in this country and that will partake with us the advantages of citizenship in Canada? Who is going to say what the nature of the population of this country shall be? Is it the people of England or is it the people of Canada? I say, Sir, that every provincial government of this country should have the right to say who will enter that particular province and live in that province. I am not discussing the question of Japanese or Chinese immigration in itself; I am simply discussing the principle whether the British government has the right to decide what our constitution means, and what it does not mean. Up to this date we have been told that the great safeguard of our rights was in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that whenever a constitutional question was raised we had only to apply to that high tribunal which has no concern in our politics, and that our constitution would be interpreted by that body in the light of the principles of the British constitution. Sir, every time that our liberties are confided to the hands of judicial Englishmen I have no objection, because I know the generosity and the breadth of mind of the English judicial tribunals; but I say that the interpretation of our constitution should not be left in the hands of the politicians in England who may have some political objects to serve, and who to serve their purposes might try to exercise an influence on the politicians of Canada. There is one body constituted in the British Empire to interpret the British constitution all through the empire, and it is not the Colonial Secretary who should have the right to dictate to any colonial government how the laws passed by any free province should be treated because they may perchance affect the interests of the British government.

I did not expect to speak at such length upon this question, and I would like to ask if the government will consent to an adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BOURASSA.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) is likely to occupy much more time I suppose so. It was understood, however, that other speakers would follow him this evening. We thought we might sit until twelve o'clock, but if the hon. gentleman feels there should be an adjournment I do not think we can refuse it, though I would much prefer we should sit until midnight.

Mr. BOURASSA. I expect to occupy about three quarters of an hour to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. If the hon. gentleman is not to finish to-night I suppose we might as well adjourn.

Mr. BOURASSA. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 26, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Crown Bank of Canada.—Mr. Guthrie.

QUESTIONS.

ST. CATHARINES WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. LANCASTER—by Mr. Taylor—asked:

Why has not the Order in Council been passed granting to the corporation of St. Catharines for power purposes six thousand cubic feet of water per minute from the old Welland Canal, as petitioned for by the said corporation and Board of Trade of the said city of St. Catharines, and referred to by the Prime Minister on 18th February, 1901, as reported in 'Hansard' on page 109 of that year?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). In reply, I beg to say that we are waiting for a report from the engineer.

TEMISCOUATA RAILWAY AND INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. GAUVREAU—by Mr. Talbot—asked:

What price was paid by the Temiscouata Railway Company for the passage of each one of its cars over the Intercolonial Railway Company's branch between the Rivière du Loup station and the wharf, for the years 1900 and 1901?

How many of the said company's cars have passed over the Intercolonial Railway Company's branch line during the years 1900 and 1901 ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The price paid by Temiscouata Railway for the passage of cars over the Intercolonial Railway Company's branch between Rivière du Loup station and the wharf for the years 1900 and 1901 was $1 and $1.50, respectively.

2. 2,254.

CENSUS COMMISSIONERS—SOUTH WATERLOO.

Mr. CLARE—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. Who was the commissioner for the taking of the recent census in the South Riding of Waterloo, and what was the amount paid or to be paid him ?

2. What amount is to be paid to the special enumerator for securing information as to the manufacturing interests in said riding, or what arrangement or understanding was come to with him as to amount or manner of payment ?

3. What sums of money, in detail, were paid to the several officers employed in the said riding for their services in connection with taking the census of 1891 ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher).

1. Alfred Kaufman, $354.74.

2. Seventeen days at $4, $68; expenses, $9.05—$77.05.

3. H. Hilborn	$53.17
H. Arthur	76.93
J. Leeds	63.06
J. Allison	138.24
G. D. Lewis	132.00
C. Pabst	50.25

DOMINION AND PROVINCIAL RIGHTS OVER TIDAL WATERS, &c.

Mr. FARQUHARSON asked :

What action has the government taken, or intend taking, to define the respective rights, privileges and duties of the Dominion and Provincial governments in reference to the rivers, tidal waters and foreshores in the Dominion, as referred to in the British North America Act ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick). A reference of questions in difference between the government and the province was made to the Supreme Court of Canada, which decided these questions, and afterwards they were finally decided upon appeal by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. See the report of the decision in 1898, A.C., 701, et seg.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). I would ask permission, Mr. Speaker, to sum up, in a few words, the points I made last night before the adjournment. With regard to the first part of the motion presented by the hon. the leader of the opposition, I said that, in my opinion, the time had passed for discussing in this parliament the respective theories of free trade and protection. The policy of protection, I contended, has been imposed upon us by foreign circumstances. It has not been adopted because of any theory, or because it is peculiar to one party or the other, but because it is the natural policy of Canada. And I maintain that it would be to the advantage of Canada if representatives of both parties would cease discussing the relative merits of protection and free trade, and recognize the irresistible force of existing conditions. The policy of protection, I have pointed out, was forced upon the Conservative party, just as it has been forced upon the Liberal party; and we should be prepared to admit, what we all know to be the case, that so long as outside circumstances do not change, we will have to continue that fiscal policy, which both sides have practically agreed upon. I therefore do not see any necessity for the motion proposed by the hon. the leader of the opposition. There may be questions of detail to be considered—as, for instance, whether the rates of duty should be raised or lowered on certain imports; but in such cases it is the duty of those who want the rates raised, to bring a straight motion asking that the tariff on this or that article should be made higher. But, I do not see any utility whatever in asking the parliament of Canada to declare that a protective policy is necessary in this country, in view of the fact that such a policy has been imposed on both parties during the last twenty-four years, irrespective of the personal opinions of any member.

In the second part of my argument I admitted that I voted with the greatest pleasure for the preference to Great Britain when that measure was introduced by the government, in 1897. But, as time went on and the results of that preference made themselves felt, I came to the conclusion that instead of its being a measure of freer trade—as no doubt the government meant it to be—it has turned out to be the worst kind of protection, namely, protection to foreign at the expense of home manufactures, and this is a kind of protection that I am not prepared to accept. I further expressed my astonishment at the contradictory position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the first part of their resolution, they say that the principle of protection should be proclaimed once more by this House, and then, in the latter part, they ask this parliament to declare itself in favour of discrimination against Canadian products for the benefit of British and German manufactures.

Mr. CLARKE. No, you have not read the resolution.

Mr. BOURASSA. That is the resolution. It is useless to talk about mutual preference and at the same time proclaim the protectionist doctrine. Suppose we should succeed in getting in the British market a preference for our agricultural products, that would no doubt be a good thing for our farmers, but would that afford the slightest protection to our manufacturers? Would that do away with the injury which they claim the present preference is doing them? No doubt if we could obtain a preference for Canadian farm products, that would be of advantage to Canadian farmers, but would it give any relief to those manufacturing industries, of which hon. gentlemen opposite pose as being the special champions? Not at all. A preference by Britain to Canadian farm agricultural products in return for the preference given by Canada to British manufacturers would certainly not aid our Canadian manufacturers, whatever good it might do our farmers.

To my mind, the position taken by both parties on that question of preference to England, and the developments in that line that have taken place in the last three years, are not inspired by any Canadian sentiment or by any sentiment in favour of any class of the Canadian community, but have been forced on public men on both sides by that wave of what, I think, may be aptly described as the morbid feeling of loyalty to the empire which has become developed in this country at the expense of the true feeling of loyalty to national and Canadian interests.

In the course of my argument yesterday, I think I proved also that the preference granted to British goods has not had the results we expected, either in the matter of exports or imports; that the development of our export trade in the British market is not due to that policy, but to the intelligence displayed by Canadian producers and to the course pursued by our government in the matter of transportation and preservation of our natural products.

I made the point also that we have entered into a Pacific cable contract, in which we have been made the victims, as we have had to pay not only the share originally agreed upon in the scheme, but also a further amount in order to redeem the broken pledges of two of the most interested parties.

I also pointed out that for the last three or four years we have given abundant proof of our loyalty to the British empire, that we have given millions of dollars, that we have given freely of our blood and our wealth both in men and money. And what have been the results? First, the refusal by the British parliament of any concession whatever to the colonies in the matter of trade; second, the maintenance without any reason possible of the embargo against Canadian cattle in the British market; third, the sacrifice of Canadian interests in the matter of the Alaskan boundary in spite of the strong position taken by the Canadian government on that point; fourth, discrimination by the British government in matters of immigration in favour of the colonies of South Africa at the expense of Canada; fifth, the declaration by the Colonial Secretary in London of the policy that, while the British government can take the funds of the British people to encourage British emigration to South Africa, they will interfere with the liberty of Canadian people and force us to admit Mongolian immigration into Canada if it suits the interests of the British government—that is, the principle is laid down by the British government that they have the right to control the immigration policy of the Canadian people.

So that I claim that within the last four years, we have displayed our loyalty on every occasion, we have made enormous efforts to secure the good will and favour of the British people, with the result that we have received a great many compliments and a great measure of eulogy in the speeches of British statesmen, an enormous amount of printed matter showing how much the Canadian people are looked to in Great Britain; but, whenever we have asked the British people or the British parliament to manifest that feeling by some measure, not of favour to the Canadian people—because we have never begged for any favours—but simply to show some consideration for the wishes of the Canadian people, we have been told, on one occasion, that there were obstacles in the British statutes, at other times that what we wished was contrary to the principles of the British people. On no occasion have we been able to secure one of the concessions, or one of the equal terms, we have asked from the British government.

I may be told that when I speak in this way I am animated by a feeling of disaffection towards Great Britain and her people. Of course, affection and loyalty are things that are understood differently by different people. To my mind, the affection, the loyalty and the love that should unite the different members of the British empire should be manifested not so much in words as in deeds. Whenever we have been called upon to prove our loyalty to the British people and the British Crown, we have been glad to take advantage of the opportunity, and we have done it generously. And I say that if we wish to prove that that feeling of reciprocal love is strong, that the new imperialism is based upon a deep sentiment of love and fair play among the different members of the British empire, then, all the deeds should not be on the one side and all the words and compliments on the other.

I was much struck with a remark that was made by one of the London papers at the beginning of the South African war. It was after the first engagement in which the Canadian soldiers had taken part. The newspaper to which I have referred observed that it was not sufficient to mention that so many Canadian soldiers, so many New Zealanders and so many Australians had taken part in the engagement; but that they should be paid high compliments, because the colonists are fond of compliments; and if their services are wanted in the future, they must be praised ungrudgingly in this respect.

It may be that we are fond of compliments, but we are not beggars. I do not ask that the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people should play the part of beggars towards the British parliament and people. I have more pride and more confidence in the national feeling of my country than that. But I say that we should take a position before the British parliament and before the British people that this is a free people, entitled to the same liberty and the same treatment as any other community in the British empire, and that when we come to deal with the United Kingdom, we must deal on equal terms. For every favour we grant them, an equal favour must be done to us. For every advantage given to the British people, a similar advantage must be given to the Canadian people.

I must confess that the position taken by our representatives for the last few years has had something to do with the belief which has developed in Great Britain as to the facility with which Canadians can be satisfied with words and compliments. I am not referring to the position taken by the Prime Minister, and to the speeches delivered by him, at the time of the jubilee festivities. No doubt the occasion was propitious for the exchange of expressions of friendly feeling. No doubt, the Prime Minister, going there as a French Canadian, the representative of a minority in a British colony where that minority enjoyed equal rights and fair treatment, felt called upon to express feelings that are at the bottom of the heart of every French Canadian. So long as this remains a matter of sentiment I shall approve of the expressions of the Prime Minister; and I shall not begrudge it if he goes there this summer and holds the same language. But when it comes to matters of business, the Prime Minister, when leader of the opposition, stated most eloquently and forcibly the best way to win the appreciation of John Bull. That way was to show John Bull that Canada was the worthy son of his sire, and that we are just as businesslike as he is.

In 1899, Sir Louis Davies, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries, spent a few weeks in London in order to get the British government to take the right side on the Alaskan boundary question. He stated at that time that he regretted very much that he was not able to secure from the British government the full support that he expected. But, on the very same trip, speaking to the very same people and government, he said that if Great Britain wanted ten thousand men from Canada, she could have them. It has been stated in the British parliament time and again that it was only a matter of time when the British government could secure in Canada all the men wanted for filling up the ranks of their army and manning the ships of their navy, Englishmen and Scotchmen no longer showing any great desire to enter the service.

Last year I referred to the late Congress of the Chamber of Commerce of the empire. The records of that meeting give us some interesting information. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), who spoke yesterday, was there as one of the representatives from Canada. Chambers of Commerce in all parts of the empire were represented there. And what happened? Our representatives from Ottawa, from Toronto from Montreal, joined by representatives from Australia and Cape Colony, proposed to that congress a motion affirming the principle of taxing the colonies for war purposes and getting from them all the material required. This was carried unanimously. But when it came to the point when the Canadian delegates asked for recognition of the principle that Canadians and colonial trade generally should receive in Great Britain similar treatment to that given by Canada to British trade, the representatives from England and Scotland united to crush every motion of that kind made by the Canadian representatives. And yet, Sir, after the congress was over, these Canadian gentlemen went to a banquet of the congress and repeated their assurances of love and loyalty to Great Britain. Again, I say I do not reproach them for having done so, but their declaration should have been coupled with a declaration of pride and confidence in our own country, such a declaration as would make the British delegates understand that if they expected Canadian military help in men and money they should give some evidence of consideration for us.

Last year there was, as there is every year, in London, a demonstration in order to develop what is now spoken of as the real imperialistic sentiment. The occasion was the Dominion Day dinner. This has developed into one of those numerous social functions of which Mr. Chamberlain very cleverly avails himself to gather the colonial representatives and cause them, after a very pompous banquet, to make declarations of love towards the mother country, that he may explain to the British people afterwards that these colonies are so generous that Great Britain may expect anything from them and need not give them anything in return. The late Minister of Justice, Mr. Mills, was there, and what did he say :

. . . . The feeling in favour of the unity of the empire has grown very rapidly during the last five years in Canada. Every one was anxious to see the unity of the empire preserved; to see by degrees some system of union organized which would prove satisfactory to the self-governing colonies and to the United Kingdom. They were satisfied that such a condition of things might be brought about, and that feeling was largely due to the reciprocal feeling which had sprung up in the United Kingdom. . .

Well, sir, it is most amusing that this declaration, which is an acknowledgment of reciprocal feeling on the part of the British people, was made by a Canadian representative just two weeks after the British parliament had repulsed by what I might call a unanimous vote, coupled with ironical cheers and laughter, the idea that the British people could be asked for a slight sacrifice in favour of colonial trade—of which I gave an illustration yesterday.

Now, what is the feeling of British statesmen themselves on that question ? Let me take as an example the most powerful public man in Great Britain to-day, one of the greatest English statesmen in this century, who has forced the imperialist sentiment upon the British people, I mean Mr. Chamberlain. In 1897 the attention of Mr. Chamberlain was called in the British parliament to the preferential policy which had just been adopted by the Canadian parliament. Mr. J. F. Hogan asked :

I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the colonies (1) whether he has observed that the new Canadian tariff provides for preferential trade relations with the mother country; and (2) whether Her Majesty's government will embrace the earliest opportunity of recognizing and, if practicable, reciprocating the action of the government of the Dominion in this important matter ?

The Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. J. Chamberlain) :

The answer to the first part of the hon. member's question is in the affirmative. Her Majesty's government cordially appreciate the friendly spirit which is shown by the action of the Dominion government, but I understand that the proposals do not depend on any alteration of the system of free trade established in the United Kingdom.

Mr. BOURASSA.

But when he came to the question of colonial help towards the British army and navy, Mr. Chamberlain was more interested in the colonies. In 1900, a motion was made in the House to lay down the principle of colonial representation in the British parliament. Mr. Chamberlain then said that, though in theory he might agree with the principle laid down by the motion, yet he did not see it was of any use to raise the question now. The seconder of the motion, Mr. Trevelyan, had stated that in the South African war the colonies had displayed all the loyalty that could be desired, but that a time might come when that feeling would cool down; and therefore they ought immediately to give a kind of legislative sanction to that action, and give representation to the colonies, so that in future they might be induced to supply the men and money in every war in which Great Britain might become entangled. Mr. Chamberlain immediately dispelled that idea. He said : You don't know the colonies, you don't know the generosity of the colonies, you can expect everything from them :

I believe that if in any stress, or difficulty, or crisis of our fate, we did make a call on the colonies, their efforts would be immensely greater even than those they have already made.

Now, turning to the other wing of the dominant party in England just now, turning to Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who is the representative of the old Tory element, what have we seen ? Sir Michael Hicks-Beach has repeated time and again that the colonies need not expect anything from Great Britain in the matter of commercial advantages ; that Great Britain would not sacrifice one cent of her foreign trade in order to benefit by that cent the loyal colonies of Great Britain. But when it came to the question of organizing the empire on a military basis so as to give Great Britain the men and money she would like to acquire in order to lessen the burden upon her own people, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach changed his position. He said in Liverpool, on the 24th of October, 1900 :

With an expanding empire we ought to have a much more widely spread system of contribution to Imperial defence than that which we at present enjoy. I do not believe you will find a single colony that will object to that. The whole history of the South African campaign shows that they have come forward voluntarily to a man in a matter which at first, apparently, did not affect them, to place their men and means at the disposal of Her Majesty's government for the safety of the empire, and I am convinced that our colonists in America, in Canada, and in Australia are much too proud to desire to impose on the mother country anything more than she ought to fairly bear for Imperial defence. We have at the present moment a great feeling of enthusiasm on the part of Her Majesty's subjects throughout the world. For the present and future of the empire, I desire to see that feeling utilized. I desire every politician in this country or in the colonies, and every man of business, to do his best to utilize and to systematize while they can that feeling of enthusiasm.

But when it came to the question of granting any favour to the colonies, in the very same speech Sir Michael said :

To suppose that this country, after fifty years experience of what the freedom of taxation on imports of raw material and food means to us, will deliberately resort to the taxation of raw material and food from foreign countries, is to my mind an impossibility. I do not wish to argue the question further. I wish, as I have said, simply to state my own opinion that any person in our colonies or in this country who founds his views as to the future on the possibility of any solution of this question except on the basis of free trade, is founding his views on a foundation of sand, and I would not for the world have the responsibility of saying to our fellow subjects that we can deal with it on any other basis than that of free trade.

Sir, there is something that I always admire in British statesmen, and that is that when they express their views they do so in no ambiguous manner ; they let us know with whom we have to deal, and with what system we are confronted. But I say that after such declarations we ought to know what are the sentiments of the British people and the British government. Last summer I had the advantage of a long interview with a member of the British government—not a member of the cabinet but of the government—not one of the rising stars of the party in power in England. I put to him this simple question : 'You are working up in this country and in the colonies, through your representatives, a strong feeling of what you call the new imperialism. But are you not afraid that when the people in Great Britain and the colonies find out that you are keeping them under a delusion, a strong reaction will take place ?' He asked: 'What do you mean ?'—I said, 'here in England I hear only of what the colonies have done for Great Britain, of what the colonies will do for Great Britain, of what Great Britain can expect from the colonies ; but I hear nothing of what the colonies may expect from Great Britain.' 'Well, surely,' he said, 'they do not expect anything; we are told by your representatives that the colonies expect nothing.'—He was not disposed to believe me, although very polite in his expressions, when I told him that there might develop a disposition in Canada to expect something from Great Britain, either in a political, a legislative or a commercial sense. I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is dangerous for all parties concerned, it is not loyal on the part of the parliament of Canada, to allow the British government and the British people to remain under the impression that Canadians are ready to make any sacrifice and to ask for nothing in return.

I have already stated that last fall, after the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was repealed, without any consideration apparently being given to the wishes of the Canadian government, some strong expressions of opinion were made in the public press of this country. We had the leading organ of the hon. gentlemen opposite in the city of Ottawa, publishing a strong argument against the stand taken by the British government, and next day it was followed by a correspondence, published without a word of dissent on the part of the editorial management. If the language of this correspondence had come from my own disloyal lips it would have raised a feeling of indignation among all the loyal representatives in this House. Let me quote :

Many of our leading newspapers have been representing Britain as an indulgent mother, protecting us with her army, navy and great prestige, and Canada as a selfish and ungrateful dependent, accepting everything and contributing nothing towards the defence of the empire.

The writers who thus slander their own country have profited little by their study of history. When and where, in the last eighty-seven years, has Britain protected us or championed our cause ? . . . .

I assert unhesitatingly that in the settlement of every dispute between Britain and the United States, Canada has been the victim. Like Artemus Ward, who was willing to sacrifice all his wife's relations on the altar of his country, the Imperial government has cheerfully sacrificed Canada's interests to maintain friendly relations with the United States.

Owing to our geographical position, Britain's army and navy could afford but slight, if any, protection to Canada. . . . The only possible enemy that Canada need fear is our neighbour on this continent, the mighty republic. Against their aggressiveness British power and prestige have hitherto failed to protect us, and, if ever there was a possibility of such protection being granted in the past, it is rapidly diminishing if it has not already disappeared.

We are doing far more for Britain than Britain has done for Canada in nearly a century. While we are admitted to the markets of the United Kingdom on no better terms than the worst enemies of the empire, we give British trade a substantial preference. While Britain has never, since the last war with the United States, taken a firm stand to protect us from the rapacity of our neighbours, Canadians have risked their lives, shed their blood and taxed themselves cheerfully to maintain the prestige of the empire. . . . .

It is high time that Canadians became, not less loyal, but more patriotic. While we have no right to condemn the policy of the British government, which has been dictated in the interest, or what has been regarded as the interest, of the empire as a whole, we should look the fact squarely in the face that in any clash of interests between the United States and the Dominion we need look for neither sympathy nor support from the Imperial government. We will be expected to adhere to the traditional policy of Downing Street and sacrifice ourselves for the benefit of the empire and the maintenance of cordial relations between England and the great American republic.

Sir, these sentiments are not exactly mine. My feeling against Great Britain is most certainly not so pronounced as that. For my part I am an Imperialist from a certain standpoint. But my Imperialism is that of the good old British school that made the empire what it is, and which was expressed in those words of Burke when he vainly protested against the policy of the Imperial government of George III and Lord North, namely : That the secret of British expansion in the world was a 'wise and salutary neglect' towards the colonies. I am one of those who do not ask that the British government should take any part in all our troubles. I am not asking that the British government should be involved in our difficulties. I am not asking any favours commercially or otherwise from the British government. But I do say that if we are forced by the government of Great Britain, or by the government of Canada, or by a feeling of false loyalty in this country, to do for the government of Great Britain and the people of Great Britain what we are not bound to do—what we were never asked to do in the past in commercial or in military matters—then it follows that some compensation should be made by the British people to the Canadian people. Let the British government leave us free to develop our policy, to have the foreign relations we want to have, to trade where we like to trade : I do not ask any favour from the British government. But, if through the influence of the British government, or through our own policy, we are going to proclaim to the British people and to the world at large that we want to trade only with Great Britain; that we want to give favours to the British public which we will not give to other people; then I say that as a consequence, similar favours must be granted to the Canadian people by the British people.

Now, Sir, an Imperial conference will be held in London this summer at which Canada will be represented, if I understand aright, by three of the Canadian ministers. We have before us the letter of invitation that was sent by the British government to the Canadian government, and the reply thereto of the Canadian authorities. When I asked for the production of these papers the right hon. Prime Minister said that I would be disappointed with the text of that correspondence. Well, I may say to the Prime Minister, that every time he and his government stand for the defence of Canadian interests; every time they tell the British government that before being representatives of the British Crown they are representatives of the Canadian people, I shall fully sympathize with them. Therefore, I am not disappointed with the correspondence. I fully approve of the principle laid down in the letter sent by the Canadian government in reply to the invitation of the British government, which states that the only question which may be fruitful of result is the question of commercial relations and a discussion thereon.

But, Sir, I think that the parliament of Canada and the people of Canada are entitled to know upon what basis the Canadian government are prepared to consider commercial relations at that conference. I think this discussion might be fruitful of good result; but I believe that the Canadian representatives, though they undoubtedly know the feelings of the Canadian people, should take the Canadian parliament into their confidence as to the views which they intend propounding at that conference with regard to the future relations of the different parts of the empire. I need not say what my view is—I need not say what the view is of more people than I seem to represent in this House to-day. That view is that this question should be discussed on a purely business basis; that we should not give up one iota of our freedom of trade with any country in the world; and that if we are brought to the point of making trade arrangements either with Britain or any of our sister colonies, it shall be on the basis of purely direct treaties between Canada and any of these sister colonies.

That view further is : That in any treaty that will be made, or in any trade arrangement that will be made either between Great Britain and Canada, or between Canada and any other colony, there should be no mere sentimentality introduced, but that Canada should play the part of an equal business partner and get as much as she will give.

It may be said that the right hon. premier stated in England in 1897 that Canada asked no favours; but, Sir, I claim that circumstances have changed since then. I repeat what I said before : I do not denounce the right hon. gentleman for anything he said at that time on this particular point. Our preferential treatment of Great Britain was an experiment; but now, enlightened by the result of that experiment, seeing that the result has not been what we expected—seeing that trade facilities could be had with other countries,—the right hon. gentleman should not be afraid to take the position of saying to the British government : 'The results have not been what we expected; some of the British traders are taking advantage of our policy to bring German goods into England and export them to Canada as British goods enjoying that preference; and whilst we have denounced the German treaty, Britain herself has been very glad to enter into a trade arrangement by which she enjoys the minimum tariff with Germany, while we suffer under the maximum tariff; and, in addition to that, German goods are exported from England to Canada under the preferential tariff, to the great detriment of our own people.' It will not be harder for the right hon. gentleman to change the position he had taken on this point than it was for him to change the position which he took with regard to another Imperial matter.

In 1897, the right hon. gentleman said that Canada was anxious for representation in the British government, or rather, that the time would soon come when Canada would ask for representation in the British parliament; but having found out now that the sentiment of the people of Canada is not in favour of representation in the British parliament, the right hon. gentleman has stated in his letter to the British government that no good can be obtained from the discussion of our political relations. Sir, it is the duty of the representative of any country to conform his views to the views of the people of that country.

The second point upon which I think our representatives at the coming London conference should not abandon one iota of our rights, is the vexed question of the embargo on our cattle. It is for them to say that nothing will be discussed in the way of commercial relations between Great Britain and Canada until the embargo on Canadian cattle is removed. Our representatives should say that before we enter into any new trade arrangements, the unjustifiable wrong of barring out our cattle from England should disappear, and that the least we can expect from the motherland is that she will cease branding all over the world that Canadian cattle is diseased, when, in fact, they are not diseased, and when, in fact, further, any cattle disease we ever had in this country was imported from the old country.

Another point upon which the right hon. gentlemen and his colleagues should insist most strenuously is, that the Colonial Secretary should not be allowed to interfere with any legislation that may be adopted in Canada in reference to immigration. The right hon. gentleman and his colleagues should insist that the Colonial Secretary has not the right to send letters to the Governor General of Canada stating that our constitution means this and means that; that such and such powers belong to provincial governments, and that such and such powers belong to the federal parliament. The Canadian representatives should make Mr. Chamberlain understand that the time is passed, and passed long ago, when a Colonial Secretary in Downing Street, a mere politician in England, has the right to interpret the constitution under which the people of Canada live. As I said last night, and I insist upon that point: We are all of us, French Canadians and English Canadians, ready to submit any point in our constitution to the interpretation of the judiciary in England selected for that purpose. However, not as a French Canadian, but as a free British Canadian, I have the strongest objection to the Colonial Secretary writing to the Canadian government to say that our constitution means this or means that, and that the Federal government should interfere with this or that provincial law, because some Imperial interest is supposed to be at stake.

As to the inter-imperial trade advocated by the leader of the opposition, I have clearly stated my views last year. I do not want it, and for two reasons. First, because it is absurd to again beg from the British people what they have three times before declared in their parliament, with sneers at our expense, that they will never grant to us. Second, because, as I said last year, we can only get a preferential treatment in England at the expense of our freedom, commercial, political and military; and that the preference under such circumstances would not be worth our while. We cannot get that preferential treatment in England without having in London a council of some kind that will look after its operation. Surely the hon. leader of the opposition and his party are not prepared to say that after we have entered into an agreement with the British government and all the colonial governments, that the operation of the trade under that agreement should be left entirely in the hands of the British government. Then, does he mean to say that it is impossible to follow up the operation of such a trade by correspondence between the various governments, in London, at Ottawa, at Melbourne, at Christchurch, and the capitals of all the other British colonies? No. The inevitable consequence—and Mr. Chamberlain, with his clearness of mind, has seen it for years—would be the sitting in London of an Imperial council, on which Canada would be represented by one or two gentlemen, who would dine every week with Mr. Chamberlain, and would be too near London to be near enough to Ottawa. We have seen something of this kind at the sitting of the Pacific Cable Board. When Lord Strathcona speaks, with all his devotion to Canada's interests, he speaks as a member of the House of Lords and a capitalist who has large investments in Great Britain, as much as a Canadian representative. This is not owing to any bad feeling or unfaithfulness to the Canadian people on his part; but after all, a man is a man; and when his interests are divided in so many directions, he cannot be expected to be solely a representative of his country. Moreover, it would be most dangerous—and on this point Mr. Ross, the premier of Ontario, has given expression to the same feeling—for the people of Canada to see any part of their policy, whether commercial or political, disposed of by a body of men sitting in London, even if that body should be composed of the best men in the empire. I repeat after Mr. Ross that the only way the Canadian people can have their will asserted is through their representatives in parliament. I have no objection to our representatives going to London once in a while to meet the representatives of the sister colonies, but the operation of a trade policy such as that suggested by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would be utterly impossible unless a permanent Imperial council be created. That policy would entail a considerable diminution of our liberties, not only in regard to our trade relations but our political relations and our military relations also. Mr. Chamberlain has stated time and again in the British parliament and on the platform—and all his followers and sympathisers in the Liberal and Conservative parties have repeated—that whenever the colonies received any sort of representation or preferential treatment in Great Britain, they would compensate the British people to a greater extent than the amount they received, by military contributions. Therefore if the government of this country are not prepared to discuss a change in our political and military relations, they cannot accept the proposal made by the leader of the opposition on the subject of preferential trade.

Sir, I will sum up what we want said in our name before the Imperial conference. We want it said that we are ready to increase and strengthen our relations with Great Britain and with the sister colonies, but on the condition that we shall not sacrifice one iota of the liberties and privileges we possess, not only by the letter of the law but by the spirit of the constitution; that is, that we want to keep full control of our trade relations, our political relations and our military relations with Great Britain; that we want to keep in the hands of the Canadian parliament, as representing the Canadian people, the full control not only of our relations with the motherland and the sister colonies, but our relations with foreign countries as well. It has been announced by the government—and I hope it will be carried out—that we are going to have agents representing this country in various foreign countries. If we are serious with that policy, and really desire to trade with these foreign countries, and want these agents of ours to be in a position to do good work, they must be empowered to say to any foreign country that while we are British subjects, we are at the same time in the full enjoyment of self-government and can make our own trade policy, and are not childish enough to say that we will trade only with Great Britain and the sister colonies, but are ready to trade with any country that is ready to trade with us on fair terms. This, coupled with a strong transportation policy, which this government seems to have at heart, is the way to build up this country, to develop its resources, to increase its wealth and population. This is a far better way to render service to the empire and to add prestige to the British Crown than by making so many speeches and talking so much of our loyalty and neglecting to take the necessary means to develop our own country. If we do not make up our minds to pursue our own course, to paddle our own canoe, then we shall continue to be as we have been during most of our past life, especially at all critical periods in our history—going backwards and forwards from American influence to English influence, and vice versa.

We shall never attain the development we are entitled to have if the representatives of Canada go to London imbued with any other idea. But if they carry to the foot of the Throne an expression of the loyalty of the people of this country, French-Canadians as well as English-Canadians, and at the same time an expression of the seriousness of the Canadian people in making the British government understand that we are not only a loyal people but a business people, that we are not only loyal to England, but, as the right hon. leader of this House so eloquently expressed it in years past, we are loyal to Canada, first, last and forever, then I shall be the first to congratulate him on his return to this country.

Mr. M. K. RICHARDSON (South Grey). Mr. Speaker, in rising to address this House after so emminent a speaker as the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Bourassa), I feel some temerity in attempting to interest hon. members. There is very much in the hon. gentleman's address with which I am in accord, and I think there would have been a more general accord with many of the sentiments he has expressed, especially with regard to our trade policy, if he had not been so unfair in charging the British government with a lack of response to the offers of this country to give preferential treatment to British trade. What could we expect by the way of response when the British statesmen were told by our representative that we did not ask anything in return for what we were giving—that we not only did not ask anything, but did not want anything in return? He took it out of the power of British statesmen to advocate Canadian interests in that regard.

The subject of a fiscal policy for this country has been discussed so fully and so ably, and has been viewed from so many sides, that few new facts or arguments can be advanced on the subject. However, I will trespass on the patience of the House only for a short time while I present the case from my point of view. In a country that has so many diversified interests and such a variety of products as our country has, a consideration of the fiscal policy which shall be best suited to the wants of the country as a whole must always be a fertile subject for debate and for difference of opinion; and in the discussion of this subject we need to rise above the limited views of what is best for our own particular locality, to sink all sectional prejudices, and candidly ask how any proposed policy will conduce to the advantage or prosperity of the country as a whole. As a firm believer in a confederated Canada, in a Canadian nationality having a distinctive character and a great future, I have listened with intense interest to the budget debate which has continued for some days. I have noticed one peculiar thing—that on this side of the House there is a remarkable unanimity of opinion as to the fiscal policy which is best suited to this country, while on the other side of the House there has been a charming variety, with all kinds of opinions advocated, from the most extreme free trade views to high protectionist views. Now, the trade policy of a country must have regard to changing conditions, internal as well as external. What may suit a country's needs at one period of its history might become entirely unsuitable at another period. Thus we are confronted with the question what is the best policy for Canada to-day ? We need to view this question, not from the standpoint of the doctrinaire, who has enunciated a lot of theories on protection or free trade, having a world-wide applicability, but from the standpoint of history and experience. For as experience is in individual life, the greatest and the best teacher, so it is in national life.

So much statistical matter has been put before the House in this debate that I shall not attempt anything in that line. Far more figures have been submitted to the House than can possibly be carried in any one's memory, and I do not believe that anything new of much importance can be submitted further in this direction. There are a few questions, however, which may be considered. The first is, has the fiscal policy of this country been conducive to its prosperity and does the policy submitted to us by the Finance Minister meet with the needs and circumstances of the time ? There is one feature of it which we on this side have not much reason to complain of. The country no doubt has reason to be grateful to the government for not having, when they assumed the reins of power, made the radical changes in our fiscal policy which, during eighteen years, they declared their intention of making. We have reason to be thankful that this government has seen fit to continue, in a large measure, the policy of protection to our manufacturing industry which was inaugurated by the Conservative party, and which, during eighteen years in opposition, hon. gentlemen opposite had been condemning from one end of the country to the other. That policy carried the country through very severe periods of agricultural and commercial depression. When in India, Australia and all European countries and the United States, we saw financial institutions wrecked by the hundreds, Canada, thanks to the stability given her institutions by the beneficent operation of the national policy, stood the storm better than any other country in the world. I do not say that we did not feel its effects or that it did not strike us as well as other countries. That would have been impossible because our trade relations with other countries must necessarily always cause us to feel the effects of depression in those countries, but there is no doubt that, thanks to the policy inaugurated by the late government, we came out of the trial much better than did other countries and we owe the present administration some gratitude for continuing that policy in a great measure, despite their pledge to destroy it root and branch. They abandoned the policy in name but have held on to it in principle as the sheet anchor of our commercial and national safety ; and only in so far as they have departed from that policy, has their administration been injurious to the best interests of the country. But these hon. gentlemen are not to-day so much afraid of the name 'protection' as they used to be a few years ago. True, there are some fossils of the party who still call themselves absolute free traders, but we hear to-day none of the diatribes with which these hon. gentlemen were wont to regale us a few years ago against the public pillage by our manufacturers under the guise of protection. And we have had the extraordinary spectacle of prominent gentlemen opposite declaring themselves protectionists without any disguise, as the last speaker and as others who have preceded him have done. Then we have had the declaration of the hon. member for North Norfolk that protection was to have been the policy of the Mackenzie government, and that it was only by a mere accident that that government did not adopt it. The Conservative party, he said, came into possession of a policy which the Mackenzie administration was seriously considering the wisdom of adopting.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there were many Conservatives in this country who felt that the accession to power of the Reform party might not be an unmixed evil. While in opposition, that party professed to have a monopoly of all the public virtues, and in their denunciations of every form of venality they posed as purest gems of the first water. They were to be rare economists, their advent to power was to be marked at once by reduction of expenditure, and the abolition of useless offices, such as the portfolio of Trade and Commerce. The abolition of the Senate was another reform on their programme, although sometimes they were moderate and simply talked, not of abolishing, but of reforming it. Well, Mr. Speaker, they have carried out in the latter respect, their pledge to the letter, for they are reforming the Senate pretty rapidly, as rapidly as nature will permit. They were to bring about lessened taxation and cheaper living for the artisan and better markets for our farm produce, and last, but not least, a rapid reduction of our national debt. There were many Conservatives who were led to believe that these gentlemen might possibly administer the affairs of the country more economically and do something to improve our trade relations with other countries. Hon. gentlemen opposite declared most emphatically that they would without any delay put our trade relations with the United States on a much more satisfactory basis than the Conservative party could possibly succeed in doing, but we all know how miserably they have failed. They came into power under most favourable conditions to fulfill the pledges they had given. Circumstances might have existed which would have rendered impossible a reduction of our debt and taxation; conditions might have obtained in which they would not have had the revenue to carry on the affairs of the country, but such was not the case. They came into power under circumstances most favourable for the carrying out of their pledges. But with every condition in their favour, in a period of unprecedented abundance of nature's gifts and unparalleled prosperity, not only has the expenditure of the government been enormously increased, but the national debt has grown to an alarming extent, and we have no hope held out to us that in the near future there will be any reduction in that direction. Rather we have the prospect of a large increase.

We can point to the record of six year's government, or rather mis-government, and ask what pledge have these hon. gentlemen kept. Where are the new or improved markets for our foreign products that were so lavishly promised to the country before their advent to power? Two great assets of the country, which we held as trade hostages for exchange with the United States and Great Britain, have been thrown away. The duty on imports of American corn should have been held as a hostage for some reduction in the American duties on our oats and barley, but that has been thrown away, and thrown away, not in the interests of the Canadian farmers, because not one farmer in a thousand feeds American corn to his animals. In consequence our farmers are suffering owing to the reduced prices they get for their oats, peas and barley. I know that some hon. gentlemen pretend that the admission of free corn to this country is a benefit to our farmers, but I say that where one farmer is benefited, five hundred are injured and possibly a thousand. In my constituency I have addressed audiences where this question came up, and I have asked the question: Is there any farmer in this audience who uses imported American corn for the feeding of stock? And never once did I get an affirmative reply. But every one of them raises peas, oats, barley and other coarse grain, and the prices of all these are lowered by the admission of free corn. We ought to have had something in return for that concession, but the advantage we have enjoyed, this government recklessly threw away.

We had another valuable asset which we might have used in order to obtain a preference for our products in the British market. Trade preference with Great Britain, as conceived by Conservative leaders, was to be a mutual preference. We needed the British market and we needed a preference in that market over other countries for our farm products. However small that preference might be, it would be of some advantage to Canada. And the consumption is so large in the United Kingdom that all we can export there would be but a very small proportion of their requirements. And such a preference would have directed to this country hundreds of thousands of immigrants who would engage in opening up our great North-west. Such a preference, I admit, would be difficult to obtain, especially with regard to bread stuffs. The British public are very sensitive on this point. What British statesmen would dare appeal to the British electorate on the platform of raising the prices on their food, even in the most infinitesimal degree, without having some very strong inducements to offset that proposition? If the proposition were made that Canada should be given a preference in the British market, which might in a very small degree increase the price of bread stuffs the British public would immediately ask: Who wants that preference? Who is asking for it? What reply could be given them? They would have to be told that Canada does not ask for it, that Canada, by her representatives, says she does not want it. Thus we have taken away from British statesmen the argument which might have been used in favour of granting this reciprocal preference to Canada.

I say this great asset was recklessly thrown away. The future may explain, but at present it is inconceivable why this was done. And while we had, in this preference in our market for British manufactures, a great asset which we might have given them in exchange for a preference in this market, this asset has been granted to them, but for what advantage to this country? To what extent has it lowered the price of goods coming from the mother country? It has done so to some extent, but I say that the large proportion of the advantage has gone into the coffers of the British manufacturer. So we have thrown away, out of the prospective revenues of this country, thousands, and, if this system continues for some time, millions, of dollars which we greatly need. Though this government has a buoyant revenue, thanks to the good times which prevails generally throughout the world to-day, and though they claim large surpluses, yet, in the face of it all we see our debt growing and our expenditure and our taxation increasing. In the discussions that have taken place in this House we have heard enough to awaken us to the necessity that exists for the adoption of some great national policy in connection with the transportation system of this country, a policy for which we shall need money. I am opposed to all trade preferences that do not embody the principle of reciprocity. Our sentiment of loyalty and attachment to Imperial interests will not be lessened, but materially strengthened, by mutually beneficial trade relations. And, as a part of the great empire to which we say we are proud to belong, we should be prepared to take our proper place, and that, I hold will be the first place in that galaxy of nations that constitute that great empire. While sharing its glory, its power and protection, let us be prepared to share also its responsibilities. I object to, and deprecate the one-sided preference given to British imports, because, if regarded as the right hon. premier has defined it as a free gift from Canada in return to Britain for benefits received, it throws the cost of that lavish gift incidentally upon the farmers and agriculturists of Canada in whose interests it should be held as a hostage. I do not plead for class legislation that favours one class of citizens exclusively, especially if it is to the detriment of any other class. Yet, if there is any one class whose interests should be carefully protected it is our farmers. There is no other class of our citizens doing more for the advancement and progress of our country. By their enterprise, industry and intelligent application of labour, our farmers are doing more to place Canada in the front ranks of national progress than any other class of our people. Witness their splendid triumphs in the world's competitive exhibitions in Paris and in Glasgow and in the Pan-American at Buffalo. Their exhibits of dairy products, of cattle, of horses, of grains, and fruits, have given and are giving Canada a world-wide fame. Everywhere they are plucking victory from defeat, often in conditions when nature in her sterner moods presents an unfavourable aspect. I claim there is no more important task to which the government can address themselves than the opening of markets for our farmers and facilitating transport to those markets. The prosperity of our farming class must necessarily lie at the base of our national prosperity. As representing an agriculture constituency, it does not follow that I have no interest in the men engaged in our fisheries, in our mines, our forests, our factories or our commerce. Each and all demand our intelligent interest. But agriculture is and will be the paramount industry of Canada. A preference for our products in the British market opens up a prospect of untold benefits to the future of this country. Therefore, I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the gift to Great Britain of a one-sided preference was made at the expense of the Canadian farmer and to the detriment of the Canadian artisan.

While this government have been lavish beyond precedent in its expenditure, no great national work has been undertaken; and, while we have urgent needs pressing upon us, the government has been unwilling to undertake to meet them or unable to agree upon any definite line of action. The many serious and costly marine disasters in the passage from our lower St. Lawrence ports to the ocean has so increased the cost of insurance as to place an almost prohibitive freight tariff on shipments by that route, and, consequently our trade is being diverted to United States ports by American railways. This is a serious problem and must be grappled with. The question of expenditure in the solution of this problem must be met in a generous, liberal spirit, because, to a large extent, our continued national prosperity must depend upon a proper solution of this problem. The reckless expenditure of public money to 'fix' constituencies by building wharfs where no freights land, and to improve impossible harbours where no shipping comes, should cease. We were told that, under the new regime, the government's railroads would be made to pay not only expenses but dividends. We have been told that, already deficits in the Post Office Department were being faced, and that soon deficits from that quarter will be a thing of the past in Canada.

But I regard failure in all these lines, sad as they have been, as less to be deplored than the introduction into our public life of that most dangerous principle known as the spoils system, the outspoken adoption of the motto that 'to the victors belong the spoils,' a system that has done more to degrade the public life of the United States, and that has been more prolific of crime and dishonesty than all other causes put together. This is a system which is, happily, unknown in British public life. There is no cloud in the horizon of our future so portentous of danger as the outspoken adoption of this principle by those who have in charge the affairs of the Canadian people. There is always hope of redemption of an individual or character where sense of shame attaches to dishonesty. But an open profession of lowering standards of morals, either in individual character or in the body politic, indicates a defection most serious. So long as a government disclaims and deprecates charges of favouritism, savouring of corruption, public morals are in less danger than when these principles of action are adopted and defended. But when that is done, the effect is to introduce an insidious disease into our social and political life, destructive of all the safeguards of our liberty. Let us be warned in time. We need to be more guarded in this respect than in anything else. The honour of our public life is something that should be as dear to us as our personal honour, as dear to us as our lives.

Mr. Speaker, this country calls upon this so-called reform government to make some honest effort to redeem their pledge of honest, economical government, their pledge of an administration that shall aim at a more equal distribution of the blessings of life and for a patriotism that is less cosmopolitan and more Canadian. And I assure this House, Mr. Speaker, that there is at least, one man, and I trust many more, on this side of the House, who care less for power than to see an honest, economical yet progressive administration of the government of this country. There has not been, on the part of this government, that sympathy for the agriculturists that there ought to have been. They have asked for something which has been denied. We know that it is an open question whether the introduction of the manufacture of beet-root sugar would be a real advantage to the country. At present it presents itself in a favourable light to many of our farmers. It has been demonstrated that beet root equal to any in the world for the manufacture of sugar can be produced in Canada. It has been shown also that this is especially an industry that deserves assistance from the government. It is an industry that cannot be started individually. It calls for the investment of large capital. But even with ample capital something more is required, for it takes many months, it may take even years to get the farmers of the country educated to the production of the raw material for the manufacture of sugar. Therefore, small concessions have been asked in the way of a bounty on beet-root sugar. That is reasonable, and it is not proposed that the bounty should be continued, but that it should expire with the efflux of time.

Other great opportunities have been allowed to slip past by this government. There was a great opportunity for securing the advantage and prestige of Canada when the various colonies were sending out their contingents to assist the British arms in South Africa. Canada should not have been in the rear in that regard ; Canada had a right to take the first place, and as it did not do so, a great opportunity for Canada's advantage was lost. A great opportunity was lost when this government, on coming into power, failed to take hold of the contract which had been entered into by the preceding government for the establishment of a fast Atlantic steamship line between Great Britain and this country. Had such a line been established, it would now have been carrying the products of our farms and of our factories, in a quick and satisfactory manner, into the great markets of the old world. I need not go into the history of that transaction ; a great opportunity was let go by, and it has not occurred again when conditions equally satisfactory could have been obtained. Another great opportunity was lost when this government failed to obtain reciprocal trade with Great Britain. I know it has been asserted that we could not have obtained from Great Britain those advantages which we desired. But, Sir, we have had no opportunity of knowing whether we could or could not have procured some concession from the British government. We have reason to believe that we could have obtained some concession. There has never been a time in the history of Great Britain, at least during the last half century, when British statesmen were so much disposed to depart to some extent from their free trade principles as they have been during the last few years; and if they are ever going to relax those principles in any degree, the present is the most opportune time to do so when they can thereby bind the colonies and the empire more closely together. So I say that in the contingency which has arisen by the war in South Africa there was a great opportunity of obtaining some commercial concession from Great Britain in favour of the colonies, and of giving a more substantial character to Imperial interests than they have now.

Another great opportunity will soon arise when the representatives of the various colonies of the empire meet in London to discuss questions of this character. What will be the result of that conference ? Canadians will watch, and listen, and wait with expectancy, Great Britain will wait with expectancy, the colonies in the southern seas will await with expectancy the results of that most important meeting. Certainly we all hope that greater wisdom will prevail in the councils in London at that meeting than we have hitherto witnessed, and that the representatives of Canada while faithfully considering the interests of Great Britain, will not forget that their duty is first and foremost to the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. D. C. FRASER (Guysborough). In addressing myself for a short time to the House I wish to say in the first place that I do not mean to discuss the admirable essay to which we have just listened. Its moral tone was excellent ; indeed it was a joint effort of morality and beet sugar. I only leave the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) to settle the beet sugar question with his confrere from Pictou (Mr. Bell) who addressed this House the other day. He has forgotten that the beet sugar question is solving itself, and that the Mormons are coming into the North-west in large numbers and building up beet sugar factories under the present government, and that they are going to make a success of it. I submit that if Mormons succeed in the North-west, Christians ought certainly to succeed in the east.

Mr. COCHRANE. Do you want to adopt their policy ?

Mr. FRASER. Well, the hon. gentlemen opposite might desire to adopt their tenets, but I do not approve of them.

Mr. COCHRANE. Your policy is better adapted to Mormons than it is to Christians.

Mr. FRASER. Oh, the hon. gentleman is too old. I wish to begin with the question that was brought before the House by the leader of the opposition ; and not since the Conservative party was dispersed so as not yet to find out exactly where they stand, was I better pleased than I was with the resolution produced by the leader of the opposition. It is a resolution that will bear a certain amount of dissection. I submit that its terms are somewhat broad, and for myself I can scarcely understand its application.

This House, regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory——

That I can understand. The tariff is too low, there can be no other reason. But if it is unsatisfactory, who is to blame for it? If hon. gentlemen opposite are to be believed, it is their tariff that they enforced previous to 1896. Was it unsatisfactory then? What has made it unsatisfactory since? Is it unsatisfactory because it keeps the hon. gentlemen opposite out of power, or is it unsatisfactory because there is, as I shall be able to show, a substantial decrease in the duties paid. I think that it is the latter reason, it is unsatisfactory because there is a decrease. Now I would like to know how it is going to be amended by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let us follow the amendment.

——is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy.

Why a declared policy and if declared, what is to be the declaration? A policy is nothing. It may be a high tariff, a low tariff, or anything you like, it will be a policy. And what is a declared policy? It is not, you will notice, a declared policy upon any special lines, it is a declared policy 'of adequate protection to labour.' What is adequate protection to labour? Are you going to take any of the meanings usually given to the word? Does the leader of the opposition mean, by a declared policy, the old meaning of the word, equal in magnitude, or does he mean the more modern use of the term, as commensurate in fitness, equal, or amounting to what is required? Fully sufficient, suitable, fitting? Or does he take the logical view of it and say that it is fully answering to a given state of things? Now I submit that this House could not with any dignity accept a resolution that did not lay down the terms of the declared policy. A policy is a policy, whether it is declared or not. You should say what is going to constitute the policy. But there is no policy without a substratum of facts on which the policy is to be built. I think the leader of the opposition should have gone back to the resolution of 1878, with which I wish to compare this one. That resolution was moved by the Conservative giant who at that time led the opposition. There was at least something in the resolution moved by Sir John A. Macdonald that appealed to the people of this country and laid the foundation of a policy.

This House is of the opinion.

Not that 'there should be a declared policy,' you see.

This House is of the opinion that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a National Policy——

Then it was national, now it is declared.

——which by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, the mining, the manufacturing and other interests of the Dominion.

That is the policy of the late Sir John A. Macdonald. Now as to the results predicted:

That such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active interprovincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of a reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbours, so far as the varied interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country, eventually, a reciprocity of trade.

That at least did show the lines on which that national policy was to be constructed; but I submit that this resolution shows nothing except a declared policy. I have looked over the speech of the leader of the opposition carefully, and an able speech it is from his point of view. But I do not find anywhere in it, except on two occasions, that he refers to the question, and one is the menace of our neighbours to the south of us, and the other is the policy that we have adopted in our trade relations with Great Britain. Now I want to know if hon. gentlemen opposite are willing that the preferential tariff shall go? Certainly if it is to go, there should be a resolution of this House moved by some one who believes that the preferential tariff is bad for Canada, and that it ought to be abrogated.

Mr. COCHRANE. Ask Bourassa.

Mr. FRASER. Do not mind asking anybody except yourselves. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) believes that, let him spring to his feet and move such a resolution, and let us have a vote on it and then we will see. But not one of the hon. gentlemen opposite dare do it, and I will tell you why. They pretend that good results have not followed from the preferential trade policy, but they know right well that there is not a man in Canada who ought to be allowed to vote, who does not believe that that policy was a step in advance; who does not believe that that policy has done more than anything else to bind together Canada and the motherland and to make this mighty empire what it is. Hon. gentlemen opposite are afraid to move a resolution against that policy. They know that if they did so, they would be deserted by the crowds that used to follow them shouting that they were the only British-connection men in this country. These gentlemen opposite, for the sake of their own standing in the community should cease condemning the operation of the preferential tariff, or else, they should declare boldly against it.

There is another difficulty in this resolution moved by the leader of the opposition. He speaks of 'a declared policy for labour, for agriculture, for manufactures and industries.' You will notice that 'labour' was not included in the resolution moved by Sir John Macdonald. Of course, if all the other industries spoken of in that resolution were benefited or adequately protected, then labour would be protected if the national policy was a true policy. The industries mentioned cover all the walks of life in which men are engaged, and how are you going to help labour if you do not help the industries of Canada. The one is a part of the other. I suppose the hon. leader of the opposition thought that he might catch the labour vote by saying that he would protect labour. How can you protect labour ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. By preventing Chinamen from competing with Canadian labour. You have not been listening to the member for Vancouver (Mr. Smith).

Mr. FRASER. I have listened to him and I have before now given expression to my views on that question, and if the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Haggart) thinks Canada is so small that it is going to be ruined by a few Chinamen, he has a miserable idea of Canada. It is true that there are other questions which enter into the question of Chinese immigration. There is the moral question, which is of great importance, and which has to be considered as well as the question of Chinese competition. Does the hon. gentleman seriously believe that Chinese labour is going to interfere with the labour market of Canada ? If he does not, then his interjection has no meaning. Now, here is a curious thing in the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition. He is going to have a 'declared policy,' but at the same time he will firmly maintain the necessity for such protection as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians. His resolution says :

That this House affirms its belief in a policy of reciprocal trade preference within the empire.

Surely the hon. gentleman knows that again and again it has been declared by the statesmen of England that the only preference that they will have with the empire is a preference on the lines of their own fiscal policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite would raise the tariff higher than it is now, and as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) said: We will pay for everything in cash. Then, the British manufacturers would have the money which we paid ; our manufacturers would have the increased advantage that would be obtained from the higher scale of duty, and the man who bought in Canada would pay the tax in both directions. I submit that you cannot have a high protective policy in Canada and at the same time get free access to the markets of all the colonies. It is nonsense for any one to claim that the two things will go together. Sir John Macdonald wanted reciprocity, for he was too astute a statesman to think that with a high protection in Canada we could get free access to the markets of Great Britain and her colonies. If that be the case, what then ? It is quite evident that we cannot protect our manufacturers by a high protective duty in Canada, and while maintaining the high protective duty get freer access to the markets of Great Britain and her colonies.

I notice that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House are now doing a good deal of talking about our German trade. They have appealed in this country to the feelings of Englishmen as against another race ; they raised the Catholic question and the anti-Catholic question, and having failed in all these they now fall back on the German cry. Well, I do not think that they will succeed in that any more than they did in the others. It was absolutely necessary, in order that we should establish this preferential policy and make it effective, that the Canadian government should do as it has done. If you look at the quantity of trade which we did with Germany, you will see at a glance that the advantages we gained under the preferential tariff were much greater than any advantage we could gain without the preference and still maintaining our former relations with German trade. So much for that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) stated that there was great dissatisfaction in the United States, and I was glad to hear him declare that he was against retaliation, but while he said that, his whole argument simply meant retaliation. In fact, when you read the resolution of the hon. member (Mr. Borden, Halifax) carefully, you will see that it is about the same thing as the resolution proposed by the hon. member for North Norfolk. Against whom is he going to put up this high tariff wall if it is not against the people of the American republic? I admit that something may be said in favour of retaliation. When I look at how the American people have treated us at times, my own personal feeling arises, but in my calmer moments the thought occurs to me that I would be serving my country better by refusing to hit back. There are times when we have to possess our souls in patience, and on the whole it would seem to me that the more cordial and more friendly our relations are with the United States the better it is for both countries. Our neighbours in the adjoining republic are, I believe, learning a little, and when I read the other day the following extract from the Boston 'Transcript,' it occurred to me that it might afford food for thought :

The duty preventing the importation of iron and coal from Nova Scotia—England, Germany and Norway are ready to supply us with iron. There has not been a single day when pig-iron has not been as cheap in Boston as in Pittsburg. We could have bought it if we had not been prevented by the duty, which for a long time was $6.72, and is now $4.00 per ton. Of course this duty has not been paid by the companies, but has been passed along to the communities, which have had to pay higher prices for the manufactures. Instead of wooden fences everywhere we should have had iron; instead of wooden beams in buildings we should have had iron, and the iron manufacture should never have gone to Pittsburg. For all these reasons he urged the legislature to indorse the Babcock bill and reciprocity with Canada.

This is from a republican source. If I may speak personally for my own province, I might say that what we want in Nova Scotia is to get that market in the New England states, and I believe that the thinking people in the New England states are desirous in their own interest to have our trade. Be that as it may, I am of the opinion now and have always held the opinion that the first question with us in framing any policy is to do that which is best for Canada.

The hon. member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Brock) stated that this government had made a reduction of 2·22 on the general average duty of 18 per cent under the Conservative government, and he called this a reduction of 2 per cent. Well, if a reduction of 2 on 18 per cent means '2 per cent,' my arithmetic is at fault. It is in fact a reduction of about one-tenth, and consequently it does not mean a reduction of 2 per cent as the hon. gentleman stated. Now, to reduce the tariff by one-tenth was a substantial reduction for the present government to make. If any gentleman here heard that the town council of any city in which he lived, had conducted the business as well as it ever was conducted, and at the end of the year made a reduction of one-tenth in the taxation, he certainly would say that that was a good council and he would vote for it again. One-tenth reduction means a great deal. It may not be as great a reduction as some of the more advanced supporters of the government would ask, but for myself, as I have already said in this House, I prefer to stand by the government that is proceeding in that direction and that is making progress. Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite, would they go back to the tariff as it was in 1896, suppose they got into power, or what would they do ? If the present tariff is unsatisfactory to them, what would be satisfactory ? I submit that the people of the country are entitled to know that. One of the things that appeals to me in the present tariff is that we have made an advance, and that the people of this country understand that and know that they have security because we are not continually tinkering with the tariff. That there must be changes, and changes in the direction in which we have gone, there is no doubt. But I would ask hon. gentlemen opposite : If the great capital that is being invested to-day throughout the Dominion is not the best indication that the position this government took when they made that reduction in the tariff is in the interest of the people of Canada ?

Nothing has amused me more in this debate than the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell). I believe he told the House that he would give very little opposition to the present tariff. So well he might give little opposition to the present tariff. He comes from a county in which there are extensive coal, iron and woollen industries, and if he were here he would have to admit that never in the county of Pictou were the conditions so prosperous as they are now. The farmers are better off; they can sell all they can raise. For three or four years, under Conservative rule, the Steel Company in New Glasgow did not pay dividends on even its preferred stock. What happened ? The present government came into power. It was said that the works were going to be shut down, that the windows would be closed, and one good Conservative even purchased the shutters. Instead of that, the works have been so busy that for two years they could not permit the men to be idle on Thanksgiving Day, or Christmas Day, and the company has not only been paying dividends on its preferred stock, but has been wiping out all its past indebtedness. Hon. gentlemen have only to look at the newspapers to see the position of the stock to-day. Stock which would have sold at 10 cents if hon. gentlemen opposite had remained in power will easily bring 200. All this has been accomplished under the present tariff. Would the hon. member for Pictou want to make any change in that ? Then, for the last five years the coal mines of Nova Scotia have been worked, I think I can say with truth, to a greater extent than ever before, and the prices obtained for the coal and also the wages paid to the workmen have been larger than for years. We have one or two woollen factories in Pictou, and there is no cry from them that the present tariff is not working well. They are working full time, and the same thing is true of Nova Scotia generally.

In the face of this condition of things, do hon. gentlemen opposite advocate going back to the old tariff ? What declaration are they going to make as to what their policy is ? What hope are they going to hold out to the investors and workers ? Are they going to change the present state of things in which the Dominion of Canada is better off than ever before ? If so, they are not going to get even the most rabid protectionist to vote for them. I believe the people of Canada generally, protectionists as well as free traders, feel that the present state of things is satisfactory. For eighteen years the people of this country were taught the trade question by hon. gentlemen opposite as well as by hon. gentlemen on this side. There is this much at least to be said, that we have passed the stage of argument, and there is not a man in Canada, with this result of the tariff before his eyes, who will not say that the present is a bad time to talk about protection. I admit that a readjustment may be necessary from time to time, and I will be a protectionist with hon. gentlemen opposite, and go in for any duties they name on this condition, that every man who makes a hat shall receive in return by way of bounty as much as all the other men who supply any article he uses will take from him. That is a protection which I will hold up both hands for. Of course, we shall never have it, because that is the way the Creator left the world at first; but is any other condition fair, in the struggle of life ?

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) said that the question of the tariff was out of politics—that it was forced upon us at the present time. It can never be out of politics. There is one thing that every public man in Canada must look to—that the predominating force in Canada in a few years will be in the west. We in the older provinces may look at it as we please, but the mighty domain beyond Lake Superior will in a few years control not only the trade and commerce of the country, but this parliament of Canada; and I submit that as low a tariff as possible is necessary for the prosperity of that great country. All classes must be equitably dealt with. The farmer must be dealt with so as not to do injury to the manufacturer, and the manufacturer must be dealt with so as not to do injury to the farmer. That is a ground on which any man in Canada can stand before the electors, and that is the position of the present government.

There is another thing that we must not forget. After all, principles underlie action. Taxation is for the benefit of every man in the country; and while I admit that you can never have the taxation so adjusted that it will fall equitably on every man in Canada, yet that is the object which we should as nearly as possible have in view. These things will exist under any finite government in the world; but the present government have made this reduction, and have made it in the interest of the consumer. Take, for example, the ordinary articles of life. Take a man's clothing, and the iron he uses, and see the remarkable reduction that has taken place in these two items.

I was struck by what my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said. I am sorry he is not present so that I could say in his presence what I am going to say now. I think it is only fair with friends and opponents alike, that we should speak out our views of what they say. I regret that my hon. friend has seen fit to turn himself inside out with such a bad result. I do not think that all his good work performed in the past for the sanctity of the Sabbath and the chastity of the home will ever compensate for the words he uttered the other day. I think that the indications he gave of the struggles he underwent when this question came up were, if not indicative of moral degeneracy, at least laughable. I can understand an honest man wavering between two sets of opinions, wanting to find out the exact state of things and judge accordingly, but I cannot understand that state of mind which could urge such a man to make a speech such as that we have heard from the hon. member for North Norfolk.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He found a friend in the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), and at once took that hon. gentleman to his bosom.

But I think he might have spared this House the little lecture he gave us as to what the right hon. the First Minister should do when he goes to the other side. Circumstances will indicate what he should do. But there is one thing on which I must take strong issue with the hon. gentleman. He said that England wanted everything from us and gave us nothing, that she was continually imposing her conditions on us and giving us nothing in return. Well, I am not going to vaunt my attachment to the old land, but I do not think that any Canadian ought to have made such a statement. Whatever may be said of the policy of Great Britain in other respects, he is a poor student of her history who does not see that, so far as her colonies are concerned, she has always done what she conceived to be to the best in their interests. I was reading the life of Sir William Molesworth the other day, and I would commend that work to my hon. friend from Labelle. In it he will find a description of what Buller and others did when there were two camps in English public life—one which looked on the colonies as places furnishing appointments and offices for Englishmen, as places intended by Divine Providence for Englishmen to rule over, and the other which took a broader and more intelligent view, and which believed that these colonies were destined to be great self governing allies of the old land. That struggle ended in Britain giving us all we enjoy as colonies, and particularly a freedom of action equal to her own. Did the hon. gentleman stop to consider for a moment what are the privileges we have obtained from Great Britain. Never have we been asked to contribute a dollar for her army and navy. Yet, even if my hon. friend from Labelle were the poorest lad from the poorest hut of Canada, he would find in any part of the world, should he be subjected to any indignity, every ship of the mighty nation to whom we belong and every soldier turned out to see that his case was righted just as if he had been born and reared in Buckingham Palace. Is that not enough ? What are the other privileges we have. We enjoy a parliament clothed, except in a few instances where these powers might conflict with the interests of the motherland, with powers as absolute as those of great Britain herself. I come from a province to which Great Britain, as early as 1758, gave us our own parliament. I refer to the province of Nova Scotia, which was given in that year a house of assembly with full control over all the local affairs of that province. I make bold to say that the amount of money spent by Great Britain in building up her colonies, in protecting them from time to time, in looking after their interests and keeping them under her eye just as much as the islands on which her own people live, has been more than we can repay during a life time. What if we were thrown on our own resources ? What would be the result if Canada to-day were unfortunate enough to be a nation with only five and a half million people ? Take our people, with the desire they have to better themselves in all parts of the world, men from the maritime provinces sailing our ships and going to every part of the globe—what if they had to be protected by Canadian money and men. I think that the hon. gentleman might have saved the House that remark. I think he would have been wiser had he studied a little deeper the institutions under which we live. Had he done so, he would have appreciated better the glory of that nation which casts its protecting aegis over us, and would have realized what an advantage it is to Canadians to have a claim on the strength of the empire equal to that of every citizen of Great Britain.

It might not be amiss to take a short resumé of the history of Canada since 1896. What has been the programme of our friends opposite from that date down to the present. The first year they predicted that by destroying the national policy we would bring the greatest disasters on the people. We heard the wails coming up to this House, which no doubt gladdened the hearts of these hon. gentlemen. But when they found that their predictions were falsified, they at once charged us with having adopted their policy. Let me point out to these hon. gentlemen that if all they have said since 1896 be true, they cannot, with any regard for decency or logic, vote for this resolution. By this resolution they declare that the present conditions are unsatisfactory. It appears now that that state of things which they said up to 1896 was the glory of the country is an unsatisfactory condition. I would like them to show in what respect it is unsatisfactory. They must either say that the present policy is not the same as that which existed previous to 1896 or else that it is satisfactory. I care not which horn of the dilemma they take. They must either logically say ; you have adopted our policy but it is unsatisfactory, and therefore all that we taught in the past was false, or you have not adopted our policy, your policy is different from ours, and we were not telling the truth when we accused you of stealing our clothes. I do not care which position the hon. gentlemen opposite take. I suppose that the latter would be more consonant with the facts, but in either case they are condemned out of their own mouth.

As time went on they found that their attacks on our policy would not do. They found an answer to those attacks coming from every factory that was working overtime, from the farmers who had good markets for their crops, from our working men who were in no lack of employment, from our lumbermen who are to-day paying men double the wages they did in 1896. They were, therefore, obliged to change their tune, and they made the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) the burden of their new policy of attack. All through Ontario, and in some parts of the lower provinces, they depicted him in colours of the blackest description. He was a bad man, a man that must be shunned, who went into politics for the purpose of doing evil and doing it continually. His very presence breathed corruption and death. A loathsome pestilence followed in his footsteps, and he required to be put down and kept down. Well, Mr. Speaker, there are two ways in which we can try a man in this House. In the first place, we can try him in the Public Accounts Committee. I have been chairman of that committee since 1896. I need not mention to hon. gentlemen opposite how easy it is for them to get witnesses. The exchequer of the country is at their disposal, out of which to pay the expense of bringing these witnesses. Every facility is given them to prove mismanagement and misconduct on the part of the minister in charge of any department, and of those under his control. Well, not one word has ever come before the Public Accounts Committee to show that the Minister of Public Works ever took one cent dishonestly of public money. He made mistakes no doubt, and would be the first himself to acknowledge it. Who has not made mistakes, but I put him in contrast with the man who held the same position when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and who had to leave, not only his position in the government, but public life altogether. Is it fair and honourable to single out an hon. gentleman for attack and suspicion and prejudice on vague and general grounds, when not the slightest proof of anything to justify any of these attacks can be brought against him. I care not whether a man comes from the bad province of Quebec or the good province of Ontario or elsewhere, we should judge him according to his merits, we should set his virtues against his vices, and decide which weighs down the scale. But neither in the Public Accounts Committee nor in this House has any man dared to say that a stiver of the money belonging to the people has been shown to have gone astray under the administration of the Minister of Public Works. Not only has not a single charge been made against him, but none has been made against any officer under him. I say then that when a man in all these years has been subjected to the severest criticism to which a man in the position of the Minister of Public Works is exposed, when he has been exposed to the searching questions and eloquent lash of hon. gentlemen opposite and has come unscathed through that ordeal, would it not be appropriate for hon. gentlemen opposite to ask the government to give them a day of humiliation so that they might pray to be forgiven for the wrongs they have committed and the unjust and slanderous attacks they have made.

There is another theme on which these hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to regain favour among the electorate, and that is electoral corruption. Everywhere, they claim, Liberals were corrupt. Well, let me give you one illustration. I had the great pleasure of taking part in an election about four months ago in the county of York, New Brunswick. At the election of 1901, two gentlemen ran and the Liberal candidate was returned by 70 of a majority. That election was set aside and the same candidates again presented themselves. And the same gentleman opposed him, Rev. Dr. McLeod, a clergyman of the Free Baptist Church. After the election was set aside and when the new election was coming on, the Conservatives came and said : We must run the next election without using money, and we want you Liberals to agree to that. And the Liberals said : Certainly, for it is very hard to carry an election on the lines to which you have forced us. The Conservatives had held the county for fifteen years. Both sides agreed to run an honest election, and the fact that there has been no petition, is proof that it was an honest election. But, whereas, with money used on both sides the Liberals came out with a majority of only 70, when the depraved conduct of the friends of the hon. gentlemen opposite, by which the county was held for fifteen years, was removed, the Liberals carried the county by nearly a thousand. With money used, of course they could beat us, for they had more money and better methods than we had. But when no money was used, we carried the county with a rush never known before. So the Conservatives dropped that; they got their commission of judges but they laid no complaints.

There is a matter to which I refer with a good deal of pain, and that is the manner in which elections are carried on among the English speaking people of some of the lower province and Ontario constituencies, and the manner in which they are carried on in Quebec. In the election to which I have just referred, a cry was raised against Sir Wilfrid Laurier because he is a French Catholic, and against his government because it was said to be under French domination. I suppose there are not more than five unsanctified Frenchmen in the whole county, so that the Conservatives felt that they lost very little by abusing the French and by raising the cry of danger from French power. I told the people that I was not afraid of the French, for there were two English speaking people in the country to one Frenchman, and I thought that we could take care of them—we did it at Waterloo, and I thought we could do it again. But think of a man asking the electors to vote for him on the ground that there was danger to two-thirds of the people from one-third of the people. Are we not equal to the French Canadians physically ? And there are two of us to one of them. Are they our superiors intellectually or morally, that we of the majority need to be afraid ? All I can say is that men who were deluded by appeals of that kind—and many honest men in Ontario and the maritime provinces were so deluded—should have a course of education in the primary schools, or an outpouring of grace that will convert them ? But that is not exactly what happens in Quebec to-day. In the general election of 1891, Mr. Loy, a Presbyterian elder was returned by the county of Beauharnois, Quebec, though his opponent was the man who is lovingly called 'the Beauharnois boy' by his friends on the other side of the House. I do not know the relative strength of the races there, but I think I am safe in saying that at least eighty per cent of the electors of the county of Beauharnois are Catholics and French. I am glad to be told by an hon. friend from Quebec province that that is not an exaggerated estimate. And in that county an English speaking Presbyterian elder was returned. That was what might be expected, for a Presbyterian anywhere ought to be returned. There is an election going on there to-day, and I make the statement on the very best information that the cry that is raised against Mr. Loy is that the French Canadian must vote down this man because he is a Protestant and an Englishman. The orators on the Conservative side are asking the electors if they will disgrace their race by returning such a man. And a circular containing a similar appeal has been issued. I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite : Is that fair warfare ? Are you going to build up this country by such appeals ? Are you even going to help yourselves eventually ? Do you not realize that there is enough intelligence among Canadians to break down that kind of thing sooner or later—aye, and sooner rather than later ? I may have my national prejudices, but I should be blind to the lessons of the world's history if I did not give every man the place to which his character and ability show him to be deserving. Hon. gentlemen opposite used to say that they were the only people who could bind this country together. And a little later on, I will make a statement as to what the present premier and the present government have done in the way of unifying and building up the Dominion. But, besides their boasts, there was one other ruse of political warfare to which hon. gentlemen opposite have always resorted. When everything else failed, they attacked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). The Minister of Public Works, (Hon. Mr. Tarte) they seem to agree, is a bad man, but in those arts that make the capable bandit the Minister of Trade and Commerce, according to these hon. gentlemen, excels. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), the other day, when he had exhausted those topics which do not throw much light upon the subject under debate—and on both sides there is a great deal said that may not be to the point—turned his gun of eloquence upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He happened to misquote that hon. gentleman—not wilfully of course. I have been twelve years in parliament, and there has not been a single year in which that same thing has not been tried. I have seen the rat attempt to grapple with the lion, the mouse to bite the cat ; I have seen the gull smash itself against the lighthouse without putting out the light—all these things have I seen typified in the attacks upon the hon. minister. I am not his apologist, nor is any apology necessary. But may I throw out a word of kindly honest, and I trust effective advice by assuring hon. gentlemen opposite that they weaken themselves by every one of these attacks. I have just learned that hon. gentlemen opposite in the next election are to have flags upon which there will be certain mottoes. Through a friend, I have obtained one of those mottoes. I understand that it is to be used at the family altar in Conservative homes and carried in the elections on their banners :

> Abuse Sir Dick with spite, for he,
> With truth and wit hath crippled thee.

What has been the result of all the criticisms of hon. gentlemen opposite ? The government stand as they never did before in the affections of the people. The first reason is that they have made a substantial reduction in the tariff—not so great a reduction as I wanted, but such a reduction as, considering the difficulties of the situation, must be regarded as substantial. Moreover, since this government took office, we have had a clean period. I think there is not a Conservative in the country but is as thankful as his Liberal fellow citizens—if he had grace enough to say it that Canada has not been smirched in the eyes of the world since 1896. We may have, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, weaknesses on behalf of certain members of the government. But the present government have been on trial and are now on trial, and, at least, nothing has been shown to be wrong. For my part, I am ready to trust the government that, since 1896, have done their work in all departments honestly and well ; I am going to trust them until I see something wrong in connection with their work. But they have done far more than this, they have settled some questions that were very disturbing. One of these was the binder twine question. For some reason hon. gentlemen opposite have not lately talked much about binder twine. It never was a very big question, but I am thankful it is no longer with us—this question of binder twine and also the question of barbed wire. I remember the tears that were shed by hon. gentlemen opposite about binder twine.

I think I remember once seeing the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), after delivering himself upon this binder twine question, going out, and the copious tears that were falling from his eyes as he went out were a sight to behold. True, the present government took away the duty altogether in order to rectify some irregularities, and it came out all right; so I will say no more about it. The government did this great service to Canada by removing those questions from the arena of politics. I said not that only has no corruption been shown against the Minister of Public Works, but none has been shown against the Minister of the Interior, nor against the Minister of Railways and Canals, nor against any of the members of the government. We had an effort made to show that there was something wrong in the Yukon. We had speeches made so long that they baffled time, and what came of it ? Nothing. There was every opportunity given, though the truth of the matter is this, Mr. Speaker, that the opposition are not able to understand how it is that the present government are honest with the opportunities they have. The whole training of our hon. friends opposite was in the contrary direction, and they cannot believe, and won't believe, that the present government are any better than they were. They say : With those opportunities we would do it, and they are no better than we are. But none of their suspicions have materialized.

Well, there is something more. I say that the present government—and for that most is due to the premier—have done more in these few years to mould together the various races and creeds of this Dominion than was ever done in the same space of time, not only in Canada, but in any other country. Read the history of Great Britain. There, as here, the substratum of the race was the Celt. In Great Britain the first element of the population was the Celt as the foundation, then came the Saxon and Norman, and it took between 500 and 600 years to mould these people together,

In the last ten years, with the same elements in Canada, the Celt (Irish and Scotch), the English and the French, we have made advances in the same direction such as were never made before in any country in the world; and to the premier is largely due the credit for that. With a broad view he looked out upon the whole country, not to the little interests that surround him in his own home, in his own parish, in his own province; but having in view the upbuilding here of a strong community where every element will coalesce, and he said: That shall be my life's aim. I make the statement boldly that if no other result was gained to Canada except what was done in that direction, the present government have done more than any other, and will live when history comes to be written as the great moulders of the races and creeds of Canada into homegenity. We have learned, on the Protestant side, to respect our fellow citizens of the Roman Catholic faith as we never did before; and they have learned that after all there is no law against either our existence or our views. We live with them and understand them better, because in our social relations we find that after all they have vices and virtues like our own. I say we have the components here, parts with which to build up a Canadian nationality which will be greater than any one of the individual races, and to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of this government, is due the praise of making that end attainable.

There is something more they have done, for the betterment of Canada. They have inspired a hope in young and old, particularly in the young, such as they never had before. Did hon. gentlemen opposite ever think of the amount of capital that has been invested in Canada since 1896? I cannot state how much it is. But I will speak of Nova Scotia, and I will say that in the large industries there they want almost unlimited capital and they can get it. Why, there is a contest now between Nova Scotia, Toronto and Montreal as to who will get the chance of investing money. I understand it is the same in Ontario, it is the same in Quebec. Where then is the unrest, where is the unsatisfactory state of things? If the hon. gentlemen opposite are correct, these men are fools to risk their capital in this country when such an unsatisfactory state of things exists. There is not a manufacturer in this House, there is not a farmer in this House, there is not a workingman in this House, there is not a professional man in this House who does not stand better to-day by at least 20 per cent than he did in 1896, in his worldly goods, and in every other respect. I want any manufacturer in this House to stand up and say that he is no better off and has not done a better business since 1896, than previously. I want any farmer to say if he is not in a better position to-day than in 1896; I want any professional man to say if he is not in a better position to-day than in 1896. I am not asking questions to which I expect a negative answer from hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not mean to say that the government did all that. Hon. gentlemen opposite used to say that; but I am asking these questions for the purpose of showing that there is no sense in saying that the present state of things is unsatisfactory.

Business men are agreed at least that when matters are moving in the right direction in their interest they are not willing to make a change. Why then is the tariff unsatisfactory? I think we must come to the conclusion that it is unsatisfactory because hon. gentlemen opposite are not in a position to claim the credit of present prosperity and to ride on the crest of this mighty wave that is passing over Canada. I am bold enough to make this other statement, that we in Canada do not feel depressions as people do elsewhere. In the unlimited sources of supplies that we have, in the soil, in the forest, in the fisheries, in iron and coal, and other minerals, I venture to state that, never at least for two or three generations, will any change that may occur in the direction of bad times strike Canada as it will any other country. We will be the suppliers of the food that the world needs; we will be increasing all the time the quantity of food stuffs that we shall produce; we can, with the preference we give Great Britain, undersell any other country in the market. They will want to purchase articles from us and sell us articles in return, because they know they have a margin that other countries have not.

We have a brighter hope in our country at the present time than we ever had before. I am not a prophet, but I think I see indications in the history of the last five years that Canadians are learning as they never have yet what a country they have, and what marvellous possibilities are before us. If I were to follow the precedents of gentlemen opposite, I would even claim credit for what nature has done. I was down home the other day, down to the province of this whole confederation, down to the province that, for its size, will continue to be in advance of any other province of this confederation. The sunny ways of the premier, if I was a Tory, I would say have been productive in that province of the result that even the robins refuse to go away in winter, and continue to chirp and sing in that province, which is the Florida of Canada. This one thing I say with confidence, that from the Atlantic to the Pacific there is more of hope in Canada and for Canada than ever before. Men feel now that their home here is the best. We used to hear a great deal of talk about loyalty and all that. Now we have the manlier and stronger sentiment that says:

This is the best country in the world, and here I will remain. We see among our young men the conviction that in Canada, such are the advances this country has been making, they are in the line of greater promotion, if they stay here, than if they go elsewhere. It used to be thought in the gloomy days when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, that the only avenue to success for a young man was in the United States. But now there is difficulty in filling up the positions that are calling for capable and honest young men. Young men now say to themselves: This is a country where we can succeed. Is it not wonderful that hon. gentlemen opposite, feeling their pockets better lined than they ever were before, finding that they are expanding their business and making wealth, still turn to the weak and beggarly elements of a defeated and defunct Conservative policy, and call by resolution upon the people of this country to accept—what? A declared policy? No. This country is moving in the right direction, moving in the direction which this government has given it making men mutually respectful of each other. May it be ours sometimes, to forget the bitterness of party strife; may it be ours to discover the good that exists in our political opponents, and may our political opponents see the good that is in us. Let us at least hold out this hope to the people of Canada: That our tariff shall be arranged equitably, and that we shall not benefit any man or any class of men at the expense of others. Let us do injustice to none, especially the poor. And, Sir, when the history of Canada is written, let us hope that the historian will be able to write that the last five years was the proudest period in our history. Sir, we are advancing. We have seen an hon. gentleman in this House who rose above the ordinary surroundings that make for that civilization which people choose to call society; but we have seen him so forget his ideas of the common affairs of life as actually to buy a dress coat and appear at a great social function. Does not that prove that this country is advancing socially as well as materially and morally. Let it be ours to help on the progress of Canada. The hon. mover of the resolution will find no response in this House even from men who have averred an inkling for protection like the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and like the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). They will have none of this resolution. It is only intended to catch the extremists in one direction, but the country is too broad to support such a platform as that. I tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden, Halifax) that if he seeks to pitch his tent on the graveyard of the issues previous to 1896, he will find that that graveyard has blossomed from a cemetery into a beautiful garden. We are advancing so fast that the government under which this progress has occurred shall receive my confidence and vote. The amendment moved by the leader of the opposition does not commend itself to moderate protectionists even. The protectionists in this House are content while things are moving in the splendid manner they are moving at present, and the protectionists in the country are thinking more of making money than about disturbing the trade relations of this great and now prosperous country. They would be mad to raise an issue that would defeat their purpose.

Mr. E. G. PORTER (West Hastings) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Prime Minister, House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, April 1, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 80) to incorporate the Huron and Erie Canal Company.—Mr. Calvert.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture to the census returns numbers 24, 25, 26, 27, and 28, in which the half-breeds of Manitoba and the North-west Territories are classified as Indians. I do not think that it was the intention of the census takers to classify these people as Indians, and I believe they are thus classified owing to some mistake. Is the hon. minister prepared to make a change?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). My attention has been drawn to this, and I propose to make a change in the wording which will meet the views expressed by the hon. gentleman.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding):

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings). After having enjoyed, Mr. Speaker, the brief holiday afforded for the proper and due observance of the Easter period, I venture to hope that hon. members of the ministry, and the hon. members of this House in general, have returned to their duties to-day imbued with that spirit of forgiveness and forgetfulness which should characterize the feelings of every man in this country towards his fellow men. And for these as well as for other reasons I might urge I bespeak for myself that consideration which, I believe, is characteristic of this House and is accorded to every beginner in political life. We are apt, in the heat of political discussion, to make use of expressions and to give vent to feelings which, in our calmer, moments we would not use and would not give vent to. If I should, in the remarks which I shall endeavour to make to this House this afternoon, trespass in this way, I ask for myself that consideration which I would ask for any other member situated as I am situated here.

Before the adjournment, I listened with careful attention to the deliverance of the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) who preceded me in this debate. I listened to the hon. member's address growing louder and louder in denunciation of the members of the Conservative party and growing louder and louder in praise of the administration of the present Liberal government. If I might be permitted to follow the example set by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), I could best illustrate my feelings on hearing that deliverance by the episode of the lady who, upon one occasion was obliged to return to her home alone as the night was falling. She was obliged to pass through a considerable stretch of wood. She reached the edge of the wood as the night was coming on. But she thought she knew her way perfectly well, and boldly ventured on. Night drew on apace and the darkness thickened. Presently a thunderstorm appeared, the clouds began to roll together and thunder was heard in the distance. Louder and louder grew the thunder, just as louder and louder grew the speech of my hon. friend from Guysborough. Little flashes of lightning were seen to dart here and there across the sky. Presently, the lady lost her way and groped in the dark. In her dilemma, she fell upon her knees and offered this prayer to the Almighty: 'Oh, Lord give us more light and less noise.' I was very forcibly reminded of that episode as I listened to the speech of the hon. member from Guysborough. That hon. gentleman was pleased to make reference to the speech of the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Richardson) who preceded him. Unintentionally, I think, he paid a very high compliment to the hon. member for South Grey, when he told the House that that hon. member had delivered a very carefully-prepared essay and that he would not undertake to reply. If the hon. member for South Grey had so arranged his facts and so prepared his figures, and if he so delivered himself to this House, as to leave himself open to no criticism from the hon. member for Guysborough, then I say he is entitled not only to the unintentional compliment paid to him by the hon. member, but to the hearty congratulations of this House at large. I should deem it far more honourable to be charged, as the hon. member for South Grey has been, with having carefully prepared my speech, having so arranged my facts and figures as not to leave myself open to unfavourable criticism, than to subject myself to a comment I have heard since the hon. member for Guysborough delivered himself—that that hon. gentleman had the faculty of opening his mouth and letting it say just what it pleased.

The hon. member for Guysborough appeared to be very much troubled over the resolution that was moved by the hon. leader of the opposition and took occasion to inquire what was the meaning of the expression used in that resolution, a 'declared policy.' Well, I am not surprised that the hon. member asked that question. Associated, as he has been for so long a time, with a party which, as a party, have had no declared or definite policy, which, as a party, could not agree amongst themselves as to what their policy should be, and whose only semblance of a policy which they have ever propounded in this House or adhered to in the country is one that they purloined from the Liberal-Conservative party, I am not at all surprised at the hon. member being unfamiliar with the phrase 'declared policy,' or asking the leader of the opposition what he meant by it. I do not take it to be the business of the opposition in this House to formulate and declare a policy for the benefit of the government. But I do take it to be the bounden duty of the government to formulate and announce a definite, a 'declared policy' for the benefit of the country. I can well understand the anxiety of the hon. member for Guysborough to have the leader of the opposition expose in full detail what was meant by the expression used in the resolution to which he referred and to give that policy in all its details. For, no doubt, had the leader of the opposition so declared himself, straightway the Liberal party would do as they did when they came into power—they would purloin the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party and claim credit, as they do to-day, for all the benefits growing from that policy. But let me tell the hon. member for Guysborough without disclosing any party secrets that, while we had in 1878, a national policy, we have now an international policy, one embodying the previous one, but broadening it, extending its benefits so that it will not only be to the advantage of Canada in particular, but will be to the advantage of the empire in general.

The hon. member for Guysborough took occasion to shelter himself and the government he supports from the accusation made against them of neglecting the opportunity they have been afforded during the course of their administration by these words: 'The tariff is the tariff of the Conservative party; if it is unsatisfactory, they are responsible.' Those are his words. Sir, I deny that position and declare it to be a statement that is not only not in accordance with the facts but it is a direct charge of incompetence against this government. Had he taken occasion to state that the principle of that tariff was the principle supported by the Conservative party, but that it was defective in some of its details and that the government of the day had acknowledged the principle and had acknowledged that the application of it was wanting in some details, I would not have been disposed to quarrel with him, for then it would have been in accordance with the true position.

Sir, no one can properly estimate the detrimental effect of such a hesitating course as has characterized the conduct of this government in regard to that matter. The government has put itself on record that changes are necessary in the tariff and would be beneficial to this country; but they cannot agree amongst themselves what that change ought to be, they cannot agree when that change should take place, and they cannot agree upon what lines they should alter the tariff; and so the manufacturer, the agriculturist, the labourer, the miner, all the people of this country are left to wallow in this maze of contradiction, and it cannot be expected, so long as this hesitating course is pursued, that capital will flow into the country, or that the industries of Canada will flourish and increase as we have reason to expect they would increase under a proper administration of the government.

The hon. member was pleased to inform this House that there were some industries that flourished under the present tariff, and he mentioned one in the province from which he comes, the one at New Glasgow. Well, Sir, I venture the assertion that if he had taken the pains to search for evidence throughout the Dominion of Canada he could have found other enterprises, other manufactures of a different character, who are to-day, to use a homely expression, standing upon their last legs for want of some change in the tariff. I venture to say further that had the hon. member taken the trouble to look for evidence, he could have discovered why the industry he referred to in New Glasgow has flourished. It is one of the bounty fed industries of this government, and I think if he had inquired into the contracts given to it by the present government, he would have discovered the cause of the prosperity of that one industry. But, Sir, I do not pretend to say, nor does the Conservative party pretend to say, that the tariff is all wrong, but we do say that it is imperfect, we do say that it requires amending, we do say that such adjustment of that tariff could be made as would be for the advantage of the industrial pursuits of this country. But while we say that, we charge at the same time that the government have not had the courage of their convictions to make such changes as they themselves know are necessary in regard thereto.

