Article 1

The high contracting parties agree to take, within the limits of their respective jurisdictions, appropriate measures to ensure the application of the provisions of the present convention and the punishment of infractions of the said provisions.

Article 2

The present convention applies only to baleens or whalebone whales.

Article 3

The present convention does not apply to aborigines dwelling on the coasts of the territories of the high contracting parties provided that:

(1) They only use canoes, pirogues or other exclusively native craft propelled by oars or sails;

(2) They do not carry firearms;

(3) They are not in the employment of persons other than aborigines;

[Mr. Bennett.]

(4) They are not under contract to deliver the products of their whaling to any third person.

The taking or killing of right whales, which shall be deemed to include North-Cape whales, Greenland whales, southern right whales, Pacific right whales and southern pigmy right whales, is prohibited.

Article 5

The taking or killing of calves or suckling whales, immature whales, and female whales which are accompanied by calves (or suckling whales) is prohibited.

Article 6

The fullest possible use shall be made of the carcases of whales taken. In particular:

1. There shall be extracted by boiling or otherwise the oil from all blubber and from the head and the tongue and, in addition, from the tail as far forward as the outer opening of the lower intestine.

The provisions of this sub-paragraph shall apply only to such carcases or parts of carcases as are not intended to be used for human food.

2. Every factory, whether on shore or afloat, used for treating the carcases of whales shall be equipped with adequate apparatus for the extraction of oil from the blubber, flesh and bones.

3. In the case of whales brought on shore, adequate arrangements shall be made for utilizing the residues after the oil has been extracted.

Article 7

Gunners and crews of whaling vessels shall be engaged on terms such that their remuneration shall depend to a considerable extent upon such factors as the size, species, value and yield of oil of whales taken, and not merely upon the number of whales taken, in so far as payment is made dependent on results.

Article 8

No vessel of any of the high contracting parties shall engage in taking or treating whales unless a licence authorizing such vessel to engage therein shall have been granted in respect of such vessel by the high contracting party, whose flag she flies, or unless her owner or charterer has notified the government of the said high contracting party of his intention to employ her in whaling and has received a certificate of notification from the said government.

Nothing in this article shall prejudice the right of any high contracting party to require that, in addition, a licence shall be required from his own authorities by every vessel desirous of using his territory or territorial waters for the purposes of taking, landing or treating whales, and such licence may be refused or may be made subject to such conditions as may be deemed by such high contracting party to be necessary or desirable, whatever the nationality of the vessel may be.

Article 9

Each high contracting party shall obtain from all factories, on land or afloat, under his jurisdiction, returns of the number of whales of each species treated at each factory and of the amounts of oil of each grade and the quantities of meal, guano and other products derived from them.

Article 12

Each of the high contracting parties shall communicate statistical information regarding all whaling operations under their jurisdiction to the international bureau for whaling statistics at Oslo. The information given shall comprise at least the particulars mentioned in Article 10 and: (1) the name and tonnage of each floating factory; (2) the number and aggregate tonnage of the whale catchers; (3) a list of the land stations which were in operation during the period concerned. 2. Any high contracting party may give notice to the secretary-general of the League of Nations at any time subsequently that he desires that the convention shall apply to all or any of his territories which have been made the subject of a declaration under the preceding paragraph, and the convention shall apply to all the territories named in such notice ninety days after its receipt by the secretary-general of the League of Nations.

territories named in such declaration six months after its receipt by the secretary-general of the League of Nations.

The present convention shall be registered by the secretary-general of the League of Nations as soon as it has entered into force.

In faith whereof the above-mentioned plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention.

Done at Geneva, on the twenty-fourth day of September one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one, in a single copy which shall be kept in the archives of the secretariat of the League of Nations and of which certified true copies shall be delivered to all the members of the League of Nations and to the non-member states.

And that this house do approve of the same.

He said: The international convention with respect to whaling is the natural result of the adoption of means in connection with the destruction of the whale which would lead to their extinction. It is known to all hon. members that in various provinces of confederation we have had to adopt means to prevent certain methods being used in the destruction of game and fish. Whales, which are of course in the high seas, have been destroyed in the north Atlantic ocean to a point where there are only few remaining. In the Antarctic, where they are numerous, it was found necessary to take restrictive and prohibitory measures to ensure the continuance of the whale. It may sound very strange, but the fact is that in the year 1930 the whaling fleets of the world destroyed 40,201 whales in the Antarctic ocean. When I say to this house that not half of that number were killed in the entire ten-year period between 1920 and 1930 hon. members will have some appreciation of the extent of the slaughter. In this process of destruction 232 whale-catching boats were engaged with 6 shore stations and 41 floating factories.

These floating factories follow the ships that destroy the whales. They are largely destroyed, as is known, with harpoons and bombs, and the fat is rendered in these floating refineries with the result that very great havoc has been made through the destruction of the whales. Great Britain and Norway largely control the whaling industry but it was realized, of course, that action merely by one national could not accomplish any good purpose for the simple and obvious reason that the whales are found on the high seas and if other nations were not prohibited from carrying on operations the ships of other nationals would take advantage of the fact and the destruction would continue. Therefore an effort has been made to bring about an international understanding or convention, and after an inquiry had been made by a committee of the League of Nations this convention which is now before the house was adopted.

I may say that the convention, which was opened for signature on the twenty-fourth day of February, 1931, has been signed by Albania, Germany, the United States, Belgium, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, Colombia, Denmark, Spain, Finland, France, Greece, Italy, Mexico, Norway, The Netherlands, Poland, Roumania, Switzerland, Czechoslovakia, Turkey and Yugoslavia, and ratification has been completed by the United Kingdom, South Africa, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Italy, Mexico, The Netherlands, Poland, Spain, Switzerland, Turkey, the United States, and Yugoslavia. Brazil, Egypt, Nicaragua, Monaco, Sudan and Ecuador, which were not signatories to the original convention have acceded to its provisions. The convention came into force on the sixteenth day of January of this year.

The only other point I assume upon which the members of this house would like to be advised is what the provisions are with respect to enforcement, restrictions and the prohibitions. The convention contemplates that each national will take adequate steps to see that the convention to which it has become a party is duly and properly enforced. So far as we in Canada are concerned, in 1933, I think we had four whaling vessels on our registry engaged in the destruction of whales, and they operated entirely on the west coast of Canada, the headquarters being in the Queen Charlotte islands. The total number of whales that were taken during that period amounted to 209 in the last season for which we have a record in the north Pacific waters, and 509,000 gallons of whale oil were secured. So far as we are concerned the regulations and prohibitions with respect to some species of whales are not difficult of enforcement. The provisions of our Fisheries Act, the Department of Justice advises, by sections 7, 8, 9, 34 and 52, confer sufficient authority upon the government to carry into effect the obligations and responsibilities that rest upon this country by reason of the convention.

I do not think that any good purpose would be served by a more lengthy statement of what the objects of the convention are. I trust that they are such as will appeal to the members of this house as eminently proper in the premises and that there will be no difficulty in adopting the resolution which aims at the preservation of the whales not only for industrial purposes, because whale oil is a very valuable product, but also to prevent a surplus of the oil being placed upon the markets of the world with a corresponding destruction of prices. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by Mr. Guthrie, the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, here we are legislating about whales. This is the new social order. In the time of the prophet whales belonged to the old order, but the old order has gone and whales went with them. Evidently the Prime Minister wants the old order restored, so now he proposes legislation with regard to whales. Most ridiculous, Mr. Speaker! Have we not other things to discuss in the House of Commons that we must be considering whales for human food? Our farmers complain that they cannot sell their potatoes, their cattle and other produce that they grow on their farms, and now we are to use whales for human food, and that is proposed by the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada. Enough of that, Mr. Speaker. It is most foolish and most ridiculous.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should not refer to remarks made by the Prime Minister on a motion for the ratification of a convention agreed upon by various nations of the world as most foolish, and I would ask him not to do it.

Mr. POULIOT: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I withdraw what has been said if it is not within the rules of the house. As I was saying, in these times of distress our farmers complain that they cannot sell their products, and here we are to raise whales on a very large scale, because whales are large fish. I wonder if the dredging around the island of the Postmaster General was done to prepare for whales coming there. It is most extraordinary. We have had legislation about migratory birds, and now we are to have legislation about whales. Who could believe it if it were not printed on the records of this house? But this convention about whales is printed on the official records of parliament and it is proposed by the Prime Minister unless my eyes and ears have deceived me. I cannot conceive but that it will be received with a general roar of laughter throughout the country. Let us have a piece of whale steak for a sandwich, and whale hot dogs. It is most extraordinary. I believe, Mr. Speaker, I am within the rules of the house in stating that it is extraordinary. I shall not use any other expression though I find many on my lips to describe this legislation, but I want to keep within the rules of the house. I wonder if the Prime Minister will not give us recipes for the eating of whale. Should we take H.P. sauce with it or ketchup or salt and pepper or mustard, English or French? I should like the Prime Minister, who is the chef of this party, to give us some recipes for eating whale. One cannot imagine any Canadian citizen, man or woman, not having a roar of laughter when he thinks of it.

But not only that. I hesitate to read some of the articles of this convention. The wording is unusual. I would draw the attention of every member of the house who has the order paper before him to some sections of the convention. It would be improper to use such language, so I shall not recite the articles but I would refer hon. gentlemen, for instance, to article No. 6, paragraph one. It is most disgusting; also article 10; it would take a doctor to make such an inquiry. But these are the things that are proposed by the right hon. the Prime Minister, who is a gentleman. I cannot conceive how it could happen. Now when we go to the people the government will say, "We are giving you something new. In the future you will eat whales." It is most incredible and stupid. And the farmers who cannot sell their products I suppose will go to the Antarctic and harpoon whales to cater to us. I shall not insist upon it too much but I did want to show how ridiculous such legislation is even though it is covered by a convention.

Mr. JACOBS: What nations are not signatories to this convention?

Mr. BENNETT: So far as I recall, Japan is the only one.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I think the objects of this convention are wholly commendable. It is desirable that the great natural wealth of the world should be preserved, particularly where it ministers to the needs of the peoples of all countries, and it is obvious that this end cannot be obtained except by the combined efforts of the different nations. I imagine that combined effort can be most effectively made through the League of Nations and it is to be hoped that any country which has not thus far become a party to this convention may be induced to see the wisdom of joining with the other nations in preserving a part of the common inheritance of mankind. I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) how it happens that we are only now being asked to approve a convention which was signed in 1931. Is there any reason for the long delay?

Mr. BENNETT: The convention did not come into force until January 16 of this year as it was waiting for the signatures of other nations.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. NEILL: Does the definition contained in article four apply to the whales usually taken on the Pacific coast?

Mr. BENNETT: I am told that the convention will apply to all whales except those known as the toothed whale.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Last night I inquired of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) in connection with any proposed amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act. The minister stated he could not give me an answer at that time and I should now like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if it is the intention of the administration to introduce legislation during the present session to amend the Old Age Pensions Act?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): There is a matter under consideration which affects the relationship of the provinces and the dominion but I am not in a position to give a more definite answer to the question.

COOPERATIVE SOCIETIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation at this session along the lines with the recommendation of the price spreads commission in connection with the incorporation of cooperative consumers' societies?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The question will be considered as a notice of question.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MANION

CONTRADICTION OF STATEMENTS APPEARING IN THE HYNDMAN COMMISSION REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, something which I have done only once before in about twenty sessions. A report was tabled yesterday by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland) in connection with an investigation into the existing facilities with regard to employment of ex-service men. After referring to a charge which had been made that an insufficient number of returned men were employed by the Montreal harbour commission, the following statement is made on page 10 of the report:

> Similar complaints were made with regard to the meagre employment of veterans on jobs outside the control of the civil service commission on canals, especially in the vicinity of Montreal. This also might well be inquired into by the Department of Railways and Canals.

This statement is absolutely undeserving. I asked my chief engineer, who by the way is a returned man, to give me a statement of the number of returned men employed by the department on the canals. He gave me the following figures in connection with the Lachine and Welland ship canals, which make up about 60 per cent of the canals of Canada. Out of a total number of 439 employed on the Lachine canal, 184 or 42 per cent are returned men. Out of a total of 510 employed on the Welland ship canal, 330 or 65 per cent are returned men. Out of a total of 949 employed on the two canals, 514 or 54 per cent are returned men. I make this statement as I think it is most unfair that any committee or commission should listen to only one side when making an investigation and make a report without calling upon the other side to give an explanation. This commission did not do this and they made a report by implication condemning the department. I hope this correction will receive the same publicity as the statement which was made in the report and I trust the rest of the report is more dependable than this particular statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the minister referring to the Hyndman report which was tabled yesterday?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

GRADE CROSSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Some time ago a question was asked by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) in connection with grade crossings which had been eliminated under the provisions of the public works acts. I am informed by the board of railway commissioners that of the crossings protected since the fund came into existence, 30 per cent were rural and 70 per cent were urban crossings. I have not been able to get the information for the last two years.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Could the minister advise when we might expect the information in connection with the crossings protected during the last two years?

Mr. MANION: The board of railway commissioners have been working on this matter and I shall get this information as soon as possible.

DOMINION NOTES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if a date has been set for the repeal of the Dominion Notes Act?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman knows that he should give notice of a question like that as obviously I could not carry matters of that sort in my head. This matter concerns the Department of Finance and I shall make an inquiry, in the meantime treating this question as a notice.

HYNDMAN COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I inquired yesterday of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland) with respect to the report of the Hyndman commission which was tabled yesterday afternoon. At that time the minister stated that he would probably disclose today what disposition the government intended to make of this report.

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): This matter will have to be thought over very carefully. Members of the government have not had an opportunity to go into this report very thoroughly and will not have until the report is printed. So far there have been only a very limited number of copies available.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BRANCH LINE BETWEEN ST. WALBURG AND LOON LAKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): I have a question to ask the Minister of Railways, and as a preliminary basis for that question I should like to read the following telegram, dated Loon Lake, via Meadow Lake, Saskatchewan, May 31, 1935:

> C. R. McIntosh, M.P.,
> Parliament Bldg., Ottawa.
> Settlers over entire area again request a favourable reply to their petition asking for completion of grade and steel from St.

Walburg to Loon Lake this summer. We feel the time is ripe to help the thousands who moved here from the south on the understanding that this line would be completed. Your cooperation is requested.

Northern Railways Development Association,
C. F. Marshall, President,
Fred Mitchell, Secretary-Treasurer.

I understand that in regard to this railway the minister has a petition dated April 4. Moreover, the matter has been brought up in the house by myself time and again during the last five years.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am just coming to the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has laid a sufficient foundation for the question if he will now kindly ask it.

Mr. McINTOSH: The question, based on the submission made to the special committee on railways and shipping by the member for Athabaska and myself on April 10, and also on the questions, to which I have referred, brought up in the house during the last five years, is this: Can the minister add anything further to his previous statements in regard to the extension of this branch line, thus more fully informing parliament and the country on the question.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): The hon. gentleman appeared before the railway committee and, assisted by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Davies), submitted the case. They both went into the matter carefully with the management. I have nothing new from the management with regard to the question but they are no doubt giving it consideration and I shall be glad to bring to their attention the remarks which the hon. gentleman has just made.

GRANTING OF INTERIM SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I notice that yesterday, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was asking for interim supply, he intimated that he thought an arrangement had been made with the opposition as to the granting of this supply. As a matter of fact, I do not think that any such arrangement was made with anyone on this side of the house. Had I been here, I would not have objected to the granting of a month's interim supply; I would, however, have pointed out that it is now over five years since the last parliament went out of existence, and that the time has come when the members on this side, or indeed in any other part of the house, should not be asked to take steps calculated to assist in further prolonging the demise of the present parliament and government.

PATENTS OF INVENTION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, May 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 48, to amend and consolidate the acts relating to patents of invention—Mr. Cahan—Mr. Morand in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 65 is under consideration.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): During the debate on the various sections of this bill, from 1 to 64, the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), the former Minister of Trade and Commerce, called the attention of the house to a letter which he had written, addressed to me, dated July 30, 1934. I remembered, of course, receiving that letter and making certain inquiries in regard to it, and then seeking an interview with the hon. gentleman, who was then my colleague in the government, and finding that he had left for the west, the time of his return being uncertain. I have no doubt there is a proper explanation why a letter dated July 30, 1934, was not delivered to me until several days later. I presume the explanation is that prior to leaving for the west he signed a number of letters, one dated July 30, and that that letter was held by his secretary for the compilation of the documents which were to be attached to it and which might require some further time. But this fact remains, as I have stated, that I did make some inquiries in regard to the matter during his absence; and without going into a full discussion—I do not think this is necessary—I wish to say simply that I did find that, with regard to the complaint of George A. Broder of the North Shore Radio and Electric Company of Vancouver, on the same day as the date of the letter in question, July 30, a judgment against him had been entered in the Exchequer Court of Canada for infringement of patent rights; and that judgment having been entered, and the case closed by a judgment from which no appeal had been taken, there was no possibility of the Secretary of State or of the commissioner of patents intervening. With regard to the case of Morris Feldberg, on looking into it I found that among the documents submitted to me was one from an official of the hon. gentleman's own department, throwing considerable discredit upon the statements alleged to have been made by Feldberg to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I found that an injunction had been obtained against Feldberg for infringement in the exchequer court on April 18, 1934. Subsequent evidence submitted showed that Feldberg, despite this injunction and in contempt of court, was proceeding still with the infringement of this patent by the sale in considerable quantities of articles which were an infringement of the patent. Feldberg was brought before Mr. Justice Maclean of the exchequer court on July 17, 1934, for contempt. Mr. Justice Maclean entered very carefully into the matter and gave a full explanation to Feldberg with regard to his wrongdoing and with respect to the order of the court issued against him; and then, taking a personal promise from Feldberg that he would no longer attempt these illicit sales, he postponed the commitment of Feldberg, on his solemn promise that he would cease from these infringements; and it appeared to me that in these cases, which had been closed in the court by judgments of the court, no good purpose would be served by my entering into this private dispute.

With regard to the matters which are under discussion at the present time, I would seek the earnest attention of the house to one or two considerations which I feel it my duty to submit. The real issue is whether we are to adopt an amendment proposed by the hon. member for East Kootenay which, in its terms, if carried into effect, is a complete violation of an international convention to which we are a party. The government, in giving consideration to this issue, decided that, although the previous government ratified that convention, it was the bounden duty of a succeeding government, so long as that convention remained in force, to maintain legislation consistent with its terms, because the violation of that convention by a succeeding government would cast grave reflection upon this house and the government.

In order that the matter may be more completely understood, allow me to say that the first international convention for the protection of industrial property, which includes patents and patent rights, was signed in Paris on March 23, 1883. Canada did not become a party to that convention. The second one was signed at Brussels on December 14, 1900. Canada did not become a party to that convention because the laws relating to patents in force in this country at that time were not consistent nor in conformity with the obligations which a nation ratifying the convention would be in honour bound to undertake. The third convention was signed at Washington on June 2, 1911. That convention was not ratified by Canada until September 1, 1923. I find that there was considerable correspondence between the late government and especially the government of the United Kingdom with regard to the ratification of that convention The officers of the government of the United Kingdom pointed out to the Canadian government that while our patent law remained as it then was, it would be improper for Canada to become a party to that convention. But in 1923 the government of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) ratified the convention on September 1, and in that year brought into effect certain amendments to the patent law which were in conformity with the terms of the convention as they then existed.

The fourth convention was signed at the Hague on November 1, 1925. That convention was signed by a representative of Canada, but the ratification of it was not deposited by this country until May 1, 1928. That Hague convention of 1925 introduced into the existing convention certain new provisions which were to the effect that before a patent could be revoked in accordance with the terms of the convention, there must first be an order for the granting of licences to others to manufacture the patented articles within Canada and a reasonable time must be given to ascertain whether the granting of licences, and thus bringing about within this country competition in the manufacture, sale and use of the patented article, would serve to remedy the abuses then complained of, but if those abuses then complained of were not remedied by the grant of licences to competitors, then the commissioner of patents or any other executive authority would have, within the terms of the convention, the right and power of abrogating the patent and wiping it out of existence, so that thereafter there would be no continuing monopoly in being in this country and every person desiring to manufacture, sell and use, would be quite free from any restrictions imposed by the grant of the patent.

The amendment which is proposed by the hon. member for East Kootenay is, in terms, section 40 of the existing act, and he proposes to amend section 65 of the bill by the addition of that clause in the present act which was first enacted in Canada on June 13, 1923, before the date of the Hague convention in 1925 and before the ratification of that convention in 1928 by the government then led by the present leader of the opposition In 1923 this provision, which is now proposed, differed from the English act that was then in force and that it purported in some of its terms to follow, but providing in addition that in the case of any abuse of the exclusive rights of the patentee, the commissioner of patents could order the patentee "to supply the patented article within reasonable limits at such price as may be fixed by him and in accordance with the custom of the trade to which the invention relates as to the payment and delivery, or to grant licences for the use of the patented invention as may be fixed by him, in either case within and after such time as may be fixed by him and on pain of forfeiture of the patent."

That section, which purported to authorize the commissioner of patents to fix the prices at which patented articles might be sold in this country, has been considered on many occasions by the leading legal counsel of the country, and there has been at least a grave apprehension that the parliament of Canada has not legislative competence to fix and determine the price of articles which are sold generally throughout this country. That grave apprehension as to the validity of any such fixing of prices has I think been the chief deterrent against the attempt to enforce that provision. But, on May 1, 1928, Canada ratified the Hague international convention of November 6, 1925, and that provision in our Patent Act then came into direct conflict with Canada's international obligations under that convention. Section 40 of the existing act, which it is now proposed to revive, purports to authorize the commissioner of patents to order the patentee to supply the patented article within reasonable limits at such prices as may be fixed by him, that is, as may be fixed by the commissioner of patents. It is obvious that the patentee's monopoly right under a patent would be valueless to him if the commissioner were authorized to fix the prices at which the patented article should be sold in this country. It is obvious also, I think, that there is, and there has been grave doubt whether the parliament of Canada under clause 22 of section 91 of the British North America Act of 1867, having authority to make laws in relation to patents of invention and discovery, has also, in respect of the laws relating to patents of invention, the legislative competence to fix the prices at which patented articles may be sold to the public in Canada. But apart from that doubt as to the legislative competence of parliament, after Canada adhered to the Hague convention of May 1, 1928, there can be no doubt that any attempt on the part of an official of the government of Canada to fix such prices, under the provisions of any such section of the Patent Act as the old section 40, would be and be deemed to be a violation of the terms of the international convention to which we became parties.

After correspondence between the late government led by the right hon. leader of the opposition with the government of the United Kingdom it was arranged that the government of the United Kingdom would deposit the British ratification of this Hague convention on the same date, May 1, 1928. So that the United Kingdom and Canada became parties to that convention on the same day. The government of the United Kingdom then reformed its patent laws so that those laws would entirely conform to and be consistent with the terms of the international convention to which both governments had become parties.

But two conditions were imposed by the Hague convention, which may be briefly stated as follows: That each of the contracting countries shall have the right to take the necessary legislative measures to prevent the abuses which might result from the exercise of the exclusive rights conferred by the patent, for example failure to work or other abuses, but it is also strictly stipulated by the terms of this convention that these measures shall not provide for the revocation of the patent unless the grant of compulsory licenses —that is, to enable others to enter and compete and manufacture and sell and use—is insufficient to prevent such abuses. Therefore the English patent act, in conformity with the Hague convention, was made to provide that in case any person interested made application in the prescribed manner, alleging in case of any patent that there has been an abuse, the first remedy must be sought in the grant to others of a compulsory licence to import, manufacture, sell or use the patented article. And thereafter, if the grant to others of such compulsory licence shall prove insufficient to prevent such abuses, then the comptroller of patents, as he is called in England, or the commissioner of patents, as he is denominated in Canada, may revoke the patent and thereby completely destroy the monopoly and all the monopoly rights existing thereunder. In this bill we deemed it advisable to follow in exact terms the English legislation, which is equally applicable to this country and the conditions which prevail in this country.

The patent laws of the United States do not permit of the revocation of a patent under any circumstances, therefore, no matter what abuses may arise during the term of sixteen years for which the patent is in force, there is no such remedy under United States legislation as the revocation of a patent because of prevailing abuses. To mention briefly just one authority, Walker on Patents, one of the leading United States authorities,—fifth edition—the author summarizes the law of the United States as follows at page 185 of that edition:

> Patent rights are property, and the very essence of the rights conferred by the patent is the exclusion of others from its use. The owner of a patent is both legally and equitably entitled to the same protection for that property, that the owner of any other species of property may enjoy; and he cannot be constitutionally deprived of that property without due process of law. Due process of law includes the constitutional judgments and decrees of courts; but it does not include any act of Congress, or of any other legislature. Patent rights, once vested, are therefore incapable of being divested by act of Congress, except of course by the exercise of the power of eminent domain. Nor can Congress do indirectly, that which it is forbidden to do with directness. It cannot destroy nor seriously impair the value of the patent right, under the guise of altering or repealing the existing remedies applicable to its enforcement, any more than it can so treat any other kind of property.

That is the law of the neighbouring republic, but that is a law which we have declined to follow. The granting of a patent is a grant of exclusive rights, or monopoly rights if you wish to use that term. But in England there has been throughout its patent legislation a procedure prescribed by law whereby abuses might be remedied. In the present state of the English law those abuses can be remedied either by the grant of compulsory licence to others to compete in the same market, or if the grant of such compulsory licence proves unavailing then the comptroller can act arbitrarily and forthwith repeal and revoke the patent and all rights under it.

We, therefore, have followed the English act, which is entirely consistent with our international obligations. Section 27 of the English act is incorporated verbatim in sections 65, 66, 67 and 68 of this bill. I think perhaps the hon. member for East Kootenay was misled somewhat by a note of explanation in connection with this bill. When I prepared section 64 I incorporated in it all the provisions of section 27 of the English act which are now represented by sections 65, 66, 67 and 68 of this bill. But the committee on banking and commerce of the Senate thought it advisable to divide the English section 27 into several sections for purposes of clarity, and therefore they divided the new section which I introduced in one long column into various sections which now stand as sections 65, 66, 67 and 68 of this bill. But the law clerk or other clerk of the Senate left opposite section 64 in this bill this statement:

> This replaces section 40 of the present act.

What was intended and what did replace or purport to replace section 40 as the bill was first prepared, was a new section incorporating not only section 64 but sections 65, 66, 67 and 68. When the Senate committee divided the lengthy provision into sections, unfortunately they left as a note on the opposite page a statement to the effect that section 64 replaced section 40 of the act, and for that reason the error has proved somewhat misleading.

To all who have studied these matters, I believe it must be obvious that the amendment suggested by the hon. member for East Kootenay is entirely misplaced and would destroy sections 65, 66, 67 and 68 of the bill which, I suggest, are completely sufficient and efficient for the protection of every conceivable interest, public or private, so far as the law of patents may be effective.

Subsection (1) of section 65 is very wide indeed, stating that:

> The Attorney General of Canada or any person interested may at any time after the expiration of three years from the date of the grant of a patent apply to the commissioner alleging in the case of that patent that there has been an abuse of the exclusive rights thereunder and asking for relief under this act.

I have already explained that the term of three years is the period prescribed by international convention. It is the express provision of The Hague convention of 1925. Any abuse of the exclusive rights of the patentee may be the subject of petition. Then follow clear definitions in subsection (2) of section 65. Without quoting the whole of the paragraphs I shall endeavour to give their substance.

Paragraph (a) applies when the patent "is not being worked within Canada on a commercial scale;" that is to say, as defined in section 2 of this bill, the manufacturer of the article shall have a definite or substantial establishment or organization and operate on a scale which is adequate and reasonable under the circumstances. Paragraph (c) of subsection (2), section 65, provides that it is an abuse of exclusive rights of the patentee "if the demand for the patented article in Canada is not being met to an adequate extent and on reasonable terms." Those are the words used in the English statute. This paragraph covers not only the abuse of withholding supplies of the patented article, but also that of charging prices for the patented article, which are not reasonable, when manufactured and sold. Paragraph (d) provides that it is an abuse if the patentee refuses to grant to others in Canada licences upon reasonable terms for the manufacture and sale in Canada of the patented article. That is a cause of complaint in connection with radios and other patented inventions.

Paragraph (e) of the same subsection (2) provides that it is an abuse if any trade or industry in Canada, or any person or class of persons engaged therein, is unfairly prejudiced by the conditions attached by the patentee, either in respect of the "purchase, hire, licence, or use of the patented article, or the using or working of the patented process. Paragraph (f) provides that it is an abuse if it is shown that the existence of the patent unfairly prejudices the manufacture, use or sale of any materials used in the production of the patented process or article.

Section 66 provides that the commissioner, upon being satisfied that a case of abuse of the exclusive rights under a patent has been established may exercise certain powers. Under paragraph (a) the commissioner may grant to others licences to manufacture, sell, or use the patented article. In granting such licences to others the commissioner, among other things, "shall endeavour to secure the widest possible user of the invention in Canada consistent with the patentee deriving a reasonable advantage from his patent rights." Under paragraph (d) of section 66 we find that if the commissioner is satisfied that the granting of such licence to others to manufacture, sell and use the patented article fails to overcome the abuses complained of, then he may order the revocation of the patent, and thereupon the rights of the patentee are completely nullified and wiped out of existence. To this power to make an order for revocation of the patent only one condition is attached, namely, "that the commissioner shall make no order for revocation which is at variance with any treaty, convention, arrangement or engagement with any other country to which Canada is a party." The only condition that now applies is the fifth article of the Hague convention, namely, that the patent may not be revoked unless the grant of compulsory licences proves insufficient to prevent such abuses.

Section 67 of the bill, which is also held in abeyance, relates to the term of exclusive licence which the commissioner may grant, and section 68 provides that the commissioner shall consider the matters alleged in every application made respecting abuses, and shall serve notice of such application upon the patentee or his representatives. Section 69 provides that in certain cases the commissioner with the consent of the minister may refer the whole proceedings to the exchequer court for judicial decision.

The English procedure, which we have adopted in its entirety, paragraph for paragraph and word for word, has proved very efficient in meeting each such abuse as it arises. I am convinced that the English procedure constitutes the most complete, effective and equitable procedure for dealing with alleged abuses of the exclusive rights granted to a patentee, which has yet been developed in any country. Decisions of the comptroller, the English authority who is almost identical with our commissioner of patents, are published the same as court decisions, and, in construing certain sections of this act, they would be available for the guidance of a commissioner in this country. They would not be binding, and the commissioner would not be obliged to follow them. But as existing conditions are such that we cannot adopt the American patent law, which provides that the rights of patentees may not be amended or revoked for a term of sixteen years, we have followed the constitutional practice of the United Kingdom, after which our own constitutional practice has been developed, and have adopted that procedure which is known to be consistent and in conformity with the provisions of the Hague conference, to which both countries are parties. We have adopted those provisions and now propose to place them upon our statute books.

After these proposals had been heard during nineteen hearings of a Senate committee, at which all parts of the country and all interests were represented, it was agreed by those opposing and as well as by those advocating the introduction of these provisions that they were the most fair, equitable and effective provisions which had yet been suggested.

I wish to add with regard to the customs law that there is nothing in our customs law at present which prevents the importation of articles into this country which would infringe the rights of a Canadian patentee, but, when they have once passed the customs they may not be used or sold in Canada except under licence from the patentee. The revocation of the patent, which is such a complete and summary remedy as now provided, will of course permit of the importation into Canada of the patented article and its sale and use in Canada without any restrictions whatsoever.

The real point at issue, Mr. Chairman, between the suggestion made by the hon. member for East Kootenay by his amendment, and the position of this government, I think is clearly understood. This government, after very careful consideration of the facts to which I have called attention, has decided that this patent legislation should be made to conform to the international obligations undertaken by our predecessors in office, and that in introducing this new legislation we will not adopt sections which will conflict with and in terms violate the international convention into which our predecessors entered. If in time another government comes into office that deems it advisable to give one year's notice and revoke the Hague convention or whatever other convention may be in force at that day, then parliament will be free to make changes in the patent law which are inconsistent with and in violation of a convention that has been revoked, but, at the present time, I insist that, until that convention is revoked, in providing new legislation and making amendments to existing legislation we are bound in honour to maintain intact the terms of the Hague convention.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, the other day when I introduced this subject I opened my remarks with the words, "I do not rise in any spirit of criticism of this bill, but there is a matter which I understand is not dealt with in the bill and I would like to lay before the government and the house one phase in connection with patents which I trust might be considered when this bill is in committee." I further stated in my remarks that I was not criticizing the bill, and that I was not criticizing the present government for its attitude in connection with this bill, and that I was not criticizing the preceding or any previous government in connection with the matter. I pointed out that the matter I wished to bring forward had apparently escaped the attention of those who were dealing with the revision of the Patent Act in the other house, and I trusted that my observations then might have been received in the spirit in which they were offered; that is, a suggestion for meeting a grievance which many people in this country feel exists in connection with the patent law.

The hon. gentleman who has just dealt with the matter (Mr. Cahan)—I think he will accept this statement—has treated the house to an extremely learned and involved legal argument. I am not presuming for a moment to be qualified to dispute his legal arguments at all. I frankly pay tribute to the hon. gentleman and his ability as a lawyer in arguing a matter of that kind. But I would like to say this to the committee, having listened to the hon. gentleman with care in his somewhat involved and constitutional argument, that in my opinion the whole matter is in fact comparatively simple, so simple, sir, that I think it comes even within the comprehension of a layman.

The hon. gentleman laboured very seriously the suggestion that the amendment is in complete violation of an international convention. He says that an international convention was entered into in 1925 and was ratified by this parliament on May 1, 1928. That is, the convention was entered into ten years ago, and it was ratified seven years ago. Now all I have asked or suggested is that a section, a portion, of the Patent Act which has been on our statutes during all that period and is still in the statute, and will be until this bill passes and repeals it, should be carried into the new statute. If what I suggest to-day is, in the words of the hon. gentleman, a complete violation of the international convention, then the patent law of Canada in so far as this section 40 is concerned has for seven years been in complete violation of a solemn international undertaking. So much for that.

Then the hon. gentleman laboured very earnestly to impress the committee with the seriousness of exercising the power of revocation, of revoking a patent. He read from American legal opinions and others to show that it was an exceedingly serious thing to revoke a patent. Well, I am not arguing for anything to be added to the statute that will revoke a patent. So, as far as that portion of his argument is concerned, I have no need to make any further reply.

But the hon. gentleman in another part of his argument says that revocation offers a complete remedy. In one part of his argument he warns us seriously and earnestly and properly against indulging in revocation; in another part of his argument he answers my very moderate suggestion by saying that it is not necessary because we have the power of revocation, which he himself asserts is a very serious thing and ought not to be invoked, and I agree with him that it ought not to be invoked except upon serious grounds.

The hon. gentleman then proceeds to argue that patents are in the nature of property. I quite agree with him in that; I am not disputing it, nor am I suggesting at any time in any of my remarks that there should be any infringement of the property rights of the patentee in his patent—none whatever. I am a firm believer in protecting particularly the inventor, but I am also a firm believer in protecting the owner of the patent within reason. But I do say this, that the practice of selling out patents to large corporations which pigeonhole them and do not use them is something that should be examined into, and great care should be taken that this practice is not abused. But that is another question. I am at one with the hon. gentleman and with anyone who desires to protect the property rights of anyone in his patent.

Then my hon. friend referred to my references to certain cases by saying that certain individuals, Mr. Feldberg and a firm on the Pacific coast, had been examined before the Exchequer Court of Canada and convicted, as he says. The suggestion in the argument is that inasmuch as this firm, on the one hand, and this individual, on the other, had been convicted they were out of court. That is exactly the basis of my appeal to parliament at this time. They were convicted of what? They were convicted of bringing articles into Canada, paying a duty upon them to the extent of about forty per cent and offering them for sale when they had paid a royalty in the country of origin.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the hon. member confident that they paid the duty?

Mr. STEVENS: The hon. member rather cross questions me on that point but I would refer him to his colleague beside him who administers the customs laws. I have sufficient respect for him to assume that he is vigorously enforcing the laws and that the duty was paid. I would not like to reflect upon the customs department to the extent of saying anything to the contrary.

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend was once minister of customs; perhaps these came in during his period of office.

Mr. STEVENS: No; during that period the customs laws were very vigorously enforced. If my hon. friend was basing his argument upon that period I could answer him with more certainty.

The fact remains that this man imported these goods openly and offered them for sale and no one has challenged the payment of the duty. As a matter of fact I have in my hand a lengthy argument prepared by a prominent firm of lawyers dealing with this particular question. This argument was prepared for certain clients of this firm and bears out my contention. The only point which I have brought before this committee and for which I ask remedial measures is that the Patent Act should not be used to enhance unduly the price of articles to the public and be a sort of supertariff imposed upon the regular tariff laws. That is all I ask.

The hon. gentleman argues that inasmuch as the privy council has declared that it is not intra vires for parliament to pass laws fixing prices, as my proposal fixes prices in effect it is a challenge to the constitutionality of the law. The law has been there for ten years, it has contained the provision I am now proposing and that question has never been raised. I ask any impartial legal mind in the committee: When the British North America Act delegated specifically to the dominion parliament the right to legislate with regard to patents, has not this parliament the right under that power to pass laws which will effectively safeguard the interests of the public in connection with matters appertaining to patents? I am not very much impressed with the argument that the fixing of prices would be challenged in this respect.

There is another view of the matter which I submit to the committee. Subsection (c) of section 40 in the old act, which I have asked to be reinstated, does not mention the fixing of prices. On the contrary, it gives powers to the commissioner of patents to impose a penalty and has nothing to do with the fixing of the prices of articles in the ordinary sense of the term. Let me direct the attention of the committee to the proposal I am offering. The hon. member is correct when he says that sections 64, 65, 66 and 67 of the bill replace section 40 of the act. We do not dispute that at all. Before making my main argument on section 65 of the bill, I would direct the attention of the committee to the fact that the hon. gentleman in making his argument a moment ago quoted a number of subsections of this section but he omitted to quote subsection (b). This subsection reads:

> If the working of the invention within Canada on a commercial scale is being prevented or hindered by the importation from abroad of the patented article by the patentee or persons claiming under him, or by persons directly or indirectly purchasing from him, or by other persons against whom the patentee is not taking or has not taken any proceedings for infringement:

That is declared to be an infringement of the exclusive right. I ask the committee to note that if anyone does import, it is an infringement of the right. The hon. gentleman did not argue that point and that is the gravamen of my whole argument. The cases to which I referred were the large electrical manufacturing and radio concerns. A very definite provision has been made to protect these large corporations against importations and my submission is that having done that we ought to protect the public against exploitation by these people under the protection given by the act as well as the customs duties imposed upon the articles.

I come now to my main argument. I shall not read all of section 40 but it makes certain provisions and imposes certain duties upon the commissioner. Section 40 of the act is being repealed, to be replaced with section 65 of the bill. The operative portion of this section, which is stated to be sufficient protection for the public but which I contend is not sufficient, is as follows:

> The Attorney General of Canada or any person interested may at any time after the expiration of three years from the date of the grant of a patent apply to the commissioner alleging in the case of that patent that there has been an abuse of the exclusive rights thereunder and asking for relief under this act.

It will be noted that according to subsection (b) the exclusive right is abused by importations from abroad. Having gone that far nothing whatever is said as to what the commissioner shall do when he has heard a complaint. I drew attention to this fact the other day. I suggest that the following words should be added:

> The commissioner shall then consider the petition and if the parties do not come to an arrangement between themselves, shall proceed to hear and determine the matter, and if it is proved to his satisfaction that the reasonable requirements of the public with respect to the patented invention have not been satisfied, or that the patentee has failed to adequately manufacture the patented invention in Canada, the patentee may be ordered by him to supply the patented article within reasonable limits at such price as may be fixed by him and in accordance with the custom of the trade to which the invention relates as to the payment and delivery, or to grant licences for the use of the patented invention as may be fixed by him, in either case within and after such time as may be fixed by him and on pain of forfeiture of the patent.

In other words, following the power of investigation, I merely ask that there shall be laid upon the commissioner the duty to consider the petition and, if the parties do not come to an arrangement, to determine the matter.

Mr. FACTOR: What about section 66 of the new act?

Mr. STEVENS: I submit it does not cover this case. I do not wish to go into a lengthy discussion of it but it will be noted that section 66 deals very largely with licences, exclusive compulsory licences, order for licence, revocation of patent, and so on. The only clause which might be suggested as covering the case is to my mind inadequate. and that is subsection (c) of section 65:

> If the demand for the patented article in Canada is not being met to an adequate extent and on reasonable terms;

It does not say anything about prices nor does it refer to importations nor cover in my opinion the case I have named. As regards terms, they may be the terms upon which they would allow someone to manufacture the patent; and so I submit that section 65 is incomplete inasmuch as it does not direct the commissioner to make a finding, having had a hearing; nor does it give him power to penalize—not to the extent of revocation, because that is of course his right under the general terms of the act. But it does not say to him that an electric light globe that may be bought in Holland or the United States—and we have cases definitely before us—paying a duty and royalty and selling for 26 cents, shall not be sold in Canada for 60 cents, as it is. In other words, by virtue of this arbitrary power exercised under the patent laws of Canada, a firm may mulct the people of this country to the extent of 125 per cent additional protective duty. That is the effect of it.

Now that is my proposal; that is the suggestion I make. There was another point in my mind which I wished to refer to but for the moment it has slipped my memory. But that is my main argument. The hon. gentleman says that the government does not wish to accept my amendment. I offered the amendment, I think, in the kindliest and most courteous spirit. I had not the faintest intention of embarrassing the government or interfering with the general tenor of the act. I think that on the whole it is an admirable act and one which will be an improvement on the statute as it stood before. But I did mention this matter to a member of the committee in the other house and it had not been brought up; it had not come to their attention.

Mr. CAHAN: The matter to which the hon. gentleman refers did come to the attention of the Senate and was discussed there.

Mr. STEVENS: I accept the word of my hon. senatorial friend who told me it had not. I am not disputing my hon. friend's view of the matter, but that is what I am told; and knowing that it had not been dealt with I sought to bring it to the attention of the committee here. I offered this amendment, not as something final, but, in the absence of any other suggestion, as one which would meet what I regard as a grievance on the part of the people of this country.

Let me say that I at least know, and I think other members know, that a great many concerns who are manufacturing goods affected by patents in Canada find themselves subjected very frequently to an overbearing attitude on the part of those who control patents, as in the case of electric light bulbs and, I am told, in many of the additions to the radio. By the way, that abuse was very prevalent a few years ago though it was substantially corrected after investigation under the Combines Investigation Act. Though the act was not applied, there was an investigation, and the mere publicity given by that investigation induced those who were manufacturing radios to lower their prices substantially. No law or authority was invoked to compel them to do so, but the publicity forced their hand. Now all I suggest here is that this amendment would be a simple and reasonable way of meeting what many people consider a very serious grievance. If on the other hand the government feel that it is a gross violation of some sacred international undertaking, far be it from me to cause any international complications because of it. I am content to wait and allow the act to go through and be put into operation, and I am satisfied that when this house reassembles there will be an opportunity of dealing with this matter. I am confident of this, that in the interim the force of it, the fairness of my proposals, and the extent of the injustice which the people are suffering will be brought more vividly to the attention of the house than perhaps I have been able to bring the subject.

Mr. BENNETT: I propose to indicate to this committee that the grievance to which the hon. gentleman has directed attention is covered by the legislation now before the house, and not only covered but covered most adequately and most fully. The provisions that have been inserted in the statute are to meet the very cases to which attention has been drawn, and I trust the committee will pardon me if I direct attention to what the provisions of the sections were intended to meet. Section 65 contemplates that when a patent is granted in Canada operations under that patent shall be carried on in Canada. Now that was much discussed during the war. It will be recalled that Mr. Lloyd George made certain observations with respect to that before the convention met in 1925. If the committee will bear in mind that section 65 is placed in this statute to ensure that Canadian workmen will be employed in the manufacture of patented articles under patents granted by the Dominion of Canada, they will realize what the foundation of the remarks I have to make may be with respect to that section. If hon. gentlemen have before them the section they will observe that the language used by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was 'infringement". The language is not infringement but abuse:

> The Attorney General of Canada or any person interested may at any time after the expiration of three years from the date of the grant of a patent apply to the commissioner, alleging in the case of that patent that there has been an abuse of the exclusive rights thereunder and asking for relief under this act.

Now what constitutes abuse? Abuse is defined by the statute itself—not infringement but abuse:

> (2) The exclusive rights under a patent shall be deemed to have been abused in any of the following circumstances:

That is, there has not been an infringement of it but an abuse. Now what are the factors that constitute abuse, if the commissioner is determining whether or not there has been an abuse? The next paragraph:

> (a) If the patented invention (being one capable of being worked within Canada) is not being worked within Canada on a commercial scale....

That constitutes an abuse—there is a proviso. Instead of (b) meaning what is suggested it means nearly the opposite:

> (b) If the working of the invention within Canada on a commercial scale is being prevented or hindered by the importation from abroad of the patented article by the patentee or persons claiming under him....

That is, if there is not being produced in Canada the patented article as provided for by statute and goods are being imported instead of being made in Canada, that is an abuse—an entirely different thing; not an infringement but an abuse, the language being of course that this constitutes an abuse. In other words, an effort is being made to secure the production in Canada of the patented article, and if instead of its being produced in Canada it is being imported from abroad, then that constitutes an abuse of the patent. Could anything be clearer than that?

> —or persons claiming under him, or by persons directly or indirectly purchasing from him, or by other persons against whom the patentee is not taking or has not taken any proceedings for infringement.

Those are three things, as the committee will observe, without my going into them at any length, that constitute abuse, the purpose of the section being to ensure within Canada that the patented article is produced in Canada. If, instead of being produced in Canada, it is being imported, that constitutes, except under the circumstances mentioned, not an infringement but an abuse of the patented rights.

(c) If the demand for the patented article in Canada, is not being met to an adequate extent and on reasonable terms.

That is not an infringement but an abuse of the patent. That means just what is said. When they introduced this clause in England, it was difficult to define what constitutes a reasonable term. Therefore those words, which are almost the words of the English law, are considered now in an endeavour to fix a given percentage of increase or a fixed rate of profit.

(d) If, by reason of the refusal of the patentee to grant a licence or licences upon reasonable terms—

That is, he has acted the dog in the manger and will not give a licence. That constitutes not an infringement, but an abuse having regard to the customs of trade.

(e) the trade or industry in Canada, or any person or class of persons engaged therein, is unfairly prejudiced by the conditions attached to the patentee—

That is, the patentee will not do the fair thing in affording an opportunity to Canadian industry to utilize the fruits of his mind, his inventive genius, that constitutes an abuse.

(f) If it is shown that the existence of the patent, being a patent for an invention relating to a process involving the use of materials not protected by the patent or for an invention relating to a substance produced by such a process, has been utilized by the patentee so as unfairly to prejudice in Canada the manufacture, use or sale of any such materials.

That goes a tremendous distance. That constitutes an abuse by the patentee of the exclusive rights conferred upon him. Then follows subsection 3:

It is declared with relation to every paragraph of the next foregoing subsection that, for the purpose of determining whether there has been any abuse of the exclusive rights under a patent, it shall be taken that patents, for new inventions are granted not only to encourage invention but to secure that new inventions shall so far as possible be worked on a commercial scale in Canada without undue delay.

That is all section 65 means and that has not been read to the committee. It is to ensure not only that the inventive genius of the individual shall be protected, but that so far as possible the invention is worked on a commercial scale in Canada without undue delay. That was before the Hague convention in 1925. This house finally in 1928 ratified the Hague convention, believing that three years constituted what could be called "not undue delay." Therefore it must be taken that a period of three years, which is agreed upon by all the nations as being the proper time for the purpose of determining what is undue delay, is settled by international agreement.

We have section 65 dealing with this phase of a patented article or property, which is taken to be necessary in new countries and for that matter necessary in old countries, namely, the production of the patented article by the country that grants the patent. All those sections about importation, reasonable terms, prices and licences have reference to one thing and one only, namely, the production of the patented article on a commercial scale in Canada without undue delay.

Then we go to what the remedies are for the abuses, and they follow in the succeeding sections. Section 66 states:

On being satisfied that a case of abuse of the exclusive rights under a patent has been established, the commissioner may exercise any of the following powers as he may deem expedient in the circumstances.

That is, the abuses being what I have indicated, the commissioner of patents, a judge, has conferred upon him the jurisdiction to deal with those abuses, not infringements. Let us see what he may do. The very purpose sought by the amendment suggested is provided for in this measure, only it is provided for in a series of steps which are to be taken to secure the end of the Patent Act itself. The first is compulsory licences; that is, the commissioner, when he finds these abuses and they are presented to him, may grant compulsory licences, willy-nilly on the part of the patentee, to persons who desire to carry on the manufacture of those goods in Canada to the end that the public may secure the benefits of the inventive genius of the patentee. I am not going into the details of that. Then we go to subsection (i) of paragraph (a):

He shall, on the one hand, endeavour to secure the widest possible user of the invention in Canada consistent with the patentee deriving a reasonable advantage from his patent rights.

(ii) He shall, on the other hand, endeavour to secure to the patentee the maximum advantage consistent with the invention being worked by the licensee at a reasonable profit in Canada.

That is the provision of the law.

(iii) He shall also endeavour to secure equality of advantage among the several licensees, and for this purpose may, on due cause being shown, reduce the royalties or other payments accruing to the patentee under any licence previously granted—

That is the English provision. Nothing could go further than that.

—Provided that, in considering the question of equality of advantage, the commissioner shall take into account any work done or outlay incurred by any previous licensee with a view to testing the commercial value of the invention or to securing the working thereof on a commercial scale in Canada.

That is paragraph (a). Could anything be clearer? It meets the very condition that has been suggested to the committee. Then we come to paragraph (b), and these are the steps:

(b) If the commissioner is satisfied that the invention is not being worked on a commercial scale within Canada, and is such that it cannot be so worked without the expenditure of capital for the raising of which it will be necessary to rely on the exclusive rights under the patent, he may—

Do so and so. That is to provide for a case in which it becomes very difficult to raise the necessary capital to enable the patentee to reap the fruits of his invention.

(c) If the commissioner is satisfied—

Will the committee please consider this carefully?

—that the exclusive rights have been abused in the circumstances specified in paragraph (f) of subsection 2 of the last foregoing section, he may order the grant of licences to the applicant and to such of his customers, and containing such terms, as the commissioner may think expedient.

Mr. FACTOR: Would that entitle the commissioner to fix the price of a patented article?

Mr. BENNETT: This is to avoid the very constitutional difficulty that is mentioned. It fixes the royalty and provides for a reasonable profit and price.

Mr. STEVENS: Limited to paragraph (f).

Mr. BENNETT: Then paragraph (d) states, and this is the gravamen of the whole thing:

If the commissioner is satisfied that the objects of this and the last foregoing sections cannot be attained by the exercise of any of the foregoing powers, he may order the patent to be revoked, either forthwith or after such reasonable interval as may be specified in the order, unless in the meantime such conditions as may be prescribed in the order with a view to attaining the objects of this and the last foregoing sections are fulfilled—

Which of course involves, so far as we may constitutionally exercise the power, the price.

—and the commissioner may, on reasonable cause shown in any case, by subsequent order extend the interval so specified:

[Mr. Bennett.]

Provided that the commissioner shall make no order for revocation which is at variance with any treaty, convention, arrangement, or engagement with any other country to which Canada is a party.

Is there any hon. member who can do less than that or more? There are the steps: first, the abuse; second, the complaint; third, the adjudication; fourth, the direction to do whatever may be necessary to remedy that abuse, and lastly, if there is failure to remedy the abuse in the manner indicated, then there is revocation. As the minister very properly pointed out, revocation is a very serious matter, one to which people do not have recourse except in the very last resort. This legislation, following the English act, provides that if there is a recalcitrant patentee, one who insists on continuing his abuse in utter disregard of the consuming public, he shall suffer the results of his action and have his patent revoked, not willy-nilly in the first instance, but if necessary he is given thirty days or sixty days or six months, with power to the commissioner to extend the time.

Then the commissioner has this power:

(e) If the commissioner is of opinion that the objects of this and the last foregoing sections will be best attained by making no order under the above provisions of this section, he may make an order refusing the application and dispose of any question as to costs thereon as he thinks just.

That, you will observe, is a complete code to deal with a recalcitrant person, to use the language of the English Act, or a domineering patentee, or an unthinking patentee or an undesirable patentee, one who has no sense of public duty and obligation. You have a code as complete as you can possibly get.

Then section 67:

1. In settling the terms of any such exclusive licence as is provided in paragraph (b) of the last preceding section, due regard shall be had to the risks undertaken by the licencee . . .

Without going into that, and the contents of the application, and the duty of the commissioners to adjudicate and matters of that sort, I say only this: it will be observed that under the terms of this statute there is a code provided to meet the very grievances to which attention has been directed. That code is the code which was adopted by Great Britain after the convention, and we have adopted it in terms, because we were bound by the convention not to insert in our statute any provisions which were at variance with the treaty we made. It is perfectly true, as the hon. gentleman pointed out, that there has been a period of six or seven years in which there has been complete and utter disregard of the provisions of the convention. That is the very reason that the Patent Act is before the house at this last session of this parliament, because attention has been drawn to it on many occasions. No one would think of introducing a contentious matter like the Patent Act at this session if it could be avoided, but complaints became so numerous that we should put our house in order, having regard to the convention to which we became a party, approved by parliament in 1928, that the bill was introduced in this house after it had been carefully compared with the provisions of the British statute. And that very language of section 27 of the old act was at variance with the provisions of the Hague convention made in 1925 and approved by this house in 1928. This statute came before the house, and the minister asked that the order be discharged in order that it might be considered by the Senate. There nineteen hearings were had and the fullest opportunity given, for representations, and I very much regret that by any misunderstanding of the real purpose of these sections it should be thought that the grievances to which attention has been called have not been provided for. They are not only provided for; they are most amply provided for, in the very terms in which the mother of parliaments provided for them. They contemplate two things: first, that those who receive patents from the Dominion of Canada should commence the manufacture of the patented article in Canada, and failure to do so within three years constitutes an abuse and subjects them to the possible loss of their patent unless they make a good case for its defence. And the second principle is that the grievances—and there are more than one, the many grievances—provided for by the statute, that constitute not infringement but abuses, may cause successive steps to be taken by the commissioner, one, two and three, finally terminating in revocation of the patent itself, which is a drastic remedy, to be pursued only when every other fails; and it may only be exercised conditionally in the first instance by giving the party a "locus pœnitentiæ" in which he may redeem his position. That applies equally to those who may secure the patent from him as to the patentee himself.

Therefore I trust that the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) will observe that the very grievances to which he directs attention have been amply taken care of by the bill before the committee. Section 65, which may easily mislead one not accustomed to the law—and patents are legal matters—has brought about a misunderstanding of the true effect and meaning. These provisions, replacing section 40, have been introduced into our statute from the English act for the purpose of giving effective control to the commissioner, and protecting the consumer to the maximum against every grievance, including excessive prices, to which attention has been called.

All I can say is that in the light of the facts mentioned by the hon. member the Attorney General of Canada will take early opportunity to bring to the attention of the commissioner these abuses of the patent law for the purpose of enabling the very machinery of this bill, if it passes, to become effective.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to say a word about these clauses 64 and 65. I am not concerned in any private dispute between the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), but I am interested in the hydro electric power movement in the province of Ontario, which is saving to the domestic and commercial consumers of power in that province $30,000,000 a year. I want to know if a monopoly, combine or trust exists and how it operates and affects the rates for power and appliances. The rates in Ontario compared with those in the United States are 1·57 cents per kilowatt hour as against 5·6 cents, and a total cost of $11,676,000 in Ontario as against $41,490,000 for the same power at American prices.

I am also interested in this matter as one of the supporters of the nearly seven hundred municipalities using the hydro in Ontario who desire power at cost and equipment at cost. I am interested to see that they shall be protected in this patent act from monopolies, trusts and combines. I well remember the debate nearly ten years ago on this act and the Gatineau power bill which I opposed. At that time I was urging a rebate to the hydro of customs duties in connection with the building of the Chippawa power plant, on account of patent monopolies held by German and American concerns. Do not forget that Ontario could not have kept its munition plants going during the war but for the cheap power. The Chippawa plant, which was to cost $65,000,000, cost over $100,000,000 because of high building costs during the war, and foreign patents and such combines. This Chippawa plant was built and generates 550,000 horsepower. American, German and other patents from all over the world have been forced on the people of Ontario who have had to pay for it all, as well as high rates for equipment and electrical appliances of all kinds in the pioneer days and even to-day.

I realize that the late government ratified this convention with the League of Nations, and amendment may not be in order for that reason. But the question in connection with this Patent Act is whether the consumer and labour are protected. I was very much struck as hydro electric commissioner and chairman of the board of control of the city of Toronto years ago by the fact, as shown by the similarity of prices in the various tenders, that there was practically an electrical combine and monopoly in this country. It must be remembered that this electrical business includes not only light and power, but telephones and the operation of electric railways. In connection with the taking over of the Toronto street railway I found that a vast amount of money was added to the cost and simply thrown away because of these patents, with the result that the consumer and labour and the people who had to pay the power bills had to pay it all in the rates. There was an investigation into this matter in England, and it was revealed how these monopolies extended all over the world, and that they parcelled out and farmed out the territory.

Great improvement has been made by this government in this new patent law. I have pointed out on previous occasions that the United States patent law required an invention to be manufactured in the United States within three years after the date of the patent. The protection which I believe in as a Conservative is protection for all the people, not some of the people. I believe in protection for the consumer, for labour, for the people who use light and power in their houses. Sir James Whitney did not intend the cheap light and power for aristocrats but for all the people, the farmers and the small householders and the toilers in the industrial centres. For years these monopolies fought in Ontario to prevent the hydro from selling appliances and equipment to the public, and in the end failed. Thus their rates were brought down by hydro competition notwithstanding their patent monopoly. We must decide whether or not there is to be a monopoly. Of course we know that a monopoly has existed. I have dealt with these people, and I know that one has no recourse and must pay the price. I am not here to criticize the large electrical supply companies, such as the Canadian General Electric, Westinghouse and others, because I do know of late years they lowered their rates and brought about better working conditions. In that respect I should like to pay tribute to them, and I believe any person who has acted as a commissioner must compliment them upon the great amount of good they have done in Canada generally.

[Mr. Church.]

The question is however as to what by this Patent Act we can do towards protecting the consumer. Is Canada forever to be the happy hunting ground of the foreign patent capitalists, or in our transactions through the Patent Act with them are we to insert provisions for the protection of our consumers? As the Secretary of State has said, it may be true that the amendments proposed by the hon. member for East Kootenay are not in order on account of the convention made by the late government through the League of Nations. We must remember however that in the next five years the greatest problem in Canada will be that of constitutional and parliamentary reform. In England that is the greatest issue to-day.

A year ago our king spoke calm words over the radio. Those who heard him must have been impressed with them. We should be up to date, keep pace with the times, declare for parliamentary and constitutional reform and, as he said, bring into public affairs those qualities of unshakable sanity, invincible patience and tireless good will which His Majesty so fittingly commended. During the past ten or fifteen years I have been deeply interested in Canadian patent law, and while I must give the government credit for the commendable action it has taken in drafting the bill now before the house I regret that we are depending still on the league for a lot of action. I am reminded of what Burke said over a hundred years ago, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue." As we sit here I have before me a copy of the English Review for May in which appears an article Letting in the Socialists. As a footnote I find this paragraph:

> The British Electric Grid system, which has been attributed to Mr. Samuel Insull's initiative, inflicts injustice on private enterprise. Furthermore, it is technically and economically unsound and strategically dangerous.

I would say that the new electric law in England advanced by the MacDonald government is a sample of sovietism, coercing consumer and producer alike. The consumer in England, whether in domestic or in commercial life, may buy from only one agency. Not only coercing importer and consumer, they coerce all concerned.

I do not believe we have gone far enough in this legislation. The investigations held by the price spreads commission have shown that which we knew ten years ago, namely what takes place in connection with patent laws when devices are farmed out and the consumer can buy from only one agency.

Consumer and labourer must be considered, and I know I represent many people who hold a similar view. I believe something ought to be done along the lines I have suggested, and we should proceed to prevent further abuses of the law so that the consumer may rely upon the protection afforded. Our hydro municipalities discussed these patent monopolies in electrical goods at their conventions many years ago, and we could do nothing because of this farming monopoly. Every time one tried to do anything he found himself up against it, because the territory was farmed out and made exclusive by virtue of patents. I believe the time is not far distant when we shall have adopted such parliamentary and constitutional principles as will make it unnecessary for us to go to the League of Nations in connection with matters concerning which at the present time we must consult them.

Mr. COOTE: In paragraph (c) of section 65 I find the expression "If the demand for the patented article in Canada is not being met to an adequate extent and on reasonable terms." Would the minister define the expression "reasonable terms." Does that provision give the commissioner any jurisdiction in respect of the price at which an article is sold?

Mr. CAHAN: It certainly gives the commissioner power to say that the patented article is not being supplied to an adequate extent or on reasonable terms either as to price, rental, conditions of use or on other grounds. The conditions which come within the expression "reasonable terms" are numerous. In England any alleged abuse brought to the notice of the comptroller is considered, and thereafter the comptroller must weigh the facts and decide whether or not they constitute an abuse. The statute states that in Canada it is an abuse if the demand for the patented article is not being made to an adequate extent and on reasonable terms.

Mr. COOTE: I am endeavouring to find out whether or not price comes under the definition of "reasonable terms."

Mr. CAHAN: It certainly does.

Mr. SANDERSON: Does the commissioner have control of royalties, or has he anything to do with them?

Mr. CAHAN: In granting exclusive licences as a remedy for abuses the commissioner may prescribe a reasonable royalty for the patentee. One section with which we have considered deals with that point.

Section 65 agreed to.

Sections 66 to 71 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr Morand in the chair.

Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934 $545,500.

Mr. VENIOT: Mr. Chairman, just before the house rose at six o'clock last Friday evening, May 31, I had risen to make some remarks and it was then called six o'clock My intention at that time was to deal first with a statement that had been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) about what is known as the British West Indies-Canada agreement. The Minister of Trade and Commerce had taken to task the member for Prince, in the province of Prince Edward Island (Mr. MacLean) for certain inaccuracies, as the minister styled them, in the hon. member's discussion of this matter at a meeting in Charlottetown. The Minister of Trade and Commerce made a statement with reference to the British West Indies-Canada agreement, and as one who was upbraiding another member for inaccuracies the minister himself I think should have paid more attention to the actual facts of the case. As far as he did go he was accurate, but had he gone a step farther and told the whole truth, presented all the facts, showed both sides of the medal, he would have been wholly accurate.

The statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce was that in 1926 the then Liberal government had changed the duty in regard to sugar in order to make a treaty or agreement between the British West Indies and Canada, that since that day no increases in duties on sugar had taken place, and that therefore the member for Prince was in error when he stated that under the present government the duty on sugar entering Canada from Cuba had been raised to such an extent that Cuba retaliated and in consequence of that retaliation the maritime provinces have lost their best potato market. Technically speaking the Minister of Trade and Commerce was correct when he said that there was no increase in the duty on sugar, but he should have gone one step further and stated that in 1932 there was a change in the method of dealing with sugar importations from Cuba, and that that change was far worse in its effects in keeping Cuban sugar out of Canada than a direct increase in duty would have been. That change consisted, not in directly increasing the rate of duty, but in giving the Minister of National Revenue the power to place an arbitrary value for duty purposes on all sugar entering Canada from countries outside of the agreement entered into between Canada and the British West Indies. The effect of that was to place an absolute prohibition on the importation of sugar from Cuba into Canada. Cuba in turn in that very year, as a reprisal no doubt against the action of Canada in fixing an arbitrary valuation for duty purposes on sugar, increased its duty on potatoes, and I think I am right in saying increased it especially against Canadian potatoes because Cuba in increasing the duty on potatoes gave a preference of twenty cents per hundred pounds to the American potato grower.

I know it will be pointed out that under the Cuba-United States treaty of years before Cuba was always supposed to give a preference to American potatoes as against imports from any other country, but I want the committee to understand that notwithstanding the fact that Cuba prior to 1932 had given a preference to Amercian potato growers, we in the maritime provinces had captured the Cuban potato market. But in 1932 Cuba, in retaliation against Canada's action, placed its duty on Canadian potatoes so high that our potatoes were almost entirely excluded from the Cuban market. I should like to place on Hansard some figures in connection with the export of Canadian potatoes to Cuba. In 1922 we exported to Cuba 1,507,620 bushels of potatoes. Our exports kept on increasing, notwithstanding the preference given to the American potato producer, until in 1930 we had reached the figure of 2,003,437 bushels. What do we find after the passing by the present government of an order in council fixing in respect of Cuban sugar, an arbitrary value for duty purposes? We find that year after year our exports of potatoes dwindled until in 1934 we exported only 359,290 bushels. Is any further proof needed to establish the contention made to-day in the maritimes that the order in council passed in 1932 has resulted in the loss of our Cuban market for potatoes? It may be said that this order in council was passed to protect our sugar refineries against the importations of refined Cuban sugar, but we must not lose sight of the fact that in attempting to give this protection we have ruined the market of an industry which gives greater employment than do all the sugar refineries combined.

[Mr. Veniot.]

The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a disciple of accuracy, and I was surprised when he made the statement that Canada did not import any refined sugar from Cuba. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has stated that this order in council was directed against the importation of refined Cuban sugar; why was it passed if we were not importing sugar? What are the facts? In 1930, Canada imported from Cuba 359,698 hundredweight of refined granulated sugar. In 1931 we imported 310,252 hundredweight. In 1932 the importations had dwindled to 125,995 hundredweight; in 1933 they had dropped down to 400 hundredweight and in 1934 the importations were nil. Since the Minister of Trade and Commerce is quite ready to take hon. members on this side to task for inaccuracy, he cannot object to an hon. member on this side pointing out to him that he should study the statistics of his own department in order to find out wherein he himself is inaccurate.

I should like to take advantage of this occasion to refer to the eastern marketing board for potatoes. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) has told us on several occasions that this board was accepted ninety-six per cent by the farmers in eastern Canada and the maritimes who had attended the forty-eight meetings.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should like to correct the hon. member; the ninety-six per cent acceptance to which I referred was the tree fruit board in British Columbia.

Mr. VENIOT: The minister told us that the farmers in the eastern section of Canada had accepted this board almost unanimously. While that statement is correct in many respects I should like to point out that this unanimity would not have been evidenced had not two statements been made. First, the farmers were told that the eastern board would consist of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, and if any one of the five provinces dropped out the board would not be put into operation. They were also told—I referred to this on a former occasion—that under the new board the grading system in force in the maritimes for some years would not be changed. Neither of these promises was kept. Why has there been so much dissatisfaction on the part of the farmers who were practically unanimous in accepting this board when it was first proposed? First, the farmers claim that they were deceived in that Quebec did not come into the agreement, and Quebec was thus at liberty to sell its potatoes on the Quebec markets in any shape or form desired, without any grading and without any attention being paid to prices. Quebec having been left out, the prices for maritimes potatoes were pegged on the Montreal and Toronto markets at such a figure as to make it almost impossible for New Brunswick and other parts of the maritime provinces to compete. The Quebec potato growers could enter the Montreal markets without grading; they could sell to commission merchants and deliver their potatoes when and how they pleased, while the potatoes entering this market from the maritimes were governed by certain regulations which almost shut them out of that market. The potato producers of Ontario were in a different position, because they had to sell, produce or transfer their potatoes to markets under certain regulations; but the price of maritime potatoes was pegged at sixty-five cents per bag on the track at Toronto, not including freight or feeds, as against forty-five cents per bag for Ontario potatoes. A comparison of these prices will show why the potato producers of the maritime provinces have felt aggrieved. It is no wonder that in April they started an agitation to have the pegging of prices discontinued. The board, when these complaints were laid before them, reduced the price. I believe they reduced it from 60 to 50 cents a bag on the rail at Toronto, and later on it was reduced from 50 to 47½, if I am not mistaken. That reduction at that date, according to our potato growers, came too late for them to take any advantage of the situation, and finally, I am informed, the pegging system was done away with altogether and—if I am misinformed in that respect I wish to be corrected by the minister—after a certain date, towards the end of April and even at this date, the price of potatoes is no longer pegged and the maritime potato growers are allowed to sell their potatoes as best they can. I maintain that the pegging of prices spelled ruin to our potato growers in New Brunswick, and I am not surprised that after an experience of a couple of months of this new system of marketing their product they do not feel as friendly towards the co-operative scheme of marketing as they did in the past. I regret that the occasion has arisen which has brought about dissatisfaction among our potato growers in New Brunswick. I should like to have seen the cooperative system work successfully, but when the bill was before the house I protested that "co-operative system" as defined therein would not operate satisfactorily. I especially referred on that occasion to its application to the fisheries of the maritimes, at the same time including farm products, and I regret very much that the failure of the system, from the month of February last up to the present time, has given a black eye to the principle even of voluntary cooperative work among the farmers of New Brunswick.