The hon. member for Guysborough next undertook to pay his compliments to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) and the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) by soundly abusing them for having been converted to the principles of protection. In the course of his remarks he made use of this expression, referring to the hon. member for North Norfolk:

> I could understand a man wavering between two opinions, but I could not understand such a deliverance as he made. . . . I regret that he turned himself upside down for such a purpose.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is pretty hard language to use towards an hon. member who has enjoyed the confidence of the Liberal party so long as the hon. member for North Norfolk. It is pretty hard language to use against an hon. gentleman who, the hon. member for Guysborough himself was forced to admit, is a pious man, a well meaning man, and an upright man. Sir, I think the hon. member for Guysborough in that statement, reversed the order of things. He has not a very clear perception of the ground upon which he was treading, for the hon. gentlemen to whom he referred, in my opinion, prior to their conversion, were turned upside down, they have now got turned right side up, but unfortunately they have left the member for Guysborough still standing on his head. After the labour of 20 years, after illustration and example were so strong that it was impossible for the Liberal party longer to resist their force, one by one they are being gathered into the fold of protection, therefore there is room for hope for the hon. member for Guysborough.

The hon. gentleman next took occasion to refer to our relations with the republic to the south of us, and referring to the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition, he said:

> Against whom is he going to put up this high tariff wall if it is not against the people of the American republic? . . . In my calmer moments the thought occurs to me that I would be serving my country better by refusing to hit back.

He then proceeded to quote at length from the Boston 'Transcript' an article from an American Republican standpoint, professing to teach the people of this country how they should administer the affairs of this country, and he expressed his fears at what the result might be should the resolution of the leader of the opposition be carried in this House. Well, Mr. Speaker, for myself I desire to say, from my observation of the course of the Liberal-Conservative party in this Dominion, that while respecting American rights, and while endeavouring to sustain the most friendly relations with them, we have never so far forgotten our personality, we have never so far forgotten the possibilities of this country as to turn to the American republic for advice as to how we should administer the affairs of our country. The hon. gentleman may have his fears, but no such feeling as that pervades the breasts of the opposition in this House. If the hon. gentleman waits until such time as the legislators of the American republic advise the government of Canada how to legislate to the advantage of Canada, he will have the privilege of waiting for a very long time ; and if he cannot dispel his fears until that time arrives, I venture to say that he will depart from this scene without bearing with him the best respects of the Canadian people.

I do not entertain any such respect or admiration for the American republic as I entertain for my own country of Canada. If it is in the interests of Canada to erect a high protective wall against the American republic for the purposes of advancing our material interests, then I say unhesitatingly that I will be willing to lend all the force I can to the erection of that wall—not, Mr. Speaker, in a spirit of retaliation, but in a spirit of self protection. Nor would I hesitate to apply that same principle to any other country on the face of the globe. In saying this I do not forget our geographical position relative to that republic, I do not fail to recognize that we have similar aspirations, I do not fail to recognize the fact that we are descended from the same stock, that we have in many respects similar resources. But as self preservation is the first law of nature in regard to individuals, so those who are entrusted with the welfare of Canada, or of any other part of the British empire, should realize that it is their first duty to protect the interests of their own country. If a preference is to be given to any one, let us give it in our own family. Let charity begin at home. I have such confidence, not only in the motherland but in every colony thereof, that I believe if we approach them in a proper spirit and on a fair reasonable basis, we will not be denied an adequate compensation for any favours we may give, notwithstanding the declaration of the Prime Minister that Canada wanted nothing for the favours she had already given, and notwithstanding his rejection of the offer made at the time he made that declaration.

Just as the Act of Confederation had the effect of binding together the weak and struggling provinces then existing into one vast dominion characterized by strength, stability and progress, so the union of the commercial interests of the colonies with one another and with the motherland, on a mutual preferential basis will have the effect of making the weak strong and the strong stronger, for in union there is strength and will better enable us, as it will every part of the empire, to withstand the fierce competition for trade of other nations and as a matter of defence and self preservation it will take away that element of dependence on other nations and emphasize our entire independence.

Already, the republic to the south of us is claiming to have assumed first place on the commercial list of the world and boasting of its possibilities in the future and that position can only be attained by obtaining possession of the best markets in the world in which to dispose of their surplus products both of manufacture and natural products and the only way to combat that attack is to preserve our own market for our own people for the whole empire to cultivate and hold as much of the markets of the empire as possible for its own people and to shut out as far as possible foreign competition. This principle might not apply and would not apply to all nations, but with Great Britain and her colonies situated as they are in every part of the globe, with the great natural resources at their disposal, with the ability to produce everything under the sun required to build up and maintain the greatest nation on earth, such a possibility is ours.

We need not expect any favours from the United States. The course of their whole existence has been repugnant to that idea, they are our natural rivals and so keen is that rivalry that there is not a minute to lose in putting ourselves in a position to withstand it, and that is one reason why I condemn the present government for its want of action in that direction. On the other hand, it is quite natural for us to expect favours from the motherland. We have always been in receipt of favours from her and in no branch of government perhaps has England shown more concern than for her colonies and the importance and strength of such a policy has never been so forcibly brought home as within the past few years. To-day Great Britain realizes that in the strength and prosperity of her colonies lies her strength and prosperity, and recognizing that fact, I repeat, we cannot show any favour that Great Britain will not be willing to compensate us for.

And then, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member turns his attention to his admiration for the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright).

He was good enough to preface his remarks in regard to these two gentlemen by the most ardent declarations of patriotism and loyalty to our mother country. He could scarcely find language strong enough to express his admiration for British connection or to express his gratitude for the shield of protection which the mother country has afforded us. With these sentiments I most heartily agree and were it possible I would paint the picture in even stronger language than he has done. But surely, Mr. Speaker, he did not get inspiration for those sentiments from the hon. Minister of Public Works whom he set out to eulogize.

Contrast if you will the utterances of the hon. Minister of Public Works with those of the hon. member of Guysborough :

Allow me to say so, and allow me to repeat it, we have remained French ; we are more and more so; we are more French than we were twenty years ago, and more than we were a year ago. (Applause)—Hon. Mr. Tarte, at Rouen, France, June, 1900.

We represent over there the France of Europe, and I do not think I am mistaken in saying that before twenty-five years we shall form the majority in North America.—Hon. Mr. Tarte, at Rouen, France, June, 1900.

Canada is much more French than it was thirty years ago, and if the tide of English immigration were to be directed elsewhere, the French-Canadians might recover the majority.—Hon. Mr. Tarte, in ' Le Journal de Paris" April 5, 1900.

Why should London, which is on an island, become the centre of the world, rather than Paris, the city of civilization, of liberty, of justice ?—Hon. Mr. Tarte, in Paris 'Figaro' interview, September, 1900.

The question is :—Shall the country interfere or hold aloof in England's troubles ? I say, and without hesitation, that this is a question upon which no hurried decision should be given ; it is not a question of money, but of principle, and before the Liberal party makes up its mind as to the proper attitude to adopt, it should pause and consult parliament.—Hon. Mr. Tarte, at Montreal Reform Club, October 10, 1899.

These are not the sentiments expressed by the hon. member and they are neither called for or excusable or calculated to have any other effect than that of weakening the allegiance of the people of whom he speaks and arousing the cupidity of Britain's possible enemies. The speaker then thought the highest compliment he could pay these good men was to say that there was no evidence before the public accounts committee to show that the Minister of Public Works had ever used a cent dishonestly, and that no corruption had been shown against Sir Richard Cartwright, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. Well, Sir, I then for the first time learned that in the opinion of a Liberal you must convict them of theft before you have a right to condemn their political action. But, Sir, did the hon. member, when he was uttering these words of praise, forget that scandal known as the Drummond County Railway Deal. Did he forget the refusal of the hon. Minister of Public Works to tell where the money came from to pay for ' La Patrie '? Did he forget the declarations of Mr. McMullen in 1894, in opposition, when he used these words :

I must take exception in the first place to the office (the Department of Trade and Commerce) ever having been created. I do not see why it was created unless it was given a resting place for the balance of his life to the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position, drawing $7,000 a year for virtually doing nothing.

And did he forget the declaration of the hon. Minister himself when he used this language :

We have far too many ministers. To increase them to seventeen appears to be a monstrous piece of folly.

And did he overlook the fact that the hon. minister sat down in that office and quietly drew his $7,000 for doing nothing as Mr. McMullen put it, or as Sir Richard himself put it in Toronto in 1899 ' as largely an onlooker in the government.'

Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) forget the declarations of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to the expenditures of this country ; did he forget his declarations as to the public debt ; did he forget his promises as to the reduction of taxation, and as to ' that abomination, the customs tax,' as he declared it to be. Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) forget that he has seen that same Minister of Trade and Commerce sit down and help to administer the government of this country which has broken each and every one of its pledges which it gave to the people of Canada. Surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) must have forgotten these things ; or otherwise he would not have ventured to pay the enconiums he did to the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

But, Sir, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) was not satisfied that he had done his whole duty in paying his compliments to these two ministers of this government, but he must needs before ending, pay his special compliments to the Prime Minister himself. And, Sir, the only reason assigned by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) for heaping roses upon the head of the Prime Minister, was, to use his own expression :

That the Prime Minister had been instrumental in cementing the people of this country together, and strengthening the bond of union with the motherland.

Again, I would ask : did the hon. gentlemen (Mr. Fraser) forget the speeches made by the Prime Minister to his French Canadian fellow citizens of the province of Quebec during the last elections, and the speeches he delivered in the province of Ontario ? Did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) forget the race cry that was raised in the province of Quebec, or did he forget this utterance that was made use of by the right hon. Prime Minister on the floor of this House :

I hold out to my fellow-countrymen the idea of independence. If we are true to our record we will exhibit to the world the unique, the unprecedented example of a nation achieving its independence by slow degrees and as naturally as the ripe fruit falls from the parent tree.

The Minister of Finance reproached me a moment ago that I had stated in Boston that the Canadian people have interests altogether at variance with the interests of the mother country.

Sir, I said so in Boston, and I say so now on the floor of the House.

I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspirations is the independence of Canada —to see Canada an independent nation in due time.'

Surely the member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) did not draw his inspirations from that utterance of the present premier. Surely he must have been inspired by the utterances of the Liberal Conservative party upon that question, as voiced by Sir Charles Tupper, who when leader of the Conservative party, used this language in the Commons of Canada :

When the Loyalists withdrew from their old homes and raised the standard of Britain on the soil of Canada it was their purpose to create a sister British nation that should be an added glory and a source of strength to the British Crown.

Their work, performed amidst struggle and hardships, still lives. To us have they handed down the honours and privileges of British citizenship and the liberties which appertain to constitutional rule.

Be it ours to cherish this great heritage and to build up in this vast Dominion a nation that shall be ever loyal to the Queen, ever attached to the empire, and ever true to our flag.

Numbered among the British communities that encircle the globe, sharing in British glory, participating in British strength, we shall advance as we shall become a stronger ally of Britain and a brighter jewel in the diadem of the Queen.

But, perhaps, the hon. member (Mr. Fraser) had in his mind the position which the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) took on the occasion of the jubilee of our late beloved Queen when as representing Canada he was placed in the first rank of honour extended to any British colony, and when may be the Prime Minister had in his mind the titles which he called tin pot titles before he went to England, but which when he got to England he was glad to receive form his sovereign. Perhaps the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) had in his mind the high position which the Prime Minister of Canada is to occupy at the Coronation of His Majesty King Edward VII. Perhaps the member for Guysborough had all these things in his mind when he made use of the expressions to which I have alluded. But, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fraser) remembered these, he entirely forgot the fact that while the Premier was willing to occupy the first position given to the representative of any British colony, he was the last to call forth the efforts of Canada to assist British arms in their difficulties during the war in South Africa. Yes ; the Prime Minister of Canada was willing to occupy the first position when the empire rejoiced ; but on the other hand he was content to occupy the last position when the empire needed help.

Now, Sir, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) were both brought up in the Conservative school ; both trained in the Conservative party, and being such bad Conservatives they were no longer continued in the party. But, bad Conservatives as they were, the hon. member for Guysborough has been pleased to say that they make two capital Liberal ministers. I was privileged to hear the remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the resolution now before the House. The hon. gentleman got rid of a large amount of bile that apparently disturbed his stomach in abusing the enumerators who took the census of 1891 and the government under which these enumerators were appointed.

By a very laboured effort he endeavoured to show by a comparison of figures and by assertion as to the position of the government of that day that these enumerators were a lot of scoundrels unfit to inhabit this country and dishonest enough to violate the oath they were required to take at the dictation of that government.

And while he was bold enough to characterize the work of the enumerators of 1891 as dishonest and bad, although he was forced to admit from the returns of the present census that it was open to argument that they were wrong, he says in this case if they are wrong it is a mistake.

The one class, these of 1891, are unable to defend themselves and he calls them scoundrels and perjurers.

In the latter class they were appointees of the present government and able to defend themselves by inflicting through the ballot box the just punishment of any one guilty of making such an accusation.

But, Sir, the hon. gentleman's allusion to the necessities of the government in 1891 are the mere outpourings of a very imaginative brain, and he is assisted in that imagination by his knowledge of the exigencies of the present government, and he entirely failed to show any necessity in the late government to falsify the census. Surely the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) must have forgotten what has been amply demonstrated since the census of 1901 was taken, namely, that a separate and a private set of instructions were issued to the enumerators in the province of Quebec, differing from the instructions issued to the enumerators in the other provinces. Why was such the case ? What explanation has ever been given of it? I venture to say that the only explanation that can be given is the fact that the representation of this parliament depends on the population of the province of Quebec, and by swelling the population of that province it would lessen the representation of the province of Ontario, where the government of the day is notoriously weak. I venture the assertion that that was the reason why these instructions were given to the enumerators of the province of Quebec and not to the enumerators of the province of Ontario.

Another position which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce took in regard to the census was this. He undertook to justify the large expenditure incurred during the past year and during the years which this government has been in power upon the ground that the population of the Dominion of Canada had very largely increased ; and, Sir, in the same breath he was forced to admit, from the returns which have been brought down and placed on the Table of this House, that the census of the Dominion of Canada is, to use his own language, disappointing. But, Sir, while he stated that the growth of the population was disappointing, he did not say, as he might well have said, that the expenditure of this country was disappointing and was altogether out of proportion to the population which inhabited it.

I was obliged, Mr. Speaker, to deny myself the privilege of hearing the hon. Minister of Finance deliver his budget speech. But I have taken occasion to carefully read it, and considering the past utterances of that hon. gentleman and other members of the ministry, and the members who are following them, I realize that my loss in that respect has not been so great as I had supposed. I had anticipated, and not without reason, from professions of the hon. gentlemen of the ministry, that at least something new, something startling would be announced in the budget as having taken place in the administration of public affairs in this Dominion during the past year or that might be expected to occur within the next year. But, Sir, like many others, my expectations have not been realized in that respect, for we have had the spectacle of a Finance Minister presenting to this House this session a leaner bill of fare than has characterized similar occasions during the years the hon. gentleman has been in office. In introducing his budget to this House, he uses this language :

> Mr. Speaker, it is my happy privilege to present to the House to-day another chapter in the continued story of Canada's prosperity.

Only half the truth, Mr. Speaker, is stated in that sentence. If the hon. minister had been frank enough to state the whole case, he would have added these words : 'And another chapter in the continued story of broken pledges and neglected opportunities of the Liberal party of Canada.' That, Sir, would have been the whole truth and the whole statement. Or, had he stated that Canada had continued to prosper notwithstanding the incubus of the Liberal party hanging upon it, he would not have been far from the truth. But, Sir, he could not have stated that as a part of his happy privilege. The hon. Minister of Finance then goes on to say :

> In a country so vast as ours, with such varied conditions, it would be too much to expect that every section and every industry would be able to make the same gratifying report of prosperity. But I think I can truly say that during the past few years we have approached as near to that happy condition as could reasonably be hoped for.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister leaves himself open to the charge of only stating half the case. Had he put the case as strongly as he could have done, or as he should have done, he would have said that we have approached nearer to that happy condition than could reasonably have been hoped for under the present Liberal administration. The people of this Dominion expected, and had a right to expect, from the pledges and promises made by the Liberal party when in opposition, and spread broadcast by them over this Dominion, in the public press, by speeches and in every available manner, and from the fault-finding they made with the administration of the Liberal Conservative party, that when they attained office there would be real reform in the administration of the various departments of the government. We had, I say, a right to expect that. But, Sir, I am happy to be able to say that at the time these gentlemen attained office they found the affairs of the country under Liberal Conservative rule in such a satisfactory condition that there was very little room for improvement. It is either that, Mr. Speaker, or the present administration stand convicted on their own evidence of lacking the courage of their convictions or of having no convictions at all. I venture the assertion, Sir, that there never was a period in the history of Canada when there was such a golden opportunity for a government to use its powers and exert its influence for the benefit and the lasting advantage of this country ; and I venture the further assertion that there has never been a period when these privileges and opportunities have been so sadly neglected. The benign smile of Providence has been continuously resting upon us during that period. All that a country could hope for has been ours. Our agricultural lands have fairly groaned under the wealth of their production. We can thank Providence and the industry of the agriculturist for this ; but I am sorry to say that the hon. Minister of Finance, in delivering his budget, was not pleased to acknowledge either the one cause or the other for this prosperity, but was quite willing to take the whole credit to the government, where credit does not belong. Our industrial pursuits have grown and have assumed larger proportions during that period ; but I venture to say that they have not made such progress or advancement as they would have done under the administration of a progressive government capable of taking advantage of the opportunities as they were offered. That, Sir, is the fault of the Liberal government. We had a right to expect that advantage would have been taken of this period of prosperity to lay up something for a rainy day. We had a right to expect that a substantial reduction would have been made in the cost of the administration of the government and in public expenditure. We had a right to expect that the national debt, which had assumed such large proportions, would have been reduced by the surpluses arising annually from the rapidly and continuously increasing revenues. We had a right to expect that the resources of this country would have been carefully husbanded to enable us, in the time of adversity which always follows a period of prosperity, to maintain our financial and commercial position in the world, and to avert as far as possible the evil effects of hard times.

This, Mr. Speaker, would not be expecting too much, it would only be applying the principles of ordinary business prudence to the administration of the affairs of this country. If a merchant, a farmer, or any person engaged in any business depending upon the public for its success were to apply the business methods adopted by the government of the day in increasing his expenditure, and increasing his debt, without increasing materially his sources of income during a period of prosperous trade, ruin and disaster must come upon such a person during a period of hard times as it will surely come upon this government. The principle applicable to individuals is applicable to governments only with greater force, because in the former case failure affects only the individual while with governments the whole people of the whole country share in the disaster.

The principle I would advocate would be to use the surplus revenues in wiping out the debt to the greatest possible extent consistent with the reasonable development of the country.

To expend the revenues in such a manner as will substantially and permanently increase the sources of such revenue.

In making such expenditures to keep first the prosperity and advancement of the country in view and not allow these interests to be sacrificed for the advancement of party.

As wholesome and commendable as these principles may appear, I charge and it has been amply demonstrated on the floor of this House during the present debate by various hon. gentlemen on this side, that the government of the day has entirely ignored these principles and have operated on the vicious principles of increasing the annual expenditure and increasing the national debt, increasing the per capita tax and in making these vast and ever-increasing expenditures, have not made them in such a manner as to permanently and substantially increase the sources of revenue, but have sacrificed the interests of the country to the retention of office by the Liberal party.

But, Mr. Speaker, this vicious principle does not appear to be confined to the Liberal party in power at Ottawa. We have had the figures quoted to show that it does apply here, but, Sir, Liberal governments appear to be all tarred with the same stick. If you will take occasion to refer to the estimates of the province of Ontario for the present year under the administration of Hon. Mr. Ross, you will find this same vicious principle in full operation there. I have taken the figures and here they are :—

Main estimates..	$4,004,228
Supplementaries..	181,947
Further supplementaries... ...	3,750
Railway certificates (dept).. ..	92,248
Annuities (debt)..	102,900
New railway subsidies...	696,000
Temiscamingue railway..	2,234,000
	$7,315,073
Estimated possible revenue.. ..	$4,075,000
Excess of expenditure over receipts..	$3,230,073
Net debt stood at..	$5,800,000
The debt will stand at	$9,030,073

So it will be seen that the disease is spreading. I do not know whether the Liberals at Ottawa caught the disease from the Liberal government of Ontario or vice versa, but certain it is they both have it bad, and it is high time that a long-suffering but now indignant public should apply a remedy, and I doubt not that, on the first opportunity, the punishment inflicted by the public will be made to fit the crime.

I have charged, Mr. Speaker, that the present administration have not done what they should and could have done to improve the opportunities of those engaged in industrial pursuits, and during the six years' administration of the present government there has been seen deputation after deputation almost without number of gentlemen engaged in various industrial pursuits waiting upon the cabinet urging with all their energies the necessity of relief or protection in some form or another to be turned away with the 'sunny smile' and promise of 'serious consideration' but no help. The fact is that during the years these gentlemen were in opposition they condemned in the strongest possible language and on every possible occasion the policy of protection inaugurated by the Conservative party. They had preached almost every other doctrine imaginable from free trade to unrestricted reciprocity, as the only panacea for the evils they imagined this country to be burdened with, but, Sir, when they attained power they found a legacy left to them in the shape of an infant named 'Nationl Policy' Protection, born of Conservative parents and reared under Conservative influences, and which had grown so strong and husky that the Liberals were afraid to touch it, afraid either because they had abused it so much or because it had acquired such strength they dared not tackle it, and so they have left it severely alone, only making slight and unimportant changes in rates but nothing in principle, but, Mr. Speaker, the infant was such a lovable thing, it was exerting such a beneficial influence in the industrial enterprises of this country (imperfect though it was) that the Liberal party simply looked on in silent admiration at its operations and one by one watched their pet theories of free trade, &c., fade away and die, and growing bold with association, they have at last adopted the child and it is a clear case of the child ruling the household, for whatever faults the child may have the present government are either afraid or incompetent to correct its manners. It has taken many years of earnest advocacy and practical administration on the part of the Conservative party to convert the Liberal party to the policy of protection. But it is gratifying to know that they have, at last, nearly all been converted to that principle. It seems to me that if there ever was a time when the Liberal party should govern this country it is the time during which they have governed it, a time when the country was strong, when the trade policy of the country was so well established and so perfect that, notwithstanding the action of the government the country could still go on and prosper. The Minister of Finance has been pleased to refer to the agricultural interest in these words :

> In the paramount interest of agriculture, which must long continue to be the foundation of our prosperity, the results of the year have been most gratifying.

Notwithstanding this important statement, the hon. gentleman failed to show that the present government had, by any action on its part in any way contributed to that prosperity. There are a great many ways in which the government could have improved the condition of the agriculturists. They could have prevented the corn of the western states and other products of the country to the south of us coming into competition with the products of the Canadian farms. They could have prevented American meat and American horses from coming into competition with the Canadian product in the Canadian market. They could have obtained, or at least, could have tried to obtain, a preference in the English market for the products of Canadian farms. But, not only have they failed to procure these benefits for the Canadian agriculturists, but they have been pursuing a policy diametrically opposed to this, they have been pursuing a policy which was indicated by the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) in an expression he used in referring to a statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) :

> Sir Richard Cartwright was right in refusing agricultural protection. Agriculture protection is a delusion and a snare.

If he had desired to seek further the authority of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) he might have quoted these words which the hon. gentleman is charged with having made use of on the hustings when he undertook to give advice to the Canadian farmer as to what he should do to better his condition, that advice being : If you wish to increase your prosperity you must eat less and work more. But, instead of gaining these advantages for the agriculturists of this country, the present government have seen fit to increase the taxes on those commodities which are of prime necessity for the farmers. And the Minister of Agriculture has given expression to this further phrase, speaking of agriculture protection :

> This kind of thing, instead of helping the farmers hurts them. The thing is nonsense.

I would like to know what the farmers of the Dominion of Canada think of the promise that has been held out to them by the Minister of Agriculture. The Canadian farmer is entitled to every credit for the pluck and industry he has shown in the face of these obstacles, and for having done so much to bring the prosperity which has been showered upon this country. The government of the day, in neglecting the opportunities they have had are worthy the condemnation of the people of Canada.

The Minister of Finance next takes occasion to compliment the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Mulock) for what he terms the able administration of that department. And he was able to show by the collection of figures in the Department of Finance that that hon. gentleman had run the affairs of that department for the last year with a loss to the country of $489,941.08, and at the same time to show that he had had an increase of revenue during last year of no less than $235,969.77. That is, taking these figures together, had the revenue of the Post Office Department been the same as under the last year of Conservative rule, the deficit added to the increased revenue from that time to the present would have made a deficit, as compared with the Conservative administration of this department, exceeding $1,000,000, a larger deficit than has ever characterized the department under Conservative rule. Just to illustrate how this department has been run, let me give one example which comes under my own personal observation. The illustration has more a local than a general application, but it is, nevertheless, very instructive. When the Liberal party came into power in 1896, the post office at Belleville held rank as a city office; but on the 30th of September, 1897, it was reduced to the rank of a country office. That is to say, prior to 1897, the several employees of the Belleville post office were on the civil service list, they were obliged to pass examinations and to qualify themselves to fill the position which they then occupied. The number of persons employed at that time was ten; the total cost of the post office was $8,710, and the revenue collected by these ten people from the post office was $17,339.60. The change was brought about in this way—the postmaster, Mr. John Taylor, who was a Conservative, was dismissed without any charge being made against him and without any investigation—in fact in violation of the principle laid down in this House by the right hon. the Prime Minister. The assistant in the post office, Mr. Thomas Duncan was removed, and, if I am correctly informed, a new position was created for him in the railway mail service, where he has since been enjoying a salary of $1,500, whereas, as assistant in the Belleville post office, he only received $1,350. Five members of the staff of the Belleville post office were superannuated, and superannuation allowances are being paid to these five people, amounting to no less than $1,166.79. Three others were dismissed who had not been long enough in the service to entitle them to superannuation, and they were paid gratuities amounting to $583.59. Only two of the total staff of ten were retained in that office. These changes, you will see, provided a position of postmaster for one of the faithful of the Liberal party, and subordinate positions for five others. It is needless for me to say that these positions were filled by the faithful of the Liberal party. Now, the present staff—and I want to compare it with that I have given you—consists of eight persons—

Mr. SPEAKER. I would call the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Porter) to the fact that he is not discussing the question before the Chair. When an amendment has been moved to a motion for Committee of Supply, the discussion should be restricted to its subject matter. That is a well established rule.

Mr. PORTER. I was addressing myself to the question upon the subject of expenditure by the administration in connection with the Post Office Department.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question of that expenditure does not come within the scope of the motion now before the Chair, which is the amendment moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden) concerning the tariff and the preference with England. I read this passage from Bourinot, page 549 :

> When an amendment has been moved to the question for the Speaker to leave the Chair, the discussion should be confined to its subject matter.

I would draw the attention of the hon. members of the House to this ruling.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman is in order quite as much as was the Minister of Trade and Commerce who occupied an hour and a half dealing with the census of 1891, which my amendment certainly does not touch ; and the same freedom of discussion, I think, has prevailed in the speeches of gentlemen on both sides of the House. While I do not find any fault with the rule which you have laid down, at the same time I thought there was an understanding that so far as this debate was concerned hon. gentlemen were not to be confined with that strictness that you might enforce if you thought proper to do so. I would therefore submit, with all proper deference, that the hon. member for Hastinngs is quite as much within his right as hon. gentlemen who have preceded him in this debate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). I have no doubt that the ruling you have laid down is strictly and legally accurate. But I may observe that in the budget debate we have, as a matter of custom for a good many years, given extreme latitude on both sides, both giving and taking. It is fair to say that I have myself, on all occasions in discussing the budget, given myself very full latitude ; and I believe my hon. friend opposite is right in saying that I did so on this particular occasion.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). We did not object.

Mr. SPEAKER. With the unanimous consent of the House the hon. member may deviate from that rule, but I thought it my duty to point out the rule to the House, and I would recommend that it be observed as much as possible.

Mr. PORTER. I was about to call attention to the position occupied by the Belleville post office as showing the scale of expenditure in the Post Office Department, and to compare the present position of the Belleville post office with that it occupied under Liberal-Conservative rule. At the present time the staff is composed of eight officials ; the cost as given in the Public Accounts laid on the Table of the House is $4,100 ; and the revenue collected in the year ending June 30th, 1901, was $14,822,80. Now those figures are entirely misleading, and one has only to look to some other parts of the Public Accounts to get the true state of affairs as to the cost of the Belleville post office. I have taken the trouble to do so, and I find that to that sum of $4,100 given as the cost of the Belleville post office, must be added the superannuation allowances which are being paid year after year to those people who were dismissed from their offices for the purpose of making room for supporters of the Liberal cause. Those superannuation allowances amount to $1,116.69. The salary of Mr. Duncan, for whom the office was created—for if I am correctly informed the office had never been in existence before—is $1,500. That must be added to the cost. Then the gratuities that were paid the next year after this change, amounted to $583.59, bringing up the total cost of the Belleville post office to $7,350.28. Now, Mr. Speaker, you will observe from a comparison of these figures that ten officials who have passed an examination and qualified themselves for the position, were paid under Liberal-Conservative rule $8,710, or an average of $871 each; while under Liberal rule eight officials are paid $7,350, or an average of $918 each. The revenue collected by the ten officials under Liberal-Conservative rule was $17,339.60, while the revenue collected from that office by the officials who are being paid more money for their work at the present time, is only $14,882. But this is not the worst feature of the case. Instead of Belleville occupying, as it did under Conservative rule, the proud distinction of giving a first class service, the service in that office has since been sacrificed, and almost every conceivable kind of complaint is being made from day to day in regard to that office

But the full force of the point I am making is shown by a comparison of the Belleville post office with some other post offices. I have taken the trouble to extract from the Public Accounts the figures with relation to other post offices in cities somewhat of the same size as Belleville. The population of Belleville is given at 9,914; the cost of the administration of the post office is $7,350.35; the revenue collected is $14,882.80. Now take the city of Guelph, with a population of 10,539, about 1,000 more than Belleville. The Guelph post office costs this government only $5,441.06, nearly $2,000 less than the Belleville post office; and yet Guelph collects in revenue $23,526.25, or $9,000 more than the amount collected in Belleville. Take the city of Brantford, with a population of 18,250. The post office costs this government $5,702.28, nearly $2,000 less than the Belleville post office, with a population of 9,914; and yet the city of Brantford collects a revenue of $28,796.60, or $14,000 more than the city of Belleville, though the officials in Belleville are paid $2,000 more for doing the work. Take the city of Brockville with a population nearer that of Belleville than either of the others that I have mentioned. Brockville, with a population of 9,013, costs for the administration of the post office $4,509.43, nearly $3,000 less than the Belleville post office; yet the town of Brockville collects $21,894.19, or $7,000 more than the city of Belleville.

Now let us go into the province of Quebec for an illustration. I have taken the city of Sherbrooke, which has a population of 10,010. The cost of the administration of the office there is $5,299, or $2,000 less than the cost of administering the Belleville post office; yet the city of Sherbrooke returns a revenue of $17,471.92, over $3,000 more than the city of Belleville. Going down to New Brunswick we find that in Moncton, with a population of 8,000, the administration of the post office costs only $3,761.93, and the revenue collected is $13,969.68. In the case of Moncton we find that the administration of the post office costs about one-half that of the Belleville post office. In Sydney, Nova Scotia, with a population of 8,000, the administration of the post office costs $4,613.05, the revenue collected is $16,115.39. You will see it costs $3,000 less to administer the post office than is paid for the Belleville post office, although Sydney returns a revenue of $2,000 more.

Now, Sir, another illustration to which I would call the attention of the government is afforded by the city of Charlottetown, in the province of Prince Edward Island. Charlottetown, with a population of 12,000, costs this government $11,795.64 for the administration of the office which collects $16,582.34. Compare that, if you will, with the town of Peterborough in the province of Ontario. Peterborough is put down as having a population of 12,000, the same as Charlottetown. Peterborough costs the government $4,630 for the administration of the office. Charlottetown costs the government $11,795. From this statement I think that the deduction is fairly drawn that if it is right and proper to pay for the administration of the Belleville office a sum so large as $7,350.35, it is wrong for the government to inflict the same work upon these other offices that I have spoken of and only pay the officials one-half the salaries, or, if it is right to pay, at these other places I have mentioned, the sums I have stated, then, it is radically wrong to pay the officials at Belleville nearly twice the sum that is paid at these other places. There is only one conclusion to be drawn, and the conclusion I draw is that at the time these hon. gentlemen made the change in the Belleville post office places had to be made, positions had to be found for the faithful of the party, and it was done in this way to the cost and detriment of the country to the extent of no less than $2,000 or $3,000 a year, and I doubt not that this is only an illustration that could be drawn from the public accounts were one to take occasion to look carefully over the whole list.

Besides the compliment paid by the hon. Minister of Finance to the hon. minister I have already referred to, he only addressed words of congratulation or praise to another head of a department, and that was to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair). But, he damned him with faint praise when he gave expression to this language:

> Even if he makes large demands he is able to show large returns.

No doubt the hon. Minister of Finance had in his mind at that time, the management of the Intercolonial Railway, and Sir, I have taken the pains to collect some figures in regard to the management of that railway, which, I think, may be of interest to the House and the country. When the Drummond County Railway deal, to which I have already referred, was before the Senate, it was pointed out there that the transaction was an extravagant and a corrupt transaction, but the answer that was given at that time was that the extension of the road to Montreal would have the effect of putting the Intercolonial Railway on a paying basis and that there would be no longer that deficiency between revenue and expenditure that had been characterizing the road hitherto. According to the statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance, during the last year there was a deficit in the management of that road of between $400,000 and $500,000; so that, the predictions of the opponents of that deal have been fully verified, and from the public accounts I have taken some figures, which, with the permission of the House, I will state. The deficit in the management of that road, to my mind, has been very largely occasioned by the increased number of officials and the increased salaries they have been paid by this government. Taking the last year of the Conservative management of the road I find the following in regard to the salaries of officials, as compared with the last year under Liberal rule.

6,000	1	2
3,750	0	1
3,600	1	1
3,200	1	0
2,950	0	1
2,500	0	1
2,400	1	4
2,225	0	1
2,100	0	1
1,900	1	0
1,800	2	1
1,700	2	3

So, you will see that in 1896 there were fifteen officials on the road who were in receipt of $1,500 a year or over, and that in 1901 the number had increased, under the able management of the present hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, to no less than twenty-seven. The salaries paid in 1896 amounted to $31,900, and in 1901 to $67,825, or more than rouble. Perhaps the hon. Minister of Finance had, at the time he was paying his compliments to the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals, a fact in his mind which I find very tersely put in one of the New Brunswick papers, an extract from which I have taken occasion to clip. Every hon. member on the government side of the House will remember how, during the Conservative administration, hon. gentlemen opposite were wont to declare that the ministers of that time were lording it over the country in private cars at the expense of the people. Here is what this newspaper says in regard to that branch of the Intercolonial Railway under the present minister:

> Official cars have become so numerous that Mr. Blair found it necessary some time ago to provide a special platform at Moncton for the convenience of the favoured ones who use them or to keep them out of the public gaze as much as possible, and the cost of the platform is charged to capital account. The extent of the private car habit on the Intercolonial Railway, may be judged from the fact that in Moncton shops last year four received heavy repairs, ten light repairs, one was renovated and varnished and one renovated only.

I would like to know what kind of a sermon from that fact would be preached by Mr. McMullen, Mr. Landerkin and other members who then occupied seats on the opposition side of the House.

But, there occurs to me, in connection with the department of Railways and Canals, one thing which is of special interest to the riding which I have the honour to represent and which I think should be brought before the House and upon which the government should offer some explanation. I refer to the Trent Valley canal. This is an enterprise to which both parties in the House committed themselves so long ago, so that, I need not take up any time in discussing the merits or demerits of this scheme further than to say that I am heartily in accord with and will support to the fullest extent that project providing the town of Trenton is made one terminus. I was very much surprised when a few days ago in answer to a question put by the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Ward) as to whether the government has decided or determined where the southern terminus of the Trent Valley canal should be, that is Port Hope or Trenton. The answer was given that the government had not determined. There has already been expended on that enterprise on the Trent river in and near Trenton a large amount of money. Locks and swing bridges have been constructed and the people in the vicinity of Trenton and the west riding of Hastings have been given to understand that the terminus of that canal would be at Trenton. A sum I understand has been in the estimates of this government for several years for carrying on this work and this year there is again a sum asked to be revoted, page 44 estimates, $300,000, for that purpose, although it does not appear to be the intention of the government to go on with the work and it is somewhat curious that the department should ask for this grant when they have not yet determined where the canal shall be. I think, however, Mr. Speaker, the intention and object of the government becomes apparent when one looks into the occasions on which this subject has been prominently before the people during the regime of the present government.

In 1896, when hon. gentlemen of the government assumed office the construction of the southern or Trenton end of the Trent Valley canal was made an issue and it was declared in the press and on the hustings of every riding through which the canal ran that if elected to power the work would certainly be proceeded with and large sums of money expended. This was urged with the object of inducing the electors of West Hastings to support the Liberal candidate, it was a powerful weapon in the hands of the Liberal party although a direct bribe and a dishonest means to secure the vote. It failed, however, and the electors of West Hastings were found to be men too true to their principles to be bought up in this way.

In 1898, there was another election on, this time for the local legislature of Ontario, and notwithstanding previous declarations of the Liberal party that the federal government should not take part in provincial politics, the Trent Valley canal again looms up and again for the purpose of furthering the cause of the Grit candidate as will appear by this article published in the Liberal organ of the town of Trenton.

Trenton Courier, Feb. 21, 1898.

A million and a half for the Trent Valley Canal.

The Dominion government are carrying out their pledges to construct the Trent Valley Canal as the following letter will abundantly prove.

Office of
The Minister of Railways and Canals.

Ottawa, Feb. 12th, 1898.

Dear Mr. Biggar,—I think we are making a very substantial increase this year, as you will observe when the estimates come down in connection with the Trent Valley Canal work. We are doubling the amount which was last year appropriated for the purpose.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed). ANDREW G. BLAIR.

W. H. Biggar,
Belleville, Ont.

Now, what could have been the possible object of writing Mr. Biggar, or of disclosing the amount before the estimates were brought down or of publishing a private letter in the Grit newspaper at that time? Simply and solely because there was an election on, because H. Bleeker was the Liberal candidate and Mr. Biggar was his champion, because that paper was supporting the Liberal cause, because they desired to bribe the electors. Again in 1900, and at the by-election in 1902, the same tactics were used and upon every platform could be heard Liberal promises of this work being carried on by the present government as a reason for supporting the Liberal candidate, but we were able to expose the purpose and show the fraud being practiced in making use of this cry and not carrying out the pledges and promises made in regard to it and the people now understand as the people of the whole Dominion understand that Liberal promises are like pie crust, made to be broken, that it is not a Liberal principle to keep a promise but an established principle to break them. We would like to know whether this old chestnut is to do service again. If not why is it kept in the estimates. Be manly, either tell the people you do not intend to carry on the work, or be honest and go on and do it. Let me just read to the House extracts from the estimates in different years:

Trent Valley Canal.—Estimates.

	Appropriation.
1897-8	$500,000
1898-9	650,000
1899-00	600,000
1900-01	845,000
1901	320,000
1902	615,000

I repeat that the government should be honest enough to take these items out of the estimates if they do not intend to proceed with the work; or let them be manly enough to spend the money and complete the Trent Valley canal.

I took occasion during the early days of this parliament to make certain inquiries regarding the Belleville Harbour Commission. These questions were:

1. Have any resignations, dismissals, appointments or re-appointments been made during the two years prior to the 1st of February, 1902?
2. What person or persons have so resigned, been dismissed, appointed or re-appointed, with dates of such resignations, dismissals, appointments or re-appointments?
3. What reason or reasons existed for such resignations, dismissals, appointments or re-appointments?

These questions were answered by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as follows:

1. Yes, that there had been resignations, dismissals, appointments and re-appointments.
2. That Mr. Thomas Hanley had resigned his position to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on the 10th of January, 1901, and the appointment of Mr. George Wallbridge was cancelled on the 19th of April, 1901. Mr. E. G. Sills, of Belleville, was appointed a harbour commissioner for Belleville on the 19th of April, 1901, and Mr. T. S. Carman was also appointed a commissioner for said harbour on the said date.
3. It was considered advisable in the interests of the harbour to cancel the appointment of Mr. Wallbridge and appoint another commissioner in his place, two commissioners having resigned because they were dissatisfied with Mr. Wallbridge and the difficulty there was in getting others to fill the vacancies while he remained a commissioner. Mr. T. S. Carman was appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. Hanley, and Mr. E. G. Sills was appointed in the room of Mr. Wallbridge.

I need scarcely say that I was very much surprised as well as disappointed at the answer given by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the questions put by me in respect to this matter, especially in regard to the reasons assigned for the dismissal of Mr. Wallbridge and the appointment of Mr. E. G. Sills in his stead. For the sake of comparison and to understand fully the motives actuating the conduct of hon. gentlemen of the government in regard to this matter I take occasion to state to the House that Mr. George Wallbridge who was dismissed had occupied the position of harbour commissioner of the Belleville harbour for a period of about twelve years prior to his dismissal.

In the Act of this parliament creating the Belleville Harbour Commission it is amongst other things provided that the mayor for the time being of the city of Belleville should be ex-officio a member of the commission, that the board of commissioners should consist of three, thus leaving it in the power of the government to appoint two commissioners.

There is a considerable revenue derived from the harbour of the city of Belleville, and which varies from year to year from $2,500 to as large a sum as $5,000, which revenue is intended to be expended for the improvement and advantage of Belleville harbour. At the time of the creation of this commission the sitting member for West Hastings in which this harbour is situated was Mr. Henry Corby, and upon his recommendation two gentlemen of the city of Belleville were appointed by the Conservative government upon this commission, namely, Mr. Thomas Wills and Mr. Thomas Ritchie.

It is well at this stage of considering this subject to look at the political complexion of that commission and the action of the gentleman who then represented that riding in this parliament. Upon the recommendation of Mr. Corby the two gentlemen whom I have named were appointed to the commission—the one Mr. Thomas Wills, an ex-member of the local legislature of Ontario and a Conservative in politics, the other Mr. Thomas Ritchie, a large retail dry goods merchant of the city of Belleville, a prominent Liberal and a gentleman who has since been the Liberal candidate in West Hastings. The mayor of the city of Belleville at that time and for every year since the creation of the harbour commission was a Conservative. Both these gentlemen subsequently resigned their positions upon the board, and in their stead and under a Conservative government there were appointed Mr. George Wallbridge and Mr. Thomas Hanley, one a Liberal, the other a Conservative. It will be perfectly evident to every member of this House that in making the selection of persons fit and proper to fill so important a position the then hon. member for West Hastings did not consult political interests, he was perfectly fair to both political parties, and appointed or had appointed to that board a representative of each party.

But, Sir, there were large sums of money to be expended by the harbour commission, not only revenue derived from the harbour of Belleville, but moneys granted from time to time by this government for the improvement of that harbour, and it became necessary in the interests of the Liberal party when it assumed the reins of power that the expenditure of these moneys and the management of this commission should be placed in the hands of those who were faithful to the party without regard to whatever sacrifices might be made as to the efficiency of the board, and accordingly we find the changes taking place. The excuse offered by the hon. minister for the discharge of Mr. Wallbridge is one which I am satisfied he could not have given were he acquainted with the qualifications of that gentleman, with the high position which he occupies and has always occupied socially and in a business way in the community where he has always resided, and the respect and esteem with which he is held by all classes of people in the city of Belleville and the time and attention and untiring devotion given by him to the success and the improvement of the Belleville harbour. I feel sure, Sir, that he would blush with shame to offer such an excuse as was offered in the answer to the question which I put to this House. Notwithstanding the answer given by the hon. minister, I venture the assertion that it would be impossible for him to find in the city of Belleville any responsible or respectable man who would say or who has stated that he refused to sit upon the Belleville Harbour Commission because Mr. George Wallbridge was a commissioner.

But, Sir, the exigencies of the party had to be served, and no matter what the qualifications of Mr. Wallbridge, and no matter what the considerations were for retaining him in office, he had to make way for supporters of the Liberal party and men who could use that position for the advantage of the Liberal party.

Mr. Hanley we are told resigned his position on the 10th of January, 1901, and nothing was done in regard to filling the vacancy until the 19th of April, 1901, when Mr. George Wallbridge was dismissed. This gave an opportunity of filling the board of commissioners with two appointees of the present government, and that was done on the same day that Mr. Wallbridge was dismissed. The one gentleman who was appointed to this position, T. S. Carman, is the editor and proprietor of the 'Belleville Ontario' newspaper, an organ known and recognized to be the organ of the Liberal party in that riding, a man who had had no experience and no training for the position; the other appointee, Mr. E. G. Sills, being a retired miller, a defeated candidate for the local legislature in the Liberal interests, and a man who has never been accused to my knowledge of having qualifications of filling any particular office.

But, Sir, in this manner the Liberal party obtained the control of the harbour commission of the city of Belleville, and if I am correctly informed—and I have my information from a source upon which I think I can safely rely—these two gentlemen since their appointment have entirely or in very large measure ignored the fact that the mayor of the city of Belleville, who happens all the time to be a Conservative, had a right to sit and act with them in the deliberations of that board, and I am told, Sir, that these two Liberals have undertaken to manage the affairs of the Belleville Harbour Commission without consulting the mayor of the city of Belleville and have refused to act upon the suggestion or initiative of the mayor.

That this change was brought about and is being used for political purposes there is the strongest possible evidence to my mind in the fact that just prior to the by-election held in the West Riding of Hastings in 1902, one of the commissioners appointed by this government, Mr. E. G. Sills, was desirous of obtaining the nomination of the Liberal party for that election, and he accordingly resigned his position upon the board and employed the ordinary or the extraordinary means usually employed by a Liberal to obtain such nomination, and during the time the by-election was pending, if I am correctly informed, another of the faithful in West Hastings in the person of Dr. Goldsmith was appointed to fill the vacancy. But, Sir, when Mr. Sills failed to obtain the nomination of the Liberal party for the by-election in West Hastings, the appointment of Dr. Goldsmith was cancelled and Mr. Sills was re-appointed to the position; and, Sir, since this question was put by me to the House, another nomination in the interests of the Liberal party has taken place in the West Riding of Hastings for the local legislature of Ontario for the coming election, and this same harbour commissioner, who has been appointed, resigned and been re-appointed, will be again resigning his position to enable him to fight out the cause of the Liberal party for the local legislature in West Hastings.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that these facts, which are uncontrovertible, show as clearly as the noon day sun that this commission has been appointed by the present government not in the interests of Belleville harbour but in the interests of the Liberal party of this country.

Large sums of money, as I have already stated, are expended from year to year in the improvement and maintenance of this harbour, and as a necessary consequence the commissioners who control the expenditure of these moneys employ large numbers of people who are residents of and they would take good care to see were voters of the West Riding of the county of Hastings, and a commissioner like Mr. Sills, who has been paying out these moneys to the voters from time to time, has a strong weapon placed in his hands when he starts in to canvas for an election either for the federal or the local House in the position that he has occupied. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this is a dangerous and a vicious principle—a principle that is not in the interests of this country, a practice that any government should be ashamed to recognize or have brought home to them in direct violation of the principle laid down by the premier; and in the face of these facts the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries should have hesitated a long time, and in fact should have absolutely refused to place upon the records of this House such an unwarranted answer as he has placed to the question which I have asked.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have occupied the attention of this House longer than I intended, and I want to say in conclusion that while I entirely disapprove of the manner in which the affairs of this country are managed by the Liberal party, while I denounce the principles of expenditure employed by this government, while I rejoice in the prosperity of this country in spite of the incompetence of the Liberal government, and while I abhor their systematic neglect of the opportunities presented for furthering the welfare of this country, I at the same time declare my unlimited belief in and adherence to the principles of the Liberal-Conservative party, which have always been the principles of progress in this country. Especially, Sir, do I give my adherence to the principles embodied in the resolution moved by the hon. leader of the opposition. I shall await with anxiety, but with perfect confidence, the decision of the people. I believe that when the great jury of this country have the opportunity to try this government upon the indictment of false pretenses and neglected opportunities, their verdict will be guilty and the punishment that will follow will be sure and swift.

Mr. A. S. KENDALL (Cape Breton). It will not be expected, Mr. Speaker, that I should follow the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Porter) through all the sinuosities of the arguments which he has just delivered. I will content myself with a brief reference to a few of the points he endeavoured to make. I think he said that the tariff of the Liberal party was practically the same as that of the late Conservative administration. Let me point out that when the Liberal party in 1893 laid down its platform, that platform was a tariff for revenue, and, if it contained any protection, that protection was only incidental to the main principle. The question now is whether or not the tariff of this government has fulfilled the expectations of the Liberal party, and is consistent with that platform. We have to-day convincing evidence that by the rearrangement of the tariff the treasury of the country has been filled to overflowing. Ever since the new tariff came into operation we have had an abundant revenue flowing into the treasury of the country, and not, as in former days, into the pockets of a certain class of the community. No doubt a number of gentlemen, who, under former conditions, used to look for a greater share of the taxation imposed on the people, to-day find in the present policy cause of complaint. They do not find to-day flowing into their pockets out of that taxation the large amount they formerly did.

I shall not detain the House at any length by reading manuscript or figures, but will ask the attention of the hon. gentlemen and the House to a few facts. On a number of articles we have made very considerable reduction in the duties, in the interests of the consuming people—not in the interests of the manufacturers, but of the consuming public generally, who, as the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) reminded us the other night, are in the majority of ten to one. Let me just draw attention to some of those reductions :

After listening to these figures, will the hon. gentlemen still assert that when the Liberal party came into power they did not change the tariff—and change it in some respects radically—for the benefit of the great consuming mass of the people ?

My hon. friend spoke of the development of the iron industry in New Glasgow under protection. I admit that that industry did develop, to a certain extent, in New Glasgow, under protection, but I would point out that the iron works to-day in Sydney and those in contemplation in North Sydney and Sydney Mines only came into existence because their operations were transferred from a situation where they could not be economically carried on to a situation where the raw materials are close together. Furthermore, I make the statement, on the authority of those men who have invested millions in the new iron industries, that they put their money into these works, not on account of the duty or of any prospects they might have for a market in Canada, but because the situation selected was one which gave them the opportunity to send their products to South Africa and South America and the Mediterranean and other European countries, and there find a sale at profitable rates in neceessary competition with the world. They say they that have invested their money in these works because, owing to the geographical advantages of the locality, the raw materials can be gathered close together, and it is on this basis alone that the iron interests in Cape Breton are being developed. Besides the iron industry in New Glasgow did not flourish under protection. We have printed evidence, prepared by the company that was operating there, to show what profits they were making, and we see by this evidence what wages were paid the labourers. And the business men in New Glasgow, without regard to political complexion, admit that the workingmen there, under the conditions that formerly prevailed, were not paid sufficiently. In fact, I have heard men say that it would have been better had the industry not existed than to have continued it under the conditions which formerly prevailed.

When about three years ago, the Finance Minister brought down his measure to extend the iron bounties, some hon. members on the Conservative side, who were disappointed with the results of the policy of protection to the iron industry, refused along with some hon. gentlemen on this side, to support the resolution of the Finance Minister. On the evening when he brought in his measure, Mr. Foster, the ex-Finance Minister, left his seat and walked out of the chamber, thus giving most practical evidence that he was not in accord with his own leader (Sir Charles Tupper) on that matter. These men believed that although iron is a prime necessity in this country, most necessary for the development of all her industries, yet it is necessarily a very expensive article to manufacture and to handle, that it is a heavy article and costs a great deal in the way of freight, and it appeared to them, as it did to many on this side, that the results of the former policy of protection had been so unsatisfactory that it would not be wise to continue it.

The hon. gentleman referred to some industries which are now hard pressed by the operation of the present tariff, and in so doing he seemed to me to contradict the early part of his speech. But what are those industries ? Up to this time I have heard no serious complaint except in the case of the woollen industries. This is a business about which I know very little, and consequently concerning which I shall not venture many remarks, but we had here a display of woollen goods some weeks ago, and one of the gentlemen interested told me that he had been engaged in the production of certain lines and found he could not do so profitably. He changed his machinery and went into the manufacture of blankets, a good solid article, and not only sold them to advantage in this market, but actually sent them to England. I am only acquainted with three small woollen factories in the maritime provinces. One of them is in New Brunswick, and it is operated by a friend of my own, Mr. Humphries, a most aggressive Conservative and a member of the local legislature. That gentleman is a strong believer in protection, but he frankly told me, if I remember well, that he had all the business he could do, but found it difficult to get sufficient wool in the locality to keep the mill in operation. In the county of Inverness, there is a small woollen factory. But it makes a high class of goods, and it is working as it probably never worked before. And I am sure that the gentleman who runs the factory told me he could not get the wool at home to do sufficient work to meet the demand for his product. The Oxford Woollen Mills in Cumberland county are well known. In spite of the United States tariff, large quantites of the products of that mill are sent across the border. Some are sent also to Great Britain, which is the home of woollen manufacturing. However, I would say, as many hon. gentlemen on this side have said, if there is any particular industry in Canada which is suffering, and concerning which it can be shown that we have reasonable ground for believing that it should be maintained, I, for one, would be disinclined, at this juncture to favour a reduction of the tariff. But I wish to say to the woollen manufacturers that, though they may be important in a local way, we must not forget that this is a cold country and an expensive country to live in. The English manufacturer and the English artisan have an advantage in the race over our manufacturers and our workmen. A less expensive house will shelter the English workman and his family than is required in our climate. The English workman requires less nitrogenous food, and less warm clothing. And as will be admitted, cheap living will provide a class of men willing to work at low wages. To my mind, it is extremely questionable whether, the facts being as they are, it is good policy to encourage the establishment of industries which have to come into competition with industries having command of the cheaper labour of England or Germany. We have opportunities to divert our labour into channels which will be remunerative without the aid of protection.

Now, the hon. gentleman referred to our relations, as regards tariffs, with the United States. If I were to follow my own feelings, I would say: Put up the tariff wall against them, as they have put it up against us.

Mr. EDWARDS. Against themselves.

Mr. KENDALL. And against themselves, as my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) says. But, speaking from a maritime province standpoint, I say that retaliation is to-day probably the worst thing that could happen to us. We are looking for extended markets. We want to send our coal, and also our fish into the American market. Furthermore, I would point out to the hon. gentlemen, that while retaliation may agree with our feelings it would probably be poor policy for Canada as a whole. I read an article not long ago, I think in the 'Morning Citizen' of this city, which to me, appeared very attractive. It pointed out that, by an imposition of a large duty on pulp wood and on paper, it could be arranged to draw the whole of the pulp and paper industry from the United States into Canada, and that industry would be worth here, probably $50,000,000 annually. I say that on the face of it that was an enticing proposition, and one which would well merit the sober attention of any government, provided there were not behind it serious difficulties. I have not the figures at hand, but I would like to point out generally that, during the last three or four years, the export of pulp wood from Canada has not increased with anything like the degree of rapidity that the export of pulp has increased. It is evident that the opportunities for the manufacture of pulp in this country are so great that, without tariffs or without any government meddling at all, pulp manufacture is goint to be established in this country on a large scale. But I wish to point out where the United States could strike us back, and that in a way that would make every hon. gentleman representing an Ontario constituency come to the government and demand that the duty on pulp wood be removed. There is no duty on hard coal. But supposing that, in a spirit of retaliation, the American government put a duty of a dollar or two a ton on hard coal imported into Ontario. And if you have no duty on your coke, yet you want great quantities of coke, and will need still larger quantities. The duty on slack coal, I think amounts to only three or four cents a ton. The American government could arrange so that every ton of coal should come into Ontario under an export duty of two or three dollars a ton. In my opinion those who suggest retaliation are not wise. And I would point out also, that, at this juncture the sober, level-headed men of the United States, not only of New England from Boston to New York, but many in Chicago, and many in our border cities are at work educating the people of the American Republic. And I think we see some signs that, perhaps in the not very remote future—I admit that we have to be patient for the time—there may be an opportunity for this country to establish better business relations with our neighbours to the south. I listened carefully to the speech of my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Bell). I always listen carefully to that hon. gentleman's speeches. They contain, as a rule, a great deal of good, sound material; and, even when his argument is, as I think, wrong, I admire the ingenuity of it. But, on this side, we are indebted to that hon. gentleman for several statements, statements of immense importance as coming from that side of the House. In the first place, if I understood him correctly, the hon. member for Pictou said, in effect, that, if his party came into power he would consider it injudicious to remove the preference. I think he must have given more attention to the business situation in England than most of the hon. gentlemen opposite have done. He made a statement to the effect that there was not the slightest doubt that free trade was the best policy for Great Britain. And, best or not best, he pointed out that the public men of that country, without regard to party affiliations, were almost a unit in favour of free trade, that, in fact, not a man over there with a reputation to jeopardize would venture to advocate a policy of protection. I think that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) must have given some attention to statements made by public men in Great Britain. Now, we have so often heard that Great Britain was only waiting for an opportunity to go back to the protective policy, that, at the risk of being tedious, I am going to read a page or two from statements made by leading public men of Great Britain. Mr. Chamberlain, speaking in 1896 of a proposal that a duty should be placed on certain imports from the colonies for the benefit of the colonies, said :

> It involves the imposition of a duty—it may be a small one, but it is a duty—upon food and upon raw material, and whatever may be the result of imposing such a duty the tendency is to increase the cost of living, which would intensify the pressure upon the working classes of this country, and it would also have a tendency to increase the cost of production, which would put us, of course, in a worse position than now in competition with foreign countries in neutral markets. . . . . The advatage offered is not enough to induce this country to take the certain loss and the possible risk which would be involved in revising altogether its present commercial policy . . . . The second point, which is much more important, is that our foreign trade is so gigantic in proportion to the foreign trade of the colonies that the burden of an arrangement of this kind would fall with much greater weight on the United Kingdom than upon our fellow subjects in the colonies. I think, therefore, we may very fairly ask them to better their offer.

Mr. KENDALL.

Lord Ripon, speaking later, said :

> A consideration of these practical difficulties and of the more immediate results above indicated, of a system of mutual tariff discrimination, has convinced Her Majesty's government that even if its consequences were confined to the limits of the empire, and even if it were not followed by changes of fiscal policy on the part of foreign powers unfavourable to this country, its general economic results would not be beneficial to the empire.

Lord Roseberry, speaking before the Manchester Chamber of Commerce in 1897, said :

> Of all the maddest things we have heard in our days, the re-enactment of the corn laws is the maddest we can possibly conceive. Free trade has preserved the empire.
> I believe an imperial customs union to be an impossibility, but supposing it were possible, it would be something which would place all the nations of the world in direct antagonism to it. It is something which, if possible, they would all continue to destroy.

I think the hon. member for Pictou must have given more attention to these statements of English public men than most hon. gentlemen on his side of the House, and he must realize that probably for years to come the people of Great Britain will refuse to jeopardize their commerce by any such ineffective arrangement as that of a preferential tariff, at least on the basis proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that in theory I am an out-and-out free trader. I will go as far as to say that I believe it would be in the interest of Canada and in the interest of many of the other colonies, and indirectly in the interest of the mother country, if a preferential tariff could be arranged provided we had free trade within the empire. But that is the only arrangement upon which the mother country will grant us a preference ; and it is an arrangement which the manufacturers of this country, either wisely or unwisely, will refuse.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman made another statement that I wish to refer to. In order to let himself down easily with his own friends, he stated that it was by the policy of protection that Great Britain had laid the foundation of her mercantile greatness. He made that statement, if I remember him correctly. Again I will ask the House to bear with me while I read some literature which I think the public men of this country should make themselves acquainted with. I want to show what kind of prosperity reigned in Great Britain as a result of her protective policy, and for that purpose I will read from Spencer Walpole's history of England :

> There are probably few persons who have not had occasion to study the records of the time, who have any notion of the misery into which the poor had fallen. A long apprenticeship had indeed inured them to suffering; but the misery which they endured in 1816 and 1833 was as nothing compared with the protracted wretchedness which commenced in 1837 and continued to 1842. In 1839, 1,137,000 persons were in receipt of relief in England and Wales alone; in 1840, the pauper roll contained 1,199,000; in 1841, 1,299,000; and in 1842, 1,429,000 persons. The population of England and Wales amounted at that time to about 16,000,000; so that one person out of every eleven in the country was a pauper. . . . Dead and living were crowded together in miserable dwellings. It is on record that in one case seventeen persons were found living in a room five yards square; that in another case eight persons, two looms and two beds were found in a cellar, six feet under ground, measuring four yards by five. An inquiry was made in 1841 into the condition of some 1,600 of the poor of Little Bolton. Out of the 1,600, twenty-three had no bed to sleep in; eight slept in the same bed; forty-two slept, seven in a bed, in six beds; seventy-eight slept, six in a bed, in thirteen beds; 185 slept, five in a bed, in thirty-seven beds; and 432 slept, four in a bed, in 108 beds. In Rochdale, at the same time, five-sixths of the population had scarcely a blanket among them: eighty-five families had no blanket, and forty-six families had chaff beds with no covering at all. In Paisley, 15,000 persons were in a state of starvation, with little or no clothing, and no bedding on which to lie.

Here follows a description, all of which I will not read, in order to spare the feelings of the House:

The miserable condition of the poor was, of course, due to their poverty; and poverty was not partial, it was catholic. . . . . 'I could tell you,' so ran a letter from Johnstone, 'of mothers dividing a farthing herring and a halfpennyworth of potatoes among a family of seven.' . . . . Girls, as well as boys, women, as well as men, worked under ground. The mines were usually ill-drained and ill-ventilated. The children had consequently often to work in the wet; they were kept at work in any atmosphere in which a candle would not burn. The smallest children were employed as trappers, or in opening the traps in the seams through which the coal laden carts passed. But women, boys, and girls were also engaged as hurriers, or in walking backwards and forwards pushing the carts themselves through the seams. Many of these seams were only twenty-two to twenty-eight inches high, so that none but small children could pass through them. In some cases the child was made to push the car; in other cases children, and even women, were made to draw it by the girdle and chain. The girdle was a band placed round the waist of the hurrier. The chain passed between the drawers legs, and chafed the wretched creature's thighs, as he or she drew the load. Little children of seven worked for twelve hours a day, harnessed like beasts by the girdle and chain; but, unlike the happier beasts of burden, subjected to the task before their growth was complete and their strength mature.

Sir, I think I have read enough to convince hon. gentlemen opposite, and any one may hear of this, that the great prosperity which is enjoyed by Great Britain was not based on protection. I now propose to read from a book called 'Ashworth, Cobden and the League.' I shall not read the solemn description of misery that prevailed throughout the length and breadth of England as it is pictured and I only ask hon. gentlemen opposite to go to the library and take this book of Ashworth and convince themselves that protection is the basis of England's greatness. I shall read a few of the concluding sentences which I have marked:

The correctness of the views entertained by the league, may be estimated by the variety and abundance of social and national advantages which have become apparent in every direction, as the result of the removal of restrictions upon our international trade. This may be said to amount to a practical extension of the area of our country. Our farmers, no longer affrighted by the cheap farming of foreigners, have embarked their capital, drained their land, improved their agricultual machinery, and thus the produce of the home land has been largely increased; meanwhile they have also increased the wages of their labourers; and it may be added, that although the population of the country has increased by about 17½ per cent since 1841——

This book was written away back in the sixties.

—the extent of pauperism has been diminished by upwards of 25 per cent during the same period.

The writer concludes:

The grand truth brought out and emphasized by free trade is, that it enables millions of people more to live in the home land, and to live with less exertion than they could do without it; that it stimulates intellect, improves machinery, and increases the produce of the land, the foundry, the machine shop and the loom, and by exchange of products helps us to utilize the prolific stores of the tropical and semi-tropical regions of the earth, and by extending our trading intercourse, to extend also at the same time our own measure of civilization.

Here follows a long list of the growing exports and imports of Great Britain and I will sincerely ask hon. gentlemen opposite when, again, in this House, or on the hustings they make the statement that it was due to protection that Great Britain developed her commerce, to look at this book and convince themselves, as they must be convinced, that the removal of the barriers to trade which existed in Great Britain gave her people more power over life, and free raw materials upon which to exert their industry.

Mr. Speaker, the government of which I am an humble supporter, is accused of making huge and unwarranted expenditures. I simply ask hon. gentlemen opposite to point out these huge expenditures, to itemize them. Last year and the year previous, when they were being voted upon, they refused to do so. Now, my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) made the statement the other night—and let me say that I always listen to that hon. gentleman's speeches with profound regard—that our government was doing nothing. I propose to show that our government is doing something. I wish to bring before the notice of the House a matter of great importance, and which, in view of what has occurred in the eastern part of Canada, is deserving of far greater attention than that which has been attached to it. This government was scarcely in power before it made an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. We all know that an arrangement had been made before that time for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, which I think hon. gentlemen opposite would be the first to admit did not adequately protect the settlers. By the arrangement which has resulted in the lowering of freight rates on outgoing and incoming materials, Manitoba and the North-west Territories gained $750,000 a year, or in the five years during which that arrangement has been in existence there has been a gain of $3,500,000, about equivalent to the government grant to the Crow's Nest Pass railway. That is something of importance, but, it is not nearly so important as the fact that in making the arrangement some 50,000 acres of coal lands, over which the government had no control previously, were taken over and held for the benefit of the people who may occupy that part of the country in the future. Furthermore, it was arranged that coal was to be put on board cars at a price not exceeding $2 a ton and carried over the Canadian Pacific Railway lines at figures to be decided on by the government. I point to that and I say that the generations of the future will point to that one act of this government as a most important act. Fuel in the North-west Territories, as every one knows, is one of the prime requisites of life, and I point to this matter as I shall refer to it in a later part of my remarks in connection with a condition existing in the maritime provinces of which this government must take cognizance. We are making some expenditures in the endeavour to get the grain of the North-west Territories to the seaboard, and these expenditures are being made, so far as possible, to produce a condition that will bring about competition. A railway is being constructed through the Rainy River district, from Winnipeg to Port Arthur. Large subsidies are being voted to construct a road from Winnipeg to Edmonton, and from there on to the Pacific coast. Will hon. gentlemen say that these expenditures must not be made? These are great and important votes. They are votes that cannot be ignored because the conditions are such, as hon. gentlemen from the west have frequently pointed out, that neither this government nor any other government can afford to ignore the demands on the public treasury for the development of that country from which we will reap such great benefits in the future. Let me say, as I come from the extreme east, that I always listen with sympathy and regard to the requests made by hon. members on both sides of the House who come from the west in respect to this important matter of transportation. It does not directly interest us, but any man who has been over that country and has seen its resources must realize, if he is at all acquainted with the conditions which prevail in the older provinces, that the situation in that vast western country is certainly the most promising one that we have in Canada to-day. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), of course, is one of the great sinners, and let me say, as one of the maritime province men, that I have to stand up and vote for him every time he asks for money with which to deepen the St. Lawrence river. In future Quebec is to be the great summer port of Canada; still, it is necessary that the depth of the channel from Quebec to Montreal shall be maintained at thirty feet. Coal from the maritime provinces is now being transported up the St. Lawrence in boats of two, three, four and five feet more draught than formerly. In 1897 or 1898, in twenty-four days, a time when the St. Lawrence was very low, twenty-three steamers went on the ground. You can understand why the hon. Minister of Public Works had to grapple with the situation. When he took office he found that the dredges were not sufficiently large for this work and he asked parliament to provide him with money. He has been provided perhaps fairly and liberally, although he claims that he has not been given sufficient. The object of his work is one that this government cannot ignore. The deepening of the St. Lawrence from Montreal to the seaboard is a matter of national importance as well as of local importance to a great many of us.

Furthermore, the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) has a project which I hope in the future to be able to support, namely, the scheme for the Ottawa and Georgian Bay canal. Of course we cannot fail to recognize that this is going to cost a great deal of money and that it will be a huge burden for the country to undertake, but it will be for us to consider whether the advantages which this canal will confer in the matter of cheaper transportation, may not outweigh the burdens which it will bring with it. I have been told that heavy freights cannot be carried on the railways at much less than one-half cent per ton per mile, and that on the other hand, heavy cargoes can be carried by water at from one-tenth of a cent to one-twentieth of a cent per ton per mile. From the standpoint of one who has the honour to represent a constituency in eastern Canada, I have also an interest in this Georgian Bay canal. I believe that if we have twenty feet draught in our canal system we will be able to send our coal through to the west, and we can get back what we need—and what perhaps we will need in the future more than we need now—several different kinds of iron ore which are to be found on the shores of the great lakes to carry on our great iron industry in Nova Scotia. For these reasons, this proposition appeals to me as an eastern man. It has its merit not only from the standpoint of the west, but also from the standpoint of eastern Canada. Of course, the interest which we in the east have in this scheme, will be almost infinitesimal compared with the interest it has for the western people. As to whether a company should construct this canal, or whether the government should construct it I have no very well defined view. I would prefer by long odds to see the government construct this canal, but if we can get a company to undertake to build it under conditions which are fair and which will maintain control over it by the government of this country, I sincerely hope that any further propositions along that line the government may see fit to consider carefully, and to accede to them if they be in the public interest.

The hon. gentleman from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) said that the present government was doing nothing. Let me point out briefly to him the history of this government in connection with the development of cold storage—not for fishermen which I am particularly interested in—but the development of the cold storage system for the benefit of the farmers of Canada. I say that there are two men who ought never to be forgotten by the farmers of Quebec and Ontario, and these men are Mr. Geo. Eulas Foster and Mr. Sydney Fisher. The farmers will have reason to remember these two gentlemen for different reasons. I wish to point out that so early as 1882 a good cold storage system was inaugurated between New Zealand, Australia, and London, and that system was developed up to 1893 and 1894, to a degree that placed the experiment beyond all peradventure of failure. When representations were made to Mr. Foster that a cold storage system was needed for Canada, he seemed, at least not to appreciate the immensity of the requirement. I believe I am speaking the truth when I say that it was with difficulty that a niggardly vote of $20,000 per year could be got with which to endeavour to initiate this business. I find however that for several years only $5,000 or $6,000 was expended out of that small appropriation. As I say, cold storage was no longer an experiment. It was an established fact for Australia, New Zealand, and Argentina, but Canadian public men of that day laid back, and failed to appreciate the crying needs of the country. The evidence of what I say is to be found in the votes for cold storage that this parliament was asked to pass up to the year 1896. But what happened after that? We put a farmer into the Department of Agriculture when the Liberal government came into power. Some hon. gentlemen say that he is a kid gloved farmer, but I have seen him stand up in this House to defend his department, and I think it has been sufficiently demonstrated that the present Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) is not only a scientific man but a practical man as well. He took office in 1896. He was not satisfied that the products of Ontario and Quebec were being dealt with to the best advantage for the farmers of these provinces. He at once asked parliament for a vote, not of $20,000; but the first year he was in office he asked parliament for a vote of $100,000 and every year since he got a vote of $100,000, and he expended these votes, and the result is that to-day we have a chain of cold storage extending from the Rocky Mountains into the markets of London, Manchester and Liverpool—a systm of cold storage inferior to none to be found elsewhere in the world. I would be doing an injustice, Sir, if I did not in this connection remember the services which have been rendered to this country by Prof. Robertson, who has enthusiastically directed his great technical knowledge and skill to the successful development and perfection of this system of cold storage. I repeat, that the farmers of Quebec and Ontario should never forget that the public records show that the Hon. Mr. Foster asked from parliament for three or four years the inadequate sum of $20,000 for the establishment of cold storage, and that when the present Minister of Agriculture, the Hon. Sydney Fisher, came to office, he at once grappled with the question and had $100,000 a year appropriated, which has been expended every year since then with the result that the farmers of this country to-day are enjoying a prosperity that they were strangers to before.

Now, Sir, I intend to deal at some length with the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, before the House rose for recess, I was endeavouring to persuade hon. gentlemen opposite that the conditions which have been arrived at in Great Britain since the inauguration of a free trade policy, are not based, as has been frequently said by hon. members on the other side of the House, on a prosperity that developed under a system of protection. I think I effectually showed, from the statements of different historians of the period, that never in the history of the British Islands had such a state of distress and degradation prevailed as that which prevailed from 1800 to 1845. I omitted to point out that the population of the British Islands, which at that time was about 16,000,000, has since grown to some 40,000,000, a population which has almost trebled itself in the short space of sixty years; to-day in Great Britain a degree of prosperity prevails which is not equalled in any other European country, unless possibly in France; and the shipping industries of the country, which at that time were considerable, have increased by leaps and bounds until to-day, there are, for every man, woman and child in the United Kingdom, from the King down to the youngest child in a foundling charity, 2½ tons of shipping. I think that is an evidence of very great expansion.

When referring to the development of the iron industry in Nova Scotia up to 1896, I omitted to point out—and I am informed by a man as well qualified as any other man in America to speak on this point—that every iron business inaugurated and built up under a system of high protective duties in the United States, which existed between the state of Maine and New York, had to leave the site on which it was built up, and move away west; that to-day there is nothing but a spot of rust to mark the former sites of those original iron industries which were developed under protection; that in fact the iron business of the United States has moved to the west, where coal, iron and lime lie in juxtaposition to be worked to the best advantage. And, I pointed out that the prosperity we hope to attain from the development of iron in the eastern part of Canada depends entirely upon that industry being placed at the point where it can be most advantageously worked.

Now, Sir, I hope I shall be permitted for a short time to refer to another project which was initiated by this government: that is, the provision of cold storage for fishermen. Up to this time the success which has attended that project has been gratifying; but we have not yet grappled with the problem in the way which in my opinion is required. We have in the maritime provinces a fishing industry which is worth annually anywhere from $13,000,000 to $15,000,000. We have engaged in this business a population of 45,000 or 47,000 fishermen and fishermen's sons, who represent a population of probably 200,000. In the old days, when people were content to work hard and live in a different way from what they expect to live in to-day, our fishing population showed an inclination to remain there. But unfortunately we have to admit that under the improved conditions of life that population in the eastern counties of Quebec, in the Magdalen Islands, and on the shores of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, shows an inclination to move away from the fishing industry, and, instead of going to the North-west and other parts of Canada to take up lands, they move to the United States. Now, this is a serious state of affairs for the whole of Canada, and particularly throughout the maritime provinces, and if there is any method available by which this can be stopped or diminished, I submit that this government is in duty bound to initiate a measure for that purpose. You are to-day engaged in a project to provide a system of cold storage for the shore fishermen. You have some 600 or 700 schooners fitted up for the deep sea fisheries, which lose on an average anywhere from three to six weeks out of the five months fishing season. You can understand that this means an enormous loss to the fishermen and to the maritime provinces. Now, I propose that the government should inaugurate another system for the deep sea fishermen. I propose that somewhere about Grand Manan, in the Bay of Fundy, or somewhere in the western part of Nova Scotia, in the Strait of Canso, and somewhere about Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands—at three or four of these places, large freezers should be erected, costing anywhere from $4,000 or $5,000 up to $15,000 or $20,000 each; and that these should be supplemented by two or three steamers built on the plan of Scotch trawlers, and fitted with refrigerators, to be used to collect bait, and to concentrate at these different points, where the bank fishermen could come and get bait. These steamers could also be used to distribute the bait to small freezers, of which we require some one or two hundred in the maritime provinces. It may be said that this would require a large amount of money. I admit that; but the industry is of such importance to us, from the standpoint of population, and it has such capabilities that I believe the government would be justified in making a very generous expenditure, say $150,000 or $200,000, to meet the requirements of this business.

Furthermore, I must point out that the government has in its custody some $5,000,000 known as the fishery award. For want of a better method to make this serve the fishermen, the government pays out the interest upon it in the shape of small bounties of from $3 to $4.50 to the owners of small fishing boats for shore fishing, and a certain amount per ton is given to the deep sea fishermen. Well, Sir, I think it requires no argument of mine to convince the government and the House that this method of appropriation, while it may be fairly good, could be improved upon; and if funds are short, it would not to any extent effect the bounty given to the fishermen, if a small amount of the capital were utilized to provide the facilities to which I have just referred. I am sure, from what we know of the development of this business on the shores of the maritime provinces, from what we know has taken place between New York and Gloucester, Boston and the Western States of America, we may with confidence look forward to results from a bold policy in regard to the fishing business which will be gratifying and of great benefit to the country.

I recollect, some three or four years ago, attending a banquet to the hon. Minister of Finance in New Glasgow, at which the Minister of Railways was also present; and in reply to a toast the Minister of Railways said that when he removed from the arena of New Brunswick politics to that of the House of Commons to take up the position of Minister of Railways, he felt, considering the conditions which had existed on the Intercolonial railway for several years before, that it would be possible for him to do something of service to the country in connection with that railway, and perhaps win some little distinction for himself. I take the ground that the policy inaugurated by the Minister of Railways has been a bold, aggressive, successful and effective one in the interests of the country. It will not take many more years to silence the criticisms on the purchase of the Drummond road and the consequent expenditure on the Intercolonial railway. In fact criticism on that measure is practicaly dead to-day. I do not think that there is an hon. gentleman on either side who will have the courage to stand up and criticise the action of the Minister of Railways when he abrogated the arrangements between the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. By this arrangement, which existed between the late government and the Canadian Pacific Railway, the agents of the Canadian Pacific Railway were given power to corral the whole of the business of the maritime provinces for their road. Even in the very offices of the Intercolonial railway, its officials were not allowed to solicit traffic for their own road. That arrangement the Minister of Railways abrogated. Is there an hon. gentleman in this House who has sufficient courrage to stand up and condemn the Minister of Railways for his action in that respect.

We have been told that we are doing nothing. But surely this act of the hon. minister was an aggressive and a bold act, particularly in view of the fact that in the last election in the constituency of St. John a determined effort was made to fight the minister to the death on that very issue. However, the result showed that when a man takes a bold stand on a great public issue the people of the country will stand by him. We are criticised for our expenditures on the Intercolonial Railway. I wish to say to the hon. gentleman opposite that the finality of the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway is not yet in sight, and some of us on this side are going to insist that much more generous appropriations be made to still further the interests of that line for the people of Canada. Before I am through to-night, I propose to show that the expenditures which have been made have already been so productive of good that the result gives the people of this country, who are enthusiastic believers in the state ownership of railways, good warrant for continuing their advocacy of that policy. I would ask the House to bear with me a short time while I read a few figures dealing with the history and development of that road.

I find that in the six years from 1880 to 1885 inclusive, the average annual expenditure was $1,243,281.62 on a mileage of 863, or an average expenditure per mile of $1,440.65. Taking the next period, from 1885 to 1896, eleven years—and this was the period during which the Intercolonial railway was starved—the average expenditure per year on capital account was $396,384 on a mileage of 1,057. Then taking the next period, from 1896 to 1901—a period of great development on the Intercolonial railway—I find that the capital expenditure only amounted to $1,381,924.80 per year on an average mileage of 1,250. In other words, the average annual expenditure per mile amounted to $1,113.54, between 1896 and 1901 against $1,440 a great many years before, and recollect that our expenditure was in the last period necessarily greater by long odds. Yet in spite of that, we did perform the service per mile at $327 less during the last four or five years than it cost hon. gentlemen opposite to perform it.

Let us look at the average working expenses, and let me again bring to the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite that a saving was affected during the last few years of the Conservative regime. But how was it affected? By reduced wages, by an inferior train service, and by the fact that possibly there was not sufficient business to keep the train hands busy. In 1896-97, only the regular hands were constantly employed, and the train hands engaged for the special were from one-quarter to one-half their time idle. From 1882 to 1886, the average working expenses amounted to $2,382,243 on an average mileage of 891, making $2,674 per mile. From 1887 to 1891 the average working expenses had increased to $3,351,343 or $3,372 per mile, and from 1892 to 1896 the expenses had fallen to $3,083,219 or thereabouts, and the operating expenses of the road were reduced from $3,372 to $2,700 per mile. That was done by the Conservatives, but how was it accounted for? By a reduction of wages, by inferior train service, and by the fact that there was not sufficient business to keep the railway employees constantly at work. Last year we had a large deficit on the road. How do you account for this? In 1896 the money paid for fuel on the Intercolonial railway amounted to $408,861 against $973,268 in 1901, or the coal purchased for the Intercolonial Railway in 1901 cost more than twice as much as it did in 1896. But I shall deal with that matter a little later. So much for fuel. I am dealing now with the three items of fuel, the wages paid to the employees, and the repairs made on the road, and to these three I would call special attention. That is, coal in 1901 cost a great deal more than twice as much as it did in 1896. Now, for repairs, I shall compare the two years 1896 and 1901:

Intercolonial Railway—comparison of cost of repairs, 1896 and 1901.

Repairs to engines, tenders and tools	$230,257	$413,127
Repairs to passenger cars	65,534	128,222
Repairs to postal, express and baggage cars	19,133	31,493
Repairs to freight cars and vans	205,191	326,075
Repairs to rails and fastenings including ties	54,041	78,659
For ties	87,920	123,997
Timber, lumber, etc., for repairs to bridges and snow-fences	82,551	97,973
Repairs to buildings, platforms, including extensions and additions	62,272	100,081
Repairs to tools	8,245	22,374
Total for repairs	815,044	1,322,001

Mr. TAYLOR. That is economy with a vengeance.

Mr. KENDALL. Sometimes, generous expenditure is the wisest economy, as I think I shall show. Now, we come to the question of wages, and for this comparison I will take three years :

Intercolonial Railway—comparison of wages for 1891, 1896 and 1901.

——	1901.	1896.	1891.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Wages of drivers, firemen and cleaners	468,734 14	264,604 16	274,281 45
Wages of conductors, train, baggage and brakesmen	452,385 55	255,412 68	259,940 94
Wages in repairing roadway, fences, semaphores, and laying new sidings	612,571 94	353,687 70	396,937 65
Station masters, agents, clerks, telegraph operators, station baggagemasters, yard masters, switchmen and labourers	506,866 40	303,796 20	297,226 60

It will be noticed that during the five years before 1891, the wages for drivers, firemen and cleaners amounted to considerably more than in 1896 itself. Hon. gentlemen opposite who were then in power were curtailing expenses in that year, with results that we shall see later on. The wages I have given do not include salaries paid to general manager, manager, traffic manager, district superintendents and all high-priced officials. It will be seen that there was an increase in 1901 over 1896 of the total wages as I have just given them of $863,000. Now, let me recapitulate these increases in 1901 as compared with 1896 :

Increase for coal	$564,407
" for wages	863,057
Repairs	506,957
Grand total of increases in expenses of 1901 over 1896	$1,934,421

I have a note to the effect that there was an increase of labour of about 70 per cent, and the receipts show also an increase of about 70 per cent in 1901 as against 1896.

Now, the freight carried in 1895-6 was 1,379,618 tons, and in 1901 the freight carried was 2,111,310 tons, or an increase of 731,962 tons. The number of passengers in 1896 was 1,471,866, and in 1901, 2,025,296, or an increase of more than half a million passengers carried on the Intercolonial Railway in 1901 over the number carried in 1896. Now, hon. gentlemen opposite talk about increased working expenses. Is it reasonable to suppose that this huge addition to the business of the Intercolonial Railway could be made without a corresponding increase in cost ? And let me remind hon. gentlemen opposite—and I do not wish to criticise the former minister too harshly—that possibly, in a legitimate desire to curtail the expenses of the Intercolonial Railway during a period of depression from 1891 to 1896, the hon. gentleman went too far and starved the road to a condition that made it more expensive than it otherwise would have been to bring it up to the condition that the trade of the country required in 1901. Now, let us look at the revenue :—

Earnings from passenger traffic	971,426	1,607,166	635,740
Freight traffic	1,788,813	3,121,006	1,332,193
Mails and express freight	197,400	244,062	46,662
Totals	2,957,639	4,972,234	2,014,595
	$ cts.	$ cts.
Earnings per mile of railway	2,589 00	3,782 00
Earnings per train mile	76 97	79 39

Earnings per mile of railway in 1891, $2,721.

Now let us compare the gross earnings of the Intercolonial Railway at different periods with the capital employed at different periods :

	Average Yearly Capital.	Average Gross Yearly Earnings.	Rate per cent on Average Capital.
	$	$
1887-91, inclusive..	50,927,597	2,920,278	5·73
1892-96 " ..	55,680,771	2,979,362	5·35
1897-01 " ..	59,391,990	3,849,267	6·48
1900-01 " ..	63,975,000	4,972,000	7·77

In 1892-96 was the period when the expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for different reasons were curtailed. Now it will be observed that in the years of the reduction of expenses from 1891 to 1896, the percentage of gross earnings on capital employed fell from 5·73 to 5·33, and that percentage rose in 1897-01 to 6·48, and in the last year, as I have stated, to 7·77.

Let us compare the average deficits for several terms of years. The average deficit since the opening of the road in 1876 has been $207,478. The average deficit from 1876 to 1896 was $230,608. The average deficit of $267,461, extending over a period of 10 years (1887-96), was reduced by 57 per cent during the past five years.

Now, in the face of these figures I venture to reassert what I said a few moments ago, that the railway policy of the present administration has been bold, aggressive, and, as I said before, effective in the best interests of the country. I may also say for the information of the leader of the opposition who was not in his seat when I made the remark before, that I consider that the end of the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway is not yet in sight, that we want large sums of money for still further development. I think before long we may expect that a fast line of steamers will leave some British port for some port on the St. Lawrence, and that on the way to the St. Lawrence this fast line of steamers will probably call at North Sydney. But I want to point out that before the fast Atlantic service can be made effective for the rapid delivery of passengers and mails, a very considerable expense will have yet to be made on the Intercolonial Railway, and this expense will be as justifiable as most of the expenditures made during the previous years. I wish to point out that one of the difficulties on the Intercolonial Railway is a very heavy grade between Truro and Amherst, that is what is known as the Folly River Mountain. That grade will probably have to be avoided, and for that purpose a line of railway will have to be constructed from Amherst to Pugwash, which is now one of the termini of the short line. Furthermore, this road will have to be carried across the harbour of Pictou, a bridge will have to be built there, and then the road may be connected with the present road a little way outside of Pictou Landing. Furthermore, it is impossible economically to convey heavy loads of freight from Cape Breton West for the reason that soon after leaving the Strait of Canso a mountain has to be climbed. This will have to be avoided, and I have no doubt at considerable expense, by sending the road around the gulf shore to the Strait of Canso.

Now, Sir, I come to a matter of considerable magnitude, a matter which cannot be much longer disregarded and that is the necessity of buildng a bridge across the Strait of Canso. Before the fast Atlantic line can be made effective we shall have to have these improvements made at the points on the Intercolonial Railway that I have indicated, and furthermore we must have a bridge across the Strait of Canso. I propose now to show to the House that large expenditures on the eastern end of the Intercolonial are not only justifiable but are demanded in the interests of the road and in the interest of the country. Sir, what is the situation ? You have a great coal business developing in Great Britain, and with unlimited possibilities. You have heard the story of the development of the Dominion Coal Company ; and I now tell you that Mackenzie & Mann, on the Inverness side of Cape Breton, have got a property which probably within a very few years will rival that of the Dominion Coal Company. It is with some satisfaction that I refer to the coal trade of this country, in the light of recent events.

I was the first public man in the eastern part of Nova Scotia who had the courage to stand up before an audience of miners and tell them that the future of the coal business did not depend on protection. It was a venturesome thing to do and the first time I did it, I was snowed under—I expected to be anyway. In 1891, when I never expected to be a politician (and I never wished to be), at a great meeting in Louisbourg, before there was a coal trade there, before there were facilities for shipping coal, before our coal was going to the United States, to South America and the Mediterranean, I met the champion of the coal trade in eastern Nova Scotia, the gentleman who is now Senator McKeen. I was a mere boy in politics then. I well remember the ridicule he poured upon me when I said the day would come when the great coal measures of Cape Breton, which had been placed there by the Almighty for the use of the people all along the coasts of the Atlantic, would be supplying coal for the markets of the world. It was his game to tell the people that the whole of the coal business depended on protection. I could not blame the people if they disbelieved me. Mr. McKeen was supposed to know all about it. The hon. member for West Prince (Mr. Hackett) was good enough to refer to the connection which Prince Edward Island has with the coal trade of Cape Breton. I am glad to see this because it shows that persons in different parts of the maritime provinces are looking at the relationship which exists between the different provinces of the country. I remember that he stated what I have so often heard on the hustings in Cape Breton that the development of this trade is due to the national policy. I would tell him now, if he were here, that I will agree with him that in 1878, 1879 and in 1880 the imposition of the coal duty was a benefit to the coal trade of Nova Scotia, but that coincident with the imposition of that duty on coal was a rapid lowering of freight rates from the fact that the old fashioned sailing vessels which required anywhere from $2.50 to $3.50 per ton to convey coal from Cape Breton to Montreal, were displaced by steamers, which in turn, were displaced by more modern steamers, and there came a more rapid lowering of the freight rates from $3.50 to $3, from $3 to $2, to $1.25 to $1 and on until they got down, in 1897, to 85 cents, or 90 cents a ton. I would like to ask the hon. member for West Prince : If the duty was of such great value to us, what would he consider to be the value of the reduction in freight rates to the extent of from $1 to $2 per ton ? Now, Sir, I may be taunted with the reply that the party I support has not taken the duty off coal. I will not agree to the removal of duty from coal to any greater extent than at present. I hold that for every dollar's worth of coal that we sell as the result of protection we lose anywhere from $2, $3 as the result of the system of protection, but, I am going to insist as long as I am in this House and as long as the tariff is framed as it is framed on having that duty maintained in order that Ontario may pay a fair share of the public revenues, because we are compelled by our situation down there and by the situation that the tariff creates to take enormous quantities of the products of Ontario on which we have to pay large taxes. That is our situation.