I do not wish to take up too much time, but there are certain further points which I wish to place before the minister in case another attempt is made to work out this system in a better way. I had already complained to the minister before the Easter recess. I had laid before him certain information that had been given to me and upon which I felt I could rely in connection with the operation of this marketing board. The minister undertook to look into the matter and let me have whatever information he could gather. I wish to thank him. He has given me that information, but still it does not meet the conditions as I see them and as others see them in the province from which I come. I have already referred to the condition that existed in the province of Quebec when they refused to come into the scheme, a practice which was detrimental to the pegging of prices so far as New Brunswick potatoes on the Montreal market were concerned. I understand that Quebec was later to come into the scheme, and the information that appeared in the press was that it did so some time about the middle of April. I do not know whether they are still in it or whether it has been completely abandoned so far as the eastern potato marketing board is concerned.

Let me point out to the minister in connection with the pegging of prices of maritime potatoes on the tracks at Toronto, that when I stated that the price was sixty cents my information was gleaned from a statement published by the gentleman who represents New Brunswick on the marketing board. It was published over his own signature in the New Brunswick papers early in February. As a matter of fact it was sixty-five cents for a ninety-pound bag, while Ontario potatoes were pegged at twenty cents a bag lower. But my information was that there was no pegged price for Ontario potatoes delivered by the grower to the Ontario dealer by motor truck. And here again arose a discrepancy. By this system of transportation he could even sell at a figure below the price on rail. Now this is claimed to exist or to have existed. I am not in a position to state that this is accurate. I should like the minister to enlighten me so as to dispel any misunderstanding that may exist in New Brunswick on that point. I wish to be fair in the matter. I am speaking only on behalf of those who have approached me and given me what they thought was reliable information on which to base my statements. If what they say is wrong then I think I shall be doing them good, I shall be helping out the cooperative principle by exposing the matter in the house and having the minister correct the false impression that now prevails in New Brunswick. I understand that, under the system, somewhere about the tenth of July is the date fixed when those who have registered will be called upon to vote for or against this marketing board, and that is one reason why I bring the matter up now, so that if our people are labouring under a false impression it may be corrected, and when the question of voting comes up on July 10 those registered and entitled to vote will be in a position to do so intelligently and will not be misguided in the step which they will take.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I ask the minister for the personnel of the board and their qualifications?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the dominion marketing board?

Mr MOORE (Ontario): Yes, and their qualifications and incidentally their salaries.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Would the minister also include in that answer the positions they ordinarily hold?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The present chairman of the board is Mr. A. Leitch, at a salary of $10,000 a year. The other members of the board are: Doctor Booth, head of the branch of agricultural economics, Mr. Davidson from the Department of Trade and Commerce; Mr. Eaton from the Department of Finance, Mr. Gosselin from the Department of Agriculture, and the secretary, Doctor Hopper. All the officials with the exception of Mr. Leitch and Doctor Hopper receive only the salaries they get in their own work in the various departments. Doctor Hopper's salary from the board is $800; that is in addition to his regular salary as an employee in the branch of agricultural economics.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I ask if the chairman devotes his whole time to the service of the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Has the minister any knowledge that the chairman is interested in the marketing of tobacco?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): What is the nature of that occupation or undertaking?

[Mr. Veniot.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My understanding is that he was in charge of the Mutual Tobacco Growers' Association in western Ontario, when we endeavoured to get his services at the head of the present dominion marketing board. We thought his services would be very valuable to us not only on account of the training he had before in agricultural economics, but also in a practical way because of his experience in the marketing of a commodity so extensive as that of the tobacco organization of which he was in charge. He was able to obtain release from his duties there, and to give his time as head of the dominion marketing board. We wanted some person with practical experience, with training in agricultural economics and one who had done some definite work along this particular line. He resigned as chairman of the tobacco board and took this position.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Is the mutual association really a cooperative undertaking of tobacco growers or is it a land holding syndicate?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is an organized company, not a cooperative society.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): It is a land holding syndicate. Is Mr. Leitch one of the owners of this syndicate?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not say.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): One would think that would be a natural inquiry. Does the syndicate sell tobacco lands?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not give that information. I shall be glad to get it. There should be no difficulty in getting it.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I ask if under the marketing act as it applies to Ontario, certain licences are issued to growers and what provision has been made for the issue of other licences to growers, we will say, who have not grown tobacco formerly?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The sellers of tobacco are licensed, but not the growers unless they are also sellers.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Do I understand the minister to say that a man may grow tobacco but may not sell it unless he has a licence?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is to the effect that the licence states that it is for the selling of a certain type of tobacco. What the hon. member has in mind no doubt is this, that of recent years there have been those who entered into the production of tobacco who did not previously produce it, and because of what was felt to be overproduction some two or three years ago, an agreement was entered into that there would be a decrease in the quantity of tobacco produced. One of the new growers met me in my office some time ago and asked that this should be looked into. I gave instructions to have it looked into, but have not yet received the report. It may have come in, but I have not it here.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I am very much obliged to the minister for the information and for stating what I have in mind. Probably I could state more specifically what I have in mind. I understand from the minister that the chairman of the board is also the owner or part owner of one of the syndicates that grow tobacco that the people who grew tobacco previously now have licences and that the growing of tobacco has become a privilege, a monopoly if you like, and that one of the syndicate holders has been made chairman of the marketing board. Is that correct or incorrect? That is my understanding of the minister's statement.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Leitch is the chairman of the dominion marketing board. I have not the other information at hand with sufficient accuracy to answer, but I shall be glad to look into the matter and get the information.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the minister state that there are individuals who are desirous of growing tobacco who are prohibited from doing so?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not under this scheme.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): From selling the tobacco they grow.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is the same thing. If they cannot sell it, what is the use of growing it? Have we come to the stage in agriculture in Ontario where a man is prohibited from engaging in producing anything out of which he thinks he can make some money?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is he prohibited from selling it, then?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The selling of tobacco or the marketing of it is subject to regulation, but the growing is not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the minister mean to tell the committee that the marketing act is being used for the purpose of prohibiting a man from selling his production?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is not what I said.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It has the same effect.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not at all.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He may sell it in some other way rather than through the agency of the board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He can sell it under the board, but I did not state that there was any provision to prevent his selling tobacco. The marketing of tobacco was regulated; it had to be sold in the regular way.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A man can sell his tobacco only when the board gives him the right to do so.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): All the tobacco could not be dumped on the market at one time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is another way of putting the matter, but the producer of tobacco is prohibited from selling it until he gets the authority of the board to do so.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the essence of the scheme; it is the essence of all such schemes.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Has the minister any knowledge of the increase in prices of the lands held by the licensed growers including the lands held by the syndicate of which the chairman of the marketing board is a member?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, I have not that information.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Will the minister make inquiries and give us that information?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Can any farmer now grow tobacco under the board without a licence?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Any farmer can grow tobacco if he wishes to do so.

Mr. VENIOT: Can he sell it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What does the marketing board do?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The producers get together and agree that they will regulate the marketing of their product under certain conditions upon which they agree.

Mr. McINTOSH: Can they not coerce growers who are not under the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If they are in the area in which the scheme is in effect, in which the majority of the people have agreed to abide by certain regulations.

Mr. CAMPBELL: That is within an effective marketing area they use the policy coercion?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Within the area in which the scheme is in effect.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): This is quite a large item, and perhaps the minister would break it down and explain in a little more detail how it is to be expended. I had hoped that at the beginning the minister would be able to give a complete and comprehensive review of the workings of the act since it was brought into effect, but unfortunately last night we got off on some sidelines. Perhaps we could gather it from the various statements he made, but I would like him to indicate how this money has been spent and to make some comment on the failure of the poultry pool scheme to carry in the three western provinces. He might indicate also what provincial governments have enacted complementary legislation. I took it from the minister's remarks a little while ago that the majority of the dominion marketing board are members of his own department. How many of them are not members of his department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Doctor Booth, Mr. Eaton, and also the secretary Doctor Hopper.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): Is not Doctor Booth a member of the minister's department? How many members of the marketing board are not members of the department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are five members in all. They are all members of the department as far as that goes because the marketing act is under the Department of Agriculture. But I think that what the hon. member means is, what members of the dominion marketing board do not occupy definite positions—

Mr. VENIOT: On the regular staff.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, do not occupy positions that have been created within the service under the different divisions. Mr. Leitch the chairman, and Mr. Eaton, who is from the Department of Finance and Mr. Davidson of the bureau of statistics.

With reference to the breaking down of the amount for last year, this will be submitted in a report:

Expenses of the board:
Transportation	$ 1,243 31
Communications	526 46
Miscellaneous	853 73
Materials and supplies	2,303 83
Salaries	3,464 52
		$ 8,391 85
Prairie provinces poultry pool expenses:
Postage	$ 14,580 19
Stationery	2,164 74
Travel and miscellaneous	2,836 13
Salaries	2,157 29
		$ 21,738 35
Organization of local boards, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta poultry marketing	50,000 00
Eastern Canada potato marketing board	10,000 00
British Columbia interior vegetable marketing board	3,000 00
Fruit export board	3,000 00

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): How is that money expended by these various boards? Do you make them a grant, or is it expenses of coming here, or of taking a vote, or what?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It varies with the requests of the different boards. The purpose of the vote of this money was to assist in the organization of these schemes in various ways. Some money was advanced after the expenses were incurred, some advanced before the expenses were incurred, under certain conditions.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask if any of it was spent in a similar way to the $50,000 grant made to the western poultry pools, for purposes of propaganda to put the scheme over, payment of lecturers and so on?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That was not for purposes of propaganda to put the scheme over.

It was considered rather in this light, that some steps had to be taken to put the scheme before the people interested. At first consideration was given as to whether or not the dominion marketing board themselves should engage speakers to go through the provinces and put the scheme that was under consideration before the people. But it was felt that it was only fair that those who had put so much into the scheme in the way of preparing it, and who had held preliminary meetings, should be advanced money to pay for the use of halls and to pay their expenses in holding meetings to forward the scheme, with the distinct understanding that on all occasions every opportunity would be given to people who were opposed to the scheme to present their side of the case.

Mr. VENIOT: At their own expense?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Every advantage was taken of this by those who were opposed to the scheme. At the great majority of these meetings, if not all, questions were asked by people who were there and in many cases questions were submitted by an organized opposition to the scheme. It was our first experience in this connection, and because of the more or less experimental nature of it we feel that the thing was lived up to in a very fair way.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have been reading the return furnished by the minister to me in connection with the payments made to lecturers. Some ninety were engaged in Alberta, and a considerable number of them were just about as competent to talk about poultry pools as I am. I can imagine the kind of answer they would give when asked about the operation of a poultry pool. If these lecturers had known something about the poultry business perhaps they would have got along better. I am not going to prolong the discussion, but I would ask the minister if he intends to use any part of this money now being voted for a similar purpose. I do not care what he calls it; I call it propaganda. If it is to be used in the same way then I want to register an objection and vote against it. If it is to be used purely for marketing purposes and the assistance that the department can and should render in marketing natural products both abroad and at home, it is all right. But if it is to be expended as the grant to which I have referred was expended in western Canada, it will not meet with my approval.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, $545,500.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock some questions remained unanswered. At this time I shall endeavour to answer the hon. members for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) and West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart). I realize that the hon. member for Gloucester has a keen interest in the matter, and is specially concerned with the eastern potato marketing board. As he stated at the conclusion of his remarks he is anxious to obtain the facts and is particularly anxious that the information be placed before the producers in advance of the vote to be taken in connection with the scheme on some date before July 10. The exact date has not yet been set.

The reason the scheme was put into effect without a vote was the abnormal conditions existing in connection with the marketing of potatoes grown in the maritimes and the province of Ontario, brought about by the fact that in the past year there was a very heavy potato crop. The year 1932 could be considered as a normal crop year; in 1933 the crop was rather short and in 1934 it was very heavy. No price of any value to the growers of potatoes could be obtained. Finding themselves confronted with this difficulty the growers got together and endeavoured by united effort to ascertain whether or not through the provisions of the marketing act they might overcome the objections of a few members—few certainly in comparison to the number who were willing voluntarily to agree —and arrive at some control of the quantities of potatoes being placed on the market. The result was that a number of meetings were held in the different provinces, and the views expressed at those meetings, in the opinion of the Dominion Marketing Board, represented a fair picture of the views held by the majority of producers. At eight meetings held in the province of Prince Edward Island, with a total attendance estimated at 1,000, only one member voiced opposition. In Nova Scotia, at six meetings with an attendance of 127, there were no voices opposed; in New Brunswick there were eighteen meetings which 386 attended, there being opposition at two meetings. In Ontario there were sixteen meetings attended by 686 people, and seven persons were opposed. In Quebec 56 meetings with 1,690 signatures in favour. These figures indicate a total of 104 meetings attended by 3,889 people, and practically no opposition to the scheme.

Many people are under the impression that the marketing act sets out specifically what producers must do in connection with any scheme. That is not so, and I believe in the present instance we have a good example. The producers of eastern Canada found themselves up against very difficult conditions indeed, and without as much time as they should have had to bring into operation a scheme involving the wide territory and large number of individuals. They asked that we set up a provisional or temporary board to take action immediately. The only basis upon which we can estimate whether or not this procedure has worked out to the advantage of the producers is that of ascertaining the exact quantities of potatoes which were placed on the market before and after the scheme became effective. We would have to ascertain if there was any slowing up of volume being forwarded to market and the price the producers received. I realize that the potatoes sold on the Montreal market would not show a fair return to the producers. The board was composed of producers and shippers who cooperated to give their best thought towards helping the potato growers out of a difficult position. In making a conservative estimate I believe one would be fair if he were to take as a standard the price received on the Montreal market for potatoes marketed in the normal crop year of 1932. Mark you, in that year there was nothing like the crop gathered last year, but to be fair I am accepting that year as a standard. Records indicate that with a much more difficult position than existed in 1932 the New Brunswick potato growers received in the last year $30,400 more than in the year first named.

With the indulgence of the committee I believe I would do well to place on record figures showing comparative crops, because I realize hon. members wish to understand accurately the difficulties with which the farmers have been faced. For this purpose I shall give figures for the years 1932, 1933 and 1934.

Prince Edward Island	3,188,000	3,760,000	4,824,000
Nova Scotia	2,122,000	1,866,000	2,453,000
New Brunswick	3,856,000	5,394,000	6,938,000
Quebec	11,475,000	13,444,000	14,244,000
Ontario	9,516,000	10,112,000	11,830,000

Mr. VENIOT: Those are production figures?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. The hon. member will note that the crop in Prince Edward Island was increased by more than 25 per cent and that in New Brunswick it was almost doubled. Although in the working out of the scheme there were difficulties encountered, as were bound to be encountered in setting up in a hurry a scheme that was felt by the producers to be necessary, I do not know but what the potato producers of eastern Canada received more for their potato crop in 1934 than they would have received had they not formed this eastern Canada potato marketing scheme.

Mr. VENIOT: Is the minister referring to the dealers or producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To the producers.

Mr. VENIOT: What figure did they receive?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not with me a record of what the producers did receive, but be that as it may, this is a scheme produced and carried out by the producers themselves together with the shippers and dealers that was felt by these men who were in the best position to judge, to be in their own interests. I can assure the hon. member for Gloucester that before the vote is taken every effort possible will be made to put the picture of this whole scheme and its results as clearly as possible before the producers.

Mr. VENIOT: Would the minister permit a suggestion?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I was going to follow that up, Mr. Chairman, by saying that if the hon. member for Gloucester has any suggestions to make in this connection because of his close touch with the situation we would appreciate it if he would make those suggestions known to us. I can assure him that they will certainly be given every consideration, because our whole endeavour is to put the picture as clearly as possible before the producers.

With reference to the point raised that truckers were able to sell under the pegged price I have no doubt that in many cases that was so, due to the difficulty in controlling the truckers delivering their potatoes.

There has been no change in the system of grading the potatoes. For a number of years grading of potatoes has been required for interprovincial trade, but not for trade within the province. That practice was continued this year, but with the setting up of this marketing scheme the potato growers themselves felt that it would be to their advantage under the scheme to carry out a grading system within the provinces. Before Quebec entered the scheme the farmers in that province were free to sell their potatoes in their own province without enforcing the grading regulations.

With reference to the questions which the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) has asked about the tobacco marketing scheme and the conditions under which tobacco is marketed, I have made inquiries since the house rose at six o'clock from the chairman of the dominion marketing board, who himself is engaged in the business of raising tobacco, and he informs me as president and chairman of two tobacco associations in the district—

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Would the minister be kind enough to give the names of the two associations?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to get them; I do not remember them offhand. I am informed by him that the buyers of tobacco are licensed. The sellers are also licensed, but in the first year of operation of this scheme of local marketing under the tobacco board a blanket licence was issued to all farmers producing tobacco, and that gave permission to each farmer to sell all his tobacco. There is no limiting feature so far as this scheme is concerned as to the amount of tobacco produced by any tobacco producer in the province of Ontario, either within this area or outside the area.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Am I to understand that licences were issued to all growers at the time and to no one else?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is this, that individual licences to individual growers were not issued as such, but that through the press and otherwise a blanket licence was issued to every producer giving him authority to sell all the tobacco that he produced. That was the 1934 crop.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): What is the acreage that was licensed, and what was the acreage contained in the two syndicates in which the chairman is interested?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not that information. I am informed that within the area there are one thousand producers. But the point the hon. member is asking about has no bearing on the question, because every farmer who produced tobacco received a licence to sell all the tobacco that he produced.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I am afraid that the minister has misunderstood my question. He says that there are one thousand producers. How many of those producers were working for or under the two associations in which the chairman is interested? I will put it in another way. The minister says that there are one thousand producers. Does he mean that there were 998 in addition to the two associations in which the chairman was interested, or is the chairman interested in a number of lands on which there are a number of producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The information that I received from the chairman is this, that he is president and chairman of two companies—

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Controlling how many producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not know how many producers. When I gave the number of producers as one thousand I did not intend to give the impression that that was the exact number but rather that the number was in that neighbourhood. I was trusting my memory on that point, but I can get the exact number of producers within the area.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Am I to understand that the minister will give me the information required as to the acreage of the two associations in which the chairman is interested as compared with the total acreage?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I see no objection to giving that.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): And the number of producers represented by the two associations as compared with the total number of producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): It seems to me that the matter is exceedingly important. The minister and every member of this house will recognize that a precedent has been created when a gentleman engaged in an industry has a privilege as part of a monopoly and then is made chairman of the board controlling those privileges. It seems to me that the thing is entirely without precedent.

I should be very much surprised if the minister could point to a parallel in any other country.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not see that my hon. friend's statement has any bearing on the question. The chairman of the board is a tobacco producer, just as the members of the tree fruit board in British Columbia are also producers of the commodity which is regulated. We were pleased indeed to get the services of Mr. Leitch because of the experience he had had in a practical way in the marketing of this product, and I believe the results to the farmers themselves in the marketing of their tobacco have been eminently satisfactory. They are all on exactly the same basis, the smallest producer on the same basis as the largest producer.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I am quite sure that the minister has not understood what I have been trying to say, because very obviously from the statement he made this afternoon the chairman of the board is a holder in two syndicates that have certain privileges under the marketing act, privileges which are not enjoyed by people holding lands suitable for growing tobacco but which have not hitherto been devoted to that purpose. The chairman is a holder and owner of a portion of that property, and he has been made by the minister chairman of the marketing board for Canada. I do not want to press the matter. I have nothing against the chairman; I do not know him, but it seems to me this is a terrible condition. I asked this afternoon for the qualifications of the other members of the board, particularly their experience in marketing.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not see what bearing the holdings of the chairman of the board would have upon the question unless he was receiving preferences.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): He has the giving of preferences.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not at all.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): The supervision of the giving of preferences.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The local board is responsible for and has the control of the regulating of the marketing of tobacco in exactly the same way as any other local board set up.

Mr. BROWN: I have a simple question to ask and I want an answer in simple language. Is it possible under this tobacco arrangement which has been set up in the tobacco growing country for a man who has not been hitherto a grower of tobacco to grow and sell tobacco?

[Mr. W. H. Moore.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. BROWN: Could he sell it apart from the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not within the area.

Mr. BROWN: If a man cannot do that it condemns the whole scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member know how this tobacco is marketed?

Mr. BROWN: That is what I want the minister to tell me.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not see how the hon. member can condemn a scheme unless he knows how it operates.

Mr. BROWN: Is it possible for a man who was not hitherto growing tobacco to grow and sell tobacco within that area?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think I can clear up the hon. member's difficulty. In the marketing of the crop in 1934 a number of producers, a number of shippers and a number of buyers were on the board. The buyers set up an appraisal committee which went around the district to appraise the crop of each producer. The producers also set up a committee which also appraised the crops. The men representing the producers and the men representing the buyers met with this information in front of them and after discussion and bargaining it was agreed that a certain average price should be paid for all the tobacco. Every producer, whether he had or had not previously produced, could sell his tobacco to any buyer and any buyer could purchase from any individual as cheaply as he could, but it was understood that the whole crop was to bring in a certain amount of money. For instance, buyer A might buy tobacco from a number of farmers at different prices and find that the total price paid was $100,000 less than the appraised value. In such a case that $100,000 would be divided on a poundage basis among the farmers who had sold their tobacco to that buyer and this might work out at ten per cent for each farmer. Farmer A might have sold his tobacco at 23 cents per pound while farmer B had received 30 cents per pound; they each would receive an additional ten per cent. The result was that instead of large quantities of tobacco being left and the market being in a chaotic state, ninety per cent of the crop was disposed of within three weeks of the time this arrangement had been made and for prices considerably higher that those received last year. Each man was permitted to sell his own tobacco but all the producers were protected by the collective bargaining power which they had.

Mr. BROWN: The minister has used a lot of words but he has not answered my question. I want to know if it would be possible for a man who had not been hitherto growing tobacco in that area to go into the area, buy a farm, produce tobacco and sell it. That is a simple question and it does not require a lot of words to answer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think we can consider from whom these remarks have come. The hon. member asked the question and I answered it with a straight "yes". I repeat the answer, yes. The hon. member evidently was not satisfied with that; he wanted to learn how these people marketed their tobacco. I endeavoured to the best of my ability to give him that information.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister has said that he gave a straight "yes" as an answer but I think he also said, "not in that area." I should like him to explain that.

Mr. WEIR: (Melfort): If a man comes into the area in which this scheme is operating he must conform to the scheme as agreed to by the majority of the producers.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Must a man who owns land in the area and has not hitherto been producing tobacco comply with the scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would say, yes.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): He could not sell without the permission of the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Without the permission of the board, yes.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): If this thing was decided by a vote, how was the vote taken? Was it a secret ballot, was it an open convention or what was it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Meetings were held and there was a personal sign-up afterwards. The report received by the dominion marketing board was that the scheme had been endorsed by seventy-one per cent of the growers, representing approximately eighty per cent of the land devoted to the production of tobacco, and by the majority of the responsible manufacturers and packers of flue cured tobacco.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Has the minister taken the trouble to find out how many growers were renting land from the syndicate represented by the chairman of the board and what proportion of the growers were independent owners? I should like to know also how many syndicates there are similar to the one in which the chairman is interested and what proportion of the total acreage is controlled by the syndicate.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The information I have, which I should like to verify, is that only owners voted.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): My information is that more than fifty per cent of the land in this area is controlled by the several syndicates.

Mr. YOUNG: A moment ago the minister referred to blanket licences having been published in the newspapers to give the growers of tobacco the licence to sell their product that year. This is a new form of licence; can the minister furnish us with a copy of it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. YOUNG: Has the minister a copy with him to-night?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. DUFF: Apparently the minister has taken credit to himself and to the marketing board for having solved the potato problem. Speaking biblically, may I say that "I have not found so great a faith, not even in Israel," as the minister's.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Would the hon. member have any objection to my correcting that statement?

Mr. DUFF: Wait until I am through; don't get excited.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I supposed the hon. member would want to be correct as he went ahead.

Mr. DUFF: You can correct me if you can after I have finished, not while I am making my remarks.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You are correcting him.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, at the moment. If I understood him correctly, the minister took the credit for having solved the potato situation in the maritime provinces. Will the minister tell me why the former chairman of the marketing board resigned? Can the minister say to me as a humble citizen of Canada who buys and sells potatoes that the scheme evolved by the marketing board or by the minister or by anybody else as far as the potatoes are concerned was successful in Nova Scotia, or even successful in New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island? It is all camouflage; this thing is all a mistake and the sooner the minister wakes up to that fact the better. Because the government interfered with the ordinary marketing of potatoes last fall, potatoes were sold in Prince Edward Island at 8 cents a bushel.

As a shipper of potatoes to the West Indies, I bought them at 25 cents a bag, or a bushel and a half of potatoes packed in the bag by the farmer after he had garnered them. Placed on the cars, they were sold at 25 cents a bag, and this was the result of action by the Minister of Agriculture and the government in establishing this foolish and stupid marketing board.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the bag worth?

Mr. DUFF: About 7 cents, and the man's labour about 10 cents, and the farmer got 8 cents.

An hon. MEMBER: That is 8 cents more than they got in Ontario.

Mr. DUFF: So much the worse for Ontario. When I came in at five past eight the minister was boasting about what a great thing the marketing board had proved to be. Let me tell you how stupid this whole marketing situation has turned out to be so far as potatoes are concerned. The former chairman of the marketing board, Doctor Barton, had sense enough to resign; he would not stand for it and he got out. What happened? When the marketing board or the minister or someone else discovered that the poor farmer in Prince Edward Island was receiving only 8 cents per bushel they started to create an organization as a camouflage to fool the public among the buyers of potatoes, and they said, "You must sell potatoes at a certain price and not lower," and they fixed the price in Halifax, for instance—that is the place I am interested in—at 58 cents a bag, and they appointed a man there to walk around every morning, calling on wholesale potato dealers and instructing them not to sell the potatoes unless they got 58 cents a bag. The result was they could not sell very many. Time went on, spring came and the potatoes began to sprout, and those who were dealing in potatoes said, "Here, we have five or ten or fifteen thousand bags of potatoes and because of this act we cannot get clear of them. We are willing to lose money on them so as to clean up the whole thing." But this man —if I remember rightly his name was Grant—walked around every morning, drawing his five or ten dollars a day, and insisting upon it that the dealers should get 58 cents a bag or let the potatoes sprout. But that was not good enough. One day my partner sold fifteen hundred bags of these potatoes in different islands of the West Indies. He did not sell them f.o.b. Halifax because the West Indies would not buy them that way; they wanted them c.i.f. West Indies. We got all the papers ready, invoices and everything else, and instead of 58 cents we sold them at 98 cents; and this official of my hon. friend went around to the offices of the different shippers and demanded to see their invoices, which of course showed 98 cents and not 58 cents. This man then told them they could not ship their potatoes at the 98 cent price, but the shippers informed him that the potatoes had already been shipped. They said, "The potatoes have gone; these are only the invoices; the potatoes left by the Lady Nelson, which sailed this morning at twelve o'clock when you were in bed drawing your five or ten dollars per day from the board." He said they must change their invoices or he would get into trouble if they shipped the potatoes at 98 instead of 58 cents. The shippers told him that the potatoes were sold c.i.f. Trinidad or Barbados or Santiago or Cuba or whatever it was. He said, "I don't know about that; I got instructions that it must be 58 cents a bag." Whether they communicated with the minister I do not know—I am not sure whether the minister knows what c.i.f. or f.o.b. means. At any rate the whole thing is a tragedy. Imagine the minister sending this man around in this way to men who have been in business forty years. The farmers of Prince Edward Island and the farmers of Carleton county, New Brunswick, would have sold twice as many potatoes as they did if the minister and the Tory government and the board had not interfered. The fact is, however, that owing to this organization which the minister created to save his face and the face of the government, there are millions of bushels of potatoes in the cellars of the farmers of Prince Edward Island and Carleton county, New Brunswick, though they might have been able to sell those potatoes long ago. You remember what Barnum said—you can fool the people some of the time—and the joke is that the potato growers fooled the minister, because those who had potatoes to sell, realizing that they had to get clear of them in spite of the pegged price which the minister and his board fixed, got ahead of him.

An hon. MEMBER: Did they bootleg them?

Mr. DUFF: Yes, exactly. After all, the people who grew the potatoes should have had the first chance to sell them and should have been allowed to sell them at their own price even if they lost money, and as a matter of fact they were too cute for the minister and the board—I will not tell the minister how; he does not know and I will not tell him. But let me assure him that hundreds of thousand of bushels were sold in spite of the 58 cent pegged price, and I do not blame the farmers and the dealers. Had the minister kept his hands off it and attended to his business in the Confederation building; had he allowed the business people of the country to run their own business, whether in potatoes or anything else; had he looked after the ordinary affairs of his department, this country would have got clear of hundreds of thousands of bushels of potatoes which, owing to the ridiculous stupidity of the act, the farmers of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have been unable to dispose of—potatoes that are now sprouting and cannot even be fed to the pigs because in a few weeks they will be rotten.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first place I did not take credit for having solved the problem in the maritimes. I only wish that some solution were possible for the difficulties in which the potato producers have found themselves. Nor did I peg the price, nor did I pay any official to go around checking up whether potatoes were sold or not, nor did—

An hon. MEMBER: Who did, then?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): One at a time, please; nor did the former chairman of the dominion marketing board, Doctor Barton, resign for any of the reasons which the hon. member has stated.

Mr. DUFF: Why did he resign?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think that covers practically all the statements the hon. member has made, all of which are incorrect.

Mr. DUFF: I rise to a point of order. The minister says that my statements were incorrect. I said that Doctor Barton had resigned. That is a fact, is it not? That statement is not incorrect.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not the reason the hon. member gave for his resignation.

Mr. DUFF: I said that the chairman of the marketing board resigned because he did not agree with the policies of the minister, and that is correct.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, it is not.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister tell us why he did resign?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): He got a better job.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Neither of the hon. members knows very much about the matter. Doctor Barton, the former chairman of the dominion marketing board, was and still is Deputy Minister of Agriculture. Because of the work that he had done in plotting out this legislation, we asked him, in addition to his duties as deputy minister, for a period to be chairman of the marketing board. That was strictly understood at the time he accepted the position, because it was felt that it was too heavy a load to be chairman of the marketing board and Deputy Minister of Agriculture for any considerable length of time. What the hon. member is criticizing is this: It is not the interference of me or of anyone else with the operation of the potato growers of Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island. The board that did everything that was supposed to have been done, although the hon. member feels it was not done altogether as they had hoped, was a board named by the potato growers themselves and the shippers independently of any suggestion or guidance on the part of the dominion marketing board, the idea being that they themselves on the ground were in the best position—and this is the basis of the marketing act—to decide the most efficient way of marketing their potatoes, especially under the abnormal conditions such as existed. Therefore all the criticism that has been levelled at me has really been levelled at the fellow citizens of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough as well as other maritimers who were responsible for formulating this scheme, naming their board and endeavouring to carry out, in what they thought was the best possible way, the regulating of the marketing of their products.

I do not think there is any other question I have omitted. I made a note of the points raised by the hon. member as he proceeded with his remarks. The whole basis is this: it gives to the producers themselves power to handle their own products in the way of regulating the marketing of them, and the men who put the scheme into force were men appointed by the producers themselves, their own local marketing board.

Mr. DUFF: I admit with the minister that the people of Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick had great hopes that when this marketing board legislation was put through, there would be a new heaven and a new earth. They were desperate on account of the policies of this government, due to the fact that the Minister of Agriculture in 1930 promised the farmers of Canada seventy cents a pound for butter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I must object very strenuously to that statement. The hon.

member is not stating the fact, because what he is saying is that I as an individual promised the farmers.

Mr. DUFF: I did not say "as an individual."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member said: "The Minister of Agriculture."

Mr. DUFF: The Minister of Agriculture as the representative of the Conservative party and the Conservative candidates in 1930. He took the position of Minister of Agriculture after this government was elected on a butter policy of seventy cents a pound, and he is still holding that position. I say that the minister and his friends in 1930 promised the farmers of this country seventy cents a pound for butter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I must object to that statement. The hon. member makes a specific charge that I promised the farmers seventy cents a pound for butter. I was not a minister at that time, and as an individual I never promised the farmers any price for any commodity.

Mr. VALLANCE: Yes, the hon. member was the only one who did it.

Mr. DUFF: I am not speaking of the minister as an individual; I am referring to him as Minister of Agriculture, as the one who benefited by the fact that the Conservative party was elected because the Prime Minister and practically every other stump speaker for that party went on the platform and said to the farmers: Under the Grit government you are getting only thirty-five cents a pound for butter; if we are elected, you will get seventy cents. The minister has benefited by that; he came into office in that way as a new man; he never sat in parliament before. Surely he should stand by his friends. They put him where he is; they gave him his exalted position as privy councillor and Minister of Agriculture. Why should he pass the buck and because I am criticizing him as representing this Tory government, now go back on all his friends who put him in his present position? That is the situation the minister is in; does he not see it?

The Minister of Agriculture tries to say that the government is not responsible for the marketing act. There is no question that when the government introduced this marketing act, they did it for a political purpose; they did it to fool the people, just as they did in 1930. They promised them something which they knew they could not fulfil, and as luck had it, instead of going to the country last year when the marketing act was new and when the Minister of Agriculture might have got away with it, the fact is that due to conditions the government did not go to the country with the result that, whether it is potatoes or hogs or beef or anything else, the Minister of Agriculture is in the slough of despond.

An hon. MEMBER: The valley of humiliation.

Mr. DUFF: Yes. The Tory government is now in the valley of humiliation. We had an exhibition this afternoon of the Tory government and the valley of humiliation. We had the same story as we had in 1894—the nest of traitors. We have in the Tory government to-day a situation where ministers of the crown do not stand by their leader, sick as he is and with his heart trouble.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Put that in your pipe and smoke it.

Mr. DUFF: Yes; my hon. friends opposite should not talk about the valley of humiliation. History has a way of repeating itself, and I have never seen it fail to do so. Everybody should be careful of the remarks he makes because to-morrow they will come back and hit him on the rebound. The hon. member must realize that to-day the Tory party is in the valley of humiliation, in the valley of treason. They are scared to go to the country; they are afraid to submit to the electorate the Minister of Agriculture's hog policy; they are afraid to submit his marketing board. Why? Because they know that his marketing board has been a mistake and a stupid one at that. They realize that the Canadian people will not stand for any interference with business.

Mr. ROSS: The former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) agreed to the idea of the marketing board.

Mr. DUFF: That does not make it right any more than in the case of the hon. member for Kingston when he disagreed with his own party about the penitentiaries. I admire my hon. friend for being independent just as I admire the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell); but the fact remains that the government introduced this marketing board legislation to fool the people and the Minister of Agriculture has to be the goat because the government, to fool the people, introduced a bill that interferes with the right of the public to market their products in their own way and at their own prices. The minister knows this scheme is a failure; he knows the potato board is a mistake; that the apple board was a mistake; that every board was a mistake. Even in his own province the hens wouldn't lay eggs for him. In order to get the hens to lay eggs in the proper way the minister spent $50,000—of whose money? Not his money, oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The taxpayers' money.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, the taxpayers' money. I say to the minister, what right had he to spend $50,000 of the taxpayers' money in order to get this poultry board established? Why did he not allow the people of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta to decide for themselves? But no; the minister, trying to support this moribund government which has been hanging on by its eyelids in the last five years, deliberately and I believe without proper authority spent $50,000 of the people's money in order to influence the poultry producers of the three provinces to give a verdict in favour of his own marketing bill, or that of the government. And what happened? The minister's own constituents turned him down, every constituency in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba turned him down, and the only result we have is that the hens are still laying eggs and the minister is still sitting on the roost of the marketing act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The best test or proof as to whether the marketing act is accepted as sound legislation is the attitude of the producers themselves. Not only are we receiving more and more applications from representative bodies of producers to have made available for them the provisions of the marketing act for the more efficient marketing of their products—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Let the minister answer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —but applications have been made by the local boards where schemes have been set up to extend further the scope of these marketing schemes. As far as my own constituency goes, I should be very well pleased indeed, and I am sure every hon. member would be pleased, if in the next election he should receive as big a percentage of the votes polled as that in favour of the poultry scheme in the province of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Perhaps they would if they spent as much money to get it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My own constituency voted over seventy per cent in favour, and some others over eighty per cent. This money was voted by the House of Commons, and spoken in favour of by members of the different parties represented in the house, to be applied to assist in the organization and development of schemes such as this.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I ask the minister the number of those who voted in Alberta and in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is already on Hansard but I shall read it again. In Alberta the total votes in favour were 12,635, being 62·5 per cent, and the number against 7,587, being 37·5 per cent. In Saskatchewan the number in favour was 27,749, being 63·4 per cent, and the number against, 16,012, being 36·6 per cent. In Manitoba the votes in favour were 6,070, and against, 18,931.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Surely the minister will admit that that was a very small fraction of the possible voters, showing a very slight interest in the movement.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): And a slighter opposition to it.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Was I correct in understanding the minister to say he had answered all the questions put to him this afternoon and evening?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member will be fair enough to admit that when hon. gentlemen ask five or six or seven or more questions in succession it is difficult to remember them all. But as far as I can remember I have answered all questions asked.

Mr. BROWN: There is one matter I would like to bring to the attention of the minister now that we have come back to the poultry scheme. Some $50,000 was spent by the government in promoting the scheme—

Mr. DUFF: Wasted, not spent.

Mr. BROWN: Well, it may have been wasted, but it was spent. The minister said this afternoon that opponents of the scheme had opportunity to present their case at the meetings. I would call his attention to the fact that at some of the meetings opposition speakers were not allowed to speak. I can prove that.

An hon. MEMBER: Serve them right.

Mr. BROWN: That is a curious statement. I have no objection to the minister taking the position that they could not directly finance the opposition; I think his argument on that point is reasonable. But I contend that when public money is spent to promote a scheme of this kind, neighbouring farmers who attend the meeting should not be denied the privilege of expressing their opposition to the scheme. Now, that was done.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No doubt about that.

Mr. BROWN: The minister agrees with what I said?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Absolutely.

Mr. BROWN: I think the minister will agree that that was an entirely wrong policy to pursue.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When the money was advanced it was set out very definitely as one of the conditions that every opportunity should be given to opponents of the scheme to express their view.

Mr. BROWN: Well, it was not done.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The first condition that was attached to the advance of this money was that:

> Every effort should be made to familiarize all poultry producers with the purpose and proposed operation of the scheme in order to ensure as complete registration and poll as possible and opportunity shall be given at every meeting to all who desire to discuss the scheme.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who signed that letter?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The dominion marketing board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who overruled it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It must have been the individuals sent out who did not live up to it. The information no doubt is correct, and I would appreciate it if the hon. member would give me the name of the individual in charge of the meeting.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By whom were those people appointed—the dominion marketing board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, they were appointed by the proponents of the scheme in each province.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Would the minister give me the marketing qualifications of the members of the marketing board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At the present time the chairman of the dominion marketing board is a man with excellent training in agricultural economics before he went into business on his own account.

Mr. DUFF: Who is he?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Leitch. He made an outstanding success, I believe, of this business he entered into. He was to a considerable extent responsible for formulating the scheme in connection with regulating the marketing of tobacco, and before coming to the dominion marketing board was responsible to a great extent for the success of that scheme.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): May I interrupt? I understood the minister to say that we had to have the marketing board in connection with tobacco because the marketing of tobacco had not been a success. Now he states that the chairman has made a distinct success of the marketing of tobacco.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I said the chairman of the board had made a distinct success in this business that he had undertaken. The hon. member knows, as I had occasion to know through numbers of delegations who came to interview me in 1932, I think, and in 1933, of the unsatisfactory conditions that existed in connection with the marketing of tobacco.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Unsuccessful.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Unsuccessful, especially the smaller producers. They felt that they were being discriminated against. I believe it is the almost unanimous opinion that there has been a great improvement, outside of a party of two who came to see me two weeks ago, and I think they laboured under a misapprehension which I hope has been cleared up. Doctor Booth is head of the Department of agricultural economics, and we felt he was qualified to make a contribution to this work.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Has he ever had any selling experience?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think he has ever had any experience in merchandising. The work of the marketing board is not to buy and sell.

Mr. DUFF: It is to prevent it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Eaton, from the Department of Finance—

Mr. DUFF: It is like the whaling convention mentioned this afternoon.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): —has had a very distinguished career in connection with the study of finance. Mr. Davidson was one of the outstanding men on the bureau of statistics, and we felt his records would be of great value. Mr. Gosselin has been enthusiastic in agricultural work, and has been an outstanding student. We selected him because we wanted a bilingual representative on the board.

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I presume the minister is answering me. I asked him about the marketing experience of these men, and he has not mentioned any marketing experience, with the exception of that of the chairman. I know the minister wishes to answer the question, and that is why I am attempting to make it clear.

Mr. POULIOT: The chairman is a responsible man on an irresponsible board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member feel his question has not been answered?

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): I am asking the minister to state the marketing experience of the members of the marketing board. I was quite satisfied with the answer given in regard to the chairman. He then proceeded to outline other qualifications of the remaining members of the board, but he has failed to mention their marketing experience.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member asked about the marketing experience of the gentlemen on the board?

Mr. MOORE (Ontario): Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In my answer I stated the marketing experience of Mr. Leitch, and I stated further that so far as I knew Doctor Booth had no merchandising experience. However I indicated that he was a student of marketing, as were the other members of the board. I think the hon. member will agree in this, that although from some quarters there has been criticism because men more actively engaged in marketing were not placed on the board, for every comment of criticism there have been nine others of commendation.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): People who did not know.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member interjects that these were people who did not know. I state that there were many people who thought exactly as the hon. member who has interrupted, who are now among the loudest in their commendation of the board.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member cannot answer because he does not know about whom I am speaking.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member is suggesting that people have not come to me and made the statement I have indicated, despite the fact that he does not know about whom I am speaking. That is typical of the attitude taken by the hon. member in matters such as these.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I will tell you in a minute what my attitude is.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): These people who have come, with one exception, have gone out of their way to pay tribute to the calibre of the men on the board. These men are unbiased, unprejudiced and all have had more or less experience in the study of agricultural marketing.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): But not in the practical application of it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They act as men interested in agriculture, with a knowledge of agriculture and the conditions under which the farmer is labouring. They endeavour to get the farmers' viewpoint and to endeavour to give what assistance they can by way of advice in the forming of schemes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): In order that I may be clear in the matter I should like first to ask if we are discussing item 263 of the estimates, a vote of $545,500 for the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe that is correct.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): By what stretch of the imagination does the Minister of Agriculture believe that the money paid by the taxpayers of Canada should be used to educate—and I am using a very moderate term—or to coerce the producers of different commodities to adopt the ideas or policies tabulated or formulated in the minds of so-called supermen who have been chosen by the Minister of Agriculture to tell Canadian producers things that those producers know much better than the technical experts the qualifications of whom, in reply to a question of the hon. member for Ontario, the minister has just described?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): May I correct that? These schemes are not prepared by members of the dominion marketing board; they are submitted by the producers themselves.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I thank the minister for his explanation, because it affords me the opportunity to place before the committee certain facts in connection with the modus operandi of paid government propagandists in connection with certain schemes which have been presented to producers. The Minister of Agriculture has said quite truly that these schemes did not originate in the minds or offices of the dominion marketing board, but I should like to place on record a method which to my intimate knowledge was used in an endeavour to bring the tomato producers of a certain part of Ontario under a marketing scheme. I would add that this method has been followed not only in the instance which I will relate but in other parts of Canada in endeavours to persuade, induce or coerce other producers to adopt schemes.

The meeting to which I refer was called in a tomato producing part of Ontario in order that two gentlemen, whose names I shall mention if the minister so desires, might address the meeting, and make an effort to organize the tomato growers of that district. As closely as I can ascertain—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not wish to interrupt, but I should like to have the names, because no officials of the Department of Agriculture are supposed to take any part in putting forward these schemes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I did not say that they were officials of the Department of Agriculture.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No, I did not say that they were officials of the department, but if the minister wishes I shall name them. Some hon. members will know them. They were Mr. Craise of St. Catharines and Mr. Robinson. Now, you have them both.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I understood the hon. member to say that they were officials of the department.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No, I did not say that. These gentleman called a meeting of tomato growers in the district. Out of 1,200 tomato growers less than 100 attended the meeting, of which number less than sixty per cent voted. I am not for one moment suggesting that that meeting was held to adopt a scheme under the marketing board, but I do say that is the method which has been adopted not only in connection with tomatoes but also in connection with the growing of apples. All you have to do is to say, "Hurrah boys; we will have a meeting in Brighton, Cobourg or somewhere else to-night. Let us all go, because we are going to discuss a marketing scheme." Those who can conveniently attend do attend, and some glib propagandist who has never been successful in operating a business of his own gets up and eulogizes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Have a good laugh; it will do you good. This man gets up and eulogizes and attempts to show the farmer or producer how to produce and market his crop. That is what happens; laugh that off.

Let me go one step farther. I have before me an itemized return of the individual payments out of a sum of $50,000 appropriated in order that government paid propagandists, men paid by money supplied by the taxpayers of Canada, might spend $50,000 of the taxpayers' money in the three western provinces in an attempt to sell the egg producers a scheme indicating how they could best market their product. What superman or supermind or minds was behind this scheme? Who thought it out? Who thought out this bedtime story? I noticed in checking over a list the other day of civil servants who receive over $8,000 a year—it was in a newspaper I read it—that the chairman of the marketing board was fortunate enough to be included in the list. I may be wrong in that, and if so, will the minister please correct me?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member refer to the $50,000 that was sent out?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No. I am asking who thought out this scheme; what superman developed this expenditure of $50.000 for radio addresses and the payment of stump speakers, salaries for stenographers, newspaper advertising, hole in the corner meetings, meetings of school boys and school girls, and practically every other type of propaganda that you can think of. They spent $50,000 of the taxpayers' money to advance an uneconomic scheme, to convince the poultry producers and egg producers of the three western provinces or convert them to the idea that some technical expert knew more about raising chickens and eggs than the poultry raisers themselves. I said that the gentleman under whose jurisdiction this expenditure came, and who in turn is under the Minister of Agriculture, is a civil servant who, according to the list I saw in a newspaper which I believe was taken from a return brought down in this house, is one of the newly appointed civil servants who are being paid over $8,000 a year. Is not that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is not a correct statement. The marketing board in the first place is not under the Civil Service Act, and the chairman of the board receives a salary of $10,000.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Thanks very much, Mr. Minister. I was $2,000 out. I did not estimate his worth as highly as the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He is a civil servant.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Who pays him?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The government.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Then my statement is correct when I say that the taxpayers of Canada are paying these supermen big salaries, $10,000 a year to the chairman of the board. While I do not wish to do anybody an injustice, I doubt whether in any one year that gentleman ever received such handsome remuneration prior to his engagement by the government to direct the practical operations of those who know more about their business than he does.

Let me go one step further. I happen to be a fruit grower, an apple grower. Under the Natural Products Marketing Act there was set up what was known as the apple export board. Once again these gentlemen weighed the reasons pro and con and decided that a certain practice should be followed in connection with the exportation of apples. I am referring to the year 1934-35. We have heard on numerous occasions from the hustings, and in this House of Commons from certain hon. members to the right of the Speaker, of the tremendous export of apples from Canada in the 1933-34 season, and that was absolutely correct; there was a bumper crop of apples in that year, and we had very large exports. But will hon. members on the other side of the house look at the export figures for 1934-35? They will find that the figures are probably the lowest export figures of any year in the last ten years. And now we are asked to vote $545,000 to administer the Natural Products Marketing Act under which these supermen set up an apple export board and put an embargo on the export of low grade apples and certain varieties from the province of Nova Scotia. The result of this interference with the natural trend of trade and business was that in 1934-35 the Annapolis fruit growers shipped into the provinces of Ontario and Quebec approximately 400,000 barrels of low grade apples, and these apples from the maritime provinces came here to the detriment of the Ontario fruit growers, who had a minimum crop of approximately 250,000 barrels in 1934. My contention on that point, Mr. Chairman, is this, that we should not be asked at this time to vote money to maintain a marketing board or an export board that does not know as much about the practical operations of the producer's business as he knows himself.

Reference has been made here to-night to the potato board. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) has spoken of the conditions that prevail in the potato industry in the maritime provinces. Let me say for the information of the minister, in order that it may get on the record and he will know it, that after the potato board was set up under the Natural Products Marketing Act, after they had called in the assistance of the provincial police to endeavour to control the bootlegging of potatoes in Ontario, after they had the provincial police speeding over the highways of Ontario in order to arrest if necessary the producers and distributors of our natural products, the price of potatoes in Ontario dropped, not to eight cents a bag, but to nil, and I was under the painful necessity last week of dumping 462 crates of No. 1 graded Ontario potatoes because even a certain hotel proprietor would not relieve me of them for nothing. That is the result of the marketing board. That shows what the marketing board failed to accomplish, and what no board can ever accomplish. That is the condition that prevails after the expenditure of all this money, the payment of salaries to supermen, to the chairman and to superassociates to instruct him in order that he may be able to tell us poor farmers what we are to do with our potatoes. I say without fear of contradiction, after spending thirty years of my life in the production, distribution and sale of fruit and farm products, that the attempts being made by the marketing board are economically unsound and will produce nothing but chaos and disastrous results. The tobacco marketing board originated in the minds of a couple of super real estate salesmen, who forced the production of tobacco on the sand dunes of Norfolk and Oxford counties. I can give the names of these two gentlemen if they are wanted. They knew nothing whatever about the production, sale and distribution of tobacco. One of them was a real estate broker in the city of Toronto who had been engaged in the sale of musical instruments but failed in that business. He had not got more than a rain check in the real estate business until he decided that there was an opportunity in Oxford and Norfolk counties for the people to buy these sand dunes to produce tobacco.

Through high pressure salesmanship and by painting a glowing picture of the profits that were to be made from the production of tobacco, through unsound methods, they forced the production of tobacco to the point mentioned by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) a moment ago, and then they put their hands up and yelled, "Kamerad, Mr. Minister. For God's sake help us; we are broke." And that is the way the tobacco scheme originated in the two counties.

Speaking not only as a member of this House of Commons but as a Canadian citizen who cherishes his liberties and rights under the constitution of this dominion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I quite realize, Mr. Chairman, why some hon. members on the other side laugh; under the cloak of Toryism they have never known what rights and liberties are. It comes to my mind to quote the old phrase, "the loud laugh that speaks the vacant mind." As a member of this house and as a Canadian citizen, as a farmer and a producer having some stake in this dominion, I say to the Minister of Agriculture that this Natural Products Marketing Act is the most vicious piece of legislation that was ever put on the statute books of this country. This act is the stepping stone to fascism in Canada. As a Canadian citizen, a member of this House of Commons and a candidate in the next election, I am ready and willing to take this act and make it the spearhead of my campaign in defence of Canadian liberty and Canadian citizenship.

We are being asked at this time to vote $545,000, which is to be spent without discretion, without direction or control, just as the $50,000 was spent in the western provinces in an endeavour to coerce, to persuade and to force the poultry and egg producers to enter a scheme. The tobacco producers, the hog producers and other producers of natural products are being forced to enter wildeyed economically unsound schemes. Before this is done this House of Commons should consider carefully where the money comes from, how it is to be spent and what the ultimate result will be for the taxpayers, the producers and the consumers of this country. I repeat to the minister that these schemes will not work. The men who devised these schemes were men who were already in trouble through inability to handle their own affairs. The men who are at present promoting the Natural Products Marketing Act and the marketing boards to the best of their ability would be better employed trying to figure out their own personal destinies.

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

A few minutes ago the minister stated that the department had been approached by numerous producers and groups who wished to adopt these schemes. I should like to know just what these groups are and what incentive is behind their request. I think this information would be very interesting to the committee.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, at the commencement of his remarks the hon. member stated that in 1933 there had been a large export of apples but in 1934 this export had fallen abnormally low. I am sure the hon. member would not want to give the impression that the drop in exports was due to anything but the deplorable frost which destroyed many of the finest orchards in Ontario. I believe the hon. member himself suffered considerably in this connection. There was a very light crop of apples in 1934 and I believe that was largely responsible for the decrease in exports.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The natural conditions are the same for a large or a small crop.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member has referred in very eloquent and vigorous terms to the Toryism at its worst in the Natural Products Marketing Act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Excuse me, I must correct the minister.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Perhaps it was at its best.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I did not use the word "Toryism" in that connection.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member referred to Toryism in connection with the Natural Products Marketing Act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I referred to Toryism when replying to some hon. members opposite in connection with fruit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not at all.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I should like to quote from the speech from the throne delivered in 1935 in the legislature of British Columbia, the government of which is a long way from being Tory. It reads:

> Agriculture generally in British Columbia has improved and an upward trend is noticeable both in the matter of markets and price structure. As a result of the natural products marketing legislation passed last session several producers' schemes have been proclaimed, which, with a further broadening of the federal act, will, it is believed, result in establishing agriculture on a sounder basis in this province.

The hon. member asked for particulars of the applications which had been received from producers' organizations to come under the provisions of the Natural Products Marketing Act. We have received the following applications:

Manitoba, live stock marketing scheme.
Saskatchewan, live stock marketing scheme.
Alberta, live stock marketing scheme.
British Columbia, halibut marketing scheme (recommended).
Ontario, fruit and vegetable marketing scheme.
Dairy marketing scheme for Canada.
The Grand Manan smoked herring products scheme.
British Columbia, red cedar shingle marketing scheme.
The Ontario cattle export scheme.
The Ontario cheese patrons' scheme.
British Columbia, hothouse tomatoes and cucumbers scheme (provincial, recommended).
British Columbia, small fruits and rhubarb scheme (recommended).
Nova Scotia, apples.
South Essex, fruit and vegetables.
Ontario, honey.
Ontario, grapes.
Saskatchewan, poultry.
British Columbia, sheep and sheep products scheme.

I cannot place too much emphasis upon the statement that neither the dominion marketing board nor the dominion government have made any efforts to institute any scheme under this act. This act has been made available to the producers and we feel that the decision should be left to them.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): How many of the applications just mentioned by the minister have been turned down?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): None of those have been turned down; they are all under consideration.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): How long has it been since those schemes were referred to the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The time varies from one month to six months.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Why has not the board acted?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In some cases it has been impossible to obtain the necessary information, and in other cases readjustments have been necessary after the scheme has been submitted.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): That is the answer I wanted. After schemes have been submitted readjustments have taken place in the proposals. In other words, as I understand it, the marketing board is endeavouring to exercise the cooperative principle in connection with these schemes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To bring the schemes within the provisions of the act. Many of the schemes submitted were not in conformity with the act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Is it the intention of the marketing board or the department to use the full powers contained in the act to enforce a scheme once it is adopted? Suppose I am refused a licence as a bean or tomato grower; would the penalties provided in the act be applied if I did not belong to the scheme and continued to sell my product?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If that were a provision of the scheme, yes. It would depend entirely upon the provisions of the scheme submitted to the producers.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Under the act itself the board has the power to impose fines, taxation and imprisonment upon anyone who infringes upon the principles of the act or violates any of the sections of the marketing scheme which has been set up by vote or otherwise. I understand that no votes have been taken as yet in Ontario. Is it the intention of the board to apply the penalties granted by Bill No. 51 to a producer of natural products who violates the provisions of the scheme or who has been refused a licence?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Each instance will be dealt with in accordance with the facts of the case.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): For years we had in Ontario what was known as the Ontario Temperance Act, and we could not stop bootlegging in liquor. It is difficult to stop bootlegging in narcotics. Now the point I want to call attention to is that you cannot stop bootlegging in potatoes. If we could not stop it in liquor, when there was not only a fine but a gaol sentence, how in the world are you going to stop it in natural products? How is the local board under the act going to refuse me as a Canadian fruit producer, owning my own farm and paying everything, from dog licence to sugar tax, the right to dispose of my products? How will you prevent me from selling my products? It seems to me that you are trying to push water uphill. May I have an answer to that question?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The answer is this. Any scheme that is submitted is submitted by the producers themselves. They are the ones who set out what the powers shall be within the act, and if a sufficient majority vote in favour of the scheme, with the powers set out therein, that scheme will go into effect and those within the area will be brought into line with the others. That is the principle of the act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): How will you bring them into line? How do you intend to bring the minority into line?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is being done now. It might be on the basis of licensing the buyers.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Suppose that as a producer I am refused a licence; where do we go from there?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): You are guilty of a violation of the regulations under the scheme and will be subject—

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): To fine?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If you have acted without a licence when one is required.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I have to sell apples; I am desperately interested in that, and still I want to keep out of gaol. Please answer this question so that I shall know. In the first place, if I am refused a licence, what happens then? I am a fruit producer, or I am producing tomatoes under a scheme, and I will not sell my tomatoes or my apples at the price set by the local board, or I refuse to comply with some regulation: what happens to me then?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends on the conditions set out in the scheme. What happens to the hon. member then, in this hypothetical case, depends entirely on what action it is felt necessary to take to make him come into line with the scheme.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Let me put the question in another way. As a Canadian fruit producer, owning my farm, paying my taxes, meeting my obligations, cutting my grass and painting my house, I want to know what you will do with me if I refuse to sell my apples or my tomatoes in compliance with the terms laid down by the local board under the Natural Products Marketing Act. What happens to me?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on the terms of the scheme, and then, if complaint had been made that the hon. member had not been living up to the conditions of the scheme, action would be taken by the court and a fine if necessary would be imposed.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I take it from what the minister says that if I break the regulations laid down by the local marketing board under the Natural Products Marketing Act I am subject to fine.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends entirely on the conditions set out in the scheme. We cannot decide hypothetical cases.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If the conditions set out in the scheme are consistent with Bill 51, am I subject to a fine? What method will you adopt to get me into line?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends entirely on the local board.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Let us see if we cannot get it focused for a minute. As a fruit producer I refuse to be dictated to by a majority of the local board or I refuse to comply with the regulations set out by the supermen you have hired. Let us get it on the table so that we have all the cards face up. I will grow my apples and sell them when and where I like, at what price I like, at such times as I choose and to whom I choose, and I will transport them as I like, all consistently with the laws of the dominion. Someone will say, not consistently with this law. But the point I wish to bring out is this. The minister said a minute ago that if the terms of the local scheme were such and such under the Natural Products Marketing Act I would be fined if I broke one of the regulations. Am I correct in that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on what is set out in the scheme.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If the scheme as set out embodies the powers of Bill 51, unquestionably I can be fined.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on the conditions; each case is decided on its own merits.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Permit me to get back to the point once again. The Natural Products Marketing Act provides for fine and imprisonment for infringement or non-compliance with the terms laid down by the local board or the scheme set up. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Then we set up a local board in the apple growing district in central Ontario or a board to control tomato production, and seventy-five per cent of the growers that happen to come to the meeting vote for it and the board passes it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member says a scheme will be set up in connection with tomatoes, to control production.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I did not say that. What I am trying to bring out is this. The minister admitted that under Bill 51 I as a producer am subject to fine—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Stated rather than admitted.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): He stated then that under Bill 51 if I did not comply with the regulations embodied in a local scheme under the Natural Products Marketing Act the board would have the right of fine and imprisonment. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is my interpretation of it, yes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): They have not only the right of fine and imprisonment; the board has the right of taxation. I was taxed in 1935—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The board has not the right of fine and imprisonment, and only if that were included in the conditions under the scheme would it be applicable. The board has not the right of fine and imprisonment; the court has.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Under Bill 51 the courts have the right of fine and imprisonment, but the board has the right of taxation and it exercises that right. I was taxed without having a voice in the matter. I paid a tax though I had no say as to whether or not I should be charged. The tax was levied on my exports. My contention is this. In the first place the act is ultra vires; in the second place, neither the minister nor any court can send me to gaol for selling an honestly grown Canadian product to a Canadian consumer; and in the third place, the right of taxation is—

Mr. HACKETT: There are a lot of fellows in gaol now under that misapprehension.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The right of taxation is vested in this House of Commons, in the parliament of Canada, and not in the board, to decide whether I am to be taxed or not to be taxed. But the board in this case decides; let us not forget that. The power is conveyed in the act. The act does not say how much the tax shall be. The local board sets the levy per acre and per bushel; the export board sets the levy per barrel of the export shipment. But the act transfers the right of taxation as well as the expenditure of taxes from the jurisdiction of the Canadian House of Commons to the board set up under the act. That is the iniquitous part of the whole matter, plus this fact—and let me repeat it and get it once again on the record—we could not stop bootlegging in liquor; how can we stop it in apples and potatoes? I repeat that as a Canadian fruit grower I defy the right of this or any other board to fine or imprison me for selling an honestly grown Canadian product. Is the Department of Agriculture in alliance with the Department of Justice? Is there a conspiracy with the Department of Public Works to build more gaols in this country? Is there by any possibility a set-up between Agriculture, Justice and Public Works and contractors and suppliers of materials behind this iniquitous piece of legislation? Let us get the situation cleared up and let us see where we stand.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) in connection with this legislation. I have given some thought to the drift of public opinion, legislative opinion I might say, not only in this country but in some others. I am discussing this question impartially; I am not interested in this side or that side of the house. What we must remember is that the only places in which we have been able to carry out a planning scheme are the gaols, the army and the navy, where every man wears the same kind of clothes, eats as the government says he shall eat and sleeps as the government says he shall sleep.

I have had some practical experience in Ontario and in the city of Hamilton. I am speaking as a sailor, not as a soldier, and I know whereof I speak. I want to be very frank about this because I think the consumer has some rights; let us not forget that. While producers and distributors sit down and say: This is the price that shall be charged, let them not forget that my people have some rights as to the price that shall be charged. The labouring man who is working for $12 or $14 a week has some rights in this matter. After all is said and done, we all speak from the viewpoint of our experience. Some speak from the viewpoint of what they have read, but I speak from the viewpoint of my practical experience. I remember when the big chain dairies, representatives of the Borden interests in the United States, came into this dominion and began to buy up the dairies of Ontario. They took within their orbit, in the boards of directors, members who were prominent in the public life of this country. I have no objection to that. In Hamilton, whence I come, the working men are practical. A man can be well educated and be a damn fool at the same time; let us not forget that. They said: These chaps are buying up these dairies, and naturally in order to meet the dividends on inflated capital they are going to ask for lower wages and lower prices to the farmers. This was quite a human viewpoint to take. They came to me and said: Give us a hand to help negotiate a wage agreement with these enormous chain dairies. So we went down to some of the smaller dairies and endeavoured to solicit their sympathy in connection with men's wages and working conditions. I gave a left-handed hint to them that if they would play the game in regard to men's wages and prices to the farmers, we would swing the labour support their way. What did one of their managers say to me? He said: "If I had the influence you think you have, I would start a dairy of my own," and they almost threw us out on the sidewalk. When we got to the sidewalk I said to the men around me, ordinary working men like myself: "By jingo, that is what we will do; we will start a dairy." So we started a cooperative dairy in Ontario. We went out among the farmers, and the funny thing about them was that we had to convince them that we were not selling them a goldbrick. They thought this was some smart slicker from the city coming out and trying to sell them something that was worth nothing. Eventually we raised enough money to start this dairy on the basis that the men get a fair wage, that the farmers get a fair return for their labour, and that what is left over is shared among the farmers and the people who buy the milk. That is the proper basis of production, because let us not forget that the fundamental basis of production is consumption, not profit. If the people in this corner who talk about the cooperative commonwealth did something more practical in that direction, they would be further ahead than they will get by just talking about it. That is the way to prove the thing is sound; the basis of life itself is voluntary cooperation, where the farmer gets his and the consumer or the man employed in the industry gets his. The fellows in this corner want a policeman all the time. I disagree with them of course on that point.

We proved my theory in a practical way; we started in with our cooperative dairy. I want to be quite frank about that; speaking as a sailor again I say that there is more profit in milk than there is in beer, and that is saying a good deal. We went along in a quite normal way and we built up a tremendous business. Within two years we had the third largest business in the city of Hamilton, based on this perfectly simple approach to the problem. This has the price spreads commission knocked off the map, to use the language of the man in the street. If after you meet your capital obligations you distribute the surplus among the people who produce the product and the people who consume it, and you pay the best wages and the top prices to the farmer, there is no argument against the proposition.

The first year we were in business we did not make any money, but that is quite a sound proposition in business. The second year we made sufficient profit to meet the arrears of dividends to the farmers, I mean to those who invested their money in the business. As a matter of fact we made fourteen per cent on the capital structure after paying top prices to the farmers and the highest wages to dairy employees within the confines of the city. Then we got the milk control board of Ontario, under a Liberal government, by the way; and I could never understand how a Liberal government should be opposed to voluntary cooperation. We might as well be frank. There is a complete answer to the price spreads commission and the lofty speeches made by the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens). How shall we pay the best wages possible to the employees, how shall we pay top prices to the farmers, meet our capital obligations and distribute the balance between those who produce the milk and those who consume it? If these overnight revolutionaries in the corner, these revolutionaries in the abstract, would go out to the people and preach the soundness of the real cooperative principle, we should get somewhere. I am one who believes in things that work; I am not greatly interested in things on paper. After all, the capitalist system works on paper; so does socialism. But I think these working men and farmers of Hamilton—I say this to the farmers on both sides of the house—have given an object lesson to the farmers and consumers of Canada which indicates that they do not need any price spreads commission; all that is necessary is the principle of voluntary cooperation. I state with all the responsibility of a member of the House of Commons that at the moment we are making so much money that we do not know what to do with it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): How about lending us some?

Mr. MITCHELL: And this good Liberal government of Ontario say we cannot pay more than eight per cent on our capital. What are we going to do with the balance? Up to the last month our profits on distributing milk have been 38½ per cent on our capital after meeting all obligations—wages, depreciation, and interest on capital.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Surely a case for the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. MITCHELL: We welcome that; the hon. member need not hold that up as a threat.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you do with the money?

Mr. MITCHELL: We have still got it. The government of Ontario, my good friend Mitchell Hepburn, said that we could not pay this out to the producers. We are willing to do it to-morrow morning, but if we did it we would be breaking the law and would find our charter taken away from us. Being a good Englishman, I believe in democratic institutions and in obeying the law.

When I spoke on the marketing measure last year I said I thought it had the germ of an idea in it, based on the voluntary cooperation of producers and consumers of this dominion. I am absolutely opposed to the principle of coercion; I say that in all sincerity. The right to express an opinion, the right to disagree, is in my judgment the basis of human freedom. If there were not differences of opinion this House of Commons would not exist. Someone behind me asks if I believe in the open shop. I shall answer that question too. If you start off with proper wages and working conditions for the primary producers and the men and women engaged in industry and forget about the chaps who are out to make fortunes and who have fleeced you in the past, it would be very fair premises to start from. But out of practical experience —because after all our attitude towards life arises very largely from our practical experience—we have proved in a small way that cooperation between the producer, especially the farmers, and the men and women engaged in industry, and the consumers, who are the basis of production, is practical; it has been a practical thing in the milk industry of Hamilton. I would leave this thought with the government, that in the working out of these schemes they must take into consideration three primary factors. First, the consumers must have a fair deal; then you must consider the producer, and you must consider also the capital which is necessary to launch the enterprise.

I shall have more to say on this matter before the session is concluded. In this marketing legislation you must have due regard for the consumer. I listened very attentively to the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland, and I think his is a sad conclusion to arrive at, if you are to maintain Canadian institutions as we understand them, having due regard to the three factors in industry.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister if he contemplates bringing down at the present session any amendments to the Natural Products Marketing Act? At the beginning of the session it was currently reported around the buildings and in the press that there would be some amendments to this bill. I was in hopes that there would be, but at this stage, after we have already had a surfeit of legislation, I scarcely dare suggest that amendments be brought down.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is contemplated that amendments will be introduced. These amendments were withheld until the report of the price spreads commission was received.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am sure that after the discussion to-night the minister must be convinced that we are not entirely unanimous about this marketing act. I voted for it myself; I was in hopes that after a year's experience the minister would be prepared to profit by the weaknesses that were bound to develop in its tryout and its administration and to make certain amendments. Possibly some of the vexatious provisions of the bill could be eliminated without impairing its general utility.

The sentiment of the house was indicated last year by the leaders of all parties; they were in favour of a marketing bill as a general principle, but a great many did not agree with this particular kind of bill. My hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) was in favour of a voluntary system. That sounds attractive, but many in the western provinces have advanced a little beyond that, especially in British Columbia where this bill really originated. To the horror of those who always favoured a voluntary system our friends in British Columbia are largely for the kind we have now. Their argument is that this is not a compulsory system in the usual sense, but that the government is merely affording them facilities to impose compulsion upon themselves, so to speak. In Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba they were asked if they wanted to impose compulsory marketing upon themselves by a two to one favourable vote, and they said no. Then where is the compulsion? It did not come into force.

For many years I had to wrestle with this problem, and for long years I was just as violently opposed even to seeming compulsion as anyone could be, to anything but an entirely voluntary system. There are two sides to the question, and I will not enter into the merits thereof at this time; but if it is wrong for a majority to say to a minority, say ten per cent: We will determine how you shall market your stuff, surely it is a greater wrong for the ten per cent to determine how the ninety per cent shall market their goods. I had to go through all that, and I have a great deal of sympathy for those who are going through the earlier stages of the same development, because voluntary action would seem a sound thing to preach and the denunciation of coercion would seem to be equally sound. But if we apply that all through life I do not know where we would finish or where majority rule would get off at.