Mr. TAYLOR. What taxes do you pay on produce from Ontario ?

Mr. KENDALL. We pay on all your agricultural machinery, pianos, organs, sewing machines, milling machinery and carriages. Everything you produce goes down there, the trains are loaded with your products and you take nothing back.

Mr. TAYLOR. You pay no taxes on that all the same.

Mr. KENDALL. We pay taxes into the pockets of the manufacturers.

Mr. ROSAMOND. Nonsense, nonsense.

Mr. KENDALL. But I have digressed. I say it is some gratification, as being the first public man who took that stand, to find Mr. James Ross, the leading director of the Dominion Coal Company, a few weeks ago give an interview to one of the Montreal papers, in which he said : My assistant manager has just returned from the Mediterranean, where he has found markets for our coal. I well recollect the ridicule I had to submit to from the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite, when I said that our coal would go into the Mediterranean. I also recollect having my own political friends pull me down and say : For God's sake do not make our party ridiculous. It is with some gratification that I point to the fact that the leading man in connection with the Dominion Coal Company made the statement that his assistant manager has just returned from the Mediterranean and that he had found markets not only for their own surplus coal, but, markets for the other collieries in Nova Scotia for all the coal they had to send. Now, I come to another matter and as I think it is somewhat important, I would ask hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to give it their earnest attention. We have had a great development of the coal business. We are glad of it. We have endeavoured to make the conditions under which these large companies operate as generous as possible, consistent with the public good, but before I go into this question, I wish to point out that the Liberal party in Nova Scotia, of which the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) was at the time leader, was charged with having created a coal monopoly. There is no monopoly. Right across the water the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company have purchased the property of the General Mining Association and instead of being content with an output of 250,000 tons a year they have an output of 300,000 tons, they are making preparations for an output of 600,000 tons and they will probably before long, have an output of nearly a million tons. Other coal companies in Nova Scotia are operating coal mines. There is no monopoly, and here I wish to point out and I am going to deal with a serious condition, but, I wish to point out before doing so, that this monopoly which the Liberals were said to have brought into existence is selling its coal cheaper than the other companies.

Now, we are confronted with a serious condition. We have a coal business in the maritime provinces which is one of the most strongly placed industries we have in Canada. Sir, this business is getting too strong. The coal producers in Nova Scotia are taxing all the people from Montreal down to Halifax and Cape Breton, a great deal too much for coal. They are taxing the Intercolonial Railway too much for coal; they are taxing the Intercolonial Railway to an extent that will surprise you when I mention the figures. I say that on the Intercolonial Railway last year we paid at least $300,000 too much for coal—an amount which would this year wipe out the whole of the deficit and leave a large amount to the credit of that road. And, Sir, the serious feature of the thing is that we have got to be thankful to these coal companies that they have not charged us at least 50 cents or 75 cents more per ton. It is in their power to do so. They are within their rights in their charges. I do not quarrel with them on that score. But, a certain condition of things has arisen. These coal producers are the masters of the situation; they are the masters of a natural monopoly, and by combining they can dictate terms to every consumer of coal, including the government, from Cape Breton down to Montreal.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is to be done about this ? Every factory, every railway, every householder, is paying too much for coal, and what are you going to do about it ? The coal companies are within their rights.

An hon. MEMBER. Take the duty off.

Mr. KENDALL. Taking the duty off will not help it, because coal from England or from the United States cannot get into that territory. I defy refutation of that statement. Then what is to be done about it ? A condition like this is not entirely new in the history of the world. To-day I pointed out that in British Columbia, when the government was making its arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway, as one of the concessions required in return for the sum of $3,800,000 given to that railroad, the government took over some 50,000 acres of coal land and stipulated that when the coal was mined it should be put on board the cars at a price not exceeding $2 a ton, and should be carried to the North-west at rates to be decided upon by the government. I referred to that this afternoon in connection with what was in my mind with regard to the Nova Scotia situation. What is to be done ? The government, as I have shown, has to a certain extent dealt with a similar situation in the North-west. A few years ago in New Zealand, the premier of that colony was confronted with a similar condition. Manufacturers came to him and said : The coal producers of New Zealand are charging a price for coal that absorbs the profits of our business; we have some thousands of people employed; the situation must be met; we have got to get coal cheaper or the government of New Zealand must take upon itself to support the thousands of operatives whom we must throw out of employment. Mr. Seddon was the premier of New Zealand at that time. I do not suppose that he acted in a hurry. There is no doubt he thought the matter over and talked it over. When the crisis came he went to his telephone and called up the leading coal operators and said in effect: I am not going to have 6,000 or 8,000 operatives of factories thrown on the hands of the government for support while you destroy the business of the manufacturers for the benefit of your coal trade; your coal trade is making too much money; you have got the opportunity and you are taking advantage of it: the industries of the country are suffering; we have a government meeting to-morrow at twelve o'clock and I give you until twelve o'clock to-morrow to say whether or not you will supply the manufacturers of this part of New Zealand with coal at such a figure, and if you will not do so, the government will telegraph to England to get out mining machinery and will mine the coal itself.

Now, Sir, there is the situation that I believe the government of Canada has to face. Recollect that the coal companies are within their rights; they can charge us nearly what they like. There is plenty more coal to be developed there but if small operators go there to develop coal mines the large operators will absorb them or put them out of business. Let a Montreal or a Quebec coal dealer undertake to bring coal to any considerable extent from England or Wales, and what would be done ? The coal companies in Cape Breton and Nova Scotia will at once lower the price of coal and teach these men a lesson that they will not want to read again. They can undersell them to almost any extent they wish.

I say, Sir, that the time has come, or the the time has pretty nearly come when that situation which interests some three millions of people from Montreal to the sea board, must be met, and particularly so, as the government of this country is a large purchaser of coal, and will be a larger purchaser in the future than at present. Now, Mr. Speaker I shall make a statement to the House on the strength of two of the best mining engineers of Nova Scotia, one of whom has mined millions of tons of coal. I say on the strength of the statement of these engineers : That to-day, whereas in Cape Breton you are paying $2.70, $2.80 and $2.90 per ton for coal ; the government could mine that coal and put it on its cars for $1 per ton. I say, that in Pictou on the main land, where you pay anywhere from $3.00 to $3.25 per ton ; on the statement of two of the best mining engineers of Nova Scotia, men of large experience—I could give the names in confidence to the hon. leader of the opposition but I do not wish to make them public—on the strength of the experience of these men, I say that this government could in Cumberland and in Pictou put coal on board the cars at $1.25 per ton, for which it is now paying $3 and $3.50 per ton. That would mean a saving of $600,000 or $700,000 a year on the purchases of coal by this government. Is that a small item ? When we were confronted with deficits on the Intercolonial Railway, and when the tax payers of Canada are told by the hon. gentlemen opposite, and perhaps by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House : That the Intercolonial Railway should be made to pay ; and when with honest efforts to make it pay the result has been that we have during the last few years an average deficit of $114,000 a year—although I am happy to say that notwithstanding the high price of coal during this current year there is a possibility that the Intercolonial Railway will come out on the 30th of June next without very much of a deficit—I say that when this very large sum can be saved to the people of Canada on the purchase of coal alone, is it not a matter for us to consider? It would be not only a saving of $600,000 or $700,000 a year to the government, but on the basis of the present purchases of coal it would mean a saving of anywhere from $1,000,000 to $1,500,000 to the factories, the other railways, and the householders from Montreal east who purchased this coal. Of course in the near future, with the larger purchases of coal, that saving would be greatly increased.

Now Sir, there is one weak point in what I have stated, I would not advise the government to go into the mining of coal unless the miners of Nova Scotia were willing to make a compact with the government. I wish to tell the hon. gentlemen opposite who are not acquainted with the men who operate the mines in Nova Scotia, something about these Nova Scotia miners so that there may be no misgivings on this point. It is admitted by persons who have travelled over the collieries of Europe and of America, that the Nova Scotia miners are probably the best class of any miners in the world. What is the history of coal mining in that province? Labour there has been organized and highly organized. The mining labour there does not consist of numbers of unorganized men. They are a strong organized body, probably the best organized body of labourers in Canada. They are not like the shifting mining populations of the western states. They are a class of men who are citizens, who own property and have a stake in the country, who are zealous to maintain their churches and schools. And just here let me interject the remark that with all the development that has taken place there, I am a little apprehensive. I would prefer not to see too rapid a development. The danger of a too rapid development is that we may have to draft into our mining population large hordes of men from outside, who will not assimilate with our people, whose aspirations and whose civilization are not the same. Therefore, I am a little apprehensive on this point, and the mining population are a little apprehensive. They are also beginning to see that the ambitions of the capitalists are factors which they may have to fight in the future as they have never had to do in the past, and they want to be left in a position to meet that situation.

I say the miners of Nova Scotia will not be content to have their normal aspirations as citizens crushed out. I do not know whether the miners will agree with this or not; but I say that if the government should go and put a fair proposition before the miners, they will at least consider it. I believe the government will be in a position to put a proposition before them that will be attractive; and if an agreement is made, these miners will stand to it. Let me tell you that in spite of our strong organization in the county of Cape Breton we have not had a strike for 16 years. In Cumberland and Pictou there have been several strikes; but they were due largely to the fact, I am sorry to say, that the managers were probably more unreasonable than the men, for I have heard the statement made by those well qualified to judge that if the same managers who operated the Cape Breton collieries had been in charge of the mines in other parts of the province, many of these disturbances would probably never have taken place.

Now, Sir, there are certain features which I believe can be attached to a policy of governmental mining of coal that will be attractive. You are aware that in other countries, particularly in New Zealand, Great Britain, Belgium and Switzerland there is a movement on foot for the betterment for the condition of labour. I say if the government undertook to secure to the mining population fair wages, compensation for injury and death, and old age pensions—and it would only cost a few cents per ton on the coal to initiate these measures—and if we could guarantee that the present position of the miners as regards their comfort and independence would not be disturbed, I believe it would be possible for this government to make a working arrangement down there that would be highly profitable to all concerned.

My proposition would be that an independent commission should be formed to work these mines. There are numbers of properties which can be expropriated, and a number which can be obtained without expropriating, sufficient to furnish the coal required by the government in the eastern part of Canada for the next hundred years. I believe this proposition would find favour in the minds of the people, who feel that the situation as regards the high price of bituminous coal is becoming intolerable, and I suggest to the government that they investigate this proposition. I do not ask for any hurried action; but I ask that they go over the ground to see that the coal is available, to consult with labour organizations of the country, and to see if some arrangement cannot be made whereby the existing evil may be overcome. These great coal companies will sell coal to-day in the city of Portland at a far lower price than they will to me, who lives within ten miles of the place where the coal is produced. It is true, they may sell there 5,000 tons and to me only one or two tons, yet the difference in the price is so great as to constitute a burden for which if possible a remedy should be found.

Allow me to come back to the question of bridging the Straits of Canso. I believe that this question has been investigated by an engineer (Mr. Donkin) who has a reputation as wide as Canada, and who holds that the structure can be built for about $4,000,000. I know that when I speak of more millions in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, people are apt to stop for breath, but, Sir, the situation that is developing there is one that will warrant the country in making further large expenditures. I pointed out just now that Messrs. Mackenzie & Mann are developing a great coal property. Other properties are developing. The Dominion Coal Company will greatly develop. The Nova Scotia Steel Company is developing not only its steel plant, but also its coal beds. I made a prophecy a few years ago that our coal would go to the Mediterranean, and I think I will venture another prophecy to-night ; that is that where to-day we mine about 3,500,000 tons of coal on the Island of Cape Breton, before the end of another ten years will mine 10,000,000. To this add the development of the iron industry.

There are other public works in the county of Cape Breton and in connection with the Intercolonial Railway to which I must ask the consideration of the Minister of Railways. I said not long ago that we expected before very long to have a fast Atlantic steamship service, and that the point at which the steamers will meet the Intercolonial Railway in Cape Breton will probably be North Sydney. The present accommodation at North Sydney is not sufficient for the present business, and I want to point out this again in justification of many of the acts of the Minister of Railways. In the autumn of 1897, when the Minister of Railways visited the town of North Sydney, he found that the railway had not been extended down to the water. The Messrs. Reid had completed their railway across the island of Newfoundland, and it was necessary in the public interest that a considerable amount of money should be expended in connection with the steamship service and the railway of Messrs. Reid, in Newfoundland. An extension was made which for a short time met or nearly met the requirements of business ; but to-day the business between the Intercolonial Railway and the Reid system of railways has grown to such an extent, that the present facilities providede by the Minister of Railways are entirely insufficient to meet the requirements of the trade, and I am going to urge upon him to make very considerable appropriations in order that the wharf at the end of the Intercolonial Railway may be made wider and longer, and that the water about it may be dredged, so that we may be in a position to acommodate any vessel of any size that is likely to come there. The Intercolonial Railway will be crippled if some appropriations are not made for providing increased facilities, particularly for the eastern end of the road. I wish to point out that that part of the road between St. John and Truro and Halifax and the Sydneys is the part that pays the best, that the expenditures made on it up to this time have been justified by the results, and that still more expenditure is required in order to get still better results. I should also say here that the Webb syndicate are building a railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisbourg, which will open up a valuable piece of country, and in its connections will certainly develop a considerable amount of trade. What its future connections may be is, of course, a matter of conjecture at present.

I have spoken at some length appreciably of the Intercolonial Railway. There is another matter to which I would draw the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals and concerning which I cannot congratulate myself, as a representative of the county, or him as a minister. I have pointed out that the amount of money expended on that road has greatly increased. I have to admit in the hon. minister's favour that the rate of wages to a great many people employed on the track has been increased, but I believe that no industry ought to exist, in this or any other country, which cannot stand on its own bottom and pay its employees sufficient wages to keep them and their families according to the requirements of our civilization. That is a proposition which the people will endorse. I say that there are three classes of labourers on the Intercolonial Railway, the trackmen, the mechanics and the freight handlers, who are altogether inadequately paid. The condition of some of these men in large places like Halifax, Truro, and Sydney is simply pitiable. Everybody knows that no man with a wife and family of three or four children can live decently, where he has to pay a rent of from $10 to $12 a month, on a wage of $1.25 to $1.30 per day, and I shall have in a few days, I hope, the pleasure of supporting the resolution of my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) that in the opinion of this House, the time has come when at least nothing under $1.50 per day shall be paid to the workingmen on the Intercolonial Railway. I cannot too strongly emphasize my discontent with the conditions of many of the labouring men along that road.

There is another matter on which I may speak a few moments without wearying the House, as it is one of very great importance to the larger part of our population, the labour element, the hon. members on both sides may as well recognize that this is a question which will not down, and that the movements on foot in other countries are to-day getting a start in Canada. This question, Sir, has got to be dealt with. I congratulate the hon. Minister of Labour on what he has done. He has done considerable in the interests of labour, and I am happy to know that he has measures yet in contemplation which he proposes to put on the statutes for the benefit of our labouring men. Not long ago a deputation from the Trades and Labour Council of Canada waited on the government. By the courtesy of one of its members I happened to be present, and I think that the members of the government who were there must have been convinced that from British Columbia to Nova Scotia there is a deep-seated conviction in the labour element of the country that labour does not get a fair share of the profits of industry. I think that that point was emphasized, and I take the ground that while we cannot initiate some measures in the interests of labour in this parliament, and that while many such measures must be introduced in the local legislatures, the government of Canada, so far as it is an employer of labour, should be a model employer of labour. I think that that is a proposition which no one, when he goes before the people, will venture to contradict. Some of you may recollect that last session I requested the government to collect during recess from other countries measures that have been there adopted for the benefit of labouring men. The late Mr. Harper was engaged in collecting this information when he came to his death by drowning, and shortly before his untimely demise he intimated to me that he had collected a considerable amount of information on this matter, and told me where I could find the balance, and I am indeed indebted to him for having secured the amount of information I have now in my possession. My hon. friend from Cumberland, as you are aware, Sir, has on the Order paper a notice of motion with regard to rates of wages on the Intercolonial Railway, and I have also a resolution on that paper asking that the government recognize that the time has come when the provisions of the British Workmen's Compensation Act should be made available for the labourers of this country. I quite recognize that this is a very radical measure. Lord Salisbury put it through in 1897, at the instance of Mr. Chamberlain, and shortly afterwards one of Lord Salisbury's supporters resigned his position in the House, and wrote a pamphlet against him entitled 'Conservative or Socialist, Which ?' I saw that in 1898. I got a copy of that measure and showed it to the premier of Nova Scotia in 1898 ; and the following year, when he visited Great Britain, he inquired into its working with the result that he came back convinced that the Act was a workable one, and introduced in Nova Scotia what is known as the Employer's Liability Act, which contains many of the provisions of the Employer's Liability Act of Ontario, with those of the Workmen's Compensation Act of England grafted on it. I take the ground that what is not too good for the British workingmen is not at all too good for his Canadian fellow-labourer, and if this Act has been found workable and beneficial in England, it is a fair proposition for the government to put it on our statute-books for the benefit of its employees.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer very briefly. The Dominion Iron and Steel Company, of Sydney, is, in a certain sense, a child of the government. It receives a large bounty from the government. It has received concessions from the town of Sydney, from the legislature of Nova Scotia and from this government. The country is making an investment in that business, an investment which will probably meet the initial losses which are always incident to the inauguration of a new industry. Sir, I say that business is to a certain extent the child of the government ; and I take the ground that when this parliament bonused that institution and several other similar institutions, it supposed that Canadian labour would not be discriminated against at least. Our workmen down in Nova Scotia—and we have also a number from other provinces—are not narrow-minded men. They recognize that a large amount of skilled labour had to be brought in from the United States in order to operate that plant. No exception is taken to that. And, Sir, I am not one who would deny to a man from the United States a day's work in Cape Breton or anywhere in Canada ; and, if he came over and, as a good citizen was ready to cast in his lot with us, we would do everything we could to help him. But I do not want to see men brought in here if they are going to displace our own men, particularly when the taxes of those men are drawn upon to pay bonuses to these companies. I think that is a fair proposition. I do not wish to be harsh, but I will say that the spirit of the Alien Labour Law has been impudently violated by that company. I say that Canadians have been discriminated against ; I say that men have been brought in here who are not required. I admit that a great many men were brought in who were required. Many of them are able, capable men, and their services will be of value in assisting our development. But I emphatically protest against discriminations against our workmen. To my knowledge, capable men who were occupying similar positions to those filled by friends of the managers are being paid only 50 or 60 or 70 per cent as much as men brought from the United States.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. For the same work ?

Mr. KENDALL. Doing the same work. If I hesitate, it is because I wish to be a little careful, for I feel inclined to say, perhaps, a little more than I will say. I shall reserve anything further for a later day, because I have been promised by certain directors in that company that the state of affairs will be improved. But I wish to point out to the directors of the Steel Company and the Coal Company, that they and the great banking institutions have made a great investment in Cape Breton in coal and iron, and it will pay them to make an investment in the good feeling of the country. I wish to say—and I feel a little restraint in making this remark—that a document was put into my hands not very long ago issued by the company to the workmen under twenty-one years of age, intimating to these young men that if they did not sign away their rights under the Employer's Liability Act of Nova Scotia, which I have just spoken of, they could consider themselves dismissed. Sir, I say that that is an arbitrary act, that is an act that can only be characterized as an act of oppression. And what I now say I say with deliberation, having thought it out, and I am prepared to take the responsibility of it—that, if the great Napoleons of capital of this country undertake to crush out the legitimate aspirations of our labouring population, if they ignore and violate the regulations and laws of the country which are the offspring of civilization, if I may say so, then I hope to live to see the time when such tyranny will bring to its perpetrators the retribution that tyranny has frequently brought to its perpetrators in the past—I hope to live to see the day when men who make war on humanity will be outlawed. Now, Sir, having made this statement I wish to say again to the investing public: We have a strongly organized labour in Cape Breton, perhaps the most strongly organized in Canada, but I point to the record of that labour element. It is an element that can be relied upon. For sixteen years in the great collieries in the southern part of Cape Breton, we have not had a strike. I say that that is the best security that investors in Cape Breton can have. That is an asset which investors should not undervalue; and again I say that the great operators, the great manipulators of capital in placing investments there should see to it that they make an investment in the good-will of the people. I wish to say to them still further that a policy of antagonism to the legitimate aspirations of labour will be fatal, and I sincerely hope that a wise policy will prevail on the part of those who come to develop that country, as it will be developed. Some years ago, in the local legislature of Nova Scotia, the island of Cape Breton was referred to by one hon. member of that body as the tin can at the tail of the dog. But one of the members representing a Cape Breton constituency said: Not the tin can at the tail of the dog, but the jewel in the swine's snout. Sir, we anticipate great developments, and we want to have not only material development but social development as well. And we want the processes which have developed our mining population up to its present status during the last thirty or forty years to be continued, and are determined as far as possible that elements which are calculated to break up the happy condition that now prevail shall be, as far as possible, thwarted.

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied the time of the House longer than I anticipated. But I did want to say a word or two about the resolution now before the House, and I will content myself with a very few words indeed. I may say to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) that I sympathize with him to a certain extent in putting that resolution before the country. I did hope, when he began to read the resolution that it would shed some light upon his fiscal policy, that it would not be merely nebulous and indefinite. There may be some light in it, but it reminds me a good deal of a ray of moonlight in a very foggy night. I cannot understand what the hon. gentleman seeks to do. I would like him to particularize, to point out just where he is going to improve the tariff. I would like to remind the hon. leader of the opposition that a gentleman who occupied the position of leader of the Dominion government, the late Right Hon. Sir John Thompson, spoke on one occasion of 'mouldering branches' in connection with the tariff, which, in his opinion, might be lopped off with benefit to the country. We have heard no demand for tariff changes except only from hon. gentlemen on this side who think that the tariff is too high, except from one industry, the woollen industry. I wonder if he ever thinks that possibly this woollen industry may be one of the mouldering branches which the late Sir John Thompson had in his mind. Let him not misunderstand me. I am not anxious to see the woollen business suffer to any greater extent than it does to-day. I suppose that is one of the industries to which he wishes to give added protection, but I wish to point out that when a million dollars worth of woollen goods are made in Canada, as compared with a million dollars worth produced in Great Britain, the manufacturer of this country still has an opportunity to sell that million dollars worth for $1,233,000 under the preferential tariff.

Sir, the hon. gentleman proposes to frame a policy for this country, and I was thinking the other day that possibly when he takes a bird's eye view of half a continent, and looks at those resources of Canada which must be the backbone of our prosperity in the future, the four great natural industries: The mining and fishing of British Columbia, the farming of the Northwest, the fishing, farming, lumbering and mining of Ontario, the fishing, farming, and lumbering of Quebec, and the similar industries of the maritime provinces; and when he looks into the future and thinks which of the industries at present in existence are most likely to build up the country, can he doubt what is the best policy for us to pursue? It is best to pursue a policy of developing the great natural industries of the country, or a policy of fostering a number of manufactures which can scarcely be expected ever to stand alone? Now, there are some manufacturing industries in this country that can stand alone, and one of these is the manufacture of agricultural implements. I have heard statements made by one of the men prominent in that business that to-day they are practically independent, that to-day they can take certain of their implements and sell them in Australia and in Europe in competition with similar implements from the United States; that as a matter of fact they are not able to-day to supply the home market, and that a number of American implements come in here for the reason that our implements can be sold in Europe to better advantage than they can be sold at home. That statement was made to me not fifty feet from where I stand, a few days ago, by a gentleman who knows as much about the business, I presume, as most any one. There are a number of manufacturing industries in this country that are almost as independent as those of fishing and agriculture. Sir, I say that the great natural industries of this country are those to which we can direct our energies the most profitably. I am sure that in the province from which the hon. gentleman comes he can find scarcely an industry that is likely to be benefited by a higher protective tariff than the present one.

Let me say that being a free trader in principle, I agree that the present tariff is merely a tentative measure. I believe that the present is a better tariff than the one that formerly existed, yet it is not the best system, though perhaps it is the best which is within practical politics to-day. I beileve that with the system that prevails in Great Britain, a system of direct taxation on all incomes over $750, the great bulk of our people would be better off than they are to-day. I make the statement that the burden of taxation falls on the shoulders of the people who have to earn their living by the sweat of their brow, and that the rich people of this country are escaping more and more their fair share of taxation. I point to the fact that in Great Britain no man pays a penny on income until he earns over $750 a year, unless he pays it on his spirits, and tobacco, and a few other articles of luxury. His food, his clothing and the materials with which he must work and gain a livelihood, are as free as they can be got anywhere in the world. I believe that system is one which would work in this country, although I admit that it is not within practical politics. I would advocate that system also as a tentative measure, because I believe there is another system of taxation even better, and that is the single tax, or the land tax, but this form of taxation will probably originate in civic and municipal politics.

Now, Sir, before sitting down I wish to say that I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to show me whereby a protective tariff can help the fishermen of this country, whereby it will help the fruit-growers of this country, the miners of this country, or to any great extent the lumbermen or the pulp producers of this country, and the agriculturists of this country, except it may be the market gardeners who produce a few bundles of rhubarb and bunches of summer savory. I say that the great natural industries of this country that depend upon foreign markets and which are the backbone of this country, can in no way be benefited by protection. I accept it as a tentative measure, and only for the present, when we find it difficult to keep our population at home. I accept the present system in order to keep the population in the country, until such time as we will have a number of manufactures well established, not rooted in protection, but rooted in the solid and successful development of the natural industries of this country.

Mr. B. ROSAMOND (North Lanark). I have no desire to emulate the hon. gentleman (Mr. Kendall) who has just taken his seat, in making a lengthy speech. He has spoken about two hours and three quarters by the clock, While I am sorry that I cannot compliment him on the brevity of his speech, I regret also that I cannot compliment him upon having given us any new ideas. He has given us a long and rambling speech without saying anything noticeable upon the budget. He told us just before sitting down that he had no desire to injure the woollen industry. Well, Mr. Speaker, I suppose we ought to be very thankful to him for that much. One would have supposed, if he had been in a patriotic mood, that he would have desired to benefit the woollen industry, but I suppose we must feel grateful to him that at least he has no desire to injure that industry. He was unable to see any light in the amendment which has been moved by the hon. leader of the opposition. I am reminded of the old saying that none are so blind as those who will not see. I think if the hon. gentleman had read that amendment properly and if he had carefully listened to the speech of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), he would have seen a great deal of light and would have been benefited by it. In the early part of his speech he said that some woollen manufacturer in the province of Nova Scotia told him that he could not get wool enough to run his mill. Well, with my knowledge of the facts, the only conclusion I can come to is that gentlemen must have been having a little amusement with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KENDALL. Not at all.

Mr. ROSAMOND. He must have been trying to pull the wool over his eyes, as a matter of fact there are tons of Canadian wool looking for buyers. He went on to say that it was doubtful if we could attempt to manufacture in Canada in competition with England and other countries. I really think that we cannot wonder at the fact that our population does not grow as rapidly as it should when an hon. member of this House, no doubt a representative man from the province from which he comes, is so pessimistic, or so lacking in ambition for the progress of his own province, that he discourages the establishment of industries in his own province, or in the country. Can we wonder that so many people from the province of Nova Scotia are to be found in the city of Boston and in the New England states ? I think this is one reason why the people of the province of Nova Scotia are said to be unambitious in regard to progress in manufacturing. The hon. gentleman read some extracts from some ancient works giving harrowing accounts of the condition of the working people of England many years ago. Well, I think there can be no question that had he given us the facts of the case relating to the condition of the working people of England he would have pointed out that it was owing to the fact that the corn laws were in existence and that food was dear and difficult to get. This is no argument against protection. Those who are in favour of protection are in favour of enabling the workingman to live as cheaply as he possibly can and he could not live cheaply if the articles of necessity were taxed heavily. The hon. gentleman went on to refer to the great benefit which the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) had conferred upon the country by expending large sums in carrying out cold storage. He did not tell us that cold storage was established by the preceding government, that it was then in its infancy and that a moderate sum was all that was necessary to endeavour to carry it into effect. He failed also to tell us at the same time that the leaders of the opposition of that day, when $20,000 a year was being expended, did all they possibly could to prevent it. They pitched into the government and opposed them in every way possible for expending so much money uselessly and recklessly. If he had told us this I think we could have discounted some of the great praise he gave to the hon. Minister of Agriculture. Listening to the hon. gentleman's speech I was at a loss to understand whether he was a protectionist or a free trader, or half way between. At the close of his speech he announced himself as a free trader pure and simple, but, when we consider that he wanted, in the early part of his speech, more advantages for the fishermen, a greater expenditure of public money, and that he was unwilling to take the duty off coal, I think we will agree that these demands are hardly consistent with the profession he made in favour of free trade. He made some reference to the Intercolonial Railway and he made a strong appeal in favour of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) on account of the abrogation of a certain arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I am not conversant with railway matters. I am not living anywhere near the Intercolonial Railway, but, I think the only conclusion that any practical business man can come to in the matter is to judge by the results of the running of the railway, and when we consider that during this last year there has been an increase in the capital expenditure of $3,652,313.46 and that in addition to that there was a deficit of $488,186.77, we must believe that there is something radically wrong with the working of the railway. Last week while in Montreal I happened to meet at the Windsor hotel a prominent and a practical railway man, one who is thoroughly conversant with the running of railways and has been for years. I will say, while not wishing to disclose his identity, that he is not connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway. He gave it as his decided opinion that there was no railway on the continent of America that was so badly managed as the Intercolonial Railway. I do not think I need refer to that matter any further than to say that if we carried out the idea of the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Kendall) with reference to the mining of coal, if the government took into their hands the coal industry and managed it in the manner that they manage the Intercolonial Railway, I am quite sure there would not be a business man in this country but would be anxious and desirous that it should be taken out of their hands as quickly as possible. When in Halifax last fall, I happened to see in one of the newspapers of that city a letter written by a prominent commercial man, a man not in public life, but a practical commercial man and a supporter of the present government, as I believe, who was writing in the public press advocating that the Intercolonial Railway should be taken out of the hands of the government and handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway to manage. There can be no other reason for his wishing that that course should be adopted than that the management of the Intercolonial Railway by the government was so outrageously bad, so detrimental to the best interests of the country, so injurious to it in every way that the only course to be taken by practical business men would be to take the road out of the hands of the government and have it managed by some people who could manage it properly. I have no desire to emulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat in making a long speech. When I listen to a long speech like that I am reminded of a verse in the psalms of David which says :

A man full of words shall not prosper upon the earth.
Evil shall hunt the wicked person to overthrow him.

If any are to follow me, I hope they will take that to heart and carry out the lesson.

Like many of those who have preceded me in this lengthy debate, I am willing to congratulate the government on having come into power at a time exceedingly advantageous to themselves. No government could have been more fortunate than they were in coming into power at the commencement of an era of prosperity. I think every one will concede that the prosperity of Canada during the past five or six years has been unexampled. I regret, however, that we cannot congratulate the government upon their having made good use of the prosperous times which have blest their period of office up to the present. If they had been prudent business men, and you know we were told that it was a government of business men, one would have supposed that when there was great prosperity in the country they would have endeavoured to reduce the public debt. In fact they promised the people of Canada that if they were given a chance to govern the country they would reduce the public debt. But, notwithstanding the abnormal prosperity; notwithstanding the surpluses which were so lavishly displayed and so glowingly spoken of in every budget speech, the public debt of the country has gone on increasing—I was going to say by leaps and bounds. My idea is, that in times of great prosperity there is no necessity for the government spending unusually large sums of money. In fact, the expenditure of abnormal sums of money in prosperous times has the effect of accentuating that prosperity, and making the contrast all the worse when times get bad. The greater will be the fall then. If there was great depression in the country, then there might be necessity for the government launching out into justifiable public expenditure, and even borrowing money perhaps, because then they would give employment to the people of the country which otherwise they might not be able to get. It is also true that under such circumstances public works could be carried out at less cost than when business is at high pressure and labour comparatively scarce. However, I do not propose to dwell at length upon that phase of the question.

I notice, Mr. Speaker, that several hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have expressed themselves as not desiring to injure the woollen industry, while at the same time they deprecate any increase in the tariff. The truth has probably not been quite told as to the manner in which the woollen industry has suffered under the preferential tariff. I have taken from the public records a comparative statement of the imports of woollens under the heads of cloths, coatings, doe skins, over-coatings and tweeds, imported during the financial years ending 30th June, 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, and 1901. I take the items I have mentioned because these are the articles which are principally manufactured in the woollen mills of this country.

In 1897, there were 3,166,361 yards imported; the bulk of that of course being from Great Britain; there being only 114,450 yards imported from other countries. In 1898, there were 3,604,286 yards imported; in 1899, there were 4,369,816 yards imported; in 1900, there were 4,562,868 yards imported, and after the 33⅓ per cent preference came into effect, in 1901, the importation was 6,045,534 yards, or, comparing the importations for 1897 and the importations for 1901, there was an increase of 2,879,173 yards in 1901, or, an increase in the importation of woollens of 91 per cent in 1901, as compared with 1897:

That, Mr. Speaker, will show why it is that the woollen industry of Canada has been depressed, and has been most seriously injured by the tariff now in force. I do not desire to dwell at any length upon that question, because some people might consider it somewhat of a personal matter with me, but I give these figures to hon. gentlemen to show how the woollen industry has been very seriously affected by the preferential tariff.

I shall now with the permission of the House, briefly refer to the result of the last census. It was admitted by the Minister of Finance in his speech on the budget, and it has been admitted by all, that the result of the census of 1901 has been very disappointing. For my part I had a vague hope that the census would show a population of 6,000,000 in Canada. As a matter of fact the increase in 1901 over 1891 was only 537,812, or about 11 per cent. Contrast that with the increase in the United States. The increase in the United States in 1900 over the census of 1890 was 13,681,137, or about 22 per cent, which is just double our percentage of increase. Then in considering the increase in Canada we must remember that during the ten years we received immigrants to the number of 282,292, or about 50 per cent of the total increase. The cost of getting those immigrants has been $2,400,173, or about $8.50 per head. The population of the United States in 1870 was 38,558,371, and in 1880 it was 50,155,783, an increase of 30 per cent. In 1890 it had risen to 62,622,250, an increase of 21½ per cent, and in 1900 it had still further risen to 76,303,387, or an increase of 21 and eight-tenths per cent. During this present session of parliament the member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) taunted the people of the east for their slow progress, and he told us that the population of eastern Canada was hardly increasing at all. I find from the census returns that during the decade between 1891 and 1901 the province of Prince Edward Island lost 5,819 of her population; Ontario increased only 68,621; New Brunswick increased 9,857, and Nova Scotia increased 9,178. The inauguration of the iron and steel works in Nova Scotia must have tended to help towards an increase of population in that province. The province of Quebec which has always a large natural increase, larger than any other province in the Dominion, increased its population during the decade by 160,363. There may be some question as to whether the census of the province of Quebec has been accurate. From some of the correspondence which has come to light, I think there may be grave doubts as to whether the census for the province of Quebec is correct. Manitoba, British Columbia, and the territories have increased 297,227, or 55,027 more than all the eastern provinces put together.

The Finance Minister claimed in his speech that the increase in our population of the last decade was all in the last half of the decade, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech said something to the same effect; in fact, he went much further than the Finance Minister. I will quote what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said:

> First of all, the increase during the last decade is double the increase which took place during the decade from 1881 to 1891, and next, that the increase during the last five years, from 1896 to 1901, in all human probability equals the total increase of the preceding 15 years from 1881 to 1896. Sir, these are not statements to be made lightly by a man in my position, and I do not make them lightly.

Mr. Speaker, I have always had a very great respect indeed for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I am sorry he is not in his seat now, for I wish to say that I think there is no man his equal for making extravagant statements in this House of Commons.

Now, against this statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, let me quote from the United States census. There was a larger percentage of Canadians in the United States in 1900 than there was in 1890. In 1890, 17 per cent of the total number of Canadians in the United States and Canada put together were domiciled in the United States. In 1900 the total number had increased to 18 per cent, or a total of 1,181,778 Canadians domiciled in the United States. As further evidence of the unreliability of the statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, let me say the state of Massachusetts takes on its own account a census every ten years, half way between the national census years. Its records and those of the national count show the number of Canadians in the state as folllows:—

1900	293,169

Or 13,306 more Canadians have gone into Massachusetts from 1895 to 1900 than from 1890 to 1895. There can be no doubt that the same is true of every other state in the union to which Canadians go, and the only conclusion we can come to is that the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce was entirely erroneous.

There is another point on which I have to quote the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that is with reference to the trade of the Dominion. In his last speech he said:

> The total imports per capita in 1890 amounted to about $24. In 1895, they were $22, per capita, and in 1900 they had risen to $36.

At this point I remember very well saying 'Hear, hear.' The Minister of Trade and Commerce went on to say

> The hon. gentleman dislikes to hear that Canada's imports have increased. I differ from him.

Then he went on to say further:

> I take the total volume of trade. In 1890 it amounted to $44 per head; in 1895 it amounted to the same; in 1900 it had risen to $71 per head. And, how does this compare with our neighbours to the south? In 1890 it was $26 per head in the United States; in 1895 it was $23 per head in the United States, and in 1890 their total volume of trade amounted to $29 per head; very little more than one-third per head as much as the people of Canada possess.
> Of all countries; of Australia, the United States, Great Britain, Belgium, France, and Germany, Canada has increased at all points; increased in her imports, increased in her exports, increased in her total volume of trade, in a far greater ratio than the best of the others—not by any means excepting Great Britain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have quoted these extracts from the speeches of the Minister of Trade and Commerce for the purpose of drawing a moral from them. I wish to draw certain conclusions, which I think will commend themselves to the good sense and the intelligence of the House. I have shown that the increase in population during the last decade has been disappointingly small; that the bulk of what increase there is has been in the agricultural districts of the North-west; that the increase in the population of the United States has been continuously large; that nearly 1¼ millions of Canadians are now domiciled in the United States; that the exodus of Canadians to the United States has been greater during the last five years of the decade than the first five years, notwithstanding an abnormal prosperity; that the imports into Canada have risen from $22 per head in 1895 to $36 in 1900; that our total volume of trade in 1890 was $44 per head, and in 1900 had risen to $71 per head, while that of the United States was only $29 per head in 1900.

Sir, have we not here the whole secret of our lamentable lack of reasonable increase of population? We are inclined to brag about our enormous imports and exports, and about the great volume of trade per head of the population which we have far in advance of every other country in the world, not even excepting Great Britain, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said. Sir, does that not point to this fact, that the people of Canada are not endeavouring to manufacture anything for themselves, that we are making no pretense to manufacture what we might manufacture and thus give employment to the people of the country? We are paying large sums of money to induce immigrants to come to Canada—$2,400,000 in the last ten years; and what kind of people do we get? Doukhobors, Galicians and others, not skilled labour. Do you wonder that the skilled labour of England passes our shores and goes to the United States? Can we wonder that the capitalists of England are not sending their money to this country for the purpose of giving it employment when we do nothing to encourage them to come here? We are not even attempting to keep our own young men, who have been born on the soil, educated in our schools and colleges at great expense to the taxpayer, and who would be of great advantage to this country if they could find here suitable employment which would give them an adequate reward for their industry and skill. We are spending large sums of money in the effort to populate this country, and the only people we get are the ignorant people from certain parts of Europe—people who will not be of any great advantage in this country until such time as they are educated. And you will find, Sir, that the descendants of these men whom we are educating, will, unless the fiscal policy of this country be altered, leave it just when they have been educated and converted into desirable citizens. My belief is that until we adopt the policy of the United States, we need not expect the population of this country to grow as we would like to have it grow. Let me quote here from a recent writer:

> It is a great mistake to consider a country prosperous because she receives large revenues from duties on foreign goods consumed by her people. In Canada we import from the United States eighty million dollars worth of manufactured goods, on which a very large revenue is collected, and to which the party in power points with pride. How much richer Canada would be in people, in cash, in power, in everything that goes to make a nation great, if this eighty million dollars' worth had been manufactured or produced by her own sons on her own soil? And the pity of it is that Canada could do it, and Canada would do it if our rulers only had the wisdom and strength to apply to Canada the same principles that have made the United States the greatest producing power the world has ever seen.
> No nation can become great and prosperous so long as her output is one of natural products only. The progress, prosperity and wealth of all nations lie in the development of their natural resources; the making of wheat into flour, ores into iron, steels or nickel, trees into lumber; wool into clothing; and so continuing to make from iron, steel and lumber, locomotives, railway cars, agricultural implements, threshing machines, furniture, etc. The continued enlargement and expansion of the industries of the country build it in people, wealth and power.

This policy it is which has built up the United States in such an unexampled degree, and it is this policy which we must adopt if we wish to make Canada prosper in the same proportion. I would like also to quote from an English paper:

> The efforts of Mr. Smart and Mr. Preston seem entirely directed to the importation of a proletariate, or, at any rate, to the populating of the west country with small farmers.
> Doubtless this is of supreme importance, but are not capitalists also required? The emigrants will form a home market for Canadian industries, it is true, but the development of industries backed up by British capital will create population. This may seem a paradox, but it is not so. Capital creates population just as much as population invites capital. If the industries advance quicker than the home population can consume, there are populations elsewhere to take off the surplus. As a matter of fact, however, Canada is not even manufacturing enough for her own wants. If Canada had herself made what she imported last year she would have employed 150,000 factory hands who would have earned $65,000,000 in wages, and these hands with their families and the trades and professions which would spring up to supply them, would fill three towns as large as Toronto. What is not sufficiently realized in this country is that Canada is one of the natural workshops of the world, and perhaps the most adaptable of all; she has immense water-power, immense deposits of coal and iron, abundance of timber, good harbours, the finest soil in the world, and an endless supply of fish. In fine, she ought to be able to feed the world, and make everything it wants at the cheapest cost. Surely if this were properly understood, English capital would be seeking investment over there all the while.

The supply of British capital for Canadian manufacturing industries would also help to find employment for that large class of young men who, we are told, unable to find it at home and being unsuited to agricultural work, are seeking their fortunes in more southern climes.

I do not think we need wonder that British capital should fail to come to Canada. There is no sentiment about capital. Just as water seeks its own level, capital seeks where it can find the most profitable employment, and it certainly will not come to Canada so long as the present condition of things continues to exist. We need still less wonder at capital not coming to this country when we find our Finance Minister in 1898 using these words :

I am afraid there is no rest for the protected manufacturer. I am inclined to think, Sir, that he will find eternal vigilance is the price of his protection. He must be on guard all the time against the attack he knows must always come.

Capital is a most sensitive thing and will certainly not seek employment in Canada so long as we have a Finance Minister imbued with these ideas. One would suppose that a Canadian Finance Minister would desire to see his country prosperous and be happy to do all he possibly could to encourage native industry in its endeavour to find employment, but we find the contrary to be the case under the present regime. Then again we find the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Sifton) saying :

Some of the woollen factories are closing up. They say the reason is that they have not sufficient protection. I say it is not. If they cannot live on a 23 per cent tariff, the sooner they shut up the better.

But another strange feature about some of the supporters of the government is that while they are loud mouthed in their professions of free trade, we find them very anxious for protection on certain things. We find, for instance, the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) wanting protection for the farmers who raise horses. Well, if I were to apply to him the language of the Minister of the Interior, I would say that if our western people cannot breed horses profitably under present conditions, they had better give it up altogether. Then there is the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Morrison), who wants protection on lumber and lead products. To him also I could apply the language of the Minister of the Interior. There is another western member, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Smith), who wants protection for Canadian labourers against the Chinese. But if he is to be governed by the doctrine announced by the Minister of the Interior, then if white labour in British Columbia cannot compete with the Chinese the sooner it leaves British Columbia and goes somewhere else where it can get employment, the better. But that doctrine will never make Canada prosperous. Until, as an hon. member on this side said some time ago, we are actuated by a broad spirit, until one and all desire that the whole of the country shall prosper, that every industry shall flourish, we never can expect to see Canada in the position she ought to occupy. For my part, and the same may be said of all protectionists—in fact it is the keynote of the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition—we want our farmers protected as well as everybody else. Our farmers have been protected to a considerable extent. They are protected by duties on many of their products such as bacon, cheese and butter. Large sums have been expended on experimental farms in their interest and on arrangements for teaching them how to make cheese and butter profitably. A large staff of men has been employed for this purpose, agricultural colleges have been established at various places, and experimental farms, all at the expense of the Canadian people. I have no objection to that. On the contrary I am delighted to see it, but if we want Canada to prosper we must not confine our attention to one class. We are all anxious to see the country grow, not only in wealth but in population, and until we are actuated by the broad spirit recommended by one of the members for Toronto, we need not expect this country to attain that degree of prosperity which she ought to enjoy. I do not think I can better close my speech than by quoting something which was said, and so well and so profitably said, by the leader of the opposition. At the outset, I stated that I was not going to make a long speech, and I have only now to quote these words which, perhaps the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Borden) will pardon my using :

We want to know what will be the policy of this government, as a government, with regard to the fiscal affairs of the country. We want that to be a declared policy so that the people will know what to expect. In asking that we are asking nothing unreasonable or unfair. We want a policy of protection to our labour, agriculturing, manufacturing and other industries. We want a policy which will give to our people the advantage in their own market—a policy of Canada for the Canadians ; and Canada for the Canadian means not the less Canada for the empire as well. Because in seeking to promote the development, prosperity and advancement of Canada, we are but doing our duty to that portion of the empire which has been specially committed to our charge. And, lastly, we believe in a policy of mutual or reciprocal trade under which, while protecting Canadian interests, we shall give to and receive from the other portions of the empire preference over foreign goods.

Mr. R. HOLMES (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a good deal of interest and pleasure, and, I will admit, with a certain amount of profit, to the discussion on the motion now before you. But I have been amused at the course of reasoning of some hon. gentlemen opposite and the inconsistencies into which it leads them. The hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) admitted, at the outset of his remarks, that this country was enjoying unbounded and almost unexampled prosperity. Yet, in closing, he told us that unless we adopted a certain policy laid down by the leader of the opposition, we could not enjoy the prosperity we ought to have. But the hon. gentleman is not different from any of his friends in that they contradict not only each other but themselves. We on this side have been twitted with not being a unit in our opinion, and I am free to admit that we are not a unit on all points. But, if that be a crime, which I certainly do not at all admit, we are not alone in our guilt. The hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith) opposed all imports and declared that no country could be made rich by imports, ignoring altogether the fact that Great Britain has imports larger than those of any other country, and yet enjoys a great measure of prosperity. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) took similar ground and said that we ought to adopt a uniform tariff with that of our American friends, implying that if we put a tariff on natural products our people would derive benefit therefrom. In other words, the hon. gentleman would exclude absolutely products from the United States. But the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock) stated that he was in favour of a reciprocity treaty, if it could be had. And the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), in opposition to the views of those who would keep out imports, wanted efforts made to increase our trade with Germany. So, Mr. Speaker, you will find diverse views among hon. gentlemen on the other side as well as among supporters of the government. And, if the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is reported correctly in the newspapers—and I have not seen any contradiction—that hon. gentleman has one set of views for Quebec and another set for Ontario.

I have just a few remarks to make upon the speech of the hon. member for North Lanark, and I shall run over the points hurriedly, endeavouring to follow the good example of the hon. gentleman and speak but briefly. In replying to the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Kendall) the hon. member for North Lanark sought to justify his position by saying that the corn laws of Great Britain had brought that country to a bad condition by making dear the bread of the common people. The hon. gentleman ignored the fact that the resolution of his leader, which he supports would, if carried out, re-establish a system of corn laws in the old land, make food dear in that country, and so tend to bring back the condition of which he speaks. I do not feel bound to justify everything that has been said in the House by hon. members on this side. It is true that some years ago they said that the expenditure should be kept down, and that the increase of the debt should be kept within reasonable bounds. I believe that their arguments were good, that they were sincere, and yet I believe that increase of expenditure is perfectly justifiable at the present time. I would remind the House that the late leader of the opposition stated on this floor that the expenditure and the debt of the country must inevitably go on growing with the development of the resources of this country. I am sure that the people will find no fault with the government that increases the debt, so long as its increase is legitimate and honourable, and so long as is not disgraced by such transactions as marked the increase of the debt in connection with the record of the previous administration. I had hoped that my hon. friend from North Lanark would speak more in detail on the tariff on woollens. That is an article with which he is, of course, familiar. But I can understand his modesty in not alluding to it at length, because it might be said that he was, as the common expression goes, talking shop. But I wish to take issue with the hon. gentleman on that point. I wish to say, and I say it without mental reservation, that, if the woollen manufacturers are not satisfied with a tariff at 23½ per cent, and the difference of the freight between the old country and here, which, at the lowest rate, would raise the protection of these manufacturers to 25 per cent, if these woollen manufacturers cannot prosper with that protection in a country like Canada, where woollens are a prime necessity and must be bought by the people, then, it is time for these manufacturers to turn their investments and their attention to some other branch of industry. I was going to say it is a woeful admission for hon. gentlemen to make to this House and this country, to convey the impression that the woollen manufacturers cannot carry on a legitimate business unless they are allowed to tax the people more than 25 per cent on their purchases in this line. The statement is made in the press, and made repeatedly, that the woollen industry is suffering. So far as I have been able to learn, I have not found that statement borne out by the facts, and I have grave doubts of the ability of any man to prove it. A short time ago I met within the walls of this House a gentleman who is engaged in the woollen industry. I asked him if he was one of those who objected to the preferential tariff, and if his woollen mill was suffering because of importations. His answer was: No, he was not one of those who were objecting, and he did not believe that the others had good ground for objecting, because they were so busy they could not fill their orders. I myself could name woollen mills that are working overtime to catch up with the demand and fill the orders that they have. If this is the state of the case, the woollen manufacturers have no grievance which would justify us in giving them greater protection than they have at present.

Reference has been made in the course of this debate to the action of the government in refusing to yield to the delegations that have come down here asking for an increase in the tariff. As one representing the people, as one representing the masses instead of the classes, I want to express my commendation of the government which has had the manliness to stand up against the pressure that has been brought to bear upon them. I am not alone in voicing that sentiment. I want to quote from a paper of Conservative leaning, the Ottawa 'Journal,' which thus speaks of the attitude of the government upon this question:

> This year, the Dominion government holds out against increase of the tariff, to its credit be it said. Manufacturers' hopes were high that from the government would come the squeak, 'Don't shoot, I'll come down.' But there are to be no tariff changes. Some may think that this is a small thing to put to the credit of a party one of whose slogans while in opposition was 'free trade as they have it in Britain,' but to those who have any conception of the pressure which the government has to withstand, any idea of the force, the persistence, the heat, with which the protected interests urge their demands, the government's stand must appear well worthy of credit. The manufacturers, long with the taste of blood in their mouths, and now fully recovered from the terrors of 1896, are in full scent after the prey. To balk them is no light job.

That quotation is from the Ottawa 'Journal' whose editor was formerly connected with the Toronto 'Mail,' and who now takes an independent position. I want to say further that it seems to me that some of the delegations that come to Ottawa asking for assistance have no other idea than that they should be enabled by law to put their hands in the pockets of the consumers and enrich themselves at the expense of the people. If they had no protection, and if they were not enjoying a certain amount of favouritism already, their request might be reasonable; but it seems to me some of them are decidedly unreasonable. I take as an illustration the cement manufacturers. I have no hostility whatever to the cement men, I would be only too glad to see an industry of that kind flourish to the utmost extent, for cement is an article entering into very general use, and will be much more largely used in the future, because it is being used for new purposes every day. The cement manufacturers came down a short time ago and asked the government for an increase of duty. They have a duty at the present time of 12½ cents per 100 pounds, or equal to 42½ cents per barrel of 350 pounds. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, when you add the freight of about 30 cents a barrel on imported cement, the Canadian manufacturer ought to be satisfied with a tariff of about 75 cents a barrel on cement.

The resolution presented by the hon. leader of the opposition proclaims that the present tariff is unsatisfactory. Unsatisfactory to whom? It surely is not unsatisfactory to the manufacturers, who are so busy all over this land that they can scarcely fill their orders. Go into any place in the province of Ontario, at any rate, for which I can speak, and I think I can say the same for Quebec and the other provinces—go into any of the manufacturing towns in Ontario at the present time, and you will find that all our industries are running to their fullest capacity. I am glad indeed to see that the manufacturers are prospering as they are, because I believe it is due in a measure to the reduction of duty on raw materials, and to the advantages they have under the present administration. Therefore the present tariff cannot be unsatisfactory to the manufacturers. It cannot be unsatisfactory to the artisans, who have all the work they can possibly attend to. If you look into the newspapers at the present time you will find that there is a greater demand for artisans of various classes than has existed for a very long time. In all branches of manufacture, or in nearly all, there is a very keen and earnest demand for artisans, and that at very good wages. The present tariff therefore cannot be unsatisfactory to them. Neither can it be unsatisfactory to the farmers, because it has relieved them of certain burdens which formerly rested upon them. One hon. gentleman on the other side, in the course of his argument, alluded to the introduction of free corn as detrimental to the farmers of this country. Well, I am here to take issue with him. The statement was made, I believe, that the introduction of free corn had the effect of reducing the price of coarse grain. I challenge that statement; I defy any hon. member in this House to prove that, as a general rule, the introduction of free corn has lowered the price of coarse grains one iota. I challenge any man to prove from the market reports or otherwise that the introduction of free corn has had any such results. I assert on the other hand that it has been a most decided benefit to the farming classes. In my neighbourhood I have asked cattle raisers, both Conservatives and Liberals, I have asked cattle buyers, both Conservatives and Liberals; I have made considerable investigations along that line, and almost without exception, men of all classes have endorsed and upheld the action of the government in throwing off the duty on corn as an action in the interest of the farming community. It has enabled the farmer to finish his cattle and stock at a less cost, and to put them on the English market in a better condition, than they would have been if fed on coarse grain alone. The Canadian farmer has to compete with the American farmer in the English market, and by the use of corn he is able to put his stock on the English market in competition with the American farmer more successfully than he could do without free corn.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have had a good many figures given us in this debate. I do not want to weary the House with them, but when figures tell certain truths and when they are advantageous, I think they should be put on record. I will give our friends on the opposite side of the House credit for this, that where they find what they believe to be a weak spot in the armour of members on this side of the House, they make the most of it. I believe in that principle, and when we have a certain fact to lay before the people, I think we should bring it forward and not let it be lost sight of. We contend on this side of the House that the present tariff is better than the old one. Our friends opposite are continually saying that the era of prosperity, of progress and advancement we are now enjoying is due entirely to Providence, no credit is due to the government at all; and they say in the very next breath if you accept their policy or if you accept the resolution moved by the leader of the opposition, a still greater measure of prosperity will be the result. Now if the policy of our friends opposite would bring about greater prosperity, then by parity of reasoning this government is entitled to a certain amount of credit because of the prosperity Canada has been enjoying during the past few years. The policy that hon. gentlemen opposite desire us to adopt is practically the policy that was in force for eighteen years, but it is a policy that was rejected by the people. It was tried and found wanting. They are now bringing it forward again, and claim that it will produce the beneficial results which it failed to produce before. I am surprised that, in view of the present state of prosperity, in view of several things that have occurred recently, our friends opposite should endeavour to put before the House the fallacious arguments to which they have resorted.

The present resolution is simply a reiteration of the old national policy. They may claim credit for it if they like, but the old national policy has been condemned by the people at the polls. It was condemned in Lisgar. The policy of hon. gentlemen opposite was condemned by the independent electors of that riding. It was condemned in Beauharnois and it was condemned by the people in the general elections. The national policy was introduced in 1879, and the trade of the country increased from $135,000,000 in 1879 to $230,000,000 in 1883. In 1884, under the alleged beneficent influences of this policy, it fell to $207,000,000; in 1888 it fell to $198,000,000; in 1889 it dropped still to $189,000,000 and in the year 1895 it increased to $224,000,000, or $6,000,000 less than it was in 1883. If there is any value in the arguments of hon. gentlemen at all, if any reliance can be placed upon them, will they tell me why it was that in the years they had that policy in operation it did not produce the results which they say it will now produce ? In 1896 when the present government took office there was only $9,000,000 of an increase in the trade of the country, as compared with the year 1883, after thirteen years of the national policy. From 1879 to 1896 there was an increase of $85,000,000, while, since 1896 to the present year, the trade of the country has increased by $160,000,000, possibly by $170,000,000, or twice as much in six years as in seventeen years under the old regime. It is no wonder that hon. gentlemen opposite try to minimize the efforts of the present government and the advantages that are accruing to the country from this expansion. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that they want a clearly defined declaration of policy. To my mind they are simply playing upon words. I think when the government have a policy that has stood before the people for a certain period of time they have a clearly defined and clearly declared policy. I fancy that anybody who reads between the lines can easily see that our friends opposite have some view other than getting a clearly defined policy for the present in connection with their arguments. They are simply playing upon words as far as a clearly defined policy is concerned, but what they are endeavouring to do is to persuade the leaders of the government into the declaration of a line of policy that they intend to pursue before they go to the Coronation ceremonies, in order, if they are not successful in securing what they desire, they may be hauled over the coals hereafter. I suppose it would suit some hon. gentlemen opposite to have a fresh declaration of the policy every day and to change that policy to suit the changing circumstances of the times. It has been said, and said with a great deal of truth that cannot be controverted, that you cannot protect the farmers. The resolution provides that you shall protect the labouring class, the farming class and every other class in the community. I am sorry that at this late stage, not of the session, but at this late day we are apparently having to go over all the arguments that have been threshed out in this country for the last twenty years. It is an exploded fallacy to talk of protecting the farming interests. The farmers know this only too well at the present time and our friends on the other side of the House, with all their persuasive eloquence and argumentative ability, will not be able to convince the farmers by any hocus pocus proceeding, that by taxing them for the benefit of the manufacturers they can make them prosperous.

A point that I want to call attention to,

and it is only incidental to this debate, and has not yet been touched upon, is the commendable action of the government in connection with the paper combine. I do not say that as one of those who has derived any benefit therefrom, as I come within the class that do not derive any benefit from the action of the government. But, I want to commend the government for the attitude they have taken towards the paper combine, and I want to say a word in regard to the peculiarity of that action. I believe that the people of this country realize that the judgment delivered by Judge Taschereau is of very far reaching importance and is fraught with important consequences to the consuming community. The peculiar feature of the government's action is that it is endorsed by Conservatives and Liberals alike. There is not a solitary Conservative newspaper but has endorsed the action of the government in reducing the duty on paper. If it is a benefit to the consuming classes to reduce the duty on paper, as I hold it is, because this combine was charging excessive prices, I think a similar reduction of other lines would meet with as large a measure of approval. Our hon. friends opposite talk about securing a preference in the mother country. I have no objection to securing a preference in the market of the mother country provided it can be obtained, but it seems to me that on the part of Canada taking the position that we do, it is a piece of presumption and impertinence on our part to attempt to dictate to Great Britain what shall be her policy as far as the colonies are concerned. If Great Britain chooses to put a moderate duty on grain, that is her own business, and though we would derive a benefit therefrom, I am quite willing to allow Great Britain to pursue her own course and do as she thinks best. But, a very striking thing in connection with the matter is that all the arguments of hon. gentlemen have been that this course would be for the benefit of Great Britain. Pure unselfishness on the part of those who speak for Canada ! No benefit to us at all ; it is all to Great Britain's benefit ! It is the old argument of doing something for some other fellow rather than for the man who is going to derive the benefit. I think that if Great Britain told us that free trade for Canada would be the best policy for us to pursue we would very quickly tell Great Britain to mind her own business. I think Great Britain has the same right to tell us to mind our own business when we interfere in an affair with which we have nothing to do. Our friends opposite dwelt a good deal on patriotism. It seems to me that this protestation of patriotism comes with exceedingly bad grace from hon. gentlemen opposite whose organ, when the national policy was introduced and when it was said it would interfere with British connection, reiterated the statement through the length and breadth of this country : Then so much the worse for British connection. These are the hon. gentlemen who talk about patriotism and about doing something for the mother land and who, when they were told, as they were told, that a policy of that kind would interfere with British connection said : So much the worse for the British nation. In an earlier part of the session one of the hon. members on the other side of the House endeavoured to get the ear of the right hon. the leader of this House (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—I suppose, perhaps, due to the fact that he had his own ear to the ground and misunderstood certain sounds that he had heard—and attempted to dictate to him the course he should pursue at the Coronation. He endeavoured to convey to him the idea that he should represent in England that the people of Canada were lying awake at nights hoping that Great Britain would adopt a policy that would be absolutely and entirely for the benefit of the colonies and of Canada in particular. I have sufficient respect for the honoured leader of this House to know that he can gauge public opinion just as well as any man on the other side can gauge it, and I have sufficient respect for the leader of the Liberal party to know that when he goes to the Coronation he will not take the dictum of this member or of that member, but he will do what he believes to be in the interests of Great Britain as well as in the interests of Canada.

If there was one question, Sir, more than another upon which the present administration gained the confidence of the electors in 1900, it was on the question of tariff reform. This was an important issue in that election, and on that issue the people voted for the government. I know that some of our friends opposite say that we have not got tariff reform, but in one breath they tell us that we have tariff reform which is injuring the woollen industry for example, and in the next breath they tell us that this government has not reformed the tariff. They say it is not a tariff such as gives adequate protection to the manufacturer. For my part, I wish to assert that I believe the confidence of the electors of Canada can be maintained by the government standing in the direction of tariff reform. I believe that while the people of Canada are willing to concede to the manufacturers a reasonable amount of protection, they are not willing that that protection shall be unreasonable. I believe that the people of Canada are willing to give to the manufacturers sufficient protection to enable them to compete with outside competition, but they are not willing that the tariff shall be excessively high. If this government wishes to pursue a policy which shall be in the interests of the people and which will be endorsed by the people, then they will pursue the same policy of a moderate tariff and stability that has characterized their regime. Canada is tired of the tariff that the hon. gentleman opposite seek to reintroduce. This country has tried the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite would endeavour to again saddle upon the country, but the country has shown upon two successive occasions that it has no sympathy with the resolution of the leader of the opposition, and has no desire to again put in practice the extreme principle embodied in that resolution.

I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who do not believe in the fast Atlantic service—perhaps that is due to the fact that I live far from the sea-board. I believe this country can get along very well without a fast Atlantic service, as I understand it, and I think we have been wise in going slow in that respect. If the time comes when we are able to have a fast Atlantic service without too much cost to the country, perhaps it may be advisable and advantageous, but I believe we have been prudent in not hurrying into a scheme of that kind without very carefully considering what we are doing.

The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Rosamond) told us that the census was disappointing, and that we have not the population we would have, had we pursued some other policy. Let me point to the hon. gentlemen the fact, that the loss of our population to a very large extent took place during the period when the hon. gentleman's friends were in power. Is it not a fact that the failure of our population to increase as we should expect it would increase, happened during the period when the national policy was in operation; a policy practically identical with that set forth in the resolution of the leader of the opposition? The census was no doubt disappointing to all Canada, but if the policy of the Conservative party failed to create the industries which they say would have increased our population, is it at all reasonable to suppose that the reintroduction of that policy would have any effect? I contend, Sir, that the more you can make this country a cheap country to live in, without seriously interfering with the existing industries, the better it is for the country. Canada would have been infinitely better off if it had confined itself to what we understand to be a revenue tariff, and had never adopted what is known as the national policy. I know that it is difficult to get people to acknowledge a distinction between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff; for 25 per cent or 35 per cent even may be a revenue tariff and yet afford considerable protection. It is only a difference of degree between the two, but however that may be, I believe that our industries would have been just as prosperous; nay more so, if we had never resorted to the extreme features of the national policy. It removed from the people that spirit of self-dependence; that spirit of active energy; that spirit of determination, that spirit of self-assertiveness which would have prevailed had we not depended upon the assistance given us by the government. If our manufacturers had been thrown upon their own resources; if our manufacturers had catered to the wants of the people; if our manufacturers had endeavoured to branch out according to the legitimate demands of the country, I believe that our industries would be more prosperous than they are to-day, and that the country would have been all the better for it.

It is apparent to all who observe, the conditions in this country that for a considerable length of time, if not for all time, Canada must be first and foremost an agricultural country. We have the mining and the lumbering and the fishing industries of course, but with our vast area of fertile territory I repeat that Canada must be first of all an agricultural country. Therefore it is our duty to do all that we can to improve the condition of our agriculturists. When we can make it possible for him to earn more by the labour on his farm; when we can enable him to have more money to spend, that of course would mean an increase in the production of manufactured goods, because the farmer will spend more money on implements and upon clothing and other necessaries. Therefore, the prosperity of the agricultural class of the community means the prosperity of the manufacturers and of every other class of our population. The argument was advanced by the hon. gentlemen on the other side of this House, that because we did not adopt the policy advocated by the Conservative party, British capital was not being invested here, but during this very debate we have heard gentlemen on the other side declaim in unmeasured terms against the fact that American capitalists were investing money here. They claim that we were being Americanized; that the Americans were buying our railways, our steamship lines, our manufacturing industries, and that we were going to be completely at the mercy of American capital. Well, Sir, I can see no distinction between being at the mercy of American capitalists and being at the mercy of British capitalists, so far as this is concerned. If American capitalists are willing to invest in our railways, surely these railways must remain here and be worked here and so much the better for the welfare of the country. I certainly shall not raise my voice against American capital or British capital being invested in Canada.

Let me say a word or two as to the transportation question. I believe that the government is doing what it can to solve the transportation problem in this country. Gentlemen opposite find fault with the government for not doing as much as they can to increase our transportation facilities, but when the government wisely expends money in improving the Intercolonial Railway or in improving our water ways, these same gentlemen condemn the government for that expenditure There is no consistency in their arguments on that score. For my part, I shall not find fault with the government even if it increases the present large expenditures for the betterment of our transportation facilities, because I believe that these expenditures are like investments that are wisely and judiciously made, and in the end will redound to the advantage of Canada. I am glad that I am not called on to support the fallacious resolution that was placed before the House by the hon. leader of the opposition. Let me say that in general, I believe that the policy pursued by the present administration is a policy that meets with the cordial approval and support of the people of the Dominion as a whole ; it is a policy which is building up our industries, developing our resources, adding to our wealth and prosperity, and therefore worthy of the confidence of this House and of the country.

Mr. R. A. PRINGLE (Cornwall and Stormont) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, April 2, 1902.

The Speaker took the Chair at three o'clock.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Wm. Power, Esq., member for the electoral district of Quebec West, introduced by the Prime Minister (Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick).

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 81) to incorporate the Canadian Northern Telegraph Company.—Mr. Davis.

Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Nepigon Railway Company.—Mr. Campbell.

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Canadian Northern Express Company.—Mr. Davis.

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—Mr. McColl.

Bill (No. 85) respecting the South Shore Railway Company.—Mr. Geoffrion.

Bill (No. 86) respecting the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.—Mr. Parmelee.

Bill (No. 87) respecting the Quebec Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Geoffrion.

Bill (No. 88) respecting the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company.—Mr. Scott.

QUESTIONS.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH LINE TO DAWSON.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria)—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. What is the total length of the government telegraph line from Ashcroft, B.C., to Dawson, by divisions :—(a.) Ashcroft to Quesnell ? (b.) Quesnell to Atlin ? (c.) Atlin to Dawson ?

2. What was the original cost of the line to Quesnell ?

3. What was the cost of the sections from (a.) Quesnell to Atlin, and (b.) Atlin to Dawson ?

4. How many persons are engaged in the operation and maintenance of the line ?

5. What are the rates of pay and allowances, if any, for the different classes of employees ?

6. What are the telegraph rates ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), who is not present, has requested me to ask that the hon. member will be good enough to convert that question into a motion.

CHIEF JUSTICE STRONG.

Mr. CASGRAIN—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

In the Appropriation Act No. 2, 1901, contained in cap. 2 at p. 17 of Acts of 1901, the following item appears :—

Expenses of Chief Justice Strong in connection with sittings of Judicial Committee of Privy Council, $1,000.

Was the sum paid, and did the Chief Justice attend the sittings of the Judicial Committee in the year 1901 ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Chas. Fitzpatrick). I have to say that the amount in question has not been paid to the Chief Justice, for the very good reason that he did not attend any sitting of the Privy Council in the year 1901.

ABSTRACTION FROM REGISTERED LETTERS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

1. Was the Post Office Department advised of the abstraction of five dollars in the month of May or June last, from a registered letter posted at Seeley's Bay P.O., in the county of Leeds, by a Mrs. Coleman, addressed to Toronto ? Also of the loss of five dollars from a registered letter posted at Morton P.O., in the said county of Leeds, at about the same time, by a Mrs. Manuel ?

2. If so was the matter investigated, and by whom ? Was a report made by the party who made the investigation ?

3. Was the postmaster at Morton removed from office in consequence of an investigation made by the assistant inspector; or was the postmaster exonerated from blame and responsibility?

4. Did the inspector report to the department the result of the investigation?

5. Was the report withdrawn and replaced by another, in which the facts were not fully or properly represented?

6. Was the postmaster and his assistant practically exonerated in the substituted reports?

7. If the postmaster was not removed, was his resignation called for by the Postmaster General or any other person? If so, when and by whom, and for what reason?

8. Did Mr. Judd and other persons of the village of Morton make representations to the department? If so, did their representations agree with the report of the inspector? If not, in what respect did they differ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Wm. Mulock). The department has no information as to the abstraction of five dollars in the month of May or June last from a registered letter posted at Seeley's Bay by Mrs. Coleman. Perhaps the question has reference to the alleged abstraction of one dollar from a non-registered letter posted by Mrs. Coleman at the office in question. This matter was referred to Inspector Merrick who reported that 'personal inquiry has been made at Seeley's Bay and Morton but no evidence was obtained which would lead me to suppose that the letter was tampered with at either of these offices, and I am of opinion that it left Morton in same condition as posted.'

With reference to the other inquiry, namely, the loss of five dollars from registered letter posted at Morton by Mrs. Manuel, this matter was referred to inspector who investigated and reported thereon. The inspector reported that in his opinion the loss occurred at the Morton post office, but he did not find who was the guilty party. His report showed the existence of more or less laxity which rendered it possible for persons other than those officially connected with the office to abstract a registered letter. The report of the inspector was not withdrawn or replaced by any other report. The postmaster was not removed nor was his resignation called for by the Postmaster General. The department has no knowledge as to whether any other persons called upon him to resign. No representations upon the subject have been made to the department by Mr. Judd or any other persons of the village of Morton.

MAIL CONTRACT, ROUND HILL—ARMSTRONG'S CORNER, N.B.

Mr. FOWLER—by Mr. Taylor—asked:

1. Why was the recent change made in the carrying of the mail from Round Hill, in Greenwich, King's County, N.B., to Armstrong's Corner, Queen's County, N.B.?

2. Upon whose recommendation was the change made, and what reasons were given for the same?

3. Were tenders asked for the new service; and if not, why not?

4. Who is the mail carrier on the route as at present constituted; and what pay does he receive for such service?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Wm. Mulock):

1. There has been no change made in the mail service between Armstrong's Corner and Round Hill, New Brunswick.

This answers 2 and 3.

4. The present contractor is Francis A. Wood, who is paid at the rate of one hundred and sixty dollars per annum.

RAILWAY LANDS—PATENTS.

Mr. OLIVER—by Mr. Scott—asked:

1. How many acres of land were patented to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company up to the 1st of March, 1902?

2. How many acres were patented to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company up to the 1st of March, 1902?

3. Is it the intention of the government to continue issuing patents to these companies until all their land has been patented to them?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton):

1. The number of acres patented to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, up to 1st of March, 1902, is 9,464,572·51.

2. The number of acres patented to the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company, up to 1st of March, 1902, is 1,002,003·26.

3. Yes. There is a temporary delay in the case of the Calgary and Edmonton Company, but patentry will, no doubt, be proceeded with in a short time.

N.W.T.—TAXATION OF RAILWAY LANDS—C.P.R. LAND GRANT.

Mr. OLIVER—by Mr. Scott—asked:

What measures, if any, have been taken by the government to submit the question of the termination of the exemption from taxation of the Canadian Pacific Railway land grant to the courts?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton). A memorandum was submitted to the Deputy Minister of Justice on the 7th of October last, asking that steps should be taken for the purpose of having the question referred to determined by the courts. A variety of detailed information was required by the Department of Justice before the matter could be fully considered, and the method of submitting the question decided upon, and some delay necessarily took place. It was finally concluded that the question could best be settled by bringing about a suit between a local municipality and the railway company, which would constitute a test case. The land commissioner of the Department of the Interior and the Deputy Minister of Justice are making arrangements to bring this about.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—PURCHASE OF HORSES IN NORTH-WESTERN CANADA.

Mr. OLIVER—by Mr. Scott—asked:

Has the government any information as to its being the intention of the War Office to purchase horses in North-western Canada during the coming summer?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). The government has no official information in regard to this matter, but it is a matter of public notoriety that the War Office is purchasing horses in Canada at the present time for South Africa through its officer, Col. Dent, and that that officer has expressed the expectation of purchasing horses in the North-west Territories during the coming summer.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed, adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding):

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. R. A. PRINGLE (Cornwall and Stormont). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate. What has surprised me has been the variety of opinions expressed by hon. gentlemen on the government side of the House. The hon. gentleman who spoke last night, the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes), opened his remarks by referring to the inconsistencies that the opposition were led up to. I think it ill-becomes any hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House to refer to inconsistencies. Their whole record has been a record of inconsistencies. I am not going over all those old and pretty well threshed out subjects now—commercial union, unrestricted reciprocity, continental free trade, free trade as they have it in Great Britain, and all the other fads and policies which these hon. gentlemen advocated for a period of eighteen years. I say that in so far as this side of the House is concerned there has been no inconsistency. We have been twitted with having the old policy of some twenty-five years ago. We are proud to stand by the policy which was advocated twenty-five years ago, and we believe it is the policy which is in the best interests of the Dominion of Canada. The hon. member for West Huron spoke in regard to the woollen industry, following the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Rosamond). He stated in regard to that industry that if those engaged in it were not satisfied with a duty of 23 per cent, they should get out of business. He is only reiterating the statements made by members of the government. I say that is not a fair statement, it was not a proper statement, and it is all the more reason why we, on this side of the House, should ask for a declared policy and that the manufacturers should know just what their position is in regard to the tariff. The hon. gentleman went on to say in regard to that industry that he had not as yet had any evidence of the woollen industry being in an unsatisfactory condition. He said that in so far as he could ascertain, the woollen industry was thriving, and that every mill in this country was running on full time. I would like to take him to the town of Cornwall, in the electoral district which I have the honour to represent. I can show him a mill in which there are some $200,000 invested and which is one of the best equipped mills in Canada, but, which, to-day, has closed its doors necessitating the discharge of 170 operators. In regard to these operators, about fifty of them are the heads of families. Each of these families will average about five persons. The closing down of that mill simply means taking the bread out of the mouths of 350 people in the town of Cornwall. It cannot be said that the people behind this mill had not sufficient capital to run it, and make the running of it profitable. The mill is owned, as you know, by Lord Mount Stephen, a very wealthy man who is quite able to operate the mill, if, under existing conditions, there was any object in operating it. Now, I say that the hon. member for West Huron, before he makes a statement of that sort, should inquire and see just what the condition of the woollen industry is in this country. The hon. member for North Lanark has given some very valuable figures in regard to the increased importation of woollens between 1897 and 1901, and it is quite apparent that it has almost doubled within that period, to the injury of the woollen industry of this country. The hon. member for West Huron also stated that it was in the interests of this country that there should be a reduction in the tariff in regard to other lines of articles which are consumed by the people. He is one of the hon. gentlemen who are evidently in favour of a tariff for revenue, or free trade. He has referred to the policy of the Conservative party, and he says that that policy was an anti-British policy. I will just refer him to the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) some time ago when he clearly stated that if the policy which he advocated of unrestricted reciprocity discriminated against Great Britain, he was quite satisfied that it should do so. The hon. gentleman has said :

I believe this country would have been better off if we never had a national policy.

I shall not go back to the dark days between 1873 and 1878, when owing to the Mackenzie government not meeting the conditions as they arose, Canada was in a most depressed state. We all know that the Conservative tariff, inaugurated in 1879, was really the first Canadian tariff that gave thorough protection to our home industries. We know that the results of that tariff were most satisfactory. Two years after the adoption of protection there was collected $2,900,000 more than was necessary for the expenditure of the country, while prior to that time, year in and year out, there were deficits. The official statistics tell us that within two years after the adoption of protection in 1879, there was an increase of over $20,000,000 in the value of bank stocks; the Canadian labourer got better wages; the Canadian manufacturer made larger profits; the Canadian merchant increased his business, and the Canadian farmer obtained a higher price for his products. It is needless to dwell further on the prosperity which Canada enjoyed as a result of the adoption of the national policy. Any one who looks at the statistics will see the progress which Canada made during the years immediately succeeding 1879.

We have had a good many speeches from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and we have had a good many different theories advanced by them as to our fiscal policy. The hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton); the hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and other supporters of the government, made strong protectionist speeches, while the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) came out as a straight free trader. At all events the hon. member (Mr. Edwards) is consistent, and he holds to his theory of free trade no matter what policy the government he supports may place before the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) told us that the conditions in Canada are very similar to the conditions which exist in the United States. I agree with that statement to the extent that our natural resources are similar to the resources possessed by the United States. But, the hon. gentleman said further on in his speech :

The proposition that you can protect the labouring man is the greatest absurdity that was ever spoken.

I do not agree with that statement. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) turns to the statistics, he will find that in every protectionist country the rate of wages has increased, while in the free trade countries the rate of wages has diminished. That would indicate that you can protect the labouring man. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) also said :

In my estimation protection is neither more nor less than legalized robbery.

That is the old old story. For years and years the Liberals made that declaration when they were out of power. But if protection is legalized robbery, why did not the party which the member for Russell supports abolish protection when they got into power ? Why did not they institute free trade instead of adopting to a large extent the national policy, which was inaugurated by the Conservative party ? Perhaps the hon. member for Russell can settle that with his political leaders. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) further said :

In the United States every producer of the natural resources of that country is a slave.

With that statement of the hon. gentleman I cannot agree. The producers of the United States would, no doubt, be themselves astonished to hear that. Further, the hon. member said :

I believe our duty is to legislate for the Canadian people without any regard to what the American people or any other people do.

In that statement I absolutely concur, and I say that in the interest of the Canadian people we should have a declared and settled policy of adequate protection in this country. The hon. member for Russell has spoken of the history of the United States, and he told us that the industrial history of that country had not been a record of success. Well, we in Canada are much interested in the history of the United States, and if time permitted I could carry this House back to all the protectionist measures that were adopted by the neighbouring republic. To begin with, I would have to take you back to the second Act which was placed on the statute-books of the Congress of the United States, and which was the foundation stone of the success of the industries of that country. From the date of the passage of that Act until the present time, there have been almost continuous tariff Acts passed by congress, giving protection to the industries of the United States, and whenever that country reduced the tariff and moved in the direction of free trade, there was a financial crisis and trade was depressed. I believe that we in Canada have got to look at this matter largely in the light of experience, and I say that the experience of other nations in dealing with fiscal matters should be a guide to us. Let us remember that it is not only the United States that has adopted a high protective tariff. I think I am safe in saying that every nation under the sun, with the single exception of Great Britain, has adopted protection as its policy. France to-day is one of the richest countries in the world, and France is highly protective. We all know the industrial history of Germany. We know that Germany in years gone by had a protective tariff, and we know that tariff was lowered to the great disadvantage of Germany. We know that in 1897, Bismarck came down with a manifesto which was acceptable to the German people, and they carried a protective tariff by a large majority, the result of which has been that since that time Germany has gone on increasing in wealth and increasing in prosperity.

Mr. EDWARDS. What are the conditions in Germany to-day ?

Mr. PRINGLE. The conditions in Germany are, I understand, prosperous.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. EDWARDS. Germany is to-day experiencing the greatest depression she has ever known in her existence.

Mr. MACLEAN. Probably because they have not enough protection.

Mr. EDWARDS. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pringle) a question ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PRINGLE. I would be pleased to answer the hon. member for Russell.

Mr. EDWARDS. Belgium is close to France and Germany, and would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pringle) tell me what are the present conditions in Belgium. Will he also kindly tell us of the conditions of Switzerland, a small country, and also of Holland ?

Mr. MACLEAN. And Ireland.

Mr. PRINGLE. I would like very much to deal with all the countries of the world ; but if I deal with France, Germany, Russia, the United States and one or two more, I think this House will be satisfied. I could quote from a very able author to show that the conditions in the country to which the hon. gentleman refers are better under the system which it has adopted than they were formerly. I might refer, for the benefit of the hon. member for Russell, to the condition of Germany. In 1879 Prince Bismarck came down with this utterance :

> One thing is clear that through the widely open doors of its import trade, the German market has become a mere storage space for the over production of other countries. We must therefore shut our gates and take care that the German market which is now being monopolized by foreign wares shall be reserved for native industry. Countries which are inclosed have become great, and those which have remained open have fallen behind. Were the perils of protection really so great as sometimes painted, France would long ago have been ruined, instead of which she was more prosperous than Germany to-day, and protectionist Russia too. Look at her marvellous prosperity. The question before us is not a political but a financial one, and we should put all personal sensibility aside. The brief experience of the German people with the policy of free trade had afforded examples which proved the error that had been committed by the free trade minister in abandoning the time-honoured policy under which Germany had grown great, and the foundation had been laid for erecting the mightiest empire in central Europe.

The Bill was passed on July 7th, 1879, by a vote of 217 for, and 117 against. The Chancellor in 1885, in referring to the policy of protection said it had freed the country from its poverty of blood. The exports of manufactured articles had increased over 33 per cent. Wages and profits had materially increased, by a report of the German iron and steel manufacturers representing 247 works. It appeared that the number of artisans employed had increased 35 per cent in 1884 over 1879.

We find a similar history in Russia. In extent of domain and in the enjoyment of certain natural and geographical advantages, Russia is probably the grandest empire on the globe, with twice the area of the United States and 160 times that of England and Wales. It embraces one-sixth of the world's habitable land. How much the population exceeds 115,000,000 is not known. It is supposed to be about 120,000,000. In 1819 the protective system was entirely abandoned. A low rate of duty was retained, but it gave such freedom to the importation of goods as seriously to affect all manufactures. On the other hand, England and France had tariffs of a strong protective character, and Russia was at a double disadvantage. It did not take her long to see the necessity of again returning to protection, and in 1822 a new customs tariff was adopted, and the importations of foreign goods were subjected to high duties. Russia has never since returned to free trade. Her tariff systems have changed, but always with more or less protective features. From 1822 till 1849 high duties were maintained ; from 1850 to 1876 more moderate duties prevailed ; while from 1877 to the present time duties have been levied in a series of measures with a view of protecting Russian productions and Russian industries. The effect of a return to a strict protective system in 1876 was accompanied by a marked advance and wonderful strides in industrial progress. A general revision of the tariff was carried out in 1891. The rapid advance made in recent years proves beyond a question that Russia will soon be numbered among the greatest manufacturing nations of the world.

The hon. member for Russell, who unquestionably is a strong free trader, may possibly, like the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), change his mind. I may tell him that men in the United States, though probably not of the ability of the hon. gentleman, have seen fit to change their minds. I remember reading of Daniel Webster, one of the cleverest men ever produced in the United States, who was an ardent free trader until pretty well advanced in life, but who then changed his views on the subject, and came out frankly and manfully and said : 'I have been a free trader, but I have come to see that free trade is against the interests of this nation, and I am now a protectionist.' The hon. member for Russell may follow the example of Daniel Webster, and we may see him coming forward next session with a confession like that of the hon. member for North Norfolk.

I might quote the language of Sir John Barnard Byles, which I think contains a great deal of truth. He says :

A nation, whether it consumes its own productions or with them purchases from abroad, can have no more to spend than it produces. Therefore the supreme policy of every nation is to develop its own producing forces.

I say the supreme policy of Canada is to develop its own producing forces. There is no reason why the people of this country should import from the United States of America sixty or seventy million dollars worth of manufactured goods. We can make those goods in Canada, and I believe we should make them in Canada ; and notwithstanding what we hear from the opposite side of the House, I believe there are men sitting on the government benches today who are just as strong protectionists as we are, and who will adapt themselves to the conditions existing in this country. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) made a very strong speech along the line of free trade ; but I say that he does not agree with the leaders of the Liberal party to-day. Does he agree with the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), who made a very strong protectionist speech in this House a short time ago ? Does he agree with the Hon. George W. Ross, the Premier of Ontario ? That gentleman does not say that the national policy was a curse to this country. What he says is that the Conservative party were the first to discover the benefits of a protective tariff and to introduce it into this country. This is the language of the Hon. George W. Ross, addressed to the legislative assembly of Ontario on the 22nd of January, 1902 :

It was on this continent largely that the idea of fostering trade by a direct intervention of the government, grew up ; and perhaps it is on this continent that it has as strong a hold as it has in any part of the world. The American government sixty or seventy years ago entered upon a policy of fostering its industries by protection. Germany, France, Italy, Russia, and latterly the Australian Commonwealth has followed in the footsteps of the United States. The purpose in every case, whether wisely or unwisely, whether according to the principles of Adam Smith, or the protectionist school, was to add to the wealth of the nation and to develop its raw material, and to increase its resources. The same object has been aimed at in various other ways. Railways have been built by subvention in land and money, for the development of the latent resources of the country. The states of the Union, including the federal government, have given nearly one hundred million acres of land for that purpose, as well as large cash subsidies. The Dominion government did so for the Canadian Pacific Railway, and no doubt that road would never have been built unless so aided. (Opposition members—Hear, hear.) We have done so in Ontario, and the other provinces of the Dominion have followed our example. Bounties have been given for the development of special industries in France and in Germany ; bounties by the Dominion goverament for the development of iron and steel ; bounties by the Ontario government for the development of our iron industry, and latterly the proposed bounty for the encouragement of the beet-root sugar industry.

Then he goes on to deal with the question of bounty, and proceeds to say :

The object of my argument is to show that it seems to be admitted all round that a government in modern times has something more to do than merely discharge administrative functions. It has to be the pioneer, if possible, at all events the foster parent, of manufactures and commerce. It has, if possible, to devise ways and means by which the material wealth of the people it represents for the time being may be promoted. It is supposed to stand upon the financial watch-tower, as well as upon the administrative watch-tower, and wherever any great industry lies dormant which the wealth and means at the disposal of the government can awaken, or where any great enterprise can be encouraged for which private capital is insufficient, it seems to be the rule in modern times for nearly every government to put its hand to these varied means of enriching a nation; and, wisely or unwisely, for good or for evil, tax the whole people, in order that the whole people may be wealthy.

Again he adds :

It would be an easy thing for a government to say : 'Give us so much money and we will administer the affairs of the country, see that officers are appointed for the various duties, see that checks are issued for salaries'—that would be an easy duty. It is another matter for a government to assume the responsibility of leading the nation, or leading and educating the people to apply their minds to the development of industry, and to the fostering of manufactures or to the development of latent resources, or to any other purpose which may be of more immediate advantage to one or more sections of the country than to the whole country. I think the modern view, although it imposed great responsibility upon the government, is the one we were bound to accept. And I am proud to be able to say that in the province of Ontario, as well as at Ottawa—we have addressed ourselves to the solution, or rather to the discharge, of that duty. In fact, I do not know but the Dominion government, the Conservative government at Ottawa years ago, realized more quickly than perhaps some of us did—(Opposition members—Hear, hear)—what seemed to be the direction—of universal opinion, I was going to say—or rather the direction of all civilized governments at that time, and, realizing that view, they struck out a course which in many respects has been followed since, and has been accepted by some other countries since that time.

These views of the Hon. Mr. Ross certainly do not coincide with those of many of the speakers from the government side of the House. Mr. Ross admits that the Conservative party were the first to adopt that policy of protection which was necessary in Canada, and to which all civilized countries have turned their attention. Let me just refer to another quotation from the Hon. Mr. Ross, and I do so more particularly to show that when the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) says that the Americans have not prospered under protection, he does not agree with his leader in the province of Ontario. The Hon. George W. Ross says :

> The Americans have become strong largely by the dominant strain which has permeated American legislation and commerce for the last thirty years, and they have become self sustaining to a great extent; and the British navy has been dominated by the idea, since Nelson's time, that the British navy is invincible. And so will we Canadians, by being imbued with the same spirit of manufacturing our own goods as far as we can, developing our own resources where we have the means, become self sustaining, applying ourselves with energy and tact to whatever comes to hand.

Then he proceeds to deal with the factory question :

> A factory means not merely the investment of capital but the employment of intelligent men and women.

He adds further :

> We must make special efforts to have the waste places of the country filled up, and its raw materials and products must be manufactured so far as possible, in the country.

To me it seems a good deal of a farce to hear a large number of gentlemen on the government benches make free trade speeches, and then to find another set get up and make protectionist speeches, and to find the government in the position of having adopted, to a great extent, the national policy. But where they have interfered with that policy they have done so to the injury of the people of this country.

A great deal has been said about free trade England. I do not propose to go back into the history of England. We all know that there was a long and interesting period prior to 1846 when England enjoyed the most rigid protection. We know that in 1337—I think in the reign of Edward III—there were passed enactments for the fostering and encouragement of English industries. We know that from 1337 down to 1846 a most rigid system of protection prevailed in that country. And this very industry, which has been so frequently spoken of here, the woollen industry, owes its present position to that protection. There would have been no possibility of England at that time manufacturing woollen goods for her own people had she not enjoyed the most rigid protection. It was under that policy that the woollen industry of England was built up, just as were built up her other manufacturing industries, until in 1846 they were in a position to dispense with protection and to throw down the tariff wall.

I would like to refer just for a moment to the experience of the United States under a low tariff. I find on reference to the New York 'Tribune' of January 15th, that in 1855 the United States were still under their old tariff law of 1846. That was a very low tariff, and here is how Mr. Horace Greeley, in the New York 'Tribune,' describes its effects :

> The cry of hard times reaches us from every part of the country. The making of roads is stopped; factories are closed; and houses and ships are no longer being built; factory hands, road makers, carpenters, bricklayers, and labourers are idle and paralysis is rapidly embracing every pursuit in the country. The cause of all this stoppage of circulation is to be found in the steady overflow of gold to pay foreign labourers for the cloth, the shoes, the iron and other things that could be produced by American labour, but which cannot be so produced under our present revenue system.

Let me also cite the opinion of another authority, Mr. Peter Cooper :

> British iron and cloth came in and gold went out, and with each successive day the dependence of our farmers on foreign markets became more complete ; with 1857 came the culmination of the system. Merchants and manufacturers being ruined, banks being compelled to suspend payment, and the treasury being reduced to a condition of bankruptcy nearly approaching that which had existed at the close of the free trade period of 1817 and 1839.

President Buchanan described the condition of things, in his message of December 14th, 1860, in the following language :—

> Panic and distress of a fearful character prevails throughout the land. Our labouring population is without employment and consequently deprived of the means of earning their bread. Indeed all hope seems to have deserted the minds of men.

These quotations are of course not evidence, and it is wise for us to look at the statistics to find the proofs of the statements made by such men as President Buchanan, Mr. Cooper, Mr. Horace Greeley and the others. We find that in 1846 there were imported into the United States cotton goods to the value of $13,530,625. In 1860, under this low tariff, there were imported of the same goods to the value of $32,559,024. Take the article of clothing. There was imported in 1864 $847,742 worth, and in 1860 $2,102,296 worth. Then take woollens, with the exceptions of carpets, we find that in 1846 the imports amounted to $9,850,307, and in 1860 they had increased to $35,394,422, or an increase of 360 per cent. Fortunately for the United States a higher tariff measure was brought down. From 1860 until 1890 a fairly high tariff was in force, but in 1890 the McKinley tariff came in. What effect had that tariff on the woollen industry of the United States ? The consumption increased some 17 per cent, while the value of woollen goods imported decreased to the extent of $21,000,000. It has often been said that the McKinley tariff was a hardship on the consumer. I maintain that that was not the case. For while that tariff protected the manufacturers and the other industries of the United States, the American consumer got his goods at a lower price than he did under a low tariff. That whole question was referred to a very competent committee, consisting of the following gentlemen :—Canon D. Wright, Commissioner of the Department of Labour; General Francis A. Walker, Prof. H. C. Adams, Edward Atkinson, Prof. E. J. James and William Grosvenor. The first man on that committee was an independent on the tariff question. The next three were pronounced free traders and the next two were protectionists. What did that committee report ? It reported as follows I only quote a short portion of report :

> During the twenty-eight months from June 1, 1889, to September 1, 1891 (the Act took effect in 1896), the average retail prices of 214 articles of common consumption among the people declined 64 per cent,—wholesale prices of the same article declined 33 per cent, the prices of agricultural products advanced 67 per cent, and wages advanced on the average 75 per cent.

This report was unanimously adopted by the Senate Committee, composed of both Republicans and Democrats. I say that this report is a most important document. It shows that under high protective tariff, under that McKinley tariff, the prices of articles commonly used and consumed by the people decreased, the rate of wages increased and the prices to the agriculturists increased by no less than 18·67 per cent. The history of the United States of America has been simply this—that parties who gave protection to the country gave prosperity to the country and that those who failed to give that protection brought disaster to the United States. May I be allowed to refer to an earlier period in the history of the American Republic. We know that in 1824 the United States passed a protective tariff. They were bound to increase their protection, because the British manufacturer at that time, owing to the United States low tariff had got possession of their markets. And Henry Clay, who was one of the leading lights of that time, in speaking of the results of a protective tariff—and the protection afforded was a great deal higher than we have in Canada to-day —said :

> If a term of seven years were to be selected of the greatest prosperity which the people have enjoyed since the establishment of this present constitution, it would be exactly that period which immediately followed the passage of the tariff of 1824.

Now, while this government were pledged to a large reduction in our tariff, they have practically maintained the tariff of the Conservative party, except in so far as the preferential feature is concerned. Let me say a word in this connection, concerning the cotton industry. In the town in which I have the honour to live, the town of Cornwall, we are interested in that industry, manufacturing there, very largely, coloured cottons. Under the late government, we had a protective duty of 30 per cent. Hon. gentlemen opposite and their supporters, when in opposition, attacked the Conservative government on account of that duty of 30 per cent. Those engaged in the manufacture of cottons were spoken of as 'Cotton Barons' and, from one end of the country to the other speeches were made attacking the cotton industry. But when these hon. gentlemen came into power they did not cut down the tariff. As a citizen of Cornwall, I felt very thankful for that. On the other hand, the government increased the duty by 5 per cent, making it 35 per cent, and then they brought in their preferential tariff. But I say that that preferential tariff is an injury to the cotton industry, and it is no wonder that three of the largest cotton manufacturing concerns passed their dividends within the last year. I have only to look at the returns to find that over $4,000,000 worth of cotton goods were imported into this country under the preferential tariff last year. And, of the class of cotton goods manufactured in our town, over $2,000,000 worth were imported. I quote these figures from memory, but I believe they are substantially correct. Now, it must be plain that that is a great injury to the cotton industry of the country. Prior to the preferential tariff coloured cotton goods came largely from the United States of America. Under the preferential tariff these goods are coming in from Great Britain, and they are coming in at prices which make it almost impossible to compete with them. One hon. gentleman on the other side, speaking in this debate, said that the woollen mills were running night and day. Our cotton industry may be running full time, but they may not be making any money, owing to the competition from outside.

We have also the hon. member from West York (Mr. Campbell) who I must say, ought to support this amendment. If he is correctly reported, he made a very strong protectionist speech at a banquet of the Manufacturers' Association in the city of Montreal. Referring to the large importation of agricultural implements, this is what he said :

> If we can have these goods manufactured in the Dominion and the duty were raised, it would mean that this $2,500,000 worth of goods would be made here ; and the actual fact of such manufacture being established would mean an increase of, say, 25,000 to 30,000 in the population. As it is in this line, so would it be in other lines. The tariff is going to be revised before long—I hope this session.

Now this is a very strong utterance, and what does it mean ? Is it a farce ? Are they playing with the people ? One branch of the government supporters are going out in the country and saying: We are going to have an increase in the tariff. Another branch of the government supporters are going out and saying, where it suits them, we are adhering to our principles, and intend to reduce the tariff gradually. The Minister of Finance says there will be a revision next year, and we cannot assume that he will increase the tariff. The only assumption possible is that he will reduce the tariff in accordance with the pledges made by himself and other members of the government. I say that this is a farce. The people of this country ought to know definitely what the position of the government is in regard to the tariff. Are they going to reduce it, or are they going to increase it? Where the government find an industry is seriously affected by the preferential tariff, are they going to step in and give that industry the protection that it needs, so that it may have a part in the prosperity of this country? I say, Sir, that we require a declared and settled policy in regard to this tariff question.

The government have taken great credit for the increased imports into this country from Great Britain. In 1900, according to the first plank in their platform as laid down in 1893, where they promised to wipe out the national policy, &c., they issued a manifesto to the people saying that this preferential tariff had resulted in largely increased sales of British goods to Canada. Now, Sir, I do not think that it is in the interests of the Canadian workmen that that tariff should have the result of largely increasing the sales of British goods to the people of Canada, especially of that class of goods that we can manufacture ourselves. And this manifesto was issued before the full reduction of 33⅓ per cent had been made in favour of British goods. I would like, Mr. Speaker, for a moment to refer to the woollen industry. I find in the 'Canadian Manufacturer' of January 3rd, an article on this British preference, and after dealing with statistics, and showing the large increase of importations of woollens from Great Britain, it says this:

> As herein shown, notwithstanding the tariff preference, our import trade with Great Britain is, as compared with our whole trade, fallen behind, not only in manufactures of metals but also in textiles, it is fair to enquire why the preference, for which we receive no quid pro quo should be continued. It has no effect whatever upon our imports of metal goods, and is therefore only valuable as a sentiment, which, in trade, does not count for much, but it most seriously and adversely affects our Canadian woollen industry, and for that reason if for no other, it should be cancelled, or very materially modified; and one very important feature of any modification it should include is a reciprocal preference on the part of Great Britain and any other British country with which Canadians desire to do business.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Holmes) said there was no progress in this country under the national policy. Without being too local, I would say in regard to the town of Cornwall in the county which I have the honour to represent, that our increase in population from 1881 to 1891 was 2,337, or 52 per cent. That was due almost entirely to the policy of the Conservative party in protecting the industries of this country. People with capital had confidence in the future of Canada, and they invested in large cotton industries in that town. But apart from that case, what do we find throughout the country? We find that from 1881 to 1891 there was an increase in the number of manufacturing establishments in this country of over 51 per cent, find there was an increase in the amount of capital invested in industries of 114 per cent; and we find the number of employees increased 44 per cent. Now it is idle for the Minister of Agriculture to go into constituencies in this country and say that if the woollen industry cannot exist on a 23 per cent protection it should be wiped out. I say the woollen manufacturers have invested over $10,000,000 of capital in Canada, expecting that the government would give them reasonable protection. I think it is the duty of the government to see that these woollen manufacturers have sufficient protection to put them on an equal footing with their foreign competitors.

I do not intend to deal with the financial question, which has been already covered so completely by the numerous speakers who have preceded me. I will, however, say this, that while the members of the present government were very much horrified at an expenditure of $38,000,000 per annum, they seem to be delighted now at an expenditure of $62,000,000 to $63,000,000 per annum. We find that during the last four or five years, from 1897 to 1901, their total expenditure was $250,550,003, and their total revenues during the same period were $228,670,960. There is a total deficit of $21,879,043 during that period of great prosperity, a period of world-wide prosperity. Not only did this country enjoy prosperity, but there was prosperity in every section of the habitable globe. During that period, with such a buoyant revenue, it was the duty of these gentlemen who found so much fault with an expenditure of $38,000,000, at least to have avoided a prodigal expenditure which left them with a deficit of over $21,000,000 during that period of five years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said here from the agriculturist standpoint. Nobody recognizes more clearly than I do that agriculture is the largest and most important industry of this country, and in it are engaged more people than in any other single occupation. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for West Huron saying that the agriculturist of this country was not benefited by protection. Then if he is not benefited by protection, why do not the government remove all protection from the agriculturist of this country? When I turn to the 'Hansard' for 1890, I find that there were tremendous importations of fresh meats and other meats; I think that year 33,000,000 pounds of American meat came into Canada, notwithstanding that we then had protection in favour of the farmers, and the Conservative party advocated an increased protection on meats coming in from the United States. We find that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce opposed it. He voted against it, and every member of the government voted against it, but, when they came into power they dared not reduce it. They left it just as it was framed by the Conservatives in 1890. If protection in favour of the agriculturists of this country is a curse, why do not hon. gentlemen remove it? They have removed the protection from three or four articles, and they have removed it to the detriment and injury of the agriculturists of this country. We have a number of hon. gentlemen coming from the western portions of this great Dominion. I may say I am always pleased to hear them speak and advocate their views, but, these hon. gentlemen, instead of being sectional, should be guided by broader lines. They should be national. They must not think that they have all the interests in the west. They have great and important interests, they are going to assist in making this a wealthy country, but their history will be largely the history of the United States. We remember the days when Illinois and the western states were all opposed to protection. We find to-day that in the western states the population has changed. We find that the manufacturers have had to remove to the west to be near the agriculturists of those states. Let me just quote a word from a very able author in connection with the agricultural condition of the United States. Before I quote that I would like to say that in looking at the report of the bureau of statistics of the United States, I find this statement from the chief of that bureau:

> Following on the rapid advance in the population of the western states, large and diversified manufacturing enterprises of this country have moved steadily towards the west.

I believe, and I firmly believe, that if the policy advocated by the Conservative party were carried out in this country you would see large manufacturing industries established in Winnipeg to supply the people of that great western country and the articles that they require would be manufactured by Canadians for the Canadians in the west. The statement has been made that the agriculturists of the United States have not prospered under protection. I say that statement is untrue, that statistics show us that the progress of the agriculturists of the United States has been greater than the progress of the agriculturists of any other nation under the sun. Wealth in the United States has increased at an enormous rate. Mulhall, whom I do not think any one will accuse of being a protectionist, in his 'Industries and Wealth of Nations,' in 1896, says:

> The growth of American agriculture in half a century has been unparalleled in any age or nation.

Then he goes on to say:

> In 1840 the United States produced——

And he gives the quantities. He also gives the production in 1850, showing that there had been a marvellous increase. I am not going to detain the House by giving these figures. This promient authority in the United States says:

> While the great manufacturing industries of the United States were in process of creation instead of diverting capital from the development of agriculture there is a consensus of opinion that the artificial system of promoting manufactures has contributed more to the rapid opening up of the fertile land of the western states than any other cause.

The statement has been made that wages are lower in protectionist countries than in free trade countries. I am not going to weary the House by giving statistics in regard to that matter, but I have taken the trouble of going into the tables, and I find that wages have increased in every protectionist country while they have diminished in free trade countries. I find that in the United States the increase has been very large. Take journeymen carpenters, for instance; between 1840 and 1860 they received $1.25 per day, and subsequent to 1860 the price ranged from $1.25 to $1.75 a day. In 1891, when the McKinley Bill came into force, wages ran from $3 to $3.25 per day, and this has been the history of all protectionist countries. I am now going back for a moment to the woollen industry in the United States. I find by looking at the statistics that the imports of woollens during the twelve months ending December, 1894, amounted to $16,809,872. In 1895, under free trade, or rather, under a lower tariff, because it was not free trade, the imports amounted to $60,319,309. We find that when the Gorman-Wilson tariff came into force in the United States that the manufacturers found it was utterly impossible for them to compete with the foreign product. Some mills were built at Bradford, England, solely for the purpose of supplying the people of the United States with woollen goods. Subsequent to the repeal of that law these mills were closed, the machinery was brought to the United States of America and woollen goods were manufactured for the American people. I would like to give a few figures from the industrial census of the United States for 1893, showing under this low tariff the injury to the business and people of the United States. There was a decrease in labour of 60½ per cent, a decrease in wages of 69 per cent, and a decrease in business of 47 per cent. The number of hands out of work was 101,763, and the total loss in the weekly wages was $1,202,000. There was an average decrease in the rate of wages of $2.35 per week. There was a loss in wages of over $300,000,000, in round figures. A very good barometer as to the condition of the country is the number of failures, and in looking up these figures I find that under Cleveland in 1894 there were 12,721 failures and that under Harrison in 1894 there were 10,034, Cleveland's extra industry of the sheriff in that respect being 2,687. I say that, go where we will, under present conditions, there is no market to gain on the face of the globe. Other nations are not only producing for themselves, but are also looking for foreign markets. I am not going into all the figures of our imports except to say roughly that we imported from the United States during last year $119,000,000 worth, a part of which were necessaries and a large portion of which were dutiable goods—I think about $65,000,000 worth—and as I have heard it stated in this House, I believe that $40,000,000 worth of these goods could be manufactured by our own people in this country. I referred a few moments ago to the importation of cotton fabrics, and I find that the correct figures in regard to the importation of printed, dyed and coloured cottons, which were imported in 1901, and which came into direct competition with the product of the Canadian coloured cotton mills, are as follows: We imported from Great Britain $2,494,503 worth, or 24,165,332 yards of coloured cotton fabrics. Our total importation of cotton fabrics from Great Britain in 1901 amounted to $4,841,165. From the United States we imported $1,368,696 worth, so that the total importation into Canada of manufactured cotton goods for the year 1901 amounted to $6,209,861 in value. It is whispered that the large mills at Valleyfield have been promised an increase in the tariff. I hope they will get it, because I believe that it will be very largely in the interest of the country if the tariff on cotton goods could be increased; at all events increased to such an extent as to put Canadian manufacturers on a par with the manufacturers of foreign countries.

The House will pardon me if I say a word or two with regard to the increase of wages in the woollen industries. We in this country want to see our artisans and our factory employees receiving fair wages. We want to see them get reasonable wages, for if they do not they will not stay with us, but will depart for the United States, which is a high protected country and where the wages are high. Look at the relative wages paid in the United States and in England. I now refer to the woollen industry, and I find that in Massachusetts the spinners get $6.00 per week as against $2.43 in England; the wool sorters get $11 per week in Massachusetts as against $7.29 in England; the overlookers get $15 a week in Massachusetts as against $8.26 in England. In the mechanic and repair shops we find that the carpenters get $13.50 a week in Massachusetts as against $6.80 in England, and the machinists get $13.20 in Massachusetts as against $7.29 in England.

The following table will show the relative wages paid in Massachusetts and in England:—

RISE IN WAGES UNDER PROTECTION.

	Massachusetts.	England.
	$ cts.	$ cts.
Spinners	6 00	2 43
Wool sorters	11 00	7 29
Overlookers	15 00	8 26
Assistant overlookers	9 00	4 36
Weavers	7 00	3 40
MECHANIC AND REPAIR SHOPS.
Carpenters	13 50	6 80
Machinists	13 20	7 29
Blacksmiths	12 00	7 29
Stokers	9 00	4 37
Engineers	15 00	7 29
CARDING.
Overlookers	16 50	9 72
Girders and strippers	9 00	4 37
Carders	6 50	3 04

It will be seen that wages are very much higher in the United States than they are in free trade England. The wages paid in Canada have got to correspond to a large extent with the wages paid in the United States or else we cannot keep our population in Canada. Why, in the little town of Lowell, Massachusetts, I was surprised to find that there are 6,000 Canadians working there in the cotton mills, and manufacturing cottons which are sent back into this country and are purchased by our people here. I believe Sir, that with a proper system of protection we would have these Canadians living in our own country and manufacturing cotton goods for the people of Canada.

The hon. member for Russell said that the United States is not a prosperous country. Let us look at the wealth of the United States as compared with the wealth of other countries and we will see that the statement of the hon, gentleman (Mr. Edwards) is absolutely refuted. The following table will show the wealth of the United States in the different years from 1850 to 1895 :

Year.	Population.	Amount.	Per Capita.
		£	£
1850.	23,200,000	1,486,000,000	64
1870.	38,600,000	5,010,000,000	130
1890.....	62,600,000	13,550,000,000	216
1895. . ..	69,700,000	16,350,000,000	234

The figures showing the expansion of British wealth presented by Mr. Mulhall do not permit the paralleling of this table but he tells us that in 1850 the wealth of Great Britain was £7,206,000,000, and that in 1895 it had increased to £11,806,000,000. This shows an increase of £4,606,000,000 in thirty-five years, whereas the increase in the United States during the twenty-five years ending in 1895 amounted to £11,340,000,000, the addition being nearly as much as the total of wealth of Great Britain in the last year of the period. According to the same authority the total wealth of the world in 1894 was £69,769,000,000 and the United States stands credited with nearly one fourth of the whole amount. In the face of this, it cannot be said that the United States is not a prosperous country. I say, Sir, that the United States has been immensely prosperous and that its prosperity is due to its protective policy. In this Canada of ours, we have resources that are as great as the resources of the United States, and under proper development I believe that we will go ahead and prosper just as the United States prospered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was a little curious to look into the report of the Industrial Commission which sat in the United States in the year 1900, as I was anxious to see how a low tariff affected the woollen industries in that country. I shall quote from one or two of the witnesses who appeared before that commission. First I will take Mr. Wood, a large manufacturer of woollens in the United States of America, and this is the report of his evidence :

Mr. Wood says that if the tariff were removed from woollen manufactures this country would be inundated with foreign goods. American woollen mills would be obliged to close, and could only resume operations through adjusting labour costs to meet European conditions. Even if they had free wool the manufacturers would be emphatically opposed to the abolition of the tariff on woollens, but woollen manufacturers do not look upon the tariff on woollens as a tax on the consumers ; it is certainly not so to-day. Mr. Wood thinks that the wages of the operatives in the mills of the American Woollen Company average about 100 per cent higher than the wages paid in England.

This is the report of the evidence of Mr. Falwell, another large woollen manufacturer in the United States :

Mr. Falwell testifies that his rate of wages are about the same now as under the McKinley Bill, but that when the Wilson Bill was in force the general rate was about 10 per cent lower and about half his mill was stopped. He attributes the fact that wages are higher in America than in Europe exclusively to the tariff. He understands that while wages in American woollen mills are about double what is paid in France and Germany, they are a little less than double what is paid in England.

Mr. William G. Steele was examined before that commission and he is asked this question :

Q. How did the wages compare ?—A. The wages are much higher here than there. I will give you an instance showing that one department of the business—that is, the weaving department. The weavers over there as a rule are higher skilled weavers; they can only get work as learners, unless they are well skilled and capable ; I just speak of this one instance although it is a good comparison of the great number of workers. There was one woman—and the weavers in England are mostly women, here they are largely men—this woman was a very good weaver, but the highest wages I remember of her making were about $5 a week. She came to our mill and she worked on the same loom and on the same class of goods precisely—not made out of the same wools but the character of the goods was similar—and she made $14 in our mill ; and we have people now —men—that earn as high as $18 a week, but I never knew a man weaver over there making over $7.50.

Under the United States tariff of 1897 on cloths, knit and other fabrics, and all manufactures of every description made wholly or in part of wool, there was a specific duty besides an ad valorem duty of 50 per cent. Under the Act of 1894 the duty was from 35 to 40 per cent ad valorem.

In this country under the preferential tariff there is only about 23 per cent on woollen goods, and it is impossible for our woollen industry to pay the wages which have to be paid in this country and exist under that rate of duty. The American woollen mills could not exist under a tariff of 40 per cent and a small specific duty, and how can it be expected that woollen mills in Canada, situated under similar conditions, can exist under a tariff of 23 per cent ?

Mr. Falwell, a woollen manufacturer, testified that his trade had no more than got established under the McKinley Bill before the Wilson Bill was passed. He only ran half his capacity during the period of the Wilson Bill. The markets were flooded both with goods and with wool, but it is pretty well over now and if we are simply let alone I think everything will work out right.

Another great injury to the woollen trade caused by a low tariff is the importation of shoddy, which is used in a very low grade of goods. So far as I can learn, our Canadian woollen manufacturers give to the people an honest article, but the low class of goods that came into the country from abroad under a low tariff were largely composed of shoddy, and this was also the experience of the United States under a low tariff.

There is a question, Mr. Speaker, of vital importance to this country, to which the government should turn their immediate attention ; that is, the transportation question. But the government of this country seems to think that all they have to do is to let things alone, while our agriculturists are suffering great hardships from the high rates that not only prevail on the railways, but on the ocean steamers plying between the port of Montreal and the old country. A short time ago I read a very interesting and able speech on this subject delivered by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. MacLaren), in which that hon. gentleman showed that there has been a loss to the farmers of this country of $10,000,000 in one year. That is equal to more than one-third of our customs taxation. And what is the reason of that loss ? It is caused by the high rates charged by the railway companies in this country. Now, surely this is a matter which our government can control. Surely our government can see that the agriculturists of this country get as low rates as the agriculturists of the United States. If they do, there will be a saving to them, according to the figures I have before me, of over $10,000,000 a year.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken a great deal longer than I had any intention of doing, and I will just say, in closing, that I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition. I am a firm believer in the development of Canada for Canadians. It is our duty as a people to further the interests of Canada, and to protect our labour, our agricultural products, manufactures and industries. Let us legislate in so far as we can to promote the wealth of this country. Let us do all that we can to bring prosperity to this country—to the artisan in the humblest home as well as to those who combine their capital and invest it for the purpose of developing the resources of this country. I am firmly convinced that the policy laid down by the Conservative party is the policy which will accrue to the benefit of the Dominion.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, last year in my maiden speech in this House I used the English language to express my views upon the administration of the public affairs of Canada, and having thus paid a deserved compliment to my English-speaking constituents, I feel it my duty to-day to pay the same compliment to my French Acadian friends, who have opened to me the doors of this parliament.

It is only right that the Acadian people, who number 150,000 souls in the maritime provinces, should attract more and more the attention of parliament and of the country, not only on account of their rapid increase and their attachment to the soil, but also by reason of the intelligent way in which they study every question of public policy, while at the same time, their public men also shine in public life.

French Acadians also deserve the consideration of all Canadians for their energetic and persistent work in developing the resources of this country, as fishermen and as agriculturists ; they also deserve our esteem for the great love they entertain for their native land which they now delight in calling their dear Canada ; and above all, for their sincere and generous loyalty to the great British nation, whose expansion and stability they wish to see maintained, for the greatest good of humanity. The small Acadian people are now one heart and soul with the happy Canadian family extending from ocean to ocean. They play a most creditable part in that harmonious concert of the different races who, in this land of ours, sing the glories of old France, the touching traditions of Ireland, the chivalrous customs of old Scotland, the triumphs of England, and finally join in a most heartfelt expression of gratitude for those acts of kindness which have atoned for past wrongs, and all bear witness to their ardent love for that constitution which guarantees to every one of us the same amount of civil, political and religious liberty, whether we live in the more modest homes of Evangeline's native land or in the great palaces of Westminster and Buckingham.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to tell the House to-day what kind of judgment it should pass upon the administration of the public affairs during the five years this government has been in power. More than a year has elapsed since the people gave their verdict, when the Liberal party were given a new lease of power by an increased majority. Nor do I think it necessary to dwell upon the merits of the present administration. This task I leave to other gentlemen who can bring to bear upon the debate all the resources of their eloquence, supported by a larger experience than mine. Such a speech we did hear from the lips of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce who, the other night, held the House spell-bound while he brought to the support of his thesis an array of most striking facts and uncontrovertible statistics. The government stands in no need of panegyrics. The immense prosperity which the country is now enjoying speaks volumes. And this unbounded prosperity could not have spread over the land except under the beneficent impulse of a master-mind which had first to pave the way for it. That master-mind it was that first prepared the soil in which that luxuriant growth was to germinate, and then, later on, extended its domain and enriched it by steady and persistent labour. That great mind was, no doubt, conscious of the immensity of the resources of this country, of the different ways of developing them ; it must have had a thorough knowledge of the geographical and climacteric conditions of Canada and of her relations to other nations, so as to take advantage of the good dispositions of some of them and refuse to deal with those who were unwilling to offer us good terms.

That prosperity, which has come here to stay, we owe to the wise and vigorous administration of the Liberal government, under the guidance of our beloved right hon. First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and with the assistance of ministers moved by the same patriotic zeal. We are told that this prosperity is due to Divine Providence. In the abstract, it is true. Every thing in this world, I admit, is ruled by an all-wise Providence. But, were it to follow the same line of reasoning I should be forced to the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite will continue to occupy the opposition benches for a long time to come.

When they speak of the immense harvest of last year in Manitoba and the North-west, which was double that of the previous year, I agree with them. In that fact I see the hand of Providence. But when we come to the progress that the country has made by leaps and bounds ; when we have to deal with the increase in our general trade during the last five years, in our exports as well as in our imports ; or when we consider the arrangement under which every up to date invention and all modern improvements have been grouped together, at the conjunction of the two brightest centuries of our civilization, so that we are enabled to carry our agricultural products to the markets of the world in a state of preservation unknown up to this time, then I see there the hand of man, but, you may depend upon it, it is the work of a most skilful, steady and firm hand, the hand of a patriotic man.

When speaking of the interposition of Providence, hon. gentlemen perhaps mean to say—and here again I agree with them—that the people of Canada have been moved by a providential suggestion, when, on the 23rd June, 1896, they selected as their future premier the man who up to then had only been the leader of a party, and a parliamentary debater, but who had revealed himself as the most judicious and patriotic leader that Canadians could desire for Canada, and the empire for its most important self-governing colony.

I contend that our leader has been most fortunate in the choice of his colleagues. Realizing that the happiness of a nation rests upon the progress of agriculture, he has intimated to the country that he wished to enlarge its agricultural area and to find new markets for the products of the fields, then he looked around for a man who knew the different qualities of the soil, its fertility and all the possibilities of the country ; a man who could and really did secure new markets for Canada, and procure to the farmers means of transportation for their products in a perfect state of preservation to the most distant, and the richest markets of the world. That man was the present Minister of Agriculture, who has done more for our farmers during the last five years than any one of his predecessors in the administration of this branch of public administration.

Our leader wanted a man of energy, a man of tact and courage, having a thorough knowledge of the resources of the country and at the same time a man who could grapple with the difficulties which would have to be faced in the development of the resources of those vast territories where the most promising and the richest areas are so remote from the sea ports. He needed for that work a man possessed with an iron will, an energetic and able man who could devise great schemes in order to meet the exigencies created by the nature of the country ; a man who like Richelieu who wished to save Canada to Louis XIV. and to France, could realize that economy does not consist in a cheese-paring policy, but in a judicious expenditure of public money.

And he found that man in the hon. Minister of Public Works, who, during the last five years has won the esteem, the respect, admiration and confidence of everybody, and whose great schemes for the development of the country, and views upon the important question of transportation have elicited the most generous approvals from the opposition as well as from the liberal press.

Knowing that the development of our resources, so vast, so rich and so varied, and that our commerce with England and the other countries would increase to fabulous figures, our leader felt the need of a man who could help these workers and the improvers of our resources ; a man who knew how to keep the treasury well filled, and who would be able to balance the expense with the revenue. Now, such a man he found in the hon. Minister of Finance, who not only fulfilled but exceeded his hopes. For, instead of confining himself to maintaining the equilibrium between the expenditure and the revenue, he took advantage of the prosperous state of our trade, and every year offered the country surpluses of which the greatest financiers of the world might well be proud.

The country was glad to find that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Public Works have spared no pains in making the improvements required for the transportation of agricultural products. If these two hon. gentlemen would allow me to offer them a suggestion out of pure friendship, I would tell them to hasten the completion of their schemes and to go ahead fearlessly while they have the good fortune of being associated with the hon. Minister of Finance ; for they may be sure that he will always follow them with a surplus.

I should also like to say that the hon. Prime Minister who had proved so happy in the selection of the members of his cabinet, when he first formed it, was equally successful in the choice of their successors. The appointment of the hon. Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the selection of the new Solicitor General (Mr. Carroll) have won approval and praise from more eloquent voices than mine. The whole country has approved of these appointments, and the flattering compliments paid to the new appointees in this House, have been endorsed by the French-speaking as well as by the English-speaking people of this country. We have heard praises coming from every quarter to the address of these new ministers, and I may add that the appointment of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Sutherland) has won the same approval from the people. It is probably because the department which the new Minister of Marine and Fisheries presides over is of greater interest to the members of the maritime provinces than to those of any other province, that I feel it my duty to express here not only my approval of his appointment, but to bear witness to the general feeling of satisfaction that prevails throughout the country as to the able and intelligent manner in which the hon. minister performs the duties of his position. It is true that we, of the maritime provinces, have regretted for a little while, I shall say the appointment of the present minister, but the loss of a representative in the cabinet. This expression of regret all through the maritime provinces was not due to the fact that the hon. gentleman who now presides over this department does not reside in our midst and is not yet perfectly acquainted with our wants; but it was due to the feeling that we had lost a representative for the maritime provinces in the cabinet. But from the relations we have had so far with the new Minister of Marine, we feel that we have the best reasons for congratulating him, and we hope that when he is better acquainted with our wants, he will also be able to realize our needs and to lend us a helping hand in developing our maritime industries.

In his budget speech, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has referred to the census. He had to confess that the result was disappointing. I shall not speak of the general disappointment about the small increase of the population in the whole country, but I shall once more ask this House to show some gratitude to the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) who, in addition to the benefits he has conferred upon the farming community, has also rendered great service to our French Acadian people. In the maritime provinces, the Acadians being aware of their numerical weakness, were naturally interested in having a correct statement of their numbers made, showing their standing in this happy community to which I referred a little while ago ; for they do not mean to remain in the background in this country of ours, but they mean to play an active role, in the development of British institutions. They were interested in showing their full numerical strength, in order to give further scope to their patriotism and their loyalty. In 1891, unhappily, the census had proved unsatisfactory to the French population of New Brunswick and specially that of Nova Scotia. This year, thanks to the intelligent, disinterested and truly patriotic efforts of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) the same interest has been extended to the French population of the maritime provinces as to the English population of the other provinces, and French enumerators were appointed in the counties where groups of Acadians were found. In short, whether this result is due to the census bureau in Ottawa, or to the enumerators in the maritime provinces, the Acadians are proud today and also pleased to see that they have been fairly dealt with and that their numerical strength was accurately put before the country, so that in future they will be able to speak in the name of a correctly enumerated population.

I say that the Acadian people wish to stand before the country in their full numerical strength, for they have proved that they have in their make up the stuff of which are made loyal subjects of England. It is important that the Acadian people should be known and judged upon their merits ; and in this connection I hope I shall be allowed to quote an extract from an article published in a great newspaper on the 15th of March, 'La Presse,' of Montreal. I trust that the able director of 'La Presse' when he was penning these lines, did not think of the false position in which he was placing the Acadian people towards the rest of the population of Canada :

> Neither do the Acadians wish to be called Canadians nor do they call themselves Canadians. To their mind, the country they reside in is not exactly Canada, it is Acadia. They are either Acadian or French ; they do not object to call themselves such, but Canadians or French Canadians never. To them Canada is as much a foreign country as Lousiana is. They go to Canada as they go to the United States. And Canada, in their eyes, is confined to the province of Quebec.

If these lines had been written forty years ago or before confederation, when the maritime provinces were no part of the Dominion, I could understand it. But to-day, the Acadians in the province of New Brunswick as in all the other maritime provinces, are happy to call themselves Canadians. They have become enthusiastic and loyal British subjects in Canada. They heartily joined hands with their brothers of Canada as soon as the isolation in which they had so long lived had ceased. To prove it, I have only to say that, though I was born in the province of Quebec, I have been returned to this House by a county which boasts of the largest Acadian population in the maritime provinces or at least in New Brunswick. This county in the limits of which reside one-third of the 80,000 Acadian souls of the maritime provinces have elected as their representative in parliament a French Canadian, born in the province of Quebec, against one of their own fellow-countrymen, an Acadian, born in that very county. I think we have here one of the most convincing proofs of the generosity of the Acadians towards their kinsmen and co-religionists of the province of Quebec. At the same time I wish to bear witness to the fact that the French Canadians having received since confederation the benefits of education, have grown as progressive as their brothers from the other provinces, and that they work with a perfect harmony for the common good of this great Dominion of ours.

I could further say, Mr. Speaker, that the increase of population, as shown by the census in the maritime provinces, chiefly in the province of New Brunswick, is due to the high birth-rate among Acadian families. In thousands of Acadian homes, children, from the very cradle, imbibe Canadian feelings and are taught by their mothers the love of this land of ours, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

I felt, Mr. Speaker, it was my duty to correct the false notions likely to rise from that editorial of 'La Presse,' so as to dispel all doubts as to the intelligence of the French Acadians, and as to their political standing in this great country of ours.

Before offering a few remarks on the figures given us by the hon. Minister of Finance, there is another question to which I should like to call attention for a few moments; I mean the Department of Railways. This is one of the most important public departments mainly for the maritime provinces. Since 1896, that department has been under the control of a man with an iron will; a man than whom there is none more respected and better loved by the members coming from New Brunswick, because we have known him better. The opposition in this House and their political organs, within the last few years, have concentrated all their attacks against that minister, and they think they have a great case in the deficit which has occurred in the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, as if that deficit was going to bring about its ruin and the downfall of the government. It was on that question that the Hon. Joseph Howe delivered one of his most masterful efforts half a century ago, when he spoke in such patriotic accents of the manifold advantages which would accrue to us of closer relations between the lower provinces and Canada, and from the traffic which this railway would develop. In the same national enterprise another statesman who has left such a bright record in the annals of the province of New Brunswick, the late Hon. Peter Mitchell, also found a theme of lofty inspiration. The same railway also found a patriotic champion in another Canadian statesman, one of the greatest men that Canada has ever produced, Sir George Etienne Cartier. This great man spoke most forcibly of the harmony which would be promoted from a closer intercourse between the people of the maritime provinces and the people of Canada. The other night, the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) and the member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) were eloquent exponents of those same views.

It looks as if the opposition had only one way of proving their patriotism, and that is to bring about the downfall of the government or one of its members. If I had time, it would be an easy matter for me to point out to this House the figures showing the result of the operation of the Intercolonial Railway for the different years elapsed since confederation up to our days; and I believe that I could prove that the final result is all to the advantage of the present administration of the Intercolonial Railway, which has been operated in as efficient a manner as any other department. I shall not give all those figures. I shall content myself with showing the difference existing between the Intercolonial Railway in 1886, when the Liberal party came into power, and the state in which it is now.

The people of the maritime provinces who daily see what is going on and notice the general increase of traffic on that road need not be enlightened on that point; but for the House and for the people of Canada at large, this comparison will serve a useful purpose, as it will show them how efficiently the Intercolonial has been operated since 1896 under Liberal rule, by the hon. Minister of Railways.

Owing to the prosperity which we have been enjoying these last five years, a large share of which the maritime provinces have had, the Intercolonial Railway has been equipped in an up to date fashion along its whole line; and so, the feeling of discouragement which formerly prevailed among the people, has given place to a feeling of satisfaction and of hope in the future. The railway is now equipped in such a way as to be a credit to the whole country.

The Conservative administration, with a view to manufacturing small surpluses, had allowed the road to fall into a dilapidated condition; and had such a state of things continued much longer, it would have resulted in depriving the maritime provinces of the facilities of communication which they are now enjoying, and they would have found themselves severed as it were from the other provinces; now, I need hardly add that it would have meant the ruin of that great enterprise and the ruin of the maritime provinces themselves. Therefore, I make bold to say, that from that standpoint, we look upon as a happy interposition of divine Providence the change of government that then took place, from which have flowed such beneficial results to the country.

We have heard a good deal of late from hon. gentlemen opposite about the deficit which we had last year; but as I said, a little while ago, these hon. gentlemen take precious good care not to refer to the era of deficits under Conservative rule, and they abstain also from showing the difference between the present condition of the road and what it was five years ago. Now, thanks to the wise administration of the hon. minister, we have a road that is a credit to the country and a sure index to the prosperity of Canada as well as an omen of what the future keeps in store for us. There is no railway on this continent which offers better accommodation to the travelling public then does the Intercolonial, a fact to which several hon. gentlemen have borne witness. I may be allowed to refer here to an incident that occurred at a public meeting in the county of Gloucester, as an instance bearing upon this same subject. I had been telling the electors that the Intercolonial was now one of the best equipped railways on this continent, and one that afforded the best accommodation to the travelling public. Among those who attended the meeting were two reverend gentlemen who had lately returned from an extended trip in England and throughout France, Italy and Germany; and when they heard me stating that our railways were, in the matter of accommodation and comfort to the travelling public, far ahead of the other lines on this continent, one of those reverend gentlemen got up and craved leave to say that, from his own experience, he might further add that our railways were far ahead of all those they had travelled on in Europe.

In order to show, Sir, the nature of this road,—were it for no other purpose than that of advertising it—I dare say that it affords the best accommodation to all travellers from the different parts of America and from Europe, who may come and visit our Canadian sea-ports and our picturesque sites; and that, moreover, it can develop a considerable trade, not only between the provinces themselves but also between America and Canada.

What I have said so far ought to suffice to show that the government and the Minister of Railways deserve full credit for their management of the road. But, in the matter of deficits, I have here a statement which will show the results of the operation of the Intercolonial for the last five years under Liberal rule:

1897-98, deficit	209,978.66
1898-99, surplus	62,645.43
1899-1900, surplus	120,667.02
1900-1901, deficit	488,186.77

It is this last deficit about which hon. gentlemen opposite have made so much fuss. Therefore, we have a total of surpluses for the five years of the Liberal administration, of $183,312.45, against a total of deficits of $758,106.08, which leaves a loss, all earnings deducted, of $575,793.63, or an average of $115,158.72 per annum during the last five years.

While making the most of these deficits, such as stated by the Minister of Railways himself, hon. gentlemen opposite ignore altogether the deficits piled up under the late Conservative government. Allow me, Sir, briefly to refer to those figures, not so much in a spirit of disparagement or criticism as to the management of the former administration, as to place those facts in their proper light and to show what the present administration have done. From a mere comparison of the results achieved under both regimes, we shall be enabled to realize what the Minister of Railways has done to improve the road and put it in good working order. I ask the House to bear with me for a few minutes, while I enter into those somewhat tedious details. Let us take the results of the operation of the road, under Conservative rule, during the seventeen years for which they are fully responsible:

	Surplus.	Deficits.
1880-81	$ 542 65	.....
1881-82	9,605 18	.....
1882-83	10,547 83	.....
1883-84	6,981 30	.....
1884-85	.....	78,547 90
1885-86	.....	133,905 79
1886-87	.....	262,252 69
1887-88	.....	383,445 69
1888-89	.....	276,846 73
1889-90	.....	547,835 87
1890-91	.....	684,946 56
1891-92	.....	493,935 03
1892-93	20,181 59	.....
1893-94	5,838 29	.....
1894-95	3,815 21	.....
	$57,512 05	$3,014,035 01

The deficits under the Conservative administration, during that period, amounted to $3,014,035.01. If we deduct from that total the amount of surpluses, or $57,512.05, we find that there was for that period a deficit of $2,956,522.96. Now, if we take the average for that period under Conservative rule, we shall find that, for the seventeen years referred to, the yearly average of deficits was $173,913.11.

The Conservative government having succeeded in showing small surpluses in the last years of their administration, it may perhaps have occurred to them that it entered into the views of divine Providence to maintain them in power ; but we know beyond a doubt that, even had they succeeded in having a small surplus, after piling up deficits for so many years, that result was due not to a policy of economy—for implies a wise and judicious expenditure of the public moneys—but to a cheese-paring policy by which the public service was starved and stinted ; a policy by which they put off from year to year equipping the road and repairing the rolling stock. As a consequence, the road went on losing in value and in power. But, as I said, when the present government came into power, a change came over the country.

Now, if we compare the five years, under Liberal rule, with the last five years of the last decade under Conservative rule, we shall find that during those last five years, there was a deficit of $2,155,327.54, or an average yearly deficit of $431,065.50.

The Intercolonial, as I said, occupies a most conspicuous position among American and European railways. It is true that, last year, through unforeseen and uncontrollable circumstances, there was a considerable deficit. But before entering into a review of the causes which brought about that deficit, let me call attention to the fact that, if we take the last five years, under Liberal rule, and compare the deficits with the total revenues of the road, so as to find the percentage of the loss to the country in each year, we find an average of $115,158.72 out of a total of $19,246,336.89 of gross earnings, or the equivalent of 1·67 per cent, whereas, for the first five years of the last decade under Conservative rule, out of a total of $17,566,831.20 of gross earnings, we find a deficit of $2,155,327.54, or a difference of 8·14 per cent. These figures show a difference of 7 per cent in favour of the present administration, notwithstanding those extraordinary and unlooked for deficits which, later on, I shall try to explain, to the best of my ability. But though I may not be able to do full justice to the subject I am handling, I may say that the figures speak for themselves and are, as it were, self-explanatory ; and so, the French-speaking members of this House will give due credit to the hon. Minister of Railways for his management of the railway.

I may say that this deficit was brought about through a combine of the coal dealers who suddenly raised the price of coal by $2.10 ; coal, in previous years, having always sold at $3.20 a ton, after tenders had been called. So, the government had to pay $1.10 a ton more for coal than in former years. That change in the price of coal involved an additional expenditure of $350,000. The hon. Minister of Railways could not stop operating the railway, and had to pay the price asked for coal. Even had the price been $4 a ton, he would have had to operate the railway all the same. This accounts largely for the deficit which the Conservative papers have so bitterly criticised of late.

There is also the increase of wages paid to the workingmen on the Intercolonial by the hon. Minister of Railways and I must say that, upon that occasion, he has shown great generosity towards the workingmen. At the very moment when that increase in the price of coal was being brought about by the combine of coal dealers, which created such a sensation all through the country, the hon. Minister of Railways did not hesitate to grant to the employees on the Intercolonial an increase of wages amounting to $200,000. Could not the hon. Minister of Railways have said, when the increase in the price of coal was known : "I am now confronted by a state of things which was altogether unexpected, and which will create a deficit in the operation of the Intercolonial. In order to make up for it, I am going to cancel the increase of wages of from 10 to 20 cents a day I had decided to give those poor operatives on the railway.' Is there a man in this House, having at heart the interests of the working classes, who would have been lacking in patriotism to the point of suggesting to the hon. Minister of Railways to cancel the increase of pay granted to those poor workingmen and employees ? I do not believe, Sir, that there could have been found a man willing to offer such a suggestion, and had there been found one, he would have been unworthy of the confidence of his constituents. So those two additional expenditures of $390,000 caused by the raise in the price of coal, and the expenditure of $200,000 resulting from the increase of the pay of the workingmen who theretofore received only from $1 to $1.10 a day and from the general raise of the wages of the employees, those I say, are the two causes which account for the deficit.

As I said a little while ago, the hon. Minister of Railways has kept steadily developing and improving the equipment of the government railways, and not from day to day, as was the case under the former management who neglected their repairs and kept their rolling stock in an inefficient condition.

He knew that if he could not meet his expenditure one year, he was bound all the same to go on with the task of making the road the safest for the passengers and the most favourable for the transportation of goods.

Moreover, there was this year an overcharge for coal. The minister had just ordered repairs to the road bed to the amount of $200,000. Following in the steps of his predecessors, he could have made an apparent saving in striking out these $200,000 ; but he does not intend to run the road from day to day ; he is building for the future, and he will be ready, at a given time, to carry all the traffic that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec will be able to send, and also all the traffic that may come to Cape Breton and Nova Scotia from Great Britain.

Then taking into account the increase of $200,000 in the wages of the staff, a further amount of $200,000 expended on the roadbed and an extra sum of $1.10 on every ton of coal consumed by the railway, we arrive to the total amount of $750,000, which is more than required to wipe out the apparent deficit, and which has been expended wholly for the benefit of the trade and the advantage of the employees of the road.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THE SPRAGUE'S FALLS MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 37) to incorporate the Sprague's Falls Manufacturing Company (Limited).—Mr. Emmerson.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. This is the Bill for which the Minister of Justice was to prepare an amendment.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Hon. James Sutherland). I understand that some agreement was made across the House in regard to this Bill. I think the committee had better rise and let the Bill stand until the promoter is present. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

THE CROWN BANK OF CANADA.

Mr. McCREARY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Crown Bank of Canada.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (East York). I take this opportunity of calling the attention of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) to the general question of incorporation of banks in this country. We have a general Act regarding banking, but the law is still in such a condition that parties who wish to go into the banking business in Canada must apply for an Act of this parliament to authorize them to do so. I think the time has come when the general banking Act should be so amended that any corporation, or syndicate of persons who wish to engage in banking might embark in that enterprise without applying for an Act of parliament. We have three of these applications before us this session, and we have some every session, If there is anything this country requires to-day it is increased banking facilities. It is for that reason that I make the suggestion to the Minister of Finance that he should have the General Banking Act so amended that parties who wish to go into banking could do so on filing the necessary papers, showing that they have the necessary capital and giving proper undertakings to abide by the law in every respect. During the last year, in one way and another, I have had occasion to discuss, to a considerable extent, the question of banking. So far as I can gather, apparently everybody who has any authority or interest in banking says we have the best banking system in the world. It certainly is the best system in the world for those engaged in banking. Our bank shares to-day are, on the average, worth double their face value, and banking is found to be a very profitable business. Our banks are all branching out, and, as the country is growing—as we are all glad to know it is—there is a necessity for increased banking accommodation. That being the case, I think the banks ought to be allowed to increase their capital stock without application to parliament, and financial men who wish to start a new bank ought to be free to do so by complying with the necessary forms, as I have suggested. As it is these banks have to make application for a special Act and they have also to comply with the law by filing certain statements with the department. I think this all ought to be embraced in one Act, and that, by filing letters of incorporation with the Department of Finance, and going through the necessary forms, they should be able to take out a license to carry on a banking business. As I have said, there is room for any amount of increased banking accommodation in this country. It seems to me that if the law were what it should be, instead of having three or four new banks projected, we would have a dozen started in various parts of the country within the next twelve months.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). If any practical difficulty had arisen in the experience of the department in connection with the matters to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maclean) has referred, or if any practical inconvenience had been felt, I should be disposed to sympathize with him. But up to this time, I have not heard any complaint whatever of inconvenience arising from the present system. As to the fact the hon. gentleman mentions, that the bank stocks stand at a high figure, I take it that we all feel that general business is in a better condition when bank stocks stand at a high than at a low figure. As between the two, the present condition of things is to be preferred. I do not wish, however, to discuss the general question of the banking system. But I might point out that the hon. gentleman is mistaken in supposing, as he apparently does, that it is necessary for a bank to come to parliament for power to increase its capital. The Banking Act makes provision for the increase of a bank's capital in a very simple way. A form is prescribed and regulations provided under which, on application to the Treasury Board, in a very summary way, a bank may obtain leave to increase its capital. It is necessary, however, for new banks to come to this parliament for their charters. But the lines of those charters are so clearly laid down that it amounts to a merely formal application. If the applicants comply with the conditions, practically, the application is never refused. The hon. gentleman may say that, in that case, it would be as well to give the charter by executive as by parliamentary action. But, on the other hand, the banking system is a very important part of the business of the country, and I think parliament would like to feel that it reserved to itself control of this matter rather than that it had handed it over to the control of the government. At any rate, I am satisfied that no practical inconvenience has arisen through the present system; and while, theoretically, what the hon. gentleman says seems right enough, I think this is one of those cases where we should be wise to let well enough alone.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I agree with what the Finance Minister (Hon. Mr. Fielding) has said. It seems to me we give greater stability to our chartered banks by having each of them incorporated by a special Act of parliament than if we adopted any method that, to the general public, might seem more loose. In no instance is a new bank organized in a month or two. It generally takes a full year at any rate. Therefore, it causes no loss of time for men who desire to engage in banking to be obliged to come to parliament and get a charter in the regular way. To my mind, the proposal of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) would take away a great deal of the stability that we think belongs to our banking institutions. I think our banks will have better standing if they are required to come to parliament to get their charters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding):

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. TURGEON. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I shall ask the House to bear with me a few minutes more while I conclude my remarks. I think I have fairly done with the administration of the Intercolonial Railway and I shall come now to the financial situation of this country. Like most other people, Canadians are proud to know the financial standing of their country, and like from time to time to be enlightened on public affairs. The people pay great attention of the national debt and naturally fear to see it increase. They are also much pleased to see new millions added from year to year to our imports and exports, more so when the agricultural products of the country are at stake. More than anywhere else perhaps, the public expenditure is closely scrutinized. The electors are always anxious to know if the fiscal year will close with a welcome surplus or an unwelcome deficit. That national turn of mind might be called a social virtue, a kind of patriotism which is not without its wholesome influence upon the business of the country, the minds of members of parliament and the general administration. The Americans do not watch so closely the doings of their congressmen, but the paramount question in the neighbouring republic is the scale of wages. If wages are high, they say that the administration is to be commended. If, on the contrary, wages are low, they say it is time for a change. Not so with us. The Canadian people are not satisfied to know if there is a surplus or a deficit in the public chest. Critical and inquisitive as they are, they will not be satisfied with the mere existence of a surplus or a deficit. A surplus of 3, 5 or $8,000,000 is always welcome, but the people want to know something more. They will inquire by what process that result was reached, and to what circumstances the surplus was due. There are different ways of piling up a surplus. A surplus is a sure sign of the prosperity of the country. If the trade of the country is prosperous, if the balance is in our favour, the people will look favourably upon the government. If, on the other hand, the business of the country is depressed, even if there is a surplus, the people are anxious to know the cause thereof.

Under these circumstances, I may be permitted to give to the House a few figures from the financial statement so ably delivered a few days ago by the hon. Minister of Finance. He told us then that the revenue had increased to the unprecedented sum of $52,514,701. This result was reached by an increase in different sources of revenue, amongst which are to be noted the excise duties, with an increase of $450,170. The next increase is to be found in the earnings of the Intercolonial Railway, which amounted to $439,219. The receipts of the Post Office Department have been of $235,969 over those of the preceding year, notwithstanding the reduction in the postage dues. The actual receipts are already larger than they were before the reduction took place.

The above statement affords me the occasion of commending the wise administration of the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). He has given us increased postal facilities, as well as a reduction of 23 per cent in the postage dues and a further reduction from 5 cents to 2 cents for all postal communications within the empire. Is it not a wonderful achievement ? The expenditure on consolidated fund has been of $46,866,367, an increase of $3,891,088 over 1890. We are then left with a surplus of $5,700,000. But the expenditure on capital account has been exceptionally high during the year, and that has resulted in a net increase in the public debt of nearly $3,000,000. This is practically the first large increase of the public debt under the Liberal government.

Let us come now to that question of the increase of the public debt. When the Liberal government came into power, in 1896, the net debt, on the 30th June of that year, was $258,497,432.77, having increased during the same fiscal year by $5,422,505.68, for which the preceding government was partly responsible.

Now, what have been the increases in the public debt under the present government ?

1897, increase of	$3,041,163.60
1898, "	2,417,802.45
1899, "	2,317,047.69
1900, decrease of	779,639.71
1901, increase of	2,986,196.80

giving a total increase during the five years of $9,982,570.92, which total divided by five gives an average yearly increase of the public debt of $1,996,514.18.

We are told that the Liberal government has increased the public debt. Nobody in this House will deny such a statement. But we are in a position to show by comparison, that under the Liberal government the public debt has not increased in the same ratio as it did under the former government, and the showing is all in favour of the hon. Minister of Finance under the Liberal government.

The official records will show for the last seventeen or eighteen years of the Conservative administration an average increase of $6,563,075. Let us come now to the deficits and surpluses of the Liberal administration. In coming into office the hon. Minister of Finance had to acknowledge a deficit of $519,981.41 for the first year. Although comparatively small, part of this deficit must be credited to the old government. For that fiscal year, specially the first part of it, the hon. Minister of Finance had to comply with the obligations contracted by his predecessors in office. But the very next year, under the influence and magnetism of his genius and of his patriotic inspirations the tables were turned and the hon. minister was in a position to present the country with a surplus of $1,722,712.33.

In 1899-1900	8,054,714 51
In 1900-1901	5,648,333 29
Total for five years	$20,263,509.13

Deducting the deficit of $519,981.44 from the first year, we stand with a net surplus of $19,743,527.69. If we divide this last amount by 5, the number of years, we have an average surplus under the Liberal administration of $3,948,705.58.

Under what circumstances has the Minister of Finance been enabled to achieve such results ? All the public documents will tell. New industries have been established, old industries have been galvanized into life under the patriotic influence of the Minister of Finance, and our trade has forged along by leaps and bounds.

Our total imports and exports aggregated the amount of $239,025,360 in 1895-96, and have crept to $386,903,157 in 1900-01, being an increase of $157,877,797.

Let us compare the development of our export trade during the last five years of the Conservative government and we have the following figures :

1891-92	$241,369,443
1892-93	247,638,620
1893-94	240,999,889
1894-95	224,420,485
1895-96	239,025,360
Total for the five years	$1,193,453,797

How slow, to say the least, has been the trade development during these years ! Let us see now what have been our imports and exports during the five years of the Liberal administration :

1896-97	$257,168,862
1897-98	304,475,736
1898-99	321,661,123
1899-1900	381,517,236
1900-1901	386,903,157
Total for five years	$1,651,726,204

The total trade of the country during the five years of administration of the present government has exceeded by five hundred million dollars the total trade of the last five years of the Conservative regime. I leave it to the House and the country to draw the conclusion.

A great cause of rejoicing is the fact that this large increase in our exports has been most marked in the agricultural products. The agriculturist has a fair share in the marvellous expansion of our exports during the last five years. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has bent all his energies towards promoting the agricultural prosperity of Canada. To him we must give credit for those transportation facilities and the establishment of a complete system of cold storage by which the farmers of the country have been greatly benefited. No wonder they are grateful for what he has done.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to give the House and the country a few more figures that are interesting to those of us who are representing rural constituencies. Let us look at the butter exports, so largely increased by the perfected system of cold storage established by the hon. Minister of Agriculture, and let us compare these exports with those of the last five years of the Conservative administration.

Butter exports for the last five years under the Conservative regime :

1892-93	1,300,199
1893-94	1,114,712
1894-95	709,126
1895-96	1,118,768
Total	$5,515,899

Butter exports for the first five years of the Laurier regime :

1896-97	$2,253,481
1897-98	2,523,664
1898-99	4,025,405
1899-1900	5,429,563
1900-1901	3,355,197
Total	$17,587,310

Under the wise administration of the Laurier government in the short period of five years, from the butter exports alone, twelve million dollars more found their way into the pockets of the farmers of this country.

Let us look now into the cheese industry.

Exports of cheese for the last five years of the Tory regime :

1891-92	$12,554,286
1892-93	14,157,555
1893-94	16,267,309
1894-95	15,118,894
1895-96	14,283,825
	$62,381,869

Exports of cheese for the last five years of the Laurier regime :

1896-97	$15,262,750
1897-98	18,486,168
1898-99	17,401,436
1899-1900	20,483,981
1900-1901	21,123,251
	$92,757,586

There is a difference of thirty millions in favour of the Laurier régime.

We have an increase of thirty million dollars for cheese ; and an increase of twelve million dollars for butter.

It was during a period of such great business activity and progress that the government piled up surpluses to the tune of $19,743,527.69, or an average yearly surplus of $3,948,705.58.

But we are reminded that the Conservatives also had their surpluses. True, but as I have just shown, those surpluses were piled up while our import and export trade went on declining, and those results were brought about through violent means, and by protection which kept increasing from year to year, and to such a point that Sir Leonard Tilley, the then Minister of Finance, a truly patriotic statesman, foresaw that the moment could come when the country could no longer bear a greater load of taxation. The trouble then was that manufacturers would always look to the government for an increase of duties and a further measure of protection, instead of relying upon their own strength and spirit of enterprise, and equipping themselves so as to meet foreign competition.

Before resuming my seat—for I see that I have spoken at greater length than I intended—I crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments more, while I say a few words of comment upon the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition. It reads :

That all the words after 'that' in the proposed motion be left out and the following substituted therefor :

This House regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory is of opinion that this country requires a declared policy of such adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, as will at all times secure the Canadian market for Canadians. And, while thus firmly maintaining the necessity of such protection to Canadian interests, this House affirms its belief in a policy of reciprocial trade preferences within the empire.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the hon. leader of the opposition, I may remark that I am reminded here of the fact that, ever since the Liberal party came into power, the opposition members and their organs have kept repeating that the Liberals, after their advent to office, had stolen their clothes, by adopting the Conservative policy. Now, with such a resolution as this on record, they will no longer be able to say that the Liberals have stolen their policy.

It is stated in the motion that the time is come for us to adopt a policy of adequate protection to the labouring classes and to the farming interests. I think it is always the duty of the government to follow a policy aiming at the protection of the agricultural community, for agriculture lies at the base of our social system.

It is always time for the government enforcing a policy of protection to the fishermen who prosecute such a hard and interesting calling.

We are told that we must adopt a national policy. I think the policy of any country should always be a national policy. France, when framing her tariff, adopted a national policy, adjusted to her geographical position and to the nature of the products of her soil. So did the United States, when they framed a national policy with a view to protecting their home industries. That protective policy they have maintained for forty or fifty years, although they have a very rich soil and vast natural resources, to which advantages should be added a large influx of immigrants, from all countries in the world, who by thousands come in every day and swell the army of workingmen, which means a considerable addition to the consumers of home products.

Great Britain herself also framed a national policy of her own, when adopting free trade with a view to protecting her industries, and when seeking new markets for the over-production of those industries, and for the relief of her own market, which was already glutted.

When the present government framed a policy which I might call a policy of discrimination between extreme protection such as is advocated by hon. gentlemen opposite and free-trade which could not be suddenly introduced into this country without jeopardizing the very existence of our home industries, thereby depriving our workingmen employed in those industries, which had grown under the fostering care of a protective tariff, of their daily bread and labour, the government, I say, did also, under those circumstances, adopt a national policy. The hon. leader of the opposition and his friends took to the past for examples. They like to look backwards and to see how their predecessors have acted. I am also a student of history and I like to learn the lessons of experience. But we must also look to the future and not content ourselves with referring to past records, to see what our predecessors have done or how they have acted. We must adopt a policy of our own and one that is best calculated to develop our trade, our material resources, our industries and our agriculture. The methods that suited our country fifty or sixty years ago may not suit the present conditions of the country.

A government should learn the lessons taught by history, and look to the fathers of confederation as their guides in framing a national policy ; but they should adjust that policy to the conditions of the country and to her needs. This the present government have done, and they have succeeded in developing our national trade and in bringing about an unprecedented prosperity. The people of this country have full confidence in the policy so far pursued by the government, because they realize that it is a policy calculated to promote the prosperity of the country.

On these several grounds, I cannot vote in favour of the motion of the hon. leader of the opposition. As I said a little while ago, we should not content ourselves with looking backwards to our past achievements, but we must look forward and entertain the brightest hopes for the future that is in store for us.

Mr. J. R. LAVELL (Leeds and Grenville). I regret exceedingly I was not able to follow very closely the long address to which the House has just listened. I was, however, able to comprehend a reference which the hon. member (Mr. Turgeon) made at an earlier stage of his address, when, though willing to admit that Providence probably had had something to do with the present favourable condition of affairs in Canada, he thought that the way Providence had helped Canada was by putting the present government into power. I notice that he disagrees with the principle laid down by a prominent fellow countryman of his, a member of the government, who apparently flatly denied that Providence had any part in the change of government when he declared that elections are not won by prayers. If I remember correctly the election address of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) himself, I would suggest that Providence had done very little towards placing him on the government side of the House. However, apart from that, I think it will not be difficult to show that possibly Providence had done more than the hon. member was willing to admit.

In proceeding to debate to-night the fiscal policy of the country and the management of its finances, I do not feel that I need to apologize for speaking either at this hour or at this period of the debate. The question is an exceedingly important one, and involves many great interests. We must remember that we are still an extremely young country. There are parts of our country yet unexplored, and even those parts that have been explored by the surveyor are still, many of them, entirely undeveloped. Our natural resources have hardly been touched. We cannot in any sense of the word be said to have fully developed any of the great resources that Providence has given into our charge. This fact was recognized at an early stage in our political history, and as a result the national policy was born, over twenty-five years ago. That national policy has been reviled, that national policy has been abused, that policy of protection, with which I am glad to say I heartily concur, has been spoken of as an old story. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce seemed to think he had dealt with the whole question when, in referring to the amendment and to the address of the leader of the opposition, he said he could almost picture to himself the former leader of the opposition moving a similar amendment to an address some twenty-six years ago. I submit, Sir, that the need of a national policy is just as great now as it ever has been in the history of this country. The history even of these later years of prosperity—for I am glad to say we are enjoying a period of great prosperity—our history, I say, only adds to the conviction that a national policy involving protection to Canadian industries, to Canadian labour and to Canadian agriculture, is just as necessary now as ever it was. We have to develop this country in face of the keenest opposition of our great neighbours to the south. I think I may say of them that they show a knowledge of Canada greater than that shown by many Canadians. I think we see in the conduct and attitude of the United States a lively recognition of the resources that Canada possesses.

I do not propose to discuss the question as to how far protection is necessary for this country, because that is practically admitted, even by a free trade supporter of the government such as the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). The party supporting the government have practically recognized the need of protection by adopting it, notwithstanding that the policy of the former government has been changed in some respects. I submit, however, that where those changes have been made they have been in the direction of increased taxation, and have wrought injury to the country, having done more harm than good. But where the items of the old tariff have been retained the country has benefited in consequence. The present government have actually been putting in force a policy of protection, though not as well administered as that put in force by the Conservative government. It has, however, been put in force under better conditions, and to one of those conditions I wish now to refer.

When the policy of protection was introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald, it was inaugurated in face of keen opposition on the part of a number of the most prominent men in this country. One of those men who had occupied, and yet occupies, a prominent position, and who had been a Minister of Finance in one of the governments of Canada, was an avowed apostle of free trade. At the very time that industries were being started under the influence of that national policy, that ex-Minister of Finance and his friends became apostles of free trade in the fullest sense of the word, and went up and down the country denouncing the new national policy and threatening to overturn it at the first available opportunity, thereby frightening away capitalists ready to embark in manufacturing enterprises in Canada. Moreover, I do not think it requires much effort of memory on the part of members of this House, or of a majority of the citizens of Canada, to recall the fact that in those years the United States was held up before us as the Mecca of all those who desired prosperity. The United States was held up as the one great country, the one great example we were to follow. Indeed they almost paraphrased an expression of the late Oliver Wendall Holmes, who, you will remember, said that good Americans, when they died, went to Paris, and so the prominent members of the Liberal party in those early days used practically to say that good Canadians, while they lived, should go to the United States. Unfortunately many young Canadians listened to their advice and left their native land. Not only was an effort made by the opposition of that day to prevent money being put into manufacturing enterprises, but an effort was made to discredit Canada, to prevent its development, and to hold up a foreign land as being the best spot to which ambitious young Canadians could go.

I would call attention to the different circumstances under which the fiscal policy of the present government is administered. As I have said, the fiscal policy of the present government differs only in a few respects from the old one. The present government is not confronted with an opposition preaching blue ruin; the opposition of to-day have done all in their power to encourage manufacturing in this country. Instead of the present opposition holding up the United States as a model to follow, and as offering the greatest inducements to ambitious Canadians, it has never thrown the slightest difficulty in the way of the development of Canadian industries, but has given every possible encouragement to the government to continue protection to Canadian industries—has always preached that Canada was the best country in which young Canadians could hope to gain wealth and distinction, that Canada was a country of magnificent resources, and required only energy and hope on the part of her people to become one of the greatest countries in the world. I submit, Sir, the attitude of the opposition has been a very important factor in making the fiscal policy of the present government as successful as it has been. It would be useless, it would be wrong, to deny that it is impossible for public men, whether they be members of the government or members of the opposition, to go through this country preaching blue ruin without producing a bad effect. Fortunately, however, the policy preached by the Liberals in opposition was not put in practice by the Liberals in power. In fact, I do not think it is too much to say, after looking back over the past seven years, that when the Liberals came into power the old Liberal party died. The doctrines preached by the present government and their supporters are so different from the doctrines they used to preach, that we can truthfully say that the old Liberalism passed into history in the year 1896. The result of the change is that, save in a few spots, and save a few spasmodic utterances of men in the House who speak louder by their words than their actions, the old free trade policy has almost disappeared; though I regret to say that in some respects and in some matters sufficient of its influence remains to prevent Canada reaping the full benefit of these years of plenty.

I want to dwell rather on the present than on the past, but before dealing with the present conditions, I want to refer to some remarks made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In reviving old times, possibly he revived them in a way he did not intend. I well remember in my early political life that the name of the ex-Minister of Finance was always associated with the phrase 'blue ruin.' I could not help feeling the other night in listening to his vigorous speech, that it was largely inspired by a brilliant effort of his imagination regarding his favourite theme of blue ruin and corruption. His speech was filled with figures, and how he did handle them! They reminded me of that prominent public man to whom the Toronto 'Globe' referred as a 'mixer and muddler of figures.'

I do not propose to go fully into these figures in reference to the census. I will leave that to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell), who has already promised to deal not only with them, but with the explanation given by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). But, I think it is unfortunate that the government, which is supposed to be a unit, cannot be a little more in accord in the figures that it gives to the country. We heard from the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) in his budget speech, referring to the census, while regretting the very small increase in the population, that there was no doubt that the large increase had taken place since 1896, and we heard a vigorous, lengthy and complicated speech by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce on exactly the same lines. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce started from 1891, as indeed the hon. Minister of Finance must have done, in order to make such a calculation as that. It is rather unfortunate that they had to wait for eleven years before attempting to make a calculation of that kind, and it is almost as unfortunate that they could not have persuaded the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) to foresee that they were going to make a statement of that kind. I admit that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he probably is fully aware of the facts, cast doubt on the truth of the figures given to us by the government, and so, possibly, we should not lay too great stress on the figures given to us by the hon. Minister of Customs, but, he has been accustomed to give a statement of the duties collected, and a statement showing the amount of these duties per head of population. I notice that this year he has left that calculation out of his report, but, he kept it up until last year, and in that report he shows a continually increasing population. Indeed he shows that according to his calculation the population increased more from 1891 to 1896 than from 1896 to 1900. I am not going to lay any stress upon these figures. I merely have pointed to them to express my regret that such a great difference of opinion between the various members of the government in reference to these figures should exist. In the case of the hon. Minister of Customs the figures are practically incorporated in his report, which is laid on the Table of the House and published by order of the government. In the case of the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce the figures as yet remain simply statements, or possibly, visions of the imagination. Surely, all the figures given to us by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce show very little more than imagination on the part of that hon. gentleman. His argument respecting the Ontario end of the census has been contradicted by the Ontario municipal census, and as to his argument respecting the figures from the province of Quebec, I do not think that those of us who were in the House when he made it, will easily forget the impressive, dignified and dramatic manner in which he handed out return after return from the various counties of that province. He told us that in Ontario and in other parts of the Dominion save in Quebec, it was a matter of argument, but that in Quebec he had positive proof, and he did not allow us to doubt the fact at all. He knew it. I feel sure that a large number of the members of the House came to the conclusion that in 1891 the hon. gentleman had a census of his own prepared, and that he kept it as evidence to give to the House now. But, now, he explains himself. He accounted for his statement by saying that three months before the census of 1891, and three or four months before the census of 1901, a parochial census had been taken, and taking for granted that the parochial census must be much more correct than the census taken with all the authority and all the machinery of the government of Canada, he laid these returns on the Table of the House and said that they proved conclusively that the census had been stuffed to the extent of some 50,000 names in the province of Quebec. Referring to the statement made by Mr. Côté, in which that gentleman gives us the difference between the parochial census taken in 1891 and the government census of that year, he says :

> The above statement shows that the enumerators in 1891 raised in twenty-one counties 40,615 more names than were recorded three months previous to the census by the parish priest.

You will notice that he bases his whole argument on the census taken by the parish priests of the province of Quebec, and shows us that the parish priests in these twenty-one counties had enumerated some 40,000 people less. He places these returns, one of which, and only one of which, I have read, and which is now in my hands, on the Table of the House. I do not know how many of the hon. members of this House have read these returns, and if they had not disappeared from the Table within about half an hour after I read this one, I would have had the pleasure of hunting up a few more, because, even although they are written in French, it is not such an unknown tongue, I believe, as not to be understood by the majority of the members of this House. I am now going to read one or two paragraphs from this return, which is the return for the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, in which reference is made to this parochial census. Apparently some letters had been written, which letters have not been returned to the House. I do not know what questions were asked, but I gather from this that the principal question was in reference to a comparison between the parochial census and the census of 1891. In answer to that question this return, placed on the Table of the House by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and under his authority, says distinctly in words that cannot be mistaken :

> It is not possible to compare the parochial statistics of 1891 with the official census of that year.

The writer gives one reason that the subdivisions are not quite the same. However, he gives another reason and it is that in each municipality the Protestant families were not registered in the annual statistics by the priest of the parish. In other words, this boasted parochial census on which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has based a charge of fraud and perjury against 2,500 Canadian officials is a census not of the whole population of the province of Quebec, but a census only of those who are in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church of that province.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Did the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce pretend that it was a census of the whole population ?

Mr. LAVELL. I have already read from the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce in which he based his whole charge on the discrepancy between the parochial census and the official census taken by the Dominion of Canada, and here, in his own return, laid on the Table of the House, is the statement that the parochial census is simply a census of those in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church in the province of Quebec. I cannot presume for a single moment that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce takes it for granted that no person should be included, if he lives in the province of Quebec, in the census, unless he is in full communion with the Roman Catholic Church. I might better trust that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has not adopted the advice which he gave to the members of this House that they should procure some French member of this House to translate these returns for them, and I can only conclude that from his own imagination of what they contain, he has made that argument to the House and based his charge against the officials of this country. I do not know how far the other returns refer to this matter, but surely, when one of his officials makes such a distinct statement, I think it must be convincing to the House as being correct that this parochial census only contained the figures to which I have referred, and I believe the House will agree with me that it entirely disposes of his argument and that a retraction and almost an apology is due from the hon. gentleman to the people of Canada for making any such charge.

I am not going more fully into his figures save to refer to one point in that address where he exulted in a denunciation of his former opponents and where he laid particular stress on the fiscal policy of the Mackenzie government and compared it very favourably with the fiscal policy pursued by the Conservative government between 1878 and 1896. He made the distinct statement that the policy of the Mackenzie administration enabled the country to tide over the period of depression between 1875 and 1879 better, than did the policy of the Conservative party enable the country to tide over the period of depression immediately preceding the advent of the present government to power. That was a mere assertion. It is incapable of proof. The majority of the members of this House are able to remember those two periods of depression, and I question if there is a man on the government side who is bold enough to say, from his own experience, that the depression between 1892 and 1896 was as severely felt as the depression between 1875 and 1879. That is more especially the case when we compare the conditions existing in Canada with the conditions existing in the United States during these two periods. We have figures to strengthen our memories as to this fact. In the first period of depression under the Liberal government, there was on an average 4½ per cent of the paper at the banks overdue, while during the period of depression between 1892 and 1896, there was only 1½ per cent of the paper at the banks overdue, and that very slightly differed from the amount of overdue paper in the years immediately preceeding and succeeding. We know also that periods of depression are unfortunately marked by business failures, and we find from the official returns that between the years 1875 and 1879, the total liabilities involved in the failures amounted to $133,138,000, while during the second period of depression under the Conservative government—when the business of the country was far and away wider and more extensive—the total amount involved in the failures was only $75,603,000; very considerably less it will be noticed than during the former period to which I have referred. In order that it may not be said that that was because of reasons peculiar to Canada, I may say that in the United States which was practically under the same fiscal policy during these two periods, the total liabilities of the failures between 1892 and 1896 were far in excess of the total sum involved in the period between 1875 and 1879. The fact of the matter is that the fiscal policy introduced and maintained by Sir John Macdonald and his successors—the fiscal policy which is practically identical with that now advocated by the Conservative party in Canada—created business interests within Canada, and rendered us less dependent on foreign countries. While of necessity, we were affected possibly inductively by the currents of trade in other countries, yet we were not affected to the same extent as when we were so entirely dependent on our neighbours to the south as we were during the regime of the Mackenzie government.

But, Sir, notwithstanding the statements that were made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), we find that the more the situation under the national policy is analyzed, the more does the national policy prove to have been beneficial to Canada. One would imagine from the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the foreign trade of a country is the only index to its prosperity. A very slight consideration of the question will show how utterly fallacious that argument is. When the national policy was first introduced, it was, so to speak, the development period of trade in this country. The home trade was far more important to us than the foreign trade. We had been importing large quantities of goods, and one of the reasons for the creation and development of the national policy was that these goods might be made within our own country, so that our home market might be supplied by Canadians; so that Canadian produce might be sold to Canadians; so that Canadian manufactures might be sold to Canadians, and so that the wants of Canada might be supplied within ourselves. It was not foreign trade, but development of the home trade that Canadians were seeking, and that was the principal object of the national policy. It may be worth our while then to look at the conditions of the trade of Canada in the early seventies. All admit that in 1873 and 1874 we were commencing to get well into the hard times, but still our foreign trade in 1874—which was distinctly a more disastrous year than 1873—our foreign trade in 1874 was in excess to our foreign trade in 1873, while at the same time the balances in the post office savings banks were going down rapidly. The foreign trade of Canada in 1874 amounted to $204,146,000, but the balances in the savings banks went down until in 1877 they reached the low figure of $2,639,000. Four years after that, when the benefits of the national policy were just beginning to be felt, the deposits in the post office savings banks had risen to $6,208,000, but our foreign trade was only $175,000,000; or, $28,000,000 less than it was in the disastrous year of 1874. I cite these figures to show, not that the foreign trade of a country is no index to its prosperity, but to show that taken alone it cannot be relied upon as proof in that connection. It is a good thing to have an increased foreign trade when the home trade is healthy, and in some lines, yes, in many lines the home trade of Canada is now healthy and progressive. But I will ask hon. members of this House to examine carefully into this matter. The hon. member for Guysborough in his speech lauded the policy of this government with respect to the iron and steel industry. We may safely take that as a good example of a healthy industry; and why is it healthy? It is because the policy inaugurated by the Conservative government with relation to iron and steel was maintained and continued by the present government; and continued in a way that it could not be affected by the preferential tariff; because the protection to the iron and steel industries is through bounties which are not at all affected by that preferential tariff, which I might almost call the thin end of the wedge of free trade. The same thing might be said of the other industries of the country that are in a healthy condition. They are in a healthy condition, because simply of the fact that the present government in their tariff tinkering did not interfere with the protection that had been given these industries by the Conservative government.

But there are some industries in Canada that are not in a healthy condition now, and one of these about which we hear so much, is the woollen industry, which is I may say essentially a home trade. The iron and steel trade is partially a foreign trade and the exports of iron and steel add considerably to the increase of our foreign trade. The iron and steel trade is not affected by the preferential tariff, but the woollen trade which is essentially a home trade is affected by it. Not only is the woollen manufacturer injuriously affected by the preferential tariff, but the Canadian farmer is also injuriously affected by it, and it is with that phase of the question which I propose to deal. I call attention to the fact that the importation of cheap shoddy goods is rendered possible by the preferential tariff. These goods come into this country with a nice finish, and they come into direct competition with goods made from Canadian wool which are better in quality, but which have not as fine a finish. What is perhaps more important is, that these goods come into competition with the goods made by the mills which handle Canadian wools. The natural result of this is that these mills have been injured, and the price of Canadian wool has steadily declined ever since 1896 until now when it is almost a drug on the market. That is a straight example of the interdependence of one industry in Canada on another. It is all very well to talk about protecting the classes, but protection to Canadian industries is a thing that affects the whole country. Protection to our Canadian woollen industries, is just as much protection to the Canadian wool grower as it is protection to the Canadian woollen manufacturer. The farmers of Canada lose by the reduction in the price of wool which is due to the preferential tariff, just as much, and indeed more possibly, than do the manufacturers whose business is interfered with by it.

Let me deal for a few minutes with this preferential tariff. If I am not mistaken, it was the member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) who said that no man on this side of the House dare oppose the preferential tariff. I do not know why he gave utterance to that statement so dramatically and with such vigour, because I was under the impression that many members on this side of the House have expressed their opposition to that very same preferential tariff. Indeed, I was under the impression that speaking last year in the House I said so myself; at all events I say so now, and I do not think it will take long to give what might be considered quite convincing reasons for my opinion. This, apart from the fact that the preferential tariff is only in name a preference to British goods. That very rule which permits goods to be imported under the preferential tariff in which there enters one-third of British work, practically gives the advantage of the preference to a country like Germany, which is as hostile to us in its tariff as it is possible for it under its laws to be.

Now, I know that there is and has been a good deal of sentiment connected with this question of the preferential tariff. So far as sympathy with and interest in Imperial questions are shown by it, I most certainly sympathize with it; for I think Canada should do her share towards bearing the burdens of the empire. I speak of that because it was very intimately associated with this question of the preference and with the different arguments on which it has been based. There is no doubt in my mind that Canada should bear her share of the expenses of Imperial defence, and there is equally no doubt in my mind that Canada's duty to the empire demands two things: first, self-development; and, next, to take her part in Imperial defence. That self-development is extremely important, and the preferential tariff as at present managed injures self-development, and is simply an excuse for not doing anything towards Imperial defence. I go further, and say that the returns provided by the government show that it does not help to increase Canadian and British trade. Let us look at the figures for a moment. If it helped to increase trade between Canada and Great Britain, that trade in the last four or five years ought to have increased at a greater ratio than the trade between the United States and Great Britain. Tremendous emphasis is laid upon the fact that the trade between Canada and Great Britain has increased. Of course it has increased. It would be a tremendous indictment of this government and of the legislation of Canada if in such a revival of trade as has been witnessed in the last four or five years the trade between Canada and Great Britain had not increased. The trade between the United States and Great Britain, as well as the trade between Great Britain and every other country in the world has greatly increased. What we have to do is to make a comparison between the trade of Canada with Great Britain and the trade of other countries similarly placed; and we cannot get a better country with which to make the comparison than the United States. We have in the report of the Minister of Trade and Commerce the figures of the trade with Great Britain since the preferential tariff came into force, taken from the English returns; and these figures show the exports from Canada to Great Britain in 1897 and 1900 to have been as follows :

In 1900....	21,764,021
Increase....	£ 2,546,103

Or an increase of 13⅓ per cent—satisfactory possibly in itself, undoubtedly satisfactory to many hon. gentlemen opposite, who have harped on that increase; but let us look at the returns given by the same authority of the exports from the United States to Great Britain :

In 1897....	£113,041,627
Increase....	£ 25,747,634

Or an increase of 22¾ per cent. In other words, while under this boasted preferential tariff which was going so largely to increase our trade with Great Britain, the trade of Canada increased 13⅓ per cent, in another country more highly protected by far than Canada and having no preferential tariff with Great Britain, and whose volume of trade was vastly greater than ours, the trade in the same period increased 22¾ per cent, nearly double the extent of our increase. This is not a result on which we ought to congratulate ourselves, and while I desire to emphasize these figures as showing the fallacy of the arguments on which this preferential tariff was based, they ought surely to furnish a lesson and a warning to us, and to cause this government and this House to look seriously into this question of trade, and see why it is that under these circumstances the trade of the United States with Great Britain could increase so much more rapidly than the trade of Canada with Great Britain.

But there is another thing that is worthy of examination. That preferential tariff was supposed to improve our trade with Great Britain not only in the matter of exports, but also in the matter of imports. Now, Canada buys very largely from the two great English-speaking countries, Great Britain and the United States. Let us see whether the preferential tariff has increased our import trade with Great Britain compared with our import trade with the United States. Taking the figures from the government blue-books, we find that Canada imported from Great Britain for home consumption as follows :

In 1897..	$29,401,188
In 1901....	42,819,995
Increase....	$13,418,813

Or an increase of 45⅝ per cent. In the same years Canada imported for home consumption from the United States, without any preferential tariff, as follows :

In 1897....	$ 57,023,342
In 1901	107,149,325
Increase....	$ 50,125,983

Or an increase of 87 9-10 per cent. In other words, while under the preferential tariff our imports from Great Britain increased 45⅝ per cent, our imports from the United States under our regular tariff rates increased 87 9-10 per cent. If any figures could possibly show that the preferential tariff has not done what it was alleged it would do, namely, increase our trade with Great Britain, these figures, taken from the government blue-book, surely show it.

There is one item which shows us that the preferential tariff was after all a huge piece of irony. I have already said that in many respects the tariff whch we now have is a protectionist tariff, as the old one was; but changes were made in it, and as I believe changes for the worse. We are often told that in one breath we accuse the government of stealing the clothes of the opposition, and the next moment we say that their tariff is very insufficient, and does not at all compare with the old one. The reason can be readily seen by any person who compares the two tariffs. In all the good points of their tariff the government have stolen the clothes of the opposition, but they have not got them on right. In 1901, the full benefit of the preferential tariff was expected to be felt. We were going to do such great things for Great Britain ; we were going to bring Canada much more close than ever to the mother country ; we were going to pave the way for practically a commercial union with her; but what has been the result ? According to the returns of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, given on page 15, of his last report, we find that in 1901, under the preferential tariff the average rate of duty collected on goods from Great Britain was 18·322 per cent, while the average rate of duty collected on goods from the United States without any preference was 12·424 per cent, just two-thirds of the duty that was collected on British goods under the preferential tariff. I can imagine the zeal with which some of those members of the present government who had been so strongly advocating commercial union with the United States, and who still believed in it though they no longer dared say so, carefully conned the importations from the United States, and judged wherein they might most benefit our American neighbours, and made the changes in the tariff accordingly. And realizing also the fact that, in the case of Great Britain, they were going to bring in a preferential tariff, they carefully increased the duties on the most important lines, so that their preferential tariff would be preferential in name only. Unfortunately—and I say this advisedly—they did not do that with sufficient completeness; and the result is that their tariff, while not benefiting Canada or Great Britain in the slightest degree, has, in certain lines, worked a great injury to Canada. These figures show, if any figures can,—I will not vouch for them after the reflection thrown upon official figures by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, from whose returns I have taken them, but I give them for what they may be worth, and, probably they are approximately correct—that so far as encouraging trade between Canada and Great Britain is concerned, the present tariff, with its preferential feature added is absolutely worthless. And it is more than worthless in the other lines I have mentioned. I have said that, so far as it is based upon Imperial sentiment, I sympathize with it; but, as an expression of Imperial sentiment it is fallacious. We have seen what that sentiment demands, but this preferential tariff is used as a mere excuse for refusing to bear our clear responsibility as citizens of the empire. We claim Imperial citizenship, and that claim is one of the reasons alleged for the introduction of this preferential tariff. But it is a paltry thing on the part of Canada as a whole to consider that, by passing a bogus preferential tariff, we have done our duty to the empire. It is interesting to note that in a recent report to the United States government as to its military establishment, it is shown that the people of the United States are spending upon that service over $90,000,000. I notice that, according to the estimates of the Minister of Militia and Defence, our total expense under this head is something like $2,000,000. And, even last year when the Halifax provisional garrison and the special services in South Africa took up something over $900,000, our expenditure was a little over $3,000,000. The population of Canada is, at the very least, one-fifteenth as large as that of the United States, while even this unusually large expenditure to which I have referred on our part is only about one-thirtieth of the expenditure of the United States on military service. I mention this to show that those hon. members of this House who have spoken of our getting no benefit through British connection are a long way out in their figures. If we compare our expense with the expense for the defence of the empire as borne by the people of Great Britain, instead of comparing with the military establishment of the United States, I think we are compelled to recognize that Britain is bearing a very great burden which ought to be shared by all those who benefit by Imperial connection. And we do benefit by it. Most certainly, in the matter of militia and defence expenditure we do not bear nearly the burdens that fall upon the people of the United States, whereas, considering that we cover an enormous territory with a small population, we might reasonably expect to bear a much greater expense, per head. Thus, in the matter of dollars and cents, Imperial connection has meant very much for us. It has meant very much more in other ways. I admit that, while we have great and serious difficulties to face, it would be wrong and improper to burden ourselves with too heavy a task financially. I admit further that, in sudden emergency and under popular pressure, we have done something—and I am glad we have done something—to contribute to the defence of the empire, and to take part in the wars of the empire. But we seem to consider that so far as financial burdens are concerned, we have done our duty. I infer from the estimates as they are now before us this year that the present government believes that no further expense should be borne by Canada in connection with Imperial defence, save only, so far as our own shores are concerned, and that only partly. I do not think that the citizens of Canada as a whole heard with any pride that we were still willing to offer our citizens to Great Britain for service in South Africa, but we cannot afford to spend a cent to send them to the country in which they are to serve. We can spend money on wharfs to improve the property of some members of parliament, or we can go on building post offices in friendly villages, but we cannot spend a cent on the defence of the empire. We can squander hundreds of thousands of dollars on an elevator to add to party strength, but we cannot spend a cent to add to the strength of the empire. I would like to have analysed some of our expenditures, just to show that we could succeed in getting a very large fund, without placing additional burdens upon the people of the country, to go towards Imperial defence. I think that an analysis of the expenditure might be an object lesson to some of the supporters of the present government regarding their former expressions of economy. However, the Big Ontario Policeman has been lost in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and our friend Mr. James McMullen has gone to what he himself called the home for incurables. Apparently, there does not seem to be any hon. gentleman on that side able to criticise the expenditure. I have already spoken longer than I intended to and I shall not attempt to do it now. But I submit that, while, undoubtedly, provision must be made for the public service, vastly greater economy should be shown. It is one of the difficulties of the opposition that, in criticising the proposed expenditure of the government as foreshadowed in the estimates, they feel that they are in danger of criticising items that must benefit the country generally. Criticism must, in nearly all cases, be devoted to the methods and details of expenditure after that expenditure has been made. I submit that an analysis of the Auditor General's Report, and an analysis of the expenditure generally in nearly all departments—not in all I am glad to say—would show that there is what might perhaps be very mildly called recklessness and extravagance which in a business house would bring financial ruin very soon. I submit that the enormously increased expenditure cannot be justified by public needs, and we can well afford to restrict that expenditure and do our work as citizens of the empire fairly, and not make a jug-handled preferential tariff an excuse for not doing our full duty. A little while ago, I referred to the unfounded attack—for it was an unfounded attack—made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce for party purposes upon the honesty of the census officers of 1891. But surely it was even a worse insult to the people of Canada as a whole that the government should proceed upon the assumption that Canada will give freely her sons for the empire, but cannot give one cent to feed them, or one cent to carry them to the scene of war, or one cent to look after them after they leave her shores and are engaged in fighting, not the battles of the motherland so much as the battles of the colonies of the motherland, simply because of the avaricious grasp that some of her citizens have on all the money that even prosperous years can pour into her treasury. This is a point upon which one could easily grow warm. Canada will show the true Imperial spirit that she ought to show by following the lines proposed by the opposition in regard to fiscal matters and contributing towards Imperial defence. Let her use her resources carefully. Let her see to it that her development is not interfered with from outside. And let her spend her revenues in a way to benefit the country rather than individuals. Let her see to it that her own producers are carefully and well protected by legislation, and this done, let her bend her energy to trade within the empire. And lastly, when she has that growing strength which comes from self development, let her contribute towards Imperial defence in a manner commensurate with her resources, and let her no longer consider the giving of a jug-handled preference as a fulfilment of her duty. I submit that the present policy of the opposition is really an Imperial policy. It represents the development of one of the greater parts of the empire, it proposes that we should develop our own strength, our own resources; and then, it is perfectly consistent with this that we should show our Imperial interests in a legitimate way by properly sharing the burdens of the empire.