I believe it will be recalled that when I voted for the second and third reading of the marketing bill I registered my vote after making very considerable reservations, and registering the hope that before there could be much harm done by it to the cause of cooperative marketing some amendments would be made to it. I am pleased to note that the minister has that point in mind. I have no doubt that if a reasonable number of good amendments were made, sufficient to remove the more vexatious features, such as the licencing and controlling of production, and the regulating of exports and imports, the act would be more satisfactory. Those factors are distressing and objectionable to many people. And then only enthusiasts like some of the rest of us on behalf of co-operating marketing, who have spent the better portions of their lives trying to do something on its behalf, could swallow those features temporarily in the hope that they may be speedily removed by amendment.

Before I take my seat may I mention another matter. I am afraid the government have not been very fortunate in the administration of the act. This was a new piece of legislation for this house, government and country. The way in which the vote has been administered leaves much to be desired, and the hesitancy demonstrated by my good friend the minister in giving information to the house would seem to indicate that he thought there was something wrong in distributing these moneys among the various schemes being launched. The money was specifically voted for the purpose of organization and he was perfectly within his right in distributing it. I do not know whether or not it was spent properly, but that is another question. The fact is, however, that the House of Commons voted the money for organization purposes, just the same as other governments have done on many similar occasions, and particularly those provincial governments in the western provinces.

I understand another vote in connection with a live stock marketing scheme is to be taken in the prairie provinces. There will be another great big voting contest coming off some time this summer, and I think it would be unfortunate to mix the two of them together. Speaking for my own province I would say that in the interests of the cause and obtaining a direct record and decision on one question at a time, it would be better to have only one voting contest in progress at one time. That is to say, if the elections are to be held in September or October I would suggest that any voting on marketing schemes be held as quickly as possible so that the two would not become intermixed, to the disadvantage possibly of both.

Mr. ROWE: After one has listened to the words of the ex-Minister of Agriculture, the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), on the eve of an election one can see why we hear opposition to the marketing legislation. I am sure hon. members will agree with me when I state that the one most qualified to speak, the member of the opposition who has had the most experience in agricultural administration, and the one who has had a life-time of experience in the industry itself, is the hon. member who has just spoken and who is still in agreement with—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have no doubt the hon. member is lauding me with the best of intentions, but it would suit me much better just now if he would cut it out.

Mr. ROWE: I fully appreciate that the ex-Minister of Agriculture does not often agree with me, and as this is probably the first time he has heard commendation from this side of the house I can well appreciate his astonishment. While he may hesitate to accept my commendation, I must say in all fairness that I believe time has mellowed his political inclination as it does practically every hon. member of this house; and the hon. member for Melville has therefore given expression now to his most careful consideration of the marketing act. I clearly recall that he supported the bill and I am pleased to note to-night that he still supports the act which was the result of that bill. I am glad to note, further, that he holds a view contrary to other western members when he states that this is the type of legislation which for years western provinces have put into effect, and that it contains nothing of a coercive nature. He suggests further that the vicious principles of the act might well be removed. With that view I am somewhat in agreement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: I see the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) applauding, and I can well appreciate that no matter what legislation is brought before parliament we will have to listen to the legal technicalities pointed out by hon. members of the bar; no matter what bill is introduced having to do with the restraint or regulation of business, the principle of liberty in business will be placed before us. But surely no hon. member will for a moment suggest that we have not regulations along every other line. Many of us have been driving on the highways and upon occasions when we have driven faster than the speed limit we have been fined. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) has spoken about the Ontario Temperance Act. Many people were fined under that act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I did not say I had been.

Mr. ROWE: I do not think the hon. member for Northumberland was fined under that act, because I do not believe he would be guilty of an offence under it. I was going on to say, however, that we have regulations and control all the way along, just as the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) has said. I was amused by his observations about the voluntary principle of cooperation. We might as well apply the voluntary principle of cooperation in our labour unions; we might as well apply the voluntary principle of cooperation in every business organization throughout the dominion. Unfortunately, however, agriculture by its very nature does not permit of voluntary cooperation. From coast to coast we have over 728,000 farmers, and everyone realizes that complete cooperation would be impossible. The ex-Minister of Agriculture has made that point very clear. I submit again that there is no one to your left, Mr. Chairman, who could speak with more authority or after greater experience than the hon. member for Melville, and in spite of his nine years of failure as Minister of Agriculture, I agree with him.

Mr. DUFF: That is a lefthanded compliment.

Mr. ROWE: I shall come to that in a few moments. I would suggest the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) assisted the ex-minister in his failure in the administration of his department.

Mr. DUFF: Well, you did not help him.

Mr. ROWE: I did not make the statement personally, when I referred to the hon. member for Melville. I say in all fairness and in all sincerity that the hon. member for Melville in the administration of his department was recognized by every farmer as being conscientious in his efforts. I can recall, further, that he brought about a system of egg grading and I have had to apologize in my own riding for criticism of it. It was also through the efforts of the hon. member for Melville that a system of hog grading was brought about, and I think he will agree with me and other hog producers in Canada that it was not a perfect system. Undoubtedly it could be criticized, and possibly was criticized by many hon. members opposing him. It was criticized at its inception and, as the ex-minister knows, the administration of it was criticized. However the fact is that at that time it was the best he knew and in fact it was a progressive step. I believe he could have gone much farther. I believe he could have gone much farther in his hog grading; instead of grading on the hoof, grading could have been done on the rail not only in connection with hogs but in connection with beef, mutton and all other meats. However, so far as coercion is concerned I must observe that the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough did not oppose the ex-minister in his coercion, if you might term these matters coercion. They were criticized by hon. members on the other side who probably did not realize their importance, but I submit that the letter killeth but the spirit giveth life. Every hon. member of this house knows that unless you make agriculture prosperous we shall never return to national prosperity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: We are all agreed on that. The members to your left, Mr. Chairman, realize full well that unless the primary industries of this country are made prosperous there is no hope for the future. It is all very well to make political campaign speeches out of an issue of this kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What about butter?

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has said that we all promised seventy-cent butter.

Mr. DUFF: You did when you went to Nova Scotia in 1930.

Mr. ROWE: I challenge the hon. member to show one report of any meeting in Nova Scotia where I offered that.

Mr. DUFF: You went to the back concessions where there were no newspapers. You were scared to say it elsewhere.

Mr. ROWE: That may be a reflection on the province of Nova Scotia, Mr. Chairman, because I spoke in some rather prominent places in that province. But I am not speaking in any back concessions to-night and I am not afraid to talk to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. I declare that his statement is an absolute falsehood; he cannot produce a paper in Canada or a clipping that will show I offered seventy-cent butter anywhere.

Mr. DUFF: In the back concessions in Nova Scotia in 1930 you said that if the Conservative party were returned the farmers would get seventy cents a pound for their butter.

Mr. ROWE: I will revamp what I have said, Mr. Chairman, with reference to an absolute falsehood because I think that is probably not parliamentary. I will say this, that anyone who told such a story to the hon. member was certainly appealing to his political sympathies. I do not believe that any hon. member on this side of the house made any such statement in the last campaign. I never made any such statement anywhere in Canada, and I will venture to say that the hon. member, after more careful consideration, will admit that he cannot produce a clipping from any newspaper in Canada showing that any Conservative candidate in the last dominion election made any such statement.

Mr. BROWN: What about fifty cent butter?

Mr. ROWE: I challenge the hon. member or any hon. member to produce a clipping.

Mr. DUFF: You are trying to hide behind a subterfuge. You and the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) went over Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island and made the statement that if the Conservative party were returned the farmers would get seventy cents a pound for their butter. You cannot deny it.

Mr. ROWE: I again deny that statement. It is absolutely untrue. It never was made by me or by any other speaker in my presence at any meeting in Canada, and I challenge the other hon. member from Nova Scotia who is getting so warm about this to produce a clipping from any newspaper showing that any hon. member from this side of the house made any such wild statement. It is all very well for the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough or any other hon. gentleman opposite to go out on the hustings and tell the people of this country that this government through the marketing act, through trade restrictions and high tariffs has closed the markets of the world to our agricultural products—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWE: Is the ex-Minister of the Interior going to campaign along that line?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. ROWE: He is the man who said he would sound the death knell of protection when the Liberals got into power, and no man knows better than he does that practically every agricultural market in the world was closed to our products before this party came into power. I challenge any hon. member to your left, Mr. Chairman, to rise and tell me of one market that they opened to our agricultural products and that remained open in 1930.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member has thrown out a challenge. May I suggest—

Mr. ROWE: You do not need to suggest. You can make your suggestions when I am through.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): During the last election I was at a meeting in the eastern townships where one of your speakers promised eighty-five cent butter, and I told him: You want to put gold bricks on the market.

Mr. ROWE: No one knows better than the former Minister of Agriculture and the former Minister of the Interior that our markets had been lost to us before hon. gentlemen opposite went out of power, yet we do not blame the former Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or the former Minister of Agriculture because we know that other countries were raising their tariffs against us. I have never blamed them, and that is why I resent hon. gentlemen opposite blaming the present Prime Minister and this government for closing, as they say, markets that as a matter of fact were absolutely closed to us before 1930. Every hon. member of this house knows that the great market to the south of us was absolutely closed to our agricultural products before 1930. They remember the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1922 and the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930. When the Liberal party came into power we were selling to the United States almost $200,000,000 of our agricultural products, and when they went out of power in 1930 that had dropped to about $30,000,000. What was the reason for that decline? Because hon. gentlemen opposite for nine years had a policy of "hush, hush—there must be no provocation given to the United States." That was your policy for nine years. But now you are saying that if you are elected you will have a round table conference to negotiate a new reciprocity treaty with the United States. But for nine years the Liberal party sat idly by and would do nothing to provoke the United States even when it raised the tariff on meats from nothing to three cents a pound, on copper from nothing to four cents a pound, on lumber from nothing to four dollars a thousand. Hon. members opposite shake their heads. They know very well that we were selling wheat free of duty to Czechoslovakia, Germany and Italy and under a twelve cent duty to France when they came into power, but before they went out of office three of those countries had imposed a tariff of approximately one dollar a bushel against our wheat and the other a duty of 73 cents a bushel.

I have listened to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough saying that these markets have been closed to us due to the tariff policy of this government, but the former Minister of Agriculture admits that after years of waiting for a voluntary cooperative movement to standardize the quality of our export products and regulate their movement to the markets of the world, the Natural Products Marketing Act is the nearest thing to that objective that has been suggested at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not say that. I wanted amendments to the act.

Mr. ROWE: I know that there are many things in the act that can be criticized by our learned friends of the legal profession. I know there are those who would say that it goes beyond the British North America Act as it affects chartered companies that are under provincial jurisdiction. I know that those who are in the business of trading in the farmer's products and taking more out of the product than we ever get for raising it will find objections to the act and can easily be appealed to by the glad hand of Liberalism. Our Liberal friends will say to them: If you want liberty, if you want to sell and buy as you please, vote for the Liberal party and liberty. This is the laissez-faire attitude which has been taken in respect to practically every policy. It is the attitude that prompts hon. members opposite to hesitate and admit reluctantly that if the government is sincere, the legislation is not too bad. They are afraid to say yes and they hesitate and are reluctant politically to say no. Progress knows no retreat. Every other industry in this country has been ably organized and hon. members opposite are afraid to oppose this class of legislation. The eight hour day and the minimum wage were in the Liberal platform of 1919. I know hon. members opposite approve of these things and I challenge any hon. member to say that he does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We passed it long before you dreamt of it.

Mr. ROWE: You dreamt of it long before we passed it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We passed it.

Mr. ROWE: Your leader put it in his book eighteen years ago; you put it in your platform in 1919, but you never put it into effect, and you are reluctant to admit the advisability of our putting it on the statute book. I say as a farmer, and I believe I can speak on behalf of the farmers of this dominion—

Mr. DUFF: Do you work eight hours a day on the farm?

Mr. ROWE: I have worked sixteen hours a day on the farm. If we as farmers work eight hours in the morning and eight hours in the afternoon in order to provide the labour unions with an eight hour day and help to solve the major problem facing this country, unemployment, I think we should be given some consideration. I have no objection to an eight hour day if it will solve unemployment; in fact I am ready to subscribe to a six-hour day, if it will solve that problem, but if we are going to buy the products of their toil, if they are going to work only eight hours a day and receive twice as much as we are able to pay our labour on the farm, then I say on behalf of the boys who are working for the farmers and on behalf of the farmers themselves: it is high time some consideration was given to the farmers. This government is making the first effort which has been made since confederation to give the farmer a square deal and to give the producer of high grade goods a reasonable remuneration for his efforts. Our ambassadors, and especially the ambassador who was in the old country when hon. members opposite were in power, have told us what has happened in other countries. Our farmers have been forced to produce at less than cost. No matter how fine a product is produced, some other fellow may put out a scrubby article which brings down the price of the better grade. Such action might affect the price received for apples by the hon. member for Northumberland. A scrubby type of bacon may be sold which spoils the sales of the better types which some of us endeavour to produce. It has been acknowledged by leading agriculturists in all countries that the only way to meet world competition is by a government supported system of marketing. We live in a frigid zone; we are proud of our high standard of living, and under ordinary circumstances we cannot compete with the farmers who live in warmer climates where in some cases the family and the live stock all occupy the same building. We must have a carefully planned and sound system of marketing; the supply must be regulated according to the requirements, and the grades must be standardized according to the demands of the markets. This fact has been recognized throughout the world for fifteen years and yet hon. members opposite are trying to find weaknesses in this marketing act on the eve of an election. They forget that during the nine years of their administration every other successful agricultural country was organizing along the same lines as we are suggesting to-night.

In 1928 or 1929 a former minister of agriculture stated in the city of Toronto that in 1921 Canada sold 255,000,000 pounds of bacon in the British market. Since the empire trade agreements were passed we have increased our exports of bacon to nine times what they were before, and our farmers received double the price received by the American farmer for his bacon for the twelve months following these agreements. I should like to draw to the attention of the committee the fact that we are exporting very little more than one-quarter of what we were exporting at the time the former government came into power in 1921. Why was this market lost? In 1921 we were selling more bacon than Denmark in the British market, but what happened? By 1930 we were selling less than two per cent of the bacon consumed.

Mr. BROWN: We were eating more at home.

Mr. ROWE: Danish bacon was being sold in our western stores and our barley was being used to fatten Danish hogs. Denmark studied the market in Great Britain. They found out the requirements. They realized that a fat-sided bacon was needed for the workingmen's districts while a lean type of bacon was required by the girl working in the office. Denmark was able to take care of the requirements of this market, and she captured the markets overseas which we had previously held. During the nine years hon. friends opposite were in power Denmark increased her shipments to the British markets from approximately twelve per cent of the requirements to sixty per cent. Denmark was selling over 600,000,000 pounds of bacon in Great Britain, but what happened to Canada? The twenty-six per cent which Canada previously sold disappeared and our exports were practically nil.

This country has been fifteen years behind the rest of the world in this type of legislation. I realize how involved such legislation may be and how legal hon. members may talk about the constitution. My hon. friend talked for over two hours on the constitutionality of this legislation and his leader referred more to the constitution than to anything else.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What about the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when he spoke the other day?

Mr. ROWE: That may be, but we have reached the time when we must have sound, progressive legislation and not an attitude of laissez-faire in connection with everything brought up in the house. This is the attitude adopted by the party which has not enunciated a policy in any way, shape or form. I do not know, even you, Mr. Chairman, do not know, especially since you have been removed from politics—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROWE: Even though you sit so close to the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, who could tell you privately what might be expected, you do not know, Mr. Chairman, nor does anyone in this country know, just what is the Liberal policy on agriculture, on fiscal tariffs, on marketing, on finance or on reform legislation.

An hon. MEMBER: Reform.

Mr. McPHEE: When was the Tory party ever allied with reform?

Mr. ROWE: We have seen more advanced, progressive reform legislation passed since 1930, even before the so-called vicious acts were put into effect, than was passed by all the Liberal administrations from confederation down to the present time. I am amazed that an hon. member opposite should rise and mention reforms. There is not one piece of legislation upon the statute books to which they can point. They might mention the Combines Investigation Act, which was a justifiable and sound piece of legislation, but my hon. friends, in all their nine years in power, never made use of it. They pigeonholed it and it has been there, dusty, ever since. They never drew it out once when five hundred or more large manufacturing concerns were organized into about a hundred and twenty of the largest monopolies and combines which this country has ever seen. They never reached into the pigeonhole and took it out to administer it. They never sent their legal friends of the party to look into monopolies and combines which were fleecing the people of the country. I say again, Mr. Chairman, that if I had any criticism of the present government—

An hon. MEMBER: You wouldn't say it.

Mr. ROWE: I was just going to say what the hon. member has said—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: I was going to say that if it were very bad, if it were very serious I would not say it at this time because there is no other party offering anything towards a solution of the problems that face this country. I say, however, that the present government has at least endeavoured to solve our problems. I remember that when our friends to your left, Mr. Chairman,—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You remember.

Mr. ROWE: Yes; you were not here then, but I remember that when hon. gentlemen were here in the hectic days of 1926 their whip went back and forth looking for support. Agrarian movements started away back in 1890, and though I do not remember anything so long ago as that, I remember reading about the patrons of industry, what great fellows they were, and how the Liberal party of those days said that they would help to solve the marketing problems of the country. And we can also remember the agrarian movement in 1919, which had a certain amount of justification, no doubt; and my hon. friends across the way were then trying to get the support of those gentlemen. We recall the platform of 1919; we remember their promise to deal with price spreads and the low standard of living—

Mr. McPHEE: May I ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. ROWE: Please do not interrupt; I am developing a point in reference to the agrarian movement.

Mr. McPHEE: Is it not a fact—

Mr. ROWE: I will answer your question in a moment.

Mr. McPHEE: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. ROWE: I know what the hon. gentleman is trying to object to; he no doubt knows what I am going to say. The hon. gentleman is not a farmer, and I am now discussing the interests of farmers. Now we can all remember all the talk about a co-operative system at that time, and I well recall that in my own county some people said I was untrue to the farmers' interests because I did not belong to that group for the reason that they had started to merge into the Liberal party. The hon. members to your left, Mr. Chairman, came here, the Crerars, the Forkes, the Browns, and all the rest, in absolute sincerity, and in the most devout—

Mr. McPHEE: What about Milton Campbell?

An hon. MEMBER: Give him a title.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. gentleman never understood the problem, let alone offered a solution. He will not say in his riding that he is not in favour of the co-operative movement; he will not say he absolutely opposes the marketing act.

Mr. VALLANCE: You don't call this a cooperative movement, do you?

Mr. ROWE: The hon. gentleman will not lead me away from the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): We won four by-elections in Ontario.

Mr. ROWE: That is also beside the issue, as the hon. member usually is.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask hon. members to keep order. If any hon. member wishes to ask a question, the hon. gentleman who has the floor will sit down if he cares to entertain the question; otherwise he must not be interrupted.

Mr. ROWE: Does the hon. gentleman rise to a point of order?

Mr. McPHEE: I wished to ask a question but the hon. member objected before I could get a chance to put it.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member who had the floor had not sat down. If he wishes to answer the question he will sit down.

Mr. ROWE: Now, if I may, I should like to proceed with what I was about to say—something my hon. friends do not care to listen to. I was going to say that hon. gentlemen came here in 1921, in 1925 and again in 1926—and some of them are still here—with the intention of doing something to give the farmers a square deal and to encourage a system of cooperative marketing. But what happened? In 1925 and 1926 the Liberal party were not hanging on by their eyelids, as the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough suggests in reference to this party, but—

Mr. DUFF: You have been in power now for over five years.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friends at that time did not even have their eyelids in, because they were in the minority in this parliament and they were kept in power by the help of the farmers' party. They did not have their eyelids in, and their eyes were closed, if they do not know they were kept in power by the farmers who sat to their left.

Mr. DUFF: Who is keeping you in power to-day?

Mr. ROWE: We were returned to this house with a substantial majority. Let me say to my hon. friends that they can ballyhoo this house sometimes, when there are not many members present, as on Friday nights, but they cannot ballyhoo the Dominion of Canada with respect to a government which has had a record of administration such as this government has had. They will not ballyhoo the people when the facts are shown in their true light. And no one knows this better than my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough. I used to see how he would sit down in the corner and flirt—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUFF: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) makes the statement that in 1925 and 1926 he saw me flirting with my hon. friends in the southeast corner. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that I never flirted with anybody. I have never agreed with the principles of my hon. friends in the southeast corner because, in my opinion, whether they are Tories or Liberals, or whatever they are, they should align themselves with one of the two great parties and not sit there doing nothing.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUFF: I am not through yet.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no point of order.

Mr. DUFF: I am rising to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member be good enough to state the point of order?

Mr. DUFF: My point of order is this: My hon. friend had no right to accuse me of flirting with the members in the far corner.

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. ROWE: I certainly withdraw that statement about flirting. I know that neither the hon. member for Southeast Grey nor other members would flirt with the hon. gentleman, and I realize that he has never flirted with anyone. But I know very well his party were kept in power by hon. members who came to this house hoping to get a solution of their marketing problems, and they had been promised on different occasions they would have assistance in the regulation of their products to overseas markets, and so forth. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) shakes his head. The Liberal party, I remember, kidnapped his first leader, Mr. Crerar, and brought him over to their fold; then his second leader, Mr. Forke, and last but not least they kidnapped the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) himself and brought him over with them also.

Mr. BROWN: It wasn't the Tory party that kidnapped the hon. member for Lisgar.

Mr. ROWE: I know the hon. member does not want to charge the Liberal party with the terrible crime of kidnapping, and I will recast that statement: he came quietly and slipped into a seat as near the front ranks of the Liberals as possible. He returned to his first love and left those with whom he was closely associated for many years. I repeat: In regard to every agrarian movement we have had in Canada since 1890, we have watched the Liberal party finally make their inroads into it and turn it from an agrarian and a cooperative movement into a Liberal force to help to return them to power. I see the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) smile; he remembers how the different leaders of the Progressive movement came over just as meekly as little children, and the hon. member for Lisgar knows full well that is why many Liberals perhaps in his own riding are a little doubtful of his present candidature in the coming election for fear he will again forsake another love.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I ask a question?

Mr. ROWE: No; I would like to ask my hon. friend a question before he asks his. I would like to ask him whether, if the Liberal party is returned to power, he will do all in his power absolutely to abrogate or annul the marketing act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Just as soon as the hon. member takes his seat, I will answer that question in detail. Will he permit a question?

Mr. ROWE: I might say that just as soon as the hon. member takes his seat, I will proceed.

Mr. DUFF: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ROWE: We have listened to the hon. member already; we have listened to his points of order.

Mr. DUFF: We have a clock or, in fact, three clocks in this chamber; we also have a rule that a member can speak for only forty minutes. We have enjoyed immensely the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, but he has been speaking now for fifty-seven minutes.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member cannot get away with that. I have not spoken fifty-seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, he can speak for only forty minutes, but every time he sits down he can speak for forty minutes more.

Mr. ROWE: May I thank the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough for extending my time by forty minutes although I do not propose to take that much time. I feel satisfied I have not taken thirty minutes yet, and the hon. member with interruptions has taken about as much of it as I have.

I know the hon. member for Northumberland, who is one of the ablest fruit producers in Ontario—and I have been amazed at what he has said with regard to the marketing act—will explain at some time how he can go to the fruit districts, the tobacco districts if you will, the fruit and vegetable producers, the hog producers.

Mr. DUFF: Order.

Mr. ROWE: As regards the forty minute rule, I have not taken forty minutes because I have been watching the clock and the hon. member has been sitting with his back to it.

Mr. DUFF: The hon. member has not said anything anyway.

Mr. ROWE: The hon. member has himself talked more and said less in the house than has any other hon. member. Surely I should have a chance to talk for a little while even if I do not say very much.

Mr. DUFF: I want a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, you have ruled on the point of order; you have ruled that I may proceed for forty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: Go ahead.

Mr. ROWE: I want to say further to the hon. member for Northumberland: Let him visit the Niagara peninsula, the Annapolis valley, the fruit and vegetable districts and the poultry districts of British Columbia, the grain districts of western Canada where the wheat pool has been in operation for years; let him look over the situation in Ontario where the marketing act is just beginning to work. He can point if he wishes to the unfortunate situation when the crop of apples is bad; he can blame the poor crop of apples on the present government.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I object; I did not blame that on the present government.

Mr. ROWE: No; the hon. member knows the present Prime Minister has nothing to do with the blight that spoils the crops. I withdraw the statement that he blames the government for that, but he will certainly say that the exports overseas were not as great as in years when crops were larger. Probably he will visit western Ontario and tell the people of Norfolk and Elgin: I am opposed to the marketing act. He probably has done this, but if he has not, he will say what he said in the house to-day and lead them to believe that if they support the Liberal party, the marketing act will be done away with. He will tell them that it is the beginning of fascism in this country.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I object to the hon. member putting words into my mouth.

Mr. ROWE: Did the hon. member not say that this was the beginning of fascism in this country?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Yes, but the hon. member a minute ago attributed to me words I did not say.

Mr. ROWE: Well, Hansard will prove to-morrow what was said.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Let the hon. member make his own speech; let him not make up one for me.

Mr. ROWE: Hansard will prove to-morrow what the hon. member has said. I certainly would not want to put words into his mouth. I know he mentioned its relationship to fascism. If he did not mean that it was the beginning of fascism, he meant that it would certainly encourage it. I hope he visits the Norfolk, Elgin and Oxford farmers, the men who have come here from other countries, have established themselves and are being assimilated into excellent citizens, and tells those people that this is the beginning of fascism and that if the Liberal party is returned to power, this act will be absolutely wiped out.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I did not say so.

Mr. ROWE: I imagine in some of the houses I have been in, they will talk to one another and say: What do you think of the Liberal party?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): That question was answered in four by-elections.

Mr. ROWE: It will be said: We produced about one-third less crop last year and despite world conditions, we got four or five million dollars more for it due to the marketing act. So they will say to themselves: If it means we have to take forty per cent less—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. As regards the point of order raised by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, the rule dcelares that even in committee no hon. member may speak for more than forty minutes following the same line of address. If an hon. member has finished his forty minute address and another hon. member interrupts him, he cannot for another forty minutes. The hon. member has now spoken for over fifty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN: As regards the point of order, at more than one period in the hon. gentleman's speech there were members who rose and spoke for several minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He just gave way in deference to a question.

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling was that there were hon. members who rose and spoke for more than one, two or three minutes; consequently, when the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) resumed, I permitted him to go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With the utmost respect, I say that the hon. gentleman gave way in deference to questions and interruptions from this side of the house. If he gives way he still maintains his right to continue his address. It would be ridiculous to say that when an hon. member is speaking he can continue for hours on end. That is not the intention of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN: Again I must say that in maintaining the rules the chair does not seek to favour one side any more than the other. I hope to be fair to both sides. But there were a number of times when not only were points of order raised but arguments were begun and finished on this side. Certainly on those occasions there was interruption of the speech of the hon. member, and from that time his time began over again.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): An hon. member who is addressing the committee does not have to give way except on a point of order and on the direction of the chair. That is not an interruption of the hon. member's address; therefore there is continuity as to the forty minutes. If you persist, sir, in the ruling, I must appeal from it.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I should like to say a few words about this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE: With all due deference, there can be no discussion on the ruling.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Am I out of order in saying a few words regarding the point of order?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): A ruling has been given, and I have appealed from it.

The CHAIRMAN: As leader of the house surely the right hon. gentleman is entitled—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the chairman definitely and finally ruled on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And I have appealed, therefore there is no further discussion.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If that is the rule I do not wish to break it. But my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was on the committee with me that made this rule, and I suggest it would be a pity that there should be an appeal from a ruling of the chair on a matter of this kind. Whether the ruling is or is not in order it is a matter that ought to be gone into carefully by a proper question to the Speaker regarding what the rule means in this respect.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The appeal goes to the Speaker.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, but I think it is a pity to have it go in this way, in a haphazard fashion as it were. The ex-Minister of Justice and I were both on the committee that prepared this rule, and I am free to admit that I have read it several times and am not sure exactly what the interpretation ought to be with regard to speeches in committee. That was not discussed in the rules committee, although we gave a great deal of attention to this matter. Suppose any hon.

member or any minister is discussing a matter in committee; he speaks for twenty-five or thirty minutes and then other questions intervene—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is different.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Excuse me. Other matters are discussed—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The same general discussion would start again.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: All I suggest to the ex-Minister of Justice and my hon. friends opposite is that this is a matter which might very well be put to the Speaker in the shape of a question the terms and wording of which would be carefully considered, not submitted in this haphazard fashion. If my hon. friends opposite wish to have the rule definitely clarified, it might be worth while to take a little time to prepare carefully a question to the Speaker as to the meaning of this rule in regard to the proceedings in committee.

Mr. ROWE: I object to this interference, because I had not spoken forty minutes, independently of interruptions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROWE: I have not talked forty minutes, Mr. Chairman; you have not ruled yet that I have talked forty minutes.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not the point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Even if my hon. friend had not spoken forty minutes, the chairman has given a certain ruling and I have appealed. We cannot consider the duration of my hon. friend's speech until that appeal is disposed of.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will permit, there is an appeal from the ruling, and my hon. friend could not speak until that is disposed of anyway. Personally I am quite willing to agree with my right hon. friend as to the course he suggests, provided that in the meantime my hon. friend yields to what is being asked from the chair and that somebody else takes the floor—at eleven o'clock.

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, I call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the hon. member cannot call it eleven o'clock. You must deal, sir, with my appeal.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 5, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

2. At what date was the said embargo removed?
3. Why was the said embargo placed, and why was it removed?
4. After the removal of the embargo, were Canadian farmers relieved from the formalities to which they were subject owing to the enforcement of this measure?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort):

1. The export of hay from Canada was made subject to licence by order in council P.C. 1966, published in the Canada Gazette August 24, 1934.

2. The provisions of this order in council were rescinded as from Feb. 1, 1935.

3. It seemed evident in August, 1934, that speculators were becoming active in their efforts to contract for hay for export which might result in a serious feed shortage for the farm stock in several areas in Canada without corresponding benefit to the producers. It was believed that order in council P.C. 1966 had accomplished the purpose for which it was intended and it was considered to be no longer necessary to require licences for export hay.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

Mr. SPENCER:

As the rate of interest on new loans being made under the Farm Loan Act is to be 5 per cent, is it the intention of the farm loan board to reduce interest to this figure on loans previously made?

Mr. RHODES: I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that this question contravenes the rules of the house in that it makes an allegation of fact. Furthermore, it also asks the farm loan board to disclose a decision before it has been reached.

Question dropped.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS—PAYMENTS TO WORKMEN ON VARIOUS WORKS

Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. The name of each workman or labourer engaged in the construction of a telegraphic system, east of Pentecôte, on the north shore of the Saint-Lawrence, in 1934.

2. The number of days each man worked.

3. The total amount paid to each man.

4. The date on which the Department of Public Works or the local foreman or superintendent of the said works paid each of the said workmen or labourers engaged in the said works.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that this return and the succeeding 21 returns would, if given effect to, involve the expenditure of large sums of money. It would be impossible to have these returns made during the present session of parliament. Usually information of this kind is obtained from the public accounts committee of the house because the auditor general's report sets out in detail the payments that are made. This is an unusual return to be asked for as it involves considerable toil and the expenditure of large sums of money for something which may not be of much public value. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman has considered his motion from the standpoint of the amount of labour and the expenditures involved but if there is any information he would like to have, the various files could be made available, which would represent the minimum of expense and labour. Possibly he has not thought of this matter from that standpoint, if he has, well and good, if he has not, I should like him to do so.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Speaker, with your permission I should like to say a word or two. I do not think there would be much work involved in making these returns. I am only asking for the list of employees and the wages paid. I have been given to understand that on many of these works only a few men have been employed and in many instances the time of construction was quite short. A few years ago, I made a motion for a return involving the production of correspondence and other records and I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) would be quite right in opposing such a motion as it would have involved considerable work. But this motion is different, it involves only the production of a simple sheet of paper giving the names of the workmen and the amounts they have received.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member desires to press his motion, it is the duty of the house to see that he gets the information that he seeks. I am only pointing out to him what it will involve in the way of the expenditure of public money.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Casgrain the following returns were also ordered:

RIVIÈRE OUELLE QUE. WHARF

Mr. BOUCHARD:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, letters, telegrams, tenders, reports of investigation, paylists and invoices in the possession of the dominion government since 1931 in connection with repairing the wharf at Rivière Ouelle (Pointe aux Orignaux), county of Kamouraska.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a reservation which I have endeavoured to secure with respect to returns of this character. It concerns the confidential reports which are made and should not be produced until they have been embodied in some report.

Motion agreed to.

STE-ANNE DE LA POCATIÈRE QUE. WHARF

Mr. BOUCHARD:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, documents, telegrams, reports of investigation, paylists and invoices in the possession of the dominion government in connection with repairing or improving the wharf at Ste-Anne de la Pocatière, county of Kamouraska, during the calendar years 1934 and 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: There will be the same reservation in connection with this motion.

Motion agreed to.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. H. RHODES (Minister of Finance): The other day the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) submitted a question with respect to instructions, if any, which had been issued to receivers under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I find that they have been specifically instructed not to call meetings, but they have been asked wherever possible to attend meetings held by farmers' organizations or boards of trade or municipal organizations or other public organizations of a similar character with the sole object of explaining the purposes, objects and operation of the act.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Have they been instructed to invite farmers to come in under the act?

Mr. RHODES: No, unless making the farmers aware of the nature of the act might be termed an invitation; they are not instructed to solicit.

GLOUCESTER RETURNING OFFICER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): In connection with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) as to the political activities of the returning officer for Gloucester, I desire to state that I am making inquiries into the facts and will reply later on.

Hon. PETER VENIOT (Gloucester): I based my statement upon what I saw in the press.

Mr. CAHAN: Naturally before the Secretary of State can take any definite action, he also should inquire into the matter.

REVALUATION OF GOLD RESERVES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): On May 29 the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) submitted to the Prime Minister a question with respect to an order in council as to the valuation of gold. I desire by leave of the house to table a copy.

DOMINION NOTES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Yesterday the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) submitted a question as to whether the Dominion Notes Act had been repealed. It has. Both the Dominion Notes Act and the Finance Act were repealed and proclamation was accordingly issued in the Canada Gazette as of March 11.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What was the date of the repeal?

Mr. RHODES: The date the Bank of Canada came into operation.

CANADIAN GRAIN BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Having in mind what was said by the Prime Minister some days ago and what now appears on the order paper, I assume that the house has before it notice at least of practically all the legislation which the government intends to introduce before the close of the session. I wish to say to my right hon. friend that if, with respect to one or two of these matters, we were aware of the intention of the government, I think it would be possible for us to expedite the proceedings of the house with a view to having them brought to a close at a fairly early date. There is one resolution which was placed on the order paper by the government on March 4; it has reference to the establishment of a Canadian grain board. I might say that the members on this side have refrained from questioning the government with respect to this particular resolution, appreciating the fact that there are many circumstances which will have to be very carefully considered and that the whole situation is a very delicate one. I think, however, it is advisable, that there should be, owing to its importance, a full discussion of the situation, before the house rises. I therefore ask my right hon. friend at once if he is in a position to say whether or not the government intends to proceed with the resolution, and whether we may expect that an opportunity will be given at a fairly early date to discuss the matters related thereto.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I appreciate the terms in which the right hon. gentleman has spoken and his desire and that of his associates to expedite the business of the house. If it will be satisfactory, barring unforeseen circumstances, we will proceed with the grain board resolution on Monday next as the first order of business. I think the desire was to get through with as many of these, shall I say, more formal matters, and to proceed with this one as soon as possible. I would have proceeded with it before, but as the right hon. gentleman knows unforeseen circumstances in connection with the illness of many people have had their effect—not my own illness particularly but that of others as well. If, therefore, it is quite satisfactory, we will proceed with the resolution on Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Thank you.

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Can the Minister of Finance tell me whether an official has been appointed for the province of British Columbia under the Farm Loan Act? If so, when was the appointment made and to whom was it given?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): I should not care to rely on my memory and give an answer at the moment. I will reply to-morrow.

COOPERATIVE SOCIETIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): With respect to the question asked by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) yesterday, the provisions of the Marketing Act as amended at the present session meet the recommendations of the price spreads commission.

HOUSING COMMITTEE'S REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May we expect legislation implementing the report of the housing committee?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): there is a resolution on the order paper with respect to it. The resolution will indicate the extent to which the government is prepared to go at the present session and the legislation will amplify that more fully.

GRADE CROSSINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways): The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) has been asking a number of times regarding grade eliminations. I have the information he desires. It is to the effect that since the first of January, 1933, twenty-two crossings or forty-one per cent of those eliminated were urban and thirty-two or fifty-nine per cent were rural. In Hansard of yesterday I gave the hon. gentleman some information but unfortunately the figures were turned round by mistake. The correct division should have been seventy per cent rural and thirty per cent urban; the figures were reversed in Hansard by mistake.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would it be convenient to get a list of the crossings—the locations?

Mr. MANION: I will endeavour to do that.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SEIZURE OF SCHOONER PAUL T.—DISCREPANCY BETWEEN ANSWER TABLED AND ANSWER HANDED TO MEMBER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. C. MATTHEWS (Minister of National Revenue): On May 28, on the orders of the day, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) drew my attention to a question asked on January 17 last, relative to the seizure of the schooner "Paul T", and referred particularly to the discrepancy between the official answer to the third part of his question, as tabled in the house on January 24 and appearing on page 157 of Hansard of that day, and the answer which was handed to him by officials of the house. I was absent from the house and was not in Ottawa in the month of January when this question was answered and consequently was not in a position to discuss the matter when my hon. friend referred to it a few days ago.

However, I have now made very careful inquiry and have ascertained that an answer to the hon. member's question was prepared in the department in the usual way. On being reviewed, prior to tabling in the house, it was felt that the answer to the third part of the question might not be considered quite adequate and accordingly a new answer was prepared in the form in which it appears in Hansard. The only reasonable explanation I can offer for the delivery to my hon. friend by officials of the house of the copy of the answer as originally drafted rather than as finally tabled is that in tabling the official answer a copy of the original draft must have been inadvertently attached thereto. In these circumstances I can merely express my regret for the incident and for any inconvenience it may have caused my hon. friend.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am prepared to accept the explanation of the Minister of National Revenue, because I realize that at that time he was incapacitated through illness and perhaps could not give that attention to the matter which it required. But the explanation as to how the official answer, which after all is the official document, reached my hand, is not satisfactory. Under standing order 44, (2) (b) provides:

> If a member does not distinguish his question by an asterisk, the minister to whom the question is addressed hands the answer to the Clerk of the House, who causes it to be printed in the official reports of the debates.

The answer sent to me through one of the pages, after it had been placed on the table, had no attachment whatever to it; it was the simple answer usually given and with the minister's name attached to it. The answer as it appears in Hansard could not have passed through the hands of the officials of this house. If it had, that would have been handed to me. It was not handed to me. The only document that passed through their hands and that was handed to me in answer to the third question contained this reply: "No specific instructions."

The question arises: How did this additional or improved answer, after the department had made the first answer and considered it not sufficiently full, reach Hansard? It is due to the house, as a protection which every member has a right to have, that any answer handed officially to any member should not be other than that which appears in Hansard. I claim as a privilege not only to me but to every hon. member and we have a right to find out how it is that that document got into Hansard in the way it did. It never, I am informed, passed over the tables of the house in that shape. It passed over the tables of the house only in the shape in which it was handed to me.

When that answer was handed to me, I considered it very serious, and based upon it, a few days later I made a certain charge in the house. That charge was investigated. I am not going to discuss to-day the process of that investigation; I shall do so at some future date. Had I received the answer that appeared in Hansard which pointed out that the vessel in question had been seized by the provincial government and afterwards handed over to the dominion authorities for action on the part of the preventive service or the Department of National Revenue, I would have hesitated to make the statement I made in the house. When I got the plain and straight answer that no specific instructions had been given for the destruction of the food stores, I felt justified, with the information in my possession, to make the charge I did.

Later on I am brought face to face with what appears in Hansard, an answer that never was given on the floor of the house, and it is demanded of me to prove the charge in the face of the answer that was given in the house as appearing in Hansard, when that answer, I repeat, was never given here. This is not treating an hon. member in an honest, fair and equitable way; when such a thing is allowed to take place, how can we depend upon the truthfulness of Hansard as it appears as an official record of this house? Is it possible to depend upon Hansard in the future if such tactics as those are allowed to take place in the House of Commons? Under those conditions I must protest and I must ask that further information be given to the house as to how that answer got into Hansard instead of the one that was officially given to me across the table.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): The hon. member for Gloucester has made a suggestion which involves me as Secretary of State.

Mr. VENIOT: I made no suggestion at all; I stated the facts.

Mr. CAHAN: That is what I am dealing with.

Mr. VENIOT: Well, deal with the facts.

Mr. CAHAN: That is what I am dealing with, but there is another side to those facts. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) was absent during a period of several weeks, and during that time the documents which he had to submit to the house were sent to me to be submitted. On a certain date which I have forgotten, three copies of an answer were given to me by his private secretary to lay on the table of the house. I did not send across the table any reply to the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. VENIOT: I did not say the hon. member did.

Mr. CAHAN: I remember distinctly that three copies of the answer were included together with a binder or a pin as I handed them in. It appears that one of those copies was a first draft of an answer prepared in error which had been discarded, but what was handed in by me to the Clerk of the House was undoubtedly sent to Hansard by the clerk. The difficulty arose by reason of the fact that what was handed to the hon. member for Gloucester was a first draft which had been submitted to me some time before and which I had asked to have revised. The mistake was entirely one on my part, for which I have to take responsibility. There were no tactics concerning the matter; it was simply that I handed to the Clerk of House a copy for his records, a copy for Hansard and what I believed to be the same copy to be handed to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. VENIOT: It was very conveniently given to me.

Mr. CAHAN: It was given to the hon. member as a matter of courtesy because I am not bound to hand in three copies. I am bound to lay on the table of the house one copy, but since I have acted as Secretary of State, as a matter of courtesy, I have annexed two copies to the official return, one for the member proposing the question and one copy for the convenience of Hansard.

Mr. VENIOT: It has always been the practice in the house to hand in three copies.

Mr. CAHAN: That may be, but I have seen that that practice is not always followed. However I have adhered to it strictly. If any mistake was made, it was entirely inadvertent and there were no tactics indulged in. The reply which I had signed with my own signature was the one which was sent to Hansard and which was published there. I regret very much if any inadvertent mistake of mine has caused the hon. gentleman inconvenience, but if he had looked at Hansard on the following day he would have seen what the official reply was.

Mr. VENIOT: I really think I ought to be allowed some latitude in this matter as I am the party who has been affected and has suffered on account of it. The Secretary of State says that I should have looked at Hansard on the following day to see what the official reply was. Why should I be called upon to look at Hansard when I have the official answer and have placed it upon my file? That is what I relied upon. May I say also that unrevised Hansard is not accepted in evidence as proof and, as an unrevised edition of Hansard, it is not an official document until after a certain period. I did not look at Hansard; it has not been my habit to scan Hansard every day. Even when I make a speech, I very seldom read it over in Hansard. Perhaps it would have been better for me had I adopted the practice of reading over in Hansard everything I had said or that others had said in which I was interested. By doing so I would perhaps have discovered errors that creep into the reports of things I have said in this house, inadvertently no doubt by the reporters, which reports I should have looked at myself in order to have corrected. I repeat that I received what was given to me across the table of the house, handed to me in the usual way which has been the practice for years and years. I accepted it, as every hon. member would have done, as the official record of this house, and when the Secretary of State says that he had three copies it is very clear that the only copy that was wrong was the one that was handed to me. I am not attempting to blame him, I do not know who is to blame, but I repeat that an injustice has been done to me personally and to the members of this house in general, and I claim that the matter should in some way be rectified. I do not accept the explanations given here this afternoon as sufficient to justify what was done.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the observations made reflect upon the conduct of the business of the house. The question divides itself into two branches; first, was there a question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot); second, was it answered. The records show that the question was asked, and that it was answered by the Secretary of State. The answer given appears in Hansard. Two copies of the answer were handed to the clerk of the house; one for Hansard, one for the clerk. One other copy, which has no bearing upon the official position in the house at all, was handed to the hon. member for Gloucester. It was his business to see that the official record and what he had in his hand were the same.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Pardon me, the rules of the house are clear, that the official answer to that question is in Hansard—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BENNETT: —and nowhere else.

An hon. MEMBER: Cheating!

Mr. BENNETT: I heard an hon. gentleman say "cheating," but that is not cheating. If he will reflect he will see that the only official records are the Votes and Proceedings and Hansard itself. Hansard is the official record of this particular matter. To contend that because he received something that was not in accordance with what appeared upon the official record of the house is a violation of the rules of the house, is incorrect. If there is any question I shall, of course, direct that an inquiry be held to see if the record in Hansard is the record handed in by the minister in answer to the question. If it is, that settles the question. If the hon. gentleman received something that was not quite in accordance with the answer, that cannot be blamed against the house nor the conduct of the business of the house. But in his first statement this afternoon the hon. gentleman charged that Hansard could not be relied on—

Mr. VENIOT: No, I said if this is to continue. Do not put words in my mouth that I did not say. I have enough to bear now, I will not stand for that, even from the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the hon. gentleman says that he will not stand for that. If I have done him any injustice in what I said I certainly desire to withdraw it. I heard what he said very distinctly. I say, if there is any question as to the accuracy of Hansard in transcribing the question in the terms in which the answer was given, we will have an inquiry without delay. That is the real issue, whether or not the official record of this house correctly represents the answer given to the question. If it does, then it is purely a matter, as the Secretary of State has explained, between himself and the hon. member for Gloucester. That is all that there is about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The question is, why two answers were given.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not two answers, one answer. With all deference, if the hon. member will reflect a moment he will see that there could be only one answer given—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There should have been one, there were two.

Mr. BENNETT: —that was the answer in Hansard. If what is handed across the table happens not to agree with the official answer that is unfortunate, but it does not change the fact that the official record is Hansard.

But all I rose to say is that in view of the observations concerning Hansard it becomes necessary that there should be no question of the position of the Hansard reporters and the accuracy of the record. I shall endeavour to secure the original and have it brought to the house, and after that make a statement as to whether or not it accords with the answer upon the pages of Hansard or whether there has been any alteration or change.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I interrupt? I understood the Secretary of State to say that the previous statement from the department was discarded. That proves my suggestion that there were two answers—

Mr. CAHAN: No, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BENNETT: I have the floor. In chapter 4 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, on Questions, section 2, paragraph (b) reads:

> If a member does not distinguish his question by an asterisk, the minister to whom the question is addressed hands the answer to the Clerk of the House who causes it to be printed in the official reports of the debates.

The issue, therefore, is, was that answer that was printed in the record handed to the Clerk of the House? In view of the observations that have been made as to the accuracy of that I propose to direct an inquiry to ascertain if that is so. If it has been, the rules of this house have been strictly complied with.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I do not think there is any question about the accuracy of Hansard, having regard to what the hon. member for Gloucester himself has said. Is not the issue rather whether the hon. member for Gloucester was not justified in regarding as the same answer as appeared on Hansard the one which came to him from the same source as that from which Hansard received its answer? The good faith of the hon. member for Gloucester in accepting what came to him from the government as being the same as what the government had handed to Hansard cannot be questioned. I do not think there can be any doubt that he accepted what he received in good faith, and was so entitled to view the matter; and there can be no doubt, from what the Secretary of State has said, that what was handed to him was handed to him in error, and was not the same as was given to Hansard.

Mr. CAHAN: No, it was the first prepared answer; which I read over, and, as I was not satisfied with that answer, I sent it back to have that answer reconsidered. Subsequently, I think on the following day, there was sent to me by the department the answer which was the official answer of the department. Now it would appear that on my desk here my papers may be somewhat confused, but when I give an answer I must take the responsibility for it. I handed to a page for the Clerk of the House the official answer signed by me, because I always sign the original copy; and as I picked up the other two copies I inadvertently picked up one of the copies that I had previously discarded. That was an inadvertence, there were no tactics about it, there was no design, and no one could regret more than I that in dealing with these documents I apparently inadvertently annexed one of the four copies which I was discarding to the official copies which I handed in on that occasion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask a question? Was the discarded answer prepared by an official of the Department of National Revenue?

Mr. CAHAN: The first reply which came to me was prepared by the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is enough, that proves everything.

Mr. CAHAN: But in these cases it is my duty as Secretary of State to examine these replies to see whether they conform to the request, and I endeavour to do so in each case. Day after day when answers and reports come to me from various departments, if I think they are not comprehensive enough, or, if by some inadvertence a mistake occurs, I send them back to the department for revision, because the official report which is handed in is signed by me as Secretary of State, and I have to take full personal responsibility in respect to it.

B.C. RELIEF CAMP STRIKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) if he has any information to give the house with respect to the march on Ottawa of the relief camp strikers from British Columbia. I am prompted to ask the question by a statement which appeared in the Canadian Press this morning to the effect that the mounted police expect to get in contact with the vanguard of the strikers at Kamloops. As this is a matter of considerable importance to the country I should like to know the answer.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour): The only information the Department of Labour has with respect to the so called trek of strikers is what appears in the press. So far as I am aware no communication has been received by the department from any official or unofficial source.

Mr. JACOBS: May I point out that the press dispatch states that the mounted police in British Columbia are watching the movement. Have the government any information in that regard?

Mr. GORDON: I have no doubt the hon. member is aware that very likely the mounted police, in the course of their duties, would watch such a performance as these men apparently are staging, but so far as the Department of Labour is concerned we have no official knowledge of it.

FEED AND SEED GRAIN EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), and if he has not the information I suppose he will be able to obtain it. How much hay, straw, feed and seed grain left each of the western provinces during the past season for the United States?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The information requested by the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) is not on the records of the Department of Agriculture; I doubt if all the information is on the records of the Department of National Revenue. Some of it should be there, however, and I shall gladly direct my hon. friend's question to the attention of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 83, to amend the customs tariff.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Extension of most favoured foreign nation treatment.

Mr. RHODES: When we were in committee on the resolutions certain information was sought by several hon. members which I promised to give when the bill was in the committee stage. The first question was by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), who wanted the latest statistics with respect to the aeroplane industry in Canada, available from the bureau of statistics. These are for the year 1933, in which year the value of production in Canada was $103,532, and the aircraft produced numbered thirteen. Supplies and parts produced were valued at $102,863. Then my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth requested certain information as to the imports of fasteners dealt with under item 451e of the tariff. I find that it is not possible to segregate fasteners of the hookless or zipper type from other fasteners, clasps, buckles and so on. The only data available is that covering the entire item 451. Imports of zipper fasteners, therefore, were a part of the total thereunder. In 1933-34 that total amounted to $221,285.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that the production?

Mr. RHODES: No, the importation. For 1934-35 the importation totalled $285,302. These imports were made up as follows:

	1933-34	1934-35
United States	$147,902	$148,159
Czechoslovakia	12,718	64,443
United Kingdom	51,537	60,028
Germany	3,429	5,943
Belgium	4,091	5,083

A further question dealt with the number employed in the industry in Canada. According to the information supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics production figures for zipper type fasteners are available, and the bureau gives such data for the calendar year 1934 as follows: Number of employees, 115; salaries and wages, $123,815; value of product, $319,979. Three firms reported the production of such fasteners, and the data quoted is derived from their returns to the bureau. The hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) submitted a question with respect to the same article; he queried as to whether the three firms or companies in Canada were or were not under one control. My information is that the plants are not under one control and, further, that the plants are not working under the same patent.

My hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) also wished me to furnish information as to the number of tariff items in the budget affected as the result of reports of the tariff board. I have the list here, as follows:

Item	Commodity
39	Starch
39d	Resin sizing
65a	Diabetic breads
66a	Biscuits
199e	Caps or hoods of paper
232e	Cereal products (as adhesives)
255	British gum or dextrines
362b	Toilet articles
384	Skelp
386r	Cold rolled strip
401d, 402c	Certain gauges of fence wire
451, 451e	Certain fasteners and clasps
506b	Wooden doors
554b, 556a, 556b	Wool fabrics
569 (all sections)	Hats and hoods
571a	Cocoa mats and matting
603	Fur skins
1024	Drawback item on wire rods

These total twenty-eight items. I think this covers all the questions which were submitted to me when we were in committee on the resolutions.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a word to gather up the information which my hon. friend has given with regard to item 451e, slide, hookless or zipper fasteners, on which the duty has been increased ten per cent. My hon. friend gave the number of employees in this industry in 1934 as 115, and the amount of wages paid as $123,815. There were imported into Canada in that year $285,000 worth of these goods, and there were made in Canada $319,000 worth, a total of $604,000. Taking that total amount at twenty per cent, which I think was the rate of duty then, would mean that the people of Canada have paid practically the full wage bill of the industry in increased prices. In other words, whoever the firm or firms are, they have received in increased prices practically the full amount of their wage bill, and by increasing the duty another ten per cent it means that as against a wage bill of $123,000 in 1934 they would receive with the new rate of duty $180,000 in increased prices. The minister may say that I am unfair in that I am including in that figure the amount of goods which were imported. Perhaps I should not say that the amount which the firms receive will be increased by that figure; the amount which would be paid in increased prices by the people of Canada would be $120,000 under the present tariff and $180,000 under the proposed increase, a portion of which would go into the treasury of Canada, but the greater portion of it would go to the firms who are making this commodity. I submit that there should be the strictest inquiry as to the value of the industry to Canada as compared with the amount of taxes which are imposed on Canadian consumers in order to keep up this industry by means of the increased protection granted.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, one could discuss at length the question to what extent the statement of my hon. friend is true, that the purchaser or importer pays the duty. If my hon. friend is right in assuming that the duty is in all cases paid by the purchaser or importer, then his statement upon that point would hold good, but as my hon. friend knows, it by no means follows that because the duty is twenty per cent or any other percentage it is paid entirely by the purchaser or importer. My hon. friend no doubt knows, as I do myself, of cases where the importer pays not a cent of the duty, and of other cases where it is divided. But I do not think this is the particular place to debate the point. I only wish to say to my hon. friend and to the committee that whether the decision qua tariff with respect to this item is right or not it is after all based upon the finding of the tariff board after exhaustive inquiry and report, and the basis of their finding, as evidenced by their report, was the relative cost of production of the same commodity in other countries as compared with the cost of production in Canada. Having said so much, in view of the statement which I made before that it has been the policy of the government to implement the findings of the tariff board in all instances, I think nothing further need be said. In other words, we must assume that the tariff board is properly performing its functions, and that being so, I do not want to go behind their findings. Having confidence in the board I propose to pursue in the future the course I have followed in the past of accepting their reports and implementing them by legislation.

Mr. BROWN: A few days ago when the house was being moved into supply I mentioned some complaints that had been made against the rulings of the Department of National Revenue, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said on that occasion that I would have full opportunity to discuss the matter later. Neither the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) nor the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was in the house at the time. I regret that the Minister of National Revenue has just left the chamber, but I might draw attention—

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing that my hon. friend from Lisgar should bring the matter up now, but it might perhaps be more in order for him to submit it on Bill No. 82, amending the Excise Act, which deals amongst other things with matters of administration in the Department of National Revenue. I do not, however, take exception to my hon. friend bringing the matter up now if the chairman does not.

Mr. BROWN: I am quite willing to meet the minister's pleasure, but I hope that the Minister of National Revenue will be in the house at the time.

Mr. RHODES: I shall endeavour to see whether my colleague can be present when the matter comes up.

Mr. POULIOT: I was told this afternoon that the government secured information from the tariff board in regard to the increases and decreases in duty that have taken place since 1930, but as the announcement of the appointment of the personnel of the board was not made in this house until February, 1933, may I ask the Minister of Finance who advised the government in regard to the increases and decreases in the tariff that took place from August 1, 1930, until the tariff board was appointed in February, 1933?

Mr. RHODES: The government must take full responsibility for any changes it initiates, and I have no hesitation in saying that the government is quite prepared to undertake that responsibility.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand that very well, but during the period mentioned did the members of the government inform themselves through any other agency or organization than the tariff board with regard to the tariff increases and decreases it enacted?

Mr. RHODES: There are permanent officials of the department with wide experience and great knowledge whose services are always available and are always availed of by the government, and I think that statement holds true not only with respect to this government but with respect to preceding governments.

Mr. POULIOT: But how did they get the information? They must have got it from someone. From whom did they get it? From the manufacturers, or from consumers?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot answer that question. Obviously there are numerous sources of information available—statistics of imports and exports and of manufactures. A thousand and one details are all a matter of record in the department and they may be obtained from numerous sources.

Mr. REID: Has the minister looked into the question of the sales tax on the peat industry in British Columbia? The last time this measure was under consideration I appealed to the minister regarding the six per cent sales tax as applied to peat moss.

Mr. RHODES: More properly my hon. friend's question would come under the war revenue bill, when we are dealing with the sales tax. At the moment I cannot rely on my memory as to the precise status of the matter. My recollection is that it has not been dealt with, but we shall know when we come to deal with the war revenue bill.

Mr. COOTE: When the budget resolutions were before the committee I took advantage of that fact to urge a reduction of the tariff on aeroplanes. Since then I have received a letter from Fairchild Aircraft Limited in which they seem to feel that some of the statements made here were not quite fair to that particular company, and in fairness to the company I should like the privilege of quoting briefly two or three paragraphs from their letter. They say:

> We note in the press your remarks made in the House of Commons on May 31, in connection with the tariff as applied to aircraft. We read these with great interest, as it is gratifying to know that the part which aircraft can play in the development of Canada is being recognized. There are one or two points on which you have however been misinformed, and we take the liberty of submitting for your consideration a brief description of the activities of this company, which is but one unit of the Canadian aircraft industry.
> With the exception of engines, we completely manufacture in every detail aircraft designed by our own engineering staff, and we believe the aircraft we produce are better suited to Canadian flying conditions than any obtainable elsewhere.
> We have been in continuous operation since 1930 and at the present time employ 135 men. The payrolls for 1934 totalled $81,000 and we expect this figure will be doubled this year.

I asked the minister if he could give us any information with regard to the production of aeroplanes in Canada during the last two years but he did not have the information before him. He has given us the figures for 1933 and I have put part of this letter on Hansard so that this company might know that I did not intend to misinform the house in connection with the development of the industry in Canada. A few days ago I was asked the price quoted by the Bellanca aircraft company for one of their machines. I did not have the information before me but for the benefit of the hon. member who asked the question I should like to quote a paragraph from a letter I received from this company, as follows:

> Enclosed are specifications for the latest type of Bellanca pacemaker, using a Wright engine. You will note that the horsepower is 420 and not 340. These are the latest developments and give comparative performance characteristic of all Bellancas.
> The price as a convertible land-seaplane, including Edo pontoons with all fittings and including all taxes, flyaway Montreal, is $29,310.

I wanted this information to appear on Hansard for the benefit of hon. members who are interested.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am glad the hon. member has made this statement in connection with the Fairchild Aircraft Limited factory which is located in my constituency. I was not in the house the other day when my hon. friend made the statement that the aeroplane factories in Canada were only assembling plants or I would have corrected him. Fairchild Aircraft Limited have been building aeroplanes for many years on the south shore of the St. Lawrence. They have a complete plant and they build the whole machine with the exception of the engine. They employ between one and two hundred people all the year round.

On section 4—Power to restore duties which have been reduced on liquors.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Is this the first time an attempt to control prices in the interests of the consumer has been made under the provisions of the customs tariff?

Mr. RHODES: The matter of dealing with duties by order in council is not new but this phase is new. It is introduced merely for the purpose of ensuring that the object of the reduction in the duty will be fulfilled. Otherwise we would be in the hands of the provincial liquor commissions which might set at naught the reductions made.

Mr. BROWN: Can the minister give us any assurance that the reduction in the excise and the customs duty on liquors will secure the result which he hopes to secure, the stopping of bootlegging? Can he tell us that or is it all a matter of guesswork as to just what the result will be?

Mr. RHODES: I am surprised at such a consistent exponent of the doctrice of lower duties and freer trade asking whether a reduction in duty will mean a reduction in the cost of the article. We believe that if the price of liquor is placed at a figure where the ordinary man who desires to purchase feels that he is able to do so, he will prefer to purchase sound liquor from a legitimate source such as a liquor commission rather than to run the risk of buying an unsound commodity through illicit channels. While I do not believe we have gone far enough, to the extent to which we have gone I think we will contribute to eliminating the illicit sale and purchase of liquors.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to revert to section 3. If this section is invoked for the purpose of reducing duties, is it the intention of the government to bring to parliament for ratification any trade agreement which embodies those reductions in the tariff?

Mr. RHODES: As my hon. friend is aware, if it is a full treaty it comes to parliament as a matter of course, but I believe the practice in the past has been not to bring to parliament those matters which are dealt with by order in council under section 11.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot speak with authority as to the practice in the past but I submit that it is the constitutional practice to bring to parliament any treaty or agreement which affects statutory provisions. I understand that there is a blanket provision here which permits the reduction of duties but at the same time I have always understood that trade agreements were brought to parliament as a matter of constitutional practice.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, or treaties.

Mr. RALSTON: Ratification is asked for as a matter of constitutional practice although possibly not as a matter of strict legal necessity.

Mr. RHODES: Concessions have been made by order in council which were not brought to parliament for the purposes of ratification, although parliament is entitled to the information. The action taken by order in council by virtue of this section is operative but it is always subject to the overriding action of parliament. Do I understand my hon. friend to suggest that in all cases the action taken should be brought to parliament for ratification?

Mr. RALSTON: I am distinguishing constitutional practice from legal necessity. I understand that trade agreements and trade treaties are brought to parliament for ratification as a matter of course notwithstanding the fact that the governor in council might have the power under some blanket authority such as section 11 to conclude an arrangement for the reduction of duties. I want to know if that practice will be followed.

Mr. RHODES: I think my hon. friend and I are in agreement as to what is the strict constitutional or legal condition with respect to trade treaties or agreements, and I shall not discuss that matter at the moment. That is the practice which was obtained, that is the practice which should obtain and that is the practice which will be followed. Beyond that there are certain actions taken by order in council which are neither trade agreements nor treaties. In the past these matters have not been brought to parliament for ratification, though parliament should have the information; but I can assure my hon. friend that it is our purpose to adhere strictly to the practice which has obtained hitherto with respect to treaties and trade agreements.

Mr. RALSTON: Can the minister mention any instance in which it has not been done?

Mr. RHODES: For example, we passed to Australia and South Africa under this section by order in council concessions by way of reduction in duty as a result of the operation of the French treaty. That would be a case in point illustrative of what I had in mind when I spoke of action other than by trade treaties or trade agreements.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think that would be under section 11 because under this section the provision is that the governor in council may reduce duties by way of compensation for concessions received from the particular country in whose favour the duties are reduced, and the application of the French treaty provisions to Australia would not bring it within that category.

Mr. RHODES: In that case there was a specific concession on the part both of South Africa and of Australia.

Mr. RALSTON: As regards the amendment made by section 3, whereby the word "concessions" is introduced, has the minister anything particular in mind in that respect? What is the nature of the concessions other than reduction in duties which it is contemplated might permit the governor in council to take action under section 11.

Mr. RHODES: Australia would be a case particularly in point. We could not strictly say in that instance that they had reduced the duty, which would enable us to make a corresponding reduction here, but they gave us a concession by way of margin which was one of real value to us, though strictly speaking it was not a reduction in duty. That is why there is this amendment. It is really, in a sense, widening the spirit of the section—perhaps that is not the correct language. It is carrying out the intent and purpose of the section, but changing the verbiage to meet the condition I have referred to.

Mr. RALSTON: What I had in mind was whether or not a concession by way of a treaty respecting the St. Lawrence waterways, for instance, would be regarded as a concession under section 11 and so enable the governor in council to reduce tariffs as a quid pro quo.

Mr. RHODES: That would be a question of fact. I should not care for a moment to attempt to follow the interpretation to its furthest ramifications, but I say in all deference to the committee that it would be a question of fact and of interpretation as to whether it would be a concession coming properly within the spirit and the intent of the section.

Mr. EULER: I understand from the remarks of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and of the reply given by the minister that the governor in council has authority to reduce the tariff, for which we may receive some concession from some other country. My impression is—and this is the point on which I should like to have information—that the governor in council has authority to make reductions whether a concession is received from some other country or not. It might be deemed in the interests of Canada alone to reduce the tariff, without reference to the circumstances affecting other countries.

Mr. RHODES: That is all right; there is always the sovereign right of this or any other country to take such tariff action as it chooses. Parliament is supreme.

Mr. EULER: I mean the governor in council.

Mr. RHODES: I am following the argument. Section 11 of the Customs Tariff has specific reference to reciprocal tariff reductions and the wording is:

> The governor in council may by order in council make such reductions of duties on goods imported into Canada from any other country or countries as may be deemed reasonable by way of compensation for reductions on Canadian products granted by any such country or countries.

Mr. EULER: But they could do it in any event, whether they got a concession or not.

Mr. RHODES: Certainly; there is always the sovereign right of parliament in the matter. But we are dealing with reciprocal action between two countries, without parliament. That is all that section 11 is for. Here, instead of using the words "reductions on Canadian products" we say "concessions"; that is the change.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there any objection to making that "tariff concessions" rather than merely "concessions"?

Mr. RHODES: I know of no immediate objection to the use of those words except that it makes the operation of the section unduly restrictive. There might very well be some other consideration which would be deemed of value to this country and which would warrant making a concession by way of the tariff. I can readily see that a situation of that sort might arise. It might be a question of margin, for example.

Mr. RALSTON: But it is a tariff concession.

Mr. RHODES: Yes, it is a concession. I do not press the matter at all. I would be content to take the phrasing my hon. friend suggests. I see no objection, if it is a real concession given us by another country, why we should not be able to go beyond the bounds of customs action alone.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to have the matter made clear with respect to what may be pending in the way of negotiations. We were advised the other day by the Prime Minister that negotiations respecting a trade agreement with the United States were still proceeding but might not be concluded before the close of the session. As I understand the minister, if anything in the form of an agreement were entered into between the United States and Canada, following constitutional practice that agreement would have to be submitted to parliament for approval. On the other hand, it is possible that the negotiations proceeding between the two countries might take the form of some reduction of tariffs on each side, in which event the reduction of tariff on one side would be regarded as a compensation or concession for a reduction of tariff on the other. In that case, under the legislation now proposed, the governor in council would have power by order in council to reduce the duties without reference to parliament.

Mr. RHODES: Apart from any question of interpretation, I would not have the slightest hesitation in saying to my right hon. friend that in anything so important as a trade agreement with a country such as the United States, it follows as a matter of course that it should be subject to ratification by parliament. That is not the kind of agreement in contemplation which would enable the country to secure concessions by way of order in council under section 11. I want to make that abundantly clear.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I understand that there is a reduction on liquors. Why has it been limited to liquors? Why should it not be applied to machinery? We in the west like our liquor as well as anybody and would rather get it cheaper than we can at the present time. But we should prefer to have this section made applicable to farmers' machinery, for we certainly need cheap machinery in the west to-day.

Mr. RHODES: I am not aware that there is any bootlegging in machinery or any illicit importation. If there were it could be dealt with similarly. That was the reason for the action taken. It is not a question of cheapening the product as such; it was a question of attempting in this way to make at least a contribution toward the elimination of bootlegging.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to delay the committee, but I would ask the minister to consider inserting the word "tariff" before the word "concessions." It is advisable that we keep tariff matters within the tariff ambit rather than to contemplate some bargain the consideration on one side of which might have nothing whatever to do with tariff.

Mr. RHODES: I shall be pleased to consider the matter. If the committee in its wisdom decides to report the bill, I can hold the third reading and, if it is thought advisable, it can be moved back into committee. There is nothing in my mind other than having an instrument which will be of use; that is all. It may be thought wise on reflection to limit it in the sense suggested by my hon. friend.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—schedule A amended.

Mr. JACOBS: Does this deal with item 66a, biscuits?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: I have a letter here received from the Canada Biscuit Company, Limited, and which I wish to place before the committee. This company owns and operates the following companies:

McCormick Manufacturing Company, Limited, London, Ont.
J. A. Marven Limited, Moncton, N.B.
Montreal Biscuit Company, Limited, Montreal, Que.
D. S. Perrin and Company, Limited, London, Ont.
Paulin-Chambers Company, Limited, Winnipeg, Man.
Northwest Biscuit Plant, Edmonton, Alta.
Northwest Mill and Feed Plant, Edmonton, Alta.

I would cite a few excerpts from this letter, which is dated June 3, 1935:

It has come to our notice that the government are considering the passing of an act which will allow English-made biscuits valued at over twenty cents a pound to come into Canada duty free—this would cause untold damage to every high grade biscuit manufacturer in Canada, as it is impossible for a Canadian manufacturer to compete with the large-volume production of the British manufacturer on high-grade biscuits. The effect of this legislation would be to force all Canadian manufacturers to make very cheap quality goods at low prices on which there can be no profit.

Canadian biscuit factories are chief market for Canadian soft wheat, and are very large users of butter, eggs, lard, sugar, cheese and paper products.

United Kingdom biscuits contain no Canadian wheat, butter, eggs, lard, sugar, cheese and practically no paper products.