Mr. W. S. MACLAREN (Huntingdon). Mr. Speaker, I do not feel quite so cool over this matter as the hon. member (Mr. Lavell), who has just taken his seat. I feel that it requires considerable nerve to get up at this stage of the debate and add another speech to it. When I remember that this debate has been going on for eight days, and that thirty-six or thirty-seven members have already spoken, I feel as if I were coming in pretty late in the day. I observe that on this occasion the House is very thin and apparently apathetic, and it was under similiar circumstances that I addressed the House last year. I mentioned at that time that it was rather discouraging to a new member to get up and speak before gentlemen who did not pay much attention to what he was saying. I do not pretend to know all about these fiscal matters. When I reflect that some of the greatest minds in the world have written whole libraries of books on this question, and still cannot agree about it, it can hardly be expected that the newer members of the House who lack their knowledge and education can speak very fluently upon the same question. I am in principle a free trader, and that is the basis of my support of the fiscal policy of the present government. That party and that policy which come nearest to my views are the party and the policy that I support.

I have listened with a great deal of respect to the remarks made by hon. members on both sides of this House. You know a man may be quite a politician in his own county, and yet not know very much about the intricacies of a fiscal policy. I have for a number of years taken a good deal of interest in political matters in the county of Huntingdon, but my chief interest was awakened about election time in my anxiety to get the candidate of my party elected. In that respect, I presume, I am like many others in the Dominion of Canada. I must admit that I have not studied this question as fully as I would like to have done before I came to the House. But what are we to do?

There are many hon. members in this House who have been here much longer than I have, who speak and act as if they knew all that was to be known of this matter.

I do not pretend to, and I think probably I show my common sense in frankly saying that I do not pretend to know everything about it. Now, what are we going to do under these circumstances? Take the Minister of Finance, for instance, a gentleman who enjoys the greatest respect on this side of the House, and who has presided over the fiscal affairs of this country for the last five or six years. We look upon the Minister of Finance as a gentleman of ability, as a fair average man in this House. I might put him a little higher, I might say more about him if he were not present. Well, the Minister of Finance has given his whole attention to this matter; he has studied the question of the best fiscal policy for Canada to pursue, he has studied the fiscal systems of the United States, of Great Britain, Germany, and other countries. Now is it not reasonable that we should pay a good deal of attention to what he says regarding these matters? I think so.

Then there is the Minister of Trade and Commerce, whose whole life time has been devoted to financial matters. He gave us an admirable speech the other evening, of some three hours length, a speech that I listened to with the greatest interest and attention. I am prepared to say it is the best speech I ever heard on this matter, though I cannot agree with some of the things he said. Now are we not to be influenced by the opinions and statements of gentlemen like these? There are few of us who have had time to get down to first principles, and to build up a theory for ourselves, and probably if we did build up one it would not stand. So our opinions are to a considerable extent moulded by those with whom we come in contact. But after I have heard all these wise men who have been a long time in parliament, I get bewildered. Such was the effect upon me of the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). He is a gentleman who, his friends say, has had a great many different kinds of fiscal policies, and he announces the one he holds to-day. I do not exactly understand what it is, it is a kind of quasi protection, I think. He has hardly sat down before up pops the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who says that the ideas of the hon. member for North Norfolk are the veriest nonsense, that he does'nt know what he is talking about. Then the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Robinson) announces his policy, which I suppose is the policy of the independent party of which he poses as leader. Then the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has a little theory of his own. You can imagine, Mr. Speaker, the position we poor unfortunate fellows occupy in coming into the House at the eleventh hour—there having been some 80 new members who came into the House last year—after hearing the diverse views of all these wise men, no wonder we get a little bewildered.

I propose to make a refeence to the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think a fair test of the importance of a speech is the attention that is paid to it by those who are opposed to the principles enunciated by a speaker. I have sat here listening from day to day, and I notice that nearly every member who has spoken from the opposition side has had something to say about the speeech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That fact proves to me that it was a speech of considerable importance. There was one part of it that interested me particularly, and that was a reference to my own county as one of those in which there had been a great increase in industries between 1881 and 1891, due to the national policy. I was a little astonished at first by the statement that there were forty new industries in the county of Huntingdon, but I began to get a little light when he stated subsequently that there were forty basket factories. I remembered that there was an Indian reserve at the western part of the county of Huntingdon called St. Regis, and that the Indian ladies, commonly called squaws, are in the habit of making baskets, and selling these baskets on the boats and cars, and taking them around the country and disposing of them among the farmers. Those were the forty basket factories that were established in the county of Huntingdon under the national policy. One thing that pleased me was to learn that in those forty basket factories there were forty-five people working; whereas in the county of Antigonish, there were seventy carpet factories that only employed sixty-nine persons. So I thought we were ahead of Antigonish. Now speaking seriously, it seems to me that where a thing of that kind occurs in a census I could believe almost anything else regarding it. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Lavell) has been quite fair to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in referring to his remarks on the census. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said this with regard to the stuffing of the census in the province of Quebec:

> Every hon. gentleman who knows anything of the customs of the people of Quebec is aware that in that province the parochial clergy every year make a very accurate census of all their parishioners, and I am informed of all the people within their particular cure.

Now the fact is that when the cure goes round to take the census of the parish, he not only takes the Roman Catholic people, but he takes Protestants as well.

Mr. LAVELL. Then the returns are false, are they? I read from the returns.

Mr. MACLAREN (Huntingdon). The hon. member spoke of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and I am speaking of him also. But we have another test. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, after stating that 40,615 more names were found on the census than were recorded three months previous by the parish priests, says:

> I am willing to admit that there will always be a slight discrepancy between such a census and the census taken by the government enumerators. I believe the parish priests do not enumerate those who are absent at the time, and there are some other slight differences; but our census of 1901 corresponds with these parochial censuses within 8,000 souls.

Now they took the government census in 1891, and they took the parochial census of three months previous, and they found there were over 40,000 more on the government census than on the parochial census. They took the government census of 1901 and the parochial census of 1901, and they found there was a difference of 8,000. The parochial census was taken in the same way in 1891 as in 1901; and there is where the Minister of Trade and Commerce found a difference of 32,000, as between 8,000 and 40,000. I think it is fair to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that I should make this explanation.

Now, as I said before, I get somewhat bewildered by hearing so many contradictory statements from each side of the House. So I think the best thing for me to do is to follow my own opinions. One thing I cannot understand is how the increase of duty is going to cheapen articles to those who have to purchase. That has always troubled me. I was talking the other day to a manufacturer down at the Russell House, and I put him this question: What about those who have to purchase? He said: The increase in duty does not necessarily increase the price of the article. Well, we are all human, we like to get all we can for what we have to sell, and buy as cheaply as possible. And I have not that confidence in the philanthropy of the manufacturers of this country to believe that they are going to give us goods any cheaper than they can afford to, and whatever duty is put on they will add to the price of their goods. Their idea seems to be that if you can put the tariff high enough to keep the goods out of the country the internal competition, as they say, will regulate the price of the articles. The government had to pass a Bill to regulate the matter and we had a little experience last summer in connection with the paper combine. I think we will find some combines existing in regard to other things, and that if they have a chance they will charge their own price for the goods. I think that argument is fallacious. I do not think it will hold water at all and I think that what we want in Canada is a cheap country to live in. I live in a purely agricultural constituency. We have no manufactures of any kind of our own, but, when I say that I will also say that I do not believe in parish politics. I do not believe in taking the view merely of our own counties, and when the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock), in his speech, was pleading for the woollen manufacturers, I could not help believing that that hon. gentleman being largely interested in woollen manufactures was probably not thinking so much of the general good of the Dominion as of the dividends which would come to him from the industries in which he is interested.

With 23⅓ per cent of protection on woollen goods, I cannot see why the manufacturers cannot make a fair living. And here I would just like to say that there seems to be an idea abroad that it is only those people who are engaged in manufacturing that have capital invested in anything. Is not the farmer a capitalist in the same sense? Has not the farmer his capital invested in his stock, his farm and his implements, and should the farmer not get a fair return from his investments the same as the manufacturer of goods? We have a newspaper in the county of Huntingdon. It is quoted a great deal by the organs of our friends opposite as a Liberal organ which is not satisfied with the action of this government. I refer to the Huntingdon 'Gleaner.' While I do not agree with everything the 'Gleaner' says, there is no question at all but that the editor of the 'Gleaner' is a man of great ability and one who gives a great deal of attention to these matters. He issues an almanac each year instead of a holiday number in which he gives a resume of what has happened during the year. He has a good deal to say of the extravagant way in which the government of the Dominion is carried on, and although he says a good deal about the extravagance of the Liberal party, the only consolation we have is that he said far worse things about the extravagance of the Conservative party when they were in power. He gave us an estimate of the return farmers get from their investment, and I think Huntingdon is about equal to any other county in the Dominion. I think we have fairly good farmers in the district of Beauharnois, which includes Huntingdon, Chateauguay and Beauharnois. His estimate was that the return farmers get from their investment is about 2 or 2½ per cent. I was staggered a little at that statement. I made some inquiry among the farmers of that locality and verified the figures he had given us. He gave the average produce of the farm, specifying what the farmer had to sell, what it cost to work the farm, and so on, and he reduced it to the fact that the return the farmer gets is not more than 2 or 2½ per cent on his investment. Would the manufacturers of woollen goods be prepared to accept a dividend of that kind? Or, would the manufacturers of cotton goods be prepared to accept that, or would they want more? I was reading in a paper a few days ago, on this particular question, a paragraph, and I was wondering if there was any truth in it. Dealing with the statement that factories were not able to make a fair dividend, the reason was given that the owners did not keep their factories up to date in the way of machinery, and it was said that they found it much cheaper to run their factories with old machines which are obsolete and out of date, and to come to the government and get more protection, thus enabling them to pay dividends with old machines which are out of date and not equal to those in use in Great Britain and the United States. That paragraph said:

> Grandsons inherit factories originally representing investments of millions of dollars and instead of throwing on the junk pile the machinery installed by their grandfathers they continue to operate them by the old antiquated method.

It was to me rather a staggering statement, and yet, in conversation with a man who is interested in a woollen factory, I had this statement made to me : Some new blood had been brought into the directorate of a woollen mill and amongst the directors was a man who had had a good deal to do with machinery in other lines. He found a certain machine in operation in this mill, and he thought it would be better to replace it with another machine. After some difficulty he got the directors to consent to put this old machine out and to put another machine in. The machine that was put out was as good as it ever was but it was out of date. The new machine that was put in cost $6,000, and this gentleman told me that it earned $7 a day more than the old machine, which hon. gentlemen will admit is a pretty fair return for an investment of $6,000. Our manufacturers should equip their factories with machinery as good as that employed in the United States, Great Britain and other countries. The great industry of this country is agriculture. There is no question about that. The census of 1901 was certainly disappointing to us all. I have talked to a great many people on that subject. A good many people expected a population of at least 6,000,000, but I have not found any person who expected a population of less than 5,500,000 ; yet, we fell short of that. What we want in this country is population. We have the great wheat fields of the North-west Territories waiting for the people to till. We have western Ontario as well as new portions of the other provinces being opened up, and after all what we want is more population. What would be an inducement to offer people to come to Canada ? A number of immigrants are coming from the United States. These people have some means, and they are coming in and settling in the North-west Territories. But, the large mass of the people who come are from the congested parts of Europe. Some of them come because of religious or civil persecution, but the great majority of them are poor men who come in the hope of bettering themselves. One of the things we ought to do, and it would be an inducement to immigration, is to make this country a cheap place to live in. I cannot for the life of me see how, if you are going to protect these manufacturers and enable them to charge the highest price of their goods, how you are thereby making it a cheap country for the consuming masses of the people. Although there is a large amount invested in manufactures there is an infinitely larger amount invested in other pursuits, and I think the people ought to have the advantage of being able to secure cheap goods. I am in favour of a vigorous immigration policy. I am just as loyal as the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Lavell). I served 26 years in the militia, I was out in the Fenian raid and I got my medal. I am just as loyal as loyal can be. There is no question about that. I think if the government have any money to spend they should devote it to the prosecution of a vigorous immigration policy. I have heard the statement made that the immigrants brought into Canada have cost the country $8.40 apiece. I think if we can get good immigrants to come and settle in Canada even if it costs us $8.40, or $10 apiece, we should get them. I am in perfect sympathy with the mother country in the trouble which she is having in South Africa, and whether it is our duty to pay for the men that we are sending to help her, I am not going to express an opinion at the present moment, but, I would like to see this government engage in a more vigorous immigration policy and make an effort to fill up this country. It is not my intention to quote any figures. You know it has been said that figures never lie, but it is also said that some people who are not very veracious sometimes figure. The figures are all of the same class, they are all taken from the blue-books, but different conclusions are arrived at from these figures. It depends largely which side of the House the member sits who is quoting them. A great deal has been said about the imports and the exports to and from the United States and Great Britain and other countries, and as to whether the imports or the exports are greater or less, but hon. gentlemen do not seem to be able to agree. One hon. gentleman says that because the imports exceed the exports it is a good sign, while another hon. gentleman says that it is a bad sign. They go jumbling things all around, and I made up my mind that I was not going to quote figures at all.

Let us look for a moment at the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax), because the hon. the Speaker told us a few days ago that we were to talk about the amendment. I notice that very few hon. members have had much to say about that amendment. They have wandered very far afield and have talked about almost everything but the amendment. Some hon. members, however, did speak about it and one thing they seemed to stumble on is that they want adequate protection. I notice that in the amendment hon. gentlemen propose to protect everything. I think the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) came very near the mark when he told us the other day that there was no way in which to protect the farmer. The only way I know of in which to protect the farmer is to make this a cheap country to live in. I observe that the amendment proposes that we shall protect the labourer. If we increase the tariff, for instance, on woollen goods, how much of it will the manufacturers give to the labourer ? Although I am a free trader, I would like to make a bargain with these people. I would like to ask them if they would give half of the increased price they get for their goods to the men who are working for them.

If they will not give half, I would be willing to make it 25 per cent, and try to strike a bargain with them at that figure. I am afraid the labourer would not get any of the increase. I am afraid it would be taken out of the pockets of the purchasers and that it would go directly into the pockets of the manufacturers. I say here, that so far as the policy of the present government is concerned it does not come near enough to free trade for me; but it comes a great deal nearer to it than the policy proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and therefore I am prepared to support the government in their policy as it is, and to hope for better things. However, I will speak a word of warning. If there is any revision of the tariff it must be down and not up, or otherwise the government will find that there are a great many members on this side of the House who are not at all satisfied, and who will speak their minds out if they have occasion to, notwithstanding that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and others seem to veer around in the direction of protection. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always twitting us on this side of the House with not being united, and that sort of thing. Do they think we are mere machines who come here to vote in a certain way? Are we to lose our individuality, and our independence, because we are members of this parliament? I hope I will never come to that stage. I am prepared at any time to express my individual views with regard to any matter that comes before us. Whether it is entirely in accord with the party with which I am identified or not, I am prepared at all times to express my views on public matters. I may err in judgment, but at all events I will be independent while I am in this House, and state my views as to what I believe to be in the best interests of this country.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). It was not my intention to say anything on the budget, but the gentleman who was to follow the hon. member for Huntingdon is not in his seat, and as the Minister of Finance has made up his mind that the House must sit until eleven o'clock, I will try to interest him until that hour, unless he consents to my moving the adjournment of the debate and making my speech to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. W. S. Fielding). The threat of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) that he will go on with his speech is one that we should seriously consider. If I am correctly informed, an agreement has been come to, so far as these things are possible, that this debate will be brought to an end on Tuesday next. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) is aware of that.

Mr. TAYLOR. The arrangement is that the division will be taken at the Tuesday sitting of the House, but of course that may run into Wednesday morning.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, of course. That being understood, there is no object in sitting to an unreasonable hour now, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) wishes to adjourn the debate, I will offer no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I will move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, April 3, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 89) to incorporate the Canada Central Railway Company.—Mr. Scott.

THE MONTREAL BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. R. BICKERDIKE (Montreal, St. Lawrence) moved:

That that portion of the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines which refers to Bill (No. 38) respecting the Montreal Bridge Company, be referred back to the said committee for further consideration.

Mr. T. O. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). When this Bill came before the committee the other morning it was defeated by a large majority. I would like some explanation from the hon. gentleman of the reason he is asking to have it reinstated on the Order Paper.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. The only explanation I have to give is that the gentleman from Montreal who was promoting the Bill is anxious to be heard before the committee. It was one o'clock when the vote was taken in the committee, and there was not sufficient time to discuss it fairly; and the people in Montreal whom he represents would like an opportunity of being heard.

Mr. W. S. MACLAREN (Huntingdon). I was present in the Railway Committee when the Bill came up. I do not know anything about the merits of the several schemes for bridges proposed to be built between Montreal and the south shore; but I did think we had not got sufficient information with regard to the matter. There seemed to be an inclination on the part of the members of the committee to hurry matters through, and I think it would be only fair that the promoters of that company should have an opportunity of at least fairly laying their case before the committee before the committee makes its decision. There were very few members present at the time, it was near the close of the sitting; other matters of importance had come up, and after each member got through with the matter he was particularly interested in, he left the committee, as is usually the case in that committee, and only a few of those who are in the habit of waiting until the committee rises were left to look after the remaining part of the business. The consequence was that when the Bill came before the committee I do not think it was fairly considered, and I am in favour of the motion to refer it back to the Railway Committee to be dealt with again.

Mr. R. LEMIEUX (Gaspé). I happened to be present in the committee when this Bill was discussed yesterday morning, and the vote which was taken there shows that a great deal of attention was given to the explanations of Mr. Buchan, the representative of the Montreal Bridge Company. The vote taken stood 41 to 11 or 12, so a large number of the members of the committee were present and listened to the discussion. I do not want to discuss the merits of the Bill now, but it is well known in Montreal, and in the Montreal district especially, that it is nothing else but another Armstrong scheme. It has not the confidence of the people of Montreal, and should be defeated.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). I am happy to support the motion of the hon. member for the St. Lawrence division of Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike), whom we are very glad to see back in this House after his severe illness. I do not think this Bill received due consideration at the hands of the committee, and I am surprised that my hon. friend from Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), whose name I think appears on the Bill, should now be opposed to the motion to give it further consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I refused positively. I was asked to introduce the Bill in the House. I asked who the promoters were. I wanted to know if Mr. Armstrong had anything to do with it. I was not given any satisfactory explanation, and now I know that Mr. Armstrong is the backbone of the Bill.

Mr. MONK. I understood my hon. friend was the mover of the Bill. Who is the mover of the Bill ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think the hon. member for Ottawa is (Mr. Belcourt).

Mr. MONK. At any rate what struck me was this ; this company was incorporated in 1890, but for various reasons it has not proceeded with the work. It was alleged before the committee that the present promoters were serious men. The name of one of them is well known throughout this country, Mr. Henry Hogan, of Montreal. Another of the promoters is the Hon. Mr. Berthiaume, proprietor of 'La Presse.' I am sure that these are names which will commend themselves to the House. We were told that the project had the very strongest possible backing from some wealthy American capitalists. We were given no occasion to find out who these men were, but it was alleged by a most respectable lawyer from Montreal who was there to speak in favour of the Bill that not less than $50,000 had been spent in preliminary surveys. An offer was made to present the proof of that allegation. Plans have been completed. They are not on their way to completion. I am now taking the statement that was made before the committee. The question of a bridge below Montreal is one which interests in a very high degree not only the population of Montreal but the population of the surrounding counties and particularly the population of the county which lies immediately to the south of Montreal. My hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Geoffrion) supported us in the desire we evinced to have that measure fully discussed. There were two reasons why the Bill was disposed of in this summary manner and no opportunity given, in a matter of this kind where a most desirable expenditure of $10,000,000 was contemplated in Montreal, to the party who was defending the Bill to adduce proof of his allegation. The reasons given were most futile, I submit. We were told there was another project, that there was on the Order Paper lower down a Bill to incorporate a company having for its object the construction of a similar bridge. Into the merits of the allegation we had no occasion to go at all, and there was no reason for the statement that Mr. Armstrong was connected with this company or this enterprise. I submit to this House, that whatever may be the shortcomings of Mr. Armstrong, what we are concerned with is not Mr. Armstrong, who may have personal enemies on either side of the House, but the seriousness of the enterprise, and whether Mr. Armstrong is connected with it or not does not matter to us provided there are men interested in it who are capable of carrying out the enterprise. This allegation of Mr. Armstrong's interest in the enterprise, Mr. Buchan, the lawyer from Montreal, who is promoting the Bill, offered to refute ; in fact, if I remember rightly, he stated before the committee that any interest that Mr. Armstrong might have had in the company had now disappeared, that he was no more a shareholder and I have been informed that there is proof of that. Well, if Mr. Armstrong, objectionable or not, has no interest in the Bill, if it can be established before the committee that he is no more a shareholder in that company and if the parties whom I have already named are really willing to go on with the enterprise, why should we throw out this Bill without giving it any study when the promoters are merely asking for an extension of time, a favour which is asked from this House and granted every day ? In fact, I believe that this morning the committee granted that favour reporting favourably on a Bill extending the time for beginning operations when the time had actually lapsed, whereas, in this instance, it had not. As I have already stated this is a project which interests to a very high degree the people of Montreal and all we ask is that the different Bills may be considered at the same time, so that the committee may judge of the merits of these different Bills. I think this is a fair request and should be granted.

Mr. C. S. HYMAN (London). Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the committee which had the consideration of this Bill, I have only to say that I think it was a very fair representation of the committee that was present when this Bill was taken up and that it was fully discussed. There were over sixty members of the committee present and the vote on the Bill was something like 41 to 17. Mr. Buchan who was promoting the Bill had every opportunity of addressing the committee. The committee extended to him the courtesy of allowing him to address it and he did so most fully. It is quite true that just before one o'clock there was some question as to Mr. Buchan's again addressing the committee. I did not refuse Mr. Buchan permission but the committee had the matter fully before it and by a vote it was decided not to hear Mr. Buchan further. There was still an other reason for the action of the committee. There was a member of the committee present who addressed the committee against the Bill and who, I understand, is the owner of 1,700 shares out of something like 2,500 shares in the undertaking. He spoke very strongly against the Bill, and I think in a case of that kind a gentleman holding such an interest in the company as that ought to have very good reasons for not desiring the Bill to be further considered. It does seem to me that there should be a fair rule laid down in regard to a matter of this kind. If an hon. member makes a motion of this kind and has nothing new to lay before the House, a Bill should not be sent back to a committee for reconsideration. The Bill has been most fully considered. I am not speaking against the Bill ; I am merely stating what occurred. I think it would be a fair rule for the House to carry out that unless there is something new to be laid before the House, a Bill should not be sent back to a committee simply on the request of a member. I trust the hon. members of the House will take into consideration the fact that the committee fully discussed the Bill before arriving at the decision at which it did arrive.

Mr. MONK. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hyman) if he is aware that there was no opportunity given to Mr. Buchan to establish, what he alleged, that Mr. Armstrong had no more interest in that company ?

Mr. HYMAN. I have only to say that that fact was referred to a number of times. Mr. Buchan had an opportunity of referring to it and of refuting the statement, but he did not have it at the particular time he asked for. That is all. He had every opportunity before one o'clock but at the last moment he wanted to discuss the matter again.

Hon. DAVID TISDALE (South Norfolk). I think that possibly a matter which was referred to a committee and voted upon will bear a little further explanation to give those hon. members of the House who were not present in the committee an opportunity of understanding the exact position. I may say for myself that I knew nothing of the merits of this Bill. It was an ordinary Bill for a renewal of time. This happens to be a bridge. I think there have been three or four bridge charters renewed already during this session under the same circumstances but the bridges were not across the same river. Further than that there has been a number of railway charters extended, and it was rather a surprise to myself when it came up in the committee that an ordinary application for a renewal of a charter of this sort should meet with such strong opposition. The only opposition to this Bill mentioned in the committee, was that there was another application for a charter lower down on the list, covering precisely the same project. Then it was mentioned that a gentleman named Armstrong was connected with this scheme. The members from Montreal and the neighbourhood seem to know Mr. Armstrong better than I do, and I take it for granted from what they said, that there might be objections to him. However, that may be, I moved, as I thought it was only fair to do, that this Bill be deferred and be considered with the second Bill of a similar kind so that the committee could have the advantage of hearing the particulars regarding both of the projects. For the first time in my memory which extends over a long connection with the Railway Committee, that proposition was opposed, and to my surprise it was rejected by a vote of forty against seventeen. I submit that that was not fair consideration of the Bill. Most of us were entirely ignorant of the merits of either of the Bills, but never the less, without one tittle of explanation the Bill was thrown out. Surely the Railway Committee will not subscribe to the proposition that they should kill a charter simply on the statement that there is another charter to be considered later covering the same project. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has mentioned three very good names who are backing this Bill, and I regret that the gentlemen behind the other charter would not allow us to hear any explanation about this one. It should be remembered that the committee declined to allow a gentleman by the name of Buchan, who was a complete stranger to me, to answer statements made in the committee. It is true that he explained the scheme, but he explained it very moderately and very briefly, and when I moved that he should be heard in reply to statements made by the other side, the committee absolutely refused to allow Mr. Buchan to speak. Much as I dislike to oppose any finding of the Railway Committee, yet after an experience of fifteen years, I can say that this is a very peculiar case and that the entire circumstances surrounding it warrant us in asking that the Bill be referred back to the committee, because there undoubtedly was not a full consideration of it.

Mr. J. A. C. MADORE (Hochelaga). I rise to endorse what has been stated by the chairman of the Railway Committee (Mr. Hyman). I made the motion in the committee which killed this Bill, and I see no reason in the world why it should be sent back for further consideration. Speaking for myself personally, as well as for those whom I represent, we have no objection that the Bill should be sent back, because we know very well that when the committee have heard full explanations from both sides they would not for a moment think of passing this charter of the Montreal Bridge Company to extend the time for the building of that bridge. But the question arises: Is there any reason why the Railway Committee of this House should waste its time in reconsidering that Bill which has already been killed? Mr. Buchan was heard in support of his Bill. Every member of the committee who was present knows that Mr. Buchan spoke twice on the subject, and it was only when he rose to ask leave to speak a third time, and after one o'clock, that the members of the committee expressed the opinion that they were fully informed on the subject, and that they did not need any more information. Mr. Buchan has no reason to complain. He has been very well treated, and every reason he could give has been given by him. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has stated that the only reason why the Bill was killed was because the name of Mr. Armstrong was mentioned in connection with it. That is not exactly the case. It is not Mr. Armstrong alone who has made application for this charter, but it is the Montreal Bridge Company, which is composed of a number of gentlemen. They were granted their charter in 1890, and since that time they have made no serious effort to begin the work. Under the charter of 1890, they bound themselves to commence to build the bridge within three years, and to have it completed within seven years. The three years elapsed and they did not move. They even waited until the expiration of the seven years for the completion of the bridge, and then they came back to this parliament asking for an extension of time. I claim that when in 1897, they got that extension of time their charter had actually lapsed, because they had not complied with the provisions in the charter which required them to commence the bridge within three years. However that may be, this parliament in 1897 granted an extension of five years to the Montreal Bridge Company to complete the bridge. Since that time they have never moved. There is not an inch of work done to-day. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) stated that they have spent about $50,000, but the fact is that there has not been a cent spent since 1890. Before 1890, plans were prepared and these were the very plans that were produced before the committee. There is not a word of proof that they have incurred one dollar of expense since 1890. In view of the fact that parliament has already granted the Montreal Bridge Company two extensions of time, is it reasonable that parliament should again extend their charter to have it there as an embarrassment in the way of another company who seriously undertake to build the bridge? We know very well in Montreal the reason why this application has now been made to parliament. We know very well that it is because certain difficulties have arisen between the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the South Shore Railway Company, and the New York Central Railway Company with regard to running rights over the Victoria bridge. These companies do no longer agree with the Grand Trunk Railway as regards the terms on which the Victoria bridge should be used by them, and so the American capitalists interested in these companies have decided to build a bridge of their own. When Mr. Armstrong heard this, then he made an application to have the charter renewed so that he might perpetuate the embarrassment to others which his charter has caused ever since 1890. Had that charter not been extended in 1897, the bridge between Longeuil and Montreal would have been completed long ago by responsible people who are willing and able to build it. But so long as the other charter was in existence the people on both sides of the river expected that the bridge would be constructed, and men who really desired to build a bridge did not like to embark in the enterprise. Now that Mr. Armstrong and some others connected with him see that enterprising people are ready to construct a bridge, they want purely and simply to blackmail them in order to compel them to buy that charter. That is the reason why parliament is asked now to grant a further extension of the charter. I do not believe that this House will be a party to that deal, and that the Bill which has been killed will remain killed.

Mr. MONK. Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question? If the facts are so much against this company as he states, what objection has he to this Bill being considered at the same time as his own Bill?

Mr. MADORE. That is exactly what I have stated, that, as far as I am concerned and the people I represent, we have no objection; but it is a question for this House, whether we are going to lose the time of the committee for the pleasure of Mr. Armstrong and company.

Mr. GEORGE BALL (Nicolet). I have no interest whatever in this charter. I was not here when it passed through the committee; but the reason given for throwing it out is so poor that I think I should say a few words in favour of having the Bill sent back to the committee. The single interest which I have in the Bill is that I represent a county on the south shore, through which the Quebec Southern Railway is going to pass. It is said that this charter was granted a long time ago, and that the gentlemen controlling it have not done much. Well, there was no opportunity to do much, because up to this time there has not been much progress made with the railroad; but now that the railroad is going to be built, other speculators come forward and want to have another charter. Why did they not present their Bill at the same time as the other ? But no, they present it now because there is a good prospect of having the bridge built, and there will be encouragement not only for the government but for Montreal and other places to give it assistance. An hon. gentleman on the other side said he was going to support the Bill, but after investigation he found that the name of Mr. Armstrong was connected with it yet. Well, I think that is a poor excuse. Why should I refuse to live in the city of Montreal because Mr. Armstrong lives there ? It is the same thing. You will not go into a certain business because another man you do not like is interested in it. I remember that last year the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine) opposed the Bill because Mr. Armstrong was interested in it. I think that is a very poor reason. It is said that there is no opportunity of passing it, that it will take up the time of the House. It will not take much time, as the two Bills are going to be discussed together. I do not suppose it will take an hour of the time of the committee to discuss this matter. You see that a representative from the district of Montreal presented the Bill, and when he found out that Mr. Armstrong had something to do with it, he took the opportunity of presenting the Bill when he knew there was not one present to support it, and he got it killed. I do not suppose I need say that I am going to vote for the motion.

Mr. N. A. BELCOURT (Ottawa). As this Bill stands in my name, I think I owe it to the House to explain why I am taking no interest in the matter, and doing nothing to support it. All I desire to say is that when the petition for the Bill was to be presented, some of the gentlemen interested in it asked me if I would present the petition to the House in the absence of the member who was going to take charge of the Bill; and, as any member of the House would do, I presented the petition, but did nothing further in regard to the Bill, and have no interest in it.

Mr. MONK. May I ask the hon. member who had charge of the Bill ?

Mr. BELCOURT. I cannot remember what name was stated to me; but the gentleman who asked me to present the petition said that the member was going to take charge of the Bill, and asked me if I would present the petition, which I did.

Mr. V. GEOFFRION (Chambly and Vercheres). I am perhaps more interested in this Bill than any other member of the House, as the bridge in question is to be built in my county. The question is not, as I understand, whether this charter should be granted, but whether we are to send this Bill back to the Railway Committee. The members of the committee will remember that when the parties interested in the Bill were before the committee, I rose and asked that the two Bills be taken up together; but the promoters of the Bill unfortunately would not listen to my proposition, and decided to go on with this Bill. Therefore, I am now in a good position to say that if they chose to take that position, and preferred to take chances with this Bill, they should abide by the result. If the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) was not satisfied with the explanations given in the committee, the different members who voted said by their votes that they were satisfied with them. I voted before the committee to give an opportunity for more explanations, but the committee seemed to be satisfied with the explanations given, and voted nay. Therefore, I am now in a good position to say that I do not think that this Bill should be sent back to the Railway Committee. It was fully discussed; all the members of the committee were in a position to judge it on its merits, and they did judge; and I think it is a very dangerous practice to send back to the committee Bills which have been fully discussed before it and disposed of.

Mr. MONK. I think my hon. friend and I both voted to have both Bills considered at the same time.

Mr. GEOFFRION. We did not vote that at all. We voted to have more explanations from Mr. Buchan, the promoter of the Bill, and I was prepared to give all the time and opportunity necessary to the different promoters of the Bill; but I think it was unfair for the promoters of the Bill to refuse to take up the two Bills together, and that was the position I took at the time.

Mr. A. W. PUTTEE (Winnipeg). I shall have to support the amendment to refer the Bill back to the committee—not because I am interested in the Bill at all, for I am not, but because I was in the Railway Committee yesterday morning when this matter was disposed of. I know nothing whatever of the merits of the Bill. No opportunity was given me or any member in my position to form an intelligent opinion as to whether that charter should be granted or not. I was not favourably disposed to the Bill, but I think that it should be given a fair hearing in the committee.

Mr. DAVID HENDERSON (Halton). I was in the committee yesterday when this Bill was thrown out. It was approaching one o'clock when the matter came before the committee, and a very large number of the members were absent. The Bill was simply to extend the time, and as a bill of that nature usually receives the endorsement of the Railway Committee, it was quite natural that a large number of the members of the committee, considering that the passing of the Bill was only a matter of form, should have left the room and a comparatively small number remained to deal with this important measure. I feel that the promoters did not receive very kind treatment at the hands of those present. It would appear that it was understood among a certain number that no opposition would be offered to this Bill, and that the larger portion of the committee had no hint given them that it would be opposed. It was apparently understood that it would receive the ordinary treatment accorded measures of that character. The result was that largely those who were opposed to the Bill remained in the committee room and a very small number were there to support it. The promoter was not present and there was no member present to speak in its behalf. I regard the whole proceedings as one of considerable hardship. Looking at the matter in a general way—and that is the only way in which I can look at it—I must say that I knew nothing at all of the merits of the scheme until yesterday, but to my mind this is a case in which the House can well afford to refer the report back to the committee and have the mistake corrected rather than treat the measure in an unceremonious way and possibly do considerable injury. I shall vote with pleasure for the resolution to refer that portion of the report back which deals with this Bill.

House divided on motion of Mr. Bickerdike.

Bill (No. 90) to incorporate the British American Life Insurance Company.—Mr. Stephens.

Bill (No. 91) respecting the Timagami Railway Company.—Mr. McCarthy.

Bill (No. 92) to amend the Railway Act so as to promote the safety of railway employees.—Mr. Smith (Vancouver).

QUESTIONS.

I.C.R.—PURCHASES OF TIES AND SLEEPERS.

Mr. BARKER asked:

1. How many railway ties or sleepers were purchased for the Intercolonial Railway in the autumn of 1900 and in the winter of 1901, between Metapedia and Moncton?

2. What proportion of such ties or sleepers were spruce, fir and poplar, respectively?

3. What prices were paid for each such description of tie or sleeper?

4. Were such ties or sleepers required to be in accordance with any and what specifications as to size, quality or otherwise?

5. Were tenders called for, if so, what notice by advertisement or otherwise was given to the public with respect thereto?

6. What amount was paid out by Inspector McMannus or other persons on behalf of the government or of the Intercolonial Railway for railway ties or sleepers during the month preceding the 7th day of November, 1900?

7. (a.) Who were the contractors who supplied the railway ties or sleepers in the autumn of 1900 and the winter of 1901 between the points above mentioned?

(b.) Did each of them have the privilege of delivering a percentage of spruce, fir and poplar, and if so, what percentage? or was this privilege given to some only, and if so, to whom?

(c.) If this privilege was given to some only, and was not general, why was it not granted to all contractors?

8. (a.) Were such railway ties or sleepers paid for in cash or by cheque?

(b.) What proportion was paid for by cheque and what proportion was paid for in cash?

(c.) Is it the usual custom to pay for such supplies by cheque upon voucher, and if so, why was this custom departed from?

9. (a.) What special privileges, if any, were given to Mr. F. Curran in connection with contracts for supplying railway ties and sleepers in 1900 and 1901?

(b.) Were the same privileges extended to all other persons tendering for the supplying of railway ties or sleepers?

10. What amount of railway ties or sleepers purchased in 1900 and 1901, respectively, still remain on hand, and what proportion of each respectively, have been used?

11. Of the ties and sleepers so purchased in the autumn of 1900 and the winter of 1901, what proportion were fir, spruce and poplar, respectively, and what proportion of each have been used, and what proportion still remain on hand?

12. Has the Department of Railways and Canals a report on the quality and durability or value of spruce, fir and poplar ties, respectively; if so, by whom was such report made, and when was it made?

13. Has any allegation or charge been made against contractor McMannus in connection with the surveying of such ties or sleepers or any of them, and if so, has the same been investigated, and with what result?

14. Has any reinspection or examination of the said railway ties or sleepers been made during the summer of 1901, or at any other time, and if so, by whom and with what result, and have any and what proportion of such ties and sleepers been found to be under-sized or otherwise unsuitable?

15. If any such reinspection has been made, when and by whom was it made, and at what cost has it been completed, and if it has not been completed, is it still in progress, and if it is not in progress, why has it been discontinued?

16. If any of such ties or sleepers have been found to be below the required size or otherwise unsuitable, or not in accordance with the specifications, if any, what steps have been taken to recover the value thereof from the contractor?

17. Has any track foreman between Newcastle and Moncton reported that railway ties or sleepers delivered to him for use on the Intercolonial Railway were under size or otherwise unsuitable, and has he sent any specimen thereof to the chief engineer at Moncton for inspection?

18. What is the usual practice of the department with respect to the paying for ties or sleepers, and was this practice in any way departed from by payment in cash instead of by cheque or otherwise during the autumn of 1900 and the winter of 1901?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair):

1. 553,210.

2. 289,805 spruce. Fir and poplar not ordered.

3. 183,053 spruce, eight feet at twenty cents; 186 spruce, eight feet at twenty-two cents; 96 spruce, eight feet at twenty-four cents; 107 spruce, eight feet at twenty-six cents; 106,363 spruce, nine feet at twenty-five nine-tenth cents.

4. They were to be in accordance with Intercolonial Railway specifications.

5. Tenders were called for by advertising poster, dated the 24th of September, 1900, and exhibited at all stations of the railway. The poster called for tenders to be sent in by the 15th of October, 1900.

6. The treasurer of the Intercolonial Railway issued railway cheques to the amount of $34,988.99 in payment for railway ties during the month preceding the 7th day of November, 1900. Neither Inspector McMannus nor any other persons paid any amount on behalf of the government or of the Intercolonial Railway.

7. (a) Frank Curran, Humphrey & Trites, F. T. B. Young, J. D. Buckley, Patrick Ultican, D. J. Buckley, John Culligan, John Maloney, Jas. O. Fish, A. Dunn, P. Hennessy, Patrick Tobin, C. A. Murray, J. J. Fournier, Summer & Co., J. S. Hachey.

(b) None of them had the privilege of delivering fir or poplar ties. In consequence of the large number which F. Curran, contracted to furnish, the railway agreed not to order spruce ties from others till his contract was completed.

(c) See answer to 'b.'

8. (a) They were paid for by cheque.

(b) All were paid for by cheque.

(c) It is the usual custom to pay for such supplies by cheque upon voucher, and the custom was not departed from.

9. (a) In consequence of the large number of ties of different kinds of wood which he contracted to supply, the railway agreed not to order spruce ties from others till his contract for spruce ties was completed.

(b) All persons tendering for ties had the same privilege as F. Curran, with the exception named in No. 9 'a.'

10. The number of ties on hand, June 30, 1901, was 800,424. From July 1, 1901, to February 28, 1902, 461,734 ties have been used.

11. The number of spruce ties purchased in the autumn of 1900, and winter of 1901, was 289,805. Fir and poplar were not ordered.

12. Mr. T. C. Burpee, C.E., made a report on March 7, 1901, and Mr. W. B. MacKenzie, C.E., made a report on the 4th of April, 1901.

13. Yes, and it has been under investigation, but the investigation is not completed.

14. Yes, the investigation was suspended in November, on account of the lateness of the season. The inspection was made by W. H. Williams and C. E. Morton.

15. This was made in September, October and November. It was made by W. H. Williams and C. E. Morton. The work was suspended on account of the lateness of the season.

16. When the reinspection is completed, such steps will be taken if the facts ascertained show them to be necessary.

17. No report has been received from any track foreman between Newcastle and Moncton, that railway ties or sleepers delivered to him for use on the Intercolonial Railway were undersize or otherwise unsuitable, and the chief engineer has not received any specimen thereof for inspection.

18. The usual practice of the department with respect to the paying for ties or sleepers is to pay by cheque upon voucher and this practice was not departed from during the autumn of 1900, or the winter of 1901.

TAY CANAL—PAYMENTS TO EMPLOYEES AND COLLECTIONS.

Mr. LEGRIS asked :

1. What amount was expended in paying the employees of the Tay Canal during the years 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1901, respectively ?

2. What amount was collected by the government on that canal during the said years ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The amount paid to employees on the Tay canal during the years 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1901, was as follows :

1896	$2,065 50
1897	990 00
1898	1,262 25
1899	1,301 62
1901	1,322 00

2. The amount of tolls collected on the Tay canal during the said years is as follows :

1896	$122 35
1897	108 82
1898	77 33
1899	121 07
1901	76 33

Hon. Mr. BLAIR.

POSTMASTER AT JOLIETTE, QUE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Has the government dismissed, or is it about to dismiss John James Sheppard from his position of postmaster of Joliette ?

2. If so, for what cause, and at whose request ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Wm. Mulock). At the Dominion elections of 1896, the postmaster at Joliette took an active part in support of one of the candidates. It was hoped that he would discontinue such action, and notice was not taken of it. But, at the elections of 1900, he again took an active part on behalf of one of the candidates. He also, during the elections of 1900, illegally detained in his office letters addressed to leading Liberals, such letters having to do with the work of organization, announcement of meetings, &c. In this way he was able to interfere with the calling of meetings for the discussion of public questions. Being engaged in the practice of medicine, he neglected the duties of the office, leaving its management to young girls wholly incompetent for the work. For these reasons he was removed from office. The department has fully satisfied itself as to the correctness of these charges and assumes full responsibility for the action taken.

I.C.R.—MR. HORNE'S ENGAGEMENT.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART asked :

1. What are the terms of Mr. R. T. Horne's engagement as manager's assistant on the Intercolonial Railway, and what salary is he now in receipt of ?

2. Has he been absent from his office in Moncton for some weeks ? If so, who is performing his duties ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). Mr E. T. Horne's engagement is a temporary one. He is engaged as an expert having special knowledge and experience in the laying out and arranging of station terminals and yards. His salary is $300 a month. He has been absent four weeks, and is now on his way to Moncton. His duties have been performed by the manager during his absence.

CHAMBLY CANAL—CONDITION OF UPPER PORTION.

Mr. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville) asked :

1. Has the government been informed that that upper portion of the Chambly Canal, granted by letters patent to the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada on the condition of a wharf being there maintained, is, to-day, nothing more than a foul mud-hole where even the shadow of a wharf is not to be seen ?

2. Is it the government's intention to recall those letters patent, as it has reserved to itself the right to do ?

3. Is it the government's intention to prevent individuals from making use of that locality as a refuse depository ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Bair) :

1. The government has received complaints that the property owned by the Grand Trunk Railway at the head of the Chambly canal is not being properly maintained according to the requirements of the grant from the Quebec government.

2. The letters patent were granted by the Quebec government, who it is assumed would have the right to take action thereunder.

3. The government will take action, when necessary, to prevent a refuse deposit being made to interfere with the navigation of the Chambly canal.

CENSUS—PAYMENTS FOR HORSE OR LIVERY HIRE.

Mr. BRODER asked :

What amount has been paid for horse or livery hire on account of the census of 1891 and 1901, respectively ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). I must ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Broder) to make a motion for a return, as this information will involve the giving of a good many figures.

YUKON TERRITORY—REPRESENTATION IN PARLIAMENT.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax) asked :

1. Is it the intention of the government to introduce a Bill during the present session providing for representation of the Yukon territory in Parliament ?

2. If not, when will such legislation be introduced ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Hon. Clifford Sifton). I expect to introduce a Bill dealing with a number of matters in connection with the Yukon territory this session, and, in all probability, the question of representation of the territory in the House of Commons will be dealt with in that Bill. The matter, at the present time, is under consideration.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CONDUCT OF CANADIAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES (North Victoria). Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay before the House an item reflecting upon Canadians in service in South Africa. I find it in the London 'Daily News' of Tuesday, March 18, 1902. It speaks of an engagement fought in 1900, and refers to the conduct of the Canadians in the battle. The correspondent states :

What struck me as a pretty horrible incident was that some Canadians who were too far off to join in the fight afterwards came in and stripped off the boots and socks of the dead Boers—a thing I should not like to do even in the case of a living Boer—and pulled out their toe-nails to carry away as mementoes.

I need not say that this item is entirely untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes, Victoria), wishes to conclude with a motion ?

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I am ready to do so, yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that it would be better to wait until the debate is reached.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) moved the adjournment of the debate yesterday, he is first entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR (South Leeds). I informed you last night, Mr. Speaker, that it was not my intention to occupy any time in discussing the motion or the amendment now before the House. But the hon. member who was to reply to the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Maclaren) is not in his place, and I feel it my duty to make a few observations in reply to him. I would have done so last night, but the Minister of Finance was kind enough to say that owing to an arrangement having been made to take a vote on Tuesday night he would consent to an adjournment, and let me make my observations to-day. The hon. member for Huntingdon, in his speech, made use of the following language :

I am in principle a free trader, and that is the basis of my support of the fiscal policy of the present government. That party and that policy which come nearest to my views are the party and the policy that I support.

Further on he says :

One thing I cannot understand is how the increase of duty is going to cheapen articles to those who have to purchase. That has always troubled me. I was talking the other day to a manufacturer down at the Russel House, and I put him this question: 'What about us who have to purchase ?' He said, 'The increase in duty does not necessarily increase the price of the article.' Well, we are all human, we like to get all we can for what we have to sell and buy as cheaply as possible. And I have not that confidence of the philanthropy, of the manufacturers of this country to believe that they are going to give us goods any cheaper than they can afford to, and whatever duty is put on they will add to the price of their goods.

Further on he says :

I notice that in the amendment the hon. gentlemen propose to protect everything. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) came very near the mark when he told us the other day that there was no way in which to protect the farmer. The only way I know of in which to protect the farmer is to make this a cheap country to live in.

Then he concluded his remarks by sounding a note of warning to the Prime Minister and the government, saying :

I say here, that so far as the policy of the present government is concerned it does not come near enough to free trade for me ; but it comes a great deal nearer to it than the policy proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, and therefore I am prepared to support the government in their policy as it is, and to hope for better things. However, I will speak a word of warning. If there is any revision of the tariff it must be down and not up, or otherwise the government will find that there are a great many people on this side of the House who are not at all satisfied, and who will speak their minds out if they have occasion to, notwithstanding that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and others seem to veer around in the direction of protection.

These are a few of the statements made by the hon. member for Huntingdon. He declared first that he was a free trader, yet supporting a protectionist government, and he asked the question of a manufacturer whether protection does not increase the cost. The manufacturer answered him, in my opinion, fairly and honestly, and I will put the question reversed to the hon. member for Huntingdon : Does the duty given to protect the industries of the farmers of this country and to the cost of living of the workingmen and consumers ? If an affirmative answer is correct in respect to the manufacturer, it must also be correct in respect to the farmers of this country. If the argument is good in the one case it must be good in the other. But he says we cannot protect the farmers. Let me ask my hon. friend from Huntingdon, who says he represents one of the largest agriculturist constituencies in the Dominion, if the farmer is not fairly protected by this tariff that is in existence to-day, that was brought into existence by the Conservative government, and that this government dare not interfere with in respect to one of the articles named in that tariff designed to protect the farmer. Let me mention some of the articles which bear a duty in order to protect the farmers of this country, and I would like to know if he would have these duties renewed :

Animals, living, not elsewhere specified, 20 per cent ; live hogs, 1½c. per pound ; apples, 40c. a barrel ; apples, dried, 25 per cent ; apple trees, cherry trees, all kinds of fruit trees, 3c. each ; bacon and ham, 2c. per pound ; barley, 30 per cent ; beans, 15c. per bushel ; beef, salted in barrels, 2c. per pound; blackberries, raspberries, gooseberries, strawberries, cherries and currants, 2c. per pound, the weight of box or basket to be included for duty ; butter, 4c. per pound ; buckwheat, 10c. a bushel ; buckwheat meal or flour, 1¼c. per pound ; oleomargarine, butterine or other substitutes for butter are prohibited.

I would like to ask my hon. friend if he would have that prohibition removed. Some years ago, I think in 1886, I had the honour of introducing into this House a Bill to prohibit the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine as a substitute for butter. I urged that a duty of 10 cents per pound, which would actually amount to prohibition, be placed on the oleomargarine manufactured in Canada or imported. It was ruining the dairying industry of the country, as I proved by statistics. The proposition was opposed by some hon. gentlemen of the opposition. One said he had purchased oleomargarine in the United States, brought it into this country, and fed it to his lumbermen in camp. Another hon. gentleman of standing in the House then, and of standing in the House to-day, made a speech from which I propose to quote a few words. During my speech I had read from the report of Commissioner Coleman of the United States Agricultural Department, in which he says :

The manufacture of injurious compounds of fat, which are being shipped as genuine butter, threatens the legitimate dairy interests of America.

Further on in my speech I announced what the government proposed doing. I said :

I asked, at the same time, that an excise and customs duty of 10 cents per pound be placed on all oleomargarine, either imported or manufactured in the country ; and I am glad to say that the government, true to its protective policy—the national policy—came down with a resolution placing a customs duty of 10 cents and an excise duty of 8 cents per pound on all these substitutes.

The government accepted the proposition I made, and came down with a specific and an excise duty on oleomargarine, either manufactured or imported. Had that been inforced it would practically amount to prohibition. But, as the matter was discussed further, the present Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) rose in his place and suggested to the then Minister of Customs (Sir Mackenzie Bowell), that in place of putting on an import and excise duty, it was better to prohibit the article, and the then Minister of Customs accepted the proposition and placed the article on the prohibited list. The hon. Minister of Customs had the audacity to state to the people that he was the party who was instrumental in having the importation of that article prohibited. But, we have one hon. gentleman high in the counsels of the party then in opposition and high in the counsels of the cabinet of to-day, and here is the speech that he made :

But, Mr. Speaker, anxious as I am to see the agricultural interests, and especially the dairy interest of the country carefully guarded—and I say this as representing one of the greatest dairy counties in this Dominion, the county, according to the last census, which made the second greatest amount of butter of any county in the Dominion—still I do not wish to see the dairy interest guarded at the expense of any other interest in the Dominion. If any person chooses to put upon the market an article which is not hurtful in itself, and which is properly stamped and shown to be such an article, if it does compete with the producers of butter it will be merely an extra stimulus to them to make a better article with which this spurious article cannot compete. But I do not believe it would be right or wise for this parliament absolutely to prevent all the people in this country from producing an article which in itself is not hurtful, and which, at the same time, would be stamped so as to show its true nature. I am quite at one with any gentleman in this House who wishes to see that the butterine or oleomargarine are not sold as butter, and do not take the place of butter, because that would be injurious, not only to the dairy interests of the country, but also to the consumers who might be led into buying the spurious article under the impression that it was the genuine article they wanted. But if these articles are stamped so that the public know what they are buying, and if the oleomargarine or the butterine are composed of materials which are not injurious to the health of the consumer, I do not see why the production of these articles should be forbidden in this country.

This hon. gentleman got up and advocated the manufacture and importation into Canada of an article which then had practically ruined the dairying industry of the United States. Whom do you think that gentleman was? It was the present hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) who made that speech in this House advocating the manufacture of a substitute for butter which, if it had gone into the tariff then as an article to be imported, would have ruined the dairying interests of this country. I would like to ask the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Maclaren) if he would like to have that prohibition wiped out and permit the importation of oleomargarine and butterine? Then, we have the following duties on agricultural products:

Candles, tallow	25 per cent.
Cheese	3 cts. per lb.
Cider	5 and 10 cts. per gall.
Cornmeal	25 cts. per brl.
Cracked corn and wheat	25 per cent.
Cranberries, plums and quinces	25 "
Cucumbers	25 "
Cut flowers	20 "
Dried flowers	20 "
Dried vegetables	25 "
Eggs	3 cts. per doz.
Fish, fresh and smoked	½ to 1 ct. per lb.
Flour of corn	1½ cts. per lb.
" rye	50 cts. per brl.
" wheat	60 "
Fowls, other than pure bred, pigeons	20 per cent.
Fruits, dried	25 "
Green grapes	2 cts. per lb.
Hay	$2 per ton.
Honey	3 cts. per lb.
Hops	6 "
Jams, jellies and preserves	3½ "
Lard	2 "
Maple sugar	20 per cent.
Meats, fresh, n.e.s	3 cts. per lb.
Meats in barrels, n.e.s	2 "
Mutton and lamb, fresh	35 per cent.
Oats	10 cts. per bush.
Oat flour	20 per cent.
Oatmeal	20 "
Potatoes	15 cts. per bush.
Pork in barrels	2 cts. per lb.
Rye	10 cts. per bush.
Tobacco, raw leaf	10 cts. per lb.
Tomatoes	20 cts. per bush.
Vegetables, n.o.p	25 per cent.
Wool, such as grown in Canada	3 cts. per lb.

Would the hon. member for Huntingdon who is a free trader like to put the farmers of this country into the position that the Americans could bring into this country all of their surplus goods such as those which I have named without any duty being collected upon them? Would he like to have no protection against the introduction of these articles and allow the American farmers to bring these articles into this country when the farmers of Canada would not be allowed to send one of these articles to the United States without paying nearly double the duties which we impose against them. Would the farmers say that they would like to have free trade in these articles and allow the workingmen of Canada to purchase supplies of this kind across the line and bring them in free of duty? Take the one item of pork, for instance; some years ago, I think previous to the time I brought in the Bill for regulating the importation into or the manufacture in this country of oleomargarine, I brought to the attention of the government the fact that the year preceding we had bought from the United States $13,000,000 worth of pork and pork products and beef and beef products with which to feed the people of Canada. I said to the government: You place 3 cents a pound on pork and beef and the farmers of this country will soon grow pork and beef enough to feed the people and have a large quantity left over to export. I said to the government: Last year we bought, according to the trade and navigation returns, $12,000,000 or $13,000,000 worth of beef and pork from the people of the United States with which to feed the people of Canada. While we have sent our money over there to get that $13,000,000 worth of goods, we can put it in barrels, ship it out of the country again and get our money back. But, we did not do that. We fed it to the people of Canada and when it was eaten the Americans had our money and we had nothing left except the bone and muscle which it produced, whereas, if this meat had been produced by the farmers of this country we would have had the bone and muscle and the money besides.

The Conservative government saw the force of my argument and they put a duty of 2 cents a pound on pork and pork products and on beef and beef products. And what is the result ? We are growing enough to feed the people of this country and we are sending millions of dollars worth away to feed the people across the sea. Would the hon. member for Huntingdon be willing to allow the corn and rattlesnake fed pork of the United States to come in here and compete with the pea, oat and rye fed pork we produce in this country which is commanding the best price in the market ? I am not surprised that he gave a note of warning to the Prime Minister (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). We have had a dozen hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House giving notes of warning to the government, saying that they are free traders, and telling the government that if they advance the tariff they will withdraw their support. How can the farmers, the workingmen and the manufacturers of Canada expect any more protection from this government when hon. gentlemen behind them are standing up here and there and warning the government to make no change in the tariff in an upward direction, threatening them that if they do they will withdraw their support ? We have not heard from the ministers yet on this question, excepting from the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) in presenting his budget and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright). Why have the ministers of the government not sprung to their feet to defend the position they have taken ? They are allowing the members behind them to get up and tell their experience and they are ascertaining how many of them would vote against them in case they attempted to give any increased protection to the industries of this country. The last note of warning that we heard was from the hon. member for Huntingdon. He said : Do not touch the tariff. If you do, I will vote against you. But the ministers of this government care more for their seats in office than for their words or for any help they can give to the farmers, the workingmen, or the manufacturers of Canada. I have just stated that these hon. gentlemen care more for their seats in office than for the solemn promises they gave to the people of this country.

Mr. BENNETT. And the salary ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Oh, the salary ! That is only a small item to some of them. I wonder that there is an hon. gentleman sitting on the treasury benches to-day who can go to sleep and sleep soundly. I do not think it is possible. These hon. gentlemen must have the nightmare of broken promises to disturb their slumber. We can all remember that in 1896 the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. Minister of Customs and the right hon. Prime Minister sang one tune to the farmers, and I could read a record as long as my arm of the promises they made to the people. They have not redeemed one of them. The Prime Minister himself went to the temperance people. The Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) was the temperance apostle of the party. The Prime Minister said : You put me in and you can depend on that hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Fisher). You put me in and I will submit a plebiscite to the people ; if the people carry that plebiscite I will give effect to the will of the people. He submitted the question to the people. Did he carry it ? He directed two or three of his ministers to go into the province of Quebec and say to the people : If the plebiscite is carried it is going to put Sir Wilfrid in a hole. Vote against it. If you carry the plebiscite it means $2 a head for every man, woman and child. The average family in Quebec is from fifteen to twenty and it means to the poor farmer down there who is a temperance man a direct tax of $30 or $40 in most cases to make up the deficiency of revenue that will be lost by the introduction of a prohibitory law. What was the result ? Quebec went nearly solid against the plebiscite, and upon the advice of the Prime Minister and three other ministers who stumped that province.

Mr. CLARKE. Satellites.

Mr. TAYLOR. No; they were cabinet ministers. But notwithstanding their efforts, the plebiscite carried by a substantial majority, and did the Prime Minister give effect to the will of the people ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. TAYLOR. Certainly not. Ask the Rev. Mr. Huxtable, who was chairman of the delegation that waited on him at Carleton Place, and who said : I never gave a Conservative vote in my life, but I will never vote for the Liberals again until they redeem their pledge. That is one of the nightmares that haunts the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher), who said that if the express will of the people were not carried out he would leave the cabinet. Well, the Minister of Agriculture has not left the cabinet yet. He thinks more of his salary than he does of his word. Then, the Prime Minister told the people in London, Ont., that he would get a preference in England for the produce of the farmers of Canada, and he pointed out to the farmers what a nice thing it would be for them to be able to sell their oats, and their wheat, and their meat, and their hay, on the English market at an advantage over the products of the United States. The Prime Minister went to England, and did he ask for a preference ? On the contrary, he said in England : We will give you a preference in our markets and we will not take anything in return. That is the way he redeemed that pledge. Again the Prime Minister told the people that if they put him in power he would get them reciprocity with the United States, and the people along the frontier, particularly around my place, took Sir Wilfrid Laurier at his word and they brought their produce over to the United States when the Liberals got into power, but they had their goods seized because they forgot to enter them at the custom-house. The right hon. gentleman sent a commission to Washington. There is only one of the commissioners present in the House to-day, I am sorry to see. They went for a jaunt to Washington in their private cars, well padded and well lined, and they spent the money of the people of Canada, but they got no reciprocity.

There was a troublesome question before the people of Canada known as the Manitoba school question, and the Prime Minister said : I will settle that question if you put me in power; I will send a commission to Manitoba headed by Sir Oliver Mowat to ascertain the facts, and we will settle the question. Did he send Sir Oliver Mowat to Manitoba ? Not at all. He sent up his handy man who sits up behind him, the man who says elections are not carried by prayers, the man who thinks that every man in this country has his price; he sent him up to Manitoba in a special car to have a good time. This gentleman interviewed Mr. Greenway, and on the authority of a gentleman who is satisfied that the facts I will relate are true, this is what occurred. Mr. Greenway said : There are three men here, namely, Mr. Sifton, Mr. Martin and Mr. Prendergast, who will have to be removed before I can settle the school question. An arrangement was made as a basis of settlement which included the provision that if these three men were satisfied and gotten out of the way, a certain amendment to the school law would be proposed if the government at Ottawa would give to Mr. Greenway a slice out of the school land funds to help his depleted treasury. Remember that the federal government was the trustee of these funds for the benefit of the schools of Manitoba for all time to come. However, the bargain was made and legislation was introduced here to give Mr. Greenway the money belonging to that sacred trust fund, and the Bill passed through this House, but thank God we had a Senate that defeated it. Now, that the Liberals have control of the Senate, I expect that when the proper time comes there will be a Bill passed to give Mr. Greenway the $300,000. Then Mr. Sifton had to be settled with, and Mr. Tarte said to him : You withdraw your opposition to the settlement of the Manitoba school question ; come to Ottawa and join the government as Minister of the Interior ; you will have control of all the lands of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and the gold lands of the Yukon. Mr. Sifton, who is a pretty shrewd fellow when there is anything affecting himself up, replied : I will go down provided I have control over the department without being subject to Council. The Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) yielded, and Mr. Sifton came down and was made Minister of the Interior, and the Prime Minister announced to the people of Canada that he gave Mr. Sifton absolute control of his department. The proof of that exists, because Mr. Sifton was not long in office until he gave the gold lands of that country to his friends to build a few miles of tramway. Thank God we had a Senate to stop that. I expect to see this year a Bill go through the Senate to recoup the gentlemen who got the contract for that work. Then there was Mr. Martin left. The Minister of Public Works could not handle Mr. Martin alone, and so he had a consultation with the Canadian Pacific Railway people about it. He went to the Canadian Pacific Railway people and said : We want Martin out of the way; you hire him to be your solicitor in British Columbia for a few years; give him a large salary of $8,000 or $10,000 a year, and we will recoup you by increasing the subsidies which the Conservative government agreed to give for the building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway sent Mr. Martin to British Columbia as their solicitor with a large salary, and this government carried out the corrupt bargain and recouped the Canadian Pacific Railway by increasing the subsidies to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. Then they went to Mr. Prendergast and said : You are working here for $400 or $500 a year as a common member of parliament, fighting the battles of your people, why not take the chief justiceship with a large salary, and withdraw your opposition and we will get the school question settled. Mr. Prendergast agreed and they appointed him chief justice of Manitoba at a big salary, and then Mr. Greenway amended the School Act. The Prime Minister now tells us he has settled the Manitoba school question. It is true that he resorted to the corrupt means I have referred to, but ask His Grace Archbishop Langevin, and he will tell you that the Manitoba school question is not settled, and that it is a burning issue to-day in Manitoba.

He promised to abolish private cars. I see in the paper the other day that they had to build a new siding at the station to accommodate the private cars of the ministers. Each one has a private car. The Prime Minister said that if he were elected, he would ride with the common people in their common cars. I want to see the Prime Minister ride in a special car, but I think one special car should do for this government, as one special car did for the government of the late lamented Sir John A. Macdonald. He promised to abolish protection. Did he do it? He promised to remove the duty on coal oil. He lowered the duty a cent a gallon, and then the wells were sold out to the Standard Oil Company; and to quiet the late Judge Lister on this subject, they took him out of this House and put him on the bench, and then gave the legislation which they had bargained for to the Standard Oil Company, and that great monopoly has now control of this country.

Mr. HUGHES. Is coal oil cheaper?

Mr. TAYLOR. The government is paying 32 cents a gallon for it, besides $1.25 for the barrels. He promised the people of the North-west that he would remove the duty on agricultural implements. Did he do it? Ask the representatives of the North-west. But they are not going to vote against the government. They are getting a share of the plunder, and they will put up with it. He promised the workingmen of British Columbia that he would stop the importation of Chinese into this country. Has he done it? We see them in rebellion on that question, asking the Prime Minister to carry out the pledge he made to them. He promised that he would reform the Senate. Has he done that? Ask Mr. H. H. Cook or read the evidence which he gave. When they went selling seats in the Senate, that was a reformation. I suppose they will thank Providence that the Senate has been reformed because a number of Conservative members have died, and they have appointed some of their partisans for a price to fill their places. They promised to reduce the debt. The Prime Minister said 'Put me in, and I will surround myself with a cabinet of business men.' Where are the business men in this cabinet to-day? We have a cabinet of lawyers, with one business man in it—the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson), who takes care that he has good protection on biscuits and everything that comes out of his factories. I like to see it, because it gives the farmers better protection on their flour. The Prime Minister promised that he would reduce the national debt. Has he done it? No. Instead of that, he has increased it in about six years by some $12,000,000. He promised to reduce the taxation. Has he reduced it any? The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) stated the other night that the government had reduced the cost of goods to the people 10 per cent, and the Minister of Customs gave the people to understand that their goods were now costing 10 per cent less than they had cost under the old tariff. The hon. member for Guysborough said that the average duty had been reduced from 20 per cent to 18 per cent, or a reduction in the cost of goods of 10 per cent. How does that affect the farmers of this country? Take a farmer who lives in the part of the country that I do, where he can throw a stone into the United States. He goes over and buys a dollar's worth of goods, and brings them home. Under the old tariff he would pay 20 per cent duty, so that that dollar's worth would cost him $1.20. To-day he goes and buys a dollar's worth of goods and brings them home, and pays 18 cents duty on them, so that the dollar's worth cost him $1.18. Therefore he pays two cents less on the transaction; and this the hon. member for Guysborough says is a reduction of 10 per cent to the people on their purchases. The Prime Minister said: 'Put me in, and I will surround myself with a cabinet of business men, who will run the country on business principles, and we will save two millions, three millions, four millions'; and Mr. Justice Mills said, 'Yes, we can save five millions of dollars a year.'

Mr. BENNETT. Where is he now?

Mr. TAYLOR. He is transplanted to the bench. He was first translated to the Senate, and from there he was elevated to the bench. How has the government carried out that promise? The Conservative government ran the country, and ran it better, and made more permanent improvements, on $36,000,000 or $37,000,000 a year than these people are doing on $47,845,000, which is the figure of their main estimates for this year. They have had prosperous times and large revenues; and the people of this country expected that the Prime Minister and his cabinet, being business men, would do what any practical business man would do in times of prosperity, when more money was coming in than he required to run his business. They expected that the government would use the surplus to reduce the national debt. Have they done it? No; they have simply spent all they got, and in six years they have mortgaged the country to the extent of $12,000,000 more. Take a practical farmer who has a mortgage of $10,000 on his farm. He prospers, and his farm yields good returns. Would he say to his family, 'We will spend it all, and if at the end of the year it is not quite enough to pay running expenses, we will put another mortgage of $500 on the farm.' Would that farmer be a prudent business man? That is just what this government have done; they have spent all their revenue and mortgaged this country in the last six years to the extent of $12,000,000 more. I will just give one illustration to show the extravagant manner in which they are transacting the public business—and this applies more particularly to the practical, honest farmer who is in this cabinet, in the person of the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher), though the government as a whole is responsible. The late Conservative government, who were corrupt and everything that was bad, judging by statements of the members of the present government when they sat on this side of the House, took the census for three terms—in 1871, in 1881 and in 1891. The census of 1871 cost $511,000, that of 1881 cost $552,000, and that of 1891 cost $549,000, or an average of $540,000. Now, what little bill has this practical business man, the Minister of Agriculture, contracted? A question was put to him on the 3rd of March: How much has been expended on the census up to date? And the answer was $948,000 up to the 3rd of March. But there is about two years work yet to be done. I have a question yet on the paper asking how much has been expended up to date, and how much the minister anticipates it will take to complete the work. I am prepared to say, that added to that $948,000 it will take another sum of $250,000 to complete the census. That makes an increase in 1901 over 1891 of $649,000. Is that the way a business government should conduct the business of the country? Take my own town. By the census of 1891, it had a population of 3,869. The town has been growing considerably since, and yet by the present census that number is reduced to 3,526. Now, our municipal assessor was at work at the same time that the census enumerators were making their count, and took down the heads of families and the number of each family. I have here a note from the Town Clerk's office with regard to that enumeration.

Gananoque, Oct. 17, 1901.

Dear Sir,—The assessment roll for the town of Gananaoque for the year 1901 shows a population of 3,718. I regret that I cannot give the other particulars asked for as they are not on the roll.

Yours, &c.,

S. McCAMMON.

Thus the municipal assessor, who was at work at the same time as the Dominion census enumerators, gives the town 192 more persons than do the enumerators of this government. I got the assessors returns from every municipality in my county, and these show an increase of over 1,000 in population as compared with a reduction of the 1,000 in the census returns. That is a fair sample of how the censuses were taken in Ontario at least. And for this imperfect census we are paying $650,000 more than was paid by the late Conservative government for the census taken by it in 1871, 1881 or 1891. The Minister of Trade and Commerce pretends to be disappointed, but he must know that so far as Ontario is concerned the figures are altogether wrong. He has frequently expressed his confidence in the government at Toronto, and that government compiles a census every year from the municipal returns, and he has always argued by that the censuses compiled by the bureau of statistics at Toronto were correct, yet see the difference between them and the figures given by the enumerators of this government.

I have here the last estimates which the late Conservative government laid before the House in 1895-6 and the main estimates of the present government now before the House. I find that there are increases in the expenditure of every department under the present government as compared with 1895-6. In that year, the late government had a public debt, including sinking fund, of $12,732,706.14, which has risen under the present administration to $13,967,312.65, or an increase of $1,234,606.51.

In charges of management the late government asked for an expenditure of $164,180 in 1895-6, whereas the present government wants $181,743 or $7,000 of an increase.

In civil government the late administration spent in 1895-6 $1,449,000 against $1,575,000 asked for by this government, or an increase of $125,800.

Administration of Justice cost us in 1895-6 $769,800. This year, according to the main estimates, it is costing us $976,000 or an increase of $206,000.

On penitentaries the expenditure of $467,000 in 1895-6 has been increased to $491,000 or an increase of $24,000.

On legislation we are spending $931,000 as against $853,000 in 1895-6, showing an increase of $78,000 under the present administration.

Then take arts, agriculture and statistics, at the head of which department is this great business man, the Minister of Agriculture, the expenditure to-day is $502,000 as against $208,000 by the late government in 1895-6, or an increase of $294,000.

On quarantine the late government expended $70,000, and we are now asked for $193,000, an increase of $123,000.

Immigration cost us in 1895-6 $130,000, to-day it is costing us $445,000, or an increase of $315,000.

In pensions there is a decrease of $1,021. Then take superannuation. The expenditure on that branch has increased from $273,000 under the late government to $328,000, or an increase of $55,000, caused by superannuations which have taken place since this administration has taken office despite their pledge to the people that they would abolish the superannuation system. I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to explain a flagrant abuse in his own city of the superannuation system. There we had a postmaster, competent and efficient, and what did this government do? They wrote out an order-in-council which they got His Excellency the Governor General to sign, believing no doubt it was true, superannuating the former postmaster because he was too old, and to-day that gentleman is drawing a big pension for doing nothing although he is a much abler man that the one put in his place. The late incumbent at Kingston was 68 years of age when superannuated by these gentlemen, and they appointed in his place Mr. Gunn, a defeated candidate, who was seventy years of age when they appointed him. And these are the people who promised to abolish the abuse of superannuation. You cannot walk down the streets of this city without stumbling over young men in the prime of life, who were superannuated by these gentlemen to make positions for their party heelers.

The militia, under the late government, cost $1,098,000 and to-day it costs $1,773,000, being an increase of $674,000.

Railways and canals chargeable to income cost $96,000 in 1895-6, and to-day is costing $344,000, an increase of $248,000.

Public works chargeable to income cost $1,300,000 in 1895-6 against $3,200,000 this year, or an increase of $1,957,000.

The expenditure of mail subsidies has jumped from $383,000 to $724,000, or an increase of $340,000, and yet we have no fast line.

Ocean and river service has increased from $166,000 to $243,000, or $76,000 increase.

The expenditure on ocean and river service has risen from $166,000 to $243,000, showing an increase of $183,000.

Scientific institutions has increased from $85,000 to $110,000, or $25,000.

The item of marine hospitals shows an increase of $2,000.

The item of steamboat inspection shows an increase of $4,000.

Our fisheries cost us $417,000 in 1895-6 and to-day the expenditure on that item is $467,000—an increase of $49,000.

Superintendence of insurance cost us $11,200 in 1895-6 and is now costing us $15,500, being an increase of $4,300.

Subsidies to provinces have increased from $4,236,000 to $4,366,000. That increase is the carrying out of the promise of these gentlemen that if they were put in they would give the provinces larger subsidies, but Ontario has not benefited in that respect.

The geological survey costs us $19,000 more than it did in 1895-6.

The expenditure on Indians has jumped from $894,000 in 1895-6 to $1,079,000 this year, being an increase of $184,000. The late Sir John Macdonald assured us that these Indians were gradually becoming self-sustaining and that the charge for taking care of them would grow gradually less, and so it did under the late Conservative administration. But although we have no more Indians than we had then and no more treaties, we find the Indian Department asking this year for $184,000 more than did the late Conservative government for that purpose.

Then take the item of miscellaneous—comprising the little items of envelopes, sealing wax, etc. Under the late Conservative government the expenditure was $142,000. but that has now risen to $327,000, an increase of $184,000. No doubt the travelling expense of the ministers is comprised in this item for we do not see any trace of them anywhere else.

In the Department of Customs the expenditure has increased from $874,000 to $1,892,000, or the business man who is now at the head of that department is now spending $318,000 more than his predecessors.

Culling timber under the late government cost $2,950, but to-day it is costing $18,000, an increase of $15,400, and there is no timber to cull.

The item of weights and measures cost us in 1895-6 $99,000 and to-day it is costing us $110,000, or an increase of $12,000.

The inspection of weights and measures cost us $99,800 in 1895-6, and it now costs us $112,050, or an increase of $47,000.

Railways and canals collecting revenue, the late government did this work for $4,061,000, but to-day it is costing $6,666,000, or an increase of $2,600,000.

Public works cost us in 1895-6 $174,600 and that expenditure is to-day increased to $316,400, or an increase of $141,800.

I now come to the item of post offices which the Postmaster General promised us would be self-sustaining and revenue producing. What do we find ? The late government asked about $3,500,000, and this government asked $4,000,000, an increase of $528,000 over what was asked by the Conservative government to do the post office business of this country.

And for the Department of Trade and Commerce, which my hon. friend said ought to be abolished because it was not needed, the late government asked $19,100, and in his estimate of this year the hon. gentleman asks $27,100—an increase of $8,000 for this department, over which he presides, and which he said was useless.

In Dominion lands the estimate of the late Conservative government was $117,022, against $157,532 this year, an increase of $40,000.

This makes a total of $36,800,000 asked by the Conservative government, and this year we are asked $47,800,000, an increase of $11,000,000. This is for current expenditure.

Now we come to capital account. For reduction of debt, Railways and Canals, Public Works, and Dominion Lands, the late Conservative government asked, in 1895-6, $4,408,000, and this government asks, $5,516,000, an increase of $1,107,000.

The grand total on account of consolidated revenue and capital is $41,243,000 under the late Conservative government, and $53,361,000 under this government, or an increase of $12,118,000. For the sake of convenience, and in order that the exact figures may be given, I give the comparison in full :

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). My attention was drawn away for a moment. I desire to follow the hon. gentleman's argument and would like to ask a question. The comparison he is making, as I understand, is between estimates and not between actual expenditures.

Mr. TAYLOR. Not between expenditures, but between the main estimates brought down by the Conservative government in 1895-6, and the main estimates that are now before us. When the supplementary estimates come down—those supplementaries which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance intimated would be so very large—I shall be ready to analyse them and make a comparison with the supplementaries under the Conservative government. I expect to see, in these coming supplementary estimates, attempts made to cover up some of the jobs—for instance, the grant to the Yukon Railway, and also the money granted to settle the Manitoba school question with Greenway, and, no doubt, many others. We can deal with these supplementary estimates when we see them, but, in the meantime, I am making a comparison on the basis of the main estimates.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) a comparative statement of the actual expenditure ?

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. and respected friend the leader of the opposition gave a comparison of the actual expenditure. And, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) will read the speech of my leader on this point, he will find that his estimate, his comparison on the basis of expenditure and mine on the basis of the main estimates, come to practically the same thing.

Some hon. gentlemen on the other side have said that the speakers on this side have not said much about the amendment. I am strongly in favour of that amendment, and so is every member on this side. But hon. gentlemen opposite are at sixes and sevens as to the policy they favour. Here we stand as one man declaring in favour of increased and adequate protection to the manufacturing, agriculture, fishing, mining and other interests of this country. I think I speak for the party——

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS. Did I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) to say 'increased' protection ? It is not so in the amendment, but 'adequate' protection.

Mr. TAYLOR. That means just what it says. For instance, the duty on biscuits is 35 per cent. But if, when we get into power, my hon. friend (Mr. Paterson) comes before us and satisfies us that 35 per cent does not afford adequate protection, we will gladly increase it to 40 per cent. We want protection that will be adequate to keep in this country the boys and girls we grow here, protection that will be adequate to afford them opportunities for labour in producing every article required and not have those articles brought in from Germany as hon. gentlemen opposite are doing with their preferential tariff. We are prepared, as the resolution says, to agree to a fair preferential tariff between Great Britain and her colonies. But we do not want such preference as we have to-day which allows Germany to send her manufactures to England, have them wrapped and parcelled there, and then sent out to Canada under a preference on the plea that 25 per cent of the labour used in producing them is English labour. The hon. Minister of Customs knows that in this way large quantities of German goods come into Canada to compete with the honest labour of Canada. Our leader and every man on this side, so far as I have heard the expression of their views, is opposed to any such one-sided preferential tariff as this. We are prepared to deal fairly by Great Britain and her colonies, and to give them a preference if that preference will not injure our Canadian labour. We say that we are building up the British Empire by building up Canada, and we will not allow a lot of pauper labour or otherwise in London or in any other part of the empire to come in here and compete with honest Canadian labour. Therefore, we say that we will give adequate protection to Canadian industries. Our party is a unit on this policy, and the people of the country will be a unit in favour of it when we appeal to them.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES (North Victoria). Mr. Speaker, in the London, England, 'Daily News,' of March 18th, 1902, I notice the following paragraph, part of a long article dealing with incidents of the war in South Africa in the year 1900 :

> What struck me as a pretty horrible incident was that some Canadians who were too far off to join in the fight afterwards came in and stripped off the boots and socks of the dead Boers—a thing I should not like to do even in the case of a living Boer—and pulled out their toe-nails to carry away as mementoes.

That, Sir, refers to the only Canadian force that was there at that time, 'E' Battery, Royal Canadian Field Artillery. I may say in explanation that one of the young English yeomen who was present at that engagement and who knew the circumstances, has written, to do justice to the Canadian Artillery. His letter appeared in the issue of the 'Daily News,' two days later, the 20th March. He corrects the statement of the contributor I have just quoted, and shows that these Boers had themselves taken off their boots in order to creep noiselessly into camp. Inasmuch as the item I have quoted has appeared in some Canadian papers to the discredit of the Canadian force, I desire to quote what this young English soldier says, which is absolutely true. His letter, in the 'Daily News' of March 20th, 1902, reads as follows :

> Conservative Club, Carlisle, March 18, 1902.
> Sir,—In your issue of to-day, under the heading, 'When will the war be over ?' appears an account of the suppression of the rebellion in Griqualand West by General Sir Charles Warren, with particular reference to Colonel Hughes, the colonial scout, who was an exceedingly smart officer. There are many inaccuracies in the said account which I am not concerned to correct ; but I do wish to contradict the slander therein contained against my old comrades the Canadians. Your scout whose testimony is recorded could not have been present at the engagement with which he connects the Canadians, otherwise he would not name the fight 'Smith's Drift.' The battle was fought at 'Fabers Puts,' which is many miles from 'Smith's Drift,' and against the statement of your scout that the Canadians were 'too far off to join in the fight,' and that they 'stripped the dead Boers of their boots and socks,' perhaps you will allow me to say that the Canadians who were 'E' battery, R.C.F.A., and as efficient a body of men as have served in this war, were encamped within 200 yards of the garden whence the enemy made their attack on the camp, and their (the Canadians) guns did good execution in the action. That the colonials had several casualties in their ranks is the best contradiction I can give, and as to the 'boots and socks' fiction, the fact simply is that the Boers doffed their own boots the more noiselessly to approach our lines. I can send you a photograph of a dead Boer as he fell shot through the heart in the aforesaid garden, minus his boots but plus his socks. Your scout lost some of his own chums in the action, but he was not there himself.

Since the Canadians herein mentioned have returned home, I trust you will permit me in their absence to record this protest.

Yours, &c.,
GEO. HODGSON,
late trooper, 24th Co., I.Y.

I may say, Sir, that there is no need for me to make any further statement in addition to what is contained in this young soldier's letter. The Canadians conducted themselves on that occasion, as on every other occasion, with the greatest gallantry. I had the honour of being present myself. The Canadians were not, as this young soldier says, two hundred yards from the position held by the Boers, they were only 65 yards, and they maintained that position, and did splendid service throughout. I would not have mentioned this matter, only that an item has appeared in some of the papers to the discredit of E Battery of the Royal Canadian Field Artillery. No better men served in South Africa.

Mr. WALTER SCOTT (West Assiniboia). The amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition to the motion of the Minister of Finance, has been so thoroughly discussed from almost every point of view that it is not with the idea of advancing anything new that I rise to take part in this debate. In consequence of a statement made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech, the idea has got abroad that at the next session of parliament the country may expect some changes, or some revision of the tariff, and it is because of that possibility, or that probability, that I deem it my duty as the representative of a district composed largely of the consuming classes to state briefly my position on the tariff question. I shall endeavour to make my remarks very brief. I hope that what I have to say will not be so woefully misconstrued as some few remarks I made on a similar occasion last year were misconstrued by one of the hon. members who followed me in that debate. Last year I discussed a question partially of a local nature, just as hon. gentlemen at that time, and again this year, have discussed some questions partly of a local character. But the matter I brought up at that time, the future of the North-west Territories, I think is as important to the whole of Canada as almost any question that could be raised in this House. The hon. gentleman who followed me at that time, the member for Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster), said that he found in my remarks the solution of something that had been puzzling him from the time of the general election. He found that I had made some promises of a local character to the people of my district superior to the promises which the opposition there had been able to make. Of course the reply might have been made to the hon. gentleman that there could not be found in his remarks any reason for his election to a seat in this House. But that would have been scarcely fair, because, from his point of view, I believe the speech he made was a very good speech, and a very good presentation of the case from his point of view. But to assure the hon. gentleman, and to assure this House, that he was entirely mistaken, I may state that the matter which I at that time discussed is not a matter of political difference in the North-west Territories. The statement that I made was similar to and, as a matter of fact, was largely a repetition of statements made by and of the position that is taken by the local Prime Minister of the territories who is a member of the party to which the hon. member for Lincoln and Niagara belongs.

I am sorry that I cannot promise to follow very closely this afternoon the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) who has just taken his seat. I fear he has covered too much ground for me to chase him over. I am sorry too, that I cannot hope to approach the high statesmanship which he exhibited in his speech and which was exemplified when he touched the matter of private cars. I would not attempt, either, to follow his example in respect to fairness when he discussed the expenditure. He went over the figures in regard to expenditure, showing the increases that have been made since 1896 when his own friends were in power, but he abstained from any reference to the extra services that have been given to the people in return for that increased expenditure. I would not endeavour either to imitate the hon. gentleman's accuracy, as when he referred to the government as a government of lawyers. I think he used the expression that the government is all composed of lawyers. Now, unless I am mistaken, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) is not a lawyer, the Minister of Agriculture (Hon. Mr. Fisher) is not a lawyer, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. Mr. Sutherland) is not a lawyer, the Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) is not a lawyer, the Minister of Militia and Defence (Hon. Mr. Borden) is not a lawyer, the Minister of Inland Revenue (Hon. Mr. Bernier) is not a lawyer, the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) is not a lawyer, the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) is not a lawyer, the Minister without portfolio (Hon. Mr. Templeman) is not a lawyer, but a journalist. Here we have 8 or 9 members of the government, nearly 60 per cent, who are not lawyers. That is enough to show his accuracy.

The MINISTER OF CUSTOMS (Hon. Wm. Paterson). That is pretty close for him.

Mr. SCOTT. Well, that probably is as close to the mark as he got in the greater part of his speech, and possibly it is as close as many hon. members opposite have managed to get to the mark when they have dealt with public questions in this House, and a good deal closer than many of them are able to get when they deal with public questions in the country.

The Liberal party, since 1896, has been accused of carrying out the policy of the Conservatives, and it has been stated that Conservatives are still governing the country because the Liberal government are enforcing the Conservative policy. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor), in his opening remarks, referred to the action taken in this House some years ago respecting oleomargarine, at a time when his friends were in power, and if I understood him correctly, he stated that the present Minister of Customs had made a suggestion which had been accepted by the then Minister of Customs and carried out. He brought this up in a spirit, it seemed to me, of reprobation against the hon. Minister of Customs. If this fact is true, then, our friends opposite, when they were in power, were not unwilling, at times—on very few occasions, it is true—to take a suggestion from the other side, and I believe that any government of conscientious, honest men will never be unwilling to accept good suggestions no matter where they may come from. I was rather amused, in listening to the remarks of the last speaker, to note the excessive anxiety that pervaded these remarks in behalf of the farmers of the country. His speech was an appeal from the farmer's point of view. It seems to me that he has changed his point of view to a considerable extent from the time when, in Goderich, he was talking privately to a manufacturer there by the name of Saunders, and when he told that manufacturer, that if he and his friends were in power the farmers would not be so well off, that they would not have free binder twine, free wire, or free cream separators, that they would put a 45 per cent duty on agricultural implements, and according to the statement of Mr. Saunders, the hon. gentleman said that the present government were doing too much for the farmers. If we get into power, that is myself and my friends, said the hon. gentleman then the condition of things will be changed radically. A reference was also made by the hon. gentleman to the question of coal oil. He asked if the changes made by this government in the tariff in regard to coal oil had resulted in any reduction in the price. I am very happy to say that in the country with which I am familiar, west of Lake Superior, the changes made in the tariff and in the regulations in regard to the transportation of coal oil have resulted in a reduction of price of from 5 to 10 cents a gallon which the people of that country very much appreciate. The hon. gentleman spent some time in endeavouring to refute the position taken by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) respecting the reduction of taxes which the present government claim they have made since 1896. The hon. member for Guysborough claimed that a reduction of 10 per cent had been made through the tariff legislation of the present government in the taxation levied on the people of the country. The hon. member who spoke last seemed to be puzzled by that statement and he sought to refute it. Possibly it is not worth while for me to spend very much time in dealing with his references to the question because the proposition should be perfectly plain to every one who has ever studied arithmetic. If we take three from eighteen it must be clear to every one that this is something in the neighbourhood of a 10 per cent reduction. It may be clearer to the hon. gentleman if it is put in another way. The duty that was collected in the last fiscal year amounted to $29,000,000. That was the amount of the taxation levied on the people of the country. Had the tariff not been changed, had the tariff been left as it was, when the hon. gentleman and his friends went out of power, there would have been duty collected to the amount of $34,000,000. There is a reduction of about $5,000,000 from $34,000,000, and that means a reduction of rather more than 10 per cent. Is there any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House who is not yet assured of this fact. If five taken from thirty-four is not equal to as much as 10 per cent, then, I do not know anything about arithmetic. In common with, I think, I may say all the members of this House, and in common with all the people of this country, I was very much pleased at the statement that the hon. Minister of Finance was able to give to this House. The statement which he made showed that the finances of the country are in a very flourishing condition, and I think it is a fair indication that the affairs of the people, of individuals and business men and others in the country are in a fairly prosperous condition. Our friends opposite all state that they agree that the country is in a prosperous condition and that progress is being made, but some of them contend that the government should not seek to claim any credit for the prosperity and progress that are to be seen on every hand. If that is true, if the attitude and policy of the government have had no effect upon the affairs of the country, why do hon. gentlemen spend so much of the time of this House talking about the tariff ? If it be true that the tariff policy of the government has had no effect upon the business of the country, why spend so much time discussing it ? If it has had any effect surely it must have had a good effect. because conditions under the present tariff have shown remarkable improvement. One point of that criticism that is made by our friends opposite is in regard to the expenditure. It has been said by a number of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House that hon. gentlemen opposite are careful never to come down to details in regard to expenditure. It is an easy matter to state that the expenditure is too high, but any person who takes the responsibility of stating that the expenditure is too high should be willing to take the responsibility of pointing out the items in the estimates which should be cut out, or reduced and as long as none of these hon. gentlemen are willing to take that responsibility they have no right to be making the general statement that the expenditure is too high. As long as they will not take that responsibility they may rest assured that the country will not take very much stock in their statements about the expenditure. My hon. friend the junior member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock) in fatherly tones told the hon. Minister of Finance that it was a dangerous thing to allow the expenditure to reach too high a point, because when the time came when there was any necessity of reduction, or when reduction became advisable, he would find it very difficult to make reductions. This hon. gentleman asked the hon. Finance Minister where he would commence to make reductions. On behalf of the hon. member for Centre Toronto I would implore the hon. Minister of Finance when the time comes when he must make reductions not to start in Toronto, because, if he does, there will be a howl against any such policy.

As I said at the commencement I intend to confine my remarks chiefly to my position on the tariff question. When I sought election in Assiniboia—while I asked for support as a Liberal, yet I also sought the suffrages of my constituents from the point of view that I should be absolutely independent in voting in this House, and that I should be free to support any measure which seemed to me and which seemed to the people I represent to be in the interests of the country. Therefore, Sir, if at any time the party led by the hon. leader of the opposition should propound a policy which I considered to be more in the interests of my constituents than the policy of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, I shall have no hesitation whatever in casting in my lot with them, and giving my support to that policy. To the people I represent, the fiscal policy of the government is one of the great issues of the day; as a matter of fact, I think it is the chief issue which divides the political parties in Canada. Consequently, the amendment that has been moved by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) and which lays down the position of the Conservative party on the tariff issue, becomes a matter of very great concern to me. Let me point out that it is very similar in terms to the resolution that was proposed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) last session. I regret now, as I regretted then, that the position taken by the leader of the opposition and his friends, is not somewhat more specific so that there should be no doubt in any part of the country as to what are the intentions of the leaders of the Conservative party, if they should be given an opportunity to frame and enforce a tariff in this country. Speaking last session on the resolution which was then proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition, I expressed the fear that in different parts of the country different arguments would be based upon it by the friends of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden). To show that my fear was not groundless, I shall read a few extracts from, what is next to the 'Mail and Empire,' possibly the chief Conservative organ in the Dominion of Canada; I refer to the Winnipeg 'Telegram.' Those of us who listened to the debates of last session and of this session, have not much doubt as to what would be the effect on the tariff, if our friends on the opposite side were reinstated on the Treasury benches. There cannot be any doubt in the minds of the members of this House as to what the hon. leader of the opposition would do with the tariff if he were Prime Minister. There can be no doubt that in such an event there would be a general and considerable increase in the tariff; but the Winnipeg 'Telegram' on December 3rd last, was so much in doubt about the matter that it wrote as follows :

> We have frequently pointed out that the Conservative resolution of last session did not call for a raising of the duties.

On December 26, the Winnipeg 'Telegram' again wrote :

> And they (the western Liberals) will probably consider that they have more to hope for from a Conservative government in regard to reductions in the tariff than from the present administration.

What may be described as the chief Conservative organ in the west, is, it will be seen, endeavouring to convince the people of that country, that it is to the Conservative party they must look if they are to have a lower tariff than at present. On December 28, the 'Telegram' said :

> But those who support the government because they fear that a Conservative government would make immediate and substantial increases in the tariff should remember that a party is better judged by its actions than by its words.

Apparently this organ has some little doubt about the words of its leaders. On February 13, while an election was pending in Lisgar, this paper wrote :

> Liberal speakers in Lisgar, as well as the 'Free Press,' are striving to convince the electors of that constituency that the Conservative party is pledged to increase the tariff.

It was surely a very strange thing that the Liberal speakers in Lisgar should try to convince the electors of that constituency that the Conservative party is pledged to increase the tariff. The 'Telegram' declared that this was nothing but a subterfuge on the part of the Liberals. Now, these references were all made pertinent to the resolution that was introduced in this House by the hon. leader of the opposition last year, and the 'Telegram' has also spoken regarding the resolution at present before us. On March 20, a day or two after this resolution was brought down, the 'Telegram' said:

> The 'Free Press' tries to put the high tariff construction on the resolution, but this is only an expedient for avoiding the confession which would otherwise have to be made. There is no doubt what the resolution means. It means that there should be adequate protection for all branches of Canadian industry. If any labour, agricultural or manufacturing interests have not now adequate protection, it means that increased protection should be given, but it does not mean a great increase or a general increase.

The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) was in Lisgar during that election, and he is reported in the Winnipeg papers to have said:

> The Conservative policy does not call for increased protection.

The hon. leader of the opposition will no doubt realize from these quotations that it is necessary for him to be a little more explicit with regard to his tariff intentions, so that there shall not be this diversity of opinion among his friends as to what he and his party will do if they should come to power in this Dominion. I have here the amendment proposed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) this session, and it reads:

> This House, regarding the operation of the present tariff as unsatisfactory, is of opinion that the country requires a declared policy of adequate protection to its labour, agricultural products, manufactures and industries, as will at all times secure the Canadian markets for Canadians.

The policy of the Conservative party therefore is, that a high protective wall shall be placed around Canada which shall prevent foreign goods coming into this country and which shall prevent the people of Canada from buying any, but goods that are manufactured in Canada. As I said last year: I may not be entirely satisfied with the tariff as applied by the present government; I may think that the tariff should be lower than it is at the present time, but I have to face a practical situation. If I am to do anything practical I have to vote either for the Liberals or for the Conservatives on this tariff question. Well, there is no ground left for me to hesitate upon as to my course. There is nothing left for me to do, in view of all the conditions, than to vote in favour of the policy; the declared policy which is in force and which has been put in force by the leaders of the Liberal party.

While the leader of the opposition was not quite as specific as he might be with regard to some of the phases of the tariff question, he was very specific with regard to others. He complained in his speech during this debate, that fruits were being imported to too great an extent, and he told us that in the fiscal year 1900-1, $2,433,974 worth of fruits were imported into Canada; $1,766,979 worth of which came in under duty and $666,995 worth of which came in free of duty. The plea of the hon. gentleman is that this fruit should not be allowed to be brought into Canada and that a tariff wall should be put up to prevent our people importing this fruit. This is a matter of considerable interest to the people west of Lake Superior who have to import all the fruit they use.

A point which possibly has not been emphasized as much as it might during this debate, is, that the policy which is announced by the leader of the opposition and supported by his party in this House, is not the old national policy. Under the national policy we had duties reaching on the average to a point around 30 per cent, but the declaration of the leader of the opposition now is, that we should have a tariff wall at least as high as the tariff wall of the United States, which of course is a great deal higher than the tariff wall we had under the national policy. The hon. leader of the opposition has stated (page 1334, revised 'Hansard'):

> If we intend to maintain and build up our own products and manufactures against such powerful and tremendous competition as that which we must anticipate from the United States we would fix our tariff of customs against that country on a scale at least as high as is that of their tariff against us.

This is a feature which I think should be emphasized before this House and before the people of the country—that it is not the national policy that our friends of the opposition would restore if they came into power, but a tariff 30 or 40 or 50 per cent higher than was the national policy tariff. In support of this, I will also quote from the speech of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Kemp), who said:

> Unfortunately for a long term of years we have been witnessing conditions which have been very distasteful to us, which have grated upon our finer feelings. Our pride has risen in us, and we have, as it were, set our teeth, when we have witnessed what has been going on in this country for the last 50 years. I refer to the exodus which has been talked of in this House under the administration of various governments.

The hon. member for East Toronto is a very enthusiastic advocate of the policy which is declared by the hon. leader of the opposition, and it is evident by his remarks that that policy is not the national policy tariff, but a tariff 30 or 40 or 50 per cent higher than the national policy tariff. Therefore, as between the attitude of the government of the present day, and the attitude of our friends on the other side of the House, there is nothing left for me—although I cannot say that I am entirely satisfied with the present tariff—but to support the present tariff and the men who keep it in operation.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SCOTT. Before six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I had complimented the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) who immediately preceded me upon the extensive and complete collection of 1900 campaign chestnuts which he had embodied in his speech. I had remarked on the various opinions expressed by different Conservative authorities throughout the country respecting the application of the principles contained in the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition. I had endeavoured to prove, and I think with a fair measure of success, that what is really meant by the amendment before the House is not a return to the national policy tariff, but the enforcement of a tariff a great deal higher than was the national policy tariff. I pointed out the plain words of the hon. leader of the opposition to that effect, and quoted from the remarks of several of the hon. gentlemen who support him in this House in proof of my statement that what the people of this country have to expect, if the Conservative party should return to power, and apply the principle they advocate here, is not the national policy tariff, which was in force for eighteen years in this country, but a tariff exceeding 50 per cent, for I understand that the average tariff rate in the United States is a little higher than 52 per cent. I had explained that from my own point of view, no ground was left for me to do otherwise than support the government, which I intend to do very heartily, when the vote is taken, notwithstanding that it would please me and the people I represent if certain items in the tariff list were considerably reduced. I had also expressed the hope that the explanation which I intended to make of my position on the tariff question would not be so misinterpreted as were a few remarks on another matter which I made last year. It was not a matter of very great moment on that occasion that the remarks of any single individual should be misinterpreted or misconstrued; but in regard to this whole tariff question, it seems to me, from remarks which have been very generally made in this House and out of it, that the position of the representatives of the country to the west of Lake Superior and in fact the position and sentiments of the whole people who live west of Lake Superior, are considerably misinterpreted and misunderstood by the people in the eastern part of Canada. Time and again the people of the west are spoken of as clamouring for free trade. Now, not to my knowledge has any representative of the west, in this debate or in any debate that took place last year, asked for free trade. We not only do not clamour for free trade, but we do not ask for free trade. We have supported the government in their revenue tariff policy, and so long as that is the case I think it is not proper for representatives of eastern Canada to be imputing to the west what they term unreasonable views. So far as I am concerned, while I would be willing to support to the fullest extent any respectable and powerful party in this country that would go the whole length of free trade, I have to recognize that at the present time that the idea seems to be impracticable. There is no considerable party anywhere in Canada that seems to favour following that idea to its full extent; and therefore my position is that so long as there is a tariff in force, which affords incidental protection to a certain class of people in the country, the advantage of that tariff should as far as possible be made equitable to every class of people in the country.

Only a few days ago in this House a question was raised by hon. members from the North-west Territories who wished to have the minimum valuation which is placed upon imported horses increased and it was at once thrown at us that we were inconsistent, that we were usually free traders but that on any little matter which we thought would benefit the people we represent we were willing to turn ourselves inside out and advocate protection. I am not very much concerned with accusations of inconsistency. I am perfectly willing to stand the brunt of such accusations. So long as the manufacturing and other classes of the country are reaping some benefit from the incidental protection of the tariff which is in force it is perfectly proper to demand that the people whom I represent should be given such advantages as can be given them through the incidental protection of the tariff. But, in the matter I speak of, the matter of scrub horses, I contend that we were not asking for protection in the usual tariff sense. We were not wishing to promote the industry that we were speaking about. We were not wishing that any change should be made in the tariff for the purpose of promoting that industry. What we wanted was to stamp out that industry which is quite a different thing from asking the government to aid in promoting an industry by means of the tariff. I can only repeat that I do not wish to hold myself bound by an idea which in this country is only a theory—the idea of free trade. So long as there is a tariff in force, so long as an advantage is given to some classes of the people by this tariff so long am I going to contend that the advantage should be extended to all classes of the community to an extent as great as possible. But, the reason why I and other representatives of the consuming classes contend for the lowest possible tariff is because there is very little advantage that can be given by any tariff to the consuming classes. The advantage which can be given by our tariff in this country is almost entirely reaped by what are known as the manufacturers. Hon. gentlemen opposite who advocate high duties have been complimenting themselves upon their doctrine having obtained some converts on this side of the House. One of the members whom they have seemed to believe has become converted to their views is the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Heyd). As it seems always to be well, if possible, to get evidence from the other side, I am going to read to the House a fairly lengthy statement which was made to this House in this debate by the hon. member for South Brant. If he is a convert to the doctrine of high protection, then, I think I may class myself in the same category. I read this in order to place it again upon the 'Hansard' because it states what I think to be the truth in a very much stronger, more forcible and more concise form than I could put it myself. The hon. gentleman said :

When I look at the trade figures once more and I discover that our agriculturists are the greatest manufacturers there are in this country, that the agricultural interest is the greatest manufacturing interest there is in Canada, when I find that that industry exported last year, in animals and their products alone, $55,000,000, where five years ago they exported $36,000,000 worth, that in agricultural products they exported $24,000,000 worth, while five years ago only $14,000,000 worth were exported, I ask myself the question : Am I entitled to speak for that great agricultural class which has no interest in a tariff, and whom we can only benefit by making life as easy as possible ? We cannot protect the agriculturists of this country. Neither have I been waited upon by any agricultural sccieties in the riding from which I come, asking me to seek increased protection for any product of the farm or of agriculture. I ask myself the question: Would I be justified in expressing the opinion that a declaration of protection will benefit the mining industry of this country ? That is an interest that does not appear to receive that calm consideration that its growing magnitude entitles it to. That mining industry of ours is going to become a source of enormous wealth to the people of Canada, which we, even in our day, have only a faint appreciation of. When we look at the actual facts of the case and see that only five years ago the exports of minerals from this country were $8,000,000, while, last year, they had risen to the munificent sum of $40,000,000, an increase of 500 per cent in five years, we can hope that when twenty-five years shall have elapsed the prediction made by Professor Bell, one of the most eminent geologists that we have in this country, recently in an address delivered in the city of Toronto, when he showed himself to be thoroughly conversant of the subject, that in twenty-five years Canada would export not $40,000,000 but $1,000,000,000 of mineral products, shall have been verified, and we are hardly in a position to say that by increasing the cost of mining machinery we will be advancing the interests of the miners of this country. That is an industry that can only be protected by making mining machinery cheap. The government have done what they could by removing the duty from mining machinery, and I do not therefore like to endorse this resolution even on behalf of the miners. Then, you take our fisheries; how can we give adequate protection to the fisheries ? They have no products we could give any protection to under the sun. The only protection our fishermen want is the protection of good harbours, good life-saving apparatus and the protection that markets easy of access will give to them. Any money in the form of protecting the fisheries expended to make the lives of the fishermen more secure and their occupation less hazardous and more agreeable, will be money well expended, and it will be the only kind of protection that we can give our fishing interests.

Take our forest products. As far as I am personally concerned—although I do not think it would do much good—I am in favour of putting reciprocal tariff on lumber as long as our friends to the south of us maintain a tariff on lumber. Taking the five great national industries I have spoken of : The minerals, the fisheries, the forests, animals and their products, and agriculture, we have an export of $161,000,000. On that vast trade, by no method of protection can you encourage it to the development of a single cent.

That is the declaration of the hon. gentleman whom hon. gentlemen opposite claim as a convert to the principle of high protection. I would not go quite so far as the hon. member for South Brant. I think there may be some few things in regard to which the farmers of this country, the greatest producers that we have and who must be for generations to come the foundation of our progress and prosperity, may possibly in some few slight particulars be given an advantage by the tariff, but the advantage which can be given is so very slight in comparison with the advantages which a smaller and comparatively insignificant class of the community reap from the tariff, that it is my opinion and it is the strong, and unanimous opinion of the people in the country I come from, that the tariff should be kept at the lowest possible point. From hon. gentlemen sitting actually on the opposite side of the House statements may be quoted in further proof of the fact that the products of the great producing classes of this country cannot be protected. For instance the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith), who claims to be a high tariff man, respecting the product of wheat, asks: What has the government done as to the price of wheat ? He held that no government could affect exports. He held that by the tariff they could affect imports into the country, but he contended that by no tariff could the exports be affected ? This is simply proving the case that the products of the great producing class in Canada cannot be given any advantage by the tariff. There are things that the government can do for the great producing classes, and there were a number of things that this government, when they come into power in 1896, found it possible to do, a number of things that they did do which have resulted in a great deal of advantage to the whole people of Canada.

In the matter of the United States cattle quarantine, I was very much surprised to hear my hon. friend from South Wentworth (Mr. Smith) speak disparagingly of the action of the government. The actual results of that action, I shall give in a very few words. In the four and a half years ending 1896, during which the quarantine regulations were in force, the sales of cattle in Canada to the United States amounted to 3,762 head, valued at $52,606, whereas in the four and a half years ending 1901, after the Minister of Agriculture had secured the abrogation of those regulations, the sales amounted to no less than 341,317 head, value $526,919. There can be no question therefore that the action of the Minister of Agriculture was of very material advantage to the people of Canada. I am in a position to state, on the authority of possibly the largest cattle dealers in Canada, Messrs. Gordon and Ironsides, whose headquarters are at Winnipeg, that this action of the Minister of Agriculture was equivalent to a profit of $10 per head to every cattle owner in the North-west Territories.

The policy of the government in perfecting our cold storage transportation system is also one the benefit of which can not be gainsaid.

Then there is the establishing of government creameries in the territories, and I might cite a long list of actions of the present government, which have resulted undoubtedly in very material advantage for the people generally.

While by means of a tariff, very little can really be done to aid the agricultural industry, there is one means by which that interest can be benefited, and that is by improving our methods of transportation. In this connection the government has done a great deal. The other day the Minister of Finance declared that the capital expenditure during the current fiscal year will amount to $14,000,000, the greater part of which has been devoted to the assistance of railway projects, and the improvement of our transportation facilities. To those gentlemen who sometimes contend that the west is too generously dealt with by this governement, let me point out that of this $14,000,000 expended in the current fiscal year on the improvement of our transportation facilities, a very small fraction indeed is expended in the country west of Lake Superior—very much smaller, I believe, than ought to be expended.

The advocates of protection now, as at all times in the past, endeavour, by some means or other, to give a sugar coating to the pill which they want us to swallow. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has recently become an ardent advocate of the protectionist system, and the sugar coating which he gives the pill is the idea of retaliation. He endeavours to play on the prejudices of the people rather than appeal to their common sense, by urging them to retaliate against our American neighbours. But when we reach bed rock in the ideas of protectionists, we find that first and last and all the time their main object is to give the manufacturing class an advantage by law at the expense of the other classes. And the hon. gentleman from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) proceeded in his speech in this debate to abandon the retaliation plea by urging that apart altogether from the course of the United States in its tariff respecting Canada, our tariff should be a protective one, because our manufacturer cannot afford to live under the preference granted the mother country. If the United States, he said, had no existence, and there consequently could be no idea of retaliation, we would still require a high tariff wall to protect our manufacturing industries against the competition of the motherland. It was rather interesting to observe our friends on the opposition benches during the speech of that hon. gentleman. When he was proving to their satisfaction that he had been for many years entirely mistaken and inconsistent in his advocacy of a revenue tariff, they applauded him loudly as though inconsistency were a mark of intelligence and statesmanship, and apparently forgetting, for the moment, that whenever a reference is made to the policy of the opposition, they claim great merit of consistency in standing by the principle which they advocated twenty-five years ago. In their case statesmanship is based on consistency, but in the case of the hon. member for North Norfolk, its chief mark is inconsistency. Our opposition friends, however, do not occupy quite the same position in their tariff advocacy as they did twenty-five years ago. When the high tariff resolution was proposed in 1878, and that policy was applied in the succeeding years, they were continually advancing the plea that this high tariff would necessarily be a measure of short duration, because as soon as the infant industries were built up, the tariff wall could be taken down, and these industries could hold their own against the world. To-day, however, the leader of the opposition says he is not willing to have a measure of reciprocity with the United States because our industries require, and always will need, protection, and will never be in a position to compete against their American rivals. So that the position of hon. gentlemen opposite to-day is not at all that which they took twenty-five years ago.

I quite admit that our tariff may be improved. I think that it might be considerably improved by further reducing the duties on various articles. When this tariff was proposed in 1897, there was considerable dissatisfaction among the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories on the ground that the government had not gone as far as the people were led to believe, by their promises before 1896, they would go. I do not know that it can be fairly urged, as the hon. gentleman who preceded me this afternoon did, that the leader of the government broke any specific promises he had given to the people, but the people of the west at all events thought that the pledges made by the leaders of the Liberal party in the campaign of 1896 and before that time could fairly have been taken to mean that greater reductions would be made than were made in 1897, and in 1897, 1898 and 1899 expressions of dissatisfaction were common. But since 1899 very much less dissatisfaction has been shown. As a matter of fact, I think, in some respects, our present tariff has worked very much more to the advantage of the people than was expected. The various reductions that were made have led to greater competition from the outside than was anticipated, and at present and for some months back very little complaint has been made by the people in the west or in any other part of the country.

There seems to be a general idea, as I mentioned this afternoon that, next year, a revision of the tariff will take place. If a revision is made fairly—and, no doubt, there is a possibility of a revision being made to the advantage of the people—and if it can be shown that there are certain industries that are suffering and are liable to be wiped out because of the lowness of certain items on the tariff, I believe that the people of the west, notwithstanding that the changes may not be to their advantage will concede the point and agree to the raising of the tariff. But, on the other hand, if it be shown that certain industries are without the competition necessary for the safety of the consuming public and are making too great profits, the people of the west will expect that the tariff, so far as the protection of those industries is concerned, will be lowered. If the government can make a revision to the benefit of the whole people and not increase the tariff rate generally over what it is to-day, I believe that no great complaint will be heard from the people of western Canada. The people of the west are willing to be fair; they recognize the fact that, for some time in the future, as now, the revenues of Canada must be raised by a customs tariff, and they are willing to pay their fair share, and even more than their fair share as they must do under any tariff. I am willing, as I believe the people I represent are willing, to judge every case on its merits. It has been contended that a duty should be reimposed upon lumber. From the information I have, I would not be inclined to accede to that view. Last session, we had a little discussion about lumber, and I took the trouble to look up the facts in regard to the matter. I found that, as far as could be gathered from the records, the annual production of lumber in Canada amounted to about $70,000,000, the exports from Canada to from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, and the consumption in Canada to about $47,000,000. On the other hand the amount imported into Canada was only about $2,500,000—only about 5 per cent of the lumber used in Canada was imported, in other words, the lumber manufacturers of Canada controlled about 95 per cent of the Canadian trade. If these figures are correct, it cannot be contended that our lumbermen are being subjected to any unjust competition or that American lumber is being slaughtered in this country. I said a moment ago that it was good, sometimes, to get evidence from the other side. I find that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) now an ardent protectionist, made the following statement some days ago, a statement which, it will be seen has bearing upon the point I am now discussing :

> The United States produced 79,000,000 bushels of barley. Suppose that we increased our exports of barley to the United States to 7,000,000 bushels, such importation would have no influence upon the price.

The hon. gentleman was arguing that if the importations into a country did not exceed a certain proportion of the total consumption those importations had no effect upon the price of home-produced goods. He put the figure at 10 per cent and contended that until imports reached this point they did not affect the price of home products. I have pointed out that the importations of lumber into Canada do not exceed 5 per cent of the total.

A good deal of talk has been indulged in with regard to the woollen industry. If there is any class of manufacturers in Canada who are suffering, probably it is the manufacturers of some classes of woollens. But the evidence that even they are suffering is by no means conclusive. Many of them seem to find the tariff quite satisfactory. We have no woollen manufacturers in the North-west, but among my friends in Ontario are some engaged in this line. One whom I met in Ottawa the other day, when I asked him how business was, and how the present tariff affected him, said that he had all the orders he could fill and had no complaint to make against the tariff. I do not think it can be fairly contended that woollen goods from any other country are being slaughtered in Canada. Certainly, it will not be contended that this is being done with American goods, for this class of goods in the United States is higher in price than in Canada, and is hardly likely to be brought in over a 35 per cent duty to be slaughtered on this side of the line. The tariff under the preference is 23 per cent, which is considerably lower than under the general tariff. It may be that the manufacturers of certain classes of woollens find the duty almost too low to permit them to continue in business. Though it would be an extra load to put on the consuming class to raise the tariff on woollens, I believe that the people of western Canada are so willing to bear their share, and even a little more than their share, of the revenue burdens of the country that, if it could be proved that there was a woollen manufacturer in any special line who was suffering because of the low point to which the tariff was cut, they would be willing to have a little increased advantage afforded him.

Another article about which there has been considerable agitation during the last six months is farming implements. Among the hosts of deputations which have approached the government pleading for higher duties have been deputations of manufacturers of agricultural implements. That is one article which, I think it can be proved without possibility of dispute is not being slaughtered in this country. During last season, if it had not been that our implement dealers were able to go to the United States and buy implements, a portion of the immense crop in Manitoba and the North-west would be still standing in the fields, for the implement manufacturers of Ontario were absolutely unable to supply the number of implements needed to take off that immense crop. And as was pointed out by my hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Oliver), the American reapers sold in the Canadian North-west are sold at a price $10 higher than the price charged for the Canadian implements. It will hardly be said that slaughtering is going on in that line. In my opinion the best way to promote the prosperity of the manufacturers, as of every other class in the country, is not to put up a tariff wall or to choke up the ordinary channels of trade, but to take steps to increase the home markets by increasing the population. I am glad to be able to say that, on this point, I am in agreement with the hon. leader of the opposition, who, in his speech in support of this amendment used the following words :

> In this connection we must not forget the enormous importance of the home market, not only to Canadian manufacturers but also to Canadian agriculturists. Our total manufactures (including under that term all articles made in factories using machinery and motive power), have been estimated by a very competent authority during the past year at $730,000,000. Of these, we exported less than $68,000,000 or about 9 per cent. Therefore, 91 per cent of the goods manufactured in Canada have been consumed in Canada. We have consequently at the present time to look first to the home market and not to a foreign market.

The home market, during the year referred to, took no less than $662,000,000 worth of articles from the Canadian manufacturers. Now, it is clear to everybody that if five and three quarter millions of people could use this amount of manufactured goods, double that number of people would use double that quantity of manufactured goods. It seems therefore that the best policy we can pursue in the interest of everybody, of the manufacturers as well as of other classes, is to take such steps as will bring in rapidly a population to afford a home market for manufactures. It seems to me that the experience of the past should be a warning against returning to a higher tariff. For eighteen years we had the national policy tariff, and as has been frequently pointed out since this debate commenced the census returns ever since that policy was inaugurated have been most disappointing. The population has not increased at all in a satisfactory manner. There can be no question that since this government came into power, and since it has to some extent cut down the tariff, progress has been much faster. and population has been coming into the country more rapidly. At the present time we are getting immigrants from the United States in vastly greater numbers than the number of Canadians who are emigrating to that country.

I mentioned a moment ago that people in western Canada, and probably in all the provinces of the Dominion, who are interested in having a low tariff, have not been making as much complaint recently as formerly in respect to the tariff, and I think this fact has misled the manufacturers, and with a feeling of false security they have again commenced sending deputations to Ottawa to ask for more protection. I think they have very foolishly come to the conclusion that the consuming classes have gone to sleep on the tariff question, and that all they have to do is to come to Ottawa and get tariff increases, and then they will be able to live and fatten upon them for all time to come. I believe it is the duty of the members of this House to give warning to the manufacturers that they are entirely mistaken in that regard. While the people are finding the present tariff fairly satisfactory, and are not complaining under it as they did under the national policy tariff, and as they did for the first year or two after the present tariff was brought into operation, still, if any action is taken towards increasing the general tariff to the detriment of the consuming classes of this country, the manufacturers and everybody else will find shortly that the sentiment of the consuming classes is very much the same as it always has been, and that there will be such a renewed agitation that the manufacturers and every person in any measure responsible for such increase will find it very much to their disadvantage.

I was struck by the reference made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce in his speech to the policy of the late Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. I thoroughly believe what was stated by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that had the policy of Alexander Mackenzie been continued in force, we would have had five or six times as many people in the North-west as we have to-day ; we would have had a greater home market, and our manufacturers would have been much better off than they are at the present time. What would be the case to-day had the advice of our friends in opposition been taken four or five years ago, and had a tariff wall been put up so high as entirely to prevent goods coming in from the United States? Do you suppose that we would see to-day people going into the Canadian North-west by hundreds and thousands weekly? Do you suppose the people of Manitoba and the North-west would have been producing, as they did last year, 112,000,000 or 115,000,000 bushels of grain? I do not think there is the slightest possibility of it. The North-west will be peopled by a policy which makes the conditions of life there as easy as possible. If transportation arrangements are made by which they can remove their products to the seaboard at the least expense, and if the tariff is kept at such a point that they can buy their goods at the least cost, such a policy will result in peopling the North-west, and will result eventually to the advantage of everybody in Canada, the manufacturers included. The parliament and people of this country have before them a great opportunity to people the vast stretches of fertile land west of Lake Superior, and the only policy under which that can be done is one which will make conditions of life easy for the people there, and enable them to buy their goods as cheaply as possible; and, as I said before, such a policy will eventually prove to be the most favourable one to the manufacturers of eastern Canada, as well as for the Dominion as a whole.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). The hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Scott), in his opening remarks, reflected somewhat upon the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) because of his want of accuracy, as he called it, in referring to this government as a government of lawyers. The hon. member for Assiniboia, in endeavouring to refute the statement, mentioned these members of the Cabinet who are not of the legal profession. But the hon. gentleman should remember that when the Conservative government was in power the present Prime Minister himself, in his speeches throughout Canada, reflected upon the Conservative government for containing a lawyer as Minister of Justice, and a lawyer as Solicitor General; he complained that the government gave a great deal of their legal work to outside lawyers who were political supporters of the government, and he promised in his addresses to the people of Canada that all this would be changed on the advent of a Liberal government to power. But the fact is that since this government has come to power, not only have they a very large representation of the legal profession in the Cabinet, but their Solicitor General is allowed to practice his own profession in addition to his governmental duties, and they have increased to a very large extent the sum of money paid to outside lawyers who are political supporters of the present government.

The hon. member for Assiniboia, in reflecting upon another hon. member for want of accuracy I think has left himself open to the same charge. For instance, he spoke on the coal oil question, and declared that that was an article that had been reduced in price to the people of the west from five to ten cents a gallon, owing to changes and concessions made to the Standard Oil Company.

Mr. SCOTT. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. What I said was that the change in the regulations for bringing coal oil into the country had resulted in that reduction to the consumer.

Mr. ROCHE (Marquette). I can assure the hon. gentleman that in the town where I reside I cannot purchase a single gallon of the best American coal oil for less than forty cents, nor a gallan of Canadian oil of the first brand, for less than thirty-five cents; and these are exactly the same prices I paid in 1896. With a miserable reduction of one cent a gallon in the duty, how could we expect to get coal oil five cents or ten cents a gallon cheaper. It is true that some changes were made in the regulations regarding the admission of coal oil. We were allowed to import in tank steamers, and heretofore we were permitted to introduce tank cars into the west. To be sure the tank cars are admitted now and the number of distributing points has been increased, but at the same time the price of coal oil throughout Manitoba generally has not been reduced—so I am informed by those who buy and sell the oil, and they say that they are not buying it and selling it one cent cheaper than they did prior to 1896. In addition to that, and because of improper inspection on the part of the government officers, the quality of the coal oil sent into the North-west last winter was simply disgraceful. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) himself spoke on this question at an earler period in the session, and he admitted that the quality of the coal oil in the North-west, was, as I have said, disgraceful. So far as my information goes there has been no reduction in the price of coal oil since 1896.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) says that while it is all well enough for the members of the opposition to complain of the extravagant expenditure of the government, why do they not move to strike out the items that they object to? Well, it is not the province of an opposition to do that. The only thing an opposition can do is to make a general protest, as we do, on the floor of this House, and in addition to that we offer a resolution at the end of each session stating in general terms that the expenditure of the government during the past year was extravagant. Of course, the supporters of the government vote down that resolution. But when we move it and vote for it we discharge our duties to the country, and we are powerless to do anything else.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) has taken exception to the amendment proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition because, he says, it is not definite enough. I wonder what the hon. gentleman wants in the line of definiteness. The amendment is definite enough to any one who wishes to read it plainly, but of course those who do not, can turn it and twist it in any manner they may see fit. The hon. member is afraid that some of the supporters of the opposition may place one interpretation upon that amendment and others place other interpretations upon it. Let the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) first pluck the mote out of his own eye. Let me ask him : What kind of a declaration have we had from the Minister of Finance in reference to the tariff changes that are to be made at the next session of parliament. Some of the government supporters are claiming that it means increased protection and others, including the Liberal members from the west, are stating that it means a diminution of customs duties. The amendment of the leader of the opposition calls for a policy of adequate protection to all the industries of our country. Surely that is definite enough. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) would certainly not have the opposition formulate a tariff for every particular item in the Customs Act. That is not the duty of the opposition. When the leader of the opposition introduced his amendment to have a declared policy on the tariff, it is something that the people of this country will support him in, because now we have a cabinet rent in factions; some preaching one thing and some another; some free traders and some protectionists, just in order to rake into their fold the supporters of both kinds of fiscal policy. I was glad to see that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) had not the same assurance that the member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) had. That hon. gentleman declared that the people of the west were perfectly satisfied with the tariff as it stands to-day, but the member for Assiniboia was candid enough to state that the people of the west are not satisfied with the tariff. He does say, however, that in 1897 there was a very great disappointment in the west when the tariff was submitted by the Finance Minister. They could not feel otherwise. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) is aware of the pledges made to the people of the west by the supporters of the Liberal party of that day, and he knows that the tariff submitted in 1897 was not a fulfilment of those pledges. The Liberal members in the House at that time recognized this very well, because they endeavoured to square themselves with their constituents for supporting the government, by declaring that they looked upon the tariff of 1897 only as the first instalment towards a policy of free trade. But session after session has since rolled by, and future instalments are overdue, and now we are led to believe by the Minister of Finance, according to the implications which any sensible man would draw from his words, that instead of lowering the duties, the customs duties will be increased in the future. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) tells us that there is not now the feeling of disappointment there used to be in 1897. Of course, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) knows full well that there is not going to be any material lowering of the duties, and therefore he, as a journalist and a moulder of public opinion, in line with such organs as the Winnipeg 'Free Press,' is endeavouring to educate the people of the west up to the fact that we must have, what they call, a revenue tariff. But what is in a name ? The Minister of Finance tells us that the present tariff is only a reduction of 2·22 per cent on the Conservative tariff, and without admitting that his figures are accurate, we know that the reduction is less than that. But even with the British preference applied the Minister of Finance claims that the tariff has been reduced only 2·22 per cent, and that is the difference which the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) claims is the difference between a revenue and a protective tariff. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) is paying rather a poor compliment to the intelligence of the people of the west and of Canada generally when he claims that the present tariff is a tariff for revenue purposes only.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) has spoken about the resolution moved by the member for Macdonald (Mr. Boyd) asking that the minimum valuation be increased on horses imported from the United States. The hon. member (Mr. Scott) supported that resolution, but he objects to have the term protectionist applied to it. Well, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Boyd) who introduced that resolution was candid enough to state that he purposely intended it to be a measure of protection to the western farmers. The hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Davis) said : Why not let the people get cheap horses if they desire; you have settlers with possibly little money going into that country, and they may be desirous of securing cheap animals. But the farmers of the west do not want these animals to come to Canada for the reason that they are scrub animals, and are entering into competition with the better class of horses in the west. That is the reason why there is a demand that the minimum valuation should be increased. The proposition is a protection to the farmers, and the farmers of the west are not particular by what name you call it so long as it gives them that protection.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Scott) has referred to the woollen industry and he dealt very gently indeed with that question. Probably the hon. gentleman may have had a hint that there is something coming in the way of increased protection to the woollen industry next session of parliament, because he expressed the opinion that if any industry requires protection, probably the woollen industry was as badly in need of it as any other. However, he quoted the opinion of one woollen manufacturer to show that he was satisfied with the present tariff. If that be the opinion of the member for Assiniboia, he differs materially from the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), who has openly declared himself in favour of increased protection being given to the woollen industry at the next session of parliament. I think it is a safe prophecy that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Scott) may look forward to the duty on woollens being increased.

It was apparent to any one who followed the remarks of the Minister of Finance, that he endeavoured to buoy himself up with an air of assumed cheerfulness under cover of the general prosperity of the country. But, nevertheless, knowing the weak points in his argument, and that they would be taken full advantage of by his opponents, he could not hide a certain air of embarrassment because of the bubbles that would soon be pricked in the half truths with which many of his arguments were clothed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) has the faculty, or the habit of quoting only those statistics that will add force to his argument, omitting those that might prove embarrassing, using percentages when they are in his favour, and when they are opposed to his contentions claiming that they are unreliable. He however was compelled to make several admissions which detracted considerably from his claim of wise administration on the part of the government. In doing so, of course he places his party in rather a ridiculous position before the public by approving of that which they formerly denounced, and using arguments which heretofore met with their condemnation when used by a Conservative government. For instance, the money on deposit in our savings banks, the amount of life insurance, the amount of the bank circulation, &c., which were heretofore quoted by Conservative finance ministers as evidences of the general prosperity of the country, were ridiculed by the Liberal party in days gone by as evidences rather of national poverty than of prosperity. But now we hear the Finance Minister, in each succeeding year, in every budget speech delivered in this House, using these very same arguments which were formerly denounced by him, apparently oblivious of the inconsistency of his course. As Conservatives, Sir, we welcome, and we join with our opponents in welcoming, all and any evidences of prosperity. As men who prefer country to party we hail with pleasure the advent of good times ; but in doing so, we are acting in marked contrast to our opponents, who when on this side of the House, never missed an opportunity, no matter how numerous or glaring the evidences of prosperity were, of decrying the fair fame and name of their own country in order to make paltry political capital against their opponents.

But the Finance Minister used a very apt term when, in answer to an interruption of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) he told that hon. gentleman that if he should ever have the privilege in the future of being a Finance Minister of Canada, and was as lucky as he was, he might well congratulate himself—a significant though no doubt unintentional admission ; for if there has ever been a party in the history of Canada, or for that matter in the history of any other country, that has proved to be lucky to the fullest extent of the term, assuming the reigns of power on the eve of a wave of prosperity that has proved to be universal in its character, that party is the present Liberal party of Canada. It makes very interesting reading for the student of politics who desires to refresh his memory as to the opinions expressed by these hon. gentlemen when in opposition, to turn up their past speeches. He will see that there is scarcely an argument used by them to prove mal-administration on the part of their opponents that cannot be used with double effect against themselves to-day. But charges of inconsistency and insincerity, no matter how strongly they may be pressed home against hon. gentlemen opposite, are met with an air of levity that could only proceed from those who have not a due sense of their responsibilities or a full appreciation of what constitutes honour in public men. What care they for consistency so long as they are in the enjoyment of the fruits of office ? What store do they set by sincerity so long as they are basking in the sunshine of power, and having full confidence in their ability to corrupt the electorate by divers means, they snap their fingers at public sentiment and rely entirely on the practice of ways that are dark and tricks that are vain, of which they are past masters, to secure for themselves a renewal of power which they would not otherwise secure if a fair field and no favours were permitted when the people are called upon to make their selection. A Liberal of the rank and file is quoted against himself. He meets the quotation with a laugh—' good politics,' says he. A member of the cabinet is confronted with his declarations of the past in direct opposition to his present actions. ' Oh,' he exclaims, ' that was before I had any responsibility as a minister of the Crown ; that was when I was in opposition, before I was drawing $7,000 or $8,000 per annum.' The Prime Minister himself, the premier of His Majesty's premier colony, the man who above all others should set an example of public probity, who should be an example for the young men of our country to imitate makes light of gross breaches of faith on the part of himself and his colleagues, and airily replies, 'We are here, and you are there ; what are you going to do about it ?' With this experience and these examples, I think the Canadian people may well feel rather discouraged at the outlook for pure politics in the future. It is not surprising that so many of the better class of our citizens are deterred from entering public life, with such examples of duplicity and double dealing practiced by those who in days of yore made loud professions of virtue in their pharisaical manner but who have exploited the possibilities of hyprocrisy to its fullest extent since their advent to power. A surplus is claimed by a Conservative finance minister. He is immediately held up to the ridicule of the public by his Liberal critics. An evidence of incapacity, said they, on the part of a finance minister. The former philosopher of the House, the Hon. David Mills, who has been transfered to the judiciary, when a member of the opposition in this House, declared that a government had no business to have a surplus. These are his words :

> I say that a government is not entitled to have a surplus. There it no stimulus to economy when a large surplus remains in the hands of the government.

Which is true, though it does not remain very long in the hands of this government.

> A large surplus invites to extravagance, and has invited to extragance in this country. The government and parliament should inaugurate a system of economy.

And to this declaration of the Hon. David Mills, the members on the back benches pounded their desks in noisy approbation. He was not the only member of the cabinet who took exception to surpluses. The present Minister of Customs (Hon. Mr. Paterson) in stentorian tones that made the rafters of the House of Commons ring, gave utterance to the following words in 1883 :

> It is no part of the duty of the Finance Minister to extract more money out of the pockets of the people than is absolutely wanted to carry on public affairs. What would be said of a chancellor of the exchequer in England if he could not estimate the requirements of the public service nearer than $2,000,000 ? He would be ridiculed as unable to grasp the financial conditions of the country.

This sentiment was also welcomed by his Liberal supporters. This, however, was before these hon. gentlemen held office. What do we find now ? We find a Liberal finance minister getting up in his place in the House and actually boasting of having extracted from the pockets of the people during the last five years $19,000,000 more than was necessary to meet the lavish expenditure of this extravagant government—more than was necessary to meet the requirements of the public service. If that was a good principle in days gone by, it should be an equally good principle to-day. Now, with a revenue of $56,800,000 during the present year, and a surplus of some $5,000,000 on consolidated account—although taking the total expenditure of the government, on consolidated account and capital account together, by the figures quoted to the House by the Finance Minister himself, we shall have on the 30th of June next a deficit of $8,450,000—the least any one could expect was that this government would apply this surplus to a reduction of the burdens of the people. We expected that they would have reduced the national debt, reduced taxation, and our household expenditure. But instead of decreases there have been increases all along the line. What do we see with regard to the public debt, under which they claimed the people of Canada were groaning, when the Conservatives held office, and when that debt was millions of dollars less than it is to-day ? They then exhausted all their ability and eloquence and powers of denunciation in making out that the people were being impoverished in order to pay the interest on that debt. Well, how does it stand now ? We find that this year the public debt will be increased by $6,000,000, making in all an increase of $16,000,000 since these hon. gentlemen came to office. Had they applied their so-called surpluses to the relief of taxation, they might with some reason have claimed our approval, but they have raised our taxation $2.66 per capita. Had they reduced the expenditure, they might have claimed some credit for their policy, but instead they have increased our annual expenditure by $23,547,617. So that we have a record thus far of an increase of $16,000,000 in our public debt, of over $23,000,000 in our expenditure, and of upwards of $11,000,000 in our taxation. A wonderful showing for this so-called economical government. And mark you, Sir, these were the particular items upon which these hon. gentlemen judged their predecessors and called upon the people to turn the Conservative government out of power. Is it at all surprising that, with such a showing, the hon. Finance Minister did not evince that spirit of jubilation in his budget speech which the good times would otherwise have warranted ?

But what a spectacle did we see when the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) rose in his place and endeavoured to draw a red herring across the trail, endeavoured to divert the attention of parliament and the people from the true condition of affairs, by delivering a nine years old speech on the census, which most of us had read before coming to parliament, and in which, by his cheap criticism, bitter invective and gross charges of wholesale perjury against all the officials connected with the census of 1891, he endeavoured to alleviate the disappointment in the country caused by the census returns of 1901. One would have thought that that hon. gentleman, in what is practically his valedictory in this House—a House that is to know him no longer—though I am quite willing to admit that his training in opposition has not been conducive to amiability in one of so bilious a temperament, one would have thought that he would have endeavoured to assume a virtue even if he had it not, and adopt a tone more becoming to one who is about to take his departure from parliamentary life. True there may be some excuse for the bitterness of the hon. gentleman in the fact that he had been relegated to that useless appendage of the government, as he was wont in the old days to describe it, the Department of Trade and Commerce—that office which he himself used to declare had been simply created in order that a haven of quiet repose might be afforded to a supporter of the government for whom a cabinet position had to be supplied. How true those words are when applied to the hon. gentleman himself. How those chickens have come home to roost. But apparently it is very difficult for some hon. gentlemen to change their old-time habits. He accused the census officials of 1891 of having made false returns, at the instigation no doubt of the government of that day, of having perjured themselves in order to do political service to their party, but he forgot that the Conservative government or its officials did not resort to the tactics adopted by this government when taking the census of 1901. The late government did not send out private circulars to the census enumerators, asking them to count as residents of Canada people who had left the country, and to keep a separate list of the young men, showing their political persuasion, in order that that might be afterwards used to party advantage. It ill becomes the hon. gentleman to make groundless charges against a host of officials who are every bit as honorable as he is, especially in the light of the experience we have had in the taking of the last census.

The hon. minister could not abstain from giving a rap to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) for his so-called lapsing or backsliding to protectionist doctrines. The hon. member for North Norfolk had been the colleague of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, he had served with him on the International Commission, and has always been considered one of the most level-headed and brainy men of the House. In days gone by he has been accused of being rather too friendly to the neighbouring republic, and no one in this House is better posted on the needs and requirements of Canada and on trade questions in the United States. But if the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce were in quest of members on his own side who were in favour of protection, he need not have travelled beyond the confines of his own cabinet. He could have found one within the radius of the ministry itself. Why did he not attack the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte), who is an avowed protectionist, both in his speeches in this House and on the public platform ? Why did not the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce turn his guns against this colleague of his own ? Was the doughty knight afraid of his colleague ? Did he shrink from a contest with the fiery little champion of protection within his own charmed circle, the Minister of Public Works? Nor is the Minister of Public Works the only member of the cabinet who is a protectionist at heart, though I give that hon. minister the credit of saying that he has the courage of his convictions and will give voice to them, whereas the other members of the cabinet who share his views, practice protection while preaching free trade. Had he done this, then the hon. minister, after having subdued his colleagues, could turn his attention to the back benches, where he would find at least a score of his own supporters who are protectionists at heart, and having routed them, he might have had a little sweet communion with himself. For have we not had it on no less an authority than the Prime Minister himself that the Minister of Trade and Commerce lived for twenty years a double life, politically speaking, previous to attaining office. Has not the Prime Minister told us that when the Mackenzie administration held office, the Minister of Trade and Commerce was willing to adopt a protectionist policy, was willing to increase the duties, and was only deterred from doing so by the pistol put to his head by the members from the maritime provinces, in response to which the coon came down. He sacrificed what he knew would be in the best interests of his country for the sake of his party, and the right hon. gentleman lauded him for this spirit of sacrifice. The people of Canada, said the right hon. gentleman, knew but very little what they owed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce for having endured during all those years the obliquy of having been an inveterate free trader while in fact he was all along willing to be a protectionist. The Prime Minister, at a banquet given the Minister of Trade and Commerce down stairs, thus expressed his opinion of his colleague amid no doubt the cordial approval of those around the festive board on that occasion. That opinion has been quoted before by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), but a good thing will stand repetition, and let me now read to the House what the right hon. the Prime Minister then said :

> There never was a day of the many days since we have had to discuss questions together in council but I could count and rely on the support of Sir Richard Cartwright, and though, as sometimes happens in the councils of the party, we did not agree when in the council, when the policy of the party was agreed upon Sir Richard Cartwright never wavered in his support of it. I may give you an instance which has come to me from reliable sources, and it is a thing which goes far to show the character of our guest of this evening. In the days of Mr. Mackenzie, when the country was much depressed, there were many who believed that if the tariff was increased that policy would be justified by the necessities of the revenue, and that it would be a valuable policy for the country at large. I can give you the story without betraying secrets, because these things happened before my day, but if the advice of Sir Richard Cartwright had prevailed at that time this policy would have been adopted. If it was not accepted it was on account of other influences——

That was the pistol influence.

—which prevailed with the government of the day, and for sixteen or twenty years Sir Richard bore the brunt of the obloquy of not having responded to public sentiment, whereas the truth was he was ready to respond to public sentiment. For eighteen years he bore the brunt of all the obloquy, and never whispered a word. It is not every day you can find such abnegation and such loyalty to the party, and I have reason to believe, and repeat it to you—I not only repeat it to you, my colleagues, but I wish my words to be heard all over Canada—that Canada little knows the debt of gratitude that it owes to Sir Richard Cartwright.

This was considered by the Prime Minister to be a meritorious act on the part of Sir Richard Cartwright, and I have no doubt he was cheered by those assembled around that table. But there are people in Canada who have rather higher ideals of what constitutes good statesmanship. I am glad to be able to say that there are many people in Canada who, instead of approving of a man being a protectionist at heart and preaching free trade, consider such a course to be of the very essence of political hypocrisy.

Now, the Finance Minister claimed—claimed by imputation at any rate—that because our trade with Great Britain has increased to a certain extent this was solely and wholly due to the operation of the preferential tariff. But when he was asked to produce the figures showing our trade with the United States, he had conveniently forgotten them. But these figures have been made available to hon. gentlemen in this House since then, and they entirely nullify the arguments of the Minister of Finance. That hon. gentleman himself admitted that our trade with the United States had vastly increased, and said that our trade with every other country had also greatly increased. If the increase of our trade with Great Britain has been less than the increase of our trade with other countries, how can the Minister of Finance say that the increase of our trade with Great Britain, such as it is, is due to the fact that we have given Great Britain the preference. It would be absurd to take such a position. Our exports to the United States last year decreased by about 681,507, while our exports to Great Britain fell off $2,407,412. Our imports from the United States during the same period increased by $6,762,783, while our imports from Great Britain decreased during that period by about $2,307,977. Is this great decrease of our trade with Great Britain amounting to no less than $4,700,000, owing to the preferential tariff ? The hon. minister cannot claim credit for the increases of our trade without assuming responsibility also for this great diminution of our trade with Great Britain. The fact is this whole preferential tariff has been so arranged as to deceive not only the people of Canada but the people of the motherland as well. England derives little, if any benefit, while Canada derives from it no benefit whatever. It may be true that, in some instances, the English exporter and the Canadian exporter may benefit to a certain extent, but the consuming population are not benefited one whit. And, on the other hand, the chief products of Germany, sent to Great Britain and a small portion of work done upon them, come into Canada under the guise of British goods, and so get the benefit of the preference, while Canadian products are placed on the German maximum tariff. It would prove very interesting reading if a reliable statement could be presented showing the quantity of German goods that have taken advantage of the preferential tariff and have come into Canada under the guise of British goods. Our greatest competitor is the United States. The products of that country are similar to our own. American products go into the German market under the German minimum tariff, while ours must pay the maximum tariff. The Americans have an advantage on every bushel of wheat sent into the German market as compared with the Canadian product of 9½ cents per bushel; on oats, 4⅓ cents per bushel; on barley, 1¼ cents per bushel; on rye, 9½ cents per bushel; on peas, 3¼ cents per bushel; and so with butter, beans and other articles. This is a discrimination against Canada for having given a preference to Great Britain. And our government has not lifted a finger to improve this condition of affairs. The average rate on dutiable goods coming from the United States last year, according to the Finance Minister, was 24·83 per cent, and the average rate on dutiable goods coming from Great Britain was 24·74 per cent practically the same, notwithstanding the fact that Great Britain is supposed to enjoy a preference of 33⅓ per cent. The average duty on all goods, dutiable and free coming from the United States was less than 12½ per cent, while the average on goods coming from Great Britain was 18·23 per cent. This, in the old days of the Conservative government would have been seized upon with avidity by our opponents as evidence of rank discrimination against the motherland. As I said, this whole preferential tariff, lauded as it was by its promoters because of its possibilities from both a sentimental and a business standpoint, has proven a disappointment to everybody except the German exporter. The English man, taking a superficial view and not knowing that the general tariff had been increased on many articles before the preference was applied, thought he was going to be very highly advantaged; and it is only recently he has been undeceived and has found how he was hoodwinked. The Canadian consumer was led to believe that he would purchase goods at a cheaper rate under the operation of this tariff, and, as a result of sentimental considerations, would receive a real preference for his goods in the mother country. But now, since the tariff has been in operation and he has had an opportunity to attest its value, he admits, and must admit, that he pays prices as high and even higher in some instances, and that the products from our Canadian farms are admitted on exactly the same footing as are the products from every country in the world. And he is practically shut out of the German market. Now, had the right hon. First Minister pressed upon the home authority the necessity and advisability of giving us a real preference in their market and thus fulfilling his pledges to the people of Canada prior to 1896; had he, at the time of his visit, when the olive branch had been held out by the leading statesmen of Great Britain, endeavoured to secure what he promised, he would have conferred upon the people of Canada a benefit of whose advantages it would not have required days and weeks of argument to convince the people of Canada. But, unfortunately for us, the right hon. gentleman was more anxious about receiving those empty baubles and glittering titles he used to refer to so contemptuously when he was a democrat to the hilt, than about winning solid advantages for the people. He thought more of receiving Cobden medals—and, by the way, I do not think that that Cobden medal was sent back since it was shown that it was received under false pretenses. As we know, Lord Farrer said that had it been known that this preference would apply to Great Britain alone, the medal would not now glisten on the right hon. gentleman's breast. It was because it was thought that this preference was offered to the whole world that the right hon. gentleman was admitted as an honorary member of the club. When he was forced to change his law and make it apply to Great Britain alone, he did not return the Cobden medal, evidently being a thorough believer in the motto, 'What we have we'll hold.' The right hon. gentleman should have been active in looking after the interests of Canada rather than in making speeches to the people of Great Britain, in which he advised them not only that Canada would not ask for any return for the preference given in our markets, but not to make any return. Why? Because it would injure Canada? No, but because it would cause a departure from the old free trade traditions that had made Great Britain such a mighty power. It was not in looking after the interests of Canada that the right hon. gentleman said it, but in advising the statesmen of Great Britain what policy they could adopt to injuriously affect this country. It is to be hoped that on the approaching visit of the right hon. gentleman, where he has been invited to participate in the Coronation ceremonies and also to discuss questions of inter-Imperial relations, he will do better. I see that the manner of his acceptance has caused profound disappointment among the people of Great Britain. It is to be hoped that he will not repeat the error of the past, but that instead of looking after titles for himself and making those empty speeches which prove little but his own desire of saying something pleasant to the particular audience he happens to be addressing, he will do all he can to promote the interest of the country he represents.

These hon. gentlemen claim that they gave this preference to the motherland to show their loyalty, to show their attachment, and their gratitude for her assistance to us in the past. Well, Sir, I will admit that something needed to be done by a party with the record of these hon. gentlemen, a party that, in 1891, advocated a policy which, if it had been adopted, would in all probability have resulted in political union with the United States, at any rate that was the belief of their former leader, the Hon. Edward Blake, who severed his allegiance with them, and would neither lead nor follow a party that advocated such a policy. I admit that a party having done that, needed to take some steps more than ordinary to prove their loyalty and attachment to the motherland. But, Sir, if they considered it necessary to adopt this policy, and if that policy can be proved to be injurious to Canadian interests, I say as a young Canadian that it is our duty to look after ourselves, and that our loyalty should begin at home. I would call to my aid no less an authority than the Prime Minister himself, who declared, when he was advocating this policy, that John Bull himself would think all the more of a son that looked after his own interest, and he stated that we should not mix up business with sentiment. Here is what the hon. gentleman said in one of his speeches, at Brantford, according to the report of the Toronto 'Globe':

> I think England can look after her own interests and if I know John Bull at all he expects his son to follow his example and do the same, namely, to look after number one. I think he would have a contempt for a son who did not turn an honest penny.

These were the sentiments of the Prime Minister at that time. He went on to say:

> Business was business and sentiment was sentiment: but he did not believe that sentiment was business any more than business was sentiment.

Most profound logic, and worthy the approbation of his party. Now, Sir, I do not desire to discuss this question from a sectional standpoint. Some of my colleagues from the west on the Liberal side of the House have declared that the people of the west were satisfied with the action of this government on tariff matters. The member for West Assiniboia admitted as much, and the member for Saskatchewan declared they were satisfied. I wish to deny that statement emphatically. The latter gentleman declared that there were some reductions made on some small implements, and what were they? Axes, adzes, pronged forks and spades in which the farmers invest a few cents each year. It is true they reduced the duty a little on these minor articles, but the farmers do not buy them a single cent cheaper. It is possible that the importer may get them a little less, I am doubtful of that even; but the reduction would be so infinitesimal that the purchasing farmer does not reap a single cent from it. But on those larger implements such as mowers and binders in which the farmers invest thousands and thousands of dollars every year, these hon. gentlemen claim that the duty should not only be reduced, but that these implements should be placed upon the free list. Now, I have here a list of articles in which a vast amount of money is expended each year by the farming population, the list shows the imports during the last year under the general tariff, the amount of duty paid, and the number that came in under the preferential tariff:

	General Tariff.	Preferential Tariff.	Duty.
Harvesters, self-binding and others, 20 p.c..	828,118	.....	165,623 60

On several other articles in which the farmers invest a vast amount of money each year, the duty remained exactly the same as it was prior to 1896, notwithstanding that the people were told at that time that should the Liberal party come into power they would place many of those articles upon the free list, notably self binders and reapers.

The Minister of the Interior, in his speech delivered in Winnipeg in 1896, told the people of Manitoba that they were being bled white for the purpose of amassing huge fortunes for the Massey-Harris Company, and others by paying them such an outrageously high tariff duty as 20 per cent on mowers and binders, and he declared these articles should be placed upon the free list. Free coal oil was another promise they made, and it was given a miserable reduction of 1 cent a gallon. Now they neglect to point out to the people of the west that the Conservatives have proved themselves to be the true tariff reformers in respect to the duty on agricultural implements, since they cut the duty almost in two, and reduced it from 35 per cent to 20 per cent. The Minister of the Interior also stated that the Conservative government, by a system of drawbacks, were allowing these men to export their reapers and binders to Australia and sell them for $85 or $90, whereas the farmers of the North-west had to pay $140 and $150 for the same machine. But in a return I asked for in this House, I find that there has been paid out to these same manufacturers in drawbacks since the Liberal party came into power, $300,000 under the very same policy which they condemned in opposition. Certainly if it was a vicious principle prior to 1896 it ought to be equally vicious at the present time. The Minister of the Interior also told the people in Manitoba that the manufacturers of these implements were employing 9,000 hands, and he declared that if this duty were reduced—because he now claims that far from being a protective duty, it is not even a revenue tariff—if this duty were reduced these 9,000 hands would have to seek employment in the United States, and our own manufacturing establishments would be crushed out. Certainly that is good Conservative doctrine, the hon. gentlemen opposite condemned it strongly in the past. In his campaign speeches during the contest in Lisgar, the hon. gentleman harped and harped upon this matter, and I will not be surprised if, in the tariff revision next year, we shall see increased duties on agricultural implements as well. Possibly one of the reasons why the Minister of the Interior has changed his ideas regarding the duty on agricultural implements is to be found in the fact of a certain deal having gone through in which the Manitoba 'Free Press' changed hands, and the Minister of the Interior and the Massey-Harris Company were mixed up in the deal, and as a result he has had turned over to himself the leading organ of the Liberal party in the west.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the present government took great credit for having changed many of the duties from a specific to an ad valorem basis. I desire to point out that the value of many of those articles purchased by the consumer in Canada to-day is much higher than it was prior to the time before the Liberals came into power. We find it to be the case under the system of specific duties that when such duties are imposed they do not increase in proportion to the value of the article. These duties remain the same no matter how much the price may be increased to the consumer, but where the duties are placed on an ad valorem basis the consumer not only has to pay more for the goods but he has to pay more on account of the duty as well. In many of these instances where a change has been made where the price has been increased, the farmer does not realize how much more he has to pay in duty, because he is called upon to pay for an increased value as well as for an increased duty, whereas under the system of specific duties he was called upon to pay merely the increased prices of the articles that he purchased. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) gave voice to an expression which he meant to be a reproach to the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) and the Conservative party in general because they were consistent enough to advocate the one policy for twenty-five years. He stated that he might close his eyes and let his mind revert back five and twenty years. The hon. gentleman is always living in the past. No wonder he is considered to be a back number. He stated that he could imagine that he heard from the very self-same desk, from the hon. gentleman's predecessor the self-same views given expression to a quarter of a century ago, and he expressed amazement that there could be a politician or a party that could be true to a principle or a policy for the space of a quarter of a century. If he judged us by the standard of his own party he had every reason to cast that reflection upon us in his speech because during that time his party has changed its policy half a dozen times. No sooner did they meet defeat on one policy than they produced a new one, and advocated it with all the gusto of new found converts. They never had any principle, political exigencies being their guide. Instead of this being a reflection upon the policy of the Conservative party, it is a matter of very great credit to the Conservative party, and the hon. gentleman will look in vain for its parallel within the ranks of the Liberal party. Hon. gentlemen opposite have increased the expenditure, as I have already declared, upwards of $23,000,000, they have increased the taxation upwards of $11,000,000, they have increased the national debt by $16,000,000, they have bestowed upon a score of members of parliament positions of emolument under the Crown in direct opposition to their declarations in the past, they have failed to even make an attempt to obtain a mutual trade preference within the empire when the time was opportune, they have, ever since they assumed the reins of power, violated that well laid down rule of letting contracts to the highest tenderer, parcelling them out instead to political supporters in return for favours present and to come, they have increased the number of cabinet ministers by two, raising their salaries by $2,000 per annum, they have abandoned that plank in their platform calling for the reform in the Senate, and they are disposing of senatorships to those who are the largest contributors to the campaign fund. We have one member of the government preaching free trade, another member of the government preaching increased protection, another one preaching revenue tariff, and as to several others it is immaterial to them what they do preach so long as they are left on the treasury benches, all in opposition to that well known rule of constitutional government that all the members of a government are expected to be a unit in matters of public policy. They have been guilty of a violation of pledges that has been a disgrace to this country, that shocks our electorate, that has brought reproach upon the country. They have brought reproach upon our country at home and abroad. With such a record as this I think the time surely cannot be far distant when a long suffering public will refuse to longer tolerate these autocratic politicians who are more wedded to office than to principle, and though up to the present time, the hands of chastisement have been temporarily stayed, it is not at all because of any display of virtue on the part of the government, but rather from the practice of those methods that will not stand the light of day. I do not desire to go over the mass of figures that have been presented during this debate or to occupy the attention of the House repeating arguments which have been traversed much more ably by those who have preceded me, but I will simply say that it is my intention to support the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition and for this reason; the people of this country I claim, are in favour of a government that has the courage of its convictions, and they will have a declaration of policy of some kind. The present government have no declared policy on which to go before the country as to whether they are protectionists or free traders, because they are, as a matter of fact, practising protection while they are preaching free trade and even then their ranks are divided. The people of the country must be at a loss to know to whom to look. Here are the men who are the advisers of His Majesty. One-half of the cabinet are preaching one tariff while the other half of the cabinet are preaching another, while we, as Conservatives, believe, that, situated as we are alongside of the most highly protected country in the world, the United States, with 4,000 miles of a boundary line between this country and that, it is an impossibility, no matter how beautiful the theory may appear, to inaugurate a policy of free trade for this Canada of ours and that unless we have a system of protection for all the industries of this country, not merely for the manufacturing industries, but for the agricultural industry as well, we cannot hope ever to be a thriving nation. It is also true that when we state that we are in favour of moderate protection in this country that does not mean that we are going to have very high rates of duties on every article grown or manufactured in Canada. It was not the intention of the designers of the national policy that we would have certain fixed high rates of duty for all time to come, but only until such times as our industries could be placed on a footing to withstand the keen competition offered by the Americans and the keen competition of the world, when they would be able to compete with them not only in our home market, but in the foreign markets as well. There are some articles that I would object to having the duties raised upon, but there are others that if it could be shown that by an increase of duty it is necessary and desirable to keep establishments going in Canada to be operated by our own people these people to be fed by Canadian farmers, then I am in favour of adopting such rates of duty as are necessary for this purpose. But, some hon. gentlemen opposite take the stand that protection is a folly and a farce so far as the agriculturist is concerned and that it is not possible to protect him. It is true that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce has always taken this position, but surely that hon. gentleman should have taken a lesson from the 17th of September, 1878, when prior to that time, when he was Minister of Finance of Canada, he was approached by one hundred thousand farmers with a petition to parliament asking for agricultural protection, and he told them that practically they did not know what they were asking for. The result was that he met with condign punishment when his government went to the country in 1878. It is paying a poor compliment to these farmers who ask for protection to be told now that they must be so green that they will not burn. Articles that are grown on the farm can be and are being protected. Take as an illustration the protection to pork. Our opponents, when on this side of the House, when the tariff was raised on pork by the Conservative administration asserted that it would be of no benefit to the Canadian farmer. What was the result ? The quantity of American pork which came in to displace so much Canadian pork immediately shrunk in value. The importation did not cease entirely, but it greatly diminished. The market was enlarged for our Canadian farmer, and he was enabled to export a very much larger quantity of his pork than he would have been able to do but for this protection. If those hon. gentlemen who say to-day that that protection was of no value, why do they not remove the duty on pork ? What is it kept there for if it is not for protection ? If a duty of 15 cents a bushel on wheat was of no use in Conservative days, why is 12 cents a bushel imposed now ? If it is of no use as a protection to the farmers, why not remove it ? Why, Sir, the whole thing shows the absurdity of the statements made by those gentlemen when they say that the farmers cannot be benefited by protection.

For the reasons I have given, it is my intention to support the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition, which amendment will, I believe, commend itself to the intelligence of all right-minded people. We are a country of diverse interests. To-day we may not be a manufacturing country in the west, but we hope in the future to have extensive and profitable manufactures there, and then, Sir, these very same gentlemen who are now decrying protection will be just as ready to cry out in favour of protection.

Mr. L. P. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation.) It is on record that in times of old lived nations characterized by their loquacity. From the experience gained in the House of Commons, I daresay that our hon. friends opposite are decidedly Gallic in that respect.

The hon. gentlemen opposite are loud in their denunciations of the government. To their mind the administration is composed of men entertaining conflicting opinions. They lay great stress on the fact that the Liberal party do not entertain the same views on the different questions which engage our attention. I have always held that the progress and development of a country proceeded from a conflict of opinions. Even the Conservatives were sometimes divided amongst themselves, and it ill becomes them to taunt on that score the members occupying seats on this side of the House.

We are told that the Liberal party has no definite policy, that a change may occur tomorrow, and people are anxious to know what will be the nature of that change.

Let them rest assured that any change that may occur will be beneficial to the interests of this country at large. In 1896, when the Liberal party came into power, after the general elections, their policy well known to the electorate, had received the popular endorsation. Had it not been agreeable to the people, the present administration would not have been then sustained as it has been since.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) said a few moments ago that he was at a loss to understand what was going on. It is well that we should take note of that admission. It is because those gentlemen failed to understand what was going on around them that they were hurled from power, and may they live long in that blissful ignorance.

When one looks up the records of the Conservative administration, it is easily understood why they were driven from power in 1896, and why the people will long keep in office those who were called upon to replace them.

When I hear the hon. members opposite state that our country is prosperous, but that we are indebted for that prosperity to the action of Providence and to the maintenance of their policy, it reminds me of a certain dynasty. Like the Bourbons, they have learned nothing and forgotten nothing. As much can be said of the hon. members opposite.

It is true that governments cannot control the business of a country nor create prosperity ; but they can largely contribute to developing that prosperity. Thus the government of the day have greatly helped the agriculturists by patronising the cheese and butter industry, by encouraging the trade in eggs and other agricultural produce, in securing for them the markets of Great Britain, thereby causing a large increase of our trade with the mother country. Is it not true that such a result was achieved through the Department of Agriculture so ably presided over by the Hon. Mr. Fisher ?

It may be said : what good purpose can it serve, so long as there is an increase in the national debt ? In the first instance, we might retort that though we have increased the public debt, we did increase it to a smaller extent than they did, but such an answer would be inadequate ; that would only amount to an argument ad hominem.

We are also taunted with having increased the expenditure. In reply, we could point out to a corresponding increase in the surpluses. If we spent $42,000,000, it is because our revenue amounted to $46,000,000 leaving a surplus of $4,000,000, whereas under Conservative rule, when the public expenditure aggregated $38,000,000, there was a deficit of $4,000,000. Such a retort, good as it may be, would not be altogether conclusive. There is a very simple answer to be made. All those expenditures have been sanctioned by the unanimous vote of this House. Why did not they object to them ; why don't they take exception to these expenditures if they find them exorbitant ? Let them muster up courage and impugn these expenditures if they be as extravagant as represented.

Therefore it must be conceded that these expenditures will benefit the country at large. As not one single Conservative member attempts to denounce them, we have reason to infer therefrom that those expenditures are warrantable. I say it ill becomes the Tory party to take the present government to ask for their administration of public affairs ; because to offer criticism one cannot rely solely upon the increase in the public expenditure. Has not a large concern to spend more than a minor establishment has to ? Does not Canada, a commercial concern, so to speak, transact more business now-a-days than she did when the hon. members opposite had the management of public affairs ? Yes, undoubtedly. However the people will be told that there is no justification for an increase in the expenditure.

Others will say that we have collected too considerable an amount of duties. Well, if such be the case, what then would have been the result had we raised the tariff to suit the wishes of the hon. gentlemen opposite ? If, as they claim, the development of trade, in Canada, were merely due to the action of divine Providence, the trade of this country would have been equally prosperous under a higher tariff.

The hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Roche) taunted the Liberal party with having impaired the fair name of Canada. If ever the fair name of Canada was imperilled, the hon. member for Marquette should know that it was on account of the numerous scandals by which the government of his friends became famous, and on no other account.

Our trade, Sir, has increased by leaps and bounds, especially our trade with England, and it would be idle to deny that such a result was brought about by the preferential tariff established by the present government. I know that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and the Conservative members in this House have stated that nothing could justify the maintenance of that tariff. First, it seems to me that the conditions have not changed since 1898, when that tariff was first introduced, and it rests upon the hon. member for Labelle, who at that time approved that measure and even delivered a very eloquent speech in its behalf, to show that a change has occurred which justifies the stand he now takes. So far, he has not done so.

The hon. member for Marquette said that the preferential tariff could not benefit England. However, a mere perusal of the English newspapers and of the speeches of public men in Great Britain would convince him that the preferential tariff was looked upon as a gracious act on the part of Canada. Moreover, who will deny that England, a purely industrial country, is largely benefited by the lowering of our tariff ? Besides, that preferential tariff is in accordance with the policy of the Liberal party.

My hon. friends opposite, in face of a prosperous condition of affairs which cannot be imputed to the sole intervention of Providence, say everywhere on the public platforms : But, you have cheated us out of our policy ! According to them prosperity was brought on by Providence and by the policy of the Conservative party. But then, if the policy of the Conservative party is responsible for the present prosperous condition of affairs, I shall ask my hon. friends : why do they move an amendment ? Indeed, the motion presented by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) states that the operation of the present tariff is unsatisfactory and detrimental to Canada. Therefore it cannot be their policy that we have propounded. There is no way out of it.

We did not cheat them out of their policy. We have adopted that policy to which we were pledged.

The fiscal platform of the Liberal party was propounded as early as 1893, when we pledged ourselves to a fair policy in everything; we promised to consult all those concerned, and to reconcile all the interests at stake—a very difficult thing to achieve. The east favours a certain policy, while in the west, where there are no manufactures, people are differently inclined. So the government has to blend together these various interests according to the requirements of the case, and of the times. This the government did after conferring with those concerned; all advantages were equitably balanced without a single interest being sacrificed. That is the reason why before framing a tariff the government conferred with the manufacturers, without fearing the sarcasm of the Conservative party. Should the tariff be readjusted next year, the same process will be adhered to by the administration, without any preconcerted plan or unalterable principle. Nothing will be decided that is not according to the best interests of Canada, and then only after having heard all the interested parties. Is it not a wise policy that can compare favourably with the extravagant statements of the opposition as voiced in the amendment offered to the House?

Just one word about the preferential tariff. It is said that the English markets are thrown open to all nations, that every country is allowed to trade freely with Great Britain, and that there is no need of a preference. It is said that England, though her markets are open to our wares, does not intend thereby to confer a favour upon us, for she acts in the same way towards other nations. Should we be grateful only when we know what motives prompted our benefactors? If any one saved my life, even if it were not out of pure benevolence, am I not bound to be grateful just the same? For my part, I think it is fair and just that we should give a preference to England, for we are at liberty to sell our goods in that country without being asked and without giving anything in return. English goods have to pay a duty of 20 per cent, when imported into Canada; our wares have nothing to pay in England; nevertheless, hon. gentlemen opposite are not pleased.

In reply to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), who stated during the debate that England deserved no favours at our hands, because she did not take advantage of the Bulwer-Clayton treaty, and surrendered our interests in the Alaskan question, I will say that this is a very simple matter. England concluded that treaty for her own sake; Canada never was, and is not yet, interested in it. Therefore, Great Britain could give up every privilege secured by that treaty without exacting in return any favours for Canada. We have no cause to complain on that score. Had she been willing, or had she thought it possible, England could have secured advantages for us, but can we reproach her for not having done so? It should not be said that Canada was sacrificed. I own that it would have been better for us had she exacted certain privileges for Canada; however, can we reproach her for having thought that charity begins at home, when the question was the abrogation of a treaty in which alone she was interested. Besides, how can we pass judgment, not knowing all the circumstances of the case?

The hon. member for Labelle taunted the government for having disallowed the statute respecting Chinese and Japanese immigrants, passed by the legislative assembly of British Columbia. I entirely differ from him. The British empire had an interest in that problem. The matter could not be settled by the provincial legislature. All international matters are within the scope of the imperial authorities interested in the question of the treatment of aliens. This was a matter coming under international law. The intervention of the imperial government was therefore fully justified. Through the British authorities our treaties are negotiated, and Great Britain also acts as a go-between in all our negotiations with foreign countries. Who will dare stand up and say that England had no right to suggest to the federal authorities a policy consistent with imperial interests? The mere mention of these circumstances will show that the Imperial parliament was justified in requesting the Canadian authorities to disallow that law respecting naturalization? Even according to our constitutional laws, naturalization is a matter within the sole control of the federal parliament here. The British Columbia statute rendered naturalization impossible, and I contend that the federal legislature alone could legislate upon the matter.

Mr. F. D. MONK (Jacques Cartier). (Translation.) Will my hon. friend allow me to say that it was a statute respecting emigration; that it did not deal with naturalization?

Mr. DEMERS. (Translation.) Granted; but I intended to show that for one to become a British subject, for instance, it is necessary to reside in a province during three years, and that naturalization was within the exclusive control of the federal parliament.

My hon. friend from Labelle then undertook to establish that, after all, Canada had constantly been exploited by England, without ever receiving anything in return. Such was the purport of his speech. Our forefathers fought for England as early as 1775. But it would not be wise to think that, in 1775, they fought for the sake of Great Britain alone. They took up arms for their own sake as well as for England's.

By referring to the address of the Americans to the British people on the 5th September, 1774, it will be seen that the war between the mother country and the American colonies was a war in which we were concerned. Let us see how the Americans in that address stated the grievances which brought on the conflict :

And by another Act the Dominion of Canada is to be so extended, modelled, and governed, as that by being disunited from us, detached from our interests, by civil as well as religious prejudices, that by their numbers daily swelling with Catholic emigrants from Europe, and by their devotion to administration, so friendly to their religion, they might become formidable to us, and on occasions, be fit instruments in the hands of power, to reduce the ancient free protestant colonies to the true state of slavery with themselves. . . . . Now can we suppress our astonishment, that a British parliament should ever consent to establish in that country a religion that has deluged our island in blood, and dispersed impiety, bigotry, persecutions, murder and rebellion through every part of the world.

Such was one of the reasons which prompted the American colonists to warn Great Britain that they would shake off her yoke if she did not listen to their petition. Her refusal to accede to their petition was one of the causes of the American revolution. Now, in 1775, when Canada took part in that war, she was almost exclusively inhabited by men of our own race and blood. Therefore, when we took part in that war, it was not only for Great Britain that we fought, but we fought also in defence of our own rights.

It was an act of justice on our part to have given a preference to England, and it was also an act of justice on our part to have sent troops in aid of the mother country, out of gratitude also for the benefits she had conferred on us. Great Britain rendered us justice, in 1867, when she gave us the constitution guaranteeing the rights of the French Canadians. Lord Carnarvon, when moving in the British parliament the adoption of that constitution, said that he wished thereby to confirm the treaty entered into by Great Britain at the capitulation of Montreal, and that it was for that purpose that this constitution was granted to Canada. As I said, our rights were guaranteed by that constitution. We, French Canadians, Mr. Speaker, are the most interested in maintaining British connection. Our choice is between British connection and annexation to the United States. There is no other alternative ; and between the two countries, it is no difficult matter to make a choice.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) laughs ; he thinks, no doubt, that our participation in the wars of the empire is a new departure—something unheard of before. Allow me, Sir, to call attention to some utterances of the hon. gentleman, at Ste. Rose, on the 8th January, as reported by Le Journal :

Did you ever hear of Canada participating in the wars of the Empire, before the coming into power of Mr. Laurier, never. How we came to take part in the South African war, is easily explained. In 1897, before the Transvaal war had broken out, Mr. Laurier went over to England. A few days later, at a banquet in honour of the representatives from the colonies, he delivered a speech in which he pledged his word to the mother country that, should a war break out, let the beacon-lights shine on the heights, let the sound of the bugles be heard and Canada would be ready to contribute soldiers and money.

On the 12th January, at a meeting held at the Bonsecours market, during the contest in the electoral division of St. James, Montreal, the hon. gentleman delivered a speech, which was reported by La Presse, in its issue of the 13th, as follows :—

The Conservative leader explained his attitude on the question of the contingents. The question, he said, arose out of Mr. Laurier's famous resolution, approving of the principle of the South African War. But it goes further back ; it originated in Mr. Laurier's visits to England, at the jubilee of the Queen, when, at the banquet of London, he offered soldiers and money to the mother-country. Canada was bound by that solemn pledge, and when the time came when it should be redeemed, I consider that the honour of the country was pledged, and that it was our duty to stand by the word of the first Minister. That is the reason why Parliament voted without a dissentient voice in favour of the sending of the first contingent. As to Mr. Bourassa's motion, Mr. Monk said that he had not voted in favour of it, because it was only academic.

The hon. gentleman is like the Bourbons, with this difference, that the Bourbons have learned nothing and forgotten nothing ; whereas the hon. gentleman has learned a great many things and has also forgotten many things.

I do not know to what school of thought my hon. friend belongs. Does he belong to the school of Sir John Macdonald, the leader of the great Conservative party, whose words were received with the greatest respect by the hon. gentlemen opposite ? Sir John had the support of all the civil authorities in the province of Quebec, and it is important that we should know what was the opinion of that statesman, who moulded to a great extent the destinies of his party.

As early as 1865, during the debates on confederation, when the new constitution was being discussed which Canada was going to adopt, the question of our participation in the wars of the empire came up for discussion, and Sir John Macdonald said:

And England will have this advantage, that, though at war with all the rest of the world, she will be able to look to the subordinate nations in alliance with her, and owing allegiance to the same Sovereign who will assist in enabling her again to meet the whole world in arms, as she has done before.

If the hon. gentleman is no admirer of Sir John Macdonald, I am sure he must be an admirer of Sir George Cartier. Now, on April 26, 1865, when the question of confederation was being debated, Sir George E. Cartier, in a speech delivered at a banquet in London, said :

> We want to adopt it (the federal constitution), not only in order that our prosperity and our strength, may be increased, but also that we may be enabled to participate in a more efficacious way in the defence of the British Empire.

So, it cannot be said that in 1897 the right hon. Prime Minister did take any new pledge, since Canada was already committed to that policy. What the present government did was merely to carry out the pledge taken in 1865.

Further on, referring to the future, Cartier said :

> We do not wish to become independent and still less do we wish to be annexed to the United States. The idea is abhorrent to us.

We have here in a nutshell the policy of the present government. We have here the very terms of the pledge referred to by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier ; and when he stands up and says : Did you ever hear before of Canada having taken part in the defence of the empire ? he no doubt forgets that, in 1865, Cartier said : 'Give us a constitution, so that we may be enabled to participate in a more efficacious way in the defence of the empire.'

Perhaps my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier belongs to another school of thought. There is the school of Ultramontanism, the ultra-conservative school and the liberal-conservative school. That latter school of thought had for its chief exponent a man of most brilliant achievements, to whom we never did refuse our admiration, though we could not follow him—the Hon. J. A. Chapleau. On January 8, 1880, that gentleman, who was conversant with the history of the Canadian confederation, spoke as follows :—

> All that Canada asks is that she may be at liberty to contribute to the defence of the empire, should the empire be attacked, and that the empire should defend her, were Canada to be attacked.

It stands to reason that if we want the empire to protect and defend us, it is our duty to offer England our assistance and to stand by her in her hour of distress. Have we not, from our very boyhood, been told that Canadians boasted of being the happiest people upon earth, living as they did under the protection of the British flag ? But as to coming to the assistance of Great Britain, not a word.

I have referred to these facts, to show the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, that if he is now under the leadership of the hon. member for Labelle, he has, on the occasion mentioned, put a question which he should never have put. As a matter of fact, the answer to that question was given in 1865, during the debates on confederation. On this point, I think the position assumed by the people of the province of Quebec is similar to that taken by the present government. The attitude of the government on this question is one that commends itself to all thoughtful men, to all business men. What is, after all, imperialism, about which we hear so much nowadays, and which is used as a bugbear to frighten people out of their wits ? Imperialism, if I understand it aright, might be taken to mean an agreement among all the members of the British family. Is there anything else in imperialism ? We are all British subjects, but if by imperialism we are to understand an agreement or a manifestation of good will among all members of the British family, then I say that I am an imperialist.

But imperialism must not be confounded with federalism. We Canadians may, of our own free will, offer help to the mother country, without changing our constitution. England has had wars to wage in the past, and only once did we participate in those wars. Therefore, I hold as fallacious any doctrine implying that we must never take part in imperial wars, as also any doctrine implying that we should always fight the battles of the empire. We should not commit ourselves to any policy in that respect, and on that ground all men of good will in Canada—I do not speak here, of extremists —should be able to meet. On that ground, all sections of the community, French, English, Scotch and Irish, should be able to join hands. Such are also the views of the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal, a most important body, composed of the best representatives of the trade of Montreal ; men who know the value of money, as well as the value of the blood of their fellow-countrymen. In a report, dated 14th March, 1900, drawn up by a committee of the Chamber of Commerce, appointed to study and inquire into the several questions that were to come up for discussion before the congress in London, in June of the same year, we read as follows :

> Shall Canada, moreover, take part in all the Imperial wars and fight all the battles of the empire ? This Chamber is of opinion that Canada is not bound to do so.
>
> Should Canada contribute to the defence of the empire, and fight the battles of England, she would then be actuated by a lofty feeling which would be justified according to such cases of emergency, right, justice and reasoned gratitude as might occur, but without being coerced into doing so by any statute. Such are the views of this Chamber.

Here we have an adequate expression of sound public opinion in the province of Quebec, on the question of our participation in the wars of the empire.

As to imperial federation, as I said a little while ago, I think it would end disastrously to the country. The government having laid down so clearly the lines of their policy on that question, there is no reason to fear that the coming conference of London will be fraught with such dangers as some people think it may invite.

As to the question of colonial representation, when it came up for discussion in the British parliament, Mr. Blake, on a motion of Mr. Sinclair, said: 'Why should the colonies be represented here, were it not for the purpose of being taxed?' In these few words, Mr. Blake spoke the whole truth.

I consider that imperialism would result in the downfall of the empire. For, when our people will have to increase their burdens, to share in the expenditure of England's wars, they will not hesitate, like the other colonies, to sever the colonial tie. When, prior to the war with the United States, Lord North tried to bring about the unity of the empire by drawing closer the ties which bound the colonies to the mother country, what was the result? The result was that England lost her best American colonies.

To sum up, I may say that the province of Quebec considers that our participation in the present war was but an act of justice on the part of Canada towards Great Britain, and that for us, French Canadians, it was an act of gratitude, a manifestation of good-will towards the imperial government.

We are proud to be British subjects because of the political rights conferred by that title, and there is no man among us who, when he goes abroad, does not feel happy to say, like the Roman of old: 'I am a British subject.' However, that feeling is by no means inconsistent with our love for our old mother country.

I heard an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House express his surprise at the fact that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) had stated in Paris that we were French, and that we would remain French. On that occasion, the hon. minister only voiced the feeling entertained by all his fellow-countrymen of French extraction. Is it not true that our fellow-countrymen, the Irish, are proud to call themselves Irish, loyal as they are to the British Crown? So, we glory in our French extraction, and we are and shall always be proud to say that we will remain French, loyal subjects of Great Britain as we are. Why should people try to do away with our race by a process of assimilation? In Canada are to be found the descendants of the strongest races which now sway the world. Here are to be found Englishmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen, Germans and Frenchmen, all of them called upon to develop this immense country, and to display their intelligence in the construction of our great public works, in the development and the extension of our industries, in the cultivation of letters, sciences and arts. Let the different elements try to outstrip each other in those fields of human activity, avoiding all causes of friction, so that we may grow up and prosper alongside the great neighbouring republic.

As to the province of Quebec, I make bold to say that so long as we enjoy the same sum of protection as we are now enjoying under the British flag, so long as our rights are respected, none among us will ever dream of annexation to the American republic. I am confident that Canada will remain loyal to Great Britain, and that, as Sir Etienne P. Taché said: 'The last gun in defence of the British flag on this continent will be fired by a French Canadian. As the future grows out of the past, our past conduct is a guarantee of our future conduct.

So long as Great Britain respects that constitution under the ægis of which we have been enabled to live in freedom, and to preserve the sacred inheritance of our laws, our language and our religion, England may depend upon it that we shall always be ready to assist her, and to stand by her. So long as the other provinces deal fairly with the province of Quebec, so long as they keep their hands off the constitution, every French Canadian, loyal as he is to his province, will place the love of Canada above all the rest.

Mr. A. A. C. LARIVIERE. (Provencher). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I have to congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Demers), because he has succeeded in turning into a patriotic speech what was, at the outset, but a mere array of figures. He began by referring to the changes brought about by the elections of 1896, a result which he attributes to the misdeeds of the former government, who had to bow to the popular verdict, after those elections. I think the least that will be said about what transpired during that gigantic struggle, at a time when the Conservative government, prompted by a most noble feeling, and championing the cause of a downtrodden people, had lost their prestige with an ill-informed electorate, whereas their opponents did not hesitate to make political capital out of that question; the least that will be said about those elections, the better it will be for the honour of their party.

My hon. friend from St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers) undertook to call in question the action of Divine Providence in bringing about the prosperity which Canada is now enjoying and he gave the fiscal policy of his party credit for that prosperity. As I did not rise in my place in this House to vindicate Providence, I enter my protest against that kind of spoliation the hon. member is guilty of, when he denies Providence all credit for the great prosperity which prevails not only in this country but throughout the world.

Let my hon. friend allow me at least to tell him that he might have adduced some proofs in support of his contention. He should have substantiated his statement that the prosperity we are enjoying was due to the action of the government. Now, I should like to know what changes the government have made in their fiscal policy to bring about such a result. I do not know of any. True, they have, a few years ago, readjusted their tariff to a certain extent; but those changes amount to so little that it is not reasonable to contend that the prosperity we are now enjoying has resulted from such changes. On the other hand, if we take into consideration the course pursued by the government as to their past pledges, we have to reach the conclusion that they have not redeemed their pledges. Formerly, the country was suffering from a commercial depression; and we had our lean years, compared with the fat years we are now enjoying. That the Liberal party, with the political platform adopted by them in 1893, can now claim that the prosperous state of the country is the outcome of the enforcement of the principles formulated in that platform, is more than I can understand.

If we take the different articles of that creed—and I may say that, not unlike other creeds, it ought to be revised from time to time—we shall find that the first article stated that it was high time for a change in the fiscal policy of the country. They denounced the Conservative government, because their policy, as they said, was one of protection to our industries and to all classes of the community. The hon. gentlemen said: It shall be the duty of the next government, when coming into power, to adopt as their fiscal policy a revenue tariff, for the efficient management of public affairs. The question is, whether the hon. gentlemen opposite have carried out that first article of the programme framed by them in 1893. To show that the very opposite was the case, it will suffice to see what was our public debt in 1896, as compared with what it is now. In 1896, the public debt was $258,497,432,77. In 1901, the last fiscal year officially accounted for, that debt had reached $268,480,003.69, or an increase of $9,982,570.92.