Even allowing for the present tariff, it is a known fact that the biscuit industry of Canada has suffered very severe losses. The industry represents an investment of many millions of dollars, and if this legislation is allowed to become effective, the results will be further large numbers of unemployed in the biscuit industry, and terrific losses of capital.

Will you please use your very best efforts in conveying these facts to the interested party? If you require any further information please do not hesitate to call upon me.

I would recommend that you communicate with Mr. Hanson, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as I understand that Mr. Rhodes in addition to being a sick man is deluded with all kinds of other matters so that he could not give this serious question the attention it deserves.

In regard to the last sentence, I wonder whether the writer refers to the other members of the government or to the members who sit behind the minister. At any rate I feel I have done my duty when I bring this matter to the attention of the minister, pointing out to him that this protest comes from practically every part of Canada; every biscuit manufacturer is represented.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have received a similar communication.

Mr. RHODES: The Minister of Finance is "deluded" with many other matters. I may say that I am sure my hon. friend is deluded also if he subscribes to the prayer or request contained in the letter, because as a matter of fact the total importation of British biscuits is one-third of one per cent of Canadian consumption. Furthermore, Canadian biscuits in price have ranged from eleven to fourteen cents per pound, and the class of biscuits from the United Kingdom affected by this reduction in the tariff range in price from twenty-seven to thirty-four cents per pound, so that this tariff action had reference to what might be termed—and I say this not offensively—a luxury product.

Mr. EULER: Fancy biscuits.

Mr. RHODES: Yes. I do not shield myself behind the circumstance that the reduction is made in consequence of a report of the tariff board after full inquiry and finding, but I leave it to the good judgment of the committee whether in the circumstances the dire disaster which apparently the biscuit manufacturers think will overtake them is likely to occur.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would follow the minister down a little more.

Mr. YOUNG: I notice in the letter which the hon. member for Cartier has just read the Canadian biscuit manufacturers object to English biscuits coming in because they contain no paper products. I do not consider that is a very serious objection.

Mr. JACOBS: The writer refers to the containers, I fancy.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I should like to call the attention of the minister to the fact that I have received several telegrams to the same effect. I assume his mind is quite clear on the subject.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps every hon. member who lives within one hundred and fifty miles of an industry of this kind has received similar communications. I have received dozens of them. The wires have been quite warm as a result of the sending of telegrams to me, but that is nothing new.

Mr. QUINN: I have also received similar telegrams, one from a biscuit manufacturer in Halifax, Moirs Limited, and also telegrams from Christie Brown and Company and others. I suppose the answer is the same to all.

Mr. BROWN: I do not suppose the hon. member for Weyburn has received similar telegrams.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Company rate of tax.

Mr. CHURCH: I would like to ask one question on behalf of the municipalities of the province of Ontario. Any section of this bill might serve to cover it. I introduced a resolution on coordination of income tax in this house on this question in 1927, and it was continued in 1928 and 1929. From 1867 down to the introduction of the Income War Tax Act in 1917 the income tax was the exclusive field of the municipalities. As we all know, at present the municipalities are having a very difficult time owing to conditions. Their sources of revenue are restricted by statute. There has been a gross invasion of their field both by the dominion and by the provinces. I do not object to the dominion levying income tax, because they had to carry on the war, relief and unemployment, and have other heavy burdens. But the present Ontario government have announced that next fall a special session of the legislature is to be convened in order that we shall be given the unexpected joy in the province of Ontario of a triplicate income tax. The income tax of the dominion government is collected chiefly in Ontario and Quebec; a very small part comes from the other provinces. The returns from the city of Toronto for the last year of record were $17,486,000, and for the city of Montreal, $18,893,000. I raised the question of the legality of this provincial tax in 1927, and I think the question is a cogent one whether the proposed tax by the province of Ontario is direct or indirect and the method of collecting illegal. The method of collecting it is both direct and indirect.

This burden of a third income taxation is going to retard the growth of industry in Ontario. There should be some coordination, because in view of the period of unrest we are going through and the condition of business to-day, industry cannot carry any further burdens. I should like to know if any negotiations on this matter have taken place with the provinces, or whether any reference is to be made to the supreme court, because it is in the interest of the taxpayers and the provinces that it should be done. This income tax comes very largely out of the working classes. They had an investigation of this in Washington and it showed a dreadful state of affairs—people like Pierpont Morgan with an income of millions paying no income tax at all. They are now bringing in a provision for registration, I may say that there is registration to-day in Toronto on municipal income tax and there are facilities there for anyone to go to the city hall office and find what income taxes have been paid. Are we going to wait for the Ontario government to put the cards on the table? As far as the assessment rolls and the collector's rolls are concerned you can walk into the office of the city clerk and turn up the rolls and find out what every person and corporation is paying in income tax to the municipality. The same applies to wills, deeds, and bills of exchange and lien notes and many other matters; they are all registered and open to inspection by the public, and I do not see any reason why there should not be similar publicity concerning income tax

As one of the representatives of an industrial city I protest against a third or provincial income tax in Ontario. The cities are already paying more than they can afford for the burden of government. It is all very well to talk about maritime rights and Pacific rights and prairie rights, but what about the rights of the old industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec who pay over 84 per cent of the federal income tax? We hear a lot about the rights of minorities, but what about the rights of majorities who have to pay all these taxes to maintain this country? I protest against this tax by the province. Under section 92 of the British North America Act they have the right of direct taxation to raise revenue for provincial purposes, but not by the widest extension of imagination can it be said that the provinces should take from the municipalities the income tax powers of taxation which they have held from time immemorial. I do not know what is to become of the municipalities of Ontario if they do not get some relief. Are we to wait, year after year, and have these provincial burdens increased? It would be a godsend to the people of this country if there had never been provincial governments. It was the greatest mistake the fathers of confederation ever made; it was done for political rather than for economic reasons, and we see the result in overtaxation and over government.

I have been asked to mention this matter on behalf of some of the municipalities which are being crushed at the present time owing to the burden of relief. A large number of properties are up for sale for arrears of taxes; in many cases the mortgagee has taken possession, and now are we going to add another income tax? This government or any other government in charge of the affairs of this country at present and for years to come will no doubt have to have this federal income tax. The present government and the minister have taken over regarding relief from some municipalities many of their obligations; in fact I do not know where the municipalities would have been had we not had the Unemployment Relief Act, as the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) mentioned in connection with Montreal. It is not the only city in which that situation exists; almost every large city in the country would have been in an even worse position than it is at present had it not been for the very active support which the federal government gave to the larger municipalities. But when we have an announcement from the Ontario government that they are going to ask publication of income tax matters and require affidavits or provide that people may be examined on oath by the local commissioner, and when you see what they are doing in the United States, allowing people to go to the register and see what is being paid, then I think that in the interest of more revenue for this government a similar amendment might be made in the law here. I do not wish to detain the minister; I am sorry on his account for having to mention the matter, because I have a great admiration and respect for him and sympathy with him in respect to the burden he has had to bear for the last ten years, not only in this parliament but as a provincial leader. But I should like to hear from him anything he can say in a few words as to the legality of the proposed provincial tax and the method of collection.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think there is any question as to the right of the provinces to impose this tax. It is a direct tax. As far as it is a direct tax it is strictly within their legislative competence. Neither is there any question as to the right of the dominion to impose this tax. That was settled in the case of the King v. Caron, which went to the privy council, the judgment being delivered by Lord Haldane, who decided that the dominion had jurisdiction. It is perhaps unfortunate that there should be a threefold tax, but as far as that is concerned the question is between provinces and municipalities and is one which must be settled within the province; it is not one which we can settle here. There are certain phases of the incidence of this tax which do work an injustice. That is, a man has a certain income, and income tax is imposed by the dominion. When the province imposes an income tax it is imposed not upon the residue of his income after he has paid the tax to the dominion, but upon his whole income as though he had actually received it, although as a matter of fact he has parted with a portion of it. The same statement applies to its application in the case of the municipalities. We had that, among other things, in mind when we sought to have a dominion-provincial conference last autumn. The question of income tax was placed upon the agenda of the proposed conference and I think it was unfortunate that we were unable to have that conference, because that was one subject that perhaps we could have dealt with in a manner that would have made it more equitable in its application not only as between the dominion and the provinces but perhaps also as to the individuals whether they pay taxes to the provinces or to the dominion. As a matter of fact, however, we could not have the conference for the reason that we could not secure the attendance of representatives of all the provinces; more than one raised objection to a conference being held at that time. It follows, of course, that there will be no possibility of a conference this year unless it is held late in the autumn, after a new government is in office.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Mr. RHODES: I do hope, however, that for the wellbeing of the country the incoming government, whether it be this or another government, will take some action. I notice my hon. friend from Quebec East smiling when I use the term "new government." He has in mind the circumstance that it will be a government of some other party. I had no such circumstance in mind. What I had in mind was that we will have a newly elected government with a newly elected parliament.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I withdraw my smile.

Mr. RHODES: We have no misgivings upon that point; in due course we will know the answer. In all seriousness, however, I do express the hope that there can be a fair and frank discussion between the dominion and provincial governments in the hope that there may result something fairer in the way of the application of income tax. It is all very well to discuss the dominion giving up the tax. Municipalities and provinces are put to it for revenue, but it requires no stretch of the imagination to realize that the dominion government is also in dire need of revenue, and that will be so for a number of years or at all events until some solution has been found of many of the problems we have before us at the present time. So it is idle to discuss giving up this tax, but I do think in fairness we can discuss with the provinces a more equitable application in the hope that it will improve conditions not only as they concern the dominion and the provinces but also as they concern the individual taxpayer.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. EULER: I am glad to hear what the Minister of Finance has to say with regard to the multiplicity of taxes and the undesirability of such a condition. But I should like to remind him that the government of which he is a member, and in fact the previous government, have practised the same thing even within the dominion itself. I know there is not usually a great deal of consideration or sympathy for corporations or those who derive their incomes from corporations, but if I recite the facts briefly it might be of interest to the committee. So far as income tax is concerned a joint stock company pays on its profits a tax of 13½ per cent. Another business, perhaps of the same nature—and I believe I referred to this last year or two years ago—which happens to be carried on by a partnership or under a single proprietor, making the same amount of profit, escapes that tax altogether. There, I say, is an unjust discrimination. First, so far as the corporation is concerned, there is the 13½ per cent tax. Then when the balance of the profits are distributed among the shareholders they again pay taxes as individuals. Then the provinces come along and exact a tax from the corporation. Now we have the announcement by the premier of the province of Ontario that he is going to propose an income tax also. That will be a fourth tax. Then the municipalities, at least in the province of Ontario, exact still another income tax, so the man who happens to get his income from a joint stock company—and I am no special pleader for those who hold stocks in joint stock companies—is faced with the probability of having to pay five income taxes in one form or another.

I should like to suggest to the minister that he is certainly on the right track when he suggests that there should be some sort of getting together to prevent this multiplicity of taxes. It is perfectly right that those making a great deal of money by way of income from stocks or bonds should pay a proper tax, but surely it cannot be right that the jurisdiction should be spread over municipalities, provinces and the dominion so as to bring about practically fivefold taxation on the same income.

In conclusion I just want to repeat what I said two years ago, or perhaps it was last year, with regard to the absolute injustice of the double taxation now exacted by this government from those who happen to get their incomes from stocks. It is a discrimination against joint stock companies, and after all that is a fair method of doing business. Consider two businesses side by side, perhaps in exactly the same line of business. One is operated as a joint stock company, perhaps with almost all the stock owned by the same man or the same family. Next to that business or across the street is a firm doing business under a single proprietor or a partnership. The joint stock company pays an income tax of 13½ per cent while the other business escapes that tax altogether. In addition all the individuals concerned pay taxation on their incomes. I say this is a double tax that is utterly inexcusable unless it arises through the necessity of securing revenue, and even that ought to be subject to the ordinary laws of fairness and equity.

Mr. RHODES: With the general tenor of the remarks of my hon. friend I am in entire accord and sympathy. I rise only for the purpose of correcting what I know was said by him inadvertently and in error, when he spoke of double taxation having been imposed by this government. That principle obtained during the whole of the nine years that hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

Mr. EULER: I said it was imposed by this government; I did not say it was inaugurated by this government. It was imposed by the previous government as well, but that does not make it any more just.

Mr. RHODES: Quite so. I mention that only for this reason, that by the layman the statement of my hon. friend immediately would be interpreted to mean that this government was responsible for the condition; that is, that the Bennett government was responsible.

Mr. EULER: I did not say that, but this government have accentuated the condition by increasing the tax from time to time.

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps it is a question of degree. I might say to my hon. friend, however, if he wants to pursue the discussion along that line, that the government of which he was a member not only maintained this principle all during the period it was in office; it maintained the principle during a period of prosperity when there were abounding revenues. If it could be justified under those conditions what can be said of a government in office during the period of the greatest depression in the history of the world, when governments all over the world are hard put to it for every cent of revenue they can derive?

Having said that I do not for a moment want to go back on what I have already stated as to the injustice of the principle of double taxation. It is unjust, and I hope the time is not far distant when we may be able to get away from it. As I pointed out last year, it is all very well for us to feel that a certain principle is not to our liking, but it is quite another thing to have to forfeit several millions of sorely needed revenue under the conditions which exist today.

Mr. RINFRET: Before the section is carried I should like to make an observation which I think is in order at this time. There has been much confusion in the minds of many taxpayers this year—probably it existed in previous years also—with regard to the retroactive feature of the changes and increases in the income tax, especially with regard to unearned or investment income. Quite a number of my constituents came to me to find out whether in the returns to be filed April 30 they had to provide for the changes in regard to investment incomes. I directed them to the officers of the Department of National Revenue. I was quite aware, of course, that these changes were retroactive and, consequently, should be provided for in the returns, but the confusion was brought about by the fact that in the first place the changes had not been adopted by the house—in fact they have not been adopted yet—and in the second place the forms supplied to the public made no provision at all for investment incomes. I feel sure therefore, that a large number of the returns that have been received by the department up to the present have made no provision at all for that new feature. I will take the stand that perhaps it might be a good thing for this government or the government to come to consider the advisability of not making these changes retroactive. I understand that it has been working both ways When the income tax was reduced by the former government it did apply to the previous year, and therefore when it is increased it seems only fair that it should be made retroactive, but there may come a time when the income tax will be increased by such an amount that the income tax payer will not have made any provision to meet the increased tax exacted from him, and I am not sure that it would not be advisable to consider whether, when changes are made in the income tax, the new tax should be made applicable to the current and not to the previous year. However, that was not my point.

I am quite aware that a large number of taxpayers have probably not provided for the investment income in their returns this year.

I see that section 15 provides that interest shall be charged on the tax imposed by section 2, and I would ask the minister why that special section is in the bill.

Section 16 says:

> Sections, one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, ten, eleven, twelve and thirteen of this act shall be applicable to income of the 1934 taxation period.

Does that mean that in the case of every taxpayer who has failed to file his return according to these sections interest will be charged from the thirtieth day of April also?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, I would be disposed to agree with the objection raised by my hon. friend that it would be preferable in dealing with the income tax to get away from the retroactive feature, but that feature has been in our income tax from its beginning. In that respect there has been no change in the method of applying the tax this year as against former years, not only with respect to this government but preceding governments. I can speak from a somewhat painful experience with respect to the difficulty in which the taxpayer is placed because I recall very well that I had to pay in one year an income tax which was greater than my income in the year I paid the tax, and I had to resort to the banks to borrow money to pay the income tax. So I can speak feelingly of the position the taxpayer finds himself in who is called upon to pay a heavier tax in a year when his income has been greatly reduced. It is very difficult to defend that, but before we can alter our system we have to have a treasury overflowing to such an extent that we can forego one year's income tax. That is just about the plain fact of the matter, and in those circumstances we are not in a position to change the method of applying the tax. It is the same to-day precisely in every respect that it has been hitherto.

It has always been so that when there have been changes in the tax imposed, that change has come subsequent to the date upon which the income tax forms, having of necessity to be prepared in advance, have been sent out to the various income tax offices throughout the dominion. That difficulty has arisen hitherto whenever there has been any change in the income tax, and I do not see any way of avoiding it so long as we have the circumstance that the date for sending out the forms in the usual course practically always precedes the date when the budget ordinarily is brought down.

My hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) put a specific question with respect to section 15. The principle there is precisely the same as has obtained in other years. It merely deals with the circumstance that inasmuch as the bill has not become law provision must be made for interest from the period when the taxation period commenced. There is nothing new in principle in section 15 from previous income tax acts.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I am not in order because clause 16 is not under discussion, but as reference has been made to section 15 I might be permitted to ask a question in regard to section 16. It says that sections from one to thirteen inclusive with the exception of section nine "shall be applicable to income of the 1934 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and of all subsequent periods." The explanation in the bill implies that there are no changes except that the rate is increased from 12½ to 13½ per cent. I just want to make certain that this does not imply a change such as we had two or three years ago when the family corporation tax was abolished. I recall at that time that in the case of a company whose fiscal year ended with January instead of December the interpretation given by the department was, and I have no particular fault to find with the legality of it, that a company or an individual might be forced to pay a tax for twenty-three months and when you are paying a tax on a twenty-three months' period you would naturally get into the higher brackets, and the tax would be exceedingly high. I would like to know in regard to section 16 whether in the case of a company whose fiscal year ends with January the same sort of thing might be possible, because it says that it "shall be applicable to income of the 1934 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein." Would that mean that if the year of a company ended January 31, 1935, the taxation period would be for the twelve months preceding January 31, 1935?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. EULER: Then it says the taxation shall be applicable also to income of "fiscal periods ending therein and of all subsequent periods." Would a company have to pay for that year ending January 31, 1935, and also for the eleven months ending with January, 1935? In other words, would a company be called upon to pay taxation for practically two years?

Mr. RHODES: I recall very well the incident to which my hon. friend refers. This section has no incidence, no bearing nor application similar or analogous to that case.

Mr. EULER: There is no possibility of them having to pay for a period of practically two years?

Mr. RHODES: No possibility of that arising. This has reference only to the extra one per cent and it has no bearing and there is no change with respect to the period to which the tax might be applied.

Mr. RALSTON: Since we are discussing the period to which the changed tax applies I understood that the 1934 taxation period, for instance, would be deemed to be any fiscal period which ended in 1934, and that therefore a company whose fiscal year ended March 31, 1934, would be obliged to pay the increased tax back to March 31, 1933, because the increase in the tax is made applicable to the 1934 period. In other words, the 1934 period included nine months of 1933. I brought that to the minister's attention when the resolution was up, and the minister was going to look into it. If that is the case it should be made clear that this only applies from January 1, 1934. When I say that, it is subject to all that my hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) has said in regard to making these increases retroactive. I spoke to that point on the resolution and in previous years I have protested against it. I am not impressed at all by the fact that under previous administrations, as my hon. friend says, changes in the income tax have been made retroactive. As I have pointed out most of the changes were downward rather than upward, and I submit that regardless of who does it, it is wrong, it is unjust, it is unfair, it is inequitable, it is not good legislation to make increases in taxation or changes in the law apply to a period that has already been closed, the commitments for which have already been undertaken, the disbursements for which have already been made. As I suggested in the discussion on the resolution, it seems to me to involve a violation of what is an implied contract between the government and the taxpayer that his taxes for that period will be so much. The government comes in with a statute and says to the taxpayer: Although we said your taxes would be a certain percentage for this period, although you have based your commitments upon that percentage, we now propose to take so much more. That is not fair and it is not sound for business and it is not fair to the individual. If the treasury needs the money I submit that it would be better to provide for the levying of a double increase in the current year. We would thus preserve the principle that legislation is made for the future and not for the past. I believe the minister agrees with me in principle although he has said it is impossible to do this because of the necessities of the treasury. I submit we ought to make a change in this respect and not make increases in taxation retroactive. With that general observation I couple the special case to which I have referred and to which the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has referred, the case of an organization with a fiscal year ending during 1934. I understand that such a company will now be taxed back into 1933.

Mr. RHODES: The law with respect to the fiscal year of corporations will be found in section 35 of the Income War Tax Act, which reads:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of section 33 of this act,—

Section 33 has reference to the general returns.

> —any corporation the fiscal year of which does not coincide with the calendar year, shall make a return within four months from the close of its fiscal year and the tax shall be computed as if the said fiscal year coincided with the calendar year within which the said fiscal year ends, and the provisions of this act shall mutatis mutandis apply.

Let me assure the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and the committee that when I say that this act was in force under preceding administrations I do not make the statement for the purpose of placing responsibility upon other governments for the actions of this government nor to evade the full share of responsibility which a government must take for its own acts. I do so solely for the purpose of emphasizing the difficulty in which the government is placed particularly when it desires to make a change in a period of stress such as has confronted us during the last few years and is confronting us to-day. My hon. friend has said that rather than have the retroactive phase of the taxation maintained he would prefer a double taxation applied in one year and let us start anew.

Mr. RALSTON: A double increase.

Mr. RHODES: As a matter of fact the retroactive feature, so far as it applies to incomes, has always been in the act. You could not tell how much income a man would make until the end of the year and you could not impose a tax upon this income until he had received it. In other words, you could not impose a tax upon income in advance as the income might be larger or smaller than expected. It is only after a man has received his salary or income that he should be told how much tax he will have to pay. The objection I have recorded with respect to this method of application, as far as this or any other government is concerned, is that it is right enough for a man or a company to pay an income tax under those circumstances if it is known that the rate of taxation will be the same next year or the year after but it is a different thing when there is an increase in the income tax and a man has to pay an additional tax upon income which has already been expended. I mention this to indicate the retroactive features to which I object and which I wish we could get away from. So far as the main principle of the act is concerned, it has been applied to the income of past years for the reasons I have indicated.

Mr. EULER: The minister's reply to my question was quite unequivocal and I was satisfied with it but since I have heard the remarks of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and the reply of the minister I am not so sure that I should be satisfied. Take the case of a company the fiscal year of which ends, say in January or in any other month other than the end of the calendar year; will it follow under this amendment that that concern will have to pay taxes for more than twelve months?

Mr. RHODES: The method of applying the tax as a result of this section will not differ from that at present prevailing.

Mr. RALSTON: I know my hon. friend is making this as clear as possible but I do not think he has answered the question. The minister has his officers before him and I shall give a specific instance. A company ends its fiscal year on March 31, 1934, and an increase in corporation tax is provided by this bill which becomes law. Will the increase apply further back than January 1, 1934?

Mr. RHODES: If the fiscal period goes beyond that, yes. What I said in my answer to the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) was this: Assuming there had been a change in the company tax this year, the application of that tax would be precisely the same with respect to that company. The only change is with respect to the rate and the increased rate would be dealt with in the same manner as the other rate and as if there had been no increase.

Mr. RALSTON: There is still a very definite doubt in my mind as to whether the increases which are said to go back only to the 1934 period will not go back to 1933. The minister has directed attention to section 35 and it seems to me that that section would confine the increase only to the portion of the fiscal year which was within the year 1934.

Mr. RHODES: I do not think I can add anything to what I have said already. I say that it will apply beyond January of 1934 if the taxation period of the company goes back of that date.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, the statute stops the fiscal period of the company at the beginning of the year 1934. By virtue of subsection 2 of section 35 the fiscal year of the company is made to coincide with the year in which the fiscal period ends. Does that not make the increase in tax stop at January 1, 1934?

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend is usually very lucid but I do not think he has made the proper deduction from section 35.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know why it was cited if it was not for the purpose of making that clear.

Mr. RHODES: It differentiates clearly from the calendar year.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. RHODES: Oh, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: It states that the tax shall be computed as if the said fiscal year coincided with the calendar year.

Mr. RHODES: It states specifically that if the fiscal year of the corporation does not coincide with the calendar year, it shall make a return within four months from the close of its fiscal year.

Mr. RALSTON: The next phrase is important.

Mr. RHODES: And the tax shall be computed as if the said fiscal year coincided with the calendar year.

Mr. RALSTON: I was misled, I know unintentionally, by the citation of that section. If that section means that only the rate applies for the portion of the calendar year, then I take it that the increased rate would only apply to January 1, 1934, in the case I mentioned.

Mr. RHODES: No, it applies to the end of the fiscal year of the corporation.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit that that is unfair and that the changes in taxation, if they apply to the 1934 fiscal period, should apply only to that portion of the fiscal period of the company which is within the calendar year 1934. It means that one company, if it is unfortunate enough to have a fiscal year ending March 31, 1934, will have to pay increased taxation for a period of nine months longer than the company whose fiscal year ends on December 31, 1934.

Mr. RHODES: There is no change in that respect; that feature has been there for some time.

Mr. RALSTON: I know that the minister is not the kind of man to take that attitude. Simply because an injustice has existed is no reason why it should continue. If it is unjust he should be prepared to make the change.

Mr. RHODES: I should like to have the privilege of being instrumental in making the change, but it is one thing to desire to do something and another thing to be able to do it. If I were Minister of Finance under other conditions I can assure my hon. friend that he would not have to make that plea.

Mr. EULER: I must protest. I am very much surprised that the minister should take that attitude. In effect he admits that it is unjust, and the only reason he gives is the necessities of the revenue. I do not believe that either the house or the minister will suggest that it is fair to exact from one company something that is not exacted from another. There is a discrimination there. In the one case the company pays for the full year and in the other case the increase goes back over a period of more than twelve months. Merely because it provides a very slight addition to the revenue is, I respectfully submit, not a sufficient reason why it should be done. If it is unjust it should be remedied, and it is no excuse for its continuance to say that it has been done before. It is no excuse to say that you are following a wrong principle which has been in force before. If the minister will give that point cool reflection I think he will make the change. The amendment could be made very simply and it would bring about justice.

Mr. RHODES: I wish to take decided exception to one deduction of my hon. friend. He suggests that this method of application makes a discrimination as between companies.

Mr. RALSTON: Taxpayers.

Mr. RHODES: If what my hon. friend suggests were done there would be a very marked discrimination. One company would pay for a portion of the year and another company would pay for the full year. All we do with respect to the tax is to make it applicable to a year. It is for the company to determine its fiscal year. We must tax for the full company year as laid down by law, and if it happens by reason of the circumstances that one company's fiscal year ends at a different period, which would make it pay a larger tax than another company, then it is to be regretted. But I know of no method of general application of the law which leaves it in the company's hands to have its fiscal year conform either to the calendar year or to a general scheme applicable to all companies. It is the company's lookout and I do not see how we can remedy that phase of it.

Mr. RALSTON: It cannot be the company's lookout if it is taxed after the year has been fixed. The year has been fixed first and the government comes in and says, "You having fixed that fiscal year, not knowing that there was to be an increase, will have to pay nine months more of taxation than another company doing business in competition with you, because your year ends March 31, 1934, and the other company's December 31, 1934."

Mr. RHODES: The principle is common not only to companies but to individuals.

Mr. EULER: If the principle is wrong, why retain it?

Mr. RHODES: I have indicated as plainly as I possibly can why that has been done. The reason is that we cannot forego revenue at the moment. I have already said that the principle would not apply in happier circumstances.

Mr. EULER: That is not a good excuse.

Mr. RHODES: It is a perfectly fair statement of my position and I do not know that I can add anything to it.

Mr. LUCAS: Has the minister been able to make an estimate of the additional amount of revenue under the amendments made this year to the Income War Tax Act?

Mr. RHODES: The estimate is $12,500,000.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Earned income.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to congratulate the minister on the compliment he has paid members of parliament by including their indemnities in the definition of "earned income." It did not appear in the resolution but it is in the bill. May I now refer to a matter mentioned to me a good many times. Members of parliament do not generally legislate for themselves, but this does seem to be a matter which should have the attention of the minister—I refer to the living expenses of members in Ottawa. Income tax is paid on the full indemnity notwithstanding that the member in Ottawa has to spend a certain amount of money to earn that indemnity. It seems proper that an allowance should be made—the country would not criticize it in the slightest—to members of parliament who actually spend money for living expenses in Ottawa to become entitled to the indemnity.

Mr. RHODES: I accede to the view expressed by my hon. friend. As a matter of fact an indemnity is not an income at all, otherwise it is not an indemnity. I can speak with some knowledge going back more particularly to the years when I was first in the house, when we received $2,500. I never took a cent back to my constituency, and the demands upon the member at that time were as heavy as they are to-day and as numerous. I will go further. I think the question of living expenses in Ottawa ought to be taken into consideration. It is grossly unjust to regard the indemnity of members as income for purposes of income tax, and I commend to the incoming parliament—

Mr. EULER: Why not now?

Mr. RHODES: I would have done it willingly myself but for the fact that my motives would have been misconstrued.

Mr. EULER: Oh no.

Mr. RHODES: The new parliament is the body to take action of that kind, and so far as I am concerned, wherever I may be, I will subscribe to it fully. I do not hesitate to say frankly that I believe the Income Tax Act should be amended to exempt the indemnities of senators and members of parliament, because if they are not income they are not subject to taxation. Indemnities are what the name implies: they are merely intended to indemnify members for the sacrifice they make in expenditure and in time and in giving up their income to come to Ottawa. I make that statement with the greatest satisfaction, and I do hope that the new parliament will be much wiser and kinder to its members than this parliament and the preceding ones have been.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The minister will find in the Department of Justice an opinion of Sir Allen Aylesworth, a distinguished lawyer, who in strong language claims that this imposition of a tax on the indemnities of members and of senators is ultra vires the powers of this parliament and is unconstitutional.

Mr. RHODES: Whether it is or not, I have no hesitation in saying that it is unjust. I do not think it should be continued.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. COOTE: I would direct the attention of the minister to expenses which we are allowed to deduct in determining our net income. For the last five years there has been a distinct difference of opinion between myself and the inspector as to whether or not I should receive an allowance at all for the fact that I require the use of an automobile. I use it both in my business, in carrying on my farm, and in earning my indemnity. I have a large constituency and I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that in carrying out my duty as I am expected by my constituents to do it, I must cover at least 5,000 or 6,000 miles of country roads every year. In addition to that, I do a good deal of travelling back and forth to my farm. I am using my car in carrying on my farming operations part of the time and on other occasions I am using it in earning my indemnity. I have been consistently opposed in that view by the inspector of income tax. I really think that right and justice would be on the side of any man in my position, that is in using a car either in the superintending of his farming operations or in earning his indemnity in visiting his constituents. As I have been unable to get any redress through the inspector of income tax, I want to give the matter a little publicity while we have the minister and the commissioner of income tax here. I think I am justly and legally entitled to an allowance for the use of my car, because men in almost every other occupation are getting an allowance for that; they are being allowed to deduct the expenses incurred in running their cars, and certainly a similar allowance in this connection should be made to members.

Mr. NEILL: I would like to endorse the remarks of the last speaker. It is well known we incur expenses solely and entirely in connection with being members of parliament, and yet we are not allowed to deduct as part of our expenses, for instance, the hire of stenographic help and payment of travelling expenses. Like my hon. friend, I have endeavoured to charge this up and have not been allowed to do so. I understand some years ago an amendment was inserted in the act which allowed a commercial traveller when he was away from home, to make a charge for his expenses thus incurred. At that time it was expected that members of parliament would qualify under that section for exemption, but some wiseacres in the customs or excise decided that being a member of parliament is not an occupation or a business—they did not define what it was; a recreation, I presume—and on that ground the application failed.

I just want to make this suggestion in regard to the remarks of the Minister of Finance: he says that he thoroughly appreciates the situation and he himself would be glad to make the reform that is asked for, but for the fact that it would look as if he were legislating for himself or as if we were legislating for ourselves, and he commended the reform to the next parliament. But I suggest that now is the correct and precise moment for him to take action and to have it not take effect until the following parliament. That would relieve him and us of the suggestion that we were legislating for ourselves. If it takes effect then, heaven knows who will be here to constitute the next parliament. It is the custom, when any increase in salary for the members of a legislative body is being made, for the outgoing legislature to take the action, because that takes away the reflection of men legislating for themselves. The Minister of Finance evidently has the support of the house in this reform; he is in favour of it; why not pass it now with the condition that it shall not take effect until the next parliament?

Mr. RHODES: I shall be pleased to consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), but I would have to confer with my colleagues before I could take any action. My suggestion, if it is agreeable to the committee, is that we pass this bill, and if my colleagues concur in the idea, which appeals to me personally, I would ask that an amendment be made to the bill in the upper house. So far as I am concerned I am quite prepared to support the idea, but my hon. friend will understand that I cannot take action without conferring with my colleagues.

Mr. NEILL: There is a precedent for this. In British Columbia such a deduction is allowed by the provincial income tax department. It used to be $2,000; now they have reduced it to $1,000.

Mr. RHODES: That is because it is a matter of law, and that is the difficulty the commissioner of income tax has at the moment with respect to the situation referred to by the hon. member for Macleod in regard to the use of an automobile. The deductions for travelling expenses are laid down specifically in paragraph (f) of section 5 of the Income War Tax Act, which reads:

> Travelling expenses, including the entire amount expended for meals and lodging, while away from home in the pursuit of a trade or business.

It is obvious that it would be hard to construe that language to cover a member of parliament as pursuing a trade or conducting a business.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is the noblest of all callings.

Mr. YOUNG: If a man has a business.

Mr. RHODES: If a member of parliament has a business which he conducts, that is quite another matter, but my hon. friend was referring to the circumstance that as a member of parliament he requires the use of a motor car in going about and doing government business, and that there should be a deduction on this account. May I say this: If we do have the law amended deleting the indemnity from being taken into account in the income tax, we shall have gone a reasonable distance. I think under those circumstances a member cannot keep a proper check in respect to the use of a motor car on government business.

Mr. COOTE: My complaint was chiefly in regard to the fact that no allowance is made for my expenses in travelling to my farm and back. That certainly was my business as distinct from being a member of parliament and the indemnity one receives therefor. The reply was: If you used this car exclusively for that purpose, the allowance would be made. But as I used it for other purposes I could not seem to convince the inspector of income tax that I should get any allowance for that. I just felt that the act was not being administered fairly in that regard.

Mr. RALSTON: May I call the attention of the minister to section 6 (a) of the act which I presume he has before him. This gives him additional latitude. It provides that:

> In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be assessed, a deduction shall not be allowed in respect of—> (a) disbursements or expenses not wholly—

This is where they get the hon. member for Macleod, I presume:

> —exclusively and necessarily laid out or expended for the purpose of earning the income.

There the words "trade or business" are not used, and "income" is defined by the statute as including indemnity. I have felt indirectly that can mean that an allowance could be made where the disbursements were made wholly for the purpose of earning the indemnity; that is to say, expenses for living in Ottawa which are made for no other purpose than earning the sessional indemnity.

Mr. RHODES: That would be true no doubt, if the condition continued to obtain that the indemnity was regarded as income.

On section 5—Alternative exemptions from surtax.

Mr. GERSHAW: I would like to submit to the minister that in the explanation given of paragraph (c) of clause 5 there are enumerated the relatives for whom an exemption is allowed. I would point out that this is interpreted very strictly, held to blood relatives. There are men who probably have under their own roofs people whom they are keeping and for whom they can get no allowance. Take the case of a man supporting his foster parents, his stepmother or stepfather. There seems to be an injustice in some cases such as these.

Mr. RHODES: That matter has been up in the house and discussed and considered many times. In an act of this kind, while it is true that if you do not widen the exemptions, you will do an injustice in an individual case, on the other hand, having regard to the necessity of protecting the revenue, the less opportunity one gives to the taxpayer to evade the tax by enlarging his exemption, the better. For my part I can see no good reason why we should go farther than we have gone at present.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Expenses payable to controlling company abroad.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to ask a question on subsection (j). Section 6 as a whole, as I understand, provides that certain items enumerated there are not to be allowed as deductions from net income. Paragraph (j) refers to net losses sustained in the 1934 or any subsequent taxation period in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, et cetera. But I note that insurance companies other than life are exempt from that liability. Would the minister tell us why that exemption is made?

Mr. RHODES: The answer is that insurance companies doing a world wide business are subject to conditions which do not obtain in ordinary business, for example conflagration loss. That is the reason that this exemption appears.

Mr. RALSTON: In respect to clause (k) I spoke to one of the officers of the department; is there an amendment?

Mr. RHODES: Yes, I am quite prepared to move an amendment conforming to the suggestion made by my hon. friend, which amendment does not change the section as it was intended to be applied, but would make it clear beyond question that it bears that interpretation. I therefore move:

That paragraph (k) of section 6 of Bill 80 be amended by inserting after the word "issued" in the eleventh line, the words "or the income provisions thereof have been adopted" and by inserting after the word "corporation" in the eighteenth line of the said paragraph, the words "or its predecessor."

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—payments in respect of certain copyrights and copyrighted works.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the minister expect to get any increased revenue out of the change? I understand that under this section a uniform rate of five per cent is imposed instead of twelve and a half per cent which was contingent on returns being made.

Mr. RHODES: No, we do not expect any increase.

Mr. RALSTON: Or any decrease?

Mr. RHODES: No, I do not expect there will be any change.

On section 10—Proviso against evasion.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister consider my remarks in regard to the retroactive provisions of this act applicable to this section? I have not any particular company in mind, so I can speak very freely. What is being done here is to provide that dividends payable to a non-resident company shall be taxable if that company has been incorporated since April 1, 1933. What appears to have been done, as would appear from the note, is that Canadian companies have been paying dividends to parent companies outside. The practice has grown up of establishing parent companies outside in order that these dividends might be received by them free of tax. It was perfectly legal and proper; there was no statutory provision or legal objection to it. Then suddenly this bill comes in to say that if the company was incorporated since April 1, 1933, that remittance from the Canadian company to the parent company is to be taxable. It is simply the retroactive feature over again, which I submit is unfair in principle.

Mr. RHODES: This section was designed purely for the purpose of preventing evasion, not for the purpose of imposing any injustice or any new taxation. It is to prevent the incorporation of a company in order to permit escape from taxes.

Mr. RALSTON: It is all right to prevent evasion from this time on, but this is what judicial decisions call avoidance, not evasion. It is perfectly proper to avoid taxation but not to evade it.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Payments on income bonds or income debentures.

Mr. RALSTON: This is a section which goes along with subsection (k) of section 6. One of the provisions of section 6 was that interest on income bonds was not to be deducted as an expense of the company. The circumstances under which income bonds are usually issued, as the minister knows, are these; a bondholder has a bond bearing a fixed rate of interest. The company gets into difficulty, and he is approached and told: "If you do not give up your bond, forego your rights and take something less, the company is going into liquidation." The bondholder agrees to some scheme of reorganization under which instead of getting a fixed rate of interest he gets an income bond, the interest on which is payable only if earned. The bondholder gives up something, makes a contribution in order that a Canadian company may continue operations instead of going into bankruptcy. The minister has inserted in subsection (k) of section 6 a proviso that if income bonds are created under those conditions, under a reorganization in respect of which relief has been given to the debtor corporation, then the interest payable on that income bond is a proper deduction to be made by the company from its operating expenses. I submit that the same principle should apply to section 11, which as it is drawn provides that:

> ... any annual amount received in respect of an income bond or income debenture shall be deemed to be a dividend.

In other words the bondholder who had his right under his fixed interest bond was getting bond interest, not a dividend, but having agreed to take something else from the company he now finds it converted into a dividend, which makes it subject to a five per cent deduction under section 9B; so the bondholder is being penalized for having been accommodating and having given up his rights against the company and accepted something less. Therefore I want to ask the minister—I feel sure that he will agree in principle—if he will agree that a man who has consented to a reorganization under the circumstances stated in subsection (k), that is a forced reorganization brought about by financial difficulties, and who has agreed not to exact his pound of flesh, will be treated at least as generously as far as taxation is concerned as he would be if he had retained his rights under his fixed interest bond. That could be done if the minister would insert the proviso of subsection (k) as a proviso of section 11. Although the minister may agree to carry out the idea by way of administration, I think it would be better for certainty if the minister would insert the proviso of subsection (k) in section 11.

Mr. RHODES: I prefer not to make an amendment, because it would provide an exemption for all time for non-residents. But I will say that it is the intention that this section 11 shall be administered in precisely the same way as the preceding section 6, in a bona fide case such as has been instanced by my hon. friend.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the only kind for which it is asked.

Mr. RHODES: It is quite competent, and it has been quite competent, to deal with the matter by way of exemption by order in council. Having regard to the danger there would be in widening the provision I think perhaps that is the better method of dealing with it.

Mr. RALSTON: Then the minister would give that assurance, that the principle of subsection (k) will be applied by order in council?

Mr. RHODES: Certainly. The desire would be to see any bona fide cases, such as the one instanced by my hon. friend, fully protected.

On section 12—Exemption from 12½ per cent deduction.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that subsection (e) lettered correctly? If the minister will just check it up, I cannot find any subsection (e) in the act or the amendments

Mr. RHODES: It is properly included here, because it has reference to an amendment made last year.

Section 13 agreed to.

On section 14—Tax on gifts.

Mr. COOTE: With regard to subsection 8, paragraph (a), which reads:

... gifts or donations made by any individual the aggregate value of which in any year does not exceed four thousand dollars;

I should like to appeal to the minister to raise that exemption somewhat. It seems to me that gifts somewhat in excess of $4,000 really should be exempt. I have in mind the case of a man who feels that he would like to give the home in which he is living to his wife; I think in many cases there is ample justification for such an act. In many instances he would be compelled to pay a tax on a gift of that kind, because often the home would be valued at more than $4,000. The rate of taxation increases progressively with the size of the gift until the sum of $1,000,000 is reached and it does seem to me that the exemption might be raised higher than $4,000. It may be that I am taking the wrong view, because I have not been informed as to the particulars of the gift tax in any other country where it has been imposed. I presume the minister has made some study of this matter as it works in other countries. Could he tell us whether, in any other country where the tax is in operation, the exemption stops at $4,000? My whole point is that the tax is imposed at too low a point, and that the exemption should be more than $4,000. I believe in many cases this might be regarded as something of a hardship.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, we did make inquiry with respect to this tax, which is in operation in other countries. The nearest example is to be found in the United States. The object of the tax is obvious; it is to prevent an individual with an income which would bear a very heavy income tax from escaping that tax by handing over to certain relatives, perhaps to his immediate family, a physical volume of securities, for instance, which would have the effect of dividing his income among five or six persons. These, paying individual income tax, would come under a lower bracket, being in receipt of a smaller income, and in the aggregate the income tax payable by these individuals would be nothing like the income tax that would be paid by the man under the higher bracket. It was to prevent that sort of thing, without the state securing some compensation by way of revenue, that this gift tax was imposed. The figure originally mentioned in the resolution was $1,000. That was raised, because we did not want to include in the category of gifts which were intended to be taxed, for the reasons I have just indicated, certain bona fide gifts by individuals to members of their families by way of an annual income, for example. There were certain cases of that. Inasmuch as the individual who gives, we will say, an annuity of $4,000 to a member of his family has paid an income tax upon that, the exchequer is not cheated. Possibly $5,000 might be a fairer figure; that is the figure set in the United States. I should be quite content to have it raised to $5,000, but I doubt if we would be wise in increasing the exemption beyond that figure. In that regard I am entirely in the judgment of the committee.

Mr. COOTE: I was under the impression that the bill contained the figure of $1,000.

Mr. RHODES: The resolution did mention that amount, but we have made it $4,000 in the bill.

Mr. COOTE: So far as I am concerned I can see why gifts of this size should not be allowed every year, but the gifts I had in mind were those made once or twice in a man's lifetime. He may never have made any gift of the kind before that would assist him in any way by reducing his income tax. I do not want to labour the point, but it did seem to me that the exemption might very well be raised to the point mentioned by the minister, $5,000 or $6 000. However, I am willing to accept the minister's judgment if he thinks $4,000 is the proper amount.

Mr. RHODES: I think it is fair.

Mr. COOTE: In certain cases it is liable to be regarded as a hardship.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. G. R. GEARY (Toronto South) presented the fourth report of the standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government as follows:

Your committee, in accordance with order of reference dated March 4, 1935, has considered the annual reports respecting the accounts of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and in connection therewith has examined the following witnesses:

Hon. C. P. Fullerton, K.C., Chairman, Board of Trustees, Canadian National Railways;

Mr. J. E. Labelle, K.C., Trustee, Canadian National Railways;

Mr. S. J. Hungerford, President, Canadian National Railways;

Mr. S. W. Fairweather, Director, Bureau of Economics, Canadian National Railways;

Mr. T. H. Cooper, Auditor of General Accounts, Canadian National Railways;

Mr. B. J. Roberts, Comptroller, Government Guarantee Branch, Department of Finance;

Mr. O. A. Matthews, George A. Touche & Company, Accountants and Auditors.

Your committee had under consideration Bill No. 24, an act respecting the Canadian National Railways and to authorize the provision of moneys to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred during the calendar year 1935, and in its second report presented on the 9th of April, 1935, reported the said bill without amendment. A full explanation of this bill was given in the House of Commons by the Minister of Railways and Canals.

Your committee had under consideration items numbers 293, 294, 295, 296 and 297 (Canadian National Steamships and Maritime Freight Rates Act), of the estimates of the fiscal year 1935-1936 approved the same and recommended them to the house in its third report dated the 10th of April, 1935.

The budget for the year 1935 of Canadian National Railways and Canadian National Steamships estimates totals operating revenues for the year at $180,000,000 and operating expenses of $163,200,000. In addition to operating expenses there are sundry other items charged against operating revenues including interest on funded debt due to the public amounting to $62,600,000, showing an estimated deficit on the year's operations of $45,800,000. Of this amount, however, $1,020,000, depreciation reserve and $780,000 amortization of discount on funded debt, or $1,800,000 in all, are not required in cash; so that the estimated net cash requirement on deficit account for the year is $44,000,000.

The total capital expenditures for the year, estimated as follows:

For additions and betterments, $5,279,600; for investments and securities representing capital expenditures, $220,400; a total of $5,500,000, call for no special comment beyond the fact that under the item of "hotels" some $600,000 is provided for opening the Saskatoon hotel, and $300,000 to continue the construction of the Vancouver hotel.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. T. H. STINSON (Victoria, Ontario) moved:

That for the remainder of the session all private bills when presented be read a first and second time and referred forthwith, and that standing order 105 respecting the posting of private bills be suspended.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Mr. REID: There are two changes contemplated in the proposed bill. The first is to amend paragraph (b), subsection 3, of section 25, and would empower the minister to purchase silver for the redemption of dominion notes. The second amendment is to repeal subsection 4 of section 26. As the section stands at present, it expressly prohibits the Bank of Canada from purchasing a greater amount of silver than 1,671,802 fine ounces during a period of three years—1935, 1936 and 1937. The change proposed in the bill provides that the Bank of Canada shall not hold less than 1,671,802 fine ounces and so removes the prohibitory provision of the section.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If the hon. gentleman's statement is accurate, as it is no doubt intended to be, the motion is out of order. He said a moment ago that the bill contemplates the expenditure by the minister of moneys for the purpose of dealing with silver, and it comes directly within the prohibition whereby measures of this kind must emanate from the government of the day, with the authority of a message. Apart from all that, the effect is to change the policy that has been defined by parliament. I suppose a private member could move to do that were it not that it involves the question of the expenditure of money, as a bill did the other day. I therefore submit that the motion is out of order.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I rise to a point of order. In this matter we have to consider the corporation as it is, whether it is a private capital corporation or a state-owned corporation. It is not state-owned. The capital of the bank is private. If the remarks of the Prime Minister are correct, if the Bank of Canada is a public institution with no private capital, I submit that the government should answer the questions which were put by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre some time ago. If not, very well. I contend that the motion proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster should be accepted.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On the point of order, the Prime Minister raised two points, though he abandoned the second one in regard to a private member's right to propose an amendment to the Bank of Canada Act. That objection could not stand for a moment. As I understand the bill as explained by the hon. member who proposes it, it does not seek to impose obligations on the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: He said the government would purchase—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think so. My understanding is that it seeks to abolish the maximum limitation of the amount of silver, which is specifically limited by one of the sections of the act. If that is the case I do not think it does impose obligations on the crown. However, I should be glad if Your Honour would look into the matter. It is different from the point raised by the Prime Minister the other day. I agree that the former bill did affect the revenues of the crown, but I do not think that is the case here.

Mr. BENNETT: If I may be allowed to speak again, I would point out that it is not a question of the revenues but of the expenditure of moneys for the acquisition of silver. The hon. gentleman proposed that the government should expend money for the purchase of silver.

An hon. MEMBER: I do not think so.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what he said in moving for leave to introduce the bill; that was what caught my attention. The bill clearly contemplates that the minister shall spend money, and it is not competent for a private member to instruct the house that the minister shall spend money to buy silver.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am inclined to think that the objection raised by the Prime Minister is a vital one. However, if the hon. member will allow the matter to stand until to-morrow I shall have an opportunity in the meantime to consider his remarks as reported in Hansard and will then rule on the question.

Motion stands.

THE LATE VISCOUNT BYNG

TRIBUTES TO HERO OF VIMY AND FORMER GOVERNOR GENERAL BY MR. BENNETT, MR. MACKENZIE KING AND MR. GARDINER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is with feelings of great sadness and profound emotion that I have to announce to the house the death this morning of Field Marshal the Right Honourable Viscount Byng of Vimy. I am sure that all the members of this house and men and women in every part of Canada and in every walk of life will share those feelings.

Lord Byng had a very long and distinguished career. It is over fifty years since he joined the army, but his career was great alike in peace and in war. He saw service, while still very young, in the Sudan and later in the Boer war in South Africa. When the great war came, he went to France with a cavalry division and saw service on the western front, commanded the Ninth Army Corps at the Dardanelles, the Seventeenth Army corps, and ultimately succeeded to the command of the Canadian Army corps.

I need hardly say that to every Canadian who served overseas, his command of that corps is one of their proudest recollections and memories. It was while acting in that capacity that he carried forward the operations which resulted in the victory at Vimy Ridge. Some of the members in this house who were present on that occasion realize more fully than could be realized by any words of mine, if I could but describe it, the preparation that was made for that great adventure. I recall reading not long since the story of the departure of the Germans from that hill when a high German staff officer with tears streaming down his face, said "Impossible, impossible!" For the achievement was one of the greatest in the annals of war; such preparation—such patient preparation—had never before been known. The valour of Canadians on that day stands out in the story of arms as one of the major achievements of man under great strain and stress and under the fire of big guns achieving an almost impossible task.

His fame and name established by that great achievement which ranked him not only as a great commander and a very great general, it is needless to say that he became so endeared to his men that it was no longer respect and regard for a great commander but affection for a great general that inspired them on all occasions. When the war was over, his country honoured him with a peerage, parliament thanked him for his services and he was honoured with a substantial grant of money.

Then one would have said that, resting upon his laurels, Lord Byng might well have been content; he had rendered great service to his king, the empire and the world, but he came here as governor general, as the representative of the king, and for five long years we recall with pride and satisfaction the position which he occupied in the affections of the Canadian people. Canadians of course recall him best because of the part he played at Vimy when he commanded the Canadian corps and for his position here as representative of the king.

He had a singular genius for friendship. If one might speak from personal experience, I think I have met very few men for whom one had a feeling not only of respect and regard but of deep and abiding affection. He had that power over men with whom he came into contact that indicated that genius for friendship which is not given to many men. In every part of this country he was concerned for the welfare not only of all Canadians but particularly of those who had been his comrades in great struggle and strife and who had been under his command; for in war he cared for his men; in peace he cared with equal devotion for those who had survived. Indeed there are no words that I could use at this time that would express my profound admiration for the qualities of that great soldier. He had kept company with pain and strife, bloodshed and carnage, and it might be indeed said that he owed to virtue every triumph that he knew.

Then, when he returned and was honoured by his sovereign by being promoted to the rank of viscount, instead of resting quietly at his country estate in Essex, at the call of duty and really at the request of his sovereign he assumed the very difficult task of head of the Metropolitan police. He was compelled by reason of ill health to resign. He travelled a bit and when he returned to this country, hon. members will recall the manifestations of affectionate pride by Canadians who had served under him overseas and by men and women in every walk of life.

He has passed from us, but he has left behind him an imperishable memory. His life, its influence, its effect upon the lives of others will endure as long as the history and record of our country live. I trust we realize that we have lost something very precious, something that cannot well be mentioned or described in words. He was a man who was familiar with death in all its forms and who knew life as few of us are privileged to know it. He had a profound regard for religious teachings, especially in the faith and confidence he had that this life was but the beginning of another more glorious, and I think we might say of him:

> He is not dead! he has but passed
> Beyond the mists that blind us here
> Into the new and larger life
> Of that serener sphere.

I am sure I but speak the thoughts in the mind of every hon. member to-day in conveying to his widow, the partner of his joys, his sorrows, his pleasures, his triumphs, the deep sympathy of this house and every member of it in her irreparable loss, and to the members of his family who survive, that distinguished family, of which the name of the original bearer of the title is recorded in brass upon the stone flags of the great hall at Westminster, our sympathy in the great loss that has been sustained not only by wife and family but by this empire and every nation of it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, members of both houses of parliament and the people of Canada generally will greatly appreciate the tribute which has just been paid by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the memory of the late Lord Byng. As leader of the opposition and one who for a number of years enjoyed the closest official and personal relations with Lord Byng, may I say in deep sincerity that I join with all that has been said in praise of the great career which has just drawn to its close, and of the qualities which won for Lord Byng in his lifetime not only the admiration but the abiding regard and esteem of those who served with him and of all who knew him best. The loss which Britain mourns to-day in the passing of one of her most distinguished sons is a loss which will be felt in all parts of the British empire, but in no other part as much as in this dominion. Because of his immediate contact with Canadians in the great war as commander of the Canadian corps, and of the high position he held in Canada as governor general, Lord Byng was brought, on the field of battle and in affairs of state, into closer association with a larger number of Canadians than any other person who has held either of those positions. In that twofold way his life was more intimately linked with the lives of many of our people than that of any other governor general.

I shall not attempt to review the career of the late Lord Byng; that has already been done by the Prime Minister, and indeed it is already a part of history itself. But I should like to join with the Prime Minister in giving expression to a thought or two arising out of the personal association which I was privileged to have with Lord Byng during the years that I enjoyed the intimate and close association to which I have referred. Of the many qualities which served to endear Lord Byng to those who knew him I should say the greatest of all was his ever present sense of duty. Viewing his life as a whole, one cannot but see in it much that, from the point of view of service to the crown and to the state, was exemplary. From the very beginning of his interest in affairs it was a life of service, and service in a very large way. That life of service carried with it those characteristics of conscientiousness, fearlessness, love of justice, the desire to see the right thing done, and to further the right with which one associates faithfulness to duty. Another quality which endeared Lord Byng to those who knew him best was his great modesty and accessibility. There was something exceptionally fine in the directness and simplicity of his nature. There was nothing affected about him, he was naturalness itself in his relations with his fellow men. Moreover, by nature, he was genuinely considerate and kind. He had a very great love for his fellow men. I think it was a distinguishing characteristic, that he was particularly fond of the average man. He had an especial concern, naturally, for those who had served with him in the great war, and it is little wonder that his name is held in reverence by the veterans of that great struggle. But his sympathy was essentially with human nature and with men of all classes. That was evidenced while he was in Canada by the extent to which he went from one end of this country to the other to become personally informed and acquainted with conditions, and to meet and know the people. I venture to say there are few, if any, who have held the great office of governor general in Canada who have left behind more personal friends and acquaintances than it was Lord Byng's privilege to have made during the time he was in this country.

There were other qualities, to one of which the Prime Minister has referred, which were also outstanding. Lord Byng was a great friend. I always felt in my association with him during the years I was in office that I had in him a friend with whom I could discuss most intimately and advantageously all the affairs that came before the government for consideration. The years from 1921 to 1925 were difficult and trying years. I should like to say that throughout that period I constantly felt that the government could not have received from a governor general more helpful counsel and assistance than was sought to be given to my colleagues and myself by Lord Byng.

Perhaps I can best express what my feelings were towards Lord Byng when I say to the house that in the early part of 1926, when we were drawing near to the end of Lord Byng's term of office and it became necessary to recommend a successor, I wrote to the British Prime Minister and said that, so happy and cordial had our relations been in all respects throughout all the time that Lord Byng had been here and we had shared so fully each others confidence, there was nothing which my colleagues and myself would more welcome, if it were agreeable to Lord Byng himself and to His Majesty the King, than an extension or renewal of his term of office as governor general. Such was the nature of our official relations. As is known, those official relations were severed owing to a difference of view on a constitutional question. But I felt then, I feel now, and I shall always feel, as regards both Lord Byng and myself, that each of us, with respect to that particular matter, did that which was right in his own eyes.

I feel that the empire has lost a great soldier, an exemplary citizen and a good man. I think we may all be proud that the name of Lord Byng of Vimy will have an enduring association with our dominion both at home and abroad. I join with the Prime Minister, as my colleagues on this side of the house will wish to do, in his request that Your Honour convey to Lady Byng an expression of the deep sympathy felt for her in her great bereavement by all hon. members of this House of Commons.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): It was with deep regret that we learned a few minutes ago of the passing of Lord Byng, former governor general of Canada. Those of us who had the privilege of meeting him here, and indeed citizens resident in different parts of Canada who had that privilege, realize that his most outstanding quality was his broad human sympathy. I join with the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition in extending to his bereaved relatives and to all those who are near and dear to him an expression of deep sympathy with them in their sad loss.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

REPORT OF MACDONALD COMMISSION APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO CONDITIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling) whether he has yet received the report of the Macdonald commission investigating unemployment relief in British Columbia. If so, will he table the report.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): The report to which the hon. member refers reached me this morning. I have not had time to look into it yet.

RADIO BROADCASTING COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ONESIME GAGNON (Dorchester) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if he is aware that a certain number of employees of the radio broadcasting commission have not been paid since the last 15th March?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I know that the payment of salaries of a certain number of employees of that commission, whose appointment had not been authorized by the treasury board, has been delayed for some time. Not very long ago, a list of these employees was forwarded to the treasury board and I believe that the payment of their salaries was authorized last Monday.

PRIVILEGE—MR. VENIOT

REPORT OF HON. J. B. M. BAXTER, ROYAL COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I desire to bring up a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, but before doing so may I say that I hesitate to refer to this matter at this late stage of the session, when there are other more important matters to be decided before prorogation. I feel, however, that I am entitled to bring up this matter on a question of privilege. I am not sure that I am right, however, so I am now submitting the matter for Your Honour's consideration. On a question of privilege would I be entitled to deal with the report, that was laid on the table of the house yesterday, of Commissioner Baxter in connection with charges made by me on the floor of this house?

Mr. SPEAKER: If I were to decide the matter offhand I would say no, but I should prefer not to do that. I should like to give the matter consideration until to-morrow, if that would be satisfactory to the hon. member.

Mr. VENIOT: May I also request Your Honour, after you have given consideration to the matter, to indicate when or under what circumstances I might be permitted to bring up this matter.

VICTORIA BRIDGE TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): On Friday last a delegation came from the counties of Chambly, Verchères, Rouville, Laprairie and Napierville, asking the government to reduce the tolls on the Victoria bridge. I understand that this delegation was received by the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman when he will be in a position to tell the house what will be the reduction, if any.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the delegation to which the hon. member has referred met a committee of the cabinet and presented a memorial in which they asked for modification of the present tolls on the Victoria bridge. As the matter was one wholly within the province of the railway company it was referred to that corporation in order that a report might be made upon the representations that were presented by the delegation. The report has not yet been received from the railway company. When it is received appropriate action will be taken.

GIBB REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I should like to ask the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if he has any information to give the house as to whether the government intend to implement the Gibb report which was presented to the government a few years ago, and if so whether such implementation will be carried out before the end of the session or before the dissolution of parliament.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): In reply to my hon. friend I may say that the report has not been implemented by legislation, but has helped to bring about improvements in the administration of our national harbours. No legislation implementing the report will be brought down during this session.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SEIZURE OF SCHOONER PAUL T.—DISCREPANCY BETWEEN ANSWER TABLED AND ANSWER HANDED TO MEMBER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I promised the house that I would have the report of the answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot) brought down from the Hansard office. The original is in my hands; it is initialled by "F", the clerk assistant at the table, and is in language exactly similar to that reproduced in Hansard of Thursday, January 24, 1935. It is open for inspection, but will be returned to Hansard.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Prime Minister the answer that was handed by the Secretary of State—

Mr. BENNETT: To the clerk of the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —to the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. BENNETT: No, a page took that to the hon. member.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): I never stated that the answer that appeared in Hansard had not been prepared by the department. My only contention was that what was handed to me as the official document did not appear in Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not handed as an official document.

INTERPRETATION ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 74, to amend the Interpretation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to establish a dominion trade and industry commission, and to provide that the tariff board shall act as the commissioners with prescribed powers and duties, and that a director of prosecutions be appointed to carry on such legal proceedings as may be required under the provisions of the act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the terms of the resolution indicate clearly the purposes for which it is placed before the house. It is proposed to bring in a measure to establish a dominion trade and industry commission, and to provide that the tariff board shall act as commissioners with powers and duties as indicated in the bill. There is a further provision that there be appointed a director of prosecutions to carry on such legal proceedings as may be required properly to make effective the terms of the bill. I believe a discussion on the resolution might be more effective in committee, and I would recommend that we proceed to that stage.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the director of prosecutions be a full-time appointee?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister any information to give out as to whether the government has decided who the appointee will be?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; no consideration has been given the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister given any consideration to the question of remuneration for the commissioner?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, full consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How much?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will be disclosed in the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the rate of remuneration be fixed in the bill to be introduced?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Is there any particular reason for the government's decision to have the present tariff board act as commissioners, rather than setting up a separate board of commissioners for the purposes of this measure?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One of the reasons is that we feel quite confident the tariff board can carry out the duties of the dominion trade and industry commission without setting up an independent body, and we will be saving money to the treasury.

Mr. EULER: The minister states that is one reason; what are the others?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We feel the members of the tariff board are well qualified to carry out the work.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Is it the government's intention to add to the personnel of the tariff board, if this work is allotted to it, or is it considered that the present personnel is large enough to carry out the work?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no provision in the bill for adding to the personnel of the tariff board, but there is a provision in the legislation setting up the tariff board whereby additional personnel may be added if required.

Mr. McINTOSH: Will supplementary machinery be established in each province in order to enforce the provisions of the board?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As the hon. member must know, the administration of justice in Canada is in the hands of the attorneys-general of the provinces. The public prosecutor would be expected so far as may be necessary to collaborate with the various attorneys-general.

Mr. McINTOSH: I am not a legal expert; that is the reason I asked for the information.

Mr. GARDINER: Before the question is put may I ask if the minister really believes the present tariff board will have sufficient time to attend to the duties of both branches of their work, namely, that connected with tariffs and the work which will come to them as the result of this measure?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the point about which I am most concerned at the moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, they will.

Mr. DONNELLY: Is this to be the brain trust which is to control and regulate industry in Canada?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I don't know anything about a brain trust.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 86, to establish a dominion trade and industry commission.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Canadian radio broadcasting service, $1,500,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: In answer to a question asked before the orders of the day were called the minister replied that certain employees of the radio commission have not been paid since the month of March, because they had been employed without the necessary authorization of the treasury board, and that this condition must be adjusted before they receive payment. How did it happen that these people were given employment without the approval of the treasury board being obtained?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): Certain employees were taken by the commission and paid out of the program allotment, and I understand that the auditor general ruled that these employees had not been regularly appointed, that such appointments should have been authorized by the treasury board. There was a difference of opinion in this connection and the Department of Justice ruled in favour of the decision of the auditor general. The matter was submitted to the treasury board and at its meeting the appointment of these employees was authorized.

Mr. MALCOLM: Surely the minister does not mean to say that the artists employed by the commission must have their engagement confirmed by the treasury board. Has the commission not the right to hire its own artists?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I was referring more particularly to the announcers.

Mr. MALCOLM: They should be in the same position.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that the Department of Justice ruled that these employments should have been authorized by the treasury board.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The announcers and people in similar positions are temporary rather than permanent employees, are they not?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Some of the announcers are permanent, others are temporary.

Mr. MALCOLM: They should not be permanent.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Some time before the recess we extended the life of the commission for a few months and I should like to know if it is the intention of the government to extend the life of the radio commission still further.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This matter has been under careful consideration by the government and we have come to the conclusion that we should ask the house to extend the life of the commission to the end of this fiscal year. The commission has been in operation only since January 1, 1933, and it was thought that it should be continued a few months longer and we should let another parliament decide whether it should be abolished or its powers modified. A bill will be presented shortly to extend the life of the commission to the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): This is the vote under which extension of services will take place. The service in British Columbia is very unsatisfactory and I should like to know what works are to be undertaken to bring about improvements.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not in a position to give details but I may say that the commission has in mind the construction of powerful stations throughout Canada, one to be located in Vancouver. The commission hopes to be able to start this program of construction within a very short time.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): Is anything provided in this vote for that work?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand that the commission intends to use a certain part of this vote to start its program. I believe it intends to commence the construction of the station in Vancouver as soon as it is authorized by the government.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): The minister has just indicated that the commission proposes to construct a high-powered station in Vancouver. As briefly as possible I should like to outline the situation in British Columbia. Vancouver and its immediate environments on the lower mainland is situated in the southwest corner of the province and I believe this is one of the reasons why we have such unsatisfactory service. There are six private stations operating in Vancouver and even though the city and its immediate surroundings contains two-thirds of the population of the province I believe it has pretty fair service at the present time. The government should consider carefully before it decides to construct another high-powered station in Vancouver. The minister should consider if it would not be for the general benefit of the outlying sections of the province to locate such a station at a more central point than the city of Vancouver. The reception received by points in the interior of the province is exceedingly unsatisfactory and the construction of a high-powered station in Vancouver will not improve the situation. One quarter of the power of such a station will go out over the Pacific ocean while another quarter will go south across the line where the American people are well served with their own stations. The people in the interior of the province have no reception at all except when they turn on the American stations. The general complaint throughout the province is that they can only get reception from the American stations. I therefore appeal to the minister to have this situation looked into carefully and to see whether a better location could not be secured than the city of Vancouver.

[Mr. J. A. Fraser.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to call the attention of the radio commission to my hon. friend's remarks, which I am sure they will consider carefully.

Mr. BOULANGER: Is it the intention of the commission to discontinue broadcasting French programs in the western provinces?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have no intimation or knowledge of any such intention on the part of the commission.

Mr. MUNN: It is recognized that Vancouver is the most central point in British Columbia as regards population, and I would impress on the minister the advisability when the station is built of having it sufficiently strong and sufficiently high powered that interior points will be taken care of, especially in the riding of Cariboo, from which my hon. friend comes.

Mr. GARDINER: What progress has been made in the last year by the commission either in acquiring stations or in building new ones?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the details before me of what they have done in the last twelve months. I know however that the commission has built and opened a station in the city of Quebec and another one, more than a year ago, at Chicoutimi. Another one is in operation at New Carlisle in Bonaventure county, and I believe a station of 1,000 watts was purchased and is operated at Windsor, Ontario. There are other stations which have been opened up by the commission, not very powerful however—1,000 and 5,000 watt stations.

Mr. GARDINER: What progress has been made by the commission in taking care of outlying districts, not only in Quebec but in other parts of Canada, which do not get very much service from the ordinary stations?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The aim of the commission is to cover every section of Canada as far as possible, but as I have already stated the appropriations that have been voted have not been sufficient to allow the commission to build expensive stations such as are built in other countries. The commissioners have been doing all they possibly could with the moneys available, $1,000,000 odd voted last year and the amount being voted this year; but they cannot maintain first class programs and build powerful stations all over Canada in one year. Everyone will admit, I think, that the amount is inadequate, but it was our view that in these years of depression we should not have been justified in asking this house to vote large amounts to build powerful stations throughout the country. I hope that during this fiscal year the commission will be in a position to execute a part of its program.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Last year, Mr. Chairman, your were the chairman of a radio committee which, with a good deal of care and time, undertook to make an examination into the conditions that had affected radio broadcasting in this country up to that time. Your committee reported, making certain recommendations, which I think were well thought of. One of them advised the government to undertake the further consideration during the recess of amendments to the act to meet the suggestions made by the committee. I should like to know what the government has done in regard to the report of the radio committee of last year—whether an investigation has taken place with respect to its recommendations and whether the government proposes to amend the act and, if not, why not?

Mr. BENNETT: When the bill is introduced extending the life of the radio commission until the end of the next fiscal year, as it will be, I desire to make some observations touching the whole radio situation in this dominion. The real truth is that the effort to destroy this publicly owned utility is very well known and is very active, and whether or not the utility can be saved will depend upon the attitude of the House of Commons towards it and their willingness to realize that a country that is as poor as we are cannot spend at once the money that is required to make this facility as perfect as it should be. I may say to this committee very frankly that it will require a very large sum of money to give a country of the size of this that coverage which would approach perfection. I had occasion the other day in England to make some inquiries regarding the manner in which they were proceeding with their broadcasting corporation. It will be known to members of this committee that Sir John Reith, who is managing director of the British Broadcasting Corporation, went to South Africa to make them a report, and he reported—I think the report has been published; if not, I am not divulging any confidence when I say that he reported in favour of a publicly owned service. The same applies to Australia and New Zealand. We in this country are in an exceedingly difficult position. We have ten and a half millions of people and we have to rent several thousands of miles of wire in order to broadcast on an efficient scale. That is very expensive having regard to the existing rates for leasing wires both from railways and telephone companies. And then always insidiously is the attack made against the publicly owned facility and the effort made to destroy it. I will deal with that at somewhat greater length, but I should like to say this to the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). Possibly he realizes that sometimes in our anxiety to be critical—I am not referring to anything that has taken place to-day but more to what occurred last year—we do the thing itself an injury. I think that perhaps that is recognized by most men who have studied the situation. I have a considerable amount of information and I shall be pleased to place it before the house on the second reading or when the bill is in committee. I am convinced that at the present time only one of two things can be done. Whoever is on the treasury benches will have to ask parliament for a grant of money to enable these facilities to be provided, if they think the conditions in the country will stand it, or to utilize the revenues to the extent that may be possible, gradually to build the stations necessary—gradually.

That is one in the east, one in the west and one somewhere else, in order that there may be a complete coverage. I do not know how the committee feel about the matter, but the more I see of it and know of it, the more determined I would be, if I were here, that I should not yield this facility to any private enterprise. That is my firm conclusion with respect to the matter. I say that very strongly, and the more I see of the matter, the more convinced I am.

I also realize the committee must take cognizance of the fact that we must proceed gradually or else parliament must be prepared to provide a larger sum of money than we feel we can ask at the moment, in order to give effect to some of the recommendations that were made last year. I should like to ask the tolerance of the committee at the present moment in order that when the bill is moved, they may be presented with such facts as various officials have been able to gather together during the past few months and there may be added to it, such observations as are prompted by the information that I have received, for, as the members of the committee possibly know, a committee has been set up again to consider the broadcasting situation in Great Britain. I think it is headed by the former speaker of the House of Commons, the present Lord Ellsworth. That is my memory; I speak subject to correction in that regard. I shall endeavour to place before the committee at the proper time, when the bill is being moved, such information as I have on the subject.

Mr. EULER: When does the Prime Minister propose to introduce the bill?

Mr. BENNETT: Right away.

Mr. EULER: To-day?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I regard the statement made by the Prime Minister as probably one of the most important he has made this year in the house. I can assure him now, in the future as in the past, of my hearty cooperation with him in maintaining the principle of public ownership. My purpose in asking the question was far from being critical as I think you, sir, as chairman of the committee of last year will remember. I wish to know, however, whether the government has taken into consideration a recommendation of the committee for an alteration in the set-up of the personnel of the commission, with a view to eliminating certain charges and difficulties of management that had become apparent to the committee.

As for the commission's work itself, I have for the greater part of that work a very sincere admiration, and I think the commission on the whole is to be congratulated on what it has succeeded in doing with the meagre funds at its disposal and the technical difficulties under which it operates. But that should not prevent those of us who feel that in this question the whole principle of public ownership may be at stake, in doing all we can to see to it that the recommendations of the committee of last year, in so far as they may be practical and possible, are carried out. We felt those recommendations were calculated to stimulate the character of the commission, to strengthen the principle of public ownership in regard to radio broadcasting and to improve the facilities of the commission. I am glad to hear what the Prime Minister has said, and I am sure the committee will wait with interest a further statement from him when the bill comes down.

Mr. EULER: I was one of those who were on the original committee that brought in the report upon which was based the bill establishing a radio commission. I was then and I am still in favour of public ownership of this utility. I also earlier this session made some rather strong criticisms of the way in which the work was carried on. I do not propose to repeat those criticisms to-day, but I do hope when the Prime Minister or the Minister of Marine, if he has the matter in charge, discusses the bill, some of the criticisms made at that time in good faith will be answered and that there will be some hope at least that the conditions complained of will be remedied.

Before I sit down I would like to ask a question—and it is called forth by an observation of the Prime Minister himself—with regard to the funds available, whether all the revenues that come from licences, any revenues that may come on the account of the radio commission, are used for radio purposes? If they are not, they ought to be and no complaint should be made that there is not enough money if all the money that comes in on radio account is not used.

Mr. DURANLEAU: My hon. friend knows the amount of revenue in licence fees.

Mr. EULER: No, I do not.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Last year we collected, I think, $1,480,000, or around $1,500,000. A small balance was left last year. That is why I am asking the committee to vote an amount of $1,500,000. It covers all the moneys collected from radio licences.

Mr. EULER: Was the total revenue spent last year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The total was spent last year.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Arising out of that very matter, may I ask the minister whether he recollects that before the radio commission was set up, there had been on the part of radio listeners an overpayment in relation to services of a sum that, I am informed, is in the neighbourhood of $1,100,000. It is true that that was placed in consolidated revenue account, but in my opinion—and I feel sure, other members of the committee will agree with me—that money should have been appropriated and placed at the disposal of the commission when it was set up. In that case the commission would certainly have had more ample funds to operate with than it has had in the past.

In the event of the amendment proposing an appropriation by parliament to the extent of $1,000,000 to assist in setting up stations owned by the commission, it should be regarded not as a charge upon the radio users of this year but as a general charge upon all the taxpayers for that account, because of the fact that it has been used on general taxpayers' account instead of going, as it should have gone from the beginning, to improve the facilities for those who paid the fees. There is about $1,000,000 of a surplus. Of course it went into consolidated revenue account and was expended in the usual way, but that amount should never have been regarded as usable for that purpose; it should have been kept for the commission or, rather, should have been turned back to it.

Mr. BENNETT: The question of funds is of course the vital one. In Great Britain they have now over 7,000,000 licensees, a licence costing substantially $2.50 of our money; it is a little more than that. Of that amount the broadcasting commission has only four shillings and sixpence at its disposal; the rest of it goes to the government. But there you have a compact little island of 40,000,000 people, and you have not any such problems as we have such as cost of wires and costs of leasing wires and things of that sort. To-day in France they are projecting advertisements across the channel throughout England, and also in Germany a high-power station is advertising certain goods that are sold largely in the British islands. The problem with us—

Mr. EULER: Put up a tariff wall.

Mr. BENNETT: That is it exactly. The problem with us is one of money and I desire to speak at some length about that, because I am going to be extremely frank with the committee. The life or death of our adventure in the field of public ownership of the radio depends largely upon our willingness to nurse this infant until it can become strong enough to fend for itself. That is the real truth about the matter and to do that means that it has to be fed money. The difficulty is to find the money except from the licence payers. I think we should at this time use for the purposes of the commission all the money that comes from licences; that is my view.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder whether the minister could give us any declaration of his policy in regard to a matter about which I had some correspondence with him.

It is the question of giving authority to his inspectors or some branch of the board to compel people who are running electrical machines that cause interference to remedy the trouble. The board spends considerable money in sending cars throughout the country to locate what is called interference. In British Columbia the minister has some very capable men, one especially; he comes around, being requested to do so, and locates the cause of interference. But he is utterly powerless to do anything to have that source of trouble eliminated. He can go and advise people and plead with them, but that is all. Unfortunately, there are hogs in the world who are indifferent to any appeal of that kind, and will only pay attention to a direct mandate backed by law. Often the trouble can be so easily eliminated. I tied up the whole radio service of the little town where I live one day by starting a small electric fan in my office, and for political reasons I did not wish to be so highly unpopular. It only cost me about $4 to provide the necessary remedy. There are people who are totally indifferent to the convenience of anyone but themselves, and who will run little electrical machines, which could easily be fixed to avoid any trouble, but, regardless of the inconvenience they are causing, they refuse to do so. In the case of a power plant and the like the cost might run into a greater amount, perhaps $100, but still there is no reason why even they should not march with the times and not cause trouble to a large number of people who now own radios. In these days, when everything we do or say is regimented, from babies upward or downward, as in the case of Ontario, I think we might well put some teeth in the act and give the inspector or the board power to compel the removal of the grievances to which I have alluded.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is no doubt that one of the great difficulties of our inspectors is that they have no power over those who operate electrical machines which cause interference. I had a report some time ago from the chief of my department suggesting an amendment to the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act which would give authority to the inspectors to order certain amelioration of these machines and to confiscate the machines in case the orders of the inspector are not complied with. This is a delicate question, the government have had it under consideration for some time. Would it be advisable to bring in such legislation at this session?

Mr. NEILL: But it has been under consideration for some months, if not a year or more, and I suggest that now is the time for action, in view of the approach of an election when we shall all want to listen to the radio addresses of the leaders. The minister has agreed that this evil exists, then why not take some action? I think the Scriptures say that now is the accepted time, to-morrow may be too late.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There may be a constitutional question on that point; it is a matter of interfering with the right of operation of private property. For instance, physicians nearly all have electrical machines in their offices which in some cases cause interference with radio reception.

Mr. EULER: And oil-burners in furnaces.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Some oil-burners, too, but I am told that it is the machines operated by doctors which are causing most trouble at the present time.

Mr. NEILL: But is it not a fact that often it could be remedied at very slight cost? Some are old-fashioned machines, or machines with defective brushes, I think they are called, which could be readily altered. I suggest that the inspectors should have power to use discretion in these matters, and where people deliberately tell him to go to a warmer place and will do nothing, however small the cost, I think he should have power to compel them. Why should the convenience of a large number of people suffer from the miserliness or meanness or dog-in-the-manger attitude of such people?

Mr. BROWN: I am not very familiar with the activities of the radio commission. It may well be that the complaints which have arisen are well-founded; indeed one can scarcely think otherwise since they come from all parts of the country. At the same time I feel it is the duty of this house and of the people to give this commission every possible chance to make good. I am a long way from being a socialist to the degree of wanting all our activities brought under government control. I disagree with many of the propositions which are now being made to control us in the activities of our private lives, but at the same time I believe there are some activities that can be performed properly only by the people as a whole represented by their government. Such activities we speak of as natural monopolies. There is no reason why broadcasting should be in the hands of private parties. No private individual or company has any vested right to give this service to the people, it is one of the things that the government should control. When the proposal was made for a radio commission I gave it my heartiest support, and I am still prepared to give it that support. We can well believe that there are private interests that are doing their best to destroy public ownership in radio broadcasting. To me it would be a disaster if through any fault of the commission, whether it be incapacity from the business point of view, or from motives of partisanship, government control of radio should come into such disrepute among the people that they would want the act which brought the commission into being repealed. The disaster to my mind would be just as great if it were brought about by undue impatience on the part of the people. We should be willing to give the commission a reasonable time in which to make good. That is not saying that there are not some grievances which should be aired. But while having that in view it is in the interest of the Canadian people to give the commission a fair chance, criticizing them where they should be criticized, but at the same time maintaining our stand for public ownership. If public ownership cannot succeed in connection with radio broadcasting, then I do not see any activity in which it can be successful. I am a public ownership man to the extent at least of believing that these natural monopolies should be held by the people. So as I say I hope that nothing in the activities of the commission itself or of undue impatience on the part of the people with imperfections in the service will tend towards putting the whole matter back into the hands of private owners.

Mr. EULER: I agree with a good deal of what the last speaker has said. My complaint originally was that so little progress has been made in the purposes for which the commission was established, that is gradually to eliminate private broadcasting. But I shall not deal with that further at the moment. Can the minister say whether the commission has given any consideration to a complaint which has been made by others as well as myself concerning a certain regulation? I have not the exact wording, but this is what I said a few weeks ago:

> Then finally I come to the censorship established by the commission.... Article 90 provides that no broadcasting station may broadcast any statements or suggestions contrary to the expressed purpose of any existing legislation.

If I understand the English language that means that any speaker, we will say during the coming campaign, who criticizes any legislation now on the statute books will be in danger of imprisonment, perhaps. Surely that is not a fair regulation to maintain. It is perfectly certain that during the coming campaign there will be a great deal of criticism of legislation on the statute books to-day, perhaps some of it placed there by the present government. Surely a member of parliament or anyone else speaking publicly during the campaign should not be exposed to any penalty whatever if he declares himself opposed to any legislation that may now exist. That is the only way in which progress can be made, by criticising that which we have and correcting it if the people see fit to do so. I believe that regulation should be struck out or altered.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Probably my hon. friend knows that this section of the regulations has not been put into force in any particular case.

Mr. EULER: It should not be there.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The commission has been very broad and lenient towards any public man who wanted to speak over the radio, to criticize laws, governments or parties. The commission has never interfered. The question of whether or not this section should disappear probably will be considered. Certainly I will direct the matter to the attention of the commission and ascertain whether they intend to put that regulation into force.

Mr. MALCOLM: Does the minister mean to say that the commission has power to pass a regulation with regard to what may be said over the radio that will stifle the speeches broadcast by every hon. member of this house so that, in order to get our opinions expressed, we will have to rely on the daily newspapers and have those opinions circulated. Does the minister mean to imply that he will speak only to the commission about a matter of such great national importance? It sounds to me like the height of absurdity. The government should amend the regulation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Of course the commission has some control over the private stations and it has the right to prohibit any defamatory speech, for instance.

Mr. MALCOLM: That is not what it says.

Mr. EULER: It says a man may not express any opinion contrary to any legislation we now have on the statute books. I protest against the extreme nature of the regulation. I could understand it if they were empowered to prohibit the broadcasting of speeches of an inflammatory nature, or those which perhaps advocate violence or anything like that. But if a man gets up, as hundreds and thousands will during the coming campaign, and criticizes legislation that has been placed on the statute books by this or perhaps the preceding government, surely he should not be liable to a penalty or to imprisonment for doing so. The minister says the commission have never exercised that power, but I do not regard that as a satisfactory answer at all. We might pass a law providing that a man might be hanged for stealing; it might be said that no one ever is hanged for stealing, but that would not be a sufficient excuse. I maintain that this power should not be in the hands of the commission at all.

Mr. HEAPS: Are these the regulations of the commission?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Would it not be very easy for the minister to see that this regulation is removed? So long as the regulation is there it is quite possible that the man in charge of radio broadcasting, that is to say Mr. Charlesworth, might decide to live up to the regulations, as he should. If he lives up to them and carries out the intent of that provision then any opposition member of this house would be barred from speaking against any legislation that has been enacted by the government. Since that is the case I think in fairness, and in order to protect the right of freedom of expression, the minister should see that this restriction is removed from the regulations of the commission. I believe there was some difficulty last year in British Columbia, where a political organization was deprived of the right to use the radio because they were delivering political speeches which evidently were not satisfactory to certain persons who were opposed to them. I believe in that case the regulations were carried out. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the minister pledge himself to this committee—

Mr. MALCOLM: No; let the minister present the amended regulations to the house.

Mr. HEAPS: He should either present the regulations to the house or pledge himself to the committee that at least this regulation will be eliminated from the rules governing broadcasting in Canada. I agree that there may be times when a broadcasting station may be justified in barring certain types of radio speeches. I need not mention the types that probably would be objectionable, but I think when it comes to a fair discussion of political questions and a fair expression of opinion there should be no limit to the use of the radio in this country.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, as a supporter of public ownership may I say that if the radio commission is a sample of public ownership the sooner it dies a natural death the better it will be for this country. I sat in opposition when a royal commission was appointed, consisting of Sir John Aird and others, to go into this question; that was about the time of the Beauharnois deal. They went all over the world; they even went to Japan, and in their report they recommended the appointment of such a commission. Last year we voted $1,250,000 for the radio commission, which represented an increase of $250,000 over the previous year.

There is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the administration of this commission and with the gentlemen who are members of it. I was listening to the radio last Sunday evening; I was receiving an Anglican service from St. Simon's church, Toronto, from seven to eight o'clock. The prayer before the recessional hymn was written by the great Archbishop Cranmer, who was burned at the stake during the reformation; then, in the midst of the singing, the station switched off the church service and switched on a cocoa advertisement, a Yankee tobacco advertisement and other programs of that kind. Where does the Lord's Day Act come in? It would be a good thing for the people of Canada if this particular kind of public ownership were abolished; even if it meant an increase in licence fees it would be better for us, if we could get rid of some of the objectionable advertising that is being broadcast day after day. We have heard a good deal about the new deal. I know of no agency that is doing more to Americanize the people of Canada than this same radio commission. This commission was set up by a Liberal government, and in the Toronto district the employees are very largely Liberals. What they know about announcing is beyond me; I do not know where they obtained their experience. If the minister wants to have public ownership let him have real public ownership and give the people of this country radio service at cost. Let the people pay for it, and then perhaps we will not have to listen to the jazz that is broadcast night and day, winter and summer. Upon my word, as a Conservative I am surprised at what is heard over the radio, and even at what appears in the newspapers, in connection with politics, sports and everything else. The morning papers of Toronto carry about a page of American baseball news and about half a column of news about the House of Commons. The evening papers contain a few lines more. I would say in connection with this radio question that we have to go to the old country to see what is being done. I could tell you what the British Broadcasting Corporation did with the Baldwin government in 1924, 1925 and 1926; they put them out of office. Protests were received from Italy, Poland and other countries as to the political propaganda which was waged against Italy by the British Broadcasting Corporation. If we wish to continue as a Conservative party the people on the treasury benches will have to take steps to put the brakes on the radio commission before the election.

Mr. HEAPS: How many private licences have been issued by the department since the radio commission came into existence?

Mr. DURANLEAU: We have issued 74 private licences for radio stations.

Mr. EULER: How many were there when the commission was established?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not informed as to that.

Mr. EULER: I am informed that there were only 49 when the commission was established. On the other hand we have established hardly any nationally owned stations, although that was the purpose behind the formation of the commission. The fact is however that we have immensely increased the number of private licences for radio broadcasting stations.

Mr. HEAPS: In what position would the government be if at some future time it attempted to nationalize the broadcasting services? How would they take over the privately owned stations?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Under the act the radio commission has power to expropriate privately owned stations. I would refer the hon. member to section 11 of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act.

Mr. HEAPS: In order to take over privately owned stations upon what basis would the government have to proceed to undertake expropriation proceedings? What compensation would be expected?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Section 12 of the act covers the point:

> The compensation payable in respect of the taking of any property so vested in the commission or of any interest therein or of lands injuriously affected by the construction of the undertakings or works shall be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of the Expropriation Act, and for that purpose the Attorney General of Canada may file an information in the Exchequer court on behalf of the commission—

And so on. In the event of there being no agreement between the owner and the government the exchequer court will pass on the amount of compensation.

Mr. HEAPS: I am trying to get at that. If it comes to arbitration I am wondering if we will have to pay anything for that which is commonly described as goodwill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not believe anything would have to be paid for goodwill because the owners of stations have no vested rights in the channels. The licence is for a period of only six months, and may be withdrawn at the end of that time.

Mr. HEAPS: If such a matter were referred to the exchequer court and that court were empowered to determine as to whether or not there may be any goodwill in the station taken over by the government, is there anything in the licence granted by the government to the private broadcasting stations which distinctly states that in the event of the government expropriating stations nothing will be paid for goodwill?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There is no such provision in the licence because the department contends it is not necessary as such licence is issued for only six months.

Mr. HEAPS: I know that these matters have been interpreted by courts on other occasions. Annual renewals almost assume the proportion of vested rights. Sometimes courts uphold such rights, and I have known of large amounts being spent in arbitration proceedings. In other words, if we grant privileges to these private companies and the time comes when we have to take over the stations we may have to pay a very heavy sum by way of damages for the privileges we are now granting. I have an objection to the granting of so many private licences, and when they are reissued I believe a clause ought to be inserted stating definitely and explicitly the conditions under which the licences are granted to the private broadcasting stations.

Mr. EULER: I should like to support the observations of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I have a distinct recollection that during the proceedings of the original committee which sat in 1932, the matter was very fully discussed, and it was agreed at that time that if any private stations were expropriated or purchased by the government there was not to be any compensation for so-called goodwill of any concerns erecting private broadcasting stations in the future. There was a very clear understanding that they could not expect compensation for goodwill if at a later time they were expropriated by the government. I think the government should be sure it does not enter into any contract through which later on it might be compelled by court process to pay for goodwill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I believe the point is covered by section 13 of the act.

Mr. EULER: I hope it is.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall read the section:

13 (1) In determining the compensation to be paid no allowance shall be made for the value of a licence terminated by the taking of any private station and no person shall be deemed to have any proprietary right in any channel heretofore or hereafter allotted, and no person shall be entitled to any compensation by reason of the cancellation of the allotment of a channel or by reason of the allotment of a new channel in substitution therefor.

(2) If the commission recommends the cancellation of or refusal to renew any licence in the interest of broadcasting generally in Canada and certifies that such cancellation or refusal is not on account of any failure to comply with this act or the Radiotelegraph Act or regulations thereunder, compensation may be paid to the extent of the depreciated value of radio equipment, together with an allowance for the cost of restoring the premises to a tenantable condition for ordinary purposes.

So I say the act clearly defines the compensation to which owners are entitled, such compensation being very limited.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member for North Winnipeg, but it is unfortunate that he interrupted the point we were discussing, namely, as to why the commission and not parliament or the government has the right to enact regulations as to what may or may not be said over the radio. Will the minister read the section of the act which authorizes the commission to institute regulations, and will he read the regulation covering the point?

Mr. DURANLEAU: In the session of 1932 the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act was adopted unanimously by this house. The regulations are provided for by section 10, which reads:

The commission may, with the approval of the governor in council, make by-laws or regulations respecting any of the matters mentioned in the last two preceding sections and generally for the fulfilment of the purposes of the commission.

The regulations are proposed by the radio commission and then submitted to the governor in council for approval.

Mr. MALCOLM: Has this regulation which, generally speaking, prohibits any hon. member of this house from criticizing any previous legislation been approved by the governor in council?

Mr. DURANLEAU: All the by-laws of the radio commission have been approved by the governor in council.

Mr. MALCOLM: We are to understand that the government approves of no man being allowed to criticize any previous legislation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, this government does not approve of that as it believes that members of all parties have the right to criticize legislation which has been adopted by any government.

Mr. EULER: Will the minister read the regulation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can tell the committee that there is nothing political in this.

Mr. MALCOLM: We are not talking about politics.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The commission is entirely independent of politics and it gives full liberty to any member or any speaker.

Mr. EULER: Will the minister read the regulation so that we can judge for ourselves what power it gives?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have just read the regulation. If it is interpreted strictly it does not seem—

Mr. MALCOLM: Read it, please.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have read it but I have no objection to putting it on Hansard. Regulation number 90 reads:

> No broadcasting station may broadcast any speech, printed matter, program or advertising matter containing abusive or defamatory statements with regard to individuals or institutions—

I suppose there is no objection to that? The regulation continues:

> —or statements or suggestions contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation; as for example, the Patent Medicine Act or any regulations promulgated thereunder.

It all turns on the interpretation given to the last part of the regulation. It might be interpreted as prohibiting the criticism of legislation but not in the sense suggested by my hon. friends.

Mr. MALCOLM: What other sense could there be? Under this particular legislation hon. members of this house who were not in favour of the radio commission could be fined and imprisoned for criticising that commission. That is a most absurd position for any member of parliament to be in.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If that is the proper interpretation, the hon. member is right.

Mr. EULER: That is what is stated in the legislation.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to have an explanation from the radio commission as to why they have asked for such powers. The power has never been exercised in the sense suggested by my hon. friends.

Mr. NEILL: There has not been an election yet.

Mr. DURANLEAU: There have been a lot of speeches broadcast.

Mr. VALLANCE: Will the minister ask the official sitting in front of him to interpret that clause?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I understand my hon. friend refers to the man in charge in the department.

Mr. VALLANCE: I want to know the interpretation of this clause by the commission.

Mr. DURANLEAU: They have never interpreted it as prohibiting public speeches criticizing legislation.

Mr. VALLANCE: Why is it there?

Mr. DURANLEAU: They have never taken any steps in connection with such speeches.

Mr. VALLANCE: What does it mean?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Quite frankly, I do not see the necessity of the last part of that regulation.

Mr. MALCOLM: Cancel it then.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister cancel it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to ask the commission to give an explanation of this regulation. If they do not give a satisfactory one I shall ask them to consider changing it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Has the minister the power to compel the commission to change that regulation?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think so. The governor in council has no right to draft regulations although we have to approve them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is a most extraordinary position to take. The regulation distinctly states that it must be approved by the governor in council. If it can be disapproved by the governor in council, surely it could be cancelled.

Mr. EULER: They can withdraw ratification.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think we have a perfect right to ask that that be withdrawn.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: We can hold up the vote until it is withdrawn.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think this is important as it strikes at the very root of free speech.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is the regulation compelling individuals proposing to talk over the radio to tender to the commission a copy of their speeches still in force?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Under section 91 the commission has the right to prohibit the broadcasting of any matter until a continuity or a record or both have been submitted to the commission for examination and approval.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is that being lived up to in the case of all broadcasts?

Mr. HEAPS: Did the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) submit his?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As a matter of fact the commission has been rather broad in its interpretation of this section. Complaints were made in connection with speeches which had been delivered over the radio but as a matter of fact the commission gives absolute liberty providing there are no defamatory statements.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would a man be permitted to broadcast anything he liked over a private station without interference by the radio commission? Were the speeches of Mr. Aberhart of Alberta approved by the commission before they were delivered?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I could not say.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He uses a private station.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot say how far the commission goes in scrutinizing speeches made over private stations.

Mr. VALLANCE: Were the speeches delivered last autumn by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) scrutinized and approved by the commission before they were delivered?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I could not say. They were broadcast from the Ottawa station.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Were they submitted to council before being delivered?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I could not say.

Mr. VALLANCE: Apparently no member of the radio commission is sitting in front of the minister so we cannot find out these things. I should like to change the subject for a moment. I understand it is the intention of the radio commission to establish a new station in western Canada, probably in Saskatchewan. Is the minister in position to speak for the commission and state where they propose to locate this station? He knows that I have made some suggestions to the commission—at least the commission know I have—and there is quite a controversy out there as to where the station should be. I was wondering whether the minister could tell me what the opinion of the commission is on the question.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am not in a position to give that information. The commission has a scheme of construction of different powerful stations in various parts of Canada but I cannot say exactly what the location will be of the station in Saskatchewan.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Can the minister give this committee the undertaking that this provision will be removed from the regulations? This particular clause gives the commission the power to prevent any member of the House of Commons from criticizing the legislation of any government, and especially the legislation passed by this government in the last five years. I intend to criticize practically every act that this government has put through in that period, and I shall want to speak over the radio. But this commission sitting in Ottawa will demand that I submit to them whatever I have to say over the radio, even if it is a private station; they are liable to stop me from criticizing the government. The man who does not criticize this government is derelict in his duties. Now is the minister prepared to give the committee the undertaking that that article that refers to political speeches or speeches delivered by persons interested in political life will be removed from the regulations before this estimate goes through? It is ridiculous.

Mr. EULER: It has to come out.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I can tell my hon. friend that he has nothing to fear in that respect. It was never the intention of the commission, I am sure, and it was not the intention of the government when it was approved, to prohibit or restrict in any sense freedom of criticism.

Mr. EULER: But it is there.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It was not intended to prohibit or restrict criticism of the acts of the government or of the laws adopted by this parliament. My hon. friend can rest assured that no action whatever will be taken by the commission against any political speaker who may criticize the legislation adopted during this parliament or the administration of this government.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The minister cannot get away with that. We had the same thing when the marketing bill was introduced. Certain powers were given to the board but they were not supposed to be exercised. We all know however that if you do not follow the regulations drawn up under that act you are put in gaol. Here is another commission that has power to make regulations and enforce them, with fine or imprisonment for their violation. Surely the minister must have some power in the matter; if he has not he should get that power as soon as possible. If the commission were politically minded it might prevent me from criticizing any legislation this government has passed. The minister is fair, and I submit that he should be prepared to give this committee the assurance that this particular provision in the regulations will be removed before this session closes; otherwise he should not get the vote through.

Mr. EULER: The minister himself has said—I do not want to misquote him—that he sees no reason why it should be in the regulations. It must be evident to every member that a regulation which prohibits free speech and the freedom to criticize legislation now on the statutes is wrong; it is subversive of free speech. It is not a sufficient reason for the minister to say that it was never intended to be used in an arbitrary way. If that is not the intention it should not be there. The power is there and it might be used. I have no objection to the minister amending that article 90 if he wants to prohibit criticism of legislation with respect to patent medicines—that parenthesis is thrown in, though I do not see for what reason. If he wants to protect the right of free speech, if he wants to protect the freedom of every member to criticize existing legislation, he can draw up the regulation in decent language that is not violent. But I am not satisfied to let this vote go through without a definite understanding that our rights in this matter will be fully protected.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not see any reason why this last part of the section should exist. Unless the commissioners give sound reasons—

Mr. FACTOR: What reasons were given to the governor in council when they approved of it?

Mr. DURANLEAU: They did not give any reason. They sent their regulations and they were accepted as a whole.

Mr. EULER: Probably not considered.

Mr. MALCOLM: Will the minister recommend that they be modified?

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will ask the commissioners to explain—

Mr. EULER: No; that won't do.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —why they wish to have it retained, and if they do not give satisfactory reasons—

Mr. YOUNG: Satisfactory to whom?

Mr. DURANLEAU: —I will ask them to repeal this part of the section objected to.

Mr. HEAPS: Why should the minister go to the commission? Why can he not go to the government and have the regulation repealed? It is not a question of the commission at all but of the government, who are the supreme governing authority. They should deal with the question and repeal the regulation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am willing to go the length of the minister's power or the power of the government.

Mr. HEAPS: What are the powers?

Mr. DURANLEAU: My intention is to ask the commission their reasons for embodying in their regulations the provision with respect to legislation, and if their reasons are not sound I intend to ask them to withdraw that part. If they do not do so, and if the Department of Justice rules that I have the power—

Mr. HEAPS: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —I will do it.

Mr. EULER: I suggest that this item stand until that opinion is obtained. We must know whether the minister will recommend that the regulation be removed altogether, or that it will be altered in such a way that the objection we raise will no longer be valid.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I support that view; it is the only reasonable thing. I do not like the position of the minister, where a few minutes ago he threw doubt on his own powers in this regard. The government has power to change the regulations, and when this parliament decides the matter the government should be under obligation to carry it through. Under the circumstances I think the item should stand.

Mr. FACTOR: If I rightly interpret the minister's remarks, then apparently the only power this parliament has is to withhold the vote temporarily until the matter is adjusted. The Prime Minister said there were criticisms against public ownership. Well, one way to destroy confidence in public ownership is to enact regulations such as this. We are in the unfortunate position where even the minister doubts that he has authority to compel the commission to withdraw the regulation. As a matter of fact, I doubt whether the minister can compel the commission to withdraw the regulation, though he may be able to recommend an order in council to withdraw the approval by the governor in council of the regulations, then have them re-enacted. But the only protection afforded to parliament now is to withhold the vote until something is done. I know of nothing so repugnant to the sense of freedom as to allow a regulation of that kind to remain on the statute books. Surely it is not unreasonable, because that is the only protection afforded to the house, to allow the vote to stand until some negotiations take place. The situation is rather an unfortunate one; it shows a tendency toward a loss of the rights of parliament when it has to negotiate with an outside party in order to protect the rights of its citizens. It is about time that something was done to return to parliament the right to control its own public bodies.

Mr. NEILL: I just want to endorse the remarks made by the last speaker. This is an illustration of what several of us on this side have so often complained of. We give a department or a commission power to make its own regulations, offences and penalties; we have been doing that this year; it has been done once or twice. The minister said, in justification of the regulation, that the act was passed unanimously by the house. If he will take the trouble to look up Hansard, he will find that I protested very strongly about the matter which has been under discussion for the last hour and that I read that identical regulation and protested against it and was supported by other members. Therefore the government can hardly say that the house was unanimous in that regard. I am glad to hear the complaints this afternoon. It has come home to the house now what we are doing. We are in the habit of giving commissions and departments power to usurp our powers, to divest us of our powers, and when we are in this deadlock, the government does not know and we do not know whether we have the power to change the situation. The government approved the regulation and now a deadlock ensues. We should never have given the commission power to make such farreaching regulations; these matters should be settled in the House of Commons. I hope this will be a lesson to us in days to come that we should hesitate a great deal before we give commissions and departments these extraordinary powers. I remember, when the matter was up before, the very question arose that was raised by the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor). I asked the Minister of Marine then, had he power to control the commission? He said: "Not exactly." I said: "Well, does the commission control you?" He smiled and said that he was not quite sure.

Mr. McGIBBON: With a good deal of what has been said, I am in sympathy. Two years ago I moved in this house a resolution to abolish the civil service commission and neither the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat nor any other hon. member would second it; I could not get a seconder among over two hundred and forty members. I think we should be consistent. We should not talk one way and act another.

I admit the difficulties because they are great. I do not believe eighteen men, no matter how brilliant they are, or even if they are supermen, can control everything that has to be controlled in this country; that is an utter impossibility; it cannot be done. If you are going to delegate anything, you must delegate it in full. What is the good of saying on the one hand: We are going to give men power to do a thing, and then on the other saying: We are going to control you politically, and if you do not do what we want, why, off goes your head? Such an idea is absurd. We have to adopt either one system or the other and stick to it; we have to go the complete length of the journey. I have been on record more than once in this house as saying that the minister of any department should take full responsibility in the house for everything that is controlled by his department. That means the abolition of all commissions, but it is absurd to say that you can appoint a commission and then control it. I believe also the complexities of the problems are becoming so great that they are beyond the power of any cabinet of men to control and to carry out properly and judiciously. This is something we might well take into consideration and try to find a solution for, because we have not the solution today, and I doubt if the present state of affairs is any better than or as good as it was before. But stand on one side or the other. I have not been on both sides, and have talked consistently throughout. After all, the problems of this country are getting so serious that this house should direct itself more to the conditions of the dominion and what is going to remedy them, than to what is going to help either political party, whether it sits on the right or on the left.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just want to raise my voice in sympathy with the expressions used in connection with the right of the commission to pass regulations to make criticisms of the government a crime. We might as well be frank about the matter. The next thing we will be doing—and I heard it suggested in some parts of this country by responsible people in public life—that there should be regulation of the press. Let us go a step further and shut up the House of Commons.

Mr. McGIBBON: One might do worse than that.

Mr. MITCHELL: That may be true, too, but if you are going to make criticism of the government a crime, you are merely imitating conditions in other countries, where, if you criticise the government, off goes your head. Frankly, I believe this is absolutely unsound. The driving force of our Anglo-Saxon civilization has been the right to express criticism of government, and I think we have reached a sorry stage when we give that commission power, because that is what it amounts to, to withdraw from any individual, whether he is high in the political sphere or low in the social scale, the right to criticise any legislation or any government that may be in power.

I am not unmindful of the fact that regulations are necessary, but I believe it is going a step too far when criticism of any governmental institution or of any legislation is forbidden over the radio of this country because, after all is said and done, the radio is only another form of education, a part of the life of this dominion, just as much as is this House of Commons. It will be a sorry day for some of us on this side of the house, at the moment anyway, if criticism of the government, either in the House of Commons or on the public platform, is made a crime. So I join with those who have raised their voices in opposition to this particular policy. I believe it is a step in the wrong direction. In my judgment, perfect freedom should be given to those who wish to use the air to criticise any legislation or any government that may be in power.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Let me say to the minister that he can settle this matter in two seconds. What is the use of denying responsibility, when the regulations cannot be put into effect except by order in council? Once it is submitted for the consideration of the government the government take the responsibility. This is an obnoxious thing, and he can get that order in council amended. The government will have to take responsibility for amending it because they will have to take responsibility of passing an amended order in council. So what is the use of talking about the commission doing this and that when the government have to take the responsibility?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Surely. Do not shirk your responsibilities.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Would this suggestion satisfy my hon. friends; I suggest that they let this item pass—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, no. We have done that for you before.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —and I shall report on this point when the bill is in committee. The bill to extend the life of the commission to the end of this fiscal year will be presented in a day or two. We might discuss this matter when that bill comes to the committee in the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. VALLANCE: If you get the money you can carry on.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am entirely in accord with what has been said by my hon. friends on the other side as to the right—and I would go further and say the duty—of criticism. If a public man thinks that legislation is bad it is not only his right but his duty to criticize such legislation.

Mr. EULER: Go the whole way.

Mr. DURANLEAU: And also to criticize the administration of any government. If a man thinks administration has not been what it should be he must have the right to say so in public. I do not think the intention of the commission was to prohibit such criticism. As a matter of fact no action was ever taken by the commission under that section.

Mr. EULER: But it could be.

Mr. RALSTON: Is it not a simple thing for the minister to bring to the council a recommendation for an order repealing the previous order in council in so far as it approves of regulation No. 90? That is all that is necessary. You do not have to go to the commission, but simply repeal the government's approval of that regulation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I would not go so far as to ask the repeal of the whole section.

Mr. EULER: No, just strike out those words.

Mr. RALSTON: Let them repeal that section and enact a new one and bring it to you for approval.

Mr. RHODES: I am at a disadvantage in not having heard the previous discussion or the precise nature of the objection to this section 90 of the regulations, which I may say I have seen just a moment ago for the very first time.

Mr. RALSTON: And never observed, I suppose.

Mr. RHODES: It reads:

No broadcasting station may broadcast any speech, printed matter, program or advertising matter containing abusive or defamatory statements with regard to individuals or institutions, or statements or suggestions contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation—

Mr. EULER: That last is the point.

Mr. RHODES:

—as for example, the Patent Medicine Act or any regulations promulgated thereunder.

I do not want to stand as an apologist for the construction of this regulation, although I must assume my share of responsibility as a member of the government for having approved by order in council the regulation itself. But surely there would be no contention that it could be in the public interest or in the interest of the radio commission that there should be matter broadcast over the radio containing abusive or defamatory statements—

Mr. EULER: No, no objection.

Mr. RHODES: —with regard to the individuals or institutions, or statements or suggestions contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation.

Mr. EULER: Yes, that is the objection. We could not criticize any act that is on the statute books.

Mr. RHODES: I see the point at once. The objection is not to the spirit or apparent intent of this regulation—

Mr. EULER: Perhaps not.

Mr. RHODES: —but the wording goes beyond what was the original intention.

Mr. EULER: Exactly.

Mr. RHODES: I think in those circumstances the wording could properly be reviewed, because I am certain it never was intended to be tortured into enabling such a construction as that to be placed upon it.

Mr. EULER: But it is there.

Mr. RHODES: That may be so, I defer at once to legal gentlemen who place that interpretation upon it, but certainly as a layman I would not. I think my colleague would be quite justified in saying that if upon consideration it appears that that interpretation can be placed upon these words, then the governor in council would be well warranted in taking action to change it. That suggestion may not appeal to him, as I say I am handicapped by coming into this discussion without having heard the preliminary part, but I offer that suggestion in order that we may make progress.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Was this prepared by the commission itself?

Mr. DURANLEAU: By the commission itself.

Mr. VALLANCE: And approved by the government?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Approved by the government.

Mr. EULER: I think we should have some assurance that these particular words, that no broadcasting station may broadcast any statements contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation, shall be struck out, and something else put in their place if desired. In the opinion of those who are lawyers, it apparently gives the commission power to prohibit any person whatsoever, whether a member of parliament or not, criticizing any existing legislation. I do not know how the courts would interpret that, because it is followed by what would be regarded as a modifying clause, "as for example, the Patent Medicine Act." We think that there is at least a possibility that a court might interpret it that no existing legislation of any sort may be criticized. I think the government would be well advised to make it perfectly clear that no man could be prosecuted for criticizing existing legislation. I think that is not asking too much.

Mr. RHODES: I apparently did not make my meaning clear. Let me say first to the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) that I do not think a member of parliament should seek one whit more right over the radio than any other citizen of the country.

Mr. EULER: No, he should not; anybody.

Mr. RHODES: He should not be entitled to make defamatory statements because he is a member of parliament.

Mr. EULER: No, you misunderstood me.

Mr. RHODES: Then I come back to my original intention, that is that we should review that section with the object of making it clear that the interpretation which has been placed upon it by certain hon. members cannot properly be placed upon it, that there should be no danger of that. I would certainly subscribe to that point of view. For myself I think it is a torturing of the language to suggest that it could, but I defer to hon. gentlemen opposite who say the language is capable of that interpretation. I have made the suggestion to my colleague that we say we will review and revise it to meet what I understand was the original intent of the regulation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Well, I have expressed my views already. I have a doubt as to the power of the minister. As to the intent, the government never intended and I am sure the commission never intended to prohibit criticism of legislation over the radio.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then why is it there?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has said, if this committee thinks it could be interpreted in that sense we will surely, if we have the power—and my hon. friend the Minister of Finance thinks we have apparently—revise that section, and when the bill extending the life of the commission comes before the committee next week we will put before the committee the wording of the new section, which I am sure will be agreeable to my hon. friends.

Mr. VALLANCE: Suppose next week the minister comes back with an interpretation by the commission, submitting that we are misinterpreting this regulation and maintaining that it should be retained for a specific purpose. What will happen? We are voting the $1,500,000 now.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friend is going too far.

Mr. VALLANCE: No, I am not. There was a great deal in what was said by the hon. member for North Waterloo. Suppose this was placed before a court, what would be the result? The only court we have is the commission, and we must accept the interpretation given by the commission. This is the only weapon we have, and I would suggest to the minister—

Mr. RHODES: May I assure the hon. member for South Battleford that there is no intention on the part of the minister, and certainly there is no intention on the part of the government, to shield ourselves behind the possibility that the radio commission might not do this, that or the other thing. I think the statement was intended to be made unequivocally that the government will assume the responsibility, if need be, of revising the language in order to make it clear that the interpretation that has been placed upon it could not properly be placed upon it. I may say in all frankness that I think the interpretation referred to cannot properly be placed upon this section; nevertheless I shall be delighted to see if we cannot find some language which will preserve the intent of the section and obviate any fears that hon. gentlemen have expressed.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the minister will give the assurance that the person who supervises the manuscripts will take the same view there can be no argument about it, but the minister will bear in mind the fact that the interpretation is made by an individual, who may place upon the regulation the same construction that we have.

Mr. RHODES: I would doubt it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have reason to believe that it might be done. The provision is extremely objectionable, and for that reason we are opposing this particular clause in the regulations. Anything short of its elimination will not be satisfactory to us.

Mr. RHODES: Surely my hon. friend is not advocating that a person broadcasting over the radio should have the right to utter defamatory statements.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is altogether mistaken; I am dealing with the one clause concerning the criticism of existing legislation, and nothing else.

Mr. GEARY: It is not criticism of legislation.

Mr. RHODES: As I understand it, this has to do with offences which have been prohibited by legislation.

Mr. EULER: It says "contrary to the express purpose of any existing legislation."

Mr. GEARY: Surely the reference to the Patent Medicine Act indicates clearly the intent, that you shall not over the radio do what you are forbidden to do by legislation, for example the Patent Medicine Act. That act does not allow you to advertise anything as a cure. I admit that this regulation is badly drawn, but surely the sensible view—

Mr. VALLANCE: Then that might eliminate any opposition, because we might prove that it was a cure.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not see just what a talk over the radio has to do with the Patent Medicine Act.

Mr. GEARY: If the hon. member is referring to my remarks he will find that the regulation under discussion refers to the Patent Medicine Act.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): With all due deference to my hon. friend may I point out that the reference to the Patent Medicine Act is simply an illustration.

Mr. GEARY: As an example of what the regulation is directed to.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has asked for an undertaking on the part of the government as to the kind of interpretation that will be placed upon this or any other section by the responsible official of the radio commission. Obviously that is a matter over which we have no control. We cannot be responsible for the judgment, even the mistaken judgment, of an official. We might cause an official to be reprimanded or dismissed if he abused the privileges of his position. but all we can be responsible for is the language of the regulation. I thought I had made the assurance abundantly clear that it will be our purpose to see that the regulation is revised in order to express the interpretation which I know is intended to be expressed to meet the object in mind. I cannot make my language any stronger than that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think when a person hires the radio in order to broadcast a message he is in about the same position as when he hires a hall in order to deliver a speech.

Mr. RHODES: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: I must disagree with the minister; I cannot see the difference. I know that in Vancouver when a person hires the radio in order to broadcast a speech, in most instances he has to submit the manuscript for censorship before the speech can be delivered. I think that is going just a little bit too far. Not only that, but sometimes they insist on making certain deletions; the best part of a speech may be deleted. We have to accept that condition or we are not allowed to broadcast the speech. The person in charge of the station goes over the speech; he may or may not know anything about it, but that is the situation and in my opinion it is going too far. I am in favour of public ownership, of course, and I am in favour of having radio under a commission of some sort, but I think it is going very much too far if that commission is to be allowed to say what can be or cannot be said over the radio.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to know what the minister has to say in reply to the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver South. It is a serious matter if speeches are to be censored by the man in charge of the radio station. Is that done with the knowledge and consent of the Department of Marine?

Mr. DURANLEAU: In regard to private radio stations, the owner of the station has control over the speeches broadcast. I know that in my own province the owner of the radio station is jointly and severally responsible in damages with the speaker for any defamatory statements made over his radio. The owner of every private radio station is therefore interested in knowing what is to be broadcast over his station, because he is personally responsible for damages. With regard to the commission stations, the commission has been very lenient in regard to the speeches broadcast. Of course they have to protect the reputations of individuals and institutions; in some instances, when they fear that defamatory statements may be made, they may ask to see the manuscript, but as a rule they are very broad in that regard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Personally I do not know that I would object very much to the regulation if there were a corresponding clause prohibiting any commendation of the legislation that has been put through this house in the last few years. I think if a clause of that kind were put in the benefit would outweigh the disadvantage.

Mr. BROWN: Would not the purpose be perfectly well served if reference were made only to abusive or defamatory language? No person wants to justify language of that kind, but why should there be any reference to criticism of existing legislation? I do not think the committee will be satisfied unless that reference is entirely removed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Sometimes it is pretty hard to define what is abusive. I should like to know whether calling an opponent a Judas is abusive language.

Mr. COOTE: I do not wish to delay passage of the item, but before it is passed I should like the minister to state the total amount expended last year by the radio commission. I ask that question because when I was in western Canada not long ago I was shown a statement published in a British Columbia paper to the effect that last year the radio commission had spent over $11,000,000. I am sure the statement was incorrect, and if the minister would indicate the exact expenditure it would be helpful.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The estimate for last year, together with the supplementary estimate, was, if I am not mistaken, $1,225,000—it may have been $1,250,000; I am not sure of the exact figure. So far as I know the commission did not overexpend that amount.

Mr. COOTE: There is no way by which the commission could have spent anything like $11,000,000?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, that would be ridiculous. The statement to which the hon. member refers is ridiculous; the amount voted was spent, and that is all.

Item agreed to.

To appoint David Ballantyne Carswell as superintendent of the government shipyard at Sorel and superintendent of the dredging fleet at a salary of $8,000 per annum, less such deduction as may be provided, $8,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why the appointment of this gentleman in any other way than through the usual channel of the civil service commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The position of superintendent of the shipyard at Sorel was extended to take in the fleet. The department has deemed it advisable to place both the shipyard and the fleet under one head. It is felt that this move will result in substantial economies for the department. We had the opportunity of securing the services of this man as superintendent, a position which is now very important, and we believe that the sum of $8,000 was reasonable.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Where does he come from? Who recommended him? Was he an employee of the department in some other capacity? Who is he? What actuated the minister in appointing this man, especially at such a high salary and at a time when the business at Sorel instead of increasing is decreasing?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Up to two years ago Mr. Carswell was manager of Vickers Limited of Montreal, and has proven himself to be an efficient engineer and manager of shipbuilding. When Mr. Bridges retired eighteen months ago, I secured the services of Mr. Carswell as his successor. I think I have made a good move. He has been employed in many shipyards in England and the United States, and in other shipyards in Canada. He is an able executive as well as a specialist in naval construction. Since he has been in charge of our plant he has proven himself to be efficient. Authority over the machinery of the fleet was given to the superintendent of the yard in order to prevent damage and cause large expense for repairs. Mr. Carswell has been in charge of the plant for a year and a half, and his services have been most valuable. Substantial economies have been effected in the repairing of our ships.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What salary was paid his predecessor?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I believe it was around $5,000; it may have been $4,700 or $4,800. He was only superintendent of the yard. The duties and responsibilities of Mr. Carswell have been enlarged; it is only fair that his salary be raised accordingly. It is the opinion of my department and the opinion I hold personally that in giving this man authority over the fleet the department is making substantial economies.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If the stand taken by the minister is accepted by the committee it will mean that a minister will always be able to go outside the provisions of the Civil Service Act and, by an item in the estimates, appoint someone to the public service and give such person a salary not fixed or accepted by the civil service commission. I cannot let the item pass without as vigorously as possible registering my protest.

Item agreed to.

Radio service, to provide for the suppression of local electrical interferences and for the issue of radio receiving licences, $263,038.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to know where this money will be spent, because I am continually receiving protests from the general public about interference with radio service coming from electrical equipment. I believe the committee should have some information from the minister as to how and where the money is to be spent, and the service given.

Item agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Tokyo. Representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $68,800.

Mr. REID: I think some explanation is due under this item in connection with the building being erected at Tokyo. I notice that the report of the auditor general states that a loan was made to this government by the minister at Tokyo bearing interest at five per cent.

Mr. RHODES: I shall be pleased to let the item stand so that an explanation can be given when it is called again.

Item stands.

Geneva. Salaries and expenses of the office of the Canadian advisory officer, $28,000.

Mr. DONNELLY: Why the increase?

Mr. RHODES: I understand it is only exchange.

Mr. EULER: Who is the Canadian advisory officer—Doctor Riddell?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Mr. DONNELLY: What is the reason for the increase in vote number 204?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot give that information offhand.

Item agreed to.

Canada's contribution to the expenses of the League of Nations for 1935, including secretariat, international labour organization and permanent court of international justice, $204,640.

Mr. EULER: I recall that five years ago many of the members of the League of Nations were not paying their proportion of the expenses of the league. Could the minister give us any information in that connection?

Mr. RHODES: I have not the details before me but I am advised that there are still a number of members in default.

Mr. MANION: They allow for those in default, mostly South American countries. The estimates are made high enough to cover those in default.

Mr. EULER: That means that those who do pay are assessed more than they ordinarily would be?

Mr. MANION: That is correct.

Mr. COOTE: How much of this vote was spent last year?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have no information before me. I called these items pending the return of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) who is taking up his estimates next and for the purpose of facilitating the estimates of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). If the hon. member desires, the item can stand until the information is available.

Mr. COOTE: It will be all right if the minister will promise to let me have the information.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Public buildings. Tokyo, Japan—Canadian legation, $200,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is the present state of this building and how much of the cost of construction is this vote expected to cover?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This vote is to make payment in full of the expenditures in connection with the construction of the Canadian legation at Tokyo, Japan.

Mr. EULER: What was the total cost?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The total cost was $200,549.21.

Mr. REID: Why could not this money have been taken out of that voted for the relief of unemployment? According to the report of the auditor general this money has been borrowed at five per cent and we have been raising loans bearing four and a half per cent interest and selling short term debentures bearing only two and a half per cent interest. Why should we borrow from an appointee of the government?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The Canadian representative at Tokyo, Sir Herbert Marler, was very much interested in having a suitable building for the Canadian legation, so much so that he undertook that the building would be constructed at a cost not exceeding $200,000. The actual cost of the building was in excess of the amount of this vote by $549.21. That amount he has paid himself; what he was paid was the cost of the building.

Mr. HEAPS: How many people are employed there?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I cannot tell; that is a matter for the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. HEAPS: How many rooms are there in the building?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know.

Mr. HEAPS: All we know is what it cost and what we have to pay.

Mr. RHODES: Item 205, Department of External Affairs, stands and the information can be elicited when that item is called.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, $545,500.

Mr. NEILL: The other night when the minister was speaking on this vote he told us that there were certain schemes that had not been acted upon, not being considered expedient. One was the butter export scheme. Can he tell us why this one was not considered desirable in the public interest?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member wrote me a letter, asking for this information. I replied but I do not know whether he has received the letter.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but the letter simply states that it was not regarded as likely to operate effectively in the interests of the butter industry. What I want to know is what was wrong with the scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not a copy of the scheme before me, but if the hon. member will let it stand I will get the information as soon as the officials come in.

Mr. NEILL: The next matter I want to speak about is the British Columbia sheep breeders' scheme, which was rejected because the principal market for the regulated product was within the area of production. The minister's letter states:

> This scheme has now been gazetted under the Natural Products Marketing Act (British Columbia) 1934, and has been presented to the Dominion Marketing Board for supplementary powers under the federal act. It is receiving consideration by the board.

It is receiving consideration by the board. I have a statement from the British Columbia newspapers which says:

> Activities of the British Columbia sheep marketing board have been suspended at Victoria. A letter was sent to Hon. K. C. Macdonald, Minister of Agriculture, over the week end, from the Salt Spring Island sheep breeders' association, asking for delay and calling the minister's attention to the fact that less than five per cent of the actual sheep breeders of the province have yet expressed an opinion for or against the marketing scheme.

The minister tells us that the scheme has been approved by the local marketing board of British Columbia and is now before the dominion board for consideration. Is he aware of this other statement, that only five per cent of the actual sheep breeders have expressed an opinion? Is it a desirable system whereby schemes can pass the provincial board and come to the dominion board for consideration, when only five per cent of the people have been consulted?

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Certain things were included in the scheme which the dominion board doubted could be put into effect. My information is that a long wire has been sent to the proponents of the scheme, asking them to give it further consideration.

Mr. NEILL: The provincial government has been asked to give further consideration?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not the provincial government but the British Columbia sheep-breeders' Association, those submitting the scheme.

Mr. NEILL: But I understood the minister to say that it was rejected because the market for the regulated product was within the area of production. It was then taken up under the British Columbia act and O.K.'d and sent to the dominion board. It is now being considered by the dominion board, but I say that it should not be considered favourably if only five per cent of the people have been consulted.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That matter will be taken into consideration. The scheme is under consideration by the dominion board.

Mr. NEILL: There is another point. In connection with the British Columbia salt fish board, it appears that this has been formed as I am afraid so many of these boards will be formed, and it is one of the greatest weaknesses of the act. We did not follow the British system, which is confined exclusively to producers. Under our act we very unwisely, as I thought at the time, extended the provisions to take in middlemen, marketers, or even marketers alone can start a scheme; and that opens the door to what will prove in the future to be a great deal of trouble. I do not mind prophesying now that within eighteen months it will be discovered, not in connection with this board but in some of these schemes, that the manipulation of a few small groups of middlemen, the men engaged in marketing the product, will lend itself to a gross misuse of their powers. If it had been confined to producers it would have been very different. I have not a word to say about the management of this British Columbia salt fish board; no doubt they are all right. But I want to make this other point. It appears that no fisherman is on the local board, which is composed entirely of men engaged in the marketing end. Now the whole purpose of the marketing act, if it had any precise object in view, was to benefit the primary producers. Here we are dealing with the fish industry, and surely the primary producers are those who catch the fish. Yet there are none of these on the board. The statement is made that the operation of the scheme has been satisfactory and profitable, but profitable to whom? To the men who compose the board and not to the fishermen, who have not had an opportunity to benefit, not having been represented on the board. The scheme was put into effect after the fish were all caught. I point this out as an illustration of the way in which we are getting away from the real object of the act and drifting along the lines I predicted a year ago, with the result that certain schemes are entirely in the hands of middlemen.

There is one other point I wish to make —it was brought home forcibly to us in British Columbia, and it appears to me to strike at the very crux, the whole existence of the act—and it is this: a local board could be formed and organized to handle a certain product in a certain area; then it presently discovered, as we found out in British Columbia, that it was not possible to prevent the particular product, namely, potatoes, from being shipped in from an outside district. The result was that the whole scheme was absolutely abortive. I appealed to the British Columbia government and asked what was their interpretation and their proposed remedy. I pointed out that we had a potato board proposing to operate on Vancouver island, and I suspected that the scheme would be ruined because potatoes could and would be imported from any area outside that designated, in other words, from the neighbourhood of Lulu island where they grow a large quantity to the acre of an inferior quality. The answer I received from the British Columbia marketing board was that the only way to deal with the situation was to get the two districts to agree not to ship into each other's territory. That sounded very nice, but naturally it would not work. Vancouver island, which was an importing area, which had a shortage, would not ship into an area of cheap production, but the area of cheap production would not agree voluntarily and with no recompense to stop shipping its product into a considerable market on Vancouver island. The result was that this particular scheme fell flat. The area was then enlarged to take in both Vancouver island and a considerable section of the lower mainland. It was then discovered that potatoes outside that area were being shipped in quite legitimately, not bootlegged, and without any restrictions as to price, quantity or marketing regulations. In other words the local scheme is threatened with complete failure.

The same thing is likely to happen, and I think it was indicated it would happen, in connection with the sheep and lamb board proposed in British Columbia. It was all very nice as long as we regulated our own lambs, but we could not stop the Alberta lambs from being shipped in and flooding the market. The whole purpose of the act seems to be dissipated on account of inability to control the product from areas outside that designated by the board. The remedy would appear to be to have given the local board power to deal with all produce of that particular variety, either grown or imported into the area. I submit that to the minister and I would like his opinion whether that would not be advisable or at least whether it will not be highly necessary, or else all these boards will be just a joke. What is the use of regulating a large area of a province when another part of that province or another province can ship in stuff to the total destruction of the market? These boards cost money to handle, fifty cents or a dollar a ton, and what is to be the benefit? The minister will either have to give the local board power to handle imported as well as locally grown stuff or else to explain of what use the board is.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This was one of the most troublesome problems we had in developing this legislation. The particular scheme to which the hon. member refers was given very serious consideration by the dominion marketing board, and it was first thought that the only solution in connection with this one particular scheme was that the area should have been in the first place large enough to get over those local conditions. The hon. member realizes that if an attempt were made to restrict areas so that products could not be shipped under any conditions into certain areas where products were being regulated, that would be equivalent to setting up a prohibitive tariff wall around that area. That would create a complicated and almost impossible situation. It was the purpose when this act was brought before the house and enacted, and it still is, that the areas would be sufficiently large to get over the difficulty that has been mentioned. But I can again assure the hon. member that the government had a full appreciation of those difficulties, and they probably gave us more concern than anything else in connection with the marketing board. We have been trying to devise some amendment to the act that will to some extent overcome this.

Mr. NEILL: Will the legislation be introduced this year?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would not be prepared yet to go that far.

Perhaps I might be allowed to put on Hansard some information that I promised the other day to give the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore). The hon. member asked these questions and asked that the information be submitted:

I understand from the minister that the chairman of the board is also the owner or part owner of one of the syndicates that grow tobacco that the people who grew tobacco previously now have licences and that the growing of tobacco has become a privilege, a monopoly if you like, and that one of the syndicate holders has been made chairman of the marketing board. Is that correct or incorrect?

Has the minister any knowledge of the increase in prices of the lands held by the licensed growers including the lands held by the syndicate of which the chairman of the marketing board is a member?

Would the minster be kind enough to give the names of the two associations?

What is the acreage that was licensed, and what was the acreage contained in the two syndicates in which the chairman is interested?

How many of those producers were working for or under the two associations in which the chairman is interested?

Am I to understand that the minister will give me the information required as to the acreage of the two associations in which the chairman is interested as compared with the total acreage? And the number of producers represented by the two associations as compared with the total number of producers?

A precedent has been created when a gentleman engaged in an industry has a privilege as part of a monopoly and then is made chairman of the board controlling those privileges. The chairman of the board is a holder in two syndicates that have certain privileges under the marketing act, privileges which are not enjoyed by people holding lands suitable for growing tobacco but which have not hitherto been devoted to that purpose.

How many growers were renting land from the syndicate represented by the chairman of the board and what proportion of the growers were independent owners? I should like to know also how many syndicates there are similar to the one in which the chairman is interested and what proportion of the total acreage is controlled by the syndicate.

The present chairman of the board is president and managing director and large shareholder of Windham Plantations Limited, a company owning and operating fifty farms; total acreage, 5,308, producing 1,900 to 2,200 acres of tobacco per year; also president and managing director and large shareholder of St. Williams Plantations Limited, owning and operating fifteen farms comprising 1,750 acres, of which fourteen are equipped for tobacco and produce 435 to 500 acres annually.

The acreage of tobacco planted by these two companies averages about twelve per cent of the total acreage grown in Ontario and the production averages about fifteen per cent to sixteen per cent of the total pounds produced in Ontario. About 1,000 separate individuals and seven limited companies produce the balance of the tobacco. These two companies employ sixty-four principal growers under yearly contract whose labour is paid for by a share of the crop but the sole right of selling the crop is in the discretion of the companies owning the land. So these sharegrowers are not producers in the sense that they take part in marketing the tobacco.

With regard to land speculating activities referred to, there are absolutely none, either personally or for companies. Since acquiring these properties in 1928 neither himself nor his companies have bought or sold or otherwise traded in a single foot of land, nor does he nor they own or have any interest directly or indirectly in a single acre of farm land within or without the tobacco area, except that used for purposes of growing tobacco as indicated above.

In his relations with grower association activities, Mr. Leitch is vice-president of Ontario flue-cured tobacco growers' association, a general service growers' organization comprising producers of about forty per cent of the total tobacco produced, and in which each producer, irrespective of his acreage, has only one vote on all matters. Mr. Leitch is one of the three representatives of this association on the local tobacco marketing board. He is also president of Ontario Tobacco Sales Co-operative Limited, a tobacco packing and marketing co-operative society formed by the service associations to provide a voluntary alternative means of selling their tobacco to those smaller growers who find it difficult to market their own crops satisfactorily. This society handles satisfactorily from $150,000 to $1,000,000 worth of tobacco annually, and is one of the most important elements in tobacco marketing stabilization machinery. Mr. Leitch owns only one share of the capital stock of this company, to qualify him as a director, as he does not need to use the services of the society in selling the tobacco of his two companies. He is trustee for the Ontario government for any credits advanced to small producers to enable them to market their crops to advantage, and chairman of the local flue-cured tobacco marketing board under the Natural Products Marketing Act, by unanimous vote of the fourteen members thereof.

The Ontario flue-cured tobacco marketing scheme was dealt with by the dominion marketing board before Mr. Leitch became chairman of the marketing board. Mr. Leitch agreed to accept the position of chairman for only a year. We did feel that with the record that he has in both production and marketing, and as a student, investigator and teacher in agricultural economics, also a farmer's son who has made every cent that he has by his business ability, and a man of recognized integrity, we were very fortunate in securing his services at this time to head the dominion marketing board.

Mr. YOUNG: The figures just given by the minister are not in exact agreement with the figures submitted to the price spreads commission. If my memory serves me aright Mr. Leitch told that commission that there were only 30,000 acres of land in Canada suitable for growing flue-cured tobacco, and that his companies control 7,300 acres, or nearly twenty-five per cent of that. Then I want to ask the minister a question with regard to this tobacco industry. How would a man proceed who owns a farm say in Norfolk county, the flue-cured tobacco district, on which he has not been growing tobacco in recent years, if he wanted to start growing? How would he get permission to grow and market tobacco?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He does not have to have any permission to grow tobacco in that area or any other.

Mr. YOUNG: How about selling; what step does he have to take to sell it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The same as the others who are in that area and whose tobacco is being marketed or the marketing of which is being regulated by this scheme.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister then say what is meant by the preferred and deferred lists of growers which are given to the buyers when they get their licences?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not know to what list the hon. member refers. There is nothing in the scheme or in connection with the scheme that has anything to do with preferred growers or sellers or the giving of licences to them in a preferred way.

Mr. YOUNG: I understand that every buyer when he gets his licence from the local board receives a list of preferred growers and a list of deferred growers, and his instructions are that he must buy no tobacco from anyone on the deferred list until those on the preferred list have sold all their crop.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The board has no such power and takes no such action.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister is sure of that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is my information.

Mr. YOUNG: Then will the minister explain how it comes about that certain growers down there are selling their rights to grow tobacco to other growers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot explain that; certainly it has nothing to do with this marketing scheme.

Mr. YOUNG: It is precisely with this scheme that it has to do and with nothing else.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no provision in the marketing scheme by which any grower has any rights or any special privileges in that connection.

Mr. YOUNG: If his name is on the preferred list?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no preferred list in connection with the scheme.

Mr. YOUNG: Is there no preferred list in the operation of the scheme down there by the local men?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not by the board, no.

Mr. YOUNG: The answers of the minister are not at all in accord with the information that I have. Another question: Is it true that a certain buyer was put in gaol down there for buying tobacco when he had no licence to do so?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that a buyer was fined because he evaded the regulations, but he was not put in gaol.

Mr. YOUNG: The report in the press states that he could not pay the fine and was sent to gaol. Then there is another report, that a farmer who sold his tobacco to a buyer who did not have a licence was taken up and fined. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, that could not be correct, because every producer was given a licence to sell his tobacco; a blanket licence was published in the press.

Mr. BROWN: But it is admitted that a buyer was fined, is it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is my information, yes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If the buyer who was fined had been unable to pay the fine, what would have happened to him?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would rest entirely with the court.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Then would the minister's interpretation of the Natural Products Marketing Act be that the court would have the right and have had no other course except to send him to gaol?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is for the court to interpret.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I have an answer, yes or no, from the minister?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member is not serious in asking for an answer, yes or no, to a question of that nature. No one but the court could answer that question.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I refer the minister to the act known as the Natural Products Marketing Act, which provides for either fine or imprisonment. My question to the minister is whether under that act a man who is convicted of infringement of its provisions and sentenced to a fine and is unable to pay the fine, that is the only alternative for the court?

Mr. LOUCKS: There is not necessarily any "only" alternative.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): How much assistance does the minister need? The hon. member is not the minister. May I have an answer to that question?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The board has no authority either to fine or to send a man to prison for the breaking of any of these regulations. The matter would be referred to the courts and the courts would decide. I cannot give any statement as to what the court would decide. It might take into consideration the fact that the man was not able to pay his fine and might give him a second chance. But certainly any act, if it is to be effective, must have provisions giving power to make people conform to the regulations under the act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): In connection with the minister's reply, May I ask this question: Has the court the right, under the clauses of the act, to send a person found guilty of a violation of the regulations or stipulations of the board to gaol if he is unable to pay a fine?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That, I repeat, is a question for the court's interpretation. The hon. member can read the section and give it his own interpretation, just as I may give it mine.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister read the section, if he has it there?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The section reads:

> Every person who fails to comply with any order of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars and not more than five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the minister any difficulty in interpreting that, when he was the one who introduced the bill and proposed this very section? Is there any doubt that it does provide for a fine of from $25 to to $500 and for imprisonment up to three months or to both fine and imprisonment? Has the minister any doubt about that? Does he need any judicial interpretation to explain the meaning of that section which he himself brought down in this house?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth is a lawyer, and I am sure he will agree with me that the clause speaks for itself; I think it is quite definite. He would be the last to state that anyone should be asked to interpret the decision to which any court may come.

Mr. BROWN: Surely the minister can interpret his own statute.

Mr. RALSTON: All I suggest is that every minister, so far as I know, who has introduced an act has purported to explain what it means. No one has been left to rely simply on the text of the statute. I think we should be able to take it that the minister understood the statute which he introduced last year and the penal clauses that he put into it. He must remember the objections raised from this side of the house to the compulsory features of the act and particularly to this very clause under which new crimes were permitted to be created by the board making the regulations, which regulations were not before the house. I do not know why the minister hides behind the idea of a judicial interpretation of a clause which seems to be quite clear. I submit that the minister is not dealing quite fairly with the hon. member who asked the question when he says the clause speaks for itself and when he is not prepared to express an opinion on it.

Mr. McGIBBON: Surely you do not expect the minister to anticipate the action of a judge.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I agree that the clause should speak for itself; that is the point I have been endeavouring to make.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought the minister should speak for himself.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Mr. Chairman, as a fruit grower I am very anxious that the minister should speak for himself, and as a member of this committee I do not see any reason why he should not do so. I should like to ask this direct question. Is it within the power of the court under this act to send a natural producer to gaol if he violates or infringes upon the conditions laid down by the marketing board or any local board set up under it? Let us get this quite clear; as a fruit grower I want to hear the reply and I know there are many other fruit growers and producers in Canada who want to know the situation, so let us get it on record. Has the court the right, under these clauses of the Natural Products Marketing Act, to send a producer to gaol if he breaks a regulation or departs from a stipulation made under the act by the federal or any subsidiary board? I think I am entitled to a direct reply to this question.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In reply to the hon. member I would state that this clause sets out specifically that the court may have that power, but it is up to the court to decide whether that power should be exercised in any particular case.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Thank you very much. The other night when this committee had the opportunity of discussing the pros and cons of the Natural Products Marketing Act under the vote of $545,000 for the administration, the publication, the advocation, the extension, the coercion, the selling and the adoption of this act, we had a very remarkable speech by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). I wish to take this opportunity of sincerely complimenting the hon. member on the wonderful oration he delivered at that time. For the last five years, off and on, it has been my privilege and pleasure to listen to speeches in this house on different topics. Never during that period have I listened to a speech which included a wider scope of interpretation, a broader application of a multiplicity of ramifications in connection with any act, any subject, any bill or any amendment before this house than I had the pleasure of hearing the other night from the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. He covered everything in a first class hustings speech from a Tory platform, from the Natural Products Marketing Act to the discrimination between different schools of political thought in Canada, including a bun fight and a bowery row. There was nothing he left unsaid. He went back to ancient history; he even accused the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) of flirting with the clock or something like that.