Now, my hon. friend from St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers) told us, this evening, that the present government always had surpluses, and that, if they had spent forty millions, it was because they had forty millions to spend. But how can it be claimed that the government has had a surplus every year since their advent to power, when, as a matter of fact, the public debt has been increased by over two million dollars a year, and to such an extent that it is now ten million dollars larger than it was in 1896? And did not the hon. Minister of Finance tell us on the floor of this House, the other day, that, next year, the public debt would be increased by six million dollars? That is a larger increase than has ever taken place under Conservative rule, if we except the period during which was being built the Canadian Pacific Railway. Never was such a result reached before. Now, we are paying $10,807,955 interest on the public debt, or $305,525 more than was the case in 1896. How, then, can hon. gentlemen opposite give this government credit for being more economical in the expenditure of public moneys than were their predecessors in office?

The public revenue is much more considerable now than it was in 1896, and this means that the rate of taxation has increased. From 1892 to 1896, for the five years which have elapsed between those two dates, the total revenue was $138,106,054, or an average of $27,621,211.

From 1897 to 1901, for the first five years under Liberal rule, the revenue was $170,-168,924, or an increase of $34,033,785, Therefore, we find that for those five years the average increase was $6,412,574.

In the face of such an increased revenue, the expenditure was considerably increased. Instead of increasing their expenditure, they should have applied those surpluses to reducing the public debt. But the reverse was the case, and notwithstanding that, from 1892 to 1896, the total expenditure was $210,708,819, or, on an average, $42,141,764, on the other hand, the expenditure from 1897 to 1901, during the first five years under Liberal rule, was $250,550,005, or, on an average, $50,110,001, or about eight million dollars a year. So, as will be seen, Mr. Speaker, the surpluses referred to by my hon. friend from St. John and Iberville are quite ephemeral, as they have already vanished, and as the public debt itself has been increased to the same extent.

I now come to the second article of the political creed of 1893. The hon. gentlemen pledged their word to the people that, upon their coming into power, they would give us reciprocity with the United States. They said: 'Within six months from our advent to power, by a scratch of the pen, a treaty of reciprocity will be put in force between Canada and the United States. As to you, Conservatives, you have so unfairly treated the citizens of the neighbouring republic that you cannot expect to come to an understanding with them; but, as to us Liberals, it is quite another matter: we have always treated them so liberally—and heaven knows if our good friends, the Liberals, have ever been on friendly terms with the Americans—that should we ever come into office, we shall be able to make a good treaty with the United States.'

Mr. F. D. MONK. (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. (Translation.) What happened? The Liberals made several attempts, but they relied too much upon the friendship of the Americans. They had fancied that they would be received with open arms. A joint commission was appointed. We all know how things have turned out. The president of the commission died in the attempa ; another member, the most distinguished representative on the American side, is also gone to his reward, the commission has discontinued sitting, and the question is now whether they are going to wait till all the other members have joined the majority, before calling another meeting of the commission. In short, they have finally come to the conclusion—and we have the admission made the other day by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to that effect—that the question was no longer a live issue. They have given up all hopes of ever having a treaty with the United States. What the hon. member for North Norfolk is now advocating is a policy of reprisals. He said : Let us endeavour to come to an understanding with our neighbours ; let us try to induce them to bring down their tariff to the level of our own tariff, and should they decline to do so, we shall have no other expedient left but to raise our tariff to the level of their own. Such is the policy suggested by one of the most eminent members of the commission, who was formerly so conspicuous for his friendship towards the Americans, that he was styled the hon. member from the United States.

The third article of the celebrated programme of 1893 provided for a reduction in the expenditure, and a policy of retrenchment ; but as I have just shown, that article remained a dead letter ; their pledges as to the reduction in the expenditure was never redeemed ; on the contrary, we shall be called upon to vote subsidies double those voted prior to 1896.

The fourth article referred to the enormity of the public debt. This is another article of their creed to which our friends, the Liberals, have proved false. As a matter of fact, the public debt is increasing in an alarming ratio, and the hon. Minister of Finance told us the other day that he would have to borrow six millions to meet the most pressing requirements.

The fifth article of the Liberal creed advocated the necessity of investigating the management of public affairs. We all know the result of the investigations held by the hon. gentlemen opposite. It is on record that during last parliament we asked for investigations, and that nothing was done in that direction. During this session, when we insisted in a committee of this House, that a substantial witness should be called, the government would not comply with our request. Now, in article 5 of the programme of 1893, in connection with investigations into the administration of public affairs, it is expressly stated that such investigations are a necessity.

In article 6, it is stated that the public domain should be preserved for the settlers. Well, Sir, there have perhaps been more grants made, in aid of the construction of railways, since the present government has come into power than at any time under the Conservative government. Have they preserved the public domain for the settlers ? Far from it, and things have come to such a pass that there are very few lands available for settlement now. As a matter of fact, immigrants, when they come to settle down in this country, have to apply to the railway companies for lands. Article 8 refers to the redistribution of seats, an operation which is known under the name of gerrymander, so as to describe a redistribution made with a view to favouring one party to the prejudice of the other party. The Liberals gave the solemn pledge that they would not resort to a gerrymander. We shall see, next session, to what an extent the government is going to redeem that pledge.

Article 9 is in reference to the reform of the Senate. How the government have made their appointments to the Senate is a matter of public notoriety. It is well known that those very Senators—whom hon. gentlemen opposite had formerly delighted in calling mischievous old men—have been replaced in the Upper House by young men who, for the most part, are quite harmless. At the present time they think they are about to have a majority in the Senate, and everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds ; so that nothing is heard about Senate reform.

Article 10 relates to the plebiscite and prohibition. That plebiscite has cost the country a large sum of money, without having given us any practical results worth mentioning. And now the provinces are endeavouring to get rid of the prohibition issue. The province of Manitoba has just taken the lead in the matter, and the province of Ontario is preparing to follow in the footsteps of the former ; but as to the federal government, they have done nothing so far, besides incurring an expenditure of $200,000 to find out that there were in the country teetotallers unwilling to vote in favour of a prohibitive legislation.

I do not intend to follow my hon. friend from St. John and Iberville when he deems it his duty to lecture the hon. member for Labelle. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) almost occupies the next seat to his ; they both belong to the same party, and the differences which may crop up between them are family matters. Now, in family matters no stranger should venture to interfere. Therefore, I shall refrain from offering any comments upon the opinions expressed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Demers) as to the position taken by his colleague. Besides, I might possibly entertain the same views as the hon. gentleman on certain points, while as to others I might differ from him. There is this, however, to remark, that when referring to imperialism, he told us in the same breath that there should not be too much of it, and that there should be enough of it. That means, no doubt, that my hon. friend is on the fence, and that he is ready to jump over to whichever side will prove the most suitable to him and to his political party.

My hon. frind (Mr. Demers) also told us that the discussion now raging in some newspapers on the question of imperialism was merely got up to frighten the people. But I should like to know who first started the debate ; for it is by no means of recent growth. That discussion has long been raging throughout the country, and I remember perfectly well that a few years ago the Liberal papers used to upbraid the hon. Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte) because he was vice-president of the Imperialist League of Toronto. The hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Tarte) was a Conservative at the time, and he was denounced by the Liberal papers. The Liberal press, besides, always held that the tendencies of the Conservative party were imperialistic.

Let us now come to the question of the contingents. We are told to-day that the government is denounced by such or such a paper, or by certain political men, for having sent contingents to South Africa in defence of the empire. Who was it that first started agitating the public mind about that question ? Let us go back to the elections of 1896. The Liberals then went about the country telling the people that the Conservative government had secured from the House an appropriation of one million dollars to buy rifles and guns, and that they meant to send our children to South Africa to be butchered there. I could name some hon. gentlemen who now occupy seats in this House and who were the first to resort to such means to bring about the defeat of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec. Now, if at the present time Conservative politicians denounce the government for their double game on that question, it is to show how inconsistent the Liberals are, since they approve to-day of the very same thing which they blamed us for yesterday. Not that we mean to censure the government for their action in this matter, but we mean to show that the government has pursued a double-faced policy in this respect. When they began agitating the question of sending out soldiers to South Africa, the hon. gentlemen told us : That cannot be done, for it is against the law. And 'La Patrie,' of Montreal, plainly told us that it would never be done.

A great deal has been said, during this debate, about the tariff, and my hon. friend from St. John and Iberville ventured to give some statistics on the matter. Before resuming my seat, I may be allowed to say a few words on the same subject.

I entirely approve of the motion made by the hon. leader of the opposition, and here is the ground on which I think it is worthy of approval : it is not stated in the motion that, to our mind, the tariff is not high enough in a general way, but that it is not so framed as to secure an adequate protection to all, and so as to distribute the taxes equally among all classes of the community. In fact, the question is not merely how to protect and promote the interests of the various industries of this country, but to extend also protection to other important classes of the community ; and one of the classes which it is most essential to protect is the farming community.

It was with a view to fostering the interests of that class, that the Conservative government, in 1894, reduced the tariff on agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent. It is true that the present government did not interfere with that portion of the tariff, that is to say, they did neither reduce nor increase the rate of 20 per 100 ; but they have succeeded, indirectly, in increasing the valuation of articles coming from the United States, so as to increase the tariff, and this, to such a point that, instead of having a rate of 20 per 100, farmers have to pay 25 per 100 on all agricultural implements coming from the United States, owing to the appraisement made by the government officials, under a peremptory order. Therefore, the tariff has practically been increased in this respect. That this is the case is known by the fact that, when one of my colleagues on this side of the House asked the hon. Minister of Customs for the production of the schedule of valuation, the minister refused to produce it, on the plea that it was a confidential paper, which could not properly be made public. This goes to show that the rate has been increased on agricultural implements.

There is something more, and the difference now existing between the American tariff and the Canadian tariff is detrimental to the farming community. So, wheat in the United States is taxed 25 cents a bushel, while here it pays a duty of 12 cents a bushel. Last year only, we imported from the United States one million dollars' worth of oats. This quantity of oats could have been raised here by our farmers, and we have imported it from the United States, having had to pay a duty of 10 cents, notwithstanding that the United States do not buy any from us.

Barley has to pay a duty of 30 cents in the United States, while it pays only 12 cents a bushel here. Our imports of barley reach the sum of thirty thousand dollars. On peas there is a duty of 40 cents a bushel in the United States, while here it is only 10 cents. Last year we imported fifteen thousand dollars' worth of peas. Hay has to pay $4 a ton, while we impose but a duty of $2 on the hay imported from the United States. There is a duty of 25 cents a bushel on potatoes in the United States ; here it is only 15 cents. Our imports of potatoes from the United States last year were $90,000. It is so much agricultural produce that our farmers do not sell in the country, and it shows how they are made to suffer under the odious tariff which the government refuses to change or to alter.

I could single out a great many other farm products, but to go through the whole list would take too long. In short, in 1900 we have bought from the United States $25,700,000 worth of farm produce and cattle. That money, which went into the pockets of the Americans for articles which could have been raised here, we should have kept it, had we had a tariff so framed as to protect us from the competition of the United States.

During the same year, we imported manufactured articles from the United States to the extent of $65,000,000. And while we were importing $25,700,000 worth of agricultural products from the United States, the Americans only bought from us similar articles to the value of about $8,000,000, leaving a difference in their favour of $17,000,000, to the great detriment of our farming community.

Let us now see how we fared as to our exports of butter, cheese, eggs, lard and meat. Our imports from the United States amounted to $2,257,183, while they bought from us only to the extent of $116,353 worth of those articles.

That is the way, Sir, that the interests of our farming community are hurt by the American trade. While our manufacturers are enjoying the protection of a tariff, readjusted with more or less care, our farmers have no protection at all. The manufacturing cities go to the United States for their supply of farm produce, to the detriment of our own farmers.

By the motion which we have offered in amendment to that of the hon. Minister of Finance, we declare that the tariff now in force is ill readjusted and does not adequately meet the requirements of the country; that it needs to be revised, so as to give a more efficacious protection to the working classes, and mainly to the farming community.

I say that the policy which is formulated in the amendment now before the House is the true national policy, and to borrow the words used by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), that policy means: Canada for the Canadians. Such is the policy that we wish to see adopted and carried out.

My hon. friend from St. John and Iberville—to return once more to his statements, which have engrossed my attention to a pretty large extent so far—referred in quite sentimental terms to our duty to Great Britain, without entering into the consideration of business matters. As to that, I may say that my views quite coincide with his; but when it comes to the discussion of our commercial relations, I no longer side with him. To talk about protection and of what we owe to England is one thing, and to discuss business matters is quite another matter. After all, business is business.

The hon. gentleman told us that it was our duty to give British goods a preferential treatment; that we owed it to Great Britain to give her that mark of sympathy, on account of the many compensations we had already received, but I cannot see eye to eye with him on that point. As I said, business is business, and politics is politics. Out of the 168,900 tons of butter imported into Great Britain in 1900, Canada has supplied but 12,000 tons. It cannot be said that our standing on the British markets has been improved by the preferential policy. In 1901 Great Britain bought from us but 7,500 tons of butter; notwithstanding the fact that we have an output of 130,000 tons in this country.

Cheese ranks among our most valuable products, and is consequently deserving of every protection at our hands. Whatever the hon. gentleman may say to the contrary, if that industry has developed in such a wonderful way in Canada, the credit for it cannot be claimed by the present government, as they have only carried out the work undertaken by the old government, and followed in the footsteps of their predecessors. Nor can it be said that they have dogged the footsteps of the old government, because the late administration had provided for the establishment of a fast steamship service, from which service, had it been maintained, would have accrued most substantial advantages to this country. Far from doing that, the present government, with one scratch of the pen, did set aside the contract which had been signed, saying: We can do better than that, and we are going to draw up another contract. It is on record how many troubles our lamented colleague, Mr. Dobell, did experience with his bottle-nosed ships. At the present time, we stand exactly in the same position as we stood in 1896. We have no system of fast Atlantic service yet, despite the fact that from every chamber of commerce, and from every railway corporation, are coming loud appeals for the organisation of this Atlantic service.

Hon. gentlemen opposite claim credit for all the development and progress realized by the country within the last few years, and they refuse to allow any share of it to Divine Providence. That the government cannot rightly claim credit for the prosperity which the country is now enjoying, goes without saying.

What we press upon the attention of the government is the desirability of taking under their most serious consideration the question of an adequate protection to be given to the farming community and to the manufacturing classes. What we press again upon their attention is this, that they should have a well defined policy; for, of all things that contribute to expose trade to disturbances and to paralyse industry, the worst of all is uncertainty as to the features of the fiscal policy of the country.

The sooner the government will have adopted some well defined course of action, and allayed the anxiety of business men who are awaiting the action of the government, the better it will be for the country at large. And as prosperity and depression come by cycles ; as, in the course of time, the lean years are wont to come after the fat years, I hope that the government, being mindful of the future, will give us a well defined and fixed policy, so framed as to afford protection to our manufacturing classes, and mainly to the farming community, which is the bone and sinews of the country, and deserving of every encouragement, both at the hands of the government and of this House. Let us, therefore, join hands to make of this Canada of ours a prosperous country and one in which all will feel happy to dwell.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney A. Fisher). Mr. Speaker, in view of the lateness of the hour, I will not attempt to-night to address to the House the few remarks which I have to make on this question. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Minister of Finance, House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, April 4, 1902.

The Speaker took the Chair at Three o'clock.

IRREGULAR PETITIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. In regard to petitions Nos. 1 to 42, asking aid for the construction of the Montreal bridge, as they involve the expenditure of public money, and in addition as petition marked 41 has not, as required by rule 85, three signatures attached to the prayer, they are out of order. The same thing applies to petitions Nos. 43 and 44 which ask a sum of money to be expended for a harbour of refuge on the Bay of Fundy. These two petitions asking for the construction of that harbour also involve an expenditure of public money and are therefore out of order. The only petition which is in order therefore, is the first one.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 93) respecting the Hudson's Bay and North-west Railway Company.—Mr. Oliver.

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—Mr. Barker.

Bill (No. 95) to incorporate the Penny Bank.—Mr. Osler.

Bill (No. 96) to incorporate the Manitoba and Keewatin Railway Company.—Mr. McCreary.

Bill (No. 97) to incorporate the Dominion Railway and Power Company.—Mr. Cowan.

Bill (No. 98) to incorporate the Montreal Subway Company.—Mr. McCarthy.

Bill (No. 99) respecting the Montreal and Southern Counties Railway Company.—Mr. Demers (St. John and Iberville).

Bill (No. 100) to incorporate the Toronto and Niagara Power Company.—Mr. Campbell.

Bill (No. 101) to incorporate the Nepigon Railway Company.—Mr. Campbell.

Bill (No. 102) to incorporate the Gaspé and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Talbot.

Bill (No. 103) respecting the Lake Champlain and St. Lawrence Ship Canal Company.—Mr. Malouin.

TREATY RESPECTING THE PRESERVATION OF INDUSTRIAL PROPERTIES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Halifax). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to mention to my right hon. friend that I observe a press despatch from Washington yesterday in these terms :

> Washington, April 2, 1902. Secretary Hay and Mr. Raikes, secretary of the British embassy today signed a treaty extending to the British colonies the provisions of the original treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the preservation of industrial properties.

There was some such treaty more particularly with regard to trade marks in 1877; subsequently a treaty between France and Spain and other nations to which the United States and Great Britain also became parties at a later date. I understood that these two conventions already applied to the British colonies. I would like to know whether my right hon. friend has any information on the subject which he would like to give to the House ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The government has no information whatever upon the subject, but of course its attention has been called to the despatch quoted by my hon. friend, and we have asked, and at this moment are expecting information with regard to it. Without having received any such information, I am quite sure of one thing: That whatever treaty has been concluded by Great Britain with the United States, would not ipso facto apply to the colonies, but that the colonies will be left to decide for themselves whether or not they shall be parties to that agreement whatever it may be.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney A. Fisher). Mr. Speaker. At the hour at which I moved the adjournment of the debate last night, it seemed inadvisable to ask the House to listen then to the remarks which I feel it incumbent upon me to make in this debate. I would not have cared to enter into a discussion of the public questions of the day at this time, had it not been for some statements which have been made by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House in regard to two or three matters in which I am somewhat personally concerned, and in which I have been taking considerable interest during the present administration. Hon. gentlemen opposite have made some statements in this debate which I cannot help characterizing as not only reckless but rash, inasmuch as they have shown thereby the lack of study of the condition of affairs and of what has actually occurred under the administration of the present government during the last few years.

First, let me say a word or two in regard to a matter which was brought up by my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright), when he spoke a week or two ago in this debate, in regard to certain figures pertaining to the census which has been taken by my department during the past year. Hon. gentlemen opposite alleged that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce had made statements which could not be substantiated, and one hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) undertook to disprove some of those statements, and asked that further proof of them be submitted. I venture to think that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce put this matter in an incontrovertible form before the House, so far as the broad question is concerned. The statements which he made did not go into such detail as could perhaps be called absolute and entire proof on every point ; but they were sufficiently detailed, I think, to appeal to the mind of any unprejudiced individual who either heard or read them, and to prove his main contention, which was that the census of 1891 was unduly swelled in the figures of population, and that therefore comparisons on this point were unfair to the progress and prosperity of Canada during the last decade, and that it was necessary to show that these were unfair, or else the people of the world and the people of our own country, in studying the census, might not understand and appreciate to the full extent the immense progress which Canada has made in the last few years.

Now, Sir, I have under my hand a number of statements which go into greater detail than those submitted by my hon. friend. I venture therefore to supplement what he has stated by placing some of these statements before the House and the country. They are far too voluminous for me to read them all ; but I wish to read some specimen ones, which I have taken very much at random, amongst the many papers which were laid on the Table by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and other statements which I have prepared. My hon. friend from Pictou claimed that in the taking of the census of 1891 extreme care had been taken by the government and the minister in charge of the department at that time to insist that the enumerations should be carefully and accurately made. He pointed out that, in so far as industrial establishments were concerned, the enumerators were instructed to include only those which had an annual output of $200. He therefore concluded that it was only such establishments that were included in the tabulation of the census of 1891, and that it was quite reasonable that industrial establishments yielding an annual output of $200 should be regarded as industrial establishments.

I have under my hand the instructions which were issued to the enumerators in 1891, and I find no such statement in those instructions. There was no instruction given to the enumerators that they should only include industrial establishments which gave an annual output of $200. As a matter of fact, that was the same instruction as was given in 1871, in 1881 and in this last census. I do not quarrel with that instruction, but I want to correct the impression that was conveyed by the remarks of my hon. friend from Pictou.

But, further than that, I find that in these tabulations not only did the enumerators take industrial establishments which had not an annual output of $200, but here in the bureau at Ottawa such establishments were included to a very large number indeed. I have in my hand the third volume of that census, which gives these industrial establishments. I have not undertaken to go through the whole 386 pages of that volume, but I did go through the first 80 pages, and as a specimen I find that in those 80 pages there are 339 industrial establishments included in the tabulation the product of each of which was less than $200—a pretty fair proportion, in fact a very large proportion of the whole number.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. What is the proportion of the whole number ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not worked out the exact proportion ; but these 339 establishments had a total annual output of $44,500, or an average of $144 for each establishment, instead of $200. This shows that the industrial enumeration was not made on the basis which has been alleged.

But, Sir, there is a much more important part of the tabulation and the enumeration which I also want to go into, that is, for the population. Hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends in the country have been making certain criticisms of the census of 1901. In the first place, I may say that the instructions that were given in 1901 with regard to the enumeration were practically the same as the instructions given in 1891, 1881 and 1871. It is true there was one difference made in the census of 1891, which was pointed out by my hon. friend from Pictou, that difference being that people who had been absent for more than 12 months were not to be enumerated ; and my hon. friend took great credit to the government of that day for taking that precaution and thereby preventing the enumerating of people who had left the country or left the particular locality permanently. Now, Sir, what have we found ? We have found, by a careful investigation, in so far as it has gone—and it has gone very far indeed in the province of Quebec, and a reasonable distance in the province of Ontario—that if that instruction was given, it was disregarded to such an extent that we must conclude that it was wilfully disregarded. The enumerators, some of them, ignored it entirely ; because I shall be able to show, not by general statements of the number in the aggregate, but by individual statements, that many individuals and their families were enumerated who had been more than 12 months absent from the place where they were enumerated.

Mr. SPROULE. May I ask the hon. member a question ? Was not the first question of the enumerator this : In the event of any of the members of the family being away, do you expect them to come back ? In the event of their not being expected back, the next question was : Have they been away more than a year ? But in the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, even if they were away five years, the enumerators would be obliged to include them.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There were no such instructions. The instructions were that if they were absent more than twelve months they should be held to be away permanently and should not be put on, but, as a matter of fact, they were put on in 1891 in numerous instances. In the census of 1901 the instructions were that they should not be put on, and we have no proof or suspicion that any were included who were away more than twelve months.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have taken two positions on this question. First, they claim that the census of 1891 was correctly taken and then they imply that the census of 1901 was not. The accusation is made that in the province of Quebec, in the census of 1901, the enumeration was excessive, that some people were counted who should not have been, and that in Ontario fewer people were counted than should have been on the schedules. I venture to say that I can prove that in the province of Quebec in 1901 no more people were enumerated than should have been, but that in the census of 1891 names were put on to an enormous extent that should not have been enumerated at all. If, therefore, there is any accusation of favouritism committed by either government in unduly swelling the population of the province of Quebec, that accusation comes with ill grace from hon. gentlemen opposite, because it was really the late government which was guilty. Let me cite a few instances just to show how the administration of these hon. gentlemen opposite proceeded in taking the census in 1891. Let me first say that in the investigation which I caused to be made, we found a ready means of obtaining information in the province of Quebec, where there is a large Catholic population. And I took care to have the investigation made in those counties in which the population is practically and entirely Catholic, and not where there is a large mixed population. My hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) spoke of the counties of Drummond and Arthabaska, in which there is a mixed Catholic and Protestant population, and he argued that the reason of the disparity was that in the parochial census the Protestants were not included, but in the counties where I have had an investigation, the details of which my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce laid on the Table the other day, the county of Drummond and Arthabaska does not appear because we limited our inquiry to those counties where there is a homogeneous Catholic population and where, therefore, the census bulletins should give results similar to the parochial censuses.

Mr. CLANCY. In every case has the hon. gentleman observed this rule ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Practically.

Mr. CLANCY. Practically—that is another thing.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that there is no part of the Dominion, no matter where, where there are not some people of a different religion from that of the majority, but the numbers are so small in the counties I have alluded to that they can be practically ignored. My hon. friend is not so familiar with the province of Quebec perhaps as some of those who come from that province, and know more about it.

An hon. MEMBER. We do not know very much about it.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is a pity.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. As my right hon. friend says, that is a pity. Comparing the census taken by the late government in 1891 with the parochial statistics, we find that the numbers in the former were in every case much the larger, whereas in the census of 1901 there are four counties, namely, Bellechasse, Bagot, Portneuf and Lotbiniere, where the parochial statistics are larger than those of the official census. In other words, if any error has been made by the census enumerators in 1901 it is due rather to their having failed to count all the people than to having unduly swelled the numbers.

Mr. CLANCY. Were these censuses taken at precisely the same period ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They were taken within three months of each other, and the figures I will give afford such glaring and convincing proof that no one can imagine for a moment that any difference could be due to any radical change in the population within that period. In these twenty-one constituencies, to which I have referred, the difference in 1891 between the official census and the parochial censuses is 40,000 to the advantage of the former, or very nearly 2,000 per constituency of an excess in the official over the parochial census. But in 1901, on the contrary, the difference is only 8,000, or about 400 per constituency.

I would ask the House to bear with me while I read a few of the details just to show in what way this enumeration was taken in 1891 and what were the results. I have here the returns from the county of Joliette, the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Morin, attested by Dr. Turgeon and Mr. Dugas. I am not making any general statement, but taking individual instances and giving individual proofs, and here is one of the first instances that I find :

Leon Charbonneau, aged 39, and his wife, aged 36, absent from the parish for at least the last fifteen years. Yet they are registered in the schedule of 1891 as being present and having six children, namely, Joseph, aged 10; Leon, aged 8; Elizabeth, aged 6; Lea, aged 4; Elise, aged 3, and Olive, aged 2. These people have been absent fifteen years, but they and their six children were registered, and not one of these children was born in that county.

I find again Norbert Charbonneau, aged 30, and his wife, aged 31, both have left the parish over fifteen years. Their children were also registered in the census of 1891. Aged 5 years, 3 years, and 9 months respectively.

None of these people ever resided in St. Jean de Matha, yet their names appear in the census schedule.

Mr. CLANCY. Was this investigation made under oath ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was made by the parish priests.

Mr. CLANCY. That makes no difference.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was made by people who knew the locality and had personal knowledge of the individuals who were living in the parish for years.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). When were these investigations made ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Last year.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). And the fifteen years date from last year ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes. But it was only ten years between the two censuses.

Phillippe St. Ama, 34 years, and his wife, Athelia, were enumerated in 1891 though they never resided in St. Jean de Matha. Still they were counted with their four children, aged respectively 9 years, 6 years, 7 years, and 2 months. That family was absolutely unknown in that parish, never having lived there either temporarily or permanently.

Here is another instance : Alexander Houle, aged 42, and his wife, Marie-Anne, aged 40. They left for the United States eighteen years ago, but still their names appear on the census schedules of 1891 together with those of eight children, aged from sixteen years down to two years. And two of these children appear in the schedule as having the same name, which strikes one as rather peculiar.

Onesime Cleremont, aged 36, and his wife, aged 34, were absent in the United States when the census of 1891 was taken, but their names and those of three children appear in the schedule.

A little further down we find the name of Onesime Cleremont, aged 38, and his wife, aged 39, and three children. The enumerator, not content with entering absentees once, counted them twice.

Then there is the name of Jean Baptiste Piette, aged 46, with those of his wife, aged 40, although they left St. Jean de Matha twenty years ago.

Their names appear on the census schedules with two children—Marie Sara, aged 15 years;

Melina, aged 13 years. Immediately after the name of Jean Baptiste Piette and family, we find again Maxime Piette and Lea Piette, aged 33, with six children—Marie Louise, aged 14 years ; Rose Anna, aged 14 years ; Alexandrine, aged 12 years; Marie, aged 10 years; Joseph, aged 8 years; Napoleon, aged 6 years—which is a repetition of the same Maxime Piette and Lea Piette, already referred to as having left for the United States 15 or 18 years ago.

Here again, the family, the father and mother and six children are reported twice over, and none of them ought to have appeared on the schedule list. I cannot read all these cases, but I am trying to read fair specimens.

Louis Rocheleau, aged 60, and his wife, Agathe, aged 56, are registered with five children : Joseph, aged 34; Louis, aged 36; Elie, aged 29, Alarie, aged 15, Nathalie, aged 17. But they have never resided in the parish, according to people who have never left the locality during the last 20 or 25 years. One old resident of St. Jean de Matha said that he remembered that about 40 years ago, one Louis Rocheleau was living in the parish, but he never saw him since that time.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I would like to ask the name of the clergyman in that case.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Rev. Jean Baptiste Morin.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). How long has he lived in that parish ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have no memorandum on that subject, but he has lived there for many years.

Paul Guilbault, aged 48, is registered with his wife, Philoméne, aged 30, and 18 children.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I wish hon. members to notice that the wife was 30 years of age, that her eldest son, Joseph, was registered as 24 years of age. The other children were :

Elizabeth, aged 23; Marie, aged 22; Philomene, aged 20; Pierre, aged 19; Olive, aged 18; Melina, aged 17, Armeline, aged 16, Paul, aged 15, Georges, aged 14; Miose, aged 13; Hormisdas, aged 12; Eugène, aged 11; Martin, aged 10; Arsène, aged 9; Albert, aged 8; Norbert, aged 8; Marie-Anne, aged 3 months.

The father was 48 and the wife 30, with 18 children, and all were registered.

But Paul Guilbault and his wife and his alleged children have never resided in St. Jean de Matha. It is said in the locality that the same Onesime Plouffe above mentioned in this report had a son-in-law by the name of Guilbault. He was residing, at that time, at St. Damien, in the county of Berthier, but he has left many years ago for the United States, and has never come back to the country. He has never resided in St. Jean de Matha.

This is another specimen of the way the census was stuffed in the province of Quebec in 1891. I have a number more here, but I will not detain the House by reading them.

Some hon. MEMBER. Go on.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. All right. I will take another at haphazard :

Alem Parent, aged 23, is registered with his wife, Marie-Louise, aged 18, and their daughter, Rose-Alba, aged 4 months. Alem Parent is the son-in-law of Jean-Baptiste Layer, who was residing in St. Jean de Matha in 1891. Parent himself has always been living in St. Beatrix and never in St. Jean de Matha. This did not prevent the enumerator from registering him and his family twice. The second time he was recorded as follows : Olem Parent, aged 21; Marie Louise Parent, his wife, aged 19, and Rose-Anna, their daughter, aged 3 months.

Olivier Belanger, aged 42, is registered with his wife, Celina, aged 35, and four children : Joseph, aged 8; Henry, aged 7; Albina, aged 5, and Arthur, aged 3. These people are absolutely unknown to the old residents of the parish. They are probably some relatives of Mrs. Emelie Robillard, an old lady of 70 years old, who then resided in St. Jean de Matha. But if Olivier Belanger and his family ever lived in the parish, it is over twenty years ago.

And so on.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Go on.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) wants me to go on, but I have cases from other counties here that I want to give.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. minister lay on the Table the names of the enumerators in each case ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I will look up the name.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Will the hon. gentleman name the enumerator charged with this fraud ? And I would like to ask also whether he has made inquiries of the enumerators in any of these cases, and, if so, in which, and what answers has he got ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I shall be glad to look up the names and lay them on the Table.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has the hon. minister made inquiry of the enumerators charged with this fraud ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In some cases that has been done.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Has it been done in this particular case ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot, at this moment say as to that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Does not the hon. minister think it would have been fair to ask an explanation before making this charge on the floor of this House ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The probability is that when an enumerator has made such an exhibition as that, his evidence would not be worth taking. I have here some cases from the county of Bagot also. In St. Liboire we find the same kind of thing occurring to a very great extent. Here is one item I would like to read :

The stuffing in the town of Acton Vale and in the Parish of St. Andre of Acton, is probably larger, and the evidence of it is absolutely undeniable. Mr. J. E. Marcil, M.P., for Bagot, has resided in Acton Vale for the last forty years, and for thirty years he has been engaged in business either as a clerk or as a merchant. He had consequently every opportunity of knowing every one in the locality. Mr. Marcil examined in our office the schedules of 1891 and has pointed out to us the names of those who had left the town of Acton Vale or the parish of St. Andre of Acton many years previous to the census of ten years ago.

Then the names are given Joseph Gagnon, aged 24, son of Alderic Gagnon and of Sophie Gagnon, is registered in the census book, but has not resided in the town of Acton Vale for the last fifteen years.

Leon Mousseau, aged 24, and Alexandre Mousseau, aged 21, both sons of Bénonie Mousseau and Genevieve Mousseau, are registered on the census book, but have left the locality for over fourteen years.

Parmelie L'Heureux, aged 24, daughter of Leon L'Heureux, appears on the census book, but has not been living in Acton Vale for the the last sixteen years.

Louis Favreau, aged 26; Louise Favreau, aged 14; Dorinda Favreau, aged 21; Eustache Favreau, aged 20; Georges Favreau, aged 18; Charles, aged 31; Marie, aged 11; Delima, aged 56; Johnnie, aged 28; Angele Favreau, aged 47, and John Favreau, aged 35, are all sons and daughters of Louis Favreau and Angele Favreau. They appear in the census book but they were all born in the United States, and have never resided in Acton Vale.

Clara Lambert, aged 19, and Mary Lambert, aged 19, daughters of Pierre and Celima Lambert, are registered, but they had gone to the United States many years previous to the census of 1891.

Joseph Leveillee, aged 43, and his wife, aged 26, are registered with eleven children——

I need not read their names.

The whole family of Joseph Leveillee are living in the United States for the last 20 years, and therefore had left Acton Vale ten years previous to the census of 1891, and still their names appear on the census book.

Louis Levesque, aged 37 and Matilda Levesque aged 31, are son and daughter of Mrs. Vitaline Levesque. Their names appear on the census book, but in 1891 they were residing at Valcourt in South Ely, county of Shefford, and that three or four years previous to the census.

We have here also :

Pierre Boirier, aged 62 and his wife, Philomène, aged 46, are registered on page six, of the book with nine children:—Pierre, aged 25; Hélène, aged 21; Joseph, aged 19; Madeleine, aged 17; Napoleon, aged 16; Antoine, aged 12; Edouard, aged 8; Marianne, aged five and Philippe aged three. They also appear on page 10 of the same book with also nine children as follows:—Pierre, aged 24; Henri, aged 20; Joseph, aged 19; Madeline, aged 16; Napoléon, aged 15; Antoine, aged 11; Edouard, aged 9; Ernestine, aged 5; and Louis, aged 3. It will be noticed that the names of the two last children in the first instance are Marianne and Philippe. There is also a small difference in the second inscription of the age of the children. But it is absolutely the same family registered twice by the same enumerator.

We have this one also :

Noé Houle, aged 34, is registered with his wife, Delima, aged 34, and five children : Willie, aged 11 ; Emma, aged 9; Délia, aged 6 ; Rosie, aged 4, and Louise Anna, aged 3; but he left with his family for Duluth, Minn., in October, 1889. He had a property in the parish of St. André and was registered on the voters' list at the revision made during the summer of 1889. At the general elections of March 5th, 1891, the Conservative committee of the county of Bagot brought Mr. Noé Houle down from Duluth. He actually came, and it was his first visit to this country since he had left. He came down alone, his whole family remaining at Duluth. He was objected to by the scrutineer representing the Liberal candidate in the poll, and he did not take the oath, as his fare had been paid from Duluth to Acton by the Conservative committee. He again left for Duluth at the end of March, 1891, and has never come back since. Still his name appears on the census book with all his family.

Mr. CLANCY. Who makes that report ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Mr. Marcil.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Who is Mr. Marcil ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The present member for Bagot.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Who knows the county so well that he has been elected as a Liberal, the first time in many years that a Liberal could be elected there.

The enumerators in the parish of St. Ephrem d'Upton have not been more scrupulous ten years ago than in some other localities in the county of Bagot. Here follows a list of persons who should not have been registered on the census book.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Was any explanation asked of this enumerator ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot tell which were asked for an explanation and which were not.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Does the hon. minister know that any were asked ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes. I will take also the county of Rouville in which a most extraordinary condition of affairs was shown.

In the county of Rouville there were 3,123 people enumerated on the Dominion census more than the parochial census of the same year showed. This is the way in which the work was done in the village of Canrobert :

Pierre Reindeau, aged 44, and his wife, Onesime, aged 37, are registered with eight children: Philias, aged 17, Emma, aged 15, Arthur, aged 13, Rosanna, aged 11, Maria, aged 9, Azarie, aged 7, Thais, aged 5, Florina, aged 3 ; that family have left Canrobert village 14 or 15 years ago.

Julien Coiteux, aged 58, and his wife Octavie aged 50, are registered with seven children : Napoleon, aged 22, Zephirine, aged 21, Emma, aged 19, Octavie, aged 17, Louis, aged 16, Joseph, aged 13, Delia, aged 11 ; that family were not residing in Canrobert.

Here follows a list of persons entered in Richelieu village who should not have appeared at all, because they all lived in the United States or had gone to other parts of the province more than twelve months previous to the census of 1891. The list is given here, with the names and details.

Mr. CLANCY. Who makes that report ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This was made by the parish priest.

Mr. CLANCY. What is his name ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. His name is not here. Then I have the county of Lotbinière, another one of the same character.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I do not wish to be constantly interrupting the hon. gentleman, but in any of these places where he has made inquiries of the enumerator and has received an answer, will he be good enough to state it, in connection with his other remarks.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I told the hon. gentleman a little while ago that I could not lay my hands on the information to show which enumerators inquiries were made from and which were not.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would the hon. gentleman be able at some subsequent stage to give us that information ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I will try to.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). We would like to have that.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have thus far pretty completely showed the result of the investigations in the province of Quebec. As I said at the beginning, these investigations have been conducted comparatively easily because of the peculiar conditions in that province which enabled us to get, not only the general figures, but the absolute details and statements of the individual.

Mr. INGRAM. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly.

Mr. INGRAM. I understand from the statements he has read now, he wants to show that a large number of French families in the province of Quebec were enumerated in 1891 that should not have been ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I was not particular to say that they were French, but as a matter of fact I think they all were French.

Mr. INGRAM. I would like to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to a statement he made when the Côté circular was before this House two years ago. The hon. gentleman stated then that the French families of the province of Quebec were not properly enumerated, that a large number of families were not taken in that census of 1891 ; and that for the purpose of getting at the correct number of French families in the province of Quebec this circular was issued by Mr. Côté. How do these two statements coincide ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There was a statement made that in the province of Quebec a large number of people that ought to have been enumerated were not enumerated. Our investigation shows that whether that was the case or not, a very large number of people were enumerated that ought not to have been enumerated. The two statements do not conflict at all. It may well have been that people who ought to have been enumerated were not enumerated, but at the present time I have given proof that hundreds and thousands of people were enumerated who had no right to be enumerated.

Mr. INGRAM. Will the hon. gentleman explain to us how these parties were enumerated that should not have been enumerated other than those he now mentioned ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I will go on with my argument, if the hon. gentleman will allow me, at a later stage perhaps he may speak and say what he wants to. Now we did not wish to confine the investigation by any means to the province of Quebec. Although the difficulties were much greater in the province of Ontario, still a slight investigation was made to find out whether anything like the same conditions obtained. I may say at once that we did not find anything like as much of this sort of thing in the province of Ontario as we did in the province of Quebec. Whether the difficulties in Ontario were so great that we could not get at the facts, or whether there were no such errors committed, I am not prepared to say ; but I state frankly that the difficulties of obtaining this information in Ontario are much greater than they are in Quebec. Now we chose five places in Ontario for that investigation, they were chosen at hap-hazard, we chose them without knowing in the slightest degree what the results were going to be, we chose them chiefly for the reason that they showed certain inconsistencies in the figures, they showed that while the number of families had increased and the number of dwellings had increased, the population had decreased.

Mr. INGRAM. That is reasonable.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is very unfortunate, if it is so, and it is rather an extraordinary condition of affairs. One of these five places was the township of Thurlow and the city of Belleville. A slight investigation showed that the census seemed to have been correctly taken there, there was nothing to show that there had been any stuffing of the lists. But in the other four places there did appear to have been stuffing, in Huron West, in Goderich and Clinton we found errors of that kind. In Goderich we found sixty-three persons out of 3,839 who ought not to have been there, and in Clinton, thirty-eight persons out of 2,633 who ought not to have been there, with an undue swelling of the list by 1·7 per cent and 1·5 per cent. In North Middlesex—

Mr. CLANCY. Before the hon. gentleman reads that, will he say who gave that statement ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Mr. D. F. Macpherson, and he gives the names of the individuals, and all about them.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Let us have the names.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am not going to read them all, I will lay the names on the Table. I will read a few :

George Nimmens, page 13, lived in London in 1891 ; Martha Tebbutt, page 25, taken twice in Goderich township and in Clinton ; James Robb, page 3, never lived here. A farmer in Tuckersmith ; Fred Crabb, page 19, in Michigan in 1891; Charles Crabb, in Toronto in 1891 ; Charles Gibson, page 23, in North-west Territories in 1891 ; Colin Sinclair, page 27, in Detroit in 1891 ; J. M. Proudfoot, page 4, in Winnipeg in 1891 ; William McCallum, page 3, in Vancouver in 1891 ; William Campbell, page 12, in Chicago in 1891 ; Christine McIver, page 3, taken twice in Goderich town ; Minnie Gordon, page 24, in Nebraska in 1891 ; Angus McKay, page 28, in Buffalo in 1891 ; Frank Simmons, page 35, in American army in 1891; Robert Reid, page 38, in Brantford in 1891 ; Donald McIntosh, page 46, in Detroit in 1891 ; Wilson Cox, page 50, in North-west Territories in 1891 ; Maggie Burns, page 51, taken twice in Goderich town ; John McIntosh, page 55, at Sault Ste Marie in 1891 ; William Vivian, page 5, in Michigan in 1891.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him if the report states that these parties were away more than one year ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. They were not there at all. In South Norfolk I find there were 3 per cent away in Simcoe, and 3·6 per cent were added to the list in Port Dover. Then I find a similiar condition of affairs in Cornwall. The inquiry was difficult to make, and I have a report detailing the means taken to arrive at the facts: In order to make the report as authentic as possible I examined the assessment rolls of the municipalities, together with the registers of the high and public schools of the district for 1891, and a comparison of those records with the census schedules has shown that in many cases persons were counted at their homes in the country by one enumerator, and in their boarding houses in the town by another. Many of the pupils attending the Cornwall high school were recorded in this way, and so also were domestic servants and others. In some instances it has been difficult to identify persons of the same family name, such as McDonalds, Frasers, McPhails, &c., who are numerous in the district, and where I had any doubt I have marked such names with a star. All other names given on the appended list as duplicated in the census are susceptible of the clearest verification and I am sure that many others might be furnished if one's memory and exact local knowledge could recall every person who lived in the district ten years ago and discriminate between the floating and the fixed elements of the population. Here is a list of 150 persons whose names were duplicated and appeared twice on the schedule of that census division.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What division was that ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In Cornwall. I have here a list of the individuals named, of the two enumerators who enumerated them, the places in which they were enumerated, Cornwall town and Cornwall township, many enumerated twice in the town, some enumerated twice in the township, but all of them enumerated twice, once in the town and once in the township, as the case may be. This goes to show that the stuffing of the lists was not alone carried on in the province of Quebec. We have another proof of that which was given to this parliament in 1894 by my hon. friend the present Minister of Militia (Hon. Mr. Borden), who at that time proved conclusively that in his county of King's N.S., there was a very great stuffing of the lists. That proof was given so conclusively at the time that my hon. friend the member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) the other day, acknowledged it ; he granted that it was true and he simply defended it by saying that the enumerator was prosecuted and had to leave the country. As a matter of fact the enumerator did not leave the country; he only went into a neighbouring county, where, apparently, the Minister of Justice of that day was not able to reach him or to punish him. We have another fact which goes to prove the same thing. I have here some returns of the school population in the province of Nova Scotia, and I find some confirmatory facts in that connection. Here we have the different counties with their populations in 1891 and 1901 with the increases or decreases as the case may be, and we have also the statement of the school children for these two years. I find that in some counties the population actually decreased very materially while the school population largely increased. It seems hardly possible that the difference can be actually so great. It points to the fact that the change between 1891 and 1901 cannot have been correct in both instances. There is no possible reason for supposing that the population of the school children was in any way changed or tampered with. But it is quite possible that the census of 1891, with the proof that we have which the hon. Minister of Militia gave in regard to King's county, was tampered with extensively at that time. In Annapolis county the population decreased 3·1 per cent, but I find that the number of school children increased 12·3 per cent. I find in Antigonish that while the population decreased 15 per cent the number of school children increased 1 per cent. In Colchester the population decreased 8·3 per cent while the number of school children increased 9·9 per cent. In Digby the population only increased 2 per cent while the number of school children increased 21 per cent. I find that in Hants the population decreased 9·9 per cent while the number of school children increased 8·1 per cent. I find that in King's county the population decreased 2 per cent while the number of school children increased 21 per cent. Here, we have a confirmation in this comparison of the statements which were made by the hon. Minister of Militia. We have here the key to the solution of the difficulty and I would venture to say that the same key will open the lock in regard to other counties in that province. We have in Queen's county a decrease in both cases. In Victoria county there was a decrease of 14·9 per cent in population, and an increase of 1·5 per cent in the number of school children. I think that what I have submitted to the House thus in detail, and I have only taken these figures at haphazard from the mass of detail that I have here, is sufficient to show that whatever may be the census of 1901, the census of 1891 was, generally, throughout the country, very unduly swelled by the manipulation of the enumerators. I venture to say that it accounts to a large extent, if not entirely, for the fact that in the comparisons of the growth of the population the growth from 1891 to 1901 is actually and in fact much greater in population than it was from 1881 to 1891. Therefore, we as Canadians need not blush as we would otherwise have to do at the comparative stagnation and lack of growth of the population in our country. I venture to think that there are other points which tend to prove the same thing. There was one notable fact in regard to the census of 1891 which shows how easy it was to misrepresent the actual growth of population. In the census of 1891 while the names of the people are given, there is no address given of the people, there being no place in the schedules of 1891 for this purpose, and consequently, there is no sure and accurate way of laying your finger on an individual except by the local knowledge of other people. In the census of 1901 we have obtained not only the names of the people, but in the cities, we have given the street and house number of every individual on the list of the census, while in the country parts we have given the lot and range and the position of the house of each individual whose name appears on the list, the schedules of 1901 being so drawn as to provide for this. The result is that with the census of 1901 anybody can prove to a demonstration whether an individual was present or not, while, with the census of 1891 there are difficulties in the way of doing that and there are facilities given to the enumerators to stuff in just as many people as they desire to do because there are no immediate means except by the local knowledge of some other individual of laying your finger on a man who was reported as being present or who might not be present. This is a most extraordinary difference in the manner of taking the census and one to which I wish to draw the attention of the House and the country. There are some other matters in connection with the census to which I wish briefly to allude.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Would the hon. member (Hon. Mr. Fisher) pardon me? He speaks of a great mass of information. Is he referring to what has been laid on the Table of the House or to something else?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. To what has been laid on the Table of the House and to what I have been reading from here to-day.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I take it for granted that he will lay all the information on the Table of the House in so far as it has not already been laid on the Table?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Certainly. There has been one effort made in the province of Ontario, and it is the only one I know of in the Dominion of Canada which has been undertaken, for the purpose of showing the incorrectness of the census of 1901, and that is the effort that was made in the city of Toronto. I was rather surprised that the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke), in alluding to census matters, did not allude to this. I can only take it for granted that he felt that the census of 1901 was completely justified and verified by the police census which was taken in Toronto soon afterwards. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright) gave a good many of these figures to the House and I will not therefore go over them but I will point out that the assessment department of the city of Toronto took their census between April 1st and October 1st, the mean of which was the 1st of July. The assessment department showed a population of 205,887, a smaller number than the Dominion census which showed a population of 208,045. If therefore we were trying to minimize the population of Ontario we evidently did not do so in the city of Toronto. The police census of the city of Toronto was taken some time afterwards and it showed a population of 221,000. The difference between the Dominion census and the police census was completely accounted for by the fact, that in the police census 4,439 pupils who are non-residents of the city were included, and these ought not, and were not enumerated by the Dominion census enumerators. The number of patients in the hospitals who were non-residents was 527, and in other institutions there were 175 non-residents. The hotels reported that on November 10th, the day on which the police census was taken, 1,413 transient visitors were enumerated who would not be enumerated in the Dominion census, and it is reasonable to suppose that there were at any rate 1,000 transient visitors in the city who were not in the hotels. This, with the natural increase within the two dates would give a complete confirmation of the Dominion census of 208,000, because the difference which can thus be made up between the two is practically 13,000.

There is another fact in regard to this about which I would like to say a word. In the directory census of the city of Toronto an effort was made to show a much larger figure. The directory census has on frequent occasions been referred to, but we have found on investigation that the estimates in these censuses are very uncertain and very irregular. The estimate made by the directory of the city of Toronto has varied very materially; a different multiplier has been taken to make up the estimate in different years, and some of these estimates have ranged very much higher than the municipal statistics, and some of them very much lower; showing a very wide difference and consequently showing the utterly unreliable character of such a census. I was rather surprised that my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Clarke) did not deal with this matter. He certainly had the opportunity to do so, but he left it without any cavil, and I therefore take that as a practical confirmation of the census of 1901.

I have dwelt at some length on these things, because I have felt, and I still feel that it is important to show to the country and to show to the world, that the population of Canada has not been so stationary during the last ten years as it would appear to be from a comparison of the census of 1891, with that of 1901. I want to speak a little further upon another phase of this subject of population, and the census will have to necessarily come into that part of my address also. I stated a few moments ago that one object of discussing this was to show that the progress of Canada had not been so slow as it appeared by the census returns to have been. I believe I can show from the census figures, and other figures which I can place before the House: that not only has the growth of Canada during the last ten years been considerably greater than it was during the ten years preceding, but that in those ten years, the growth of Canada during the last five years of the period has been greater than it was in the fifteen years preceding the advent of this present government to power. The Minister of Finance alluded to that briefly in his speech, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce showed pretty conclusively that the development and progress of Canada had been very much greater during the last five years than it had been during any previous five-year period in the history of this country. And furthermore, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) went on to show that in some respects the progress of Canada had been greater during the last five years than in the fifteen years preceding. Hon. gentlemen opposite themselves acknowledge the prosperity of the country. I want to give a little proof of what that prosperity is, and in this connection I will refer to the speech of my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Clarke). When he was dealing with the increase in the population between 1881 and 1891, and between 1891 and 1901, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clarke) stated that the increase of population during the last decade had been less than it was during the first decade. I do not know where he got his figures, but they are certainly not the figures of these three censuses. As a matter of fact, in 1881 the population of Canada was 4,324,810 ; in 1891, the population of Canada was 4,833,-239 ; and in 1901, the population of Canada was 5,371,051. The increase from 1881 to 1891 was 508,429, but the increase from 1891 to 1901 was 537,812, or, about 30,000 increase more in the last decade than in the first. This is no very great difference I confess, but still it is to the advantage of the last decade.

Now, Sir, in the province of Ontario we have municipal statistics and these statistics enable us to deal with, not only the decennial census periods, but also with the conditions from year to year. Before I go into that I should say that these municipal statistics have to be taken with a certain reserve, because in the early days in 1881 and 1882 and 1883, these municipal statistics were not as carefully or as accurately compiled as they were afterwards. Up to 1881 they were avowedly imperfect, and therefore the figures for 1881 are acknowledged to be, not by any means correct; so that when we come to compare 1881 with 1891 we do so simply for what it is worth. In these ten years there was an increase of 226,000 according to the municipal statistics. But there is this curious fact to be noted: that in 1882 and 1883 there was a sudden increase from 2,000 increase to 19,000 increase. In 1883 and 1884 the increase in the population was 40,000, according to these municipal statistics; in 1884 and 1885 the increase was 33,000, and in 1885 and 1886 the increase was 38,000. Knowing as I do something about the way in which these municipal statistics were handled in the province of Ontario at that time, I am aware of the fact—and I have no doubt hon. gentlemen from Ontario here are also aware of the fact—that these enormous increases were due to the improved methods in the compilation of these statistics.

Mr. CLANCY. They are just as loose now as they were then.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Possibly so, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) is right, then the comparison made by the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Clarke) would not be of very much value. As a matter of fact it was only about 1882, that these statistics began to be in any way carefully and completely compiled. In 1885 and 1886, when they had got to the point at which the statistics were compiled about the same as they are now, the increases did not go on to the same extent. In 1890 and 1891, the increases went down almost as low as in 1881 and 1882. I find that in the ten years from 1891 to 1901, these municipal statistics show an increased population in the province of Ontario of 102,626, but they show in the five years from 1891 to 1896, an increase of 50,165, and in the five years from 1896 to 1901, they show an increase of 52,426; or in other words, these same municipal statistics in the province of Ontario show that the population was increasing more rapidly during the last five years than it did in the five years preceding.

There are one or two other points in this same connection. We have in this Dominion census a statement of the numbers of the foreign-born population of Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia, which shows the immigration that has come into that western country. The increase of the foreign population in the different periods was as follows: From 1881 to 1885, 19,000; from 1886 to 1890, 31,526; from 1891 to 1895, 38,728; a total immigration of foreign-born people into that part of Canada in those fifteen years of 89,932. But from 1896 to 1900, there was an increase of 94,527, and from the 1st of January, 1900, to the 31st of March, an increase of 6,451, a total of 100,978. So that we find that 11,000 more foreign-born people came into that country since the present government came into power than came in during the whole fifteen years preceding.

We have also the five-year period census of the province of Manitoba, and what does it show? In 1891, there were in the province of Manitoba 152,506 souls; in 1896, there were 193,425, and in 1901, there were 254,947. That increase in the five years of the last decade was 40,919, while the increase in the last five years of the decade, since this government came into power, was 61,522, or over 22,000 more than there was during the same number of years under hon. gentlemen opposite.

An hon. MEMBER. How many of those are Doukhobors?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There are very few Doukhobors in the province of Manitoba; but I have no reason to regret the fact that Doukhobors are coming into the country. On the contrary, I think it is a good omen for the future that we see industrious people coming in to add to the productive capacity of the country, whether they are Doukhobors or Mennonites or anything else.

Now, Sir, in connection with the census there has been a good deal of talk about the exodus. Though hon. gentlemen opposite proclaim that the exodus is still going on, one of their principal organs some three years ago said that the exodus was a thing of the past—a matter of history. I am not prepared to say for a single moment that there is no exodus in one sense, although in another sense, I am prepared to deny that there is still an exodus. There is and there always will be a certain migration of people across this continent, with the people of the south speaking the same language and having largely the same institutions as ours; that migration being sometimes from the south to the north and sometimes from the north to the south. But there is this difference, that under the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite the migration was invariably and to an enormous extent from the north to the south, people leaving Canada to go to the United States, whereas I am proud to know that, since a change of government has taken place and a new policy has come into operation in the Dominion of Canada, the great stream of that migration has changed and is now from the south to the north and no longer from the north to the south. This I consider one of the best auguries for the future of our country, and it is one which our people cannot too long dwell upon or boast of; because if the wide-awake and up-to-date American people are finding the conditions in Canada—the conditions of government, of civil liberty, of material prosperity—better than in their own great union, it surely will happen that the people of the European continent will follow their lead and come to us in greater numbers than ever before.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. minister explain how it is that of settlers' effects imported into the United States from Canada there were in 1899, $1,037,000 worth, in 1900, $1,144,000 worth, and in 1901, $1,143,000 ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Has the hon. gentleman found how many came from the United States to Canada ?

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the migration to the United States had stopped.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I did not say it had stopped. The hon. gentleman has not listened to me. What I said was that it had changed to a great extent its direction—that while there will always be, as there always has been in the past, a migration across the continent, at the present time the greater stream is from the south to the north, and the smaller from the north to the south, while under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite there was hardly any stream at all from the south to the north, but a great broad river flowing from the north to the south.

The hon. member for Pictou, in his speech, referred to what appeared to be a quotation, I know not from what document, in regard to the migration of Canadian population to the United States, and he read a passage which had a very strong likeness, although it is not verbatim the same, to a statement which appeared in the press three or four weeks ago, supposed to be on the authority of Mr. George Johnson, who is described as the Dominion statistician. I may say that that statement had no authority from the department, and that the department takes no responsibility for it. I note this statement, quoted by the hon. member for Pictou, in regard to the number of Canadians who went to the state of Massachusetts in the five-year periods from 1885 to 1890, from 1890 to 1895, and from 1895 to 1900 :

> In the first period Canadians went to the state of Massachusetts, according to the statistics of that state, at the rate of 12,050 a year ; in the second period, at the rate of 7,236 a year, and in the third period at the rate of 9,888 a year.

Then my hon. friend from Pictou went on to say :

> If these figures are right, there was a larger exodus from Canada to the state of Massachusetts in the last five years ending with 1900 than there was in the preceding five years.

The hon. gentleman was well advised in saying : 'If these figures are right,' because these figures are not right. There is a misstatement and miscalculation in the quotation made by the hon. member for Pictou, just as there was in the statement which Mr. Johnston published without the authority of the department. I have here under my hand the United States census and the Massachusetts census, and in them I find these figures. In the state of Massachusetts the Canadian-born population between 1880 and 1890 rose from 119,302 to 207,601, or an increase of 88,299; from 1890 to 1900, it rose from 207,601 to 293,169, an increase of 85,568. But, according to the records of the Massachusetts State census, during the period from 1890 to 1895, the number of Canadians in the state of Massachusetts increased from 207,601 to 251,346, an increase of 43,745. From 1895 to 1900, the Canadians in the state of Massachusetts increased from 251,346 to 293,169. In other words, the Canadian-born population in the state of Massachusetts increased, in the first five years of the last decade, 43,745, and in the last five years 41,823, or just about 2,000 more of an increase in the first five years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, than in the last five years when we were in power.

The statement which the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Bell) read and which was made by Mr. Johnson was also to the effect—which is quite true—that during the last decade the number of Canadians in the United States increased much less than it did in the previous one, and the fallacy appears to lie in the figures of the year 1895. A certain number of those who went to Massachusetts before 1895 had been added to the period after 1895, which shows an entirely false statement of the facts and an unfair statement of the condition of the exodus from Canada to Massachusetts. At this however I am not surprised.

What do I find when I look back ? In the whole of the United States, taking ten year periods, I find the Canadians increased as follows :

From	1860 to 1870	243,494
"	1870 to 1880	223,693

What is noticeable about these figures is that the increase between 1880 and 1890, when we had a continuous ten year period of Conservative rule, was far the greatest, and was least between 1890 and 1900 when we have five years of Conservative and five of Liberal administration. And if you go back to the period between 1870 to 1880, in which there was also five years of Liberal administration, we find that the figures are less by 40,000 than they were in the succeeding period when the country was entirely under Conservative rule. We find therefore that notwithstanding the howl of the hon. gentlemen opposite about bad times under the Mackenzie administration, notwithstanding the attacks which they made on that administration and the manner in which they decried the country during that period fewer Canadians by 40,000 then went to the United States than during the ten years when these hon. gentlemen opposite had full control.

When we come to another decade, during one-half of which the Conservatives governed and during the other half the Liberals were in office, the exodus was still less by 60,000 than in the decade which was distinguished entirely by Tory administration.

I shall not dwell longer upon the exodus and the movement of population, but I would like to say a few words with regard to another phase of the subject, which at this time is specially interesting. I need not go into any details to show the great prosperity which Canada is to-day enjoying. Hon. gentlemen opposite acknowledge it, but they seek refuge in the statement that this prosperity is not due, in any way whatever, to the present government, but solely to natural causes, among which are the great crops that we have been blessed with during the past few years. Well, while I do not question the great advantages we have enjoyed in these abundant crops, I venture to think that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is hardly warranted in saying that our administration has had nothing whatever to do with our present prosperity. My hon. friend and others like him have been somewhat decrying my own administration, and the work done by my department on behalf of our farmers. Far be it from me to boast of what I have done, and I have not the slightest desire to magnify anything I may have done or attribute any improvement in our agricultural industry to any personal merit peculiar to myself. But I think I am justified in pointing out certain facts and allowing hon. gentlemen to draw their own inferences. In the first place, during the last five years, our exports, as everybody knows, have enormously increased. We sent out from Canada in that period $23,000,000 more of the products of the mine than in the previous five years, over one-half million dollars more of the products of the fisheries, $29,000,000 more of the products of the forests, and $113,000,000 more of the products of the farm. These are all the natural products of our country, and it is on these we must depend to pay our foreign debts. I was rather surprised and somewhat amused by the statement of my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Brock) that we would be unable to pay our foreign debts unless we had manufactures. He asked pathetically: How are we going to pay our foreign debt if we do not have manufactures in the country? Well, I would ask my hon. friend just to pause a moment and contemplate the figures. We sent out of this country, in the five year period to which I have referred, $205,000,000 worth of the product of the soil, the mines, the fisheries and the forests. And how much do you suppose we exported of manufacturing products in that same period? Only twenty-two and a half million dollars worth.

Mr. BROCK. Yet our debt is not yet paid.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Well, we seem to be pretty solvent, and I venture to think that we are paying our debts pretty well as we go along. We are paying our foreign debts and bills chiefly by the exports of our natural products, and only to a very small extent indeed by the export of our manufactures. We are paying them almost entirely by the exports of our agricultural, mineral, forest and fishery products.

Mr. BROCK. What has the government to do with that?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I appreciate fully that the government cannot create these things, but no one can deny that it can encourage, stimulate, guide and direct them, by opening the most profitable channels and encouraging those industries which help to open up the country and increase our mining, forestry and agricultural development. And it is only to the extent that it does so that I claim credit for this government. But my hon. friend must not forget that this great increase in our export of natural products has taken place under a Liberal administration assuming proportions which it never did under the administration of my hon. friends opposite. If our policy has had the blighting effect which they attribute to it, if our administration has been so prejudicial to the best interests of the country, how is it that in those five years we have had this enormous development of these natural resources and at the same time a considerable development of our manufacturing industries as well?

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman point out now where they have changed the policy of the Conservative party which brought about these grand results?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Why then are you dissatisfied?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Surely my hon. friend is not serious. He is about to support a resolution which declares distinctly that our policy is contrary to the life long policy of the Conservative party. I think that he was in the House when Sir Charles Tupper, then leader of the opposition, in answering my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, told him that he could hear the wail of the men engaged in manufacturing industries, who were crying out in fear and trembling that they would not be able to find bread for their families because of the tariff which my hon. colleague introduced in 1897 and which is the same tariff that my hon. friends opposite want to reform. It is true that somewhat later, finding that that wail existed only in an imagination, stimulated at the time by the disappointment of losing office, Sir Charles Tupper—I think it was 1899 or 1900, just before the general election—gave utterance to the same opinion to which my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) has just given expression, and told the country that we had stolen the clothes of the late Conservative administration.

Mr. CLANCY. Which was correct.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It was neither correct as to the future nor as to the present effect of the Reform tariff. The duties have been lowered.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Then why does the hon. gentleman support a resolution to have them raised? Why does he want the tariff changed? If he has to-day that protection for the manufacturing industries which he had before 1896, why does he support the resolution of the hon. leader of the opposition? Or does he wish to support the resolution of the leader of the opposition? No; these hon. gentlemen cannot ride the two horses in that way—they are not clever enough. And the amusing thing about it is that the hon. gentlemen practically answer one another, and we hardly need to answer them at all. But I wish to tell the hon. gentlemen a little of how we have changed this; and, in doing so I have to refer a little to agricultural matters. My hon. friend the member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith) a little while ago dealt at considerable length with the question of cold storage. I have here an analysis of the agricultural exports of the country in recent years. It is very suggestive. The hon. member for South Wentworth says that the government has nothing whatever to do with the increase of these exports. I take here products of a certain kind, the chief of which are wheat and flour, oats and oatmeal, and peas. These are the chief products of the field that we export, the chief products of the country that do not call for the intervention of what I might speak of as the manufacturing side of the agricultural industry. In these articles we have increased our exports in the last five years from about $8,500,000 to about $16,500,000. That is due to the increased crops of this country—

Mr. CLANCY. And increased foreign demand.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. And increased foreign demand, possibly. The hon. gentleman can put that in if he chooses, and I do not object. We have, however, another class of agricultural products usually spoken of under the general name of animals and their products. In these the industry and skill and intelligence of the Canadian farmer is exercised in turning the crude products of the soil into a higher class of agricultural products and exporting them. In helping to increase this class of products and in helping to increase the export of them, the government has done a great deal during the last five years. The increase in this class of exports has been, in round figures, $21,000,000. And out of that increase, I venture to say, a very large portion has been due to the guidance and stimulus of the government policy and the work that has been done by my department in providing facility of transportation and otherwise and in guiding and educating the farmers of this country to produce these goods and send them out. And I venture to say that neither the hon. gentleman nor any person can controvert what I am about to put before you. In these years we have sent $2,000,000 more of cattle in 1901 than in 1896, our increase in cheese exports was from $13,000,000 to $20,000,000; of butter from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000; of pork products from $4,500,000 to $11,750,000; and of eggs from $800,000 to $1,600,000—a total as I say of about $21,000,000. This has been due to the improved methods pursued in production and the better facilities for transportation provided, to a very large extent by the work of the administration.

Mr. CLANCY. It is due to one point in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) has followed the policy of his predecessors.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That is the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Clancy's) opinion because he has not studied the question. The hon. gentleman thinks that this is simply due to the one item of cold storage. But I am going to refer to that in a few minutes. The analysis of export that I have given, I think, is of value. One other point I wish to refer to is the fact that this increase of export is almost entirely to the old country. This increase has been an increase not only in quantity, but in value to a very considerable extent. We have been able to get better prices for these articles in the old country than we got before. And I venture to think that the increase in prices is, to a considerable extent—I do not pretend that this is the cause of it all—due to that preference which was an integral part of the tariff arrangement established by this government, and that struck the people with such surprise and pleasure in 1897.

Mr. CLANCY. I supposed that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) would assume that—

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) can restrain his impatience for a little while until he gets the floor, perhaps his speech will be a little more coherent than his present interruptions. That preference attracted the attention of the people of the old country to Canadian products, and the difference was shown immediately by this fact—that while before 1896, Canadian products were sold in the old country under the names of other countries—were deliberately asked to be sold in such packages that they could not be recognized as Canadian—to-day every retail dealer in the old land tries his best to put the name 'Canadian' on everything he is selling in order to attract his customers and induce them to try it. And I am glad, as Minister of Agriculture, to say that when these people have tested the Canadian products, they are glad to go back for more. The result is the splendid showing of increased exportation of the articles that I have just given. But hon. gentlemen opposite are always decrying this preference and taking the line that, while the preference may—they are doubtful of it—may have helped our agricultural sales, it has not helped the English people. And my hon. friend from Toronto brought forward in his speech a little while ago a rather specious argument, the fallacy of which, I should think, the hon. gentleman must have been aware of, because I would naturally give him credit for enough intelligence to recognize it. I did not expect to have to impute to him disingenuousness in putting the argument forward. He stated that in the five years preceding the preference the aggregate of British imports into Canada were $187,000,000, and that from 1897 to 1901 inclusive, the aggregate was $186,000,000—practically the same. He put this forward as proof that the preference had done no good. Surely, the hon. gentleman knew perfectly well that the aggregate in the first five years was an aggregate of yearly importations into Canada which were steadily decreasing from $43,000,000 in the first year to $29,000,000 in the last year, while the aggregate in the succeeding five years was made up of importations which began at about the lowest figure of the first five years and went on increasing. The one was an aggregate composed of amounts on a descending scale, the British importations gradually and pretty rapidly tending toward the vanishing point, and the other of amounts which were steadily rising, and had got back in five years to just about the place from which the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite had lowered them. Sir, that is a fair specimen of the kind of argument and manipulations of figures to which hon. gentlemen opposite descend in order to prove their contention. I was surprised, I confess, that the hon. gentleman from Toronto should make an argument so disingenuous unless, he was so obtuse that he could not see the fallacy in it.

Now, the hon. gentleman opposite spoke a few minutes ago about one of these articles I have read over as being the only one in which we did anything for the export trade to England. I suppose the hon. gentleman alluded to the trade in butter, which even hon. gentlemen opposite confess, has been enormously stimulated and improved since their time, and which could not be improved under the old condition of affairs, because butter from Canada could not be carried to England and placed on the market there in good condition owing to the condition of transportation that obtained under the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite. Since that time, however, things have changed.

I want to point out that in respect of those articles I have alluded to we have done an enormous amount of work of which, perhaps, the House and the country are not aware. During the last five years what I may call the educational side of the Department of Agriculture has been greatly enlarged. We have been able, by the addition of some officers to our staff, though I must confess at some considerable expense, to reach the farmers and producers throughout the country in a way that was never even attempted before; we have been able by the distribution of information from the Experimental Farm and from the agriculture and dairying branch under Professor Robertson, to disseminate information, to bring new points to the attention of the people, and help them to overcome the difficulties in their various industries. This has resulted in the increase of our cattle trade with Great Britain, taken in connection with the admission of free corn to feed their cattle, and it has resulted in the increase of the cattle trade with the United States by removing the quarantine impediment which had effectually shut out our cattle from the United States market. We have appointed a live stock commissioner who is to-day organizing the live stock interests in this country, and enabling those engaged in that interest to work together, to understand the situation of their trade, and better to overcome the difficulties which they encounter. We have stimulated the fruit trade by the passage of the Fruit Marks Act, which, though only in operation one year, has already done something to improve our export trade in fruits, by the appointment of inspectors under that Act to supervise the trade, by arranging for proper ventilation of the holds of steamers which cross the Atlantic, to carry our fruits and cheese in a proper condition, by arranging for cheese curing rooms, and the improvement of cheese curing in this country, which is only beginning to-day, but which has been necessary for a couple of years past, and which we have been working the people up to during the last two years. We have established a complete and continuous chain of cold storage from the creameries in Canada to the retailers in Great Britain, and that has been done so effectually that the butter trade of Canada is to-day fivefold what it was in 1896. These things have been done by the department without much ostentation, but they have resulted in stimulating production and improving the exports.

Now, I have here a few details which I wish to give in reply to some strictures that were made by the hon. member for South Wentworth (Mr. Smith). That hon. gentleman said that I had not done my duty because I had not compelled every steamboat that sails from a Canadian port to put in fans, &c. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman is crediting my department with a great deal more power than it possesses. We have no power to compel any steamship company to do anything against their will; though we have power to offer them inducements, we can show them the advantages they will reap from making these improvements. I found that difficulty from the commencement of my work. As a result of the representations that were made to one of the largest steamship lines, I was able to induce them to put in mechanical cold storage apparatus which, until that time, had never been put in any ship sailing from Canada. The result was the stimulus of the butter trade, followed by experiments in regard to the export of fruit, and this also offered prospects of improving the condition of the poultry meat exports, which have already grown to considerable proportions. When I found there was a necessity for proper ventilation in the holds of the vessels for the carriage of apples and cheese I exercised some pressure to induce the steamship companies to make the arrangements necessary, and succeeded to some extent. I went further than that. Last year I endeavoured to get the steamship companies to put in cooling apparatus by which the air would be artificially cooled in special chambers, and in that state forced through the holds where the fruit and cheese were stored. I was not successful with all the steamship companies at first, and I am condemned for that. I would like the hon. gentlemen opposite to tell me how I could compel the steamship companies to do this. Hon. gentlemen do not reflect that these are independent companies who trade for their own benefit. I went to the head of one of these companies in England, and represented the necessities of the Canadian trade. I asked him if he would not put in one of these cooling apparatus into the holds of each of his vessels in which butter and cheese were carried. I had already been in communication with his agents in Montreal, who had recommended to him that it should be done, but the head of the firm in England refused to do it. When I went there last summer I asked him to do it and he said he would not. Although I urged him, he still refused, and then I said, 'well, I have only one resource left, I will publish to the people of Canada who ship these goods across the Atlantic, that while your competitors do make these arrangements in their vessels to meet the demand of the Canadian trade, you refuse to do so; and I will see, and you will see, whether the shippers of Canada will patronize your boats.' But my arguments had no influence with him. The moment that Professor Robertson and I came back from England, I instructed Prof. Robertson to meet the shippers at Montreal who were engaged in shipping these goods, and he told them that this company had refused to meet our demands. At once I got a cable from the company, asking me how it was that I authorized a Dominion officer to do this, and I replied that it was necessary in the interests of the exporters and shippers of Canada. To-day that company is fitting up their ships, because they do not dare to go contrary to the demands of the Canadian trade and shippers of these goods.

Mr. CLANCY. Did that company give reasons for their refusal?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The reasons were that they did not think it would pay, now they do think it will pay.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I did not catch the name of the company.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I did not give the name, I do not think it is wise to give it. I will give the name to the hon. gentleman privately, but I do not think it right to publish the name of the company to the public.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I think the hon. gentleman should not make the statement unless he is prepared to give the name of the company.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I think so. The hon. member for South Wentworth read a statement in connection with which he pointed out that certain ships going from Halifax did not give the accommodation necessary. That statement was, to a certain extent, correct. There is a line going from Halifax which agreed to give certain accommodation for the shipping of our products. That line was granted the usual help for doing that. The owners of that line carried out to a certain extent their contract, but they refused to carry it out further and the assistance given to them was stopped and in addition to that they were obliged to refund what they had already received because they had not fulfilled their conditions and had not fulfilled their contract. More than this cannot be done. They are at liberty to put in the necessary facilities or not but in order to obtain the assistance that this government gives it is necessary for them to provide the accommodation and fulfil their contract.

Mr. CLANCY. Would the hon. gentleman say whether the government were repaid as well for the sum they expended in fitting out these steamships with cold storage?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes, the money paid for them was refunded.

This particular line which was referred to by the hon. member for South Wentworth was under contract to supply certain vessels. They put on those vessels which the fruit-growers of Nova Scotia declared were suitable vessels. They, for their own convenience and for their own purposes, sold two of these vessels and they offered to put on other inferior vessels. The result has been that they have not been paid their subsidy and I venture to think that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce will not pay them their subsidy until they provide the accommodation which they are required to provide by the contract and which is needed by the trade. We have no means of compelling these companies. We can only hold inducements out to them that certain things are necessary to accommodate the trade of the country. We can describe what things are necessary and help them to meet these requirements. If they refuse to do it we have nothing more to do with them. If they will do it, we can give them the assistance which it has been the policy of this government to give for the purpose of inducing these companies to provide the necessary facilities. But, they have provided these facilities to a great extent. There were five main lines plying to Montreal during last season. Twenty-eight steamers have been fitted up and others are being fitted up today so as to be in readiness for the season of 1902. There were 77 sailings from Montreal last year with exhaust fans for the ventilation of their cargo space. We also induced the fitting out of four steamers with cold chambers to force air through. Canada, with one exception, that of the line from Bristol to the West Indies which was subsidized lately by the home government, is the only country that has obtained vessels fitted out in this way for the carriage of cheese and fruit. We opened these negotiations last year and the result was that four steamers were fitted out as a trial and these steamers were so successful and our products were carried so well that this winter the main line companies are fitting out more vessels. Ten others are under way and it is expected that they will be fitted out for this season. These things are directly in the line with what I have been describing. These are the things that the hon. member for South Wentworth ignored while he quoted one particular case down in Nova Scotia. During the season of 1901 there were from the port of Montreal 254 sailings of ships. My officers reported on and inspected 204 of these sailings.

Mr. CLANCY. How many ships ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman how many ships there were. But these were the sailings. There were so many sailings of the ships from Montreal. It does not matter very much whether one ship made forty trips or four. The other fifty sailings which were not inspected were at the commencement of the season when there were none of these products going forward. We supervised and inspected and reported on every sailing of the regular line ships that went forward from Montreal last year. We have the records of all of these sailings in the department. We placed in these ships self-registering thermometers which could record the temperature in the cold storage chambers and the ships' holds during the voyage. These instruments were taken out of the ships on their arrival at the ports in England by our officers who recorded the temperatures shown by the thermometers. We have a complete record of these temperatures. The hon. member for South Wentworth said we ought to do that. It has been done for three years past.

Mr. CLANCY. Could the hon. member give the House the value of the goods shipped by these sailings ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have not the value of them. All the butter shipped from Canada practically went by these sailings, as well as the fruit that went from Montreal and the cheese during last season. This was so much thought of and so well liked that I was gratified to receive a resolution from the Montreal Board of Trade and a letter from the buyers of these products in England. The following is a resolution from the Butter and Cheese Association of the Board of Trade, Montreal :—

The members of this association have noted with gratification the complete success of the cold air chambers system used on some steamers running from this port during the past season, and they feel they cannot exaggerate the importance of having it installed in every vessel carrying dairy produce from here next season. It is certain that having experienced the benefits of the cooled chambers last season the great majority of British buyers will next year insist on having all goods shipped in these chambers. The demand is likely, therefore, to far exceed the supply unless some effort is made to induce the steamship companies generally to turn all their available cheese carrying space into cold air chambers. This association believes it would be immensely to the advantage of the whole dairy interest were there no other way of shipping possible, than in cooled chambers, and it would heartily join in all efforts made to accomplish this result.

This is another communication which came to me from the Home and Foreign Produce Exchange, Limited, of London, Eng. :

A few steamers sailing from Montreal to London have been fitted with cool air ventilators, which have proved a great success in carrying Canadian cheese, and it is the opinion of the undersigned that the best interests of cheese importers would be served if all steamers catering for the cheese trade were so fitted. It is also the opinion of the signatories that even during the winter months it would be desirable to continue this system, as it is well known that heating in steamer's hold is caused by storage near other cargo, which has a tendency to create heat. The signatories would be glad if the committee of the Home and Foreign Produce Exchange would take the matter up, with a view to furthering the end suggested.

The importance of these representations will be appreciated from the fact that the memorial has been signed by practically all the London firms importing cheese.

Now that the matter has thus been brought to your notice, I would urge that no effort should be spared to give effect to the wishes of the trade.

Yours faithfully,
JOHN D. COPEMAN,
Chairman.

Mr. CLANCY. Do the hon. gentleman's contracts not cover the whole season ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The contracts covered all the trips that the ships made.

Mr. CLANCY. Well, then, that letter has not much point.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This is the kind of work that is being done. I want to say a word or two in regard to the cheese trade, a trade which has been the glory and the boast of the people and particularly the farmers of Canada for many years. We have made notable progress in this trade which commenced so many years ago. Many years ago, by the enterprise of the people of Ontario chiefly in the beginning, this trade obtained a high position and it maintained that position ever since until last year. Unfortunately, last year, in consequence of the heating of the cheese in the cheese factories, in the storing rooms here and during transportation, the cheese of Canada did not have as good a reputation on the English market as it had before.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman——

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If the hon. gentleman will have a moment's patience I will give him all the information he wants and perhaps a little more. My hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Smith) quoted apparently a statement made by Prof. Robertson before the Committee on Agriculture last year. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith) intended to quote correctly, but as a matter of fact he did not. He said that Prof. Robertson prophesied that we would lose $3,000,000 on our cheese trade this year. Prof. Robertson as a matter of fact said $2,000,000, and I have no doubt that is a misprint, or a slip of the tongue on the part of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith). But the other misquotation can hardly be that, for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith) was in the committee and he himself questioned Prof. Robertson. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith) said in his speech :

Professor Robertson came before the Agriculture Committee of the House a year ago, and stated that owing largely to the bad ventilation of these steamships, our cheese, which is one of our largest exportable products and most valuable, had received a black eye in the old country market; that our cheese, which had stood in the highest notch, had received a setback, and he prophesied that this year our exports of cheese would shrink in value by $3,000,000.

It should have been $2,000,000, as a matter of fact. Then the hon. gentleman also said that instead of taking hold of it in a whole-hearted fashion, I neglected to compel the steamship companies to work the fans to ventilate the holds and that in consequence our cheese was injured in transit to England. As a matter of fact what occured is this, and this is what Prof. Robertson said :

Professor Jas. W. Robertson, Commissioner of Agriculture and Dairying, was called, and continued his evidence, as follows :—

The next matter I wish to bring before the committee is the improvement of the cheese trade, with special reference to the need of better curing rooms at cheese factories. I need not go into details at length, as there is now in course of publication a bulletin for distribution before the factories open this season.

Last season our cheese trade got the worst set-back from poor boxes and heated quality it ever got. It is now in a precarious position. I do not know of a time when it was in a more doubtful position than it is at present. We got good prices in the summer, but hot weather in August and September caused the cheese to be heated, and much of it was landed in England in poor condition. It looks as if we might receive this summer of 1901 to the extent of $2,000,000 less from our export cheese trade, because of the bad impression made in England last season by the poor condition in which so much of it was landed.

By Mr. Smith (Wentworth) :

Q. Where was this cheese heated ?

A. In the factories first, from want of good curing rooms. In many of the factories last summer the temperature went up to 85 degrees in the rooms when it should not have gone above 65. Some of it was heated in the railway cars.

That was Prof. Robertson's statement, that was the evidence which the hon. member for Wentworth obtained from Prof. Robertson in the committee, but the hon. gentleman gave this House the impression that Prof. Robertson had attributed that difficulty entirely to transportation on the steamer from Canada to England, when as a matter of fact, Prof. Robertson said nothing of the kind.

Now, Sir, what are the facts ? For the last three years Prof. Robertson and my dairy officer have been urging upon the cheese makers of Canada to make a change in their cheese factories; to get better curing rooms so that the cheese could be cured in a cooler temperature. We carried on a number of experiments three years past; first scientific under a bacteriologist and afterwards practically in a number of cheese factories in the country. The same kind of experiments were carried on a little later at the Guelph Agricultural College, and the same kind of experiments were carried on next year in the Geneva Experimental station in New York under Prof. Van Slyke. It was proved conclusively by all these experiments that cheese which was cured at a temperature below sixty-five was materially better than, and worth more than cheese which at any period of its curing or after handling was subjected to a temperature above that. We therefore urged upon the people of the country to so improve their curing rooms that they could insure a temperature in them below sixty-five degrees. I am sorry to say that the people were led away by the fact that next year they got a good price for their cheese as it was, and they disregarded this advice and these warnings. Last year they continued in the same way, and the result was that our cheese in England acquired a bad name, and we lost, I venture to say, at least $2,000,000 as the result of the disregard by the cheese makers of this country of the advice that was tendered to them, and of the facts that were laid before them in reference to the experiments conducted by my department and by those others to whom I have alluded.

Mr. CLANCY. The cheese makers say that is not so.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The cheese makers will not say that is not so, in the presence of myself, or of Prof. Robertson, or of the experts who carried on the experiments I have referred to. I have stated the same thing at the Eastern Dairymens' Convention which was held at Whitby. Mr. Ruddick also went to the Western Dairymens' Convention at Woodstock this last fall, and he laid the same facts before that great dairy convention where the best dairymen of the Dominion congregated, and the result was that the people begged us to put in practice the new scheme which was suggested to them for trying to get over that difficulty. Not one single man in either of these great conventions stated what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy)—without knowing anything about it—dares to state here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I venture to tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) that the Eastern and Western Dairymens' Associations for the province of Ontario, represent the farmers and the dairymen of this country far more than he does, and that they know more about the cheese business than he.

Mr. CLANCY. I did not give that statement as my own opinion at all. I told the minister that the cheese makers generally denied the statement, and they point out that long before the hon. gentleman's cold storage business they had established the Canadian cheese trade in England.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) does not yet know the difference between the cold storage system, and that cool storage necessary for the carriage of cheese.

Mr. CLANCY. I know it quite well.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) has made a statement which is not supported by the facts. If the dairymen of Ontario agree with the hon. gentleman, how was it, that at the dairy convention at Whitby where there were assembled 600 or 700 of the best dairymen of the province of Ontario, there was not a word of dissent when the statement was made before them by myself? If the hon. gentleman is right, how is it that at the Western Dairymens' Convention in Woodstock nothing of that kind was said by the men who are the leaders in this work, and who placed the cheese trade of Canada where it is to-day, while the hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) has never had anything to do with it? I venture to say that the people of Canada; I venture to say that the members of this House will agree with me, that the men who assembled at these dairymen's conventions know more about the cheese trade than does the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CLANCY. I suppose it is not necessary for me to repeat that I did not make that assertion on my own knowledge?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, but you said it was stated to you by the leading cheese makers of the country.

Mr. CLANCY. Quite so.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I say that the leading cheese makers of this country are represented in the dairymen's conventions in the province of Ontario, and that any cheese makers who do not come to these conventions are not the leading cheese men of this country.

Now, Sir, we are hoping to get over this difficulty and we are prepared this season to try the experiment of central accummulating rooms for the assembling of the cheese for curing purposes. That scheme was laid before these two dairy conventions in Ontario, and it was also laid before the dairy convention of the province of Quebec. It was accepted by the dairymen who were present at these conventions as being a first rate scheme. They endorsed the carrying out of the experiment which is to be carried out this season, and so far were they satisfied with it that I have had application after application from people all over this country asking for information as to how they could carry it out at their own expense if they had to do so, but still more so requesting for information as to how to get the department to carry it out in their particular district.

Now, Sir, I have gone over these facts in general terms, and also to a certain extent in detail. I have laid them before the House because I wish that hon. members and the people of the country generally should appreciate and understand, that while nobody on the government benches, least of all myself, wish in any way to claim credit for the enormous crops of Canada during the last few years; crops which have been so instrumental in stimulating the trade of this country; nevertheless we do believe, and I venture to say that I am prepared to give proof of it at any time and anywhere: that in Canada to-day, the government through the department over which I have the honour to preside, has been able to do a great deal to help, and to guide, and to direct the work of the farmers of this country, so that that work has been made more profitable to them than it was in days gone by. That is all I do claim and I think I can prove that claim. I believe that the trade returns show it; I believe that the records of the prices obtained for our exported products in the old country markets show it, and therefore I leave the matter in the hands of the House.

Now, Sir, I am not going to delay the House much longer. I am glad to have had the opportunity of saying a few words on this question. We have to-day an apparently clear cut division between the opposite sides of the House. We have the decision of the government that they should not make any changes in the tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite, through the mouth of the leader of the opposition, have put forward an amendment to the motion of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. It seems to me, Sir, that with the record of the last five years of the commerce and trade of Canada; with the record of the material development in the country; with the record of the prosperity which has reigned in every branch of business, in every industry of this country, amongst the great classes of producers—it seems to me that the principle embodied in the saying to let well enough alone, is the one that ought to guide us at the moment. If difficulties arise in the progress of the country, or in the condition of its trade, or its industrial development, and the government can do anything which seems to them likely to help that progress and development, to help consumers as well as producers, it would be no doubt their duty to take the situation into consideration. But with such a record as we have had during the past five years, with people coming into the country by the thousands to make this country their home, and with the productions of the country going out in such enormous quantities and bringing in such magnificent returns to build up this country, it seems to me that it would be a great mistake for us to change the condition of affairs which has brought these magnificent results about. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that nothing that the government has done has brought them about. The government have been in power five years and more. In 1897 we inaugurated a fiscal policy which was signalized by a reduction of the duties, and by a preference which has given us a great advantage in the English market, as it has given our fellow-countrymen in the old land an advantage in our market. The results of this policy seem to be magnificent in any way you look at them; and with this fact before our eyes, I cannot see that it is necessary or that it would be good policy to make a change now. If in the future any change is required, let the future take care of itself; but let the present conditions continue as they are, and I believe the material advancement of the country will go on as it has done so splendidly during the past five years.