As I said the other night, I am not particularly interested in past history; I have no particular interest in the abortive attempts of this government to assist the farmers. What we were discussing the other night and what we are discussing now is a vote of $545,000 of the money of the taxpayers of Canada for the administration of what is known as the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934. At this time I should like to ask the minister to be good enough to explain to this committee in as great detail as possible just how in the world we are going to spend, he is going to spend, or his department is going to spend $545,000, half a million dollars plus $45,000, sugar tax, income tax, food tax, liquor tax, or some other tax, under the Natural Products Marketing Act. What is he going to do with it? How is he going to spend it? Who is going to direct that expenditure? What is the purpose of it? What is to be accomplished by it? The minister may need the assistance of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) before he is through answering that question; in fact I think he will need the assistance of everyone on that side of the house. As a member of the committee I want to know how he is going to spend that money.

Before giving the minister an opportunity to answer the question I should like to couple with it another. I have before me a return tabled in the house in connection with the $50,000 spent in the three western provinces. At page 20 of that return there is a list of items covering, as I found upon inquiry, money paid to public speakers. Included in that list is an item of $94.25 paid to A. Speakman. May I ask the minister to tell me who Mr. A. Speakman is. Will the minister please answer these two questions?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Accompanying the statements we received from the associations to which we advanced the money there was no information with regard to specific individuals, as to who they were, to distinguish them from other individuals, except by their names. I could not hazard a guess as to who the A. Speakman might be, but I shall be pleased to get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I have a reply to my former question? How is the department going to spend the $545,000?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Perhaps the minister would permit me to say a word, because whether or not I am the A. Speakman to whom reference is made, it is obvious that it is intended to convey to the house that I was that person, and that I was paid for speaking. I want to say at once, without having seen the item in question, that while I spoke throughout Alberta during the last year on this particular subject, and did attend a number of meetings outside that province, I did so on my own time and at my own expense. The money I received in connection with this act amounts not to $90 but to $190.

Before Christmas I was appointed by the live stock board of the western provinces, which body by the way has received no money from the federal government, to represent them down here. I travelled to this point and spent two weeks here discussing plans of the board and representing it, as by their appointment I had a perfect right to do. They paid me my actual out of pocket expenses during the time I was absent from home, and that is the money I received. The rest of the time I put in at my own expense. Not only am I not at all ashamed of having received that money, but I say they were perfectly right in paying it. They believed it was worth their while to pay my expenses, because unfortunately I am not sufficiently wealthy to travel to Ottawa and spend two weeks in this city at my own expense, no matter how anxious I may be to help the farmers organize under the act. That is the dreadful secret about the money I received, and that is the amount I received. They advanced me $200, out of which I returned $10, giving an itemized account of every cent I spent from the time I left Red Deer until I arrived back—and if any member thinks he can make that trip, spend that time and do what I did on a smaller amount of money, I should like to see him do it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In further reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) I would state that the estimated expenditures for 1935-36 are broken down in the following way: Salary, $25,000; travelling, $10,000; printing and stationery, $6,000; equipment, $2,500; communications, $2,000; organization of local boards, investigations and so on, $500,000.

A number of schemes are now under way, one of which, that respecting the dairy industry, is nation wide. If that scheme is brought to a point where it is considered by the dominion marketing board that it would be advisable to make a recommendation, a good deal of money would be required to bring the scheme before all the Canadian dairymen. Then, there are other schemes well advanced. There are live stock schemes from the western provinces, and another one from British Columbia which will require a considerable sum of money. Hon. members will bear in mind that under the second part of the act there is provision to ascertain whether or not certain industries are making undue profits through their operations in processing farmers' products. To carry on those investigations over a period of time is a difficult matter and gains its importance because there is a body of opinion in Canada which holds that the primary producer is not getting his fair share of the consumer's dollar. So long as that opinion, whether it be right or wrong, remains in the minds of producers, they are unable to give that same degree of skill and concentration to the production of a high quality product as they would give under other circumstances. When the act was introduced last year it was intended that the investigations would have been commenced before this time, but the board did not wish to leave itself open to the criticism of promoting investigations when investigations were being held by the price spreads commission. There is no doubt, however, that in the very near future inquiries of a very far reaching nature will be carried on. I am certain the amount is by no means too large to do the work which we believe should be undertaken.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I must thank the minister for his lengthy reply, but I would point out that we are asked to vote $500,000, half a million dollars, of the taxpayers' money for the promotion of marketing schemes throughout the dominion. Ostensibly the expenditure of that money—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If I may be permitted to interrupt, I would say that the hon. member must have misunderstood my statement. I did not say it was contemplated to spend that sum for the promotion of marketing schemes.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, an arrangement was made this afternoon whereby we would proceed with bills arising out of the budget resolutions which earlier in the day were held over because of the absence of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. When he arrived I arranged with him to proceed with the bills at nine o'clock. If we finish the discussion of them we will revert to the committee of supply. I move, therefore: that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Is it the intention to return to this item if we finish the bills?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Progress reported.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 81, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Excise tax on duty paid value modified.

Mr. RALSTON: May I ask the minister for an explanation of the last two lines of the new subsection 2 enacted by this bill? As I understand it the purpose of the subsection is to exempt goods coming in under the British preference from the three per cent excise tax, or the one and a half per cent excise tax as it was modified last year. In addition to that the subsection provides that goods imported into Canada under trade agreements between Canada and other British countries shall be exempt. Does the minister think that by using the words "under the British preferential tariff" with the words "under trade agreements between Canada and other British countries" he is covering goods imported from all British countries? In other words, can we be satisfied now that goods imported from all British countries will be exempt from this three per cent excise tax?

Mr. RHODES: If the section were passed without the lines to which my hon. friend has referred it would still cover goods admitted under the British preferential tariff, which covers all British countries, protectorates and possessions with the possible exception of Hong Kong. The last two lines are really an enlargement of the section. Under the Australian treaty, which is a specific instance, there are certain items admitted at rates even more favourable than the British preferential. If the exemptions covered only the British preferential the result would be that the excise tax would be applicable to those items which now enjoy rates much lower than the British preferential. The reference to the trade agreements is made to include such items as might come in under more favourable rates than the British preferential.

Mr. REID: Could the minister give me a decision in connection with the sales tax on peat moss?

Mr. RHODES: That can be dealt with when we reach section 7.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—schedule III amended.

Mr. RHODES: I can see no reasonable objection to acceding to the suggestion made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and I therefore move:

That section 7 of Bill No. 81, an act to amend the Special War Revenue Act, be amended by adding thereto the following words: "peat moss, when used for agricultural purposes, including poultry litter."

Mr. REID: I can assure the minister that this addition will be appreciated in British Columbia.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 8—schedule IV amended.

Mr. COOTE: In connection with section 6, does that mean that a tax of at least ten per cent will be placed on every cigarette lighter?

Mr. RHODES: It means that the minimum tax will be ten cents.

Sections 9, 10 and 11 agreed to.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 82, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—power to restore duties which have beeen reduced on liquors.

Mr. BROWN: The minister said that I might make some remarks at this time with regard to the administration of the Customs Act. I am glad to see both the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Matthews) in the chamber. The Minister of Finance determines the amount of taxation and then the Minister of National Revenue and his department undertake to collect that taxation. We have reason to believe that sometimes the Department of National Revenue is so much interested in obtaining the last cent of revenue that it violates the spirit of the Customs Act We had an illustration of this two or three years ago in connection with the duty on repair parts for farm implements. I want to bring that matter again to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue and also to take up another matter to which I referred the other day when speaking on the motion to go into supply. At that time I referred to the complaint which had been made in connection with the imposing of a dump duty upon certain fishermen's supplies which came in free of duty. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) expressed the opinion that that had reference to goods coming in from Japan, but I hold in my hand a copy of a letter which indicates that the complaint was made in connection with goods coming in from Norway. This letter, which is addressed to the Minister of National Revenue, reads:

> The representatives of your local customs called on us to-day in connection with the importation of nets and rope from Norway. It is our understanding that you propose assessing dump duty on nets imported from Norway, and which are on the free list. We take some credit for stirring up this trouble between Japan and your government, as we wrote some of our principals there, explaining the difficulty of importing goods from them on account of your unreasonable dump duty. It is our understanding that the balance of trade between Norway and Canada is in favour of ourselves. Therefore we propose advising Norway of the rate, so that they, like Japan, may take steps to convince your government that they cannot carry on a one-sided trade.
> We trust that you will not be sufficiently blind to the interests of Canada to put a dump duty on goods that are admitted free, because similar goods are made in Canada. Our fishermen are compelled to sell their goods on the markets of the world and take the world price. They cannot exist and pay the high protected prices in existence in Canada. If the Canadian manufacturers are desirous of selling goods to those who have to sell their wares in world markets, then they must be prepared to get their prices down to those of the world.

Personally, I have no immediate interest in the fishermen, but fishermen are one class of primary producers in Canada, and the interests of Canada as well as of the primary producers themselves demand that the implements of production, whatever they may be, be admitted at the lowest possible rate. And since these articles used by fishermen are put on the free list, it would seem to be a violation of the spirit and intent of the act that a dumping duty should be imposed. I call attention also to the question of repairs on agricultural implements. So far as the general run of agricultural implements are concerned, that was satisfactorily adjusted two years ago when the Minister of Finance placed these repairs on the list at the duties prevailing before the tariff was raised in the fall of 1930. There is, however, one implement on which the ruling of the Department of National Revenue is by no means satisfactory; I refer to the situation in regard to repairs for tractors. Item 409m reads:

> Internal combustion traction engines for farm purposes, valued at not more than fourteen hundred dollars each; traction attachments designed and imported to be combined with automobiles in Canada for use as traction engines for farm purposes; and complete parts of all the foregoing: Free.

It was the understanding that repair parts for implements should come in at the rate of duty that prevailed on repairs before the tariff was raised in the fall of 1930. Now in regard to these repair parts for tractors, I have already called the attention of the house to the fact that the department has ruled that these repairs, constituting bolts, nuts, washers, rivets, lock washers, screws—copper or brass—tractor gaskets, cork gaskets, copper gaskets, asbestos gaskets and paper gaskets, shall now be charged a duty of from 25 to 35 per cent. A bulletin of the department, issued November 12, 1927, reads:

> Declares that any article which constitutes a part of a part, provided it requires no further fabrication and is not adapted for any other use, is entitled to entry as a complete part.

I submit that these words "and is not adapted for any other use" should be stricken out. It is perfectly true in regard to engines that many of the bolts, for instance, which are used on engines, whether steam or gasoline, may be used for something else; but it is also true that bolts are made especially suited for a particular engine and only that particular bolt can be used in that part of the engine, though undoubtedly, as I say, a bolt may be used for some other purpose. If the department bases its ruling on the fact that these bolts may be used for some other purpose, then I suggest that that clause be stricken out, "and is not adapted for any other use." To the users of engines this is an important consideration. The companies that handle these supplies have to keep a large stock on hand in order to meet the necessities of the farmers, because these engine repairs are often needed at very short notice and it would not be possible for the wholesaler in Winnipeg to get them readily from the manufacturer in the United States. I submit that the Minister of National Revenue should give this subject consideration and instruct the officers of his department to apply the law according to what we believe was the spirit and intent of it when it was passed under the leadership of the Minister of Finance.

Hon. R. C. MATTHEWS (Minister of National Revenue): I am very glad the hon. member has called my attention to the matter and I will endeavour to reply with the information at my command. The first complaint has reference to representations made direct to the department on May 22 last, by a firm of ship chandlers in Prince Rupert, I believe, to the effect that currency dump should not apply to importations from Norway of fishermen's ropes and nets which are entitled to free entry from all countries under tariff item 682. I may say that order in council P.C. 2549, passed on October 10, 1931, provided, in respect of goods imported from countries having depreciated currencies, that the value for duty of such goods should be computed in accordance with currency values as proclaimed by the governor in council under section 55 of the Customs Act. This order in council, which also provided for the collection of special duty under section 6 of the customs tariff, in cases where the selling price to the purchaser in Canada was for a lesser amount than the value for duty as computed in the manner stated, applies to all currencies whose values have been proclaimed and which have become depreciated. The proclaimed value of the Norwegian krone is 26·80 cents in Canadian currency and at the present time it has depreciated to a value of about 24·75 cents. In this instance therefore the currency dump is practically negligible. In any event, I am informed that there are very few importations of fishermen's ropes and nets from Norway.

Section 6 of the customs tariff provides for a special duty in respect of goods of a class or kind produced in Canada, although the goods are not otherwise dutiable; and in this connection fishing nets and netting, whether of linen or of cotton, with the exception of salmon gill nets with double knots, are regarded by the department as of a class or kind produced in Canada and are therefore liable to special or dumping duty.

Accordingly it will be apparent that in this particular instance there has been no discrimination whatever against fish nets from Norway. The correspondence from the Prince Rupert company is now receiving consideration by the department and an adequate reply will be sent to them direct in due course.

With regard to the second complaint made by my hon. friend, which has reference to the tariff status of repair parts for farm traction engines, I may say that so far as anyone at present on the staff of the Department of National Revenue can remember, it has always been ruled and held for customs tariff purposes that a complete part is precisely as defined in appraisers bulletin 3383 of November 12, 1927, which was quoted by my hon. friend and which reads as follows:

> That any article which constitutes a part of a part, provided it requires no further fabrication and is not adapted for any other use, is entitled to entry as a complete part.

The decision of the board of customs as contained in appraisers bulletin 3383 merely confirmed this ruling on appeal.

For the information of my hon. friend I may say that the department classifies as complete parts such articles as cylinder head gaskets, manifold gaskets, oil pan gaskets and other special gaskets irrespective of the material of which they are made, which are obviously specially designed for use only as parts of a particular traction engine, and admits the same to duty free entry under tariff item 409m when for use on traction engines for farm purposes, valued at not more than $1,400 each. The department also deals similarly with washers so-called, of special shape, which are specially designed for use as parts of tractors and which do not lend themselves to other use. However, bolts, nuts, washers, rivets and screws which are adapted for other uses cannot be classified by the department as "complete parts" in view of the decision of the former board of customs. I think this answer will cover the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. BROWN: According to my information tractor gaskets, cork, are being charged at 20 per cent, and, copper, at 30 per cent. We all know that a gasket for a tractor is made for one particular type of engine and cannot be used for any other. That is a matter of common knowledge.

Mr. MATTHEWS: It is my understanding that such gaskets are free, but if a specific case is referred to me, I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. BROWN: I can give only the information that is furnished to me. It states that tractor gaskets are being charged at 20 and 30 per cent.

Mr. MATTHEWS: Has my hon. friend any specific case into which I can inquire?

Mr. BROWN: I have only the general information that has been furnished to me.

Mr. YOUNG: I would like to ask the minister what he thinks of a ruling which states that a complete part is not a complete part if it can be used for any other purpose than that for which it was designed. That is a ridiculous ruling.

Mr. MATTHEWS: If my hon. friend had the responsibility of collecting the revenue, I do not think he would regard that particular ruling as ridiculous.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, I would.

Mr. MATTHEWS: I am afraid I will have to differ, because when they are used for other purposes I do not think he would claim they should be free.

Mr. YOUNG: There is hardly any part of a machine that cannot be used for some other purpose.

Mr. EULER: Clause 1 of this bill has, I take it, a very laudable purpose, namely, that the benefit of the reduction in duties on liquors shall be passed on to the consumers in the various provinces. It just occurs to me that it might be fairly difficult for the minister to make a change which would not cause discrimination; in fact the change could not possibly be made without an injustice being done. For example, let us say that Ontario does pass on the reductions to the consumer and some other province does not; perhaps two or three provinces reduce their prices to the consumer and one or two do not. I was just wondering what method the minister could apply to correct that situation.

Mr. RHODES: The question submitted by my hon. friend is a practical one, but there is no way whereby one could have liquor imported under one tariff for one province and under another for the others.

Mr. EULER: That is exactly the trouble.

Mr. RHODES: There had to be one tariff, and so the provision in this clause is applicable generally. But inasmuch as the provinces are interested in attaining the object which we have in mind in reducing the price of liquors, they have all complied, if not to the exact cent, at least in a reasonable spirit. Some of the provinces have, I think properly, made some slight further reductions. But the practical effect would be this: Let us assume that one province declined to comply with this clause. I have not the slightest doubt that moral suasion, if I may use that term in association with an enterprise of this kind, would be brought to bear by the other provinces with the net result that they would all conform to the legislation.

Mr. EULER: A kind of pious hope.

Mr. RHODES: No; the best answer to that is this, that I have before me a complete schedule of the prices under the new lists in all the provinces, and, speaking by and large, they have conformed to the design of this section by making the proper reductions, although in certain cases of individual classes of spirits they may not have gone the whole way. That is a matter which will be dealt with immediately between the Department of National Revenue and the various liquor commissions.

Mr. MALCOLM: I cannot quite understand why the minister wants to incorporate the bargain in legislation, when he could do it by agreement. On a former occasion he reduced the excise on cigarettes. I think at that time it was understood that cigarettes were to be reduced in price to a cent apiece. That was quite a proper arrangement for the minister to make and quite a normal concession for the manufacturer of cigarettes to make to the people when the excise was reduced from $6 to $4 a thousand. There was no incorporation of the bargain in legislation, and I think it is rather a peculiar principle to follow to put this bargain into legislation.

Mr. RHODES: I think my hon. friend will be the first to admit it would be a very difficult matter to call into conference representatives of the liquor commissions of nine different provinces and consult them in advance in respect to a reduction in tariff involving as it does revenue running into hundreds of thousands of dollars. As a matter of fact it is a practical impossibility, having regard to the secrecy which of necessity must surround a change in tariff. The result is that the liquor commissions receive the information through the press, and the only lever we could keep in our hands was to insert a provision such as obtains in the clause in question. This was an idea of my own; I think it will work; the purpose is plain and I believe it would be worth while to give it a year's trial.

Mr. MALCOLM: I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I think the plan would work without this clause. The principle of introducing a bargain of this kind into legislation is not sound. Does the minister suggest that while it was difficult to get into touch with the representatives of nine provinces, it was easier to get into touch with the representatives of the tobacco industry?

Mr. RHODES: I do not wish the assumption to go abroad that there was an agreement between the tobacco interests and the department—

Mr. MALCOLM: The results followed just the same.

Mr. RHODES: That is not the case. Representations were made by the tobacco interests to the government that if such and such a thing were done they would do thus and so. But there was no undertaking by the Department of Finance that the representations that they made would be adhered to, any more than there is in the case of any submission, and they come in in hundreds, indeed thousands, prior to the budget each year.

Mr. DUFF: I would like to refer to the question of nets and twine for fishermen. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) read a letter from Prince Rupert, and the minister replied that the difference was due to depreciated currency of Norway. He informed the committee, quite correctly of course, that the depreciation was so small in the case of that country that there would not be much increase of tax. But that does not apply to Japan. As the minister knows, the depreciation of Japanese currency is very great. Let me give a specific case which came to my notice when I was in Nova Scotia during the recess. I had sufficient time to go around and visit some of my fishermen friends, not in my own constituency but in another. The afternoon I called on one man he was engaged in putting a piece in his fish trap, and I noticed that he had some very nice twine. I asked him where he got it, he told me it came from Japan. I asked him what it cost, he told me it cost him twenty cents a pound, but, he said, the duty on it was more than the cost of the twine. I asked him how much he paid for the twine, and he said he paid $600, but that the tax was $630. This was a fisherman, a man who had to go out in the ocean and risk his gear and sometimes his life to earn his livelihood. This government, or the minister of the department, made this poor man pay $30 more than the cost of the twine in duty; the twine cost him $600 and he had to pay at the customs house $630 in duty before he could get delivery. That seems to me an outrage, especially in view of the condition of the fishing industry in this country. I was always opposed to dumping duties; I believe in free trade. The people should not have to pay customs duties, whether dumping or otherwise, and I say it is an outrage to the fishermen of this country that they should have to pay $630 tax on $600 worth of twine.

Mr. MATTHEWS: My hon. friend will appreciate that the dumping duty of which he speaks is due entirely to the depreciated currency of Japan. The par value of the yen is 49·89 cents, and the proclaimed value for duty purposes is the same, but the present value of the yen is only about 28·90 cents. That is where the difference comes in, and the dumping duty. The hon. member will also appreciate that this department merely administers the law in collecting the duty.

Mr. DUFF: Quite right, but it is a very bad law when a poor fisherman, finding a place where he can get some cheap twine, imports it and has to pay $630 on a $600 article, whether it be dumping duty or whatever you like to call it. I say the law should be changed. It is not fair to the industry or to the individual, and in my opinion it is not right.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) I am sure will forgive me if I do not follow him in his discussion, as in other circumstances I should be glad to do.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) dealt with the whole question of valuation, which has no reference to the bill under discussion. We cannot enlarge the discussion into a general tariff debate; I hope that will not take place.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, $545,500.

Mr. BROWN: I wish to make a few remarks on some statements that were made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). The hon. member for Northumberland, Ont. (Mr. Fraser) characterized that speech very well. I must admit it was a noble and courageous effort on the part of the hon. member to respond to the SOS call of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). But while it was a noble effort we cannot say much in praise of the material of his speech. I shall not deal with it at any length, but there is one sentence to which I call attention. He said, as reported on page 3300 of Hansard:

Mr. Rowe: Danish bacon was being sold in our western stores, and our barley was being used to fatten Danish hogs.

I take the first part of that statement, that Danish bacon was being sold in our western stores. Perhaps the hon. member made that statement in good faith; sometimes men repeat so often statements they have heard that they come to believe them. It is said of George IV that he declared so often that he had been present at the battle of Waterloo that he came to believe he had been, and when the Duke of Wellington was asked about it by the king he replied "Well, I have heard your Majesty say so." This is one of the loose statements which Conservative speakers have been making all through the country. Similar loose statements have been made in regard to the tariff in many respects. I took occasion to look up the trade returns of Canada, and I found that from 1923 to 1930 there is no record of a single pound of Danish bacon being imported. So much for the first part of that statement. Then, the hon. member said that our barley was being used to fatten Danish hogs. This was just one of the loose statements made by the hon. member in the course of the rambling speech he made in response to the SOS call of the Minister of Agriculture. We know the minister needed his help very badly, as he needs it again to-night. So I just want to call the attention of the house and the country to the fact that, according to the trade returns, that statement will not bear investigation.

Mr. ROWE: In response to the hon. member for Lisgar, I should like to say that I did not receive an SOS call from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. BROWN: Then your effort is still more worthy of commendation.

Mr. ROWE: I thank my good friend, but that is an evidence of his own loose statements. The Minister of Agriculture does not need any help from me; as a matter of fact I asked if he would mind if I made a few remarks. I regret that due to the interruptions from the other side I perhaps did not make the remarks I intended to make when I rose. It is not my intention to speak at any length tonight; I know it is not the desire of the hon. members who interrupted so vociferously the other evening that I should do so.

[Mr. Brown.]

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? Through you, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. gentleman whether this is the same speech he made the other evening, or a new speech?

Mr. ROWE: Through you, Mr. Chairman, I might tell my genial friend that the policy of his party for the last twenty years has been to wait and see, and I might suggest that he follow that policy still.

Mr. DUPUIS: It would have cost less if your government had done the same thing.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, another voice suggesting that we should have done the same thing. Thank God we did not, so far as Canada is concerned. I do not propose that the hon. member for Lisgar or anyone else shall direct me away from what I propose to say. I know very well that I could find many loose statements that have been made by the hon. member; in fact, I remember his saying, when he sat in the far corner of the house, what little regard he had for either of the major parties.

Mr. BROWN: You never did.

Mr. ROWE: Even now, apparently, the people of his own riding doubt his sincerity when he talks there about being a Progressive.

Mr. BROWN: Will the hon. gentleman just permit me and my constituents to settle that matter between ourselves?

Some hon. MEMBERS: They have settled it.

Mr. ROWE: According to all reports the matter is already settled. I know that my hon. friend came here with good intentions, as I said the other night. He did not intend to make any reckless statements; he came here intending to assist in the cooperative marketing of agricultural products, which was the object of the organization he represented. In the first place the farmers of old Ontario organized in order to help the farmers to get a fair price for their products, and it was through the organization that followed that first step that the hon. member for Lisgar and other hon. members first came to this parliament. But when he saw the advantage of getting back to his first love he not only made reckless statements, he recklessly disregarded his second love and came nearer the front benches of the party to which he now belongs.

It was no reckless statement the other night when I said that our overseas markets were lost before this government came into power. I say that the Natural Products Marketing Act is more fundamentally associated with our agricultural prosperity than perhaps those on this side of the house who drafted the act can imagine, certainly much more than those who sit to your left appreciate. I know the leaders in every line of Canadian enterprise and activity have stated repeatedly that unless agriculture is brought back to prosperity there is little hope for the future, and I will say that I believe hon. gentlemen opposite are in agreement with that statement. One thing is sure; only through the wise and careful marketing of our products can we hope to receive the best return for what we produce. I think that is generally acknowledged. I have stated before in this house, Mr. Chairman, and I repeat—and this is no reckless or ill-considered statement—that we had ten years of an absolutely lopsided agricultural policy in this country from 1920 to 1930, with little regard paid to marketing conditions. That was so much the case that the sound development of Canadian agriculture almost disappeared. I know it is true that we marketed much more wheat, but undoubtedly if we had possessed a natural products marketing act in 1920 and had exercised the powers now contained in that act we would have preserved some of our overseas markets which were lost when hon. gentlemen who sit opposite were in power.

I think everyone will appreciate that if any phase of Canadian agriculture should be developed on a sound basis it is the careful and systematic sale of the products of mixed farming. I know that for years my friends from western Canada, both in this parliament and on the hustings, have criticized this government for their policy of protection. I can remember, some eight or ten years ago, listening to the wheat growers tell us in this house that we should have free trade or at least a lower tariff on farm implements, and I rather admired the zeal of my hon. friend from Lisgar to-night in requesting that even the nuts, bolts and screws that go to make up a binder should be put on the free list. But may I remind him that when the tariff on farm implements was reduced before 1930 we paid more for those implements than we had paid before the change was made. May I remind him also that the tariffs have been raised since that time but we pay less for these implements, so apparently the tariff has very little bearing on the price paid.

One thing, and one thing only, was emphasized by those inclined to that fiscal theory; in this country we developed the sale of wheat, and wheat only. So much was that so that the agricultural interests in this country seemed to feel that when you mentioned wheat you had mentioned everything in relation to agricultural prosperity. They forgot that in 1920 we sold $133,000,000 worth of live stock products, and that overseas we sold $16,000,000 more of live stock products than of wheat. But what happened? With reckless disregard for the systematic marketing of these products, by 1930 we had lost our position in the world market. I say it is fundamental to the security of Canadian agriculture, which is the basis of Canadian prosperity, that we have an up to date marketing system for our agricultural products. As I mentioned the other evening, Denmark and other countries have planned their marketing very carefully. While in 1920 we had 26 per cent of the British market, and Denmark had less than 12 per cent, when the party to which hon. members opposite belong went out of power we had less than 1½ per cent of the British market, and Denmark had 60 per cent of it. In 1930 Denmark sold to the British market over 600,000,000 pounds of bacon, and we sold less than 9,000,000 pounds.

Mr. BROWN: How much do we sell now?

Mr. ROWE: Nine times as much as when your party went out of power. In 1920 and 1921 we lost that market for the Canadian producer. I know hon. members will smile. They will say that these were war conditions, that the war had a great deal to do with it, increased production and so on. I do not blame the right hon. leader of the opposition for losing that market when he was Prime Minister—I do not say he is absolutely to blame, but as a farmer, I do say that there was an utter disregard for the careful marketing of our products during the years when Denmark and other countries were so carefully surveying the fields of demand for similar products.

This is the first attempt on the part of any political party since confederation to give the farmer a square deal. It is all very well to say that there are principles in the marketing act that are unsound; that its principles do not coincide with the laissez-faire doctrine of the Liberal party. I have listened to hon. members opposite; I have read the speeches they deliver on the hustings, and I know how many of them travelling throughout the country endeavour to convince the Canadian people that since the Conservative party took office markets have been lost. Mr. Chairman, may I call your attention to the fact that in 1904 we sold in the British market three times as much cheese as we did in 1930—three times as much. We sold three times as much bacon sixty years ago as we sold when the Liberal party went out of power in 1930. The fact is that in 1870 we sold three times as much bacon in the British market as was sold when the late government left office. I repeat—and I shall not let the enthusiasm of hon. members opposite drive me from the point—I repeat what I have said; because every child in Canada knows that through the empire trade agreements we are gradually recovering our lost markets for primary products.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: Hon. members may laugh if they wish. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) knows that his province has shipped more lumber to the United Kingdom in the last year—four times more than was shipped before.

Mr. REID: What about salmon?

Mr. ROWE: I would say to the hon. member who has interrupted that you do not find salmon in the bush; perhaps he will recall that I was talking about lumber.

The Natural Products Marketing Act is fundamentally sound. It is all very well for members of the legal profession across the way to laugh; quite possibly none of them has milked a cow in his life. I know the hon. member for Vancouver Centre would not know which end of a cow to approach. I venture to say that even the right hon. leader of the opposition knows more about milking than the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. Hon. members opposite must know that any plan for the development of Canadian agriculture cannot ignore the principles which have made production possible and profitable in the old European countries during the last twelve hundred years. Those principles, may I point out to the hon. member for Lisgar, do not countenance buying where you can buy the cheapest and mining the soil continually. Without return. I say to hon. members opposite that in this dominion there are over 500,000 farms of less than two hundred acres. Western farmers may have the acreage, but mixed farmers have the numbers. I say further that the story will be told and has been written in western Canada that wheat mining is unsound. We have to put the fibre back into the soil if we are to follow sound principles of agriculture. The hon. member knows very well that principle which he advocates has contributed in no small measure, to the bankruptcy of the three western provinces.

In 1937 the empire trade agreements will come before an empire conference for renewal, and I know and every business man within sound of my voice knows that unless we establish a regulated system of marketing, and unless we have influence on the British market through placing on that market a high grade quality with regularity and continuity of supply, we shall be in a poor position to ask the empire conference for a renewal of the agreements which hon. members to your left have been so doubtful about.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): You won't have to worry about it.

Mr. ROWE: Don't be too sure about that. I say to the hon. member for Northumberland, who has gone up and down the province of Ontario telling the people that the empire conference agreements are no good, that he should take the wily advice of his leader, who, although at first opposing them, has remained to adore them. He is still doubtful whether or not he could go to the country opposing them.

Mr. BROWN: Let us vote on it; there is a resolution before the house with respect to the trade agreements.

Mr. ROWE: How would the hon. member for Lisgar vote on them?

Mr. BROWN: I will vote against them.

Mr. ROWE: How would the hon. member for Northumberland vote on them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Make your speech.

Mr. REID: Bring on the resolution.

Mr. ROWE: I would suggest that the hon. member for Lisgar take a leaf out of the canny book of the hon. member for Northumberland, who does not say anything. His right hon. leader has said on different occasions that while at first he was doubtful, he now reserves the right to renegotiate them—but not abrogate them absolutely. He knows very well that those trade agreements preserve the solvency of Canadian agriculture. I say that had Canada maintained the markets overseas which were established back in 1900, and had she achieved the gradual development of those markets, the wheat price debacle of the last few years would not have occurred, and the unemployment in this country—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the proper word for it.

Mr. ROWE: —would be entirely different from what it is to-day.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, oh.

Mr. ROWE: My good friend laughs, and says that I have used the proper word. Let me say to him that nothing has contributed more to that debacle than the lopsided policy of the late government. We know that the production of wheat has increased, and that between 1915 and 1930 it almost doubled. While in the earlier years we exported only about ten per cent of the world's supply, in 1930 we were exporting about 35 per cent of the exportable surplus of the world.

An hon. MEMBER: What has it done since?

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Chairman, hon. members opposite do not even see the point. Successful farmers in Canada know that had we established the marketing system they had in Denmark, and had we sold the large quantity of bacon Denmark sold, the farmers would have received the benefit. I have listened to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) and to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) and others who seem to be very doubtful as to the soundness of this legislation, but in the speech from the throne presented by a Liberal government at the opening of parliament in British Columbia I find this paragraph—

An hon. MEMBER: We have had that.

Mr. ROWE: Some hon. member says that they have had that, but I suggest to the genial hon. member for Vancouver Centre that he read it a few times.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was read by the minister.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It is already on Hansard.

Mr. ROWE: This paragraph reads:

> Agriculture generally in British Columbia has improved and an upward trend is noticeable both in the matter of markets and price structure. As a result of the natural products marketing legislation passed last session several producers' schemes have been proclaimed, which, with a further broadening of the federal act, will, it is believed, result in establishing agriculture on a sounder basis in this province.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am glad hon. friends opposite are applauding the work of a Liberal government.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friends laugh and apparently disagree with me, but I do not expect them to believe everything I say. There are none so blind as those who will not see. I ask them to recall the words of one who was as bright as any of them, in fact I have always thought a little brighter, a former minister of finance who stated in the last session of the previous parliament that Canada had lost $244,000,000 of her trade and that there was practically no market left in the world with the exception of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There has been no improvement since then.

Mr. ROWE: Since the empire trade agreements were put into effect we have added more than $250,000,000 worth of trade.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): From zero.

Mr. ROWE: No, not from zero. There are those who are in business who will oppose this Natural Products Marketing Act. In the very nature of the industry, agriculture is difficult to organize. It is practically impossible to get 500,000 or 700,000 farmers properly organized to sell their products. We have been selling in a buyer's market since before confederation and we have been buying in a seller's market. We have been dancing to the tune of the highly organized monopolies and mergers who consider the farmer as merely a glorified pedlar of his own products. We have listened to bank managers and leaders of industry tell us that we are the backbone of Canada and we have subscribed to every plan which has been brought forward to ameliorate the hardships of the labouring man. It may have meant that we had to work another hour or two longer but we were ready to do it. We have never had a voice as to what we should get for our products. The hon. member for Lisgar knows as well as any other farmer in this house that what I have said is absolutely true. He has had to pay what the manufacturer has told him he would have to pay, and the manufacturer and his friends John, Bill and the others, have organized and fixed the prices of his products.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Under a Tory government.

Mr. ROWE: Not especially under a Tory government. The hon. member for Northumberland knows both sides of the game as well as any hon. member.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Give me a chance and I will tell it to you.

Mr. ROWE: I might as well tell part of it for fear you might miss it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No, I will not.

Mr. ROWE: We have heard the appeals of the hon. member for Northumberland for fairness. He has spoken two or three times and has made reference to this vicious legislation. I saw on the front page of the Toronto Globe of yesterday a reference to how he is martyring himself as a poor fruit grower who may have to go to gaol. He comes back to parliament and he says to the Minister of Agriculture: What can you put me in gaol for? I say to the hon. member that if they ever put him in gaol I will come down to see him.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): You will be there with me.

Mr. ROWE: I say in all seriousness that, while hon. members opposite plead for the freedom and liberty of the producer to sell his product for whatever price he likes, they know that the producer will be keeping his eyes cocked on our prices. As I said before, the hon. member for Northumberland knows how both sides of the game is played. I understand my hon. friend has a large interest in a cooperage company at Trenton. Back in 1919 that company did not go out like the producers as glorified pedlars. My hon. friend has very good judgment in business matters. I can see him going to Toronto and sitting in with the cooperage manufacturers of western Ontario. I do not know just what was said, but I believe the effect of the dialogue would be this: You can have western Ontario and I will take eastern Ontario.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I rise to a point of order. I object to the hon. member putting words in my mouth or imputing ulterior motives.

Mr. ROWE: Then I do not know what happened.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): That is right.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friends says, "that is right." I am sure the fruit producers did not appreciate the increase in—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The statement made by the hon. member contains not one tittle of truth. He is going a little bit too far in hatching jokes which appeal, I was going to say, to the vacant minds of his colleagues.

[Mr. W. A. Fraser.]

An hon. MEMBER: What is your point of order?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The hon. member is stating something which is absolutely untrue.

Mr. ROWE: Then we are to believe that my hon. friend has nothing to do with the Trenton Cooperage Company, Limited, which manufactures barrels.

Mr. GAGNON: He will not deny that.

Mr. ROWE: And that he does not sell barrels in western Ontario, that he is not interested in the price of barrels to the same extent that he is in the price of apples, and that the producers have not had to pay almost twice as much for their barrels as they did in 1919. The producers here have to pay from 65 to 75 cents for the same type of barrel which can be purchased in Nova Scotia for from 23 to 25 cents.

Mr. DUFF: That is not true.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): For the hon. member's information: My name is William Alexander Fraser; my address is, Trenton, Ontario; I am president and owner of the Trenton Cooperage Mills, Limited, which manufacture cooperage stock from which are made sugar barrels, kegs, apple barrels and other lines of cooperage stock which are sold to the trade on an uncontrolled market at competitive prices. If in this debate the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe chooses to disregard the subject and continue along the lines he has been following, I shall be glad to answer any personal questions he may ask. I really enjoy it, and judging by the loud peals of laughter among his colleagues they evidently enjoy it, too. I suggest, however, that we get back to a consideration of the marketing act.

Mr. ROWE: It has reference to the marketing of apples. I do not know what eastern manufacturers of barrels can compete with the Trenton Cooperage Company.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Why don't you stick to the marketing act?

Mr. ROWE: I will say this, however, that the marketing of these implements, barrels or containers, or any other articles used in the sale of the product, practically everything you buy, from a tin plate to a barrel, is controlled by the organized industry. The price is set by the organized industry.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Absolutely incorrect.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend says, absolutely incorrect. I can only say that the prices of barrels are higher and have been higher in eastern and western Ontario than in the state of Virginia or in New York or in Nova Scotia, for a period of ten years.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): You don't know what you are talking about; why not admit it?

Mr. ROWE: The Natural Products Marketing Act is fundamental. I know that those hon. gentlemen who have never fully recognized the difficulties under which the farmer is labouring in his endeavour to get value for his products are unconscious of the critical position of agriculture in this country at the present time. They do not fully realize what the industry has had to face in the last five years in the hazards of marketing. If I had any criticism to make of this marketing act it would not be, as my hon. friend has said, with regard to the vicious principle of the act, it would not be because the vote is too large, but the very opposite. For I do not think that it should be $545,000; in my opinion there should be set aside in connection with the Natural Products Marketing Act the sum of $5,000,000. I know that the government themselves might oppose that idea; it might be said that the imperial trade agreements would be affected by state aided products. Well, we have an advantage in the British market of $1.25 in connection with our apples and we enjoy an advantage in other lines as well, but I repeat—I have said this before and I repeat it now by way of emphasis—that it is absolutely necessary that Canadian agriculture should be made prosperous once more if Canadian industry generally is to return to prosperity. And if this is to come about we must have an increase in agricultural prices. I believe that under the act we have the power to set aside a stabilization fund for the purpose of disposing of our surplus products in the export market. It is generally understood that apart from wheat we have only a very small percentage which is sold in the British or world market—in bacon it is four or five per cent and in fruits the percentage is small. When practically every country in the world has adopted the system of bonuses, subventions and subsidies, it is high time that this or any other government forgot the political effect of commendable actions in a period of crisis. We have spent millions of dollars to feed the unemployed. Now if we are to make agriculture prosperous so that it may be the means of absorbing thousands and hundreds of thousands of the unemployed in this country, we must have higher prices for agricultural products, and every farmer within the sound of my voice will appreciate the fact that it is the exportable surplus, which is small compared to the amount we produce, that automatically sets the price. There should be under this act a branch, an export board, with a stabilization fund to standardize and stabilize the prices of our exportable surplus going into the world market. As regards state aid, I would point out that we have wheat state aided to the extent of from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 in the way of freight rates. We have state aided coal, iron and steel, and industry is state aided by means of protection. I say, therefore, that if I had any objection to make to the present act it is, not that it goes too far but that it does not go far enough. I think it should meet with the approval of hon. members on both sides of the house.

I appreciate what the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) said yesterday and what the hon. member for Northumberland has said; it is difficult to evolve something that will be satisfactory to everyone. No doubt my hon. friends, when they want to indulge in technicalities, will find in the act something which will give them an argument, but I urge on this house to consider the act not from the point of view of politics but as a means of restoring Canadian prosperity; and I submit to the government that instead of setting aside $545,000 in connection with the act they should think in terms adequate to stabilize prices by disposing of the exportable surplus, thus raising the price for the rest of the product. I am satisfied that the only hope of increasing employment in the country is to increase and to stabilize the prices of our exportable surplus. That is our only hope for expansion and for maintaining the balance of trade. It is the only thing that will provide the necessary stimulus for industry and commerce in this country. Again I urge the government to reconsider this vote of $545,000 and to add another decimal in the interests of agriculture. It is absolutely essential that the exportable surplus should be taken off the market, and for that reason I say that prices should be stabilized and standardized in keeping with the costs of production. This would have a far-reaching effect, in processing our coarse grains and giving employment, thus stimulating business all along the line. I submit that the Natural Products Marketing Act should receive the support of hon. members on all sides, because while in the letter it may not be absolutely perfect, it is undoubtedly sound in principle and is a step in the right direction. I am not surprised that the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) the one who on the opposite side understands it best, has supported it.

Mr. BROWN I apologize to the committee for having been the occasion of drawing forth that speech.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Let me say to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe that I regret he was so unethical as to interject into the discussion of a national question a matter of personal or private business. I would point out to him that as a manufacturer of cooperage stock and lumber in Canada I have the privilege, under the Natural Products Marketing Act, of evading the combines act and, by combining my business with those of others interested in the same line, I can stabilize, maintain and charge a set price for barrels or other products coming under the act, which I manufacture—something I do not at present enjoy. In this connection I would point out that the Natural Products Marketing Act gives the right of monopoly. The other night I expressed the opinion that it was ultra vires and contrary to the Combines Investigation Act, giving the right of combine with respect to over fifty-five per cent of the total production in the dominion. That is the right of combine under the Natural Products Marketing Act to "sock" the basic producers, so that those who are enjoying monopolies, cartels and combines in Canada may have some further excuse for a continuation of their privileges and as the hon. member suggested for "socking" the farmer in his depressed state under the mistaken policies of the government that my hon. friend supports.

May I also say to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and the Minister of Agriculture, in connection with the Natural Products Marketing Act as it applies to the canning industry in Canada, involving every branch of that industry from asparagus to tomatoes, that under the government that has been in power since 1930 and under the empire agreements of 1932, every user of a Canadian commodity packed in tin plate or packed in a tin or can is at the present time paying a levy of 20 per cent on tin plate to an international cartel under the 20 per cent duty applied under the empire agreements as a sop to an international cartel. May I say to the hon. member and the minister—and I am going to give the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe a little additional information about my private affairs—for four years I was a director of the second largest tin can company in Canada. As he rightly said, I know something about both sides. I know this much, that if the Minister of Agriculture would appeal to the Minister of National Revenue in the interests of the basic producers to cancel the 20 per cent duty on tin plate, which has forced the price of tomatoes in Canada from thirty-five cents to twenty-five cents a bushel since 1932 or 1933, a direct and effective move would have been taken by this government to assist the basic producers in receiving more from the results of their toil.

Permit me to go one step further, and I am very glad the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe brought these details to my experienced mind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Let me tell my hon. friends, whom I might place in the category of—to use a word which I rarely use, because I do not like it—buffoons, that as a matter of policy there are only one or two places where you can align the cost of a basic product when it comes into conflict with a product under a controlled price or a cartel, and that is the cost of labour or the cost of the product to the basic producer. When the twenty per cent duty was imposed on tin plate and we in the canning business were confronted with an increase in the price of cans, we and others in that business looked around to see some place where we could lower our costs, because we are bound and tied by the twenty per cent duty on tin plate. I happen to have before me the annual statement issued by the company in which I am a shareholder and was originally a director. We were bound and tied by the duty of twenty per cent on tin plate, twenty per cent on tin cans, so not only we but every other Canadian manufacturer took it out of the basic producer and labour. That is the reason why the farmers work sixteen hours a day to keep even and pay their taxes and the interest on their mortgages; it is because they are selling a product that it is impossible to align under this or any other act which is in direct conflict with a prohibitive economic tariff such as the one on tin plate. When the tomato grower whom the Minister of Agriculture hopes to assist, and when the basic producer for whom the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe was a few minutes ago expressing his sympathy in such melancholy tones, are working sixteen hours a day and getting less for their products than will enable them to pay their taxes and interest, the company of which I have the honour and privilege to be a shareholder increased its profits in 1934 by twelve per cent under a highly protected cartel on which the canning industry depends. That is all I have to say in that connection to my hon. friend.

But I would like to get back to the Natural Products Marketing Act. A little while ago I asked the minister for some information in regard to the $50,000 paid to the poultry schemes in the three western provinces, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. This did not exactly start a controversy, but it brought forth an explanation from an hon. member on this side. The hon. member stated that he did not receive any money directly from the government or from a government board, but nevertheless he, I believe, has acknowledged in what he has said that the name appearing on this list opposite an amount of $94.20 is his name. My contention is that the government under this vote of $545,000 is paying money to paid propagandists to promote these schemes. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to have your permission to place on Hansard this return which will give the record in detail of the money spent and who received it in regard to the $50,000 in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Shall I read it or may I have it taken as read and placed on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. ROWE: Put it on Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN: With the consent of the house the hon. member may put it on Hansard.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Very well, I will read it in a minute or two. In that connection may I say this to the minister and to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe in order that we may get down to a proper basis on this matter. As I said the other night, I am a farmer and interested in farming as an industry, individually, collectively and nationally, and I believe in cooperative marketing. My hon. friend laughs, but I may say that I have a good many dollars invested in the farming industry and I am greatly interested in it. I am interested in the farming industry, in the assistance of that industry, in anything that will promote the interests of the farmer, but I feel it my bounden duty not only as a farmer but as a member of this house to the best of my ability to prevent the expenditure of public funds in a way that is absolutely uneconomical, diametrically opposed to sound economics and in a way that will reflect detrimentally on the interests of the farmers. I am not making a political issue out of this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If that is my hon. friends' interpretation, they have a perfect right to it. Perhaps, if they were as serious about this matter as I am, they would cry instead of laughing even if they had to use an onion to do so. But this is a serious matter, apart from politics. I want to say to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe and to the Minister of Agriculture: I am not interested in the question whether an act was passed by a Liberal government in British Columbia or a Tory government at Ottawa or a Liberal government in Ontario. To me it is wrong, it does not matter which government passed it. I do not endorse it because Mr. Pattullo passed it.

Mr. ROWE: I did not say he passed it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Or because they passed enabling legislation.

Mr. ROWE: They just approved.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): However you put it, I still contend it is absolutely wrong—wrong first in the matter of the expenditure of public funds, as this return shows, and secondly as an attempt to do things which have been proven wrong, such as the rubber monopoly in the Malay states, the Patterson scheme in Australia, the Coffee scheme in Brazil, or the wheat marketing scheme in Canada, which will probably result in a loss to the treasury of several million dollars. I will do anything, in this house or out of it, on the public platform or otherwise, to assist the Canadian farmer, no one wishes to do that more than I. I am absolutely in favour of cooperative marketing, of orderly marketing, and I am in favour of the government spending money in an educational way to improve the methods used by the farmers, whether they be fruit growers or tomato growers or wheat growers. But I say that it is wrong to use the public funds to the extent that they are being used at the present time, without the control of parliament, for schemes that are hatched and concocted perhaps not by members of the staff but in a great many cases in the minds of those from one end of this country to the other who have ulterior and personal motives. I am not making that statement without a basis of fact; the facts are before us, the expenditures are before us; the methods are before us and the results are before us. The results are before us in connection with the potato board in Ontario and in the eastern provinces. To-day potatoes are not worth a nickel a bag in Ontario. All that scheme did in Ontario was to lower the price of maritime province potatoes coming into Ontario and force down the prices all along the line.

Now I wish to put this on record. As fruit and vegetable growers we have all that we require for the regulation of our industry, the grading and marketing of our product, the designation of grades and the definition and methods of marketing under the Fruit and Honey Act and under the Root Vegetables Act. We have the approach to the Canadian Horticultural Council and direct to the Department of Agriculture. In my experience as a charter member of the Canadian Horticultural Council and up to the present time, regardless of which government was in power, I can say the council and its officers have been given sympathetic hearing by the Ministers of Agriculture of the federal government and have been given all possible assistance. Grades have been changed as recommended by the council. Things were done in conference with the Canadian Horticultural Council when the industry was represented from one end of the country to the other, and we have under these acts everything that is necessary for the orderly marketing and grading and packing of fruits and vegetables. I do not wish to be misunderstood in this house or outside, but I wish to convey to the Minister of Agriculture that we as fruit growers object to the compulsory clauses of this Act. The schemes have been turned down in Ontario and other parts of Canada except British Columbia. As basic producers we do not believe that this act is economically sound. We believe that changes must be made eliminating objectionable features that cannot be enforced, and such powers as the minister admitted to-night exist under the act, by virtue of which if the court so decided it could send a producer to gaol. Let these features be eliminated and the act amended in such a way that the basic producers shall be neither coerced nor persuaded by propaganda paid for out of public funds to try to do something that cannot be done.

I wish to ask the minister one or two definite questions. First I would like to read an extract from the Tillsonburg News, of Tillsonburg, Ontario, under date of January 31, 1935:

First Tobacco Conviction

"Simcoe.—The sale of a quantity of tobacco, not a crime six months ago, has landed Antal Csopari, South Norwich farmer, in gaol for a twenty day term, when he was the victim of the first conviction under the provisions of the Ontario flue-cured tobacco marketing act. He was found guilty of purchasing unmanufactured tobacco from a fellow Hungarian, A. Listock, while not possessing a licence. Magistrate Cross imposed a fine of $25 and costs or twenty days in gaol on Csopari, the accused going to gaol when he was unable to meet the fine. At the same session Frank Latos of Middleton paid the fine of $25 and costs after pleading guilty to selling unmanufactured tobacco to a person not licensed by the board."

Remember there is more at stake than your interest as a poultry producer. If this compulsory monopolistic scheme carries what chance will you have to resist a gasoline and tractor fuel monopoly; a twine, coal, flour or boot monopoly, in this country, once farmers themselves vote for a monopoly, or for that matter a monopoly in any other commodity?

My question is whether that report is correct, that a man was sent to gaol for selling tobacco, whether he had a licence or had not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No. Will the minister answer the question?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret that I did not get the definite question.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): My definite question is: Was Mr. Csopari, a South Norwich farmer, sent to gaol for twenty days for selling tobacco?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not a record of this case at hand, but the circumstances are more complicated than as stated by the hon. member. I believe this case came up under a different charge, but as the actual information is not before me I would not care to take the risk of placing a statement on Hansard. I think the hon. member may agree with me that this was a more complicated case in the first place than he has made out. But I do not wish to evade saying this, that it is felt, and has been felt for years by those who have been actively engaged in cooperative effort and marketing, that in many cases their endeavours were made of no avail because of the fact that even a small percentage of producers remained outside of the organization and were sufficient to break the effectiveness of it. The purpose of this act is, in that connection, although it can be made use of in many ways without the compulsory feature, to give full control when the great majority of producers are anxious that it should be done. Under legislation passed in this house by the previous government as well as this government there are compulsory features, especially in connection with grading as the hon. member mentioned. For example I refer to section 14, page 4, of the Root Vegetables Act and regulations:

Every person who by himself or through the agency of another person violates any of the provisions of this act or regulations made thereunder, shall be liable upon summary conviction, for the first offence to a fine not exceeding twenty-five dollars and not less than ten dollars, for the second offence to a fine not exceeding fifty dollars and not less than twenty-five dollars, and for the third and each subsequent offence to a fine not exceeding two hundred dollars and not less than fifty dollars, together in all cases with the costs of prosecution; and in default of payment of such fine and costs shall be liable to imprisonment for any term not exceeding one month unless such fine and costs and the costs of enforcing them are sooner paid.

That is an example of legislation that was passed, I have no doubt, with the support of the hon. member who has spoken at such length. So it would seem that either he has changed his mind with reference to these things or his objection is not so much to the compulsory feature as it is to the political point involved. I would not care to be unfair in that connection; if the hon. member has changed his mind it is his privilege to do so. When he first rose to his feet he referred at length to the fact that the Natural Products Marketing Act made it possible to form a combine. That may be so, but it is only a combine concerning a regulated product, and not a combine that could be used to the detriment or injury of the public, because if it should be so used the powers of the board could be withdrawn.

Before taking my seat I should like to refer to the request of the hon. member for permission to place on Hansard the statement he has in his hand, without reading it. In view of the fact that on quite a number of occasions I have requested permission to do the same thing and that permission has been always refused by hon. members opposite, I think the proper thing in this case would be for hon. members on this side of the house to agree unanimously to permit the hon. member to place the statement on Hansard without reading it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I take it, then, that I must read it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, hand it in.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): Is it the wish of the committee that the hon. member be permitted to place the statement he has in his hand on record without reading it?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I will read, from the statement submitted by the Alberta Poultry Producers Limited, the disbursement of their advance of $20,000.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member need not read it; the committee has given him permission to place it on Hansard.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): Is the hon. gentleman reading the statement? The committee consented to allow him to hand the statement to Hansard.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Then I will hand it in. The statement is as follows:

I should like to say, in reply to the statement of the minister concerning the act to which he referred a moment ago, that the penalties imposed under that act bring it into exactly the same category as the Weights and Measures Act; it is a case of standardizing and selling the consumer products of a certain quality. That is an entirely different feature; that is an entirely different purpose from the Natural Products Marketing Act. In that case, if you sell a man a rotten apple you are fined. If he wants to buy a Spy and you try to sell him a Ben Davis, naturally you will be fined, just the same as if you give a man a counterfeit dollar you will be fined. That bill is in exactly the same category as the Weights and Measures Act, with which we all agree. With that principle I entirely agree, as I always have agreed, but the penalties under the Natural Products Marketing Act are entirely different. These penalties are to be applied in order to try to make a person do what you cannot make him do. I quite realize, as the minister has said, that in all these schemes some people break away; in this case you are going to apply penalties to a minority, in the way of fines and gaol sentences, in order to force the minority to do as the majority desire. As I said the other night, that was what we tried to do in connection with liquor and narcotics, and we found that it could not be done. Now you are trying to do it in connection with food products.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, there are four distinct features to this act. There are the penalty clauses; there is the removal from the House of Commons of the right to regulate exports and imports; there is the clause which places in the hands of a board not under the control of the parliament of Canada the right of taxation, and in the fourth place you put in the hands of that board rights which should be and are under the sole jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. Those are the objectionable features of the act. If the act were so drafted that it could be used to assist the farmers instead of trying to do these things you cannot do, it would be a different proposition; as I have already said, cooperation is all right.

I should like to mention another point in connection with this act. A moment ago the Minister of Agriculture said that it did not provide for monopolies or for price fixing I agree with only part of what the minister has said. I have in mind the jam scheme. Under that scheme, which I believe has been adopted by the federal board, the price of jam has been fixed; specifically, the price of marmalade, which is made out of an imported product—Jaffa, Spanish or Italian oranges—has been increased to the Canadian consumer by nearly one hundred per cent. If any producers are to benefit under that scheme it can only be the Arabs or Jews of Jerusalem, the Spaniards of Spain or the Italians of Italy. Unquestionably, there is the right of monopoly under this act.

I should like to return to the fact that public moneys are being spent under the jurisdiction of this board in an endeavour to coerce—or I might use the word "kid"—people into trying to do something they do not want to do. Just listen to this for a moment. In Alberta the sum of $584 was spent for broadcasting. Just imagine using a propagandist over a broadcasting station to tell the Alberta farmers how to raise chickens and how to sell eggs. That is the way the money is being spent. Then there is item after item for speakers. Imagine paying speakers to go out on the public platform to advocate a scheme such as this. I happen to know some of the speakers by name, and if I did not know any more about keeping chickens, raising hens, or producing eggs than some of the people on this list know I would go into the horse doctor business without any hesitation. That is the way this money has been spent. I want to be emphatic about this. Apparently, from this statement, that is the way it is intended to proceed in 1935 and spend $500,000 of the people's money. And let me repeat that this $500,000 will not be spent under the direction of people who have spent their lives in successful business, farming or otherwise. It will be spent under the direction of academic minds and a lot of people who think they know more about other people's business than they do know. If you think the basic producers, whom the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe said to-night are toiling sixteen hours a day in order to get enough money to pay the sugar tax, their other taxes and the interest on their mortgages, are going to let any white collar, ten thousand dollar a year men, with shining cars, run around this country and broadcast over expensive stations, telling them how to get more eggs out of a hen, you are very much mistaken. I suggest to the minister that before this item passes he should carefully consider how this money is to be spent. He should be very careful before spending half a million dollars of the money of the taxpayers in trying to do impossible, uneconomic things that have been proven wrong from the Malay straits to south of the forty-ninth parallel. Look across the forty-ninth parallel to-day; the minister knows as well as I do what has happened to the cotton business in that country. He knows also that there are forty per cent less cattle there to-day than there were when the NRA first came into operation. Do we think we can change the Almighty's works over night, the growing of grass where grass should grow? You cannot do that, or anybody else.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would like to correct the hon. member on one point. This money was not distributed by any white-collared gentleman driving around in a shiny car, but by producers themselves, who are sponsors of the schemes and members of the different organizations supporting them in western Canada. The money was given to the provincial organizations, practically all of which represented producers.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If there were not any shiny cars in western Canada they must have used old Fords or horses and buggies, because there were surely shiny cars used in eastern Canada.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In connection with the distribution of this money?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Not that part of it, no.

Mr. YOUNG: I understood the other night from the minister that there were eleven schemes in operation; could he tell me if under any of these schemes marketing is being done either by the marketing board or by the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. YOUNG: Why?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Because it provides only for the regulation of marketing, not the actual marketing.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it not the intention of the act that either the marketing board or a local board shall do the marketing?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, even if it were desired they could not do it under the act.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MacNicol): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. NEILL: Would you call it eleven o'clock?

Mr. MANION: Carried.

Mr. NEILL: No, I will go on, if you insist.

Mr. MANION: Go ahead, then.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister insist upon going on?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot see any objection to going on; we have to get it through some time.

Mr. NEILL: All right. I am sorry the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe has left the chamber. I was going to remark that it was curious to find him spending fifty minutes the other day eulogizing the marketing act and spending nearly as long to-night repeating most of it. It is even more curious to note that he concluded his remarks with very faint praise, by saying that it was a step in the right direction, while at the beginning or very early in his observations he alluded to the vicious principles contained in the act. He made some reference to my not being convinced of its usefulness, but I do not believe I ever went so far as to talk about its vicious principles. I am sorry he is not in his seat, but so that there will be no doubt about his statement I shall quote from his observations as they are recorded at page 3296 of Hansard for June 4, 1935. Speaking about the hon. member for Melville, he said:

> He suggests further that the vicious principles of the act might well be removed. With that view I am somewhat in agreement.

He began by telling us that the act contained vicious principles but ended with the statement that it was a step in the right direction, and fills in ninety minutes in an endeavour to show what a great and gallant act it is. He brought my name into the matter by stating that I had doubts about the efficacy of the measure. I never went so far as to talk about its vicious principles.

Now, to get back from the hustings to the House of Commons I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a certain point, and ask him to make a statement of policy on behalf of the government concerning a matter which to my mind seems to strike at the very root of the usefulness of the act. I refer to a decision given by the Saskatchewan court of appeal, to which I shall presently allude. This is a matter which more or less is of a constitutional nature, something which as a rule I am very careful to leave alone. However it is put into such simple and plain language that even he who runs may read. It would appear as we are all aware, that there was doubt as to the dual jurisdiction of the dominion and the provinces, and they got around it by passing an act in the federal house and the provinces passing what is known as enabling legislation. In all the provinces the enabling legislation was in very much the same language. Then, on an appeal concerning live stock products to the court I have mentioned, a ruling was given. In connection with that ruling this statement is made:

> The net result of the judgment delivered at Regina within the past fortnight is to throw grave doubt on the constitutionality of all dominion enactments which rely upon provincial enabling statutes.

The judgment proceeds to state why they find fault, but I have not time to go into that phase of the matter. The fact is however that one of the higher courts—possibly it was the supreme court—of the province of Saskatchewan has decided that that method of solving the question of dual jurisdiction is all wrong and invalid. If it is invalid in Saskatchewan I suppose it would be equally so in Alberta, British Columbia or Ontario, because the basic principle upon which the decision has been given appears to lie right at the root of the matter. This statement is made:

> The judgment nullifies the Saskatchewan enabling act on the ground that it is merely an attempt to give a jurisdiction to the dominion which it does not possess and in a matter which, by the British North America Act, is assigned to the province.

Then they cite the converse:

> The dominion cannot give jurisdiction or leave jurisdiction with the province. The provincial parliament cannot give legislative jurisdiction to the dominion parliament.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who were the judges?

Mr. NEILL: The article does not say. This statement is made:

> This act has received a crushing blow at the hands of the Saskatchewan court of appeal. It now appears that all the enabling legislation at present supporting such dominion statutes as the marketing act and the industrial disputes act, to cite but two, is imperilled.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That case did not refer to the provisions of the marketing act; it had nothing to do with the marketing act.

Mr. NEILL: I know that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member is reading a newspaper opinion with respect to it concerning the effect the decision might have on the Natural Products Marketing Act. If the hon. member would read the judgment I think he would find that the objection taken to this particular piece of legislation was the manner in which the enabling legislation was passed.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to continue the discussion to-morrow, because the minister's statement is not in accordance with my understanding.

Progress reported.

Bill No. 89, for the relief of Muriel Mabel Muttart.—Mr. Myers.

Bill No. 90, for the relief of Emile Fossion.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 91, for the relief of Eva Bennett.—Mr. Bell (St. Antoine).

Bill No. 92, for the relief of Helen Gertrude Bryant Wilson.—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 93, for the relief of Gladys Sarah Jenkins Weeks.—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 94, for the relief of Mary Elizabeth Taylor Nicholson.—Mr. White (Mount Royal).

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 7, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

TRAIL, B.C., SMELTER

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I desire to lay on the table two copies each in English and French of the convention between Canada and the United States, with respect to certain complaints arising from the operation of a smelter at Trail, British Columbia, dated the 15th day of April, 1935.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION BY ROYAL COMMISSION INTO ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): At the request of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), I desire to lay on the table the evidence and exhibits, which only came to hand on Wednesday, in connection with the inquiry by Chief Justice Baxter into certain irregularities charged against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This is the only copy of the evidence that has come to hand. I have not yet had time to read it but I will place it on the table in the meantime.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

On the order for the introduction by Mr. Reid of a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before this matter is further proceeded with I think I should say to the hon. gentleman who proposes the bill that perhaps he is not aware of the fact that under the international agreement made between various countries, including Canada, regarding silver, there is an obligation undertaken by Canada that the government shall purchase or otherwise arrange for withdrawing from the market, as in the attached memorandum of agreement, 1,671,802 fine ounces of silver in each calendar year beginning with the calendar year 1934. The agreement does not terminate until the first of January, 1938, and I hardly think that the hon. gentleman would desire, by the legislation which he now contemplates, to endeavour to destroy the international agreement to which I have referred.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may refer to the point raised by the Prime Minister, I submit with all respect that the legislation proposed to be introduced by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) does not in the slightest degree interfere with the agreement to which the right hon. gentleman has referred. It only implements it and strengthens it, proposing that the Bank of Canada shall not have less than that actual amount specified in that agreement. With respect to the point raised by my right hon. friend yesterday, I submit that this cannot possibly affect either revenue or expenditure as suggested, nor can it affect the Bank of Canada even if, Mr. Speaker, you construe the Bank of Canada to be the agent of the minister. I think the point raised by the Prime Minister now is raised more or less on grounds of public policy, and I suggest with the utmost deference, after a careful examination of both sections of the proposed bill, that it does not in the slightest degree interfere with the international agreement; on the contrary, it seeks definitely to implement the terms of that agreement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am going to ask the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) if he will allow this matter to stand for another day. I may say that I have given the matter very careful consideration and I am in considerable doubt as to whether or not the bill is in order, but I certainly do not wish to rule that it is out of order unless I satisfy my own mind on the subject. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is reasonable.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

[Mr. Bennett.]

FRUIT, VEGETABLES AND HONEY

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 95, respecting fruit, vegetables and honey.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

B.C. RELIEF CAMP STRIKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question with reference to press dispatches to the effect that certain men who were formerly in unemployment relief camps in western Canada are now proceeding to Ottawa. Is he prepared to make any statement with respect to the general situation or any statement of government policy with regard thereto?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): So far as the government is aware, a number of men have left Vancouver as trespassers on freight trains and are travelling east, some by the Canadian Pacific and some by the Canadian National. No complaints have been made by the railway companies against these trespassers, and until such time as such complaints are made, the provincial authorities are not, as I understand the situation, disposed to take any proceedings against these men. The government is ready and willing, if called upon by the provincial authorities, to render such assistance as may be necessary in the premises, but at the moment no such occasion has arisen.

I should add that the communist societies in Canada are proclaiming it as a very great victory on their part that these men have moved east. I need hardly say that there are several well known communistic societies under varying names; they have sought to embroil the government in some discussion in respect to these matters, and we have declined to enter into any discussion with them. Doubtless the hon. gentleman has seen the statement that has been made as to the victory that has been achieved with respect to these trespassers on the trains.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have there been any requests from the government of Alberta or the mayors of cities?

Mr. BENNETT: A number of telegrams have been received from various communities apprehending difficulties, but we have told them that when complaints have been made against these trespassers, at the request of the provincial authorities we are ready to render such assistance as may be within our power and as they may require.

One telegram did come from the premier of Alberta, one, I think, from the mayor of Calgary and one from Edmonton. I speak subject to correction as to Edmonton, but I am sure as to Calgary. Obviously it is hardly necessary to say that we are not in a position to render any assistance until some complaint is made, and that matter, as I repeat, is one that rests, in its inception and in its carrying forward, with the provincial authorities.

FEED AND SEED GRAIN EXPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. C. MATTHEWS (Minister of National Revenue): Last Wednesday, on the orders of the day, the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) asked how much hay, straw, feed and seed grain was exported to the United States from each of the western provinces during the past season. I find that the statistical returns of exports do not distinguish between seed and feed grain, all of each class of grain being grouped together in one item for statistical purposes.

I have had a statement prepared, however, of the exports of hay, straw, barley, rye, wheat and oats from each of the western provinces during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1935, and during the month of April, 1935, and with the permission of the house, I shall place this on the record. The statement is as follows:

Statement of exports of barley, rye, wheat, oats, hay and straw: to the United States through ports in the western provinces of Canada during the fiscal year ended March, 1935, and the month of April, 1935

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

REPORT OF MACDONALD COMMISSION APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO CONDITIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): I informed the house yesterday that the report of the Macdonald commission which had been inquiring into the relief camps in British Columbia had just reached me. I wish to state that it is now receiving the consideration of the government, and I anticipate being in a position to table it early next week, probably Tuesday, and to make a short statement at that time.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Might I ask the Minister of National Defence whether copies of the report of the Macdonald commission will be printed for the use of members?

Mr. STIRLING: That matter will be considered by the government and I will make a statement thereon when I speak to the tabling of the report.

HYNDMAN COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Might I be permitted to suggest to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Sutherland) that I will ask him next Monday with respect to the government's intention as regards referring the Hyndman report on unemployment among ex-service men to a special committee?

CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question in regard to the Farm Loan Act. When a man has a loan made prior to the act which was passed this year whereby a person can borrow at five per cent, will the old loan be released?

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): A decision upon that point has not been arrived at as yet.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 25, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Power to prescribe fees for inspection.

Mr. NEILL: Might I ask the minister why he is making this amendment to section 17 which deals with fish and shellfish canneries and their inspection? It seems to me that it should have been made to section 18 which deals with fish and shellfish packed in cans. The minister is aware that inspection of canneries lies no longer with the dominion but with the provincial authorities and this section is really obsolete. The amendment would seem to be more appropriate if it were made as an addition to section 18 of the act.

Mr. STIRLING: The object of the amending bill is to clear up any doubt which may have existed as to whether under this section the government have power to collect fees. The insertion of the clause as suggested, appears to me to meet the difficulty. It states:

> The governor in council may from time to time prescribe a tariff of fees that shall be charged for the inspection of canned fish and shellfish.

And attached to section 17, it appears to me to be quite appropriate.

Mr. NEILL: Surely the minister did not catch my meaning. I am not finding fault with the wording of the clause in the bill. I am merely saying that it is being put into the wrong place. It is being attached to a section which has no standing in law to-day. Section 17 reads:

> All fish and shellfish canneries shall be inspected as provided by the regulations.

But that is ultra vires of the jurisdiction of the dominion at the present time and has been since the decision of the privy council somewhere around 1927 or 1928. It would seem appropriate to put it in the proper place instead of the wrong place. I admit it would have sufficient significance wherever it is put, but it would be much more appropriate to put it in the section that is within our jurisdiction, section 18, dealing with canned fish, rather than in the one dealing with canneries over which we have no jurisdiction.

Mr. STIRLING: The output of canneries can certainly be inspected under the act. It does not seem to me to make any difference whether it is under section 17 or section 18.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

LIVE STOCK AND PRODUCTS

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 72, to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

Motion agreed to, bill the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Definitions.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister give a word of explanation as to what the changes are?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The changes are, first, to leave no doubt as to meat, not only for export but also for interprovincial trade, being included for inspection. Also in order that packers' yards through which direct shipments are made to packing plants may, if necessary, be brought under the same regulations as public stockyards; to give effect to the recommendations of the price spreads commission.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is not export from one province to another taken care of by the present inspection in meat packing plants? Is it the intention to bring the small butcher doing a domestic business under it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, what is the idea concerning trade between province and province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At present the act defines "live stock products" as including meat for export, but that does not cover interprovincial trade. The definition "for export" has been changed to include interprovicial trade.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what I am asking. What will be the position of a farmer who lives on the boundary line between two provinces, or a local butcher who slaughters say in Alberta and sells the meat in Saskatchewan? It is not now inspected because it does not go through a packing house. Will he be an offender under the act if he does that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, in that case there is not much use making the change, if it can be evaded as easily as that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are many plants that are not inspected establishments. At the present time there is only provision for inspection of plants doing interprovincial trade, but not of the product itself in transit. It will not in any way affect these small butcher shops.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think the minister will admit that there is not very much to this bill. I do not suppose it is meant to be one of the reforms bills at all, just the regular dressing up that usually takes place from time to time in these measures as circumstances require. Section 1 that we are now discussing defines "export," and the meaning is the same as it has been all along. "Export" has meant export out of the country and also interprovincial trade.

Then the other changes have grown out of that to some extent; such as the definition of what "domestic consumption" means. These are very trifling amendments but they are necessary. I do not despise them, but they do not by any means conform to the majority report of the price spreads commission. When the Minister of Justice was dealing with the amendments to the criminal code the other day he seemed to be very anxious as nearly as possible to follow along the lines of the price spreads report, which seems to be looked upon as the sacred ark of the covenant; but in this bill the minister seems to be getting away from the recommendations of the price spreads commission as far as possible. Maybe he is right in that respect. One recommendation of the majority report as I recollect is that there should be a live stock marketing board appointed. I do not see anything of that in this bill; perhaps the minister will explain why it is not here. I am not criticizing him for it not being here, I do not think it will be missed; at the same time I would like to understand why the Minister of Justice is so religiously desirous of carrying out in every detail the price spreads report, even to the point of absurdity, in the amendments to the criminal code.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh no.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, pretty nearly. My good friend the Minister of Agriculture seems to disregard it by overlooking the major report of the price spreads committee on the live stock industry.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Provision is being made, with the exception of those amendments, to give effect to the recommendations of the price spreads report. The hon. member who has just taken his seat was right in his suggestion in that connection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Are we through with section 1?

The CHAIRMAN: Not yet.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then I shall wait until we are before saying anything further.

Mr. GERSHAW: May I ask the minister if a man taking meat across an interprovincial boundary must fill in reports and give information or call at any office to get permission to do such a thing?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No. But if complaints are made and abuses arise this gives power for action to be taken.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has the minister anything definite in mind, any particular regulation that he proposes to make under this section?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With respect to hogs passing from one province to another it might be necessary to take certain action.

Mr. ILSLEY: In what way? It would be interesting to know whether there is anything definite in the mind of the minister or of the department as to what is to be done under this section. From reading it I do not know just what is aimed at.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): One example might be the failure to observe grading regulations in connection with hogs, for example, or anything else that might arise in this connection. The whole point in the change of this definition is to give further power not only in connection with exports but also in connection with interprovincial trade in order to correct any abuses that may arise.

Mr. ILSLEY: That does not say anything at all. We do not know what abuse the legislation is designed to remove or what offence is expected to be created under it or what punishment there is to be for the offence; in fact we are entirely in the dark as to what the government have in mind. Does the department intend to prevent certain kinds of meat from moving from province to province while they may be moved from point to point within a province? Is that the point they have in mind?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Previous to this amendment "export" meant only international trade. The definition is changed here to include interprovincial trade, to which the same regulations can apply.

Mr. ILSLEY: What kind of regulations; regulation in what way?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In any connection, either as to inspection or any of the powers contained in this act, that previously applied only to export for international trade. Now they will apply to interprovincial trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: What provisions do apply to export trade?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is given in the regulations, which I have not here.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should like to support the objection to this section of my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). I think there is danger in creating barriers between the provinces. I believe what we should have in mind in Canada is the development of a national sentiment instead of the creation of different provincial territories separated and divided one from the other. If you start with small matters such as this in connection with the regulation of cattle, hogs and so on it may spread to other fields, and I think that is a dangerous principle to develop in this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the explanatory note a reference is made to the recommendation in clause 11 of division 2 on page XXII of the report. So far as I can see that is an incorrect reference; I cannot find the recommendation referred to. I should like to know what recommendation is referred to so that I may see what the government have in mind.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This reference deals specifically with the grading of meats.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where is the reference? It is incorrectly stated in the explanatory notes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am referring to the reference now, "consumer grades for meats."

Mr. ILSLEY: What page is that?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Page XXII of the preface. Recommendations have come to the department from time to time, and the department itself has also felt, that in connection with meats it would be advisable to make available to the provinces, if they so desired, an inspection of meats for domestic purposes. A good deal of work has been done in connection with the grading of meats during the past number of years with the hope that if the consumers had some assurance as to the quality of the meat they were purchasing, through a grade placed upon it—red label or blue label beef, for example—it would encourage the consumption of meat. I think perhaps it has come to the attention of every hon. member of the house, in travelling throughout the country and stopping at hotels and other eating places, that possibly nine times out of ten they have been disappointed in the quality of the meat served to them, particularly beef. I know that opinion is held very strongly by the live stock producers themselves, and each person who is disappointed in the quality of the meat he gets is a lost purchaser, to a certain extent, of live stock products. So far this inspection has not been pressed in the domestic market but it is felt that if the province of Ontario, for example, should wish to carry further this policy of grading meats for consumption, they should be given the privilege of doing so.

Personally I feel that because of the large percentage of our meat, for instance beef, that is consumed locally, it would not take very much of a stepping up in the consumption to take care of a great part of our present surplus for export, and it is felt that the one move that would go further than anything else to bring about that end would be to make it easier for the consumer to be assured of the grade or quality of his meat, so that the purchaser might know as nearly as possible what he was getting. I believe during the investigation by the price spreads committee complaints were registered that stores would advertise for sale red label and blue label beef. These stores would have some of that beef for sale but on some occasions, without an explanation to the purchaser, they sold beef that was not graded either red or blue label. In that way the consumer was misled, with no possibility of redress. I know there is a very strong feeling among those who are anxious to make better use of our domestic market that we should carry further the grading of beef in order to encourage the consumption of higher quality beef and to make more difficult the misrepresentation that undoubtedly has occurred in some cases in this regard. In order to do that the definition of "export" has to be changed in order to take care of the interprovincial movement; so that if the province of Ontario decided to have compulsory provincial inspection of beef, for example, that would not be effective if beef could be shipped in from other provinces without undergoing the same inspection.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Would the minister indicate to the committee what percentage of our annual production of various live stock products, including hogs, cattle, sheep, lambs and so on, goes to the export market?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret very much that I have not those exact figures with me.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I think they are rather important in view of the minister's observation that a slight stepping up of the domestic consumption would largely take care of our surplus for export.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the point I was endeavouring to make. We have a market for all the lambs we produce, and an export market is unnecessary. Our consumption of beef is in the neighbourhood of 85 per cent of production.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I believe the figures are shown at the bottom of page 145 of the price spreads report.

Mr. McGIBBON: What percentage is rejected on account of disease?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): About one-half of one per cent is rejected and condemned.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does that apply to beef.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That applies to live stock, as a whole. Dairy cattle run higher than that figure.

Mr. McGIBBON: A few years ago the percentage of tuberculosis in pork was very high. Has it been decreased?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Some tubercular infection shows in about 20 to 25 per cent of the hogs marketed. In a great number of those cases certain glands in the neck are mildly affected. Those hogs or parts thereof are discarded and not allowed to go into consumption. In my former statement however I did not take that into consideration.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Does the amendment give authority to apply grading regulations to meat in all packing plants engaging in interprovincial business?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): It makes no difference whether or not all the meat going through a particular packing plant leaves a certain province; it applies to the whole product. The grading applies to the whole product of that packing plant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the intention, yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): What about meat imported from other dominions into Canada. I am thinking particularly about mutton. It is imported, and I believe is sometimes sold over the counter as lamb. Having tasted some of the lamb that is sold I have a suspicion that I am correct in my assumption.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If a province decides that all meat within that province shall be inspected and graded and that no meat within the province may be sold otherwise, this measure gives power to prevent an interprovincial movement of uninspected meat, and would take care of the difficulty mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Does the act as it stands give the federal government the right to insist upon the grading of mutton or lamb brought into this country from other countries?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I do not think we have power at the present time except as I have explained.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I consider that a very important matter, and on previous occasions have made reference to it in this chamber. If it were possible to have an amendment to the act or to obtain the cooperation of the provinces in the matter I believe the live stock industry would be greatly helped.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I agree with the views expressed by the hon. member for Peace River, namely, that if live stock products are to be imported into Canada and are to come in direct competition with our own production it is highly important that they be under a strict system of inspection and grading, the same as domestic products.

In respect to the question asked a few minutes ago I would refer the committee to the information at the bottom of page 145 of the report. I shall read some of the figures:

The following figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics show the relation of domestic consumption in 1933 to production:

	Per cent
Dairy products	95·4
Butter	98·5
Cheese	31·4
Cattle (beef and veal) estimated by pound	95·0
Hogs	90·8
Eggs	99·1

These figures indicate clearly that only a very small surplus of domestic production goes into export trade.

Mr. DONNELLY: I can readily realize that there will not be many cattle raised in Canada for export purposes if the prices remain at the point they have been in the last year or two. Cattle have been sold by the farmers at one-half cent or one cent per pound on the hoof. That price does not pay for their keep, and the farmers are not going to raise many of them. There is not much encouragement for the farmer to go into the production of live stock, and there will not be much difficulty in persuading the Canadian people to eat the total production. I do not think there will be much necessity for grading for export unless the price can be raised.

What will happen in the southern part of the province from which I come when we wish to pass through a customs port to cross the line—because I presume before this session is over we will have a measure of reciprocity with the United States? We have been looking for it for two or three years. This government has promised it and of course it always keeps its promises. When we have that measure of reciprocity cattle will cross the line without duty, and we do not want to have to take them to Moose Jaw, a distance of about 150 miles, to have them graded. We want to have some system of getting through customs ports and across the line without having to make that long trip for grading purposes. Even to-day we are taking cattle across the line in the southern part of the province and are paying the duty. They are being sold in the Chicago market because it pays us to do that. It is better to sell them there than to sell them in Canada. What provision has been made for the grading of cattle going out in that way?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have power to grade beef cattle leaving the country in that manner, but it has never been exercised. We are doing it in so far as dairy cattle are concerned in connection with shipments going to the United Kingdom. No person regrets more than I do the condition the hon. member has described, namely, the difficulty of getting an export market, and the fact that the market in the United States was lost before the present government took office.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is a huge joke that the Tories put over on every occasion, namely, the loss of this market. For two evenings we have been treated to a dialogue about the loss of markets. The hon. member who acted as chairman of the price spreads commission was desperately anxious to indicate that the people of Canada could eat the domestic supply. That is the sort of stuff the Tories will feed to the electors at the next election, in the hope that the Canadian people will fail to remember that there was a day when prices were sufficient to warrant production, when we had large amounts of dairy products to export—in one year 24,000,000 pounds. Those were days when people drank more milk and ate more butter than they ever did before in the history of Canada.

[Mr. Donnelly.]

Mr. GOBEIL: You remember the Hawley-Smoot tariff?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, I do; and I remember what you said about it. Go back now and tell the same story to your electors, and see whether or not you will be elected. The electors are becoming fed up on this sort of thing. We sit here day after day and listen to hon. members opposite tell us how the market disappeared when the Liberals were in office. What justification has the government for what has happened in the last five years with regard to price reductions, when because of lack of markets production has fallen off? Hon. members opposite have been advising the fellow who wants to eat to tighten up his belt and to eat less. They have advised him to eat less eggs and butter in order that they might take up the slack in home consumption. You have closed every possible market by various devices since you came into office, and I would advise you to go very slow in talking about any restriction of markets because I have in my desk statistics demonstrating how badly the markets both domestic and export have fallen off. So far as the export market is concerned, if prices continue as they are we shall not need any export market or domestic market either because, if present conditions continue, one of these days you will find yourself in the happy position of not having a market and of having no people to eat your products anyway. It will be a Godsend when there is an election and we can have this moribund outfit cleared out and give somebody who will do business for Canada a chance to do it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member state that during the time his party was in power, when the United States tariff was raised against our cattle to three cents a pound, that did not shut practically the whole of our cattle out from the United States?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I draw the minister's attention to this fact, that simultaneously with the loss of the American cattle market we secured the British market, and that is where our cattle went to. This government think that they took the embargo off cattle. It is true that they attended to the frills and tagends in the way of restrictions that still remained after 1923, but the major part of the embargo was taken off in 1923 under the Liberal administration. But we never claimed that all the credit belonged to us but to all who had preceded us and had been endeavouring to remove it for thirty years back. Immediately we were shut out from the United States market our market in Great Britain was opened up, and in the second or third year after the embargo was removed, in 1926, we shipped over 100,000 cattle to Great Britain, which is twice as much as we ever shipped since. So when we lost one market we got the other, and that is the advantage of having two markets. You cannot have it both ways. When the British market is bad, it is an advantage to have the United States market. But who is losing the British market now? I might just as well castigate this government on that score. When the United States market prices become attractive naturally our cattle gravitate to the United States in spite of their high American tariff but this year we have shipped to the United Kingdom only between 5,000 and 6,000 head—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—and if the quota next year is based on our shipments this year we shall be limited to shipping 5,000 or 6,000 head to the British market. So there is no use in the minister indulging in these bedtime stories about our losing markets because if we lost one we gained the other, and we did not lose the American market as the result of any action on our part but because the American government conceived that the action they took was the proper thing to do for the protection of their own farmers. But the Liberal government did do something to gain the British market by removing the embargo in 1923.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): On each occasion that I have made reference to this matter I have been careful to state this, and I did so specifically in the house the other night, that we were not accusing hon. gentlemen opposite of losing the market but simply that the market was lost when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and that we objected to them blaming us for losing the market.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: What could we have done to retain it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not say you could have done anything.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then what is the use of chewing the fat about it?

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister says that it was under Liberal rule that we lost our market for cattle. Anyone who knows anything about raising cattle in western Canada knows that there is only one market for cattle, and that is the United States, and that market was lost in 1911 when the Conservative party defeated reciprocity. There is no doubt about that. Anyone who knows political history knows that that is when we lost our market. More than that, the American government kept the terms of the reciprocity pact open for our acceptance up to 1919, when we had a Conservative-Union government in power, and it would not accept it. After that government went out of power and a Liberal government came in here, we had a Conservative government in office across the line. Now we have a Democratic government in office across the line which is willing to give us a measure of reciprocity, and our government here says that we are going to have reciprocity. What I want to know is why we are not having it. Why is this government not doing something about it? They have told us for the last two or three years that they are negotiating with the United States for reciprocity, but it is just another promise like those they made five years ago. We all remember the wonderful things that they were going to do then. The farmer was going to get wonderful prices for his eggs and butter and wheat, and there was going to be heaven on earth, but it has turned out just the opposite. The farmers have learned what this government and its promises mean. It was not long after this government was in power that our farmers realized how little its promises meant, and it is the same with all these stories that you are telling them now of the wonderful things you are going to do for the farmers. To find out what the farmers think of this government and its promises all you have to do is to go out in the country and ask them how much money they have saved, to put their hands in their pockets and feel the money that the Conservative government has saved to the farmers. The farmers will soon tell you: That money is not here; if you have saved any, it must be some place else in the country. They know that they have not got the money. They know that the packers or someone else got it, and not the farmers throughout the country. And when any of you come out and tell our people of these reforms and the great things you are going to do for our farmers by regulations of this kind, I say it is just so much balderdash so far as the farmer is concerned. He does not believe a word of it, and he is only waiting a chance to tell you what he feels about it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I take issue at once with the statement of my hon. friend from Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) that there is nothing in regulation of this kind. I do not know that there was anything done by the former Liberal government in connection with a product that helped that product more than the grading of eggs. We all know that the regulations in regard to egg-grading which were established by the Liberal government when it was in office were of tremendous assistance, and how on earth the hon. member who has just taken his seat can argue that regulations of a similar sort such as we have here for the grading of beef or meats can be of no benefit to the farmers of this country is amazing to me. I do not know that I am willing to give credit or blame to any government for all the ills or benefits that have come to agriculture during a period of years, but I am sure of this, that there is a desperate need in this country for the grading of meats and I think the grading of cattle as well. I am fond of beef but I hardly ever eat it when I am away from home because I am tired of chewing shoe leather, and I have good teeth at that. I think it is the greatest mistake for anyone to get up and say, when the government is attempting to put through legislation that will guarantee that the consumers of this country will receive the quality product raised on the farms of this country, that that is of no value to the producer. It is of tremendous value, and every step that has been taken along this line by a Conservative government or by a Liberal government has been all to the good both for producers and consumers.

I would like to ask the minister, while I am on my feet, what provinces have been cooperating with the dominion government in connection with the red and blue label grading. I understand when that was put into effect it was necessary to get the cooperation of the provinces, and I was wondering just how many provinces have entered into an agreement with the federal government in connection with the matter.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that they are cooperating in all the provinces. They do not require any enabling legislation for the grading of beef up to the present time because it is purely a voluntary matter.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Does the minister think that he has sufficient power under this section and the amendment to the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act to enable him to cooperate thoroughly with the provincial governments which are willing to cooperate for the grading of beef within the provinces as well?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe so, yes. If the province of Ontario wishes to establish grades for their beef we can protect them against beef coming in ungraded from other provinces, and that will give them full control this far, that no beef within that province can be sold except in accordance with their grades. It really gives them full power.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) took exception to my reference to the large percentage of domestic consumption of live stock products. I was merely quoting figures which were absolutely authentic, secured from the bureau of statistics. He may not have liked to hear them but that is his own concern. I would also call the hon. gentleman's attention to this. Those who, in season and out of season, have claimed that the Ottawa agreements have not been beneficial, with reference to the export trade, would do well to look at a statement that appears in this morning's Ottawa Journal by Sir Francis Floud, British High Commissioner, made at Hamilton yesterday in discussing Canada's exports to Great Britain. He is reported as follows:

> Canada had received far greater advantages from the Ottawa agreements than the United Kingdom, Sir Francis said, in appealing for a greater share of trade.

Every farmer in this country knows what that has meant to the Canadian hog industry during the last few years.

Mr. MacLEAN: Last season in our province there was put into effect a certain regulation —I do not know whether it was a dominion government regulation or not—which prevented the shipment out of the province of dressed pork. Under that regulation the shipper was compelled to ship his dressed hogs to the packing plant at Charlottetown. A great many of the merchants and dealers there have been in the habit of buying dressed pork from the farmers and shipping it to Saint John, Halifax, Montreal and other points; but under this regulation they were not allowed to ship dressed pork out of the province. Of course, the dealers, the farmers and everyone else were up in arms over this regulation and it was lifted. I would ask the minister whether he has any knowledge as to how that regulation came to be put into effect, whether it was a departmental regulation from Ottawa or some local regulation which the packers were able to have put into force there.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The question does not come under the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act—that is to say, the regulations that control the movement of products. At one time, about a year ago or perhaps a little more, but at any rate up to that time, the three maritime provinces were considered by the health of animals branch inspection department as one area, and under the regulations of that branch the interprovincial movement of meats was prohibited except as processed in plants that had been approved by the officials of the health of animals branch. The three provincial governments requested that there be a change and that rather than being dealt with as one area they should be dealt with separately. The federal department conformed to their wishes because we felt that it was only fair to do so. Some complaints have been made with respect to the working out of this arrangement, and later at the request of two of the provincial governments the regulations were rescinded. That does not come under this act but under the health of animals branch regulations.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am a little bit concerned about these packers' yards. If things keep on the way they are now going it looks as if we shall have nothing left but packers' yards. I remember when it was my privilege to have charge of the administration of this act. We featured strongly the building up of stockyards where both buyers and sellers could assemble in fairness under proper regulations, where butchers, feeders and packers could go to buy and others who had to sell could go to sell, both groups meeting in a common market. As pointed out in the commission's report, in recent years, since the truck has been introduced, it has been a great convenience to both seller and trucker to go direct to the packing plant. If that is to continue and we are to eliminate the stockyards—because I do not see how we can maintain them both; there is not enough turnover—there must be some radical change in the packing plants before they can be put on a parity with the stockyards as to weights and grades. The great value of the stockyards, in addition to the features I have enumerated, was that you could get government weight and grade, and that means a good deal because it determines to a large extent the price. But in the packers' yards, unless the government establishes public weighing, and I do not know whether that is intended or not, they are at the mercy of private weights and private grades, except in regard to hogs. I believe we have hog graders in the packers' plants.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But outside of hog grading the rest is graded by the packers themselves. So that unless these packers' yards give us great safeguards to the farmers as to weights and grades as the stockyards, they will be out of luck and the first thing we know there will be no market at all as far as stockyards are concerned, especially if the trucks keep multiplying as they have been. What value are these packers' yards to the producers unless you have official weights and grades?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the purpose of this. I agree with the hon. member as to the difficulty with which the department has been confronted in trying to maintain stockyards as they have been built up, to give the very best service and at the same time not to impose any unnecessary hardship on farmers and cooperative societies who felt that it was more beneficial to them as individuals or groups of individuals to ship direct to the packers, thus obviating certain charges. On various occasions the federal department has been petitioned to establish in the packers' yards the same services as in the stockyards, but the objection to that was felt to be that if we did establish the same services in the packers' yards—that is, compulsory weighing and reporting, and in addition to that competition, where there would be buyers the same as in the public stockyards—we should be virtually giving the same service in the packers' yards as in the stockyards, and there would be no reason why the stock should go through the stockyards For that reason this part of the recommendation received very serious consideration. There was no lack of appreciation of what was in the minds of the members of the commission when they made the recommendation. It was felt that it might defeat the end which they were endeavouring to reach. The hogs going into the packers' yards are inspected exactly the same as in the stockyard. Cattle are not inspected in either case. But the purpose of this is so that we will be able, if necessary, to protect the farmers with certified rates, and also that there will be available to the public through the officials of the marketing branch of the Department of Agriculture prices paid for hogs delivered directly to the packers' plants themselves, so that in this we have met what the hon. member for Melville feels is desirable and at the same time we have avoided doing that which we felt might be more destructive to the stockyards themselves.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I have followed the discussion so far with some interest, and I am not at all convinced that the minister is meeting the difficulty in the proposal he has made. I notice the report builds up a very strong case showing how the packers manipulate their prices through the handling of direct shipments by truckers. Having built up that evidence, they then quote the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, Minister of Agriculture of Manitoba, at page 163 of the report as follows. He is asked the question:

What effect would that have upon the industry?

And he answered:

Absolutely disastrous to the producer.
Q. Why?
A. Because it would eliminate the only competitive market he has.
Q. But the loss of the public stockyard you think would be a calamity to the industry?
A. Absolutely—I have no hesitation in saying that.

On the next page the report then recommends:

That all shipments of live stock should be made to the public market where reasonably possible, to give all buyers an opportunity of competing for them, and to prevent direct shipments being used as a club in the hands of the packers to break down prices on the public stockyards.

I would like to know what steps are being proposed in that regard. How is the minister going to control direct shipments? What provisions is he going to apply? What regulations? While I am on my feet I might as well continue my criticism of this part of the report. At the bottom of page 164 I find the following passage:

While the number of commission firms operating on any market from a competitive selling force, there seems to be no doubt that there is a heavy duplication of effort upon the part of these numerous firms, thereby adding to the expense of marketing, to the injury alike of the producer and the commission agent. For example, the evidence disclosed that at Toronto it costs the firms operating there $20,000 per year in the aggregate, to maintain representatives at the gate soliciting the business of various truckers who come to the market. It costs another $20,000 for disseminating information as to markets over the long-distance telephone, a service which is largely duplicated to the same people by various firms.

Then this is evidently the recommendation of the commission:

The licensing of commission agents directly by the dominion government and a clear definition of their responsibilities would be a step forward. The number of agents operating on a yard could then be controlled.

I would like the minister to tell the committee just what are the intentions of the government in regard to those points—direct shipments, the continuation of packing yards in competition with public stockyards and the licensing of commission agents.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is power at present within the Live Stock Act, section 8, subsection 4, which reads:

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

The minister may require a live stock exchange operated under this act to adopt new by-laws, rules or regulations, or to amend such by-laws, rules or regulations as may be in force in such manner and to such extent as he deems necessary.

That covers licencing and there is power in that regulation to deal with the majority of those problems. I am and have been decidedly inclined to think that in some of these stockyards there are more commission firms than are necessary to do the work and at the same time give competition in purchasing. There is now power within the act to change the charges of those commission firms. Before this commission sat, the Department of Agriculture had taken steps to insist upon a reduction of the commission men's charges. Some of the commission men complied voluntarily with it; others did not, and the objection raised was that because the whole matter was under investigation by the committee on price spreads and mass buying and later by the royal commission, it should be delayed until this report had been submitted and a decision made as to what action should be taken. That is why the matter was not forced, but the hon. member for Bow River will agree with me that the ideal condition would be for all stock to go through the stockyards, which would make the cost a minimum, and that there should be only sufficient commission firms to give the necessary competition.

One of the difficulties in passing all stock through the stockyards is of a practical nature. For example we have a number of processing plants away from localities in which there are public stockyards. We purpose making an investigation and it will not take long to do it, because we have practically all the information on hand. When the report is in, we intend to decide what reduction we feel will be warranted with this implementing of the recommendations of the commission to enable commission firms to carry on with a profit but not to take undue remuneration for the services that they give to the farmer. But to make all stock go through the present stockyards, or to set up sufficient stockyards to make their service available to those various plants, it was felt would be perhaps starting something that might not be used if the livestock producers of the dominion take advantage, as we have every reason to hope they will, of the Natural Products Marketing Act, because they as producers themselves will have it in their own power to bargain with the packers and any other purchasers for direct shipments. At the same time, if they wish, they will have all their bargaining power before the live stock leaves the farm, though they might also decide to sell their cattle on the basis of grade on the rail, the same as hogs. To show how the farmers realize the importance of rail grading as being the soundest grading in connection with hogs, an experiment was made a little over a year ago to make it available to farmers at certain Canadian plants, namely Peterborough and Stratford so that they could have their hogs graded voluntarily on the rail if they so wished, and at the same time those who did not wish that might continue to receive the service of our grading in the public stockyards. The result has been that during the last year, although this is purely voluntary, more than 90 per cent of the farmers have asked that their hogs be graded on the rail. That has been so satisfactory that we have had demands to extend it. We have been asked to start the same practice in western Canada, and demands have also been received from eastern Canada. This week we are starting grading on the rail in plants in western Canada. If that continues to be as satisfactory as we hope it will it might be possible that the live stock men themselves, if they were organized as a body, would prefer to ship directly to the packing plants with a price set in advance on the basis of the grade or quality of the product when it was graded on the rails by independent graders. I may say for the assurance of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) that we believe that with the small amendments we have introduced, together with the power we have under the Live Stock Act of changing our regulations, we have sufficient power to deal with the whole situation.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I am glad to hear that the minister has all the powers necessary under existing legislation. May the committee be assured that the minister proposes to exercise those powers, and, for example, to license commission men? I ask that first.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are licensed through the exchange at the present time. We believe that we have the power to license them directly, and in effect to do away with the live stock exchange. But it is believed that if we could achieve the same purpose without wiping out the live stock exchange it might be desirable, because the exchange performs a service that it would be difficult for the department to perform. But I can assure the hon. member that nothing will be left undone to give effect to their recommendations in the interests of the producer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Then I understand that part of the recommendation is not going to be carried out at the present time? The minister is still going to permit the commission men to be licensed by the exchange.

Then what about this question of shipment of live stock direct by truckers? The recommendation in that regard is in my opinion most important. If direct shipment is to continue it is going to be, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) said disastrous to the market, to the producer. Packers are not going to be easily regulated, I have no information of any country yet that has been successful in regulating a private monopoly, and the packers are shown by this report to be operating a private monopoly. Unless the minister takes his stand in this matter to legislate religiously in accordance with the report, I am afraid all his efforts are going to be futile. He suggested that I was in agreement with him as to what can best be done. I share his opinion that the producers must themselves undertake cooperative organization, and I think they have opportunity to do that under the Natural Products Marketing Act. I am sorry that they have not succeeded so far in establishing a nation wide scheme in regard to live stock. But even that is not going to settle this problem. As long as the price depends upon an export surplus, or may be affected by it, it is still going to require governmental action in the event of the price level falling below cost. If the minister really wants to know what I think about it, I think we should have our packing plants owned as public utilities, or cooperatively. Until the producer is in a position, both in intelligence and in finance, to take over and operate them cooperatively I think they should be operated as a public utility. I would ask the minister to turn to page 146 of the report and he will find what my opinion is after that stage has been reached.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member mean that the government should operate them directly?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): A public utility.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, that may be publicly or privately owned.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friend knows something about public utilities.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, so I am wondering what you mean.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): At page 146 of the report we find the following:

> The price received for this exportable surplus, however, under present conditions becomes the basis of the domestic price; one result of which, during the last few years, has been extremely low prices for agricultural products in Canada. These prices, indeed, have often reached a level far below the cost of production.
> This means that the agricultural population, which constitutes a large proportion of the total population of the country and consumes large quantities of manufactured goods, has had little or no buying power. This, in turn, has restricted the consumption and hence the manufacture of manufactured goods.
> If the necessity for increasing the farmer's buying power is admitted—

And I presume the committee is prepared to admit that.

> —and if world conditions prevent this being accomplished by international action, the question arises whether domestic prices are to continue to be controlled by the price of the small exportable surplus. The alternative is to maintain a domestic price, if necessary by governmental action, in keeping with the domestic cost of production and allowing the exportable surplus to get what it can.

I am strongly in favour of that implied recommendation of this committee. I submit to the minister that if he really is looking far enough ahead in the matter he will be now organizing his department for the purpose of operating the packing concerns of this country as public utilities. In my opinion it is a crime that we should leave them in the hands of a few exploiting concerns—two in fact, seventy-eight per cent of the business being controlled by them, and they having power as a result of that to swindle flagrantly and brazenly the poor devils who are working to produce the real wealth of the country. It is time some direct action was taken in regard to that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In reply to the hon. member's suggestion that this industry is in the hands of a combine, if we take that for granted for the sake of argument—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): It is contained in the report, no one has to take it for granted.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My fear in that connection is that if all live stock were forced through the stock yards in Montreal for example, we know that it could not be held for any considerable length of time in those yards, live stock being in almost every sense a perishable product, and so under those conditions, if there was no competition in buying, as there would not be with a combine, the producers would be more than ever in the hands of the combine. It was because of that fear that we resolved to make it possible for the producers to organize so that they would have the whole volume of the product behind them, and in that way they would be rather the masters than the servants in setting the price.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: A monopoly on the other side.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A monopoly of a different kind. Also they would be in this position, that by making a small levy, or by whatever means would be devised, they could take care of the small exportable surplus and prevent it having a disastrous effect, as I think we all agree it has now, on the domestic price. The only difference between the hon. members' opinion in that connection and my own is this: I feel that those people who have built up a very successful business are particularly anxious to give the best service that they can, and if the producers were organized to have control of their own product I am sure that they can find common ground with the people who are now in charge of the processing. They would be able to negotiate with them in a very different way, and would have a very different respect for them if they realized that they had power to put into effect what they wished to put into effect. This is a large question, but we have given serious consideration to the recommendations of the commission, and no time is being wasted.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): For fear the committee may not quite have understood the character of this monopoly it may be necessary to give one or two quotations from the report itself. At page 55, dealing with the meat packing industry, I find the following, referring to the Swift Canadian Company and Canada Packers Limited:

> It may be fairly stated, therefore, that these two companies dominate the industry. Their buying and marketing policies affect their smaller competitors and largely determine the operating methods of the industry. A proper appreciation by the managements of these companies of their responsibilities to producers and consumers is manifestly of supreme importance.

On the following page we find:

> The manner in which these results—

Referring to profits.

> —have been achieved has a direct relation to the monopolistic character of the structure of the industry.

That is clear enough. Then again at the bottom of page 56 I read:

Further reference will be made to the profits of these companies, but we should here consider the view expressed by the president of Canada Packers Limited, of the relations of the industry to producers and consumers. This witness summed up his estimate of the situation as follows:

"The total live stock is sold for the total sum, whatever it is; from that sum is deducted the packer's expense and the packer's profit and the farmer gets the balance."

According to the president of Canada Packers the farmer gets the leavings, if there is any balance left, and in recent years there has been no balance. At the top of page 57 there is a further paragraph dealing with the opinion of this witness, and the thought of the commisison in that regard is contained in the last two sentences:

We cannot, therefore, escape the conclusion that the continued prosperity of Canada Packers Limited during the depression bears some relation to the enjoyment of relative freedom from competition. That the inadequacy of such competition has operated to the detriment of the primary producer seems evident.

That establishes clearly the monopolistic character of this industry, and since it is a monopoly which affects the well being not only of the consumers but of a most important body of producers it is obvious logical to accept the suggestion that it should be either publicly owned or, as I personally prefer, owned by the producers themselves. If the minister could only give the producers some real encouragement and financial assistance in order to enable them to take over and operate these packing plants in the interests of the country it would meet every objection I have, but until he does that he is not even touching the problem. You cannot regulate a private monopoly; it has not been done successfully anywhere. All the anti-trust laws of the United States were successfully evaded, and trust and combine conditions in that country are as bad as if not worse than they were previously. So it will remain under private ownership of monopolies in this country.

Mr. SPROULE: When the minister speaks of the grading of hogs on the rail, are those grades marked, whether they are butchers or what grade they are? Is that done also with lambs? Do they brand them so that the consumer can see the grade and whether $2 has been taken off or whether it has not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no grading of lambs on the rail. There is grading of hogs on the rail, and they do carry the identification mark of the producer, so there is returned to him the premium to which he is entitled according to the grade, bacon or select. The way that works out is best illustrated by the fact that ninety per cent of the farmers in areas where this grading was started on a voluntary basis asked for that rather than the other method, because they feel they are getting paid for their products on the basis of quality.

Mr. SPROULE: I do not think the minister quite understood my question. I quite understand that the farmer has the right to ask with regard to the grade, but what about the consumer, the man who goes in and buys the meat? What right has he to ask what price was paid for the hog? I understand that the packers take a dollar off a light hog and two dollars off a butcher hog and so on. Has the consumer any way of knowing the price paid for that hog?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is not graded to the consumer. We are now making provision so that if a province wishes to grade for domestic consumption within that province we can protect them by preventing ungraded meat from being shipped to that province. The federal government has no control over provincial matters, of course, and the grading for domestic consumption is a matter entirely in the hands of the provinces.

Mr. SPROULE: I appreciate this information, because I am very much interested in this matter. One thing is certain; the producer is the man who pays the shot; he is the man who has to pay the $2 or $1 or whatever it may be. My understanding always has been that these animals were not branded, so that when the consumer went in to buy meat he had no way of knowing what the hog cost or anything about it. It seems to me they should be branded so that the man who buys the meat can have some idea of what it cost. The packers always have had the right to take off so much a head for condemnation. I am not prepared to say whether or not that is legal; possibly the minister can tell me. I know in connection with the stock that goes across the border there are no restrictions of that kind at all. Perhaps that practice is legal; possibly it is not, but I should like the minister to tell me.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. gentleman has reference to condemnation insurance?

Mr. SPROULE: Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The question of condemnation insurance has been investigated many times, and in that connection there are two opinions. Those in areas where the condemnation insurance is high feel that it is the best protection they can have, and that if there were no condemnation insurance deducted the tendency on the part of the purchaser would be unduly to depress the price in order to protect himself. On the other hand in some areas from which a good deal of our beef cattle comes, where disease is not prevalent, they feel that this should be wiped out altogether. I believe the records show that the condemnation insurance does not actually take care of the losses in that connection.

I omitted one point, the question of whether or not this is legal. This whole matter has nothing to do with legislation or regulation; it is simply an agreement that has been arrived at between the purchasers and the producers. The only part played by the federal department is really to be the third party witnessing that agreement.

Mr. SPROULE: I never heard that the packers ever asked where live stock came from; apparently the condemnation insurance is taken off anyway.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The packer does not need to know, but if that agreement were broken he would have to take that into consideration.

Mr. SPROULE: The minister said the losses were not covered by the amount deducted. Possibly I am wrongly informed, and I presume the minister would be in a better position to know, but I have been told that a good deal more has been taken off than the packers have had to put up. This is something that is not done in the United States at all. A good deal of Canadian stock goes to that country, but they never ask anything about it. When you take your stock there they do not say, "Well, these come from such an area; very likely some of them will be condemned, and we will have to take off five cents or ten cents a hundred." From what the minister has said there is one thing certain, and that is that the consumer does not receive the benefit of the amount deducted. If the packer deducts $2 from the price of lamb which is not branded he is just that much ahead. The same condition would apply to hogs, $1 being taken off a certain grade and $2 off the heavy hogs. If the meat is not branded the packer is the winner.

Mr. SPENCER: I understood the minister to say that condemnation insurance arises as a result of an agreement between producer and packer. That is news to me. Who made the agreement for the producers?—because it is my understanding that this matter is arbitrary on the part of the packers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed that my former statement is correct. This very point has on various occasions been discussed with representative producers organizations. If they feel it would be to the advantage of the producers as a whole to remove the condemnation insurance I am quite sure the packers would be willing to do so. At the present time however if any producer wishes he may ship his stock to the packers with the understanding that there will be no charge for condemnation insurance, and that he will stand the loss on any carcass unfit for consumption.

Mr. SPENCER: He has that option?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I should like to speak about another point closely related to a discussion of packers' yards, namely, the grading of live cattle. Is it the intention to grade live cattle?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): At the present time it is not the intention unless there is a demand from producers' organizations. If any organization desired to have certain animals at the bottom of the class, tail enders, set aside as being injurious to the trade, that could be done. Such action could be taken in the event of a submission by the producers.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I believe we should have live stock grades because not all cattle are sold through stockyards. It may be sound to argue, as is contended in the minority report, that commission men can grade cattle fairly well. But I say the livestock yards have a function in addition to that of the selling of stock by commission men to packers and other buyers, that is they establish standards. Other sales throughout the country are to a great extent based on the records made in and published through the stockyards. A considerable percentage of cattle is sold direct. My conviction is that the average farmer who sells is not a very good judge of cattle, but if he had a check in the nautre of a grading system he could check the price he obtains for his live cattle not being sold through the yard against grades in and prices paid at the yard.

This is one of the great advantages of records in connection with live hog grading, and at least to some extent I believe it to be necessary in connection with cattle.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have authority to do that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): The minister's position is that if live stock men demand it—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Or it might be done without a request on their part.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I should like to ask a question about truckers. What is the significance of paragraph (n)? I can read the words, but I should like to have an explanation of them.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Formerly we had a definition of a public commercial vehicle, but not of a trucker or the operator of a truck. The definition has been inserted so as to have more control over truckers.

Mr. YOUNG: What control is contemplated?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To require them to furnish security when they are handling funds. There have been some losses in western Canada, and we wish to bring truckers in every way under the control of the live stock legislation.

Mr. YOUNG: The first part of the explanation is all right, but I do not understand what the minister means when he talks about bringing them under control. I should like a little more light on that.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It may be desired to have control so that they would have to submit a bill of lading indicating the ownership of the animal and that such animal will be sold according to the instructions issued by the producer.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know of only one way of furnishing security, and that would be by a bond. Will truckers be bonded?—because they will be handling large amounts of money belonging to producers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If they handle money other than their own they may have to furnish a bond.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They have not been doing that in the past?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. SPENCER: Will truckers be allowed to buy stock outright?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort) They cannot be prevented any more than we could prevent drovers doing the same thing, under present arrangements.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—regulations.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): What is the significance of the expression "for voluntary application only"? Who will undertake to ask for it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If without passing legislation a province wishes to get some information on which to base contemplated legislation it may ask for voluntary grading of domestic meat, and this gives us authority to do it.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): It would not be made by butchers or packing plants handling a product, but would be a request by a provincial government to enforce regulations within a province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I should like the minister to give us a statement with respect to the whole bill and the recommendations of the commission indicating what powers will be in the hands of the minister, after the passage of this bill, which would enable his department to implement the recommendations of the commission?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Department officials believe that with these amendments to the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act together with other legislation on the statute books every recommendation the commission has made, with the exception of providing a live stock board, can be made effective. We believe that with the present legislation we may accomplish what it was believed would be accomplished by a board.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I do not suppose it will be possible simply to apply immediately all the legislation and regulations. For instance, there is the question of the grading of live cattle. But the minister has indicated it is the intention to go ahead and through this legislation bring about that which has been suggested in the recommendations.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, as already stated.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I should like to say a word about the live stock board. The Ottawa agreements in my judgment, combined with the restriction of imports into Great Britain, were of tremendous advantage to the hog producers of this country. Even if we had a surplus of only ten per cent or thereabouts it was necessary to find a market for it under the conditions existing in this country. Of wheat we had a very large surplus, but through government intervention and assistance, with the cooperation of the grain pool and through Mr. McFarland's efforts, wheat has been bringing to the farmers of this country, notwithstanding the tremendous surplus, a return much nearer to the cost of production than we have had in the case of cattle, for instance. I would say roughly that wheat has been bringing the farmers of western Canada from eighty to ninety per cent of the cost of production. Hogs, as a result of the Ottawa agreements, have been bringing easily the cost of production and maybe something better. But there was deliberate government intervention, by the Canadian government and the British government through the Ottawa agreements, in regard to the hog situation. There was the same thing in connection with the wheat agreement, and we had a very bad situation there.

The cattle situation is very bad. Cattle were selling until recently for about three cents a pound to the farmer. They were bringing more, from 4 to 4½ and 5 cents, in the stock yards, but to the farmer the cost of production is certainly close to five cents. There was a very small exportable surplus, less than in the case of hogs and much less than in the case of wheat, and yet the price in relation to the cost of production was relatively far lower. That in my judgment is an illustration of the value of reasonable government intervention, and one of the reasons why I at least wanted to see a board established was because of our experience with regard to wheat. I have had the opinion that the various branches of the live stock department were somewhat scattered, but a commission of a few men, either inside the department or any way you like to organize it, would have its duties definitely defined and it should be held directly responsible for the carrying out of those duties. It could be organized in various ways. It may not be necessary to call the board a commission or to call the people who are saddled with this responsibility commissioners, but I believe that something of this sort is necessary. I believe that there is need for something to be done because of the delicate situation with regard to the surplus of cattle in this country. It is a small surplus. The chairman or president of Canada Packers made a statement when he was before the commission and it simply meant this, that because we had a surplus of ten per cent of cattle, 100,000, the price was down from three to four cents below what it otherwise would have been.

Mr. McGIBBON: How much would it take in money to buy up that surplus?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Not a very great deal.

Mr. McGIBBON: Can you give me any idea?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): They would be worth about $50 a head, and the surplus was given as 100,000. The United States market has opened up and I have given you Mr. McLean's estimate of what the prospect of the export of our surplus of cattle of 100,000 would mean in higher prices to the producer in this country. There are other factors that enter into the situation.

Mr. BROWN: How long would the surplus remain at that point if you paid that price?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I am not arguing that. I say that I can see no reason why the farmers of this country and the government should not be able to do something with regard to that ten per cent surplus, which had the effect of causing the price to drop fifty per cent. We have heard all sorts of theories advanced for the salvation of this country, and I believe in a good many of them, but unless we can correct to some extent the prices received by the primary producers in relation to the prices received by the secondary and other groups of producers in this country, I do not believe that any policy will save this country. I believe it is necessary to correct that situation. I believe it is necessary to have an organization in this country to study the matter and to watch it very carefully. We are out of the British market to some exent, if not altogether, because of the exports of the United States, and nobody yet knows whether that is a permanent export or not or whether something will happen, something that others may do or that may depend on natural and other conditions in other countries, to bring about the conditions of 1923 or 1929.

The favorite policy of most people is to expand the markets in order to absorb the surplus. What if we cannot do that? There is no guarantee that we can do it, and I think that the recognition of that fact at least implies that if we cannot expand the market we ought to reduce the supply. I believe it can be done. I do not believe in scarcity, but I do believe that with reasonable conditions in agriculture you have to balance your supply with your market within reasonable limits. That has been attempted I believe with a good deal of success with regard to wheat, and certainly with regard to hogs and hog products in the British market, and we are a party to that scheme. It may be possible to do something with the present set-up in the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Trade and Commerce but I think that the question should be definitely studied and definitely placed before some officials who at least will do what they can to study it and try to get cooperation from the organized farmers throughout the country and scattered producers to try and stabilize the price.

My hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) was on the commission and he recommended that it might be necessary to reduce the surplus. He wants to do it by ruthless economic law. Well, that is his opinion and I respect it as his opinion, but I cannot see any reason why if a thing must be done we should leave it to ruthless economic law if we can do it by intelligent methods, and the application of human sympathy to the situation. The whole progress of human society in my judgment has taken place through the exchange of intelligence and sympathy and humanity for ruthless economic law and rugged individualism.

I want to say a few words in regard to the hog situation. We want someone who is in a position to insist that there will be the most rigid application of approved methods and that grading be applied to our bacon exports to Great Britain as it has been applied to hog raising in the Dominion of Canada. The hog grading system and the hog grading regulations have done a very great deal for the hog industry in this country.

It was stated by the president of Canada Packers, Mr. McLean, that there was a lack of confidence between the farmers and the processors. That is so. I believe that if we could convince the farmers of this country that there should be applied to the bacon exported to Great Britain, where our standards are set, the same rigid requirements as are applied to live hogs, a great deal would be done to remove some of the misunderstanding between packers and farmers. Of course the packers have their problems just as the farmers have theirs, but everyone representing the packers, everyone representing the primary producers and, I think, the government officials who came before us, admitted that there had been going into the old country bacon of a grade that should not have been exported—certainly bacon that was not beneficial to Canada. Every effort of this department, of the live stock board set up, and the boards representing the primary producers, should be directed to the fixing of a standard of bacon the product of select and bacons only and this bacon should fix the price of bacons and selects in Canada There is a dispute with respect to the lower grades, but there is definite evidence by one of the packers that in the A grade there were not only selects and bacons but heavies and lights. I do not think you can satisfy the hog producers of this country if hogs that are brought on a differential go into the grade that sets the price for bacon and select hogs in the dominion. It is for that reason that I recommend the setting up of a live stock board.

The problem of the organization of cattle marketing in this country is to endeavour to get the farmers a decent price, and that is a very important matter. Important also is the problem of maintaining the confidence of the live stock producers in marketing methods so far as the British product is concerned. The permanent prosperity of agriculture depends on live stock. We have heard a good deal about grain mining, and whether or not it is a just phrase to use in connection with grain farming, we all know that any country which has continuously produced grains has usually had to quit that system and go in for mixed farming, where there is live stock and particularly cattle. I do not think there is any country in the world that has done more in the same number of years to improve its live stock than some of the ranchers in Canada have done, and the plight in which they have found themselves in the last five years has been desperate. Because of its importance to the national economy, because of its importance to the continued welfare of agriculture, I believe that a deliberate effort should be made to deal with any future problem of surplus in at least as effective a way as was done in regard to the wheat problem of this country.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River, I agree with him one hundred per cent: there can be no permanent prosperity unless the efficient primary producer receives a profit for his labour over and above cost. The problem of a small surplus and its effect on the domestic price is perhaps the most depressing factor, but to deal effectively with that problem except by direct bonus has been felt to involve taking control of all the product. The organized producers themselves, especially the producers of live stock, have stated emphatically that in their opinion not only must steps be taken to take care of this small surplus but that the industry itself should carry the load; and they have made very considerable progress towards forming an organization among themselves by which to a certain extent they can get rid of this small exportable surplus. In their work in this direction some might have considered their progress to be rather slow, but because of the number of people involved and the different opinions expressed it must of necessity be slow. We are informed, however, that three of the provinces in the west at least have brought their ideas into line to such an extent that they believe they will be able to combine that one large area into one organization, or at any rate to have three organizations cooperating as one. Ontario has also taken steps to deal in some way with the surplus which at one time was going to the united kingdom market, and the fact that they did go as far as that shows that the live stock dealers in the province are very much alive to the danger of this small surplus. The producers feel that a solution is possible, but they think that the industry itself should carry the load, and they have every hope now that in the not distant future they will themselves be able to cope with this problem. They may have their own live stock board and in addition there will be available to them the services of the officials of the department. One thing more than anything else which the officials in the live stock branch have been concerned with during the past few years has been the problem presented by all the difficulties and the obstacles in marketing.

In connection with bacon grading for export, a recommendation has been made by the price spreads commission that only graded and select hogs should be allowed to go into the product exported. About a year ago it was decided that definite grades should be set up in connection with bacon that was being exported from this country in order that we might overcome some of the criticism that had been made, to the effect that much of our bacon was not a credit to the Canadian people and had a detrimental effect on other prices obtained for the rest of the bacon in the old country. This has proved to be a difficult matter, especially considering the varied feeds used and the varied conditions that exist from one end of Canada to the other; it has been considered difficult to set definite standards in connection with bacon for export in view of these circumstances. It was felt at one time that only the top grade should be sent over, that a selection should be made of the best bacon processed and that this only should be exported. But those in the best position to advise, not only those personally interested but others as well, claimed that if we set a top standard only and set it too high there would not be sufficient of our bacon going into the United Kingdom to supply the demand that might be created for it. The endeavour was to hit a happy medium so that a sufficient quantity would go forward to meet the demand and at the same time as far as possible not be detrimental to the reputation of Canadian packers.

There were three grades established first. They have been carefully checked on this side and also on the other side in the reception they have received from consumers in the old land. After some time the three grades were cut to two, and now only two grades are going forward. On the basis of putting in selects and bacon that would be graded, say on the hoof, there would be no assurance that they would give the best finish, because the quality depends on the finish, and that cannot be told by those who would grade the hogs on the hoof. That is one of the difficulties in that connection. As to grading on the rail, with our complete control of bacon going to the United Kingdom, only the top bacon can be exported; I do not mean the very top selects, but bacon and selects.

The hon. member will remember a letter I showed him this morning in this connection; it was a confidential letter and cannot be read into the record of the house. About a year ago we sent over a man who, we felt, was eminently qualified to check the quality of our bacon and its reception in the United Kingdom, after having visited packing plants in Canada and being fully conversant with government machinery and the department on this side. He was not sent to a position in England, because he is still on the staff of the Department of Agriculture in Canada, but to make confidential reports. The value of his work has been much greater than we even expected when he went over, because by his manner and tact he has had a very fine reception and has received every assistance from every person on the other side as well as those in the trade. He writes directly to the packers who are sending over bacon that is not what it should be. He is candid in his criticism and in pointing out the criticisms that are made over there. If the bacon is not brought up to standard as a result of the letters he sends, the licence to export given to such a packer may be cancelled. Therefore we have all the power necessary, but as long as the packers make every possible effort to put the best product on the old country market, we feel that we should not be too drastic in any action we take. But we think now we have reached a point where if there are certain packers who may not step up the quality of their bacon, a licence may have to be refused them. There is however ample power to do what has been asked in that connection.

Mr. LUCAS: Has the minister any information to show that the packers have a uniform grade themselves? I was led to believe some time ago that each packing plant had a grade of its own and that they did not conform, so that when the bacon went on to the British market, there were different grades of Canadian bacon. I think every hon. member will agree that there is no other country in the world that should be able to produce as fine a quality of bacon hog as Canada. Nevertheless it is humiliating, when we take the prices that are given in these, I think, weekly reports that are issued by the Department of Agriculture giving the comparative prices of bacon that goes on to the British market from the other countries of the world, to find the price for Canadian bacon is the lowest of that of any country reported. I am strongly of opinion that if we are going to build up a market for Canadian bacon, there should be some standard for export to which all these various packing companies would have to conform. The minister says that he has the power. I trust, if he has it, he will see that a standard is set so that all packers who are exporting will have to conform to that standard and that there will be brought about some more uniformity in our bacon on that market in order that we will get a better price for it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member is right in what he stated at the commencement that when we endeavoured to set a standard for bacon, among the different packing plants that were exporting, although in one sense each was producing a high class article, there was a difference in the finish or in the cure so that it was not a uniform bacon. That was the first problem the officials of the department ran into in establishing a fixed standard or grade. They felt that the only way in which that could be overcome was to call various meetings of the packers. A number of meetings were held and after a good deal of consultation and showing beyond doubt that they did intend to fix a standard and that if the packers were not willing to cooperate, a standard would have to be set that might be more injurious to some of them than if they sat in and endeavoured amongst themselves to investigate the cure of bacon in each of the packer's plants, and from such investigation each take what he felt was best in the way of curing and see if in that manner he could not come to some more uniform standard. I think it is only fair to state that one of those packing plants was creating a very favourable impression in the markets of the United Kingdom because of the uniformity of its cure, and this was due to certain machinery that was being used in this packing plant. We received the full cooperation of the packers and the undertaking that they would each visit the others' plants and then have another meeting and see what steps could be taken to work out a uniform standard. After a number of such meetings a certain standard was reached, and it was reached by every person cooperating. The packers are very generous in their praise of the officials of the department, stating that their getting together and each learning from the other has been perhaps more beneficial than anything else in regard to bringing about a uniform standard for our bacon in the old country. We have now an artificially fixed standard for export that must be lived up to.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I would like to ask the minister whether all the bacon exported to the old country is examined there by a representative of the Agriculture department?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He sees it opened at the docks at London, and besides that he checks it through the different sales agents.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): This is not a very good time to recommend additional expenditure, but in view of the importance of the matter and the tremendous figures involved as outlined before the commission by the president of Canada Packers, I think at least a reasonable expenditure is necessary to put on more inspectors in the old land so that we may do everything possible to raise the standard of our bacon in the British market.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am inclined to agree but we felt that before this was done we should have the best man possible go overseas, investigate and make recommendations.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The minister will remember my calling to his attention some time ago reports from the old country in regard to the quotas on cattle, beef, veal and hogs from Canada exported overseas. At that time the reports indicated that there was going to be some reconsideration of the agreement between the United Kingdom and the dominions. Has any change been made since then?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not so far as Canada is concerned. The discussion of that quota applied more to New Zealand and Australia because it was in their agreements with the United Kingdom that a quota should be set up in the first place.

Mr. POULIOT: The other day in answer to a question the Prime Minister said that there were quotas for hams and bacon and oats and oat products. Cattle was not mentioned. Is there a quota for cattle?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, $545,500.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I made a few remarks on this item three or four days ago so I do not intend to devote any more attention to the actual vote and the purposes for which it is to be used, but inasmuch as the discussion widened out a good deal, particularly on the part of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), may we be permitted to follow that hon. gentleman in some of the extraordinary allegations he made not only yesterday but on the 4th of this month. On page 3298 speaking of markets and replying to the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) he is reported as saying:

> Mr. Rowe: He is the man who said he would sound the death knell of protection when the Liberals got into power, and no man knows better than he does that practically every agricultural market in the world was closed to our products before this party came into power.

Now that was an extraordinary statement. It was so wild that I let it go by at the time.

[Mr. Elliott.]

But on the same page I find he repeated it in even worse form. He said first that "practically" every market was lost to Canada. Now "practically" is a very flexible and saving term. Sometimes it lets one out from deliberate misstatement. But what shall we think of this, found on the same page?

> I have never blamed them, and that is why I resent hon. gentlemen opposite blaming the present Prime Minister and this government for closing, as they say, markets that as a matter of fact were absolutely closed to us before 1930.

This time he used the word "absolutely," not "practically." Then if you look at yesterday's Hansard the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe repeated the same statement, saying he was not making a random statement the other day when he said we had lost all our markets for agricultural products. What are you going to do with a gentleman like that? Where have our export commodities been going? If they have been shut out of all the world, then we must have eaten them all ourselves. But everyone knows that there has been a great volume of these agricultural commodities going abroad. Just to refresh our memory I have to-day received from the bureau of statistics figures as to exports of grain—I am speaking more particularly of wheat and of flour converted into the equivalent bushels of wheat. Here are the authentic figures, we shall see how far we lost the markets:

Crop years	Quantity
1924-25	192,721,772
1925-26	324,592,024
1926-27	292,880,996
1927-28	332,963,284
1928-29	407,564,186
1929-30	186,267,212

A big drop occurred there. It will be remembered that the 1929 crop was very small, and that was the beginning of the holding policy by practically every seller of Canadian wheat. I am not going to criticize the policy, it was thought to be a right one, nearly every seller of Canadian wheat did it, not meaning it to be permanent, but such hoarding policy has continued more or less until the present day, getting worse all the time. But notwithstanding that, in the last year of the Liberal administration we exported 186,000,000 bushels of wheat to various countries of the world, numbering about forty. Yet the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe says that absolutely all these markets were closed to us. How then did it get in? If all the doors of this chamber were closed, the inference would be that we could not get in unless we climbed through the roof or somewhere else. World markets cannot be open and closed at the same time. Inasmuch as all this grain went out of Canada for export and large amounts of other farm products, it shows that the hon. gentleman's statement was just a fairy tale, no sense to it, no fact to it. There has been no time in the history of Canada when we shipped out as much wheat as we did in the second to last year of the last administration, 407,000,000 bushels. Then as I say it suddenly dropped because of the holding policy of all sellers of Canadian wheat, thinking the market would revive.

Now we will proceed, after that occurred. In 1930-31 we exported 258,693,887 bushels; in 1931-32 we exported 207,029,559 bushels; in 1932-33 we exported 264,304,328 bushels, and in 1933-34 we exported 194,779,876 bushels. This year, as far as the figures go, we have exported 132,672,697 bushels. If you take the value, which is the basis upon which exports are compared, the showing is much more favourable for the years of the Liberal administration, but I will not make an extreme comparison of that kind because in a sense I suppose it should be on the basis of quantity rather than of value, though nearly all statistics are based upon value.

Yesterday the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe repeated the statement, and I am sorry to report to the house and to remind the minister that he made the same statement himself four or five nights ago, I think on May 31. The minister stated that practically all our markets for agricultural products had been closed, and he cited the United States as one example. That was correct; that market was almost closed to cattle but the minister did not mention the corresponding British market that had been opened up, to which I referred already to-day. So I am convinced that these are going to be the campaign tactics of this government during the coming election. It will be recalled how lamentably they have fallen short of carrying out their 1930 promises. Not satisfied with that a further barrage of promises by the Prime Minister was hurled across Canada over the ether waves shortly after the new year, another plethora of promises which have flattened out like the proverbial pancake or a busted tire. Now something else has to be framed up to stave off the approaching defeat. I happen to have in my hands some campaign literature sent out by our Conservative friends, and this reveals the same tactics. Of course we are always prepared to make some allowance for the enthusiasm of the writers of campaign literature, but this stuff is just like the statements that have been made by the member for Dufferin the very antithesis of the truth, and apparently that is the way the government and their followers are going to try to humbug the people once more, with the hope of again attaining power. Following the nonfulfilment of their 1930 promises and the Prime Minister's effervescent radio performances, now apparently the government are going to jam the people full of false statements by means of campaign literature.

That is one reason why I speak thus to-day. I regret very much that the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe is not present; I presume he belongs to that class of people who hear someone make a misstatement, after they repeat it frequently enough they begin to believe themselves. I should like to be sufficiently charitable to think he was not deliberately deceiving the public, but the fact remains that he made those misstatements to which I have referred. He did qualify the first statement by saying that "practically" all the markets were closed to our farm products but in his last statement he said they were absolutely closed. Yet these official figures indicate that large volumes of farm products were going to the markets of the world, including Great Britain, between the crop years 1924-1925 and 1929-1930 far in excess of what has gone forward since this government have been in power.

I do not want to urge that point further except to say that the minister did qualify his remarks a little bit this afternoon. When he pointed out that our markets were lost he really did not quite mean it that way nor blame anyone for it. But why make the statement? I think when we come to the measure regarding the grain board we may be able to go into this matter further, in order to show that markets have been lost not so much during the Liberal administration but during the last two or three years. However, we will let that be for the moment. I would hope that the minister would not spoil some of the other qualifications he possesses for performing his work by making such loose and extraordinary statements as that we have lost all these markets for farm products. I think he did insert that saving word "practically" but his follower and supporter from Dufferin-Simcoe went him one better, or one worse, and said they were absolutely all lost. The very fact that all the members on this side of the house let the statement go indicated that they did not think it was worth replying to. It was like the statement of a madman, but at the same time it is this kind of madman that gets listened to during a campaign. Those tactics worked fine in 1930, but it is our business to see that they do not work again. That is why I have made these remarks. If any one has any explanation or justification to offer on behalf of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe in connection with his extraordinary remarks I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. YOUNG: When we were on this item last night I aksed the minister if there were any schemes in operation under which the actual marketing of the commodity was done by either the local board or the central marketing board, and the minister replied that there were none. I notice in the synopsis of the poultry marketing scheme which was submitted to the people of the west during the winter that the plan was to have the marketing done by a central sales agency set up and controlled by the producers. Are there any schemes in operation under which the marketing is done in that manner?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member's question, I take it, is this: Is there any scheme in operation under which the local board has made use of that part of the marketing act that gives it authority to designate a specific agency?

Mr. YOUNG: Not exactly. They might designate as a specific agency some agency already in existence, some private corporation. Under this plan, however, they proposed to set up a producer-controlled central selling agency that would handle the entire surplus product, working on a non-profit basis. Is there any such scheme in operation?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is merely a designated agency, whether established or chosen from those already in existence. The potato people designated an agency; the jam people designated an agency and the bean scheme designated a specific agency, or so I am given to understand.

Mr. YOUNG: Do these agencies actually market the crop?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, as distributors.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister tell me how they finance it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not give the hon. member any information as to how they finance it. Certainly they do not finance it by any levy made on the producer.

Mr. YOUNG: I would not expect them to do so. What I want to know is where they get the money with which to make the initial payments to the farmers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that they are using the established trade organizations.

Mr. YOUNG: Then they are not doing the marketing; the marketing is being done by other people, private agencies?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, they are carrying on some of the functions. My interpretation is that they are really carrying on some of the functions of marketing in that to a certain extent they controlled the sale.

Mr. YOUNG: Then they were not doing any selling, nor were they doing any buying?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No buying.

Mr. YOUNG: Neither buying nor selling. Then there is no scheme in operation under which the local board or any body set up by it is doing the actual marketing of a commodity?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is right.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to ask the minister a question with regard to the working of the so called potato marketing board, just following along the line of the questions asked by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. As I understand it the potato marketing board has power, under the order in council whereby it was established, to regulate the time and place at which and to designate the agencies through which the regulated product shall be marketed by dealers. That is one of the powers of the board. As I understand it the next thing that happens is that an individual is named in, let us say Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, as the marketing agency designated by the board. Is that the practice?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That an individual person is named as an agency?

Mr. RALSTON: As a marketing agency.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, I understand that is correct.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that individual actually a dealer in potatoes; does he deal in potatoes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Except in so far as he controls the sale of potatoes.

Mr. RALSTON: But does he deal in potatoes? Is he a marketing agency, at all? What does he do?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To the extent, that he controls the sale of potatoes through any subagent he names.

Mr. RALSTON: Through what?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Through any subagent he names.

Mr. RALSTON: Where does he get power to name a subagent?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He himself is named as agent and he can use whatever means he wishes to market the product.

Mr. RALSTON: He is the agent of whom?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe I did not understand the last part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. RALSTON: He is the agent of whom? The minister said that this man was named as an agent,—the agent of whom?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The first individual, do you mean?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Of the producers.

Mr. RALSTON: Of what? There is no provision for naming an agency of the producers. The board has power to designate agencies through which potatoes shall be marketed. I have under my hand—and there is no secret about it—a circular from New Brunswick signed by J. C. Cunningham, marketing agency designated by the eastern Canada potato marketing board. Is he the agent of the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He is the designated agency through which the marketing takes place.

Mr. RALSTON: The agency of whom?—of the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Of the producers.

Mr. RALSTON: Has the producer any part in naming him?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The board names him, and the producer is represented on the board.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister tell me how many producers are on the local potato marketing board of eastern Canada?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have not the names of the producers on the board, but I am informed quite a number of the members of the board are local producers.

Mr. RALSTON: How many are there on the board altogether?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Ten.

Mr. RALSTON: I notice the minister is looking at the order in council. I find that a Mr. Mulharin is a representative on the board of New Brunswick. Is he a producer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have no information available as to who are or are not producers. I regret that that is the position.

Mr. RALSTON: We ought to have that information because the minister has said that this marketing agency is the agency of the producers. He is not named by the producers; he is named by the board, and we ought to know whether it is a producers' board. My information is that it is not.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed that it is a composite board consisting of shippers and producers.

Mr. RALSTON: And I understand that there are more dealers than producers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would not hazard a statement, because—

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about eastern Canada, the man who regulates the shipment of potatoes in New Brunswick. I notice that there are two men in New Brunswick, one being a Mr. Mulharin and the other a Mr. Cunningham. I wish to know if either or both are producers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe Mr. Cunningham is a producer.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the minister verify his belief—not immediately but at some later time?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that Mr. Cunningham is named by this board to sit on the marketing agency designated by the eastern Canada potato marketing board. Does Mr. Cunningham handle any potatoes for the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that all sales of potatoes in New Brunswick go through Mr. Cunningham.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister please answer the question: Does Mr. Cunningham handle any potatoes? Does he buy or sell potatoes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): He does not buy or sell potatoes, but he negotiates sales of potatoes through subagents.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister states that he negotiates sales of potatoes through subagents.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Who are the subagents?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The different dealers named by him; we will have to get the names of the dealers.

Mr. RALSTON: Where does he get the power to name dealers as agents?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the same way as any person who might be named as an agent would carry on that work with the assistance of subagents, commission men and so on.

Mr. RALSTON: Are those subagents the agents of the producers or of the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are the subagents of the agent named.

Mr. RALSTON: And the agent is named—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Named by the local board.

Mr. RALSTON: The agent is the agent of the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Of the producers named by the local board.

Mr. RALSTON: The agent is the agent of the producers named by the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the agent deal with the producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The local board controls the movement of potatoes through that agency, and through his subagents the potatoes are directly purchased from the producer.

Mr. RALSTON: Does Mr. Cunningham of New Brunswick deal with the producer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not directly, but through subagents, I am informed.

Mr. RALSTON: And the subagents are nothing more or less than every dealer in the province of New Brunswick. He names each dealer a subagent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Each dealer who conforms to the requirements set up by the scheme.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not attempting to raise legal technicalities, but I am asking the minister, whose officers are before him, under what authority he finds powers to clothe Mr. Cunningham with authority to appoint subagents, or to appoint as subagents all the dealers in New Brunswick who conform with his requirements?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is a matter of commercial arrangement between the agent appointed and his subagents. If the regulation of the marketing was not conducted according to the ideas of the local board, and in the best interests of the producers, then another agent might be named. That is the control that the local board has.

Mr. RALSTON: I am asking the minister this question: Where does he find the authority to clothe this agent with the power to appoint subagents throughout the province, and to instruct them to sell through him?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The authority is vested in the agent. A man, Mr. Cunningham in this instance, is appointed agent for the marketing of potatoes. He may either engage individuals and set up a marketing organization of his own, or he may make use of those already engaged. That is a private arrangement he may make.

Mr. RALSTON: But Mr. Cunningham does not handle a solitary potato, does he? Mr. Cunningham is only a toll gate, is he not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The movement of potatoes is within the control of the marketing board, through Mr. Cunningham. He controls the movement of them.

Mr. RALSTON: Does he keep any books of the number of carloads inward to him and outward from him.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not give that information.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to know whether he is an agency or not, or just a figurehead, a sort of mouthpiece of this local board. Is he anything more than that? Does he handle a single potato or keep any books whatsoever with regard to purchases from producers and sales to the central markets?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Whether he handles the potatoes himself or through the subagents I have no information, but I do not see how it makes any difference.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, he is the agency designated through which the regulated product shall be marketed by dealers. That is the difference, and I am asking if he is an agency in the business or just a figurehead who issues orders to somebody else.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The interpretation is that he is the agent, and the work is done by subagents.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister tell me where Mr. Cunningham gets authority to issue a circular fixing prices?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): As the agent of the producers. Any marketing agency could do that—a man by the name of Brown, for instance, if he was the agent of the producers, and they engaged him to market their product at a fixed price. I understand that is the way it is done.

Mr. RALSTON: I am reading from circular No. 3, headed "New Brunswick Potato Marketing Agency" and addressed "To all representatives." I stop there to ask the minister if the "all representatives" referred to are all the dealers throughout the province of New Brunswick who, as he says, conform to the regulations laid down by this Mr. Cunningham? Is that who all the representatives are?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Following that I quote further from circular No. 3:

> The following are the minimum prices for Green Mountain potatoes (Cobblers 5 cents per bag less except at Halifax) effective February 25, 1935, at which you are to sell potatoes produced in New Brunswick, cash track on the following markets.
> Representatives of this agency shall note that all quotations and sales to points east of Peterborough, Ontario, and to all points of northern Ontario shall not be confirmed at a lower proportional price rate than the minimum Montreal base rate.