Mr. ANDREW BRODER (Dundas). Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to discuss the resolution which is immediately before the House, I will, like a great many others, digress a little to deal with the question of the census, which has been so largely dealt with by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and to answer some of the accusations which have been made by that hon. gentleman. I take some interest in the census, having been myself a chief officer for twenty-two counties in the eastern part of the province of Ontario, and I wish to say emphatically that the twenty-two commissioners under my charge who were brought here to receive their instructions from Mr. St. Denis, were most particularly directed to guard against any inaccuracies in taking the census. They were so carefully directed that that gentleman said to them: 'When you go home to instruct your enumerators, if you find that there is anything that you do not understand, communicate with Mr. Broder; and if he is out of reach, communicate with the department before you do any work. And yet the hon. gentleman charges this sworn body of men with having stuffed the census. It is a poor compliment to pay to 4,239 men in this Dominion, 1,300 of whom were in the province of Ontario, to say that they joined together as one man to stuff the census; and it was a poor compliment to pay to the reverend gentleman whom he quoted to-day to suppose that men under their instructions and guidance would foster anything of that kind. What are the facts of the case? Hon. gentlemen opposite were prophets a few years ago. They prophesied a certain increase in the population of this country; and when accused of spending more money than ought to be spent, their justification was that the population had increased wonderfully. Now, these hon. gentlemen are face to face with their prophesies, and they find that they do not agree with the facts; therefore somebody must be indicted. But I am glad to be able to say that the public have paid very little attention to the accusations of the Minister of Trade and Commence. They fell about as dead as his apologetic thesis fell a few years ago. What are the facts? The increase in the province of Quebec from 1881 to 1891 was 120,508, while the increase from 1891 to 1901, was 132,444, in round numbers 4,000 more of an increase from the stuffed census to the present census than the previous increase. Now, if the census was stuffed to the extent of 40,000 names, as the hon. gentleman holds, how is it possible for the present census to go so much beyond the natural increase? And when you turn up 'Hansard' and quote the language of the Minister of Agriculture, when he was justifying the issue of that Côté circular, what do we find him saying? He said that the reason for it was that the French population left the province of Quebec and went to the United States. Why, I thought no person was now leaving this country. That was the reason the hon. gentleman gave for the issue of this circular—to reach the people who were leaving the province and going to the United States—a direct bid to stuff the census. I think there was an interview some time ago with Mr. Côté, in which that gentleman gave as a reason why the census of 891 was stuffed, that the enumerators got 3 cents per name. Well, if 3 cents per name induced these gentlemen to stuff the census, I wonder how 5 cents a name works. And when you come to the cost of the census, in 1891 it was not quite $500,000, whereas hon. gentlemen opposite have spent $1,000,000 up to date, and they have a year and a half before their work will be completed. I will give the hon. gentleman this advice, although he will have no census to take again, there is no doubt about that: but if he has, let him appoint his own officials, instead of allowing the premier of Ontario to unload upon him some one he wants to get rid of. That is what has happened. Mr. Blue was over the Mining Bureau of the province of Ontario, and the miners wanted to get rid of him, and they loaded him on to the Minister of Agriculture, and he has spent up to date over $1,000,000. Then, look at the number of men employed to take the census. In 1891 there were some 4,000 odd enumerators, but there are over 8,000 to take the last census. As proof of that I will give you the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture that they appointed an enumerator for each polling sub-division, and there are over 8,000 polling sub-divisions in the Dominion of Canada. Another thing I wish to say—that the hon. gentleman takes evidence ten or eleven years after the fact as proof against men who have taken a solemn affidavit to do a certain piece of work; and the reverend gentleman who sent in the statements which have been read, do not pretend to say that they are a full census of the people. If the hon. gentleman had read to this House the correspondence connected with the documents from which he tried to make out his case, he would find that they condemned himself most strongly. Some of these men gave evidence within three months, and some of these hon. gentlemen here have been hunting for evidence to justify the statement made by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. The name generally applied, I believe, to the men who get up a brief is that of jackal for the counsel employed, and the Minister of Agriculture has been acting in this capacity for his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. These hon. gentlemen had to pull the Minister of Trade and Commerce out of a hole, but it will take more than the Minister of Agriculture to do that.

What are the facts? The exodus is still going on, to the regret of every honest Canadian. And what kind of men are leaving the country? Young men educated in our schools, who are sent not only to our colleges but to our high schools and collegiate institutes in order to be fit for the business of life. These are the men who, finding there is no room for them in our commercial centres, have to go to the United States. After the state has educated them and their parents have made sacrifices to send them to school, they cannot find employment in this country, even in this era of boasted prosperity, and have to go to the United States. There is not a man in this country, who is engaged in business, who does not know but too well that there never was a time in the history of the country when it was so difficult to find business openings for young men of education and ability to make their way in commercial life. Let me cite one of these hon. gentlemen's own witnesses—no doubt an unwilling witness but none the less credible on that account. I hold in my hand the report of the Minister of Education for the province of Ontario. And what does he say regarding our population? All will admit that an indication of the population of the country is the number of its children. And what do we find? We find that the number of children of school age—and that age has not been changed since 1892—in Ontario in 1899 was 586,350 as compared with 595,238 in 1892. In other words, at the end of seven years after 1892, there were 8,838 less school children in the province of Ontario than there were seven years previously. There is one of the hon. gentleman's own witnesses. He may repudiate him if he likes, but there can be no doubt that his statement is a correct one. That is the present position. Let the Minister of Trade and Commerce give a little attention to these figures and see how they square with the explanation he made throughout the country in justification of our increased expenditure.

The Minister of Agriculture has laid a great deal of stress on the encouragement he claims to have given certain enterprises in this country. Does he pretend that it is he who has led the trade of the country in these matters to which the hon. gentleman has referred. If he does, no one will believe him. Whatever development has taken place has been due to the efforts of our energetic business men who have been using every effort to push trade along. Does he pretend, for instance, that the cold storage under his control is adequate to the requirements of the country ? Let me inform him where some of our cheese is heated. It is not in the factory, but in travelling from one point to another in the country in order to reach the ocean port, and the heating is due to the absence of those cold storage cars which the hon. gentleman is supposed to provide. The cars were not on hand, supplied with this cold storage, and this cheese had to be put into red hot stations, where they had to wait for this cold storage accommodation. The heating did not take place in the factories. This we have on the authority of Professor Robertson and others. I have personal knowledge myself of what I am talking about, and I know that it does not make any difference how good your cheese is, if you get it heated on its way to market you may freeze it as long as you like afterwards, it will not recover its former quality. The hon. gentleman knows well that he started out with one kind of cold storage, and then found he had no ventilation and had to change it. He had to get ventilated cold storage, and that is why the ship-owners do not want to bother with him. They know very well that he does not know exactly what he is going to do.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The cold storage has never been changed but we have supplied ventilation in the holds of steamers.

Mr. BRODER. Why then did the fruit which the hon. gentleman sent out get destroyed ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It did not.

Mr. BRODER. Why, the hon. gentleman, in order to explain his failure, told us that over in South Africa they were six years trying to find out how to keep peaches in good condition during shipment, and he is not any more clever than the people in South Africa. He will be six years before he can get a proper system. He is only carrying out the plans laid down by the late Conservative administration, and the gentleman in charge is the same one whom the Conservatives appointed.

The hon. gentleman takes great credit for having tried to help the farmers. But in 1896, when an estimate for cold storage was submitted to the House and when Mr. Foster, who was then acting Minister of Agriculture, wanted these gentlemen to let it go through, they refused, and yet now they talk about their endeavours to promote the interests of the farmers. The hon. gentleman asks us if we ignore the influence of the farmers institutes throughout Ontario. Certainly not, but he must not forget that the agricultural societies do not take so much stock in what he says as he thinks they do. I find in the 'Hansard' of 1902 that Mr. Bennett put the hon. gentleman the following question :

> Is the government aware that at a meeting held on the 5th day of February, instant, in the city of Toronto, the following resolution was passed unanimously by the Shorthorn Breeders Association.
>
> We, the members of the Dominion Shorthorn Breeders Association, at our annual meeting, resolved that the tubercular test is unreliable, unnecessary, and in many cases injurious, and that we urge its discontinuance of the compulsory use of toxine by the Dominion government Department of Agriculture ; and we also fail to see the object now of requiring ninety days quarantine, as there is no contagious disease in Great Britain requiring its enforcement to such a length of time.
>
> In view of the above action, is it the intention of the government to meet the wishes of the said association ?

What did the minister say in reply ? He said :

> It is not the intention of the government to act in the direction indicated by the resolution.

He does not pay much attention to these gentlemen nor do they pay much attention to him. Well, the hon. gentleman afterwards spoke for about a half an hour to these men trying to justify his refusal and they passed a resolution condemning it. So much for these societies view of the administration of the minister, and I think that the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario concurred in their condemnation of his administration. He is not in line with these societies, so that we must just take what he says about these matters with a considerable degree of doubt.

There is another matter to which I wish to refer. The hon. gentleman spoke of the exodus of to-day as being an exodus from south to north, instead of as formerly from north to south. But he omitted to tell us that if he and his friends had had their way in the past, there would have been no north country for any exodus to go to. That country would never have been opened up, and consequently there would be no people seeking it out as a place for settlement. But they are singing quite a different song now from what they did formerly. It was not so very long ago when they said : Let that country go, it is not worth bothering about. Very well, then hon. gentlemen have to admit that there is an increase in trade largely from the products of that country which was opened up through the efforts of the Conservative party. And when you deduct the bullion and ore, and the flour and wheat, which are the products of the North-west and Manitoba, the hon. gentleman's trade shrinks very rapidly. While we are on the subject of quarantine, I may say that the hon. gentleman takes great credit for having raised the quarantine, or, rather, modified the condition between this country and the United States. I do not know what the hon. gentleman himself says, but his friends on the platform throughout the country say that Hon. Sydney Fisher, a practical farmer, convinced the American people that our cattle were free from disease. But, in the United States the cattle were known at one time to be diseased. Did the Americans convince Hon. Sydney Fisher, the practical farmer, that their cattle were not diseased? He opened the gates irrespective of that fact, and that is one of the reasons that we cannot get the embargo in the British market raised—the hon. gentleman has put that beyond all possibility. In fact, he has abandoned the attempt, knowing the impossibility of it, since he made this arrangement with the United States. He ought to have looked after Canadian interests, and I do not see much benefit to Canadians in sending a twelve or fourteen dollar animal over to the United States for the Americans to fatten and send over to England as worth seventy-five or eighty dollars.

The Liberal party all over this country are singing the praises of the hon. minister as a practical farmer. I question whether he has ever been between the plough tails. I question whether he ever intends to try. But I want to tell the hon. gentleman that in spite of all the boasting of his friends, in spite of all he has said, he cannot show where he has added one article to the curriculum of the agricultural text-books. In the Agriculture Committee, we are dealing with the same subjects that we dealt with in 1896. And you can go a good deal further back. Cato was asked by a person how to get rich and his answer was 'Feed cattle.' 'Feed them how?' 'Feed them moderately.' This was eighteen hundred and fifty years ago, and the hon. gentleman is discussing that question to-day. But this 'practical farmer' of whom his friends say so much does not do anything to fasten the people to the soil. What kind of farmers does he meet? He meets the farmer who gets up at nine o'clock and goes down about three o'clock to see how his bank account stands, not the poor farmer who rises before daylight and ploughs his furrow alone. The poor farmer of small means and in debt is not reached by the hon. gentleman. The man who can take hold and use the propositions laid down by the hon. gentleman is the man who has means to put up buildings, to buy machinery and improve his land. But the poor fellow who is looking for shelter rather than for a comfortable house, who wants to find a place to put his cattle where they will be out of the reach of the storm, is overlooked by the hon. gentleman, though he is a 'practical farmer.' That is one reason why our population is going away from the farm. Free corn, which the hon. gentleman talks so much of, was not intended for the poor fellow I have been speaking of. He can eat Johnny cake, but the bulk of the free corn is for the cattle in the stalls. When this poor fellow puts on his shoulder a bag of grain to go to market, he is overtaken on the way by a full bag of American corn to be sold ahead of him. This is the fellow the hon. gentleman has overlooked. What does the census show? That census must be a cause of thought to every loyal Canadian. We know that it will be impossible to assimilate the foreign element coming into this country unless the natural increase of our population is larger than the census shows. We are up against the fact that the foreign element coming into this country, not assimilated by our own population will never have the true Canadian sentiment that should be shared by all our people. Now, in 1901, we had a rural population of 3,349,055, and an urban population of 2,206,001, that is we had 328,464 more of rural than of urban population. But ten years before, in 1891, we had 3,296,141 rural population and 1,537,098 urban population, or a rural population greater than the urban by 1,759,043. We have increased our total population by 530,427, but our population of farmers has increased by only 52,924, and that included the North-west, where hon. gentlemen claim to have sent in, since 1891, 262,000. In other words, we have put one man on the soil and we have sent 9 to the town. And this under a 'practical farmer.' I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has not ploughed to the end of his furrow yet. His duty is hardly begun. This is a question that every honest Canadian ought to try to solve. It is a serious thing to think that this wide gate is open out of the country, that those who stand at the gate of life are able with less frequency to report a new life in which there may be great possibilities for the future. That question stands for solution not only at the door of the state, but also at the door of the church. You may have volume of trade, but the true assurance of economic prosperity and of social security is in the increase and assimilation of population.

Now I want to devote a few minutes to another matter, which the hon. gentleman touched very lightly. It is a question that I do not wonder he touched lightly. I find he was over in England last summer. I was glad to see he was over there. He made a statement there, which is reported in the Lancashire 'Courier,' while he was speaking before the Board of Trade. He told them that we did not want anything for this preference which we are giving them. The right hon. gentleman who leads the government had already made that statement a few years ago. But that is not the end of it. We see Mr. W. T. R. Preston bobbing up a few days ago at the London Chamber of Commerce, and saying, We do not want anything for this. How are public men in England, however well inclined they may be to give Canada a preference in the British markets, to go to their people and ask them to make any sacrifices, when the premier of Canada, the Minister of Agriculture and their agents are singing out, We don't want any preference ? It is a difficult task for the public men of England to encourage or advocate a preference to the colonies in face of this Canadian government saying, We don't want it. These gentlemen are not honest in the interests of Canada when they make that statement. They say there is a great deal in sentiment. Well, Sir, if we follow the history of trade in the United States there is very little in sentiment. It is a very strange fact that the trade of the United States for the last forty years has increased and expanded as England's trade and colonial expansion has increased and expanded. The United States' expansion of trade with England has increased as England's has increased. But that is not the history of Canada. These gentlemen should endeavour to put Canada in the same relative position towards England that the United States occupies ; and, Sir, they are not true to the interests of this country when they make no attempt to do so. If there is one thing more than another that renders high protection necessary in Canada it is the conditions of this country. What are they ? As an English writer has said, the conditions which justify protection are, a country with large natural resources undeveloped, a high political and industrial outlook, and late on coming into the markets of industry. That is exactly the position of Canada. We have untold resources undeveloped ; we think we have the prospect of high intellectual and political advancement, and we know we have ability in the markets of industry. Therefore, the duty of Canadians is to stand by these conditions and to make the fiscal policy one that will develop those conditions to the highest extent possible.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—CANADIAN CASUALTIES.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Before the House rises at six o'clock the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Hon. Mr. Borden) desires to read an important telegram.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). I have here a message which has been sent from Capetown to His Excellency the Governor General, and as it refers to a press despatch which has been reported to-day in the bulletins, and gives further particulars in reference to it, I thought the House would like to hear it :

Capetown, April 4, 1902.

Governor, Ottawa.

'C' 3963. Following casualties reported. Daschpoort 138, Kleinhardts river, 31st March. 2nd Regiment Canadian Mounted Rifles. Severely wounded, Lt. R. H. Ryan, forearm. Slightly wounded, Lieut. George Baptist McKay, hand ; Lieut. R. F. Markham, arm ; Lieut. W. P. Louden, shoulder. Non-commissioned officers and men killed, 9 ; wounded, 40. Names not yet received.

(Sgd.) CASUALTY.

I may be allowed to add, Mr. Speaker, that while this is very sad news, there is this satisfaction to be taken out of it, that Canadians are maintaining that reputation which they have already earned in South Africa, and that they still prefer death to surrender.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SPRAGUE'S FALLS MANUFACTURING COMPANY, LIMITED.

House again in committee on Bill No. 37 to incorporate the Sprague's Falls Manufacturing Company, Limited.—Mr. Emmerson.

On section 10,

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Hon. H. G. Carroll). It has been agreed that an amendment shall be made to section 10, which reads as follows :

The company shall not take or hold within its booms any prize or unmarked logs, &c.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden, Halifax) suggested that this clause would perhaps come into conflict with the laws of the legislature of New Brunswick, but in looking into the statutes of New Brunswick I find that the only sections which would bear upon this subject are sections 5 and 9 of the Revised Statutes, chap. 133. Section 5 provides :

In any prosecution under this chapter . . . If the justice shall be satisfied upon sufficient evidence that the ownership of such lumber is in the claimant, or any person not being the defendant, he shall order the same to be delivered up to the owner thereof, or his agent, on payment of reasonable charges for keeping the same.

Section 9 says :

The owner of any such lumber may at any reasonable time, by himself or his agent, enter in a peaceable manner upon any mill, mill-pond brow, boom or raft of lumber, in search of any such property he may have lost; any person wilfully preventing such search, shall for each offence forfeit not more than ten, nor less than five pounds, to be paid to the person by whom or on whose account such entry may have been claimed.

These are the only sections that relate to this matter, and this section 10 of the Bill does not conflict with any provincial law, but as the hon. leader of the opposition wanted this matter to be made absolutely clear I have prepared an amendment to this section which reads as follows :

Subject to the provisions of any Act of the legislature of the said province, the company shall not take or hold within its booms any prize or unmarked logs and any person, &c.

Amendment agreed to, Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

ST. LAWRENCE AND NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill No. 39 to incorporate the St. Lawrence and Northern Railway Company.—Mr. Bureau.

On section 10,

The company may construct and operate telegraph and telephone lines and establish offices for the transmission of messages for the public and collect tolls for so doing ; and for the purpose of operating such telegraph and telephone lines, the company may enter into a contract with any other company, or may lease the company's lines or any part thereof, and may connect its lines with the lines of any telegraph or telephone company.

Mr. SPROULE. If this is a general power given to this company all along its main line and branches not only for the purposes of the undertaking but also for the purpose of doing a general business it must connect with towns and villages, and before placing its poles on the streets and highways it should obtain the authority of the municipal corporations. We should put the same conditions in this Bill as those we put in a Bill last week and which we put into all telephone and telegraph Bills that we pass.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I think the Railway Act provides for that.

Mr. SPROULE. It does not.

Mr. HYMAN. Probably there is more restriction in this clause than there is in the general sense. It is quite true what the hon. gentleman for Grey says, that they are generally restricted 'for the purposes of the undertaking'; but in this particular instance they are restricted along the whole length of the line of the railway and its branches.

Mr. SPROULE. If you allow them to do a general business they must connect with villages somewhere and then they would depart some distance from their line.

Mr. HYMAN. They are only entitled to construct telegraphs along their line and can only use their own stations I suppose.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). That is the way I understood it at first, but it would seem that the language of the section might empower the company to construct telephone lines elsewhere than on their own property. The section says that they may construct 'along the line of their railway,' and it seems to me that might empower them to construct along the railway but not necessarily on their own property.

Mr. McCARTHY. Suppose the railway line would take a circuitous route and that by cutting across they could save a few miles of poles and wires they should not be deprived of that privilege.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Certainly not, but if they cross a highway they should be subject to having the consent of the municipality, and if they build on private property there should be compensation.

Mr. McCARTHY. I quite agree in that.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). If the clause were made to read 'upon and along their line of railway' it would make it plain.

Mr. HYMAN. There would be no objection to that.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose they lease another line, what power would they have under this Act.

Mr. FRASER. They would take over the power of the company from whom they leased it.

Mr. SPROULE. Then the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition would cover the ground.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, read a third time, and passed.

STRAIT OF CANSO BRIDGE COMPANY.

House in Committee on Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Strait of Canso Bridge Company.—Mr. McLennan.

On subsection C, of section 8,

Mr. SPROULE. Is there anything to provide that tolls shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council ? Does the Railway Act provide this ?

Mr. WADE. There was some doubt in the committee as to whether the Railway Act provided for tolls over a bridge, and therefore these words 'subject to the provisions of the Railway Act' were added to subsection C. in the Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. We ought to make it clear that the tolls shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council before this Bill becomes law.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. If the words added are not sufficient, we ought to mention that special section of the Railway Act, so as to make it clear that it governs the tolls on the bridge.

Mr. WADE. One of the points raised in the Railway Committee was that, as there was some little doubt, it would be better to provide that the tolls over the bridge should be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. But instead of these words the words 'subject to the Railway Act' were put in, which does not carry out the intention of the committee. I would therefore move that words be added making these tolls subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. It is the intention of the promoters that the Governor in Council should have control over everything.

Mr. SPROULE. I should be disposed to go further and provide that the Governor in Council shall have the power to revise the tolls and lower them if necessary. When we say that the tolls shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, then once they are approved, the company may refuse to lower them although they may prove to be too high. Once these tolls are approved and become law, and the company do not change them, the Governor in Council may not have the power to make any change. Then, what is subject to the Railway Act would only be the railway tolls. It would not apply to foot passengers or vehicles. There must be some provision giving the Governor in Council control of these tolls also.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I might also call attention to the fact that the Railway Act only regulates tolls on the railways. The company fixes the tolls and the Governor in Council approves of them. But bridge tolls, as a rule, have been treated as distinct from railway tolls, and there has been a special clause authorizing the Governor in Council to deal with them.

Mr. WADE. That is all I proposed. I submit that the words in the Bill do not correctly represent what was agreed upon in the committee, and I proposed to substitute the words 'subject to the control of the Governor in Council.' That gives continuing control.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. I would suggest that it be made 'control and regulation.'

Mr. WADE. I am free to put that in.

Mr. SPROULE. That would be indefinite. What kind of 'control' is meant?

Mr. WADE. If it is by this government, it will be good control.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Make it 'fix, control and regulate.'

Mr. SPROULE. If the Governor in Council has the power to fix the tolls in the first place as well as to regulate them, that will be all right.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Mr. Wade moves that the words 'provisions of the Railway Act' be struck out, and the following words be inserted 'the control and regulation of the Governor in Council.'

Mr. SPROULE. I do not like to object, but I do not see why we should not have the carefully considered clause which has been used in other cases. This does not seem to be very clear.

Mr. WADE. Put in both. The object of the company is to have the tolls absolutely under the control of the Governor in Council. I thought I had met the objection of the other side, having adopted the phraseology of the leader of the opposition. But if any hon. gentleman thinks it well to have the tolls subjected to the clause of the Railway Act, then, put that in also.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). I think the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) does not understand the position taken by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). There is a clause which has been used in the acts governing other bridges, and it is suggested that this clause should be used. The chairman of the Railway Committee is in the House and could inform us about this.

Mr. WADE. It seems doubtful whether the provisions of the Railway Act cover tolls on bridges. But if we make this Bill subject to the Railway Act and add, with regard to this clause, that the tolls shall be subject to the control of the Governor in Council, surely we have it all covered.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. But, as I have pointed out, under the Railway Act, the company fixes the tolls and takes them to the Governor in Council to be approved. But, under the bridge clause, the tolls must be fixed before they commence charging at all. I do not wish to take up time, as we have only an hour and we desire to put through these other Bills. But if you provide that the Governor in Council shall 'fix, control and regulate' the tolls, you make it all right. If we do not put this in satisfactory form now, I fear we shall have it back from the Senate.

Mr. WADE. Where would the hon. gentleman suggest putting in the word 'fix'?

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). You will have to alter the form of it. If you make it 'charge and collect such tolls upon and for the use of the bridge and railways as shall be fixed and determined by the Governor in Council,' that would cover it.

Mr. WADE. I am quite content.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Make it 'as shall from time to time, be fixed by the Governor in Council.'

Mr. WADE. I move to add these words at the end of the section: 'Such tolls to be fixed and regulated by the Governor in Council.'

Mr. SPROULE. I think we should say from 'time to time.' What would be a reasonable toll to-day, a few years hence might be found very unreasonable, and the Governor in Council ought to have power to compel a reduction of tolls if necessary.

Mr. WADE. They have the power. A railway has to submit its schedule of rates and classifications to the government, giving their maximum rates, and the government approves of it. But at any time after that, the government has power to alter the classification or to alter the rates. That has been done with railways, and it can be done here.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). The Governor in Council surely can be trusted not to embarrass a company by making arbitrary and unnecessary changes.

Mr. SPROULE. Let us understand whether the government have this power or not, because if not, we shall insist upon the Bill being held over until we can have it amended. If, as the member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) says, the Governor in Council has power to change the rates from time to time, then there can be no reasonable objection to put those words 'from time to time' in the Bill, so that they shall have power to regulate and change the tolls.

Mr. FRASER. If they have that power now under the Railway Act, it is hardly worth while bringing it in here.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. One of the vexed questions under the Railway Act to-day is whether they can change a toll once they have approved of it. There is no authority under the Railway Act to levy a cent for persons or animals crossing the bridge, but only as to freights.

Mr. SPROULE. I move in amendment that the words 'from time to time' be inserted after the word 'regulate.'

Mr. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). There doesn't seem to be any great necessity for putting in those words 'from time to time.' If the matter is subject to the Railway Act, it seems to me the Governor in Council has already authority to regulate the tolls from time to time.

Mr. WADE. It may have a weakening effect on the charter. It may be necessary for that company to come to the government and get a rate fixed before they can finance their scheme. If it were known that that rate were subject to change, they might not be able to raise capital sufficient to build the bridge. If you go into the money markets of the world with a scheme to build a bridge, and you show that you have a fixed rate for a certain length of time, the scheme may be enticing; but if it appears on the face of the Bill that these tolls as they exist to-day may be arbitrarily changed to-morrow by the government, that provision would have a deterrent effect on financiers. Therefore, I think if the government has power to fix and regulate tolls, they have power to say that they will fix this toll now for five years, or ten years, or twenty years. We will submit to any provision fixing the tolls for a certain period. I do not like to have the Bill made hard and fast, or made in such a form as will kill the whole scheme. It is hard enough to get money now. The Bill in its present shape passed the Railway Committee unanimously after it was fully discussed. I do not think it is hardly fair that these technical objections should be taken, they can accomplish no good. The hands of the government are entirely free, when the company goes to have its rates fixed. The government is absolutely free to make any rates they think desirable under the circumstances, in order to give such encouragement to the scheme as may be necessary to carry it through.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). Do you go to the Governor in Council to get your rates fixed before you finance the bridge?

Mr. WADE. Yes, the company may have to.

Mr. BORDEN (Halifax). A railway company for example, does not go to the Governor in Council in order to have their rates approved before they finance their scheme. In all these cases you may trust to the Governor in Council being reasonable, that they will not arbitrarily change these rates from year to year. Any railway company is in the same position with regard to fixing its rates. I think the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) is reasonable. It may not be in the power of the Governor in Council ever to touch these tolls again, and I think they should have power to change them when they think circumstances require it. It may be that the tolls twenty-five years from now should be very much less than they are now. The Governor in Council must have the right to interfere. My hon. friend says the Governor in Council has the right to interfere as to railways; should he not have the same right in respect to these tolls?

Mr. WADE. There is this difference; in regard to nine-tenths of the railways in the Dominion there is a recognized rate which is the maximum rate that railways are permitted to charge. Therefore, if a railway is being promoted, the parties have the right to assume that they will be permitted to charge the usual maximum rate throughout the Dominion. It is quite a different matter in regard to a bridge, because, a bridge being constructed under circumstances of this sort, there is no arrangement as to the tolls they may be permitted to be charged and in my humble judgment I believe it would be necessary for the parties to go to the Governor in Council before they could finance their scheme and ask what would be the maximum rate they could charge. I do not think that would be unreasonable. The Governor in Council has the power to say: We will fix you this rate unaltered for two or five or ten years but only for that time. The Governor in Council is at liberty to use his discretion as thinks proper under the circumstances.

Mr. SPROULE. If the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Wade) had been in this House a few years ago he would have remembered a discussion which took place in regard to the rates charged on the Victoria Bridge, Montreal. He would remember that it was contended that once the Governor in Council had fixed the rates he could not change them, and notwithstanding the fact that the rates charged then were much too high it was contended that the Governor in Council could not lower them. It is to avoid such a thing as that occurring in the future that we ask for the insertion of this provision. There is another thing which I would like to mention. We have a Minister of Railways and Canals and there are other members of the government who are responsible for looking into railway Bills and Bills of this kind. We should hear from them upon the subject. I am quite sure if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was here he would agree with us, and put in a clause to regulate the tolls for foot passengers and other traffic.

Mr. WADE. These are the words that he suggests.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me very uncertain what the words are, because some hon. gentlemen say these are not the words that were put in by the committee. I think the hon. member had better accept this amendment, because I think that finally the Bill, if it passes, will pass with this clause in. I do not think it is unreasonable to ask him to accept the clause, and if the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals were here, I am sure he would insist upon it.

Mr. GALLIHER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me, if I understand aright the amendment proposed by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that it would practically impose upon the government the duty of regulating the tolls from time to time, not giving them the privilege of doing it, but imposing upon them the duty of doing so. Instead of putting in this clause suggested by way of amendment I believe that if we simply inserted the word 'control' making it read 'subject to the control' it would meet every objection that has been raised, because the word 'control,' in itself, without limitation, means absolute control. If the Governor in Council has the control of these rates, he has the absolute control unless it is limited by legislation and he can fix the rates from time to time.

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Here is the Bill prepared by the Minister of Justice (Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick) in regard to telephones and in it he places a clause giving the Governor in Council power to regulate tolls, saying that they must be approved by the Governor in Council before they are changed. The clause reads :

> Every by-law fixing and regulating tolls shall be subject to revision by the Governor in Council, from time to time after approval thereof.

Why would he do that if there was no doubt, because this is the same principle ? I have not had as much practical experience as the hon. member for Annapolis has had, but I have always understood that this was one of the vexed questions under the Railway Act, because, when the maximum rate was once fixed the railway companies have never wanted to change. But here, in this proposed telephone Bill, the hon. Minister of Justice proposes that this approval shall be necessary, and I think very wisely. He put it beyond peradventure. I quite agree with the hon. member for Annapolis, and that never struck me until he mentioned it, that it might affect railway companies in making through rates because bridge tolls might be of a nature which would make it extremely difficult for them to carry out their arangements. But, if the hon. gentleman is right in his contention that the Governor in Council always has the right to change railway traffic arrangements and rates after they have once been approved, then there would be nothing in his argument that that might injuriously affect the financing of the company. I do not know whether this is so or not but I do hope that when the Railway Act is consolidated the Minister of Railways and Canals, or parliament, will see to it that that question shall be settled and that the Governor in Council shall not only have the right to approve of the rates, but from time to time to alter them if there is any question about their alteration. I think probably the words that my hon. friend proposes to put in would enable the Governor in Council to change these rates, and I cannot see why, if they are not sufficient he should object to putting in the words 'from time to time' to make it clear.

Mr. WADE. No such provision, as far as I know—of course, I may be entirely wrong about this because I am not familiar with all the bridge Bills that are before the House—but no such provision as is now being sought to be incorporated in this Bill, has been asked for in regard to any other bridge Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes it has.

Mr. WADE. I am told that there has been no such provision proposed, and if I am wrong I will vacate my words. I can see difficulties in the way of putting in the words that are suggested, and these difficulties are to my mind difficulties which may be of much importance to the company. I am willing to assume this position that if any provisions similar to this have been included in the other Bills I will agree to this. I can see where it may be fatal to the interests of the company and I do not want it to go in unless it has been included in other Bills.

Mr. SPROULE. Let us rise, and report progress and we can find out.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Hon. Mr. Fielding). I was not present at the committee when this Bill was discussed. Probably the Minister of Railways and Canals (Hon. Mr. Blair) has had the matter under consideration and if the usual provisions in the bridge Bills are included in this that is all that is necessary. I would suggest that we proceed with the Bill, reserving this one point.

Subsection C of section 8 allowed to stand.

Progress reported.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 52) respecting the St. Clair and Erie Ship Canal Company.—Hon. Mr. Tisdale.

Bill (No. 44) respecting the Tilsonburg, Lake Erie and Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. McCarthy.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 83) to incorporate the Canadian Northern Express Company.—Mr. Davis.

Bill (No. 86) respecting the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company.—Mr. Cowan.

Bill (No. 87) respecting the Quebec Southern Railway Company.—Mr. Geoffrion.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. A. BRODER (Dundas). Mr. Speaker, just before the House rose at six o'clock, I was interrupted in my remarks by the announcement made by the Minister of Militia ; an announcement which I am sure every one in this House received with mingled feelings of regret and pride—regret for the loss of the lives of the brave Canadians, the news of which will darken many a home throughout the land ; and pride, that they died bravely fighting for the British empire. But, Sir, I thought when that announcement was made that it would be well for hon. gentlemen opposite to put up their colours somewhere, and to emulate the example of these brave Canadians. I was proceeding to remark that the American expansion of trade was commensurate with the expansion of English trade and commerce, and I shall read some figures from an American authority to prove the statement I make. I want to say this: That the importance of the trade of the British empire to any country can be easily understood when it is realized that the largest political organization the world has ever seen under civilized government, the British empire, embraces 16,662,-073 square miles containing 387,000,000 of people. The official figures given by the writer to whom I have referred, tell us that one-third of a century ago the American exports to Great Britain amounted to $225,-090,224, and in 1900 they amounted to $533,-819,545 ; an increase in thirty-three years of 137 per cent. During the same period, the American exports to British Africa increased 1,013 per cent; to British Australasia 421 per cent ; to British India, 1,126 per cent, and to British America 322 per cent. In 1900 the American exports to the entire world amounted to $1,394,483,082, of which they shipped to the British dominions $702,070,-802, or in other words, 50·34 of the whole, and to Great Britain alone, they shipped $553,819,454, or 28·28 per cent. During the same year the United States exports to Germany and to all German colonies were 13·43 per cent ; to France and to all French colonies 6·22 per cent ; to Italy 2·31 per cent ; and to Russia three-fourths of one per cent.. I want to say here that while hon. gentlemen opposite say so much about the change in British sentiment and the increased trade in consequence of that change, let me point out that Russia, a country that has been particularly friendly with the United States for thirty years only takes three-quarters of one per cent of the American exports. The Austrian empire only took one-half of one per cent of the export trade of the United States. In other words, the American exports to Great Britain are four times the value of those to Germany ; eight times the value of those to France ; twenty-one times the value of those to Italy; seventy times the value of those to Russia, and a hundred times the value of those to Austria. The American exports to Great Britain are more than double the American exports to Germany, France, Italy, Russia and Austria combined ; one-third greater than to all the continent of Europe ; and more than the American exports to all the rest of the world.

In view of that, I wish to say that the gentlemen who have control of the government of this country to-day, should wake up to the necessity of endeavouring to get control of our share of that great market which is now being occupied by the United States. It is a singular fact that notwithstanding the large area of agricultural lands in the United States, agriculture has ceased to be the dominant industry in that country, and manufacturing has become the dominant industry. Therefore this new Canada of ours, with her broad acres undeveloped, ought to put on her armour and endeavour to take possession of her share in that market. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, while boasting of what has been done in this country, has fallen far short of his duty in failing to take that broad outlook which any man controlling that department should take, and has failed to seize the opportunity which is offered to the Canadian people of assuming the rights that belong to them in that country. It is high time that England, which has been so long looking to Europe and the United States, should reach out her arms to this Canadian colony of hers, which is willing and able to raise the bread that her people require.

There is another matter in this connection of which I wish to speak. While we are boasting so much of the growth of Canadian trade, it is a singular fact that notwithstanding this preference, and since it has been put into full force and effect, the United States has sold to England more in proportion of the very articles we have to sell than Canada has. I will quote the following figures to prove that statement. Great Britain took from Canada in 1901 over £300,000 less in cattle than she did in 1900, while at the same time she took from the United States £700,000 more in 1901 than in 1900. Of sheep and lambs she took from Canada in 1901 £43,000 more than in 1900, and from the United States she took £236,000 more for the same period. Of wheat, meal and flour she took from Canada in 1901 £58,000 more than in 1900, and from the United States £332,000 more. Of Indian corn, from Canada she took in 1901 about £585,000 less than in 1900, and from the United States £2,500 less. During the same period there was a slight increase in her imports of Indian corn from Russia, an increase of £900,000 from Roumania, and over £1,000,000 from the Argentine Republic. Of fresh beef, in the returns Canada is not mentioned and it is therefore assumed that there was practically none imported by Great Britain. Great Britain, however, imported from the United States an increase over 1900 of £700,000. Of mutton, the increase from the Argentine Republic was about £300,000, and from Australasia about £600,000. Of pork, from the United States, Great Britain in 1901 took £260,000. Canada is not given. Of bacon, from the United States Great Britain took in 1901 an increase of £1,800,000, from Denmark an increase of £180,000, and from other countries an increase of £30,000, while the amount from Canada actually decreased by £150,000. Of ham, from the United States she took in 1901 £437,000 more than in 1900, and from other countries £1,650, while from Canada she took £142,100 less. Of butter, Great Britain took from Russia in 1901 £664,582 more than in 1900, and from Denmark, £820,872; Holland, £97,123; the United States, £431,340; and from Canada, £367,242. Of cheese, there is a decrease all along the line. Holland decreased, £42,597; France, £25,000; United States, £466,700; Canada, £91,440. Of fish, the United States increased, £108,300; Norway, £65,000; Portugal, £30,000; Newfoundland, £7,000; Canada decreased, £32,000.

This shows that Great Britain has bought more from other countries on an average than she has from Canada.

The Premier, speaking at Bowmanville in October, 1899, used these words:

> The merchants of England, the men who have to buy articles in the markets of the world no longer go to the United States to make their purchases. They come to Canada and this is the direct result of our preferential tariff.

The merchant in Great Britain wanted to buy cattle in 1901 and he went to the United States for $36,000,000, and to Canada for $7,400,000 worth. To the United States he went for sheep and lambs to the amount of $2,300,000, and to Canada for $475,000. For salted beef he went to the United States for $1,234,635, and to Canada for none. For fresh beef he went to the United States for $33,800,000, and from Canada he took none. For bacon he went to the United States for $46,279,255, and to Canada for $4,607,545. For pork he went to the United States for $3,814,965, and to Canada for none. For hams he went to the United States for $21,000,000, and to Canada for $15,000,000. For butter he went to the United States for $3,400,000, and to Canada for $5,000,000, to Russia for $8,000,000, to France for $8,000,000, and to Denmark for $40,000,000. For cheese he went to the United States for $6,300,000, and to Canada for $18,300,000. For lard he went to the United States for $18,700,000, and to Canada for none. For wheat he went to the United States for $67,000,000, and to Canada for $11,000,000. For wheatmeal and flour he went to the United States for $43,000,000, and to Canada for $3,000,000. For barley he went to the United States for $4,000,000, and to Canada for none. For Indian corn he went to the United States for $29,500,000, and to Canada for $2,300,000. For wood and timber he went to the United States for $3,750,000, and to Canada for $2,300,000. For leather he went to the United States for $16,500,000, and to Canada for none.

Now, I do not understand the force of the argument which the hon. gentlemen opposite attempted to use to prove that this preference has given us an advantage in the English market, in view of the fact that England's trade with these other countries is greater than it is with Canada. These figures disprove the contention of the hon. gentlemen opposite, and it is time that they woke up to the fact that they are not doing their duty towards this new country with its great resources. There is this difficulty with the preference, so far as the government followers are concerned, that they seem to have no definite pelicy, and things have come to such a pass that the right hon. gentleman cannot now send out two of his ministers together before the people because they cannot agree the one with the other. One will denounce protection, and the other free trade. He has to send them out singly. If it is a free trade community which has to be approached, the hon. gentleman will say to it: Here is Mr. Fielding, my Finance Minister, he will do for you fellows. If a protection constituency has to be catered to, he will say to it: Here is Mr. Tarte, my Minister of Public Works, he will suit you. Then, when an appeal has to be made to a tariff for revenue locality, he can fall back on his old friend, Sir Richard Cartright, who will instruct his hearers by the hour on the advantages of a revenue tariff. And when he has to court a community where the people do not really know where they stand and what they want, why, why he can choose indiscriminately among the balance of his colleagues, for they themselves are at sea as to where they stand and are prepared to suit themselves to whatever the occasion requires. In fact this is simply an omnibus government, you know, Sir, what kind of a vehicle an omnibus is. It takes in all sorts and sizes of passengers, and you can get anything out of it under the sun, from that omnibus, but a straight deal. Free traders, revenue tariff men, straight protectionists, anything you want, this omnibus government has in stock. It has everything but a settled policy. And so clearly do these hon. gentlemen realize this themselves, that I doubt whether you will ever again catch the hon. the Minister of Finance at a banquet in company with the hon. the Minister of Public Works. Fancy killing a poor fellow in the house of his friends. Yet this was the fate which overtook the Finance Minister the other day in Montreal. He got the breath crushed out of him by his colleague the Minister of Public Works, and the right hon. the Prime Minister dared not side with either. Such was the exhibition which took place down in the city of Montreal, and it is high time that a decisive and a declared policy was given to the country. Yet despite all their diversities of views, these hon. gentlemen can act together as one man when it comes to sharing the spoils. That is the cohesive principle which keeps them together, and which furnishes the country with a spectacle never before witnessed in the history of responsible government.

These hon. gentlemen claim that they have done wonders because they took 2½ per cent off the tariff. Well, if that reduction has done such wonders, why do they not take off 2¼ per cent more and do still greater wonders. Do they believe their own professions ? If they do, they are not faithful to the interests of the country, because if, according to their contention, 2½ per cent reduction on the tariff has brought about this marvellous prosperity, they should go still further, and add to our wealth by making a still further reduction. And when some of their followers get up and preach the protection doctrine in the House, as we have heard them do during this debate, we find the leader of the government, and the Minister of Finance saying to them : Where did you get this doctrine ? This is not according to the text-books which we put into your hands years ago. But these followers of theirs, who declare for protection, know that there is a stronger schoolmaster outside. They know that they have to reckon with public opinion, and they are more afraid of that schoolmaster than of going back on their former principles. What did we see when this government came into power ? We saw an immense phalanx, composed of them and their followers, who were going to fell that foul tree of protection which was ruining the country. But they have not yet succeeded in knocking a chip off it. They brandished their hatchets but did nothing else, except trim off a few branches on one side to give the sun freer play and allow the tree to get the benefit. No one knows better than the Finance Minister that not a chip has been knocked off that tree since this administration came into office. These hon. gentlemen may cut down large trees in the lumber bush but they dare not meddle with this one. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) may brandish his little hatchet as much as he pleases but everybody knows it is rusty and that he has not the slightest expectation of doing any damage with it. What a sorry spectacle we have before us to-day—the spectacle of men who are afraid to declare what their policy and principles are because they might wake up in the morning and find that something else was necessary.

What this government ought to do is to secure in the English market for Canada the place she ought to occupy. If England were to put 4 or 5 cents a bushel on the wheat going to her market, other than the Canadian or colonial grown wheat, that would not only give an increased price to the Canadian producer but it would give him the first place in that market, which means a great deal more than a few cents on a bushel of wheat. It would mean that no matter what this colony might produce, we had a market for it. The first place in the English market is that which we ought to occupy, and that is what we can get if these hon. gentlemen would only set themselves to the task. Any man who follows public opinion in England must see that it is changing rapidly. We already find protective measures strongly advocated there with regard to a great many things. We find that the English farmers, for instance, are being protected by the embargo on cattle. We can see that in many other ways the principle of protection is making headway in the mother country, and hon.

gentlemen opposite should be ready to meet the English people half way in the interests of this country. If they would do this and if the responsibility were thrown upon the colonies of furnishing England with agricultural products, there would be a great increase in the acreage of wheat in this country in the very near future. If our Canadian farmers were aware that that market was there waiting for them, he would set about the task of furnishing it with all the agricultural products it can absorb. If there is one motto more than another that ought to be the watchword of every true Canadian, it is this : 'Back to the soil.' I do not mean that in any narrow, but in the widest possible sense. If we ever want to foster Canadian sentiment in this country, we must in every sense of the word, in our literature, in our trade, get back to the soil, and thus cultivate a true Canadian sentiment, not only in the interests of this country, but of the empire at large.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). In endeavouring, Mr. Speaker, to discharge our duties to our constituents and the Dominion of Canada at large, it seldom happens, unfortunately, that we can discuss any question upon which the different parties in this House entirely agree, but I feel that in the message conveyed to us by the Minister of Militia to-night, a subject is touched on which both sides of this House are heartily in accord. We all join in sympathy and regret that others had been added to the long list of those from Canada who have sacrificed themselves in South Africa for the empire. But also we rejoice that, while this loss has been sustained, we have the consolation of knowing that again the Canadian soldiers have acquitted themselves well in the field and have won for this country added renown. Casting over in my mind the many prominent statesmen who have adorned this country on both sides of politics, I venture to say that no act of theirs has ever brought Canada to the attention of Great Britain or stirred to the same extent the interest in this country of the people of the motherland, as the loyal response of the Canadian people themselves when England entered upon the present war in South Africa, the ready offer of service by our Canadian boys, and their valiant acts upon the field of battle in that far away land.

But it is my duty, my painful duty, to turn from things like this, to speak of the government of the day in this country. And, speaking of war, I am reminded that war always has a tendency to unite factions. The moment a country or a party is attacked from without, the rancor and hostility within that country or party are likely to yield, for the time, at any rate. To-day we have the Liberal party coming against the mountain, or the mountain coming against them in the person of the hon. member from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The government, as we all know, was in a rather unpleasant position, as touching that good will which should exist among the members of a government. But there are indications to-night that the attack, the very justifiable attack, which the hon. member for North Norfolk made upon the policy of the government has been having the effect, though slowly, of closing up the ranks of the cabinet, and it may have even affected the desirable change of bringing about comparative harmony. We have indication of it to some extent to-day. Since the 17th of March, we have been discussing this question, and with the exception of the speech of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) we have not heard one word from the government until this afternoon, when the hon. Minister of Agriculture spoke, brought into line, no doubt, by the circumstances I have referred to.

I notice that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce opened his very long and very familiar speech the other night by saying that if he had closed his eyes he could have imagined himself back in the old days of twenty-five years ago, and thought he was listening to the Conservative party of that day. Well, Sir, when he listened to the Conservative party of twenty-five years ago, he listened to as able men as it has ever been the happy lot of Canada to possess. And I am glad to tell my hon. friend, and to tell the Liberal party of Canada, that the policy which Sir John Macdonald originated in 1876-78 was so broad, it was so much more than a mere matter of tariff policy, it was so far-reaching in its operation and effects, that it is a policy upon which a progressive, intelligent and patriotic party can stand to-day. I cannot return the compliment which my hon. friend unwittingly paid to us and say that if we had closed our eyes we could imagine we were listening to the oratory with which the Mackenzie administration was defended in 1876, 1877 and 1878. Anyone who listened to the utterances of the speakers on behalf of the Liberal party from 1874 to 1878, would be a very dull man indeed if he did not mark the contrast afforded by the Liberal party of to-day. There were giants in those days on both sides; but where are the giants on that side to-night ?

Mr. McCARTHY. Where, and oh, where ?

Mr. LENNOX. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says 'Where, and oh, where, and oh, where ?' When I stand up to address the House upon any public question, the House learns the position I take upon that question, though it be one of the great issues of the day. But when my hon. friend from North Simcoe rises, the question is 'Where, and oh, where, and oh, where ?' We see a peculiar state of things arising from the agitation which has been created by the speech of the hon. member for North Norfolk. The position in which the Liberals find themselves by reason of that speech is not at all pleasant for them. We saw the consternation that was depicted on their faces. But we can imagine that when another Sunday has been passed and the whole matter has been thought over, the government leaders to some extent may recover and next week we may hear from them. But, for the time being, the murmur went round, and the voice of the Liberal party was : We brought this man forth to curse the Conservative party, but behold he has altogether blessed them.

Now, I come to speak for a moment or two of some statements made this afternoon by the Minister of Agriculture. I may say at once that I do not propose to take up much time in discussing the relative merits of the census taking of 1891 and of 1901. It is not a question with the people of this country as to how the census of 1891 was taken ; but the people, realizing that they are living in the twentieth century, are asking what the government of the day is doing, not what was done by another government ten or eleven years ago. I wish to remind my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture that by blackening the character of the gentlemen who took the census in 1891, he gives no certificate, either to the gentlemen who took the census in 1901, nor to the minister who presides over the department under which that census was taken. I was struck with the answer that the hon. gentleman gave to the question as to what steps he took for the purpose of ascertaining that the information he got is correct. I venture to say that such evidence as the Minister of Agriculture placed before this House to show the truth of the statements he made, would not be accepted in any law court of the land. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture, devoting himself to agricultural pursuits, is not aware of what is required in order to constitute reasonable proof in the minds of the people of this country on that point. But I call his attention and the attention of the House to the fact that there is not at present any verification of the census of 1901 ; but on the other hand, we have evidence that the administration flagrantly transgressed in many instances that have already been brought to the attention of the House, and also in respect to the methods that were adopted in sending out circulars to the census takers. There is great reason to suppose that the statements that he made are of no value whatever, and there is great reason to believe that if an investigation such as he has made was instituted in regard to the census of 1901, an even worse showing would be made than he has made regarding the census of 1891. Now I think the Minister of Agriculture is hardly doing himself justice, or doing justice to the government of which he is a member, in trying to make a mountain over these little matters which he supported with such frail evidence. When an hon. gentleman occupying a responsible position tries to grow eloquent over such little petty circumstances as he did when he read statistics uncorroborated by any substantial evidence, it makes one feel that there is not much substance in his arguments. When he goes from climax to climax over the fact that in some lower Canadian households there are as many as 18 children, he hardly gauges correctly the intelligence of the members of this House.

But I pass over that question, and proceed to consider some questions that have been raised by other hon. members. The hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Sutherland) gave us the other day a very interesting list of the acts of this government during the six years that they have been in power. Well, I am glad he gave us that list. It is not very much to be proud of, if that is all they can show of what they have been doing for the benefit of this country. He might have told us of some other little things they have been doing, but he was probably endeavouring to make the same excuse that the leader of the government made in Toronto when he said that there was nothing to reform. Among the matters for which I notice the Liberal party are disposed to take credit, is the reduction of the postage, or what is called the Penny Postage Act. Now, Mr. Speaker, why should the Liberal party take credit for this penny postage ? Was there much labour involved in changing the rate of postage from 3 cents to 2 cents ? Did it involve much negotiation upon the part of the ministry ? I do not think they claim that it did ; what they claim is that this bright idea originated in the fertile brain of the Postmaster General. But I do not think that claim will stand investigation. If you inquire you will find that the idea originated as far back as 1896 ; when the Chambers of Commerce of the empire met in London, that was one of the articles of their programme which was discussed and endorsed. Coming as it did prominently before the empire in 1896, the year when this government came into power, it is not surprising that the Postmaster General seized upon the opportunity, and that this opportunist government seized upon the opportunity of making the change.

But I desire especially to call attention to some things that this government have not done, and that are matters of extreme urgency indeed. What have they done in regard to the regulation of freight rates ? Has there ever been a greater grievance, a greater iniquity, perpetrated upon the people than the freight rates as they exist today in the Dominion of Canada ? Why, Sir, it is a fact that the shipper for a short haul is compelled to pay, not merely the same as for a long haul, but in many instances even more than a shipper for a long haul. This is a grievance that calls at once for the interference of the government, and they can offer no reasonable excuse for having allowed that grievance to exist so long.

Take the question of national transportation. If there is a matter upon which the great agricultural classes of this country have set their heart and which is of vital importance to them it is this question of transportation. Looking at it in the broader sense, if there is anything that would tend to secure a permanent advantage to the people, if there is anything which is a living question to-day it is the problem, the greatest problem that any one can address himself to, of solving the best means of carrying across this continent and in the direction of the markets of the world the products of the agriculturists and of other producers in this country. The government have practically nothing to do as this session manifestly shows, because the government have nothing to bring down for the consideration of parliament. If there is anything which calls for the attention of parliament, it is this question. Can the hon. gentlemen give us any reason, any excuse, why this matter has not been taken up and discussed by the representatives of the people and parliament, getting upon it the light and intelligence that will result from laying the matter before the public through the newspapers and so bringing to bear upon it the best views of the people? I know, of course, that there is the scheme of the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Tarte). That has no practical bearing on the case, because we know that the hon. Minister of Public Works persists in announcing that this is only an idea of his own. He does not propose to pledge parliament to it and it cannot be treated as a government scheme. Therefore, we have no general transportation scheme for this country. The result has already begun to be manifested in the fact that the grain of this country which should pass through Canada is passing along American lines and that the grain which is being brought through this country is being taken to American ports for shipment. But, although there is no large scheme of transportation before the people through the instrumentality of the government we have an expenditure of money going on which would almost be sufficient for the inception of this large work and for its carrying out. We have little sums of money, sometimes considerable sums of money, and sometimes large sums of money spent here and there, everywhere, God knows where, because the hon. Minister of Public Works cannot even tell us where the place is; it is not on the map. It is at some hamlet, or some harbour at the mouth of a small creek at which money is spent and spent for what? To promote a summer hotel? But the idea is that it is spent at such places as this for the gratification of the parties locally interested and it is a fraud upon the country that should not prevail If there were some large, comprehensive, intelligible scheme laid down for the development of this country, then, we would not complain, but what I do now complain of is that when an election is coming on, or when an election is contemplated, these moneys are being spent in the various localities, not to serve the public interest, but to demoralize the electors. Am I right in saying so? If you go back just a few months to the eve of this session you have a very significant instance of that. I am glad to see that at this moment the right hon. the leader of the government (Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has returned, because he is one of the gentlemen of whom I wish to speak just now. Speaking of this expenditure of public money here and there where it is totally unjustifiable I want to call the attention of the House to the speeches that were made in Montreal just a few months ago on the eve of an election, and if you pay any attention to the speeches, the eloquent speeches, delivered by the right hon, the leader of the government and the speeches delivered by the hon. Minister of Public Works, you will have a very fair key to the whole situation. These hon. gentlemen vied with each other on that occasion during an election campaign, when they were trying to settle the differences between the rival candidates, in showing the magnificent prospects that would result to the city of Montreal by the contemplated expenditure of money. Mr. Speaker, I submit, that if we are going to have fair, ordinary decency in public life, if we are going to have any pretense of honesty this thing should come to an end and there should be a rule laid down as to the expenditure of public money. It should be expended upon some principle. It is not for me, a young member, to outline that principle, it is not for the opposition to make a policy for the government, but I would suggest for the consideration of the government that there ought not to be money spent upon harbours or on works which have merely a local significance, or which are of mere local benefit in a town or village or township. These matters are intended to be provided for by the township or town or village as the case may be. I submit that if there was a proper policy upon this matter formed, which would not be departed from, laying down that until a work had become a national work in which the people of the country were interested not merely a local municipality or village, then, something like an honest distribution of public funds would be arrived at, and until this is done there must be an unfair and dishonest administration of the people's funds. We also see that this government which has nothing to do and which the right hon. the leader of the government has said has nothing to reform, has allowed this matter of fast Atlantic steamships to still remain in abeyance. I would ask the government which was in such a hurry to come in, which was so anxious to do better than the old administration what valid excuse it can give to the people for allowing this matter to remain in statu quo until the present day. Can the government plead a rush of business ? There is nothing in this parliament to do except to pass some private Bills in the interest of the railway companies and other corporations of that kind. It is well enough to serve these companies and incidentally it may be in the interest of the people, but when we come to meet here great public measures should be brought before the representatives of the people and I think it would be hard indeed for the government to find an excuse for its delay in this regard. Even in the matter of legislating with reference to the cattle guards question, they have delayed doing so without any reasonable excuse. A year ago we were told by the Minister of Railways that he had not had time for consideration, but a year has passed, nothing has been done, and we are again told that there must be another year's delay. I speak of these matters because they more particularly affect the interests of the farming community. There is indeed a long list of things which the government might reform, but which the government has not reformed, and which apparently the government do not intend to reform.

I have heard it said a good many times in this House by hon. gentlemen on the other side, that you may protect the manufacturers but that you cannot possibly protect the farmers. Well, gentlemen who make such a statement as that have not carefully considered the matter. If they would only look at the Customs Act they would find a long list of agricultural products that were protected under the Conservative government, and which retain a measure of protection to-day. That fact alone is sufficient evidence that you can protect the agriculturists. You can protect them in a direct way by putting a reasonably high duty upon the products of the farm, the garden, the orchard ; upon animals and their products, and upon all things generally which farmers have for sale. There is also an indirect protection which you can give to the farmers, and that indirect protection is given in this way. Wherever you place a duty upon an article which is required by Canadian manufacturers, which forms the raw material of their business, and which article can be supplied by the farmers of Canada, then you protect the farmer to a considerable extent.

We therefore have direct protection and indirect protection for the farmer, and if it is found that more protection is required there is no obstacle whatever in the way of the government giving our farming community that adequate protection. It is idle for the government and their supporters to try to make the farmers believe that the reason why they have not done more for that class of the community, is because they are helpless to protect them. I assert Sir, without fear of successful contradiction, that the government has it in its power to give adequate protection to the Canadian farmer as they can give adequate protection to the Canadian manufacturer.

I shall not take up much time treating of the budget speech because unless you enter into a dry analysis of figures, it is one of those deliverances which do not afford much ground for discussion. I call the attention of the government to the fact, that year after year the budget is losing its old time significance as a declaration of the policy of the party in power, as well as being a financial report. It used to be, as hon. gentlemen can ascertain by looking up 'Hansard,' that before this government came into power—under the Mackenzie government and under the Conservative government—we got a clear and explicit declaration of the policy of the party for the coming twelve months at least, either in the budget speech or the Speech from the Throne. But now the Speech from the Throne enunciates no policy of the government, and the budget speech outlines nothing as to the future except an expression of hope by the Finance Minister that prosperity will continue. We could as well discuss the policy of this administration from the public accounts as from any information that is vouchsafed by the Finance Minister of to-day in his annual financial statement. However, let me draw attention to some of the figures which have been placed before the House. The revenue for the fiscal year 1899-1900 was $51,029,-994.02, and the revenue for the fiscal year ending 1900-1901 was $52,514,701.01. The increased revenue of the one year over the other was therefore $1,484,707, or 2·91 per cent. One would expect that in these abundant times the expenditure would not increase at all events more rapidly than the revenue, but we find that the expenditure for the year 1899-1900 was $52,717,466.84, and the expenditure for the year 1900-1901 was $57,982,866.46, an increased expenditure in the latter year over the former amounting to $5,265,399.62, or 9·98 per cent. Therefore we find ourselves confronted with this result, that our income is increasing at the rate of 3 per cent while our expenditure is increasing at the rate of 10 per cent, in round numbers. And during this prosperous time when the people of the country might reasonably expect that there would be no increase in the public debt, we have the fact staring us in the face that there has been during the fiscal year just closed a net addition of $3,000,000 to the public debt.

We have this promising state of things announced by the Finance Minister, that we may expect by the end of the year which will be closed on the 30th of June next, another $6,000,000 added to the public debt of this country ; and yet the hon. gentleman, who seems to have got into that strain of mind and that habit of language, says that we have reason to be thankful. He says that we must congratulate ourselves. That there is great reason why not only the government, who are enjoying the fruits of office, but the country and the representatives of the people on this side of the House, should be thankful for this state of things and desirous of its continuance. Thankful for what, Sir ? Thankful for the fact that, in a year when there should not have been one dollar added to the public debt of the country, we have an increase of $3,000,000 ? Thankful for the fact that at a time when, having regard to the revenue, we should not anticipate any increase, there is another $6,000,000 to be added, and that by that time this country will be in debt to the amount of 274½ millions of money ? Why, the hon. gentleman must think that we ought to be thankful for whatever we get. There was a boy, a midshipman, but in reality a midshipmite, who was taunted by his companions about his size. It was suggested by them that he could not perform any great deeds of valour. He wished to prove that he could, and one morning he went out pretty early from the ship, taking with him his gun and a piece of pork. He made a fire and suspended the pork over it, and so attracted a couple of bears. In the meantime he had got up into a tree. He fired a shot at one of the bears, and then he recollected to his dismay that he had left his ammunition at the foot of the tree. The companion bear, after devouring the meat, lay down to sleep, and the poor boy was in agony thinking what would happen when she woke up, because he felt that she would certainly climb the tree and devour him. Finally she did wake up, and he was preparing for the fate that he felt certain awaited him. Then he thought, like some wicked gentlemen when they think they are near their end, that he ought to say a prayer ; but, unfortunately, he had delayed praying too long, and he found it impossible to recollect a prayer. Finally he recollected the grace that had been said in the mess room, and he said : 'For what we are about to receive may the Lord——' and just then a rescue party came in sight and shot the bear, and he was relieved. The grace was never finished. That is what the Minister of Finance wants the people of this country to do. In the face of the public debt increasing by leaps and bounds, he says : 'For what these people are about to receive the Lord make them truly thankful.' But I do not think they will be.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. They have been so far.

Mr. LENNOX. My hon. friend says they have been so far. Well, he will be a better judge of that when another general election comes. There are means of carrying by-elections at the command of the government, which even members of the government would not like to have fully investigated or disclosed ; but when it comes to a general election, and these men have to face public opinion and clearly declare their policy, and say whether they stand for protection or free trade, and give an account of their extravagant expenditure of the people's money, I dare say they will find to their cost that the people are not thankful, but that they will be thankful to have them out.

Now, I am going to read from the 'Monetary Times' a few lines to show what this non-political journal thinks of this precious budget. Referring to the figures given by the Finance Minister, it says :—

> This fairly takes away one's breath, the sums are so vast, and the increase so rapid. Yet it is not recorded that Sir Richard Cartwright either swooned or swore, or that any of the old advocates of economy and reduction did else than cheer the minister as he placidly made these announcements on the authority and with the sanction of a Liberal government. And yet, apart from the change of front indicated in the party, these figures challenge the serious attention of every thoughtful citizen. Granted that the country is prosperous, is it wise to set so rapid a pace, and raise to such a height the scale of expenditures, which once raised it will be found almost impossible to lower ? It is well to remember that as the prices of staples rise—and there have been marked advances in price in many lines of recent years—the amount received from customs taxation rises, for it is largely ad valorem. Then, when prices fall, the amount of customs revenue falls. In prosperous times, with a buoyant revenue, is it prudent to spend it all and add so many millions besides to a debt already too large ? For $13 per head or $65 per family for one year's government is a tremendous charge. Giving all due force to the contention that we are a growing country, and must needs provide generously for the public services, this headlong rush forward in taxation and expenditure, seemingly unchecked by bit or bridle, invites reflection on the part of business men and thoughtful citizens. These piping times will not always continue, and the overdrain of to-day hastens the exhaustion of to-morrow. We cry a warning and a halt—before the rush has become a rout in which moderation and prudence lose their meaning and their force. At this rate we know not where we shall end, for, though the minister hints at limits to the tide of prosperity, he apparently sets none to the volume of expenditure.

I call the attention of the members of the government to this fact, that although the Minister of Finance, in his budget this year, seems rather more hopeful than he was last year of a continuance of good times, if we consult the great organs of public opinion or the great financiers, we will not find them sharing that opinion. On the contrary, there are indications that the good times are not likely to continue for very long ; that we are just about coming to the crest of the wave which the Finance Minister spoke of last year, and that we ought to prepare for the time, perhaps before 12 months pass round, when we shall be face to face with another state of affairs.

The London 'Times,' a valuable organ of public opinion, points out that Germany, France and Russia are already beginning to be sensible of a change, and suggests to the people of Britain whether there is not good reason to believe that a change for the worse is likely to set in there as well. Let me call the attention of the hon. Minister of Finance to the story of Joseph. I would not like to follow in the lead of the First Minister of the province of Ontario and mutilate the Bible, but it seems to me that an edition of special copies of the story of Joseph would be beneficial to the government of this country. That story was not written originally for private circulation or for the Egyptians or Israelites alone, but as a warning to all. It was written for the members of this government as well, in order to give them a lesson of prudence, in order to warn them to lay up in the years of plenty provision for the years of scarcity that are bound to follow. And the government would do well to lay this lesson to heart so as to meet the change which is bound to come very soon; and when that change does come, this country will view the course of the government in a far different spirit from that in which they may be disposed to regard it to-day.

I hear hon. gentlemen on the other side frequently ask what our policy is, as if they did not know. Again we hear hon. gentlemen on that side say that they know all about it. Well, I am not an experienced member of the House and do not propose to outline a policy for the government; and if I did and the government should adopt it, I fear, from the experience we have had that they would not give me the credit, but would assume the authorship themselves. I would like, however, to call attention to certain characteristics of policy and certain conditions which must obtain in this country to form the primitive elements of prosperity. Our great point first should be to get capital and labour. You may analyse all the various elements which go to make up prosperity, and you will find that the basis of them all is capital and labour. These are at the foundation of all commercial prosperity. A policy to be successful must be one which will have the effect of attracting capital and labour. There can be no complete development or utilization of our resources without what is called in the resolution of the hon. the leader of the opposition, a declared policy, and one which will attract sufficient capital and labour into this country to develop our latent resources. And in order to attract capital and labour, you must have two things constantly in your policy. It must contain a reasonable promise of gain and a reasonable assurance of stability. These were wanting in the policy which was in force during the Mackenzie regime. It failed to afford a reasonable return for investment and a reasonable reward for labour, in consequence of which the country was not able to pay its way. Under those conditions it appeared to many, and among other—as we now have it from the hon. member for North Norfolk—to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, that some remedy should be adopted to assist the exchequer and afford relief to the suffering people of this country. Unfortunately, however, in their budget of 1876, although they declared that the condition of the country was bad, although they said that the government was not able to pay its way, they refused to make any change. The result was that soon afterwards, they lost the reins of government and a better state of things was inaugurated. The late Sir John Macdonald was the man of the moment. He was the one statesman who, according to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was able in the course of some two hours, between six o'clock in the afternoon and eight o'clock, when the House reassembled after recess, to frame, devise and frame the first of a series of celebrated resolutions. That resolution which he then submitted to the House was in these words:

> I move that the Speaker do not now leave the Chair, but that it be resolved that this House regrets His Excellency the Governor General has not been advised to recommend to parliament a measure for a readjustment of the tariff, which would not only aid in alleviating the stagnation of business, deplored in the gracious speech from the Throne, but would also afford fitting encouragement and protection to the struggling manufacturing industries, as well as to the agricultural products of the country.

As it has been understood, Mr. Speaker, that I should not complete my remarks to-night, I would now move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of the Prime Minister, the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, April 7, 1902.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

IRREGULAR PETITIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. Amongst the petitions which have just been read, those numbered from No. 33 to No. 45 ask for aid for the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence river. I have already decided that such petitions are out of order, because they ask for the expenditure of public money. I declare these petitions out of order.

ELECTION PETITION DISMISSED.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Hon. Justice Gagné, one of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions pursuant to the Controverted Elections Act, judgment and report in the matter of the petition for the electoral district of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, by which said election petition was dismissed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

STRAIT OF CANSO BRIDGE COMPANY.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Strait of Canso Bridge Company.—Mr. McLennan.

On section 8, subclause (c),

Mr. WADE. When the House rose the other night we were considering an amendment to this clause, and also an amendment to the amendment. Since then I have drafted an amendment which I think will meet the views of hon. gentlemen on the other side who had objection to the section as it stands. I have submitted this amendment to the Minister of Railways, and it meets with his approval. The object is, that while the company has the power to fix the tolls, yet it shall be under the jurisdiction of the government and subject to their approval. I regret that the mover of the amendment to the amendment is not present, because I would wish to ask his permission to withdraw my amendment in order to substitute this one.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to withdraw his amendment ?

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. Let us hear the new amendment first.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Let us hear the amendment that he proposes to substitute.

Mr. WADE. The amendment I propose is as follows :

Provided further that no such tolls shall be levied or taken until the by-law fixing the same has been approved by the Governor in Council and the same published as provided by section 227 of the Railway Act ;

And further provided that such by-law shall be subject to revision as provided by section 228 of the Railway Act; and for the above purpose of approval and revision, said sections 227 and 228 of the Railway Act shall apply mutatis mutandis to any by-law of the company fixing such tolls.

Section 223 of the Railway Act authorizes the company by by-laws to fix railway tolls; section 227 provides that they cannot collect any of these tolls until the same have been approved by the Governor in Council and until they have been published for two weeks in the 'Canada Gazette'; section 228 provides that any toll so fixed or approved by the Governor in Council shall be subject to revision by the Governor in Council. I objected to having the words from 'time to time' appear on the face of the charter——

Hon. Mr. TISDALE. Carried, carried.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). The proposition of the hon. member gives the company power to fix tolls, but does not give the Railway Committee of the Privy Council power to reduce those tolls without the company's consent.

Mr. WADE. That is provided for in section 228.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair). I think the section as proposed is all right. The only criticism I would pass upon it would be that it might be put in the form of a clause of eight or ten words to the effect that the right of the company to levy tolls would be subject to the provisions of the Railway Act. However, I have no objection to the clause as it is drawn, for the Railway Committee of the Privy Council will have power to reduce the tolls, and no tolls will be legally recoverable unless the Governor in Council approves of the by-law fixing them.

Hon. Mr. HAGGART. I think the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals is perfectly correct, that it would be better to have a short clause which would make this undertaking subject to the provisions of the Railway Act ; and it ought to go further and make the undertaking subject to that Act as amended from time to time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That would follow.

Mr. WADE. There is a clause in the Bill providing that the Railway Act shall apply to the undertaking. But I would like to draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to one or two features of the Railway Act as amended in 1899 with respect to these bridges. There were express provisions made at that time giving power to fix tolls for foot passengers and for carriage passengers ; but inasmuch as the word company in the Railway Act only refers to a railway company, a doubt arose as to whether that would be sufficient to enable the company to fix tolls on this bridge. Therefore it was necessary to put in a clause to make that clear ; and when we throw around it all the safeguards which are applied to railways, I think we have met every objection.

Amendment (Mr. Wade) moved at a former meeting of the committee withdrawn ; amendment now moved agreed to ; Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 49) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of John Westren.—Mr. Campbell.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 81) to incorporate the Canadian Northern Telegraph Company.—Mr. Davis.

Bill (No. 84) respecting the Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—Mr. Harty.

Bill (No. 88) respecting the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company.—Mr. Scott.

Bill (No. 91) respecting the Timagami Railway Company.—Mr. McCarthy.

Bill (No. 94) respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—Mr. Barker.

Bill (No. 103) respecting the Lake Champlain and St. Lawrence Ship Canal Company.—Mr. Geoffrion.

QUESTIONS.

ALPHONSE THOMAS, LAPRAIRIE, POSTMASTER—DISMISSAL.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. What is the date of the dismissal of Alphonse Thomas, postmaster, Laprairie, P.Q. ?

2. What is the reason of said dismissal ?

3. Who recommended or asked for said dismissal ?

4. Was any inquiry held before said dismissal, and with what result ?

5. Who recommended the appointment of the new postmaster ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Wm. Mulock) : I. Mr. Alphonse Thomas, late postmaster of Laprairie, Quebec, was removed from that office on the 1st December, 1901.

2. Mr. Thomas was removed from the postmastership of Laprairie for having used the position which he also held, as caretaker of the Laprairie post office building in endeavouring to extort money from contractors doing work on such building, the accounts for all such work being certified by him. In view of his improper dealings as caretaker, he was considered an unsuitable person for the position of postmaster, and was therefore removed from that office.

3. The charges against the postmaster were presented by Mr. D. Monet, M. P.

4. A very full inquiry into the matter was made by the post office inspector and the correctness of the charges being established, the postmaster was dismissed.

5. The new postmaster of Laprairie was appointed on the nomination of Mr. Monet, M. P.

I.C.R.—St. OCTAVE STATION.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. To whom did the government accord the contract for the construction of the St. Octave station ?

2. Did the government previously call for tenders for the said contract ?

3. What was the amount of the lowest tender ?

4. What is the price mentioned in the contract accorded by the government ?

5. Why was not the lowest tender accepted by the government ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair :

1. To Timothy Landry.

2. Yes. Tenders were called for the said work and several were received.

3. The amount of the lowest tender was $4,500.

4. $4,000.

5. The contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer, but at a sum lower than his tender, which was considered too high by the department.

CENSUSES.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

What was the total cost of taking the census for 1881 and 1891 respectively ?

What has the census for 1901 cost up to the present date ?

What will be the probable cost to complete it ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). I beg to reply :—

1881..	$456,904 19
1891..	570,115 54
1901..	986,296 98
About	183,703 02

Making a total of $1,170,000 as the cost of the census of 1901.

ST. LAWRENCE CANAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. HENDERSON asked :

1. What amount was expended in paying the employees of the canals on the St. Lawrence during the years 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1901, respectively ?

2. What amount was collected by the government on said canals during the said years ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Hon. A. G. Blair) :

1. The amount expended in paying the employees of the canals on the St. Lawrence during the years 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899 and 1901 respectively, is as follows :—

Year ending June 30, 1896.. ..	$148,826 35
" " " 1897.. ..	137,543 58
" " " 1898.. ..	145,623 93
" " " 1899.. ..	150,291 28
" " " 1901.. ..	190,848 77

2. The amount collected by the government on the said canals, during the said years is as follows :—

Year ending June 30,	1896.. ..	$120,256	30
" "	1897.. ..	122,437	69
" "	1898.. ..	128,338	31
" "	1899.. ..	141,979	55
" "	1901.. ..	147,637	90

RIFLE RANGES BELOW MONTREAL.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. What amount of money has been expended in improvements at the new rifle ranges below Montreal ?
2. To whom has the money been paid ?
3. What amount remains due on the price of the land ?
4. What was the amount of the contract for improvements on said new rifle ranges.

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). The answer is :

1. $34,960.50.
2. Lyons & White, Ottawa, for construction, $34,369; Arthur Demers, Montreal, superintending work, $342.50; R. W. Allan, Montreal, superintending work, $249.
3. All the land bought by the department has been paid for. One or two more small parcels may be required, but the matter is under consideration.
4. Main contract for construction, $33,789; store shed, $300; target sheds, extra telephone instruments, extra firing point numbers, &c., $500; fences, 98 cents per rod, estimated at $1,280, total $35,869.

PURCHASE OF HAY FOR WAR OFFICE.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. What quantity of hay has been purchased since 1899 for the War Office by the government in the province of Quebec ?
2. How much per ton was paid for said hay ?
3. From what parties, firms or companies was said hay purchased ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). This question relating entirely to the business of the Imperial War Office, I am not at liberty to answer.

PAMPHLET 'REGULATIONS FOR RIFLE ASSOCIATION.'

Mr. LEONARD—by Mr. Morin—asked :

1. Did the Department of Militia and Defence publish, in 1901, a pamphlet entitled 'Regulations for Rifle Associations, with extracts from Musketry Regulations, 1898 ?'
2. Why has the government not yet published the French version of that important pamphlet?
3. Who has charge of the translation of that pamphlet ?
4. Is the government aware that the French language is still spoken in this country ?

The MINISTER OF MILITIA AND DEFENCE (Hon. F. W. Borden). The French version of this pamphlet has been published and issued, and the translation was made at the Government Printing Bureau. I beg to lay on the Table of the House copies of both English and French versions.

CENSUS—COST IN EAST AND NORTH SIMCOE.

Mr. BENNETT asked :

What was the cost of taking the census in East and North Simcoe, respectively, in 1891 and in 1901 ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Sydney Fisher). The following figures will give the answer to the hon. gentleman's question :

	1891.	1901.
East Simcoe..	$2,304 48	$4,465 79
North Simcoe..	1,728 62	2,890 05

THOMAS RICKETTS, POSTMASTER, GILMOUR, ONT.

Mr. CARSCALLEN—by Mr. Sproule—asked :

1. Has Mr. Thomas Ricketts, postmaster of Gilmour, been removed ? If so, when was he removed, and for what reason ?
2. Were any charges made against him or against the management of the office ? If so, by whom, and when ?
3. Was any investigation made into the conduct of the office ? If so, by whom, and what report was made ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Wm. Mulock). The Gilmour post office has been kept by Mr. Thomas Ricketts, the postmaster, in a public hotel, or boarding house, where liquor was sold. This was considered an unsuitable place and the office was removed. In its removal to a more desirable location, it became necessary to appoint another person to the postmastership, and Mr. Ricketts ceased therefore to be postmaster.

There were no charges against the postmaster personally or against the management of the office apart from the objections to its situation.

An investigation as to the management of the office was not considered necessary, as the information came from a source that was regarded as thoroughly reliable.

SUPREME COURT—LEAVE OF ABSENCE OF JUDGES.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. What judges of the Supreme Court of Canada have obtained leave of absence from the government, or from the Department of Justice, during the past five years ?
2. What has been the duration of the leave in each case ?
3. For what reason has leave of absence been granted in each case ?
4. Is it a fact that only one-half of the cases brought before the Supreme Court during the last five years has been heard and adjudicated upon by the full bench ; and if not, then what proportion of such cases has been judged by the entire court ?

The MINISTER OF JUSTICE (Hon. Charles Fitzpatrick) :

1. In 1897, Chief Justice Strong and Mr. Justice Sedgewick. In 1898, 1899 and 1900, none of the judges absented themselves. In 1901, Chief Justice Strong and Mr. Justice Taschereau were absent.

2. In 1897, Chief Justice Strong was absent six months, in 1901, four months; in 1897, Mr. Justice Sedgewick was absent for two months and in 1901, Mr. Justice Taschereau was absent one month.

3. In 1897, Chief Justice Strong was absent to visit England, to be sworn of Her Majesty's Privy Council and to attend the sittings of the Privy Council. In 1901, Chief Justice Strong was absent on account of ill health, and, the same year, to attend the Privy Council. Mr. Justice Sedgewick was absent in 1897 to visit England, and in 1901, Mr. Justice Taschereau was absent to visit the maritime provinces.

4. The number of cases argued in the Supreme Court of Canada, from the 1st of April, 1897, to the 1st of April, 1902, was 494, and in 16 of these cases all the judges sat to hear the argument.

JAPAN EXPOSITION.

Mr. LEMIEUX (by Mr. Talbot) asked :

Is it the intention of the government that Canada shall take part in the Japan Exposition, to be held in 1903 ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Hon. Mr. Fisher). Yes.

MAIL BETWEEN CACOUNA AND RAILWAY STATION.

Mr. MONK asked :

1. Was the contract for carrying the mail between Cacouna and the railway station cancelled by the present government in 1896, and why ?

2. After the cancellation of the said contract, was a new contract entered into for the said transport of the mail for four years at 5½ cents per trip ?

3. After the expiration of this contract, has the carrier had 25 cents per trip without tender or contract ?

4. For how long has the government so paid 25 cents per trip ?

5. Were new tenders asked for this service in the month of February last, such service to commence on the 1st April, 1902 ?

6. Who was the lowest tenderer ?

7. Why was his tender not accepted ?

8. What tender has been accepted ?

9. Is the contract signed ? When will the new service by contract commence ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Hon. Wm. Mulock) :

1. The contract for the conveyance of the mails between Cacouna and railway station, contractor, Thomas Dionne, frequency (12 trips in summer, 6 trips in winter), cost $149 per annum, was terminated after three months' notice to the contractor on the 31st of January, 1897, because of not having been awarded after public tender, and as the price was considered too high.

2. Tenders were invited in December, 1896, and a new contract entered into on the 1st of February, 1897, with the lowest tenderer at 16½ cents per trip, estimated at $129 per annum. This contract terminated on the 31st of December, 1900.

4. The service has been performed since the 1st of January, 1901, at 25 cents per trip, the best rate obtainable by the inspector for a temporary service.

5. Tenders were not invited until January last. In the absence of the head of the branch, it cannot be ascertained why tenders were not invited sooner.

7. The department did not feel at liberty to award the contract to the lowest tenderer as he was reported to be mentally unfit for the responsibilities of the position.

8. The next lowest tender was accepted and, on the first instant, sent to the inspector with instructions to execute a contract.

9. The department has not yet learned whether it has been executed. If the hon. gentleman will renew his question at a later date, after a contract has been entered into, full information as to names and amounts of tenders will be given. The department does not think it in the public interest to give particulars of tenders until contracts are executed.

OFFICIAL OBSERVANCE OF THE KING'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria) asked :

Is it the intention of the government, as announced in the Liberal press, to introduce a Bill fixing the 24th May as the day of official observance of the King's birthday.

The PRIME MINISTER (Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier). The attention of the government has been called to this subject, but no decision has been reached on it.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Fielding) :

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty ; and the proposed motion of Mr. Borden (Halifax) in amendment thereto.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Before resuming the course of the argument, I was endeavouring to present to the House when the debate was adjourned on Friday evening, I wish to call attention to a paragraph which appears in the Montreal 'Herald' :

The opposition's story was told by two members in succession, Mr. Broder and Mr. Lennox. Both told the same story of broken pledges and big expenditures and made the same apologies for the prosperity of the country that have been made by all the Conservative speakers.

Items of this character are not, in themselves, important. But inasmuch as neither the hon. gentleman who preceded me nor myself addressed our arguments in the line spoken of, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact, and also for the reason that we find this organ supporting the government—and it appears, as some one says, a subsidized organ—in this instance, as in some other instances, has referred to arguments as being advanced by this side of the House which were not advanced. We know that conscience makes cowards of us all, and the Liberal party, conscious of their weakness in these matters as well as in a variety of other matters, imagine that the opposition must be talking of this matter even though they do not refer to it.

Now, when I concluded my remarks the other evening, I was referring to the condition of the country in 1878, and was pointing out the deplorable condition in which the country then stood. Canada had in fact reached the parting of the ways; it was more than the parting of the ways, because the government had acknowledged defeat, they had acknowledged that they were unable from the resources of the country, to carry on the affairs of the country. Canada had, in a commercial and industrial sense, actually abandoned the field, and was going backwards. I need not remind the House who came to the rescue on that occasion. He may be an efficient general who, upon the battle field, casts about him to ascertain the position of the enemy, the strength of the enemy, and lines up his own army in an efficient battle array. He is perhaps a brilliant general who, when victory trembles in the balance, rushes to the head of his forces, stays a threatened retreat, and holds them in line. But, Sir, he is a prince of soldiers who, when panic has set in, when confidence has been lost, when the army has commenced to retreat, when all seems lost, comes and rallies the soldiers, stays their retreat, and ultimately, after reorganizing them, leads them on to victory. I need not tell the House who was that man, that father of his country, that saviour of Canada, in 1878.

Now, this newspaper says that I referred to the prosperity of the country, and tried to apologize for it. I do not need to apologize for the success of the country. The success of the country, as is known to every thoughtful Canadian, as is known to every statesman the world around, is owing to two things, and two things alone: To the general prosperity of the commercial world and to the magnificent policy, so far as it relates to Canada, that was inaugurated in 1878. I refer now to the condition of things which succeeded the declaration of policy, and the magnificent campaign that was carried on by the Conservative party, ably led by Sir John A. Macdonald, the greatest Canadian statesman, and one of the greatest statesmen of the British Empire. Almost immediately that declaration of Sir John A. Macdonald reanimated the country. I wish to point out this fact, that you may make your policies what you will, you may argue as you will, but unless you animate a country with hope, unless you can point it to something to be accomplished, you will never succeed in building up a nation. So I cast back the statement of the Minister of Agriculture when he told us, in winding up that somewhat tedious speech of his the other day, as a conclusion of the whole matter, that the future of the country must take care of itself. If that is the theory of the Minister of Agriculture for assisting this country, if that is all he can do for agriculture, if he cannot point to a line of policy which will develop the varied resources of this country, if he cannot adapt himself to changing conditions and map out a line of conduct which will enable us to compete for the commerce of the world with other nations, then I submit that the country will pronounce him not exactly fit for the position he occupies.

Now, after 1878, after the victory that was then achieved, it goes without saying that Sir John A. Macdonald inaugurated the policy upon which he won. The Conservative party, Mr. Speaker, always carried out in the House the policy which they advocated in the country. I tell the hon. gentlemen opposite who talk about standing by the old policy of 1878, and that we stood, and stand, by the old policy of redeeming our pledges made to the people at the time of the elections. We had great success by reason of the national policy introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald, but we had not complete success, and perhaps that admission will give a grain of comfort to the cabinet and their followers. I have said that absolute certainty of the continuance of a policy is essential to its successful operation. After Sir John A. Macdonald inaugurated the policy, what attitude did the opposition of that day assume? Why, Sir, instead of acting like a loyal opposition in the interests of the country, instead of giving the policy a fair trial, they went up and down the country, many of them saying what they did not believe, traducing the policy, and declaring that it would be reversed on the first opportunity, trying to drive the young men out of this country, trying to stem the tide of immigration into this country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), more unfaithful than most of his party, by his speeches in this House and throughout the country, by his writings in English papers such as the 'Economist' did not cease to vilify the policy and administration of the Conservative party, to disgrace Canada, to deter immigrants from coming here and to drive away our young men from this country.

I say it is the essence of a policy that it should be stable, and therefore it is little wonder that at the present time these gentlemen can point to some measure of success. They are practically carrying out the policy that was inaugurated by our great Canadian statesman, they have enforced it in a large degree, and to that fact I attribute the prosperity which the country now enjoys; and so far as that policy fails to procure for Canada all the prosperity which she ought to enjoy, it is owing to the fact that they have tinkered with the tariff, and have never risen to the height of realizing its full scope, nor have they adequately carried it out.

I will tell these hon. gentlemen a story, and they have always been fond of American authorities until recently, that was told by Chauncey Depew. He said that some few years ago there was in a village not far from the city of New York an excitement because it had been proclaimed that the end of the world would occur on a certain night at twelve o'clock. It unsettled the minds of the people as uncertainty of the future always does unsettle and unhinge people's minds. Some of the people sold their property at a sacrifice, some abandoned work and on the last day a number of them—and I trust hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will take this lesson to heart—began to pray. Among them was an old shoemaker who had promised a pair of boots to Mrs. Brown for the next day. He prayed fervently, and as it approached twelve o'clock he prayed more fervently still. When it came to twelve o'clock he found that no change had occurred, but he thought that it would be better to pray a little longer. There might be a difficulty about the exact time. He continued praying for perhaps half an hour and then said—and this is the point I wish to impress upon hon. gentlemen opposite as to the necessity of certainty in fiscal matters—O Lord, if the end of the world is coming, let me know right now, but if the end of the world is not coming, O Lord may it please you to say so, because I must have Mrs. Brown's boots ready at twelve o'clock to-morrow; there is nothing that knocks business out like this uncertainty. We have had, therefore, a better state of things since the government came into office in that regard. We have not had a disloyal opposition, but we have had a loyal opposition, not traducing the country but willing to give the government a fair chance to carry on public affairs. We have not had a complaining opposition, but we have had members on ooth sides of the House uniting, whether acknowledging it or not, because the government has not had the candour to acknowledge it, in upbuilding the national policy and the policy of protection in this country, so that with a ready made policy and with a loyal opposition supporting it, taken in conjunction with years of great plenty, we should have comparative success. Now, I wish to refer to some circumstances which are unique in a sense in connection with this debate. We have a decidedly unusual state of things. In the words of the man in the street, 'things are coming our way.' First, we have the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and his speech is yet fresh in our minds. I venture to say that a more significant speech, one of more far-reaching effect, one that is more calculated to shake the confidence of the people of Canada and of the world, for that matter, in the truth and candour of the existing government has not been uttered. Taken in connection with the statement of the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in reference to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and with the utterances of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who is declared to have taken exactly the same line as the hon. member for North Norfolk, it establishes beyond refutation that for a quarter of a century we have had the leading men of the Reform party, the men whom the Reform party looked up to, the men whom they believed to be honest, going about this country proclaiming that which they did not believe to be true and denouncing and defaming the policy in which they actually believed. A more significant state of things has not existed in Canada for a long time. Now, there is more than that. We have what we would expect and what does not trouble my mind at all, and that is a good deal of wrangling in that party over that same speech. We have the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards) on the right and the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) on the left, who, with the hon. member for North Norfolk, are the leaders of the Liberal party outside of the government, and we have these two hon. gentlemen attacking the hon. member for North Norfolk. At the same time we have the hon. member for Russell attacking and threatening the government. He is getting shaky about the government; he does not know where they stand; and who does know where they stand? Is there a man in Canada, who, if you were to divide that government, knows how many would stand on one side and how many on the other? I do not know. He holds them up—and history repeats itself—as they were held up in 1878 by a contingent from the maritime provinces. He says: Go one step farther and I will denounce you. An hon. member on the other side of the House farther back, on Friday evening did the same thing. So it is all over the House. The hon. member for Russell speaks as if he were in earnest. I do not know whether he is or not. I would believe every word he uttered was perfectly sincere only for one thing, which makes me feel that I do not know where I stand in that regard, and that is the fact that we had the declaration of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and the avowal of the hon. member for North Norfolk—both of whom proclaimed their convictions in language quite as vehement and certainly more forcible than ever that used by the hon. member for Russell—and yet of these declarations they meant not one word. What are we to understand ? I hope he is sincere. I would rather have him sincere in error than have him take the position of proclaiming one thing and actually believing another. I am sorry that when the whole trend of public opinion has gone thus far any man who has a regard for his public reputation as a politician or a statesman, should announce a policy of free trade in this country. I am sorry that the hon. member for Russell, coming as he does from almost the Capital of Canada, has not advanced beyond the infant stage of political economy. He reminds me of an incident that occurred in the riding of the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Mulock). I regret to say that owing perhaps to the example of that hon. gentleman they have not in conservative households in that riding a high opinion of the virtues of the Liberal party. A lady who belonged to that party, or whose husband did, came to visit at the house of a Tory family, whose name I will not mention, but it is a name well known to some hon. members of this House. She brought with her three little children. When the visitors had departed a little toddling child of the Conservative family went to her mother and said : Mother, is Mrs. Jones a Grit ? The mother said : Yes, I suppose so. The child said : Mother, is that nice little boy a Grit, too ? The mother said : Yes, he is a Grit, too. The child said : Mother, is that dear little baby a Grit, too ? The mother replied : Yes. 'Well,' said the little girl, 'I am very very sorry for the dear little baby.' And so it is with the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards). He is yet in the infancy of political economy, and I am very sorry for the dear little hon. member for Russell. But we come to bigger game, and we have on the other side the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser), who struck out generally in this debate. I have a report of his speech from a good Grit paper, it is a nice report all through, which says :

> The speech of Mr. Richardson for South Grey was finished in thorough fashion by Mr. D. C. Fraser, the big member for Guysborough. He took the tariff and the royalty question, and shook them as a terrier does a rat.

Now is that really what the hon. member for Guysborough did ? What he did does not seem to be quite so big as that, for here is what he said :