> G. C. Cunningham,
> Marketing Agency designated by the Eastern Canada Potato Marketing Board.
> Fredericton, N.B.
> February 21, 1935.

If one of the gentlemen who is named as a representative comes to Mr. Cunningham and says, "I am handing you my potatoes; I am going to sell them; I want them sold at 50 cents, not at 60 cents a bag," what are you going to do about it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The board controls the movement of potatoes.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the board control the price?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The agency controls the price.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there anything in the statute or is there anything in the order in council which mentions a solitary word about price, and was it not expressly intended when the marketing act was brought down in this house that this was not to be a price fixing agency?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The agency that is appointed controls the sale under the direction of the board, and the agent can sell at any price he wishes, but being the agent of the producers he would take instructions from the producers.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend suggest that when he finds in paragraph (a) of section 6 defining the powers of the local board:

> (a) To regulate the time and place at which and to designate the agencies through which the regulated product shall be marketed by dealers——and that includes the regulation and the fixing of a price?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It states the time and place at which the commodity is to be marketed.

Mr. RALSTON: And the agency through which.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): And the agency through which it is to be marketed. Then it is within the power of the agency to market those potatoes according to the instructions of the board for regulating the marketing of potatoes. It is the function of the agent that is appointed to control the marketing of the product.

Mr. RALSTON: It is the function of the agency to regulate the marketing of potatoes as laid down in the powers of the local board, namely, to regulate the time and place and to determine the manner of distribution of the regulated product by dealers and to determine the quantity and quality, grade, variety or class, but it expressly omits to say anything about the fixing of the price.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The marketing agency has full power of the sale of the product when he is appointed agent of the board, both with reference to the price he wishes to get for the product and other matters.

Mr. RALSTON: Has my hon. friend any advice to that effect?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the information I have just received.

Mr. RALSTON: No. I mean has the minister taken the advice of the Department of Justice or anybody on the power of an agent who is simply named as such to issue instructions to people throughout the province that they must sell at a certain price?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The approval of this has been given I understand by the Department of Justice.

Mr. RALSTON: Will the minister bring down that approval after recess?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The approval is in the scheme, in the fact that the scheme has been accepted. The basis of acceptance of the scheme is that it has met the approval of the Department of Justice.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister is not going to get away with that. I am not talking about the approval of the scheme, but approval of this method of regulating prices. I ask the minister has he any advice from the Department of Justice that a gentleman named Cunningham can be named by the board, a man who does not handle potatoes at all and is in no sense a marketing agency except nominally, and that he can issue instructions legally to all dealers in New Brunswick that they must sell at a certain price?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am not aware whether or not that particular point was put before the Justice department. I thought the hon. member was asking with reference to the powers under the scheme. Before any scheme is approved by the board the powers are first submitted to a representative of the Justice department. With reference to the particular point my hon. friend mentions I do not know whether it was brought before the Department of Justice.

Mr. RALSTON: But that is the whole point, Mr. Chairman. That is why I understand the peg was pulled and the potato marketing board almost ceased to function.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CANADIAN AND BRITISH INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT, 1932

The house resumed from Friday, April 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 13, to amend The Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, 1932—Mr. Coote—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Surrender of policy.

Mr. BENNETT: I came to this chamber to-night for one purpose, and that was to urge the hon. gentleman to drop this bill; I would not have come otherwise. I speak for His Majesty's government charged at the moment with responsibility for the financial administration of this country's affairs when I state that the enactment of this legislation will have a most injurious effect upon Canada's position at the present time.

First let me say that there is no subject that has been so much discussed from time to time in the courts of the country as has the jurisdiction of the provinces and the dominion with respect to insurance legislation. We in this house have claimed jurisdiction over insurance; we have tried to suggest that it was trade and commerce; we have tried to suggest that it came under many heads of section 91, and the privy council rejected our contention. Later we amended the statute and the privy council again rejected our contention. Finally, in the last judgment Lord Dunedin suggested that we were apparently endeavouring by persistency to do something which we should know we had no right to do. However, since this government assumed office, we have enacted these statutes after the decision of the privy council, believing that they are within the legislative competence of parliament.

Insurance is by all odds the largest business in this country. It touches the home of the very rich and of the very humble and poor.

Insurance companies are for the moment the depositories and the repositories of the accumulated savings of the Canadian people. Insurance is based upon the assumption that by an individual paying a certain premium for a given number of years, the company will pay to the person named in the policy a given sum of money. It is admitted that the money thus paid as premiums will earn sufficient interest, having regard to the tables of mortality, to enable those obligations to be discharged.

The rates of interest upon which our companies made their reservations in times past have been reduced from time to time. They did reserve at one time on the basis of money over a period of years earning over four per cent. Later the rate was reduced to three and a half per cent, and some companies reserve on the basis of earning over a term of years being three per cent. In the case of other companies where they had perhaps a clearer appreciation of the possiblity of interest rates lowering, the rate has been two and a half per cent. With the present low return upon securities, it is obvious that insurance companies, if their premiums heretofore have been based upon a sound appreciation of the tables of mortality, that is the expectation of life, and of the earning power of money, will find it necessary to increase their premiums. Some Canadian companies have already given notice that new business will be carried on an increased premium. Annuities some companies are now seeking to avoid taking.

One of the provisions of our law as enacted by this parliament, assuming that it is a statute that is within our competence, provides for loans being made on policies, and in most instances the policy or contract between the insured and the company contains a provision that the company will not charge more than a given rate of interest upon the loan thus made. The loan of course is amply secured by the reserves of the company with respect to that particular policy, and the sum of money that may be borrowed at any one time depends upon the number of premiums that have been paid and the reserve that has been set up at the rate of interest on which the company reserves its accumulated premiums. That contract between the assured and the company is like all other contracts; it represents what is technically, we will say, an offer by the company to do something on certain terms and conditions, and an acceptance of that offer by the insured as evidenced by his policy, which of course constitutes the contract. The minds have met and the contract is complete. We are suggesting here tonight that some of the provisions of the contract shall be modified. The insurance companies, as I shall presently point out, are willing to make certain changes, but they reserve very definitely their rights with respect to our right thus to set at nought a contract between the assured and his company.

The second class of borrowings is that which does not find its way into the pocket of the policyholder; they are the automatic loans which are made on policies to enable them to continue in force after premiums have ceased to be paid by the insured. That of course is relatively a new provision with respect to insurance. It used to be that when the insured no longer paid his premiums, the policy lapsed. Now, the reserve accumulated by the premiums that have been paid automatically carries forward a sufficient sum, depending upon the time the policy has been in force, to pay the premiums. In other words, these automatic loan values or loans made to pay premiums are something that has been secured to policyholders by the provisions of our statute. Thus it is that those of us who practise law have sometimes found in estates a policy upon which the insured has failed to pay premiums for two or three years. When we looked at it at first we thought it had lapsed because no premiums had been paid for the preceding three years, but on an examination of the provisions of the law and the policy, it was found that the policy had been automatically carried on for four or five years and that the beneficiary named in the policy, notwithstanding the apparent lapse, would recover the sum named in the policy less the premiums that had to be paid out of the accumulated reserve with interest as provided by statute. Now the policies provide for an interest rate to be paid for either of these two classes of loans, that which may be made to the individual who applies for it and receives his cheque, or that which is made automatically to maintain the policy in force. These latter provisions are inserted in the contract of insurance. The bill that is before the house suggests that the rate should be reduced to four per cent. In the committee I believe it was agreed by a majority vote that the rate should be five per cent, and there is an amendment before the committee that the rate should be six per cent. The companies through their solicitor have now advised the government that they are prepared to enter into an agreement, satisfactory to the government and to the superintendent of insurance, that beginning on January 1 next, or possibly sooner if the adjustment can be made, reducing the rate of interest on all contracts outstanding to six per cent and so notify their policyholders, and that in future loans made by way of advance to the insured on application, or loans made automatically to maintain the insurance in force will carry interest at the rate of six per cent.

It may be thought by many that the rate is still excessive. There are many cases in which the rate provided for is higher than that. In 1910 the rate was fixed, as is known by this house, at not exceeding seven per cent, because in the Bank Act of that year we also provided that the interest rate charged on loans should not exceed seven per cent. With the cheapness of money the insurance companies have now expressed a willingness to file with the superintendent of insurance an agreement that the rate shall not exceed six per cent.

Under the circumstances I suggested that these bills should be withdrawn at this time, and I am going to give a few reasons for that suggestion, some of which have to do with companies considered merely as companies, and others with the public financing of this country. I shall endeavour not to make any observations that may be regarded in any sense as a reflection upon the legislation of any character anywhere else than here. Our insurance companies carry on insurance business outside of Canada. One of our large companies at one time had a billion dollars at risk in the United States of America, and was transacting business in nearly every state of the American union. These companies transact business in India, Japan, China and many other countries of the world. I need hardly say that the rates of interest provided for by contract between the insured and the company in those countries is somewhat different from the rate that prevails in this country, for the reason that rates of interest in those communities are in many instances much higher than here. For instance interest rates on deposits in banks in some parts of South America are substantial as compared with Canada, and the rates of interest obtained for loans entirely different from those that obtain in this country. Under these circumstances I ask the hon. gentleman who promotes this measure, and who stated very frankly that he was doing it in the first instance in the hope that he might be able to reduce the rate on automatic loans to maintain the policy in force, is it desirable that we should thus interfere with contracts made between citizens of other countries and one or many of the corporate organizations of our own country? I suggest that as one consideration. I shall not amplify it beyond stating that I can conceive of few things at this delicate time, if I may use that expression, in the financial world, that would be more injurious than to have it thought that this parliament, without consultation with those concerned, should undertake to say that it could do better for the policyholder than he himself had seen fit to do. For when the policyholder made his contract with his company he did it with his eyes open and knew exactly what he was doing. To suggest now that we with our great wisdom will make a new contract for him is in my judgment not sound from the standpoint that has been suggested or from the standpoint of what I will describe as the public interest of the Dominion of Canada. The second point is that I believe counsel for the insurance companies satisfied the committee that with respect to certain types of contracts it would be quite impossible for us legally to do what has been suggested. Those are matters which would fall within property and civil rights, within the provincial domain of legislation.

Lastly I suggest an argument that I believe is the basis upon which all the insurance companies have fixed a higher rate of interest than would at first blush seem to be desirable in connection with policy loans. Nothing that has been done with respect to improvement of terms and conditions connected with insurance has been more closely or jealously guarded than that connected with loans to policyholders, loans of the two kinds I have mentioned. It has been the experience of all companies that making easier the securing of policy loans has resulted in great injury and loss and unhappiness to those who are primarily the beneficiaries under such policies. Now I do not speak of my own knowledge alone as to that. I have borrowed money on my life insurance policies; I am wholly familiar with the conditions under which this business is transacted, and I believe that when the superintendent of insurance states, as he does, that making easy or facilitating the readiness with which loans can be obtained on policies has operated to the detriment of widows and families in this country, he knows whereof he speaks. Strange as it may sound, the average loan by direct advance in this country is only about $200, and the average loan with respect to the automatic carrying of the insurance about $100.

I desire to direct attention to the magnitude of this business, as supporting the suggestions I make. On December 31 last, the insurance companies had under loan to their Canadian policyholders the following amounts:

Canadian companies..	$145,414,590
British companies..	4,101,930
Foreign companies..	57,759,692

Now observe that of that total over $61,000,000 has been loaned by companies beyond the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. While we have licensed them under circumstances which I shall not now discuss, it will be readily understood that when they are advised—as they promptly will be, as it is their business, and they have agents who watch that sort of thing—when they are advised that we have passed legislation by which we have modified to any extent at all the terms of the contract made between the policyholder and the company, the credit of Canada suffers a great injury. I say that with very great deliberation because I know whereof I speak. Only a few years ago we endeavoured by a special form of taxation to do what had been done in other countries, and we were advised at once, almost by cable shall I say, that certain conditions that attached to certain contracts clearly must not be covered by such legislation.

Let me go further. The premium loans, that is, loans standing to the credit of policies in this country, to carry the policies forward when the unfortunate policyholders can no longer pay the premiums, so far as the Canadian companies are concerned amount to $33,564,616; in the case of British companies, to the small sum of $466,377, and in the case of foreign companies to $3,439,173. making a total for automatic premium loans of $37,470,166. So, sir, the total sum of these two amounts, or should I say the total amount of these two sums, is $244,746,378.

When I first saw those figures, Mr. Chairman, I confess that I was astonished. Here we have nearly a quarter of a billion dollars advanced on the security of the reserves, on policies or under contracts between the policyholders and the companies themselves. What do you think the statutory reserves, set up under the provisions of the Insurance Act, amounted to? As of December 31 they amounted to the very large sum of $1,224,650,970. That was the sum total of the reserves, so you will observe that of those reserves there had been drawn out in cash or set aside to meet premiums when the policies, in the familiar language of the home, had lapsed, about twenty per cent of the whole. In other words, of the reserves set up for the purpose of taking care of the obligations of the companies, under policies of insurance, to widows, orphans and beneficiaries in this country, twenty per cent had been advanced to the policyholders or set aside to automatically carry forward the policies.

That is within Canada. Now let us proceed outside of Canada. Canadian companies outside of Canada had loaned their policyholders $90,248,660 as of the end of December last, and automatically there had been provided $15,238,728, making a total of $105,487,388 against total reserves on the same policies of $693,281,773. So the companies doing business in Canada, Canadian companies doing business within and without our own country, the total loans on policies amounted to $235,663,250 and automatic loans to $48,803,344, or a grand total of $284,466,594 against a reserve of $1,505,856,108. I ask my hon. friend from Macleod and the members of this committee: At this moment, when the insurance companies are willing to enter into an agreement with the minister, and lodge it in his office, that they will reduce their rate on all outstanding loans to six per cent and make the same rate on all future loans as of January 1—and it will be the subject matter of further discussion as time proceeds—with further loans amounting to $105,000,000 outside of this country, where reserves have to be set up, do you think we should have it said that this dominion took this action to-night with respect to these contracts, without any consultation with the policyholders and against the legal position taken by the insurance companies who are willing, however, to notify their policyholders that they will make the agreement to which I have referred?

I have only one further observation to make upon another phase of the question. I did point out that it is inimical to the interests of those who are to be protected by insurance that loans should be made against the policies. I do not suppose it is necessary to argue in this committee, where there are a great many gentlemen who have outstanding policies payable to their wives and children, how undesirable it is that the protection thus afforded should be reduced by loans, for unfortunately there is a tendency on the part of those who secure loans not to repay them but to let the interest accumulate until such time as the reserves are wiped out. Let me give an illustration of how marked has been the borrowing of money in days of great prosperity, not for the purpose of paying premiums but for the purpose of engaging in hazardous undertakings and speculative enterprises. In the year ending December 31, 1924, we had loans in Canada against policies amounting to $90,298,571, and the total policy reserves were $585,596,956, the ratio of loans to reserves being 15·4 per cent. During the ensuing five years of very great speculative activity the loans increased to $159,353,195, as of December 31, 1929, and the reserves to $975,113,290, increasing the ratio of loans to reserves to 16·3 per cent. During the years of great depression from 1929 to 1934 loans on policies increased to $244,746,378 and total reserves to $1,224,650,970, and the ratio of loans to reserves to approximately 20 per cent. This indicates, of course, that in times of depression this reserve is available for any purposes for which it may be required, and much money has been drawn for those purposes during that time.

Now may I say to this committee that we have passed through five pretty bad years, and during some of that time we have had considerably increased responsibilities because securities decreased greatly in value and the reserves of the companies could not be readily realized upon without taking great losses. The demand for loans was so great that the premium income could not be invested but had to be utilized for the payment of loans upon policies or for cash surrender value of policies, and the result was that there was a rather acute condition, not only in this country but in every country. Particularly was that so in the United States where, as I dare say you have observed from the newspapers, some of the great companies met with very great difficulties indeed. Under those circumstances I suggest to the hon. gentleman that we should avoid again thrusting the insurance question into litigation. We have done the best we could, believing that the action was legal, but having regard to the terms of the judgment of the privy council I am not expressing the certain opinion that there might not be grave difficulties in supporting some of the clauses of our statute. I would avoid it if we could, because the companies in which you and I have our money invested are most anxious that they should have dominion registration, that dominion licences should be forthcoming, that dominion investigations should take place and that the restrictions upon investments for insurance companies, which we have in the insurance acts, should be observed. If that is to be continued we must support and protect this legislation. We believe it is legal, but we desire to avoid litigation, and I may say that the legislation as it stands has met with the approval of the insurance companies themselves who, for the reasons I have indicated, are anxious that they should have dominion licences. Then again, I ask, is it desirable with respect to these companies transacting business both abroad and at home, where provision has been made to meet the situation, that those companies by legislative act should be compelled to do something which at this moment they are not prepared to do to the extent the hon. gentleman wishes? In other words having regard to the contracted sphere of sound investments and to the low price of government securities they have done what they could by the rates I have indicated to create a habit of not borrowing on insurance policies so that those policies may be maintained for the purposes for which they were originally taken out, namely for the protection of the beneficiaries named.

One more point, and I shall have concluded. It is this, that if we are to pass this legislation, let us do it by amending the Interest Act and not the Insurance Act. If it is the view of the house or committee that this is the time at which to reduce the rates, then I suggest that it be done in the way I have indicated. I have nothing to say against rates being reduced, so far as that is concerned. I desire to say only this, that it is not desirable to do so without the consent at least of one of the parties to an insurance contract; for what assurance have you or I that we are representing John Smith regarding the terms of his contract instead of John Smith himself? John Smith has agreed that the insurance company which makes the advance to him shall be able to take from him a rate of interest which shall not be greater than a certain amount. The agreement provides exactly what it is to be. How am I to say, "I can do better for John Smith and know more about his business than he does himself?" I know what some hon. gentlemen will say to that argument, but we must remember that this is a matter of an exact contract for each specific case, each loan which I have mentioned. Do hon. members think this parliament, or does the hon, member for Macleod believe that this parliament, should take that contract, tear it to pieces, and say, "This is the contract by which you are governed, and not that one?" If we desire to do it, let us make it a general act for the future.

Every man who has a policy of insurance has two interests, one of which is its safety. If it is a profit bearing policy it is a better policy when he dies than it was when he took it out. This very provision for interest enures to the benefit of every policyholder throughout the country. That is an amazing feature of it because it strengthens the reserve on his policy. Let me ask this further question: Is it desirable to take the action suggested at this particular time? Is it not desirable that we should adopt the reasonable method and, if we are to take action at all, place it in the statute relating to interest so that it shall apply to all? Countries abroad, whether they be Mexico, China or South America, would not be able to say that with respect to loans what we had done was not proper, but rather that under the interest law of Canada owing to the cheapness of money and the lowering of interest rates the rate had been reduced for general application to all companies, whether they were provincial or federal, foreign or British. There is standing in committee a bill which would enable such amendment to be made, if it be thought desirable. I do suggest however that the desirable course at this time is for us to accept the undertaking of the insurance companies to make the agreement with the superintendent of insurance, so that every policyholder may be advised that the company is now prepared to reduce the interest rate on his past agreements—as they are prepared to do unless he desires to do otherwise—and on future loans. There is one phase of the matter that I mention with great hesitancy, and that is that the suggested legislation may place a very serious strain upon the companies themselves in providing cash to meet the requirements of the policyholders, either for cash surrender values on the one hand or loans on the other.

There are amplifications of the reasons which I could give, but I have endeavoured to outline to the hon. member and hon. members of the committee what is in my mind, not because I am against the reduction of interest rates but because I am deeply solicitous about the future of Canada, its position among the countries of the world in connection with the maintenance of what may be good or bad at the time it is made, and the maintenance of legislation under which companies have issued contracts to various people in different parts of the world.

In suggesting the action I have indicated I do so with the full realization that it may readily be misunderstood. I feel however I would be recreant to my duty if I did not rise in my place to-night and indicate to the committee how serious I believe the result would be if we were to say to each individual policyholder in the world that we know better than he does how he should conduct his business with respect to his home and family, and the protection he affords to those he desires to protect, and in connection with the making of loans, whether automatic or otherwise on the reserves which have accumulated on his policy. If the hon. member will accept that view, very well, but if he does not accept it I think he must in all fairness resort to the provisions of the Interest Act, and not the Insurance Act, to protect us against attacks which might properly be levelled against us. If he accepts my suggestion, we may hope that even further concessions may be obtained by action of policyholders themselves, and we know that at least we shall have secured a fixed rate, a rate not exceeding six per cent, covering all charges of every kind in connection with advances which may be made against your accumulation and mine on money which we have entrusted to various companies to invest, against the contingency provided, namely the payment to the beneficiary of a sum named either as an endowment or a claim maturing at death.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking on behalf of John Smith may I say that the member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has had experiences that quite probably the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) never had. I have often borrowed money from insurance companies, and I have found that the rate has been very high. When a man applies for a loan from an insurance company he does not discuss the rate of interest. He gets the money from the insurance company because he needs it badly, and the insurance company proceed to take advantage of that fact and charge the rate they wish. May I tell the Prime Minister, for his information, that when John Smith or John Doe goes to an insurance company to get money he has to comply with the conditions imposed by that company. Those conditions are not always pleasant, but when one needs money he must accept them as they are. That is a point which I suggest should not be overlooked.

Perhaps other hon. members have been in the same unfortunate circumstances and have had to borrow on their insurance policies. Undoubtedly they have found the rate very high. How is it that when rates of interest have been reduced everywhere, insurance companies continue to impose their own high rates? How it it that when the government obtains the privilege of borrowing money at a low rate, individuals cannot do so? This is another point which cannot be understood by the common people. We know that in the first instance the rate of interest was reduced to the federal government; then it was reduced to the provincial government, and now the municipalities have obtained a lower rate of interest. But when it comes to an individual, he must pay a high rate; the sky is the limit. Why do we have this discrimination? I find the condition I have described very hard to understand. I cannot understand the people who seek cheap money on the markets of the world and then tell the private individual that to save his country he must pay a high rate of interest. It is absurd, in my humble view, and I cannot understand it coming from a business man of the calibre of the Prime Minister. If the rate of interest is to be low for the federal government, if it is to be low for the provinces and the municipalities, it should be equally low for the private individual, and the reason why so many individuals cannot pay their debts is because of the interest payments on their liabilities. It is a vast problem. I admit that the precise rate of interest fixed by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) may be a matter for debate, but on the other hand something should be done to lower the rate of interest for the private individual. That is a matter of the utmost importance and it should be settled by this house because the usury act is an act of the parliament of Canada.

One reason why I do not object too strongly to this bill is that it is a public bill which affects all the insurance companies. I am strongly opposed to all private legislation to the granting of special privileges to this company and to that one. The business of parliament is to look after the general welfare of Canadian citizens as a whole, and we should not allow ourselves to be imposed upon by the private legislation which comes before us and which brings here swarms of lobbyists who are a pest to this house. Men who cannot earn anything before the courts come here and go from room to room canvassing in the interests of private legislation. It is shameful, because that legislation is to grant special privileges to the few. That is the sort of legislation I object to, but in a general way I do not object to public legislation by private members. That is our privilege. The members are here to enact legislation that affects every Canadian citizen. Therefore I think in principle the legislation which has been proposed by the hon. member for Macleod should receive the general approval of this house with the understanding that its particulars are a fair subject for debate.

The insurance companies always are complaining that their privileges are being curtailed. No one can expect that these companies, which have such enormous assets—and it is a good thing that they have—will be glad and that they will congratulate the House of Commons when by act of parliament their revenues are curtailed and the rate of interest is reduced on the loans which they make to their policyholders. On the other hand the public interest must be kept in view all the time, and it is on behalf of the man in the street who has to borrow on his insurance policy that I make these remarks to this committee.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. DONNELLY: I should like to ask one question of the Prime Minister. He referred to one Canadian company doing business outside Canada, and said that it had loaned money in outside countries and that a high rate of interest was received upon its loans in certain countries. Can he tell us what rate of interest this company receives from the loans it makes in England, for instance?

Mr. BENNETT: Presumably the rate on policy loans of any company doing business in England would be the going rate in England. The rate as fixed in 1910 was based upon the rate fixed in the Bank Act on the assumption that money should be borrowed on an insurance policy at a slightly higher rate than from the bank. The policy of 1910, and it is still the policy, was to discourage these loans being made. In England the rate of interest is much less than it is here, although I have not the figures; so is the interest rate on reserves, and so are the promises with respect to profits. One of the reasons our companies do a large business abroad is that they are supposed to have a good field for investment in Canada where the yield would be larger than in older countries where the rate of interest from securities is smaller; but with a reduction of the rate of interest on securities the profits on insurance policies have been reduced. The rate of interest varies in other countries and it varies here from time to time. When we fixed the rate in 1910 we did it with the purpose of not facilitating policy loans, the purpose being, as I have said, to maintain a slightly higher rate on policy loans than money might be obtained for from a bank or other lending institution, in order to discourage the practice. I remember a friend of mine saying to me in this house that he wished that ten years ago there had been a law prohibiting loans on policies, for he had made a loan and had not been able to repay it—he wished he had never been able to get it.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, I must say that the Prime Minister's statement to-night came as a complete surprise to me. I had no intimation, no knowledge of it at all; in fact I did not expect the insurance companies would make such a proposal to the government, and naturally I feel that I would like to have the opportunity of seeing in Hansard the statement made by the Prime Minister and possibly of seeing the suggestion which the insurance companies have made to the government.

As to the propriety of the house dealing with the matter I may say that the insurance companies were very ably represented before the banking committee by Mr. Rowell, and speaking from memory I understood him to say that so far as this particular section of my bill is concerned, fixing the rate of interest on future contracts, we are certainly within our rights. That is, he did not raise any question of constitutionality at all in regard to that section. As the section was originally drawn I believe he did suggest that it might be regarded as perhaps outside the powers of parliament, but the redrafted bill as it was passed by the committee makes it clear that the rate of interest this bill seeks to impose would apply only to loans made after the first day of January, 1936. That will be clear, I think, upon a reading of the bill. It says:

> No company shall charge, stipulate for, or recover as interest in respect of any loan made to any person on a policy of insurance issued or effected upon the life of any person—

I draw particular attention to the words that follow:

> —resident in Canada at the time the policy was issued or effected, any amount in excess of five per centum per annum, compounded annually, on the balance of the loan from time to time unpaid by the borrower.

I just mention that to make it clear that this was not to apply to any policies or any loans made outside of Canada, and in that particular the committee was very careful to see that the bill as passed by them did not infringe upon that right. I hope that before the bill is up again I may have the opportunity of studying the statement which the Prime Minister has placed upon Hansard.

Section stands.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, $545,500.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock the minister was dealing with the question of the fixing of prices for potatoes under the potato marketing board, and I was asking him if he had had any opinion from the Department of Justice intimating that there was power for an agency of the kind which appears to have been appointed here to fix prices or to issue an order to the dealers that a certain price must be obtained. I understood the minister to say that that point had not come up I am wondering whether during the recess the minister has looked into the matter and found an answer, and whether he can give us now the benefit of any information he has gathered.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that the Justice department has not been asked for its opinion as to whether or not the central marketing agency had the power to fix a price. As regards the other question with respect to the personnel of the board, on the local potato board, which includes two from Quebec, six are growers: J. J. Trainor, Prince Edward Island; R. K. Lougheed, Nova Scotia; F. I. Boates, Nova Scotia; G. C. Cunningham, New Brunswick; J. T. Cassin, Ontario; C. E. Broughton, Ontario. Two are shippers; M. G. McNealy, Prince Edward Island; H. L. Mulharin, New Brunswick. Three are connected with growers' organizations: W. J. Tawse, Quebec; J. H. Lavoie, Quebec; L. F. Burrows, chairman.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister has said that the Department of Justice had not been asked whether or not the central marketing agency had authority to fix a price. By the central marketing agency, did he mean the agency appointed by the local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister agrees, I presume, that the local board itself has no power to fix prices.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Has he not taken an opinion or given consideration to the question whether or not the local board, not having the power to fix prices, may indirectly fix prices by appointing a marketing agency which does so? Does he think that the agency can do what the board itself cannot do?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no doubt that the agency can do certain things which the board cannot do.

Mr. RALSTON: For instance?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): For instance, the agency can market and the local board cannot. With reference to the hon. member's question regarding the fixing of prices, I think he will agree that the term "fixing of prices" is capable of different interpretations. The agency is appointed by the local marketing board in this particular instance for the purpose of marketing potatoes through that agency. The agency, in the ordinary course of selling, would decide as to what was considered the best method, under conditions such as prevailed, of getting the largest returns to the producer, and in so doing he would doubtless offer at a certain price the product he had to sell. If that price were found to be such that the product would not move freely, or that its movement would be handicapped in merchandising, the agency would naturally change the price. As I say, "fixing of prices" is open to different interpretations. Personally I see nothing wrong with the action which was taken, especially under these conditions.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to prolong the debate if it is going to get into a legal discussion, but the minister is speaking of a commercial transaction. The transaction which takes place here is not in any sense, as I understand it, a marketing transaction by the agency. Take Mr. Cunningham, for instance: all that he does is to issue an order to certain dealers throughout the province declaring, "You shall sell your goods for so much." But he does not take an order from the purchaser; he does not handle potatoes; he simply issues an order to A, B, or C all over the province of New Brunswick, "You have to sell your potatoes for so much," and all he asks of them is to file invoices with him. He does not say to whom they are to sell; he takes no responsibility in connection with marketing. He is simply a figure head, a dummy, a bureau, not a marketing agency in any sense of the word. Surely the minister does not suggest that a man who is appointed by the board can fix a price when the board itself cannot fix one. I do not understand the line of reasoning the minister takes. I am not talking about a commercial agency which has power to decide, "We have a certain number of potatoes on hand and we must determine whether to sell at such and such a price." I am speaking of a statutory creature, a man who does not handle potatoes at all and who does not attempt to negotiate with the purchaser. He sends letters to so and so, "You shall sell potatoes at such and such a price." Does the minister suggest that that can possibly be done? Has the minister any authority for it? Has he consulted the Department of Justice in regard to the soundness of such a scheme? Remember that what he is doing is this. He is endeavouring to found a basis for prosecution, for putting people in gaol, fining them from $25 to $500 and imprisoning them for three months. Does he suggest that any prosecution could be brought against a man who disobeyed an order made by someone in Fredericton and sold potatoes cheaper than specified in that order?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Like my hon. friend, I do not wish to enter into a discussion of technicalities, especially legal, because I should be in no position to do so with one of his training. But it is a matter of interpretation of the term "marketing." For example, I wish to buy a house; I can either go direct to the parties or name an agent to purchase it for me, though I have really paid for the house and purchased it. This selling agency—because he is appointed a central selling agency—

Mr. RALSTON: Who appointed him?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The local board. He has control of the products that come under the provisions of the scheme that has been approved.

Mr. RALSTON: That is where the minister has gone wrong. If the local board appoints the central agency, the agency cannot do more than the board can do.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The local board has no power actually to market, but it is set out specifically in the statute that the local board can name any agent or agencies to do the actual marketing. In this instance they specified a central selling agency and as such it has control of the product. If its operations are not satisfactory to the local board, the local board may either withdraw the authority which it has given or name some other agent or agency similar to any other marketing organization. He, I would say, would be privileged to ask a price for the product he has to sell, because his endeavour is to get the greatest possible remuneration for the producers for the goods sold.

Mr. RALSTON: Let us leave that point for the moment. In the first place, I say that the marketing agency is the creation of the board and cannot do more than the board can do, and this house expressly indicated that the local board was not to have the power to set a price. What the statute contemplated I think was this: A toll gate or supervising bureau was to be established in the form of a central agency, so that the local board might be assured the marketing was being done in accordance with the local board's regulations, and there would be a possibility of checking them as they went by that toll gate or turnstile. But the only thing the local board could do was to make regulations as to distribution, the quantity and quality of the things specifically set out in the order in council, but not as to price.

Let us go a step further. The marketing agency is not a marketing agency for the producer at all. To whom does it give an order as to price? It gives an order as to price to the dealer and says to the dealer: You must sell to another dealer at such and such a price. There is no order so far as I know—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—from the marketing agency that the producer is to get a specific price. On the other hand there is no order from the marketing agency that the consumer is to pay a specific price. But there is an order that, for example, a dealer in New Brunswick and a dealer, it may be in Toronto or Montreal or somewhere else, will have between them a specific price, while the consumer is left out at one end and the producer left out at the other. Perhaps I am wrong, and if I am, the minister will correct me; but if that is the case, then it seems to me that what the minister says about the central marketing agency having the control of this product for the purpose of marketing it in the interest of the producer is not a correct statement of the case. The marketing agency simply regulates the price as between two middlemen.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The marketing agency in this case differs fundamentally from the local board in this respect: the local board has no power to buy and sell and therefore has no power to fix prices, but it has power or authority to name an agent or agency to market this product.

Mr. RALSTON: No, it is the agency through which the dealer shall market the commodity, not the agency to market.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): To market.

Mr. RALSTON: No, through which they shall be marketed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They are marketed through this marketing agency.

Mr. RALSTON: May I just correct the minister? This is the distinction. The minister says that they have a right to appoint a central selling agency to market. That is not so. They have the right to appoint a central selling agency through which they shall market. The producer of potatoes, so far as I know, has the right to fix his price. He says to the marketing agency: These are my potatoes; I want you to market them according to quantity and quality at a price which I specify. He is told: You will have to take such and such a price. He replies: No, I will take the price I stated, because you are my agent and I will not have you, my agent, tell me what price I am going to get. That seems to me to be the position.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member in that statement refer to the action of a producer in selling his production?

Mr. RALSTON: The minister said that the marketing agency was acting for the producer. My contention is that it was not. But assuming that the minister was right and that the producer did deal with the marketing agency, I said that if it was acting for the producer, the producer was the one to fix the price. If it is acting for the dealer, then the dealer was the one who had the right to fix the price, because he is the principal and the agency is only the agent. Or if the central agency is the agent of the local board, then it has no power to fix the price because the board has no power to fix the price. All through this legislation from beginning to end there has been the idea that price fixing is not going to be authorized. I will ask the minister one question: Have there been any prosecutions against anyone under the potato marketing board for selling at a price contrary to that which has been fixed by what he calls the central marketing agency or any of those agencies appointed by the board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that there have been no prosecutions, but I beg to differ from the hon. member in the statement that the producer may take his product to the marketing selling agency—

Mr. RALSTON: He does not have to take it anywhere; he can sell it direct.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): But he can take it, if he wishes, to the central selling agency or to subagents, and he can offer his product for sale at any price he wishes. That product can be purchased or otherwise at the price that is set. But on the understanding I have of the statute, the agent is named in this way, that the local board names the agent through which the marketing shall take place.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think in view of the discussion that has been had here this afternoon and evening, a most extraordinary situation has developed under this marketing act, and I want to discuss it for a few minutes because it is a matter of great importance not only in the province from which I come but all over the dominion. The whole discussion of the marketing act last year was based upon the assumption that neither the dominion marketing board nor any of its agencies were to have power to set prices. The minister states that there is some ambiguity about the phrase "fixing prices". Let me make what I am speaking about very clear: I mean the setting by someone who purports to act as authority, of a minimum price below which the owner of the goods may not sell the product. I think that is clear.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Has the hon. member reference to the producer?

Mr. ILSLEY: The owner—producer, shipper or dealer.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is no price fixed for the producer.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us see about this. There are eleven schemes in operation under the approval of the dominion marketing board and the governor in council. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There are more than that. Two or three more have been passed lately.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then there are twelve or thirteen now. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nearly all the schemes about which I have been able to get information are for the fixing of prices. There is one notable exception to that, and that is the scheme under which the export fruit board of the Dominion of Canada is operating. That scheme does not involve the fixing of prices; it involves dealing merely with the regulation of quality of fruit shipments, and with the qualitative regulation of fruit shipments I have been in accord and other hon. members on this side were in accord last year.

In Nova Scotia the only formidable criticism of the apple export scheme is that there is an unnecessarily complicated amount of machinery used in putting it into operation. I can hear the comment on every side that this should and could be done by regulation of the minister under the Fruit Act or under the Fruit Act as amended, but with the principle of qualitative regulation I think we on this side are in accord. I certainly am personally in accord with the principle; I want to make that clear at the outset.

When you move into the other sphere, that of price fixing, very important considerations arise, and it is amazing that an act which was erected upon a basis which excluded price fixing entirely should have been used in its operation as the ground for approval of a number of schemes the essential feature of which is price fixing. If the minister would kindly give me his attention, may I ask him whether the apple scheme in British Columbia —I am speaking about the Okanagan valley scheme—was not a price fixing one? Can he tell me whether that is so or not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that it is not.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have here the issue of the Vernon News, as it states, "the leading journal of the famous Okanagan valley", of Thursday, March 21, 1935. In an article headed "Shippers advise lowering of prices so that 1934 apples may not rot in valley storehouses", I find down in the middle of it this statement:

> Prices were out of line.
> To recite these facts is only to hint at the story that lies underneath. To understand, it is necessary to trace a portion of the history of the marketing of this crop. Last December the B.C. tree fruit board set prices which were changed on Saturday.

Did they set prices or not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that they did not set any definite price; that the shippers were not required to follow any price.

Mr. ILSLEY: Did they fix a minimum below which shippers could not sell?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that they did not.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will continue reading:

> Very shortly afterwards shippers found out that in order to sell the crop, lower prices were imperative. In January these prices were being cut to make sales, the condition of the fruit being an important consideration. With the passage of time price cutting became general until it is believed that for the past month the pool bases as set by the board have been almost entirely ignored.

What I want to know is, did the board set prices? Did they set pool bases in the way of prices?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that the board named what they thought should be the basic price at which the apples should be sold to cover the cost of production, I take it; but the shippers were in no way bound, because the board had no authority to fix that price.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister's answer is that the board's action in setting prices was merely advisory?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not consistent with the tenor of this article. It goes on to say:

About six weeks ago the shippers met at Kelowna, discussed the situation and called in Messrs. Haskins and Barrat. These members of the board are reported to have referred to the movement as satisfactory and to have refused to move on prices.

I shall not go on reading the article, but I commend it to the attention of the minister, because that seems to be a circumstantial account indicating that the board did set prices, prices which were not set by the shippers. They were set in December; in January the shippers began to break them; in February the break was almost general, and in March it was complete, and the board then met and fixed the price at which the shippers were selling anyhow. That, as I understand it, was the experience in the Okanagan valley of British Columbia. Now, did the tobacco scheme involve the setting of prices?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have the evidence of Professor Leitch before the price spreads committee that an agreement was entered into between the big companies and the growers of tobacco in Ontario fixing prices which the buyers would pay during the next three years —they were fixed rather definitely for 1934, with provision for variations for 1935 and 1936 —and that the buyers were licensed and were threatened with suspension or cancellation of their licence, either tacitly or expressly, if they did not pay those prices. So that in effect prices were set in that scheme through the instrumentality of licensing. Is that substantially correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think that bears out the contention I made some time ago as to the ambiguity of the use of the term "price fixing." The hon. member stated, if I heard him correctly, that the growers themselves in negotiation with the buyers agreed on a certain price for the sale of their product. If any product is to be bought or sold there must be some price fixed, but that I take it would not come under what is generally understood as price fixing. It was just a matter of selling a product. Under this scheme they have the control of the product and sat in and negotiated with the buyers as to the price. I would think that is a legitimate sale.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps it is perfectly legitimate, but I am asking whether my statement of fact is correct.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, but I do not interpret it as price fixing.

Mr. ILSLEY: But my statement is substantially correct, regardless of the interpretation. Then my submission would be that the board, through the instrumentality of licences, was in effect fixing the price.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Was it not rather taking power to make certain that the buyers would live up to the agreement that they had made to pay a certain price?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but through the instrumentality of licensing the board was practically keeping control over the price that was being paid for the tobacco.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): An agreed-upon price. A contract was entered into to sell goods for a certain price—

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not arguing that point, but I say that is what happened.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): But following the hon. gentleman's argument, in every case where an article is bought or sold, because the buyer and seller agree upon a certain price is it price fixing?

Mr. ILSLEY: But not by the board.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But this was done by the board.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that. Now let us come to the third scheme, the potato scheme. There is no doubt that in that case prices were absolutely fixed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would not say that. That is again a matter of interpretation. An agency is named to handle a product, and in handling it it feels that the product is worth a certain price, as any other merchandising agency might do. If by charging that price, from the experience of a week or two or a day or two it concludes that they are preventing the movement of the goods to the consumer, they may change the price. The flour milling companies do the same thing, as do the motor car manufacturers; or any organization.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister should not evade in that way.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I object to that statement. I am not evading; I am making a straight statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would say that all over eastern Canada where the eastern Canada potato marketing scheme was in effect, the board, whether through an agency or not, fixed prices and sent bulletins out to all dealers.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The board did not do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: What did the board do? That was the whole scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The board named an agency to sell a product.

Mr. ILSLEY: Who fixed the price?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The agency. That is the job of an agent, to sell the product.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister says the agency fixed the price and the board did not, but certainly it was part of the scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No part of the scheme whatever. An agent or agency may be named to sell a product. They might just as well name half a dozen different agencies, but in this case one was named, and the job of that agency was to take this product and dispose of it. In doing that they would do what they considered to be in the best interests of the producer and also themselves.

Mr. ILSLEY: This agency was not the agent of the dealers or the producers in the sense that they appointed it their agent. It was an agent imposed upon them by the board.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What is the board? The board is the representative of the producers, everyone concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not arguing that; do not draw me off to these side paths. The board selects an agent or agency which is not the agent of the producers except in a fictitious or legal sense—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not fictitious at all. Someone has to speak for the producers, and the logical spokesman is their own chosen board. The producers are represented on that board. Otherwise there would be no means of naming the agent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Now the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Agriculture are both talking, but certainly neither one would say that apart from the act the agency or agent was the agent of any producer or dealer, because they did not appoint it their agent.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Who is the board?

Mr. ILSLEY: The board is a creature of the statute, of course.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Who names it?

Mr. RALSTON: The minister approves it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, the minister approves the board that is selected and named by the producers, as representative of the producers' interests.

Mr. VENIOT: How did the producers select the agent?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In this case the board was named because of the emergency that existed. It was felt that to meet that emergency there was not time to go through the procedure of having an election to name this board. That organization that we considered most representative of the producers named this board. In that way they were, I take it, as far as could be, named by the producers, and therefore were their representatives.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly the agency fixed the price, and the farmers generally broke the price they fixed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Could the hon. member sell any article without a price being named before it was sold?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not objecting to the farmers and dealers fixing the price at which they would sell, but I object that this legislation was erected on the basis that the boards were not to have the power to fix prices.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The boards have not fixed the price. Any product that is sold must have a set price either asked or bid for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL: By whom?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): By the person who owns or is in charge of it to sell it, or his representative, and that is what took place in this case—not a particle of difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: Now I want to come to this: Is there a domestic apple marketing scheme pending for the province of Nova Scotia? Is it under consideration by the board at the present time?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is one under consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: I noticed something in the press the other day to the effect that the board would receive representations for or against this scheme up to a certain date. What is that date?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is not certain, but it is suggested that it is June 15.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has any poll been taken of the persons interested in that scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would not be done until after these representations were received.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the minister propose to take a poll after these representations have been received?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not tell until the conditions were laid before me. I do not really know the particulars of the scheme.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a price fixing scheme, is it not?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not tell that. Until all the information has been collected by the dominion marketing board and placed before me I could not hazard an opinion at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just in conclusion I want to say two or three words about these price fixing schemes. I am not going to take any very high ground or base my argument upon any broad or general principles at all, but I want to submit to the minister and to the board that they ought to be exceedingly careful about setting up price fixing schemes, because that is what they are doing now and what they have been doing ever since they started to put this act into operation, though they said they were not going to do it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot let the hon. member get away with that, because we have scheme after scheme in which there is no price fixing at all, any more than providing for an agency which may ask a price for a product. You cannot sell a product otherwise.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is all there is to it. Under these schemes, when a body, whether it be a board or an agency, fixes a price and imposes that price upon the producer, very often the price will be too high to move the goods. I do not think it can be denied that this has been the almost universal experience of boards which undertook to set prices at which the owners of goods could sell those goods. If that price is fixed too high the result very often is that the goods do not go into consumption as quickly as would be the case otherwise, and when that happens very often you have left a surplus which does not go into consumption at all but which is left on the hands of the seller to spoil. That has happened in connection with potatoes.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Would the hon. member suggest, then, that any fewer potatoes, to any considerable degree, would go into consumption because of a difference in price of four cents per bushel, especially if the lower price were eight cents and the higher price twelve cents?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about the difference in prices, but I say that I do not think you can get away from this principle, that if you fix the price a little too high, or even a little higher than the market would fix it, a smaller quantity of the commodity will be purchased. It practically always works out in that way. I am submitting now that there is great danger in these price fixing schemes for that reason alone. If the price is fixed only a little bit too high it becomes exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to enforce the scheme, because the seller or producer who has on his hands goods for which he finds there is not a demand, or for which the demand is not as brisk as he thinks it should be so that he finds it difficult to get rid of them, is confronted with the temptation to take what he can get for those goods. Take for example a person who has apples on his hands, and the price is fixed at $3 a barrel. He does not get the business at that price. He has a competitive, perishable product, which comes in competition with other fruits and which will not keep. What is he going to do? There are only three courses open to him. One is to bootleg the product, as they have been bootlegging potatoes, and from what I can gather from this British Columbia paper that is substantially what they did there in connection with apples and that is what a great many people will do. Another alternative open to him is to get the board together in some way or other and see if they will not lower the price a little to everyone so that he can sell his product. That is slow and cumbersome, and it is very doubtful if the board will act soon enough to enable this man to get rid of his product. The third course open to him is to keep his product and let it spoil.

Those are the alternatives open to the man who is the owner of a perishable product, under a price fixing scheme such as this. I think that is very clear, and I would suggest to the gentlemen who are administering this act that they should be exceedingly careful in connection with their price fixing schemes or they will drive the natural producers of this country into a wholesale bootlegging of natural products, as they have done up to the present time. They are doing it now. It is an amazing thing that there have been no prosecutions under this potato scheme.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Does the hon. member suggest that under the potato marketing scheme at the present time the producers have been forced into bootlegging because of price fixing?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think they are bootlegging to-day but certainly they have been bootlegging during the winter months, and no one knows it better than the Minister of Agriculture. There have been no prosecutions, and apparently no prosecutions are possible because the price fixing provisions are illegal. It was a revelation to hon. members of this house, I think, to hear the cross examination to which the minister was subjected by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) during which he elicited the fact that the opinion of the Department of Justice had never been obtained in connection with these price fixing features. It is an amazing thing that the board should have been putting into effect what purported to be schemes that apparently have no legal authority behind them, and there is no reason to believe they have any legal authority. Are they going to continue to do that, or are they going to find out just what they can do? Are they going to make a farce of the whole thing? The person who suffers is the loyal, law-abiding man who tries to stick to the scheme; it is not his neighbour who bootlegs his products. All over the country a great many people think that if a scheme is put into effect it has the force of law; that is how they regard it. It has not the force of law; the neighbour of the law-abiding man can violate the scheme with impunity. That has been done in the past. Unless the whole operation of the marketing act is going to be child's play the minister will have to put it on a different basis.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In reply to the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) may I say that never have I felt so much regret because I have not the legal training to make such a lengthy statement based on something quite impractical. The hon. member has stated nothing that is not well known with reference to the sale of a commodity. He has said that if the price charged for a commodity is too high in comparison with the prices of other products that may replace it, or too high for the consumer who may wish to buy it, it will interfere with that commodity going on the market. I am sure the gentlemen who form these local boards are well aware of that fact. Every person who has given any thought to the principles of marketing knows that, and that is the one thing these people have had in mind.

In connection with the potato scheme, due to a very abnormal crop throughout the whole of eastern Canada, and due to the realization on the part of every person that this great surplus existed that could not be consumed, the price broke to a point at which the producer was not receiving anything worth while for his product. But surely the hon. member would not put himself on record as saying that increasing the price of potatoes, especially potatoes of the higher qualities, from eight cents to twelve cents or thirteen cents would in any material way affect the supply of that product going on the market. That is a question of business judgment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that, but I know that the principle is of pretty general application that if you raise the price of apples from $2.50 to $3 a barrel it affects the sale of the apples.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This is a question of the collective business judgment of several men; it is not the judgment of an individual producer but of an organization which has been selected by the producers, men who have their confidence. It is not something imposed upon them. These men do this themselves; they name the agency which they think is best qualified to handle their products in the best possible way, and to put them on the market. And in order to put any product on the market some price must be asked for it. If we could imagine that these men, who are so closely in touch with these problems and the difficulties with which they have been confronted, would be so foolish as to raise the price from eight cents to seventy-five cents a bushel, I agree with the hon. member that it would be an entirely different story, but we do not expect sane men to do things like that, and these are the men vitally interested in these matters.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister seems to have missed the point made by the hon. member for Hants-Kings, which I think is most important. If he is going to have price fixing regulations surely those price fixing regulations must be such as are enforceable, and not such as can be evaded by the man who is either able to get legal advice or who has nerve, courage or boldness enough to tell the minister or tell the board that he does not care what regulations are made. What has been happening, I am sure, is that the man who is honest and who wants to play the game is being penalized and has to hold his potatoes, while his neighbour is selling his at five cents or ten cents below the price and getting them off the market. The reason is that at the present time the minister has in force a scheme of very doubtful validity. Even without a legal training I hope the minister will understand that point. I am sure members of the government sitting near him, if he does not accept my statement, will tell him I am correct. I submit that in the interests of Canadian producers he could not do better than to follow the method adopted by the Minister of Justice, who did not feel ashamed or humiliated in connection with certain amendments to the criminal code in seeking the advice of Mr. Tilley and Mr. Geoffrion. In that way the minister could find out whether or not the scheme holds water.

I point out to the minister that his local board has no power to fix prices. That point has been admitted in a letter written by the secretary of the local board to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) who drew my attention to it during the recess.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): We have agreed to that to-night.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister agrees to that; very well. The local board has no power to fix prices. The local board has power to designate the agency through which dealers may market their product. Is that getting us any farther? Does that mean to say that the agency may designate a price when the local board may not? The very essence of the thing is that prices were not to be fixed. I submit that this is the most barefaced, transparent, unsound and unstable scheme one could possibly imagine. The point is this: The local board have gone through the form of what they describe as designating an agency through which potatoes are to be marketed. That is, there is nothing more than the writing of a man's name into an order and saying, "This is the agency through which potatoes shall be marketed." What action does that man take in connection with the marketing of potatoes? Does he sell potatoes on the Montreal market or does he go to the dealers and purchase potatoes? No, he does not do that; he sits in his office and issues an order in the following form:

To all representatives: The following are the minimum prices for Green Mountain potatoes (Cobblers 5 cents per bag less except at Halifax) effective February 25, 1935, at which you are to sell potatoes produced in New Brunswick, cash track on the following markets.

This is signed

G. C. Cunningham, marketing agency.

Designated by whom?

Designated by the eastern Canada potato marketing board—

—a body which cannot fix prices. Can anybody suggest that by this action the local board is not trying to fix prices?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is it the hon. member's interpretation that where a statement is made to the effect that the local board may name the agency through which the product may be marketed, the agency named by the board cannot buy, sell and actually market?

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about the scheme the minister has before him. Let us deal with a scheme in which the agency actually buys, sells and markets, when we come to it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): But that is not the point.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sticking to the particular potato marketing board, not some imaginary board the minister may have in mind.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have no imaginary board in mind.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the only one I am talking about.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Is it the hon. member's interpretation that they may name the agency through which the marketing may take place? Does the hon. member understand that the agency named may buy and sell the product?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That was my understanding.

Mr. RALSTON: No, I am saying that it is an agency through which the dealers may sell.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): But the agency itself might buy and sell.

Mr. RALSTON: No. Potatoes are being bought and sold, and the dealer is doing the buying and selling. He is doing it through that agency. That is the turnstile through which they are to go. Even supposing the agency itself is doing the buying and selling and fixing the price, that is doubtful enough, but if all the agency does is to issue an order to people in the province stating, "You are to sell potatoes at such and such a price," I do not believe even the minister, with the lack of legal training he speaks of, would assert that that was sound.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate my lack of legal training, especially in a matter like this. Because my understanding is very definitely that this agency named has the power to buy and sell.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand the minister; but let us leave that to one side.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is the point at issue.

Mr. RALSTON: No, it is not. This agency is not buying and selling; it has never bought a solitary potato, nor has it sold one.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends on the understanding of the hon. member as to the functions of marketing.

Mr. RALSTON: No; if the minister will permit me to say so I am using the words "buy and sell." Those were the words used by the minister. I say this agency has neither bought nor sold. All it has done is to issue an order to a lot of dealers in New Brunswick telling them, "You are to sell at such and such a price." Then, when the dealers have themselves made the sale, the board says "send to the agency the invoices under which you sold those potatoes." There is no suggestion that this agency itself has bought and sold; that is some imaginary board which the minister must have in mind.

I submit there is no foundation for a scheme wherein an agency is simply a dummy, a body issuing an order to people throughout the province. The sale is made between a dealer on the one hand in the province and a purchaser somewhere else on the other. The minister may evade—or if he likes the word better, he may avoid—the question put to him by the hon. member for Hants-Kings, but this is nothing less than a local board trying by subterfuge to fix prices, and under the act the fixing of prices was not authorized. It may be that if done properly the fixing of prices may be good policy. The hon. member for Hants-Kings has indicated principles which he thinks ought to be observed, if the fixing of prices is to be resorted to. If the board or the agency is to fix prices, this parliament ought to have an opportunity to say whether authority to do so is to be given. But if the minister receives advice that the marketing agency has power to fix prices I believe he will also be advised that this method of doing it, namely one whereby a piece of paper is issued to dealers, is quite illegal. The result is that the fellow who wishes to cut below the named price does so and nothing can be done about it and the man who tries to observe what he thinks is the law is left with his potatoes on his hands. That is not a fair position; and it is one which the minister ought to correct immediately by seeking advice as to the legality of this whole procedure.

Mr. NEILL: A week ago to-night when this subject was under discussion the minister referred to some schemes which had been rejected by the board, one of which was a scheme for the regulation of the marketing of butter for export. It struck me that that was a very desirable scheme and one which contained all the elements of success, particularly in view of the multiplicity of conditions which arise in the domestic market, especially bearing in mind the fact that the exportable surplus of butter is small. Yet that exportable surplus sold on a foreign market very often sets the price for the domestic market. A great many of the butter producers have looked towards a scheme which would regulate and feed the product on to the foreign market at the right time and place. Last night I asked the minister why it had been rejected and he told me he had not the information at hand, but that he would obtain it and give it to me later on. Is he now in a position to give me that information?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme I take it was to this effect, that responsibility should be taken for the disposal of certain amounts of butter in storage. Now in order to declare that that butter should be removed from storage for export some provision would have to be made to make up the loss sustained by the selling of the butter on the world's market at a price less than the domestic price, and no adequate provision in that respect was set out in the scheme. That was one of the grounds upon which the board turned it down.

Mr. NEILL: Who were the promoters of the scheme, and whom did they represent?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They represented dealers, I believe, chiefly; the names were submitted through the National Dairy Council.

Mr. NEILL: They are not dealers, are they? Is the National Dairy Company a dealer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The National Dairy Council, I said.

Mr. NEILL: I understood the minister to say that the scheme fell down because there was no provision made for taking care of the loss sustained by selling the butter. How was it determined that there was to be a loss?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It was a long and rather involved scheme, and my information is that there were a number of reasons why the board did not approve of it. I understand that this is more or less a confidential document we have in front of us, but so far as possible I shall be glad to set out in detail for the hon. member's information the scheme and the objections so far as they are set out here by the board. The board found the scheme lacking on a number of grounds. Another question was whether or not the scheme should be proceeded with before further opportunity was given to the combined dairy interests to submit a scheme that would take in the whole dairy industry. I shall be glad to give the hon. member more information but I regret I have not got it with me to-night.

Mr. NEILL: There is just one other matter I wish to refer to. We were discussing it last night when the house adjourned. The discussion brought up a ruling given by the Saskatchewan court of appeal and the minister interjected into my remarks that "that case did not refer to the provisions of the marketing act; it had nothing to do with the marketing act," and I replied "I know that." But I spoke too soon. I did not mean to say that it had nothing to do with the marketing act, but that it had nothing to do with the marketing act directly. The minister must surely admit that the case was a very clear one, and that it did strike at the very root of the marketing act. The actual case was brought up under the Live Stock Act, but the point was that this appeal court decided that this system of trying to pass enabling legislation was ultra vires. I have the case in front of me here. It is reported in the Western Weekly Reports of May 4, at page 34. It is the case of Rex versus Zaslavsky. It appears that he is a dealer who bought some cases of eggs and did not comply with the regulations made under the Live Stock Act of this parliament. The case was appealed and a stated case was presented to the court, asking three specific questions: (1) Whether the Live Stock Act of Canada and the regulations thereunder were valid and binding on the accused; (2) if not, were they valid and binding on the accused by reason of the Live Stock Products Act passed by the Saskatchewan government; (3) was the governor in council empowered under the Live Stock Act of Canada to enact prohibition in regard to purchasing of eggs as contained in clause 9 (4) of the regulations. I have put the questions briefly in my own language. The answer in the case of the first two questions was no, that both the act and the regulations sought to be enacted by the Dominion of Canada were ultra vires, and so they were under the provincial act.

The minister I think said last night that I would find if I looked at the case that the objection taken was to the manner in which the enabling legislation was passed, but I think the language used was that customary in all these cases. The judgment said:

> It was provided that any provision of the dominion act ... within the legislative authority of the province, and outside that of the Dominion of Canada, shall have the force of law in Saskatchewan, and, unless otherwise enacted by the legislature of Saskatchewan shall be and remain in full force and effect therein to all intents and purposes whatsoever, until the same is repealed by the dominion parliament.

Then in the article there is this remark:

> This phraseology is used in nearly all provincial enabling statutes.

I believe that that is practically the language generally used. Well then, if it has been decided, although not of course finally because no doubt the case will go to the privy council, by an appeal court in the province of Saskatchewan that this system of passing enabling legislation is all wrong and ultra vires, I ask the minister and his officials whether that does not strike at the very root of the marketing act when it is admitted that we here have not sole jurisdiction nor has the province, and we try to get around it by passing enabling legislation. I think the province of British Columbia passed legislation along somewhat similar lines. If the only legal decision up to date of any value going beyond magistrate's court is the one I have just cited, and that cannot be denied, what is the advice of the minister as to the legal status of the marketing act?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I have no advice to give in that connection. What I had reference to last night was that this was dealing specifically with the marketing act. The judgment given found the court divided.

Mr. NEILL: With the chief justice siding with the majority.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes. The case has been brought to the attention of the Department of Justice. I think everyone who has given any special attention to the question of a lot of this legislation, and the benefit of it while it has been in operation, realizes that it is a matter of the very first concern that all these acts do operate to a certain extent on the basis of enabling legislation. Under the marketing act there are certain things that can be done without enabling legislation of the province, but they may not be as complete and effective as if enabling legislation were passed. The matter is, as I stated before, under advisement by the Department of Justice. What their opinion is I do not know. I do not think they have come to a decision yet.

Mr. NEILL: In view of that does not the minister think it would be wise to have a close season on starting any more of these schemes until we get the opinion of the Department of Justice? Is it not better to go slow in starting any more schemes? We have thirteen on our hands now of doubtful validity, and it might be a good thing to have a close season for a little while.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If the producers of a natural product have voted on a scheme, can another scheme in regard to that product be voted on within a certain period?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Another scheme might be voted on at any time, depending on the scheme itself and all the circumstances.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I had in mind Manitoba particularly. The people there voted against the scheme that was proposed to them by the egg and poultry pool. As the minister knows, they voted strongly against it because the producers of that product in Manitoba are against the compulsory features of the act and in the scheme as it was presented to them. Suppose another scheme is presented with compulsory features; I hope that the minister will be very reluctant about adopting a scheme which will inconvenience the people of Manitoba in connection with that same product, putting them to the trouble of voting again. I believe there are three members on the dominion marketing board. Am I right?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Five.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I understand that in voting on these schemes there are two official languages, and I wish the minister would instruct the board that when they are taking a vote on any scheme in my riding, where there are many producers who do not understand English very well, he will see that the two languages are used so that it will be satisfactory to the people. This was not done on the last occasion.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Some schemes were printed in both languages and every care is taken to provide for those who spoke only French, or spoke French with greater facility than English. As regards the printing of the ballot in French, this was not done, but I agree with the hon. member that in cases such as this it might be made available in both languages when desired.

Mr. VENIOT: The other evening I referred to the pegging of prices, and my information, according to what I saw in the press, was that it had been abolished, that there was no pegged price now for potatoes. Is that correct?

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is correct.

Mr. VENIOT: On whose recommendation was the practice of pegging the price of potatoes abolished, and when was it abolished?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): On the advice of the advisory body of producers, on the first of May.

Mr. VENIOT: I understand that Mr. Cunningham of New Mills, New Brunswick, is the agent of the board. I see by the Royal Gazette that his address is given as New Hills; it is New Mills. What has he received in the way of compensation since he has been acting from, I believe, the first of January last, and from whom, and in what manner has he received it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would be decided by the local board. I have not the information here, but I shall be glad to get it and send it to the hon. member.

Mr. DONNELLY: Are any of these schemes in operation at the present time in Saskatchewan?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. DONNELLY: Will the minister tell me whether he has had any applications from the wheat growers to bring wheat under the scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed not.

Mr. DONNELLY: Last night, speaking on this bill, the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) went out of his way to deliver a campaign speech and he was allowed a great deal of latitude. I have no fault to find with that, but I expect to have the same privilege extended to me in discussing some of the subjects he dealt with. Some of the things the hon. gentleman said I heartily agree with. For example, he referred to the critical position of agriculture at the present time, and I absolutely agree with him. The agriculturist is indeed in a critical condition throughout the dominion wherever I have been, not only in the west but in eastern Canada as well. I agree with him also when he says that unless agriculture is made prosperous no industry can prosper. We are not yet out of the depression, and until agriculture is put on a sound and prosperous basis once more the country at large will not be prosperous. When the hon. gentleman says that Canadian agriculture must be made prosperous once more if Canadian industry generally is to return to prosperity, I heartily agree with him; but immediately after that, or at any rate during his speech, he began to advise the farmers of the west how to farm. I take issue with him there. Let me tell him first of all that the man who comes from the east, even though he may be a good farmer, will find it necessary to live in the west for one or two years at least before he knows how to farm—yes, before he knows how to farm.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is all very well for you to laugh, but I have seen better farmers than you come out west and they have discovered after two or three years that at first they had not known how to farm. I have farms in three or four different parts of western Canada and in no two sections do I farm land in the same way. In some places the land has to be farmed with a view to the consequences of drought; in other places the farmer has to take preventive measures against frost; in other sections again the land has to be farmed so as to keep down weeds, and so on. And when you come from eastern Canada knowing nothing about the conditions in the west and presume to tell us how to farm, well you have another guess coming. There are no better farmers anywhere in this world to-day than the western farmer, nor more intelligent. He knows how to farm, and he has taken the best methods of farming his land. All he wants, and he is demanding it, is that eastern Canadian industry shall get off his back and give him a chance to live. Get off his back and give him a chance to get along, and he will do so without subsidies or any help in the form of marketing schemes. He does not need these things. The hon. gentleman spoke about bonuses given to farmers, how they bonused them to the tune of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 in connection with freight rates, or something of that sort. Let me remind him that we paid in Saskatchewan in the year 1931 the sum of $29,000,000 in order to keep up Canadian industry. That is to say, we paid $29,000,000 more than we should have paid for the goods we purchased in the west, all on account of tariffs and other restrictions put on against us which prevented us from importing the things we needed. Not that we paid that duty; I do not mean that. I mean that we paid that much more to industry in Canada for our goods because of the duties and the restrictions which were imposed upon us. We were unable to buy in the cheapest markets, world markets, but had to buy under the conditions laid down by these tariffs and restrictions. Again I say, get off our backs and let us have a chance; let us buy these things in the open market. Some of you say that you have low tariffs, that the Liberals had much higher tariffs than the Conservatives.

An hon. MEMBER: Sure.

Mr. DONNELLY: Sure they did; and I suppose you will tell them at the same time that you reduced the tariff on liquor from $10 to $5 a gallon. And to make up the difference, what did you do? You put two cents a pound on sugar, and then you reduced it to one cent—you were ashamed of yourselves. Now we need money in this country, and if people want to drink liquor they have a right to pay a duty to the government. But when you put it on a necessity such as sugar and take it off liquor, a great deal of explanation to the people throughout the country is needed.

You did the same thing with cigarettes, and then you thought: Well, the fellow in the backwoods is so poor he has begun to roll his own, and so you went to work and put a tax on the paper, but you did not put it on the paper that the Imperial Tobacco Company is using; you let them go free. The poor fellow in the back concessions who buys his paper to roll his cigarettes has to pay the tax, while the poor Imperial Tobacco Company that is so hard up that it is paying $25,000, $35,000, $40,000 a year to nincompoops and then on top of that paying bonuses of $25,000 or $30,000 a year, is let off easily because it is too bad to hurt such people! That is the policy of the government all the way through.

Somebody suggests: What about matches? When this government came into power the price of wheat stood at ninety-six cents to $1 a bushel and the index price on matches at that time stood at 72 and a fraction; but in 1933 the price of wheat had dropped to forty cents a bushel while the index price on matches had gone up to 76. Was that not too bad? I wonder who are interested in matches. This year the government were afraid that the people were not using enough matches, so they put a tax on two-bit lighters. The man who buys a two-bit lighter has to pay the extra ten cents; they wanted to drive him to using matches instead of lighters. That is the situation which exists in Canada to-day, yet the government says: How solicitous we are for the poor man on the back concessions! They try to tell us how they are helping out the farmers, the poor people. They come here with a claim of this kind as they did last night. Let me say that not only is the tariff a cause of our losing markets and prices, but the policy of this government with regard to sound money has caused the farmers of this country to lose hundreds of millions of dollars in the last four years; let us not make any mistake about that. That has been the result of this foolish policy of sound money. Hon. members may laugh, but there is another story to that.

In October, 1932, the English pound stood at $3.60, and if I went over to the old country with a steer and got £10 for it, when I took that home I had $36. When President Roosevelt came into power and the United States went off the gold standard and reduced the amount of gold in their dollar to sixty cents, our dollar came on a parity with the English pound. What happened? If I go over to England with a steer to-day and get the same £10 for it, when I get home I have $48. Why were we not on a parity with the English pound all the way through? Why did the government put it on a parity with the United States dollar? Why did they send $50,000,000 in gold over there in 1932 to try to keep our dollar on a parity with theirs? Why did the government borrow $60 000,000 in order to try to keep our dollar on a parity with the United States dollar? Why? Because in this country there were rich men who had borrowed money in the United States and the government were looking after them and not after the poor man on the farm. It was a case of: Let the farmer pay.

Now they see an election coming and the government are solicitous for the farmers. My hon. friends are going out and crying what they are going to do for them. But that sort of thing is too late; it is no good. Even to-day our dollar should not be where it is. Who are the people with whom our farmers have to compete? They have to compete with Australia and the Argentine; those are the two agricultural countries with which our farmers have to compete. Our money should be on a parity, practically speaking, with that of Australia, and it would be if we had a proper policy in this country. The trouble is that we got some foolish notion that we had to have a balance of trade, a favourable balance of trade. Of all the foolish things that any economist ever heard of, it is this favourable balance of trade! All it does is to keep the home money as high as possible; that is all it does. What we should have is lower tariffs all the way through. Then let our dollar go where it will; let imports come in; then the value of our dollar will drop and in no time we shall be on a parity with Argentine money and Australian money; we will be getting the same as they are. What do we find? When I was getting $36 for that steer, the man from the Argentine was coming along with the very same kind of steer, selling it in England, getting the same £10, and then when he brought that money home, he got not $36 but in his money the same as $64. Our dollar to-day is worth practically only sixty cents in gold, not a dollar in gold as it was before. Do hon. members know any difference in the dollar to-day from what it was before? Not a bit. Does the man in the Argentine know any difference in his money from what it was before? Not a bit. Does the man in Australia know any difference in his pound from what it was before? Not a bit. The Australian, when he was selling the same kind of steer in England, getting the same £10 for it, when he took the money home was getting, not $36 but $60 in his own money. To-day when we are getting $48, the man in Australia is getting $60 and the man in the Argentine is getting $64, but this government are asking the people of this country to compete with those others. Is that fair, right or just? My hon. friends know it is not, but that is their policy all the way through.

Take down our tariff walls; let our money come down on a parity with the English pound. Why should we have the highest money in the world? Practically speaking we have the highest money in the world, and it has been at the top all along. The result is that it is crucifying the exporter all the way through; whether he be a farmer or a manufacturer, or whatever he may be, he is the man who has to pay the shot. This is the policy that this government has had and that has brought our farmers to the condition in which we find ourselves at the present time.

The stock argument of our Conservative friends apparently seems to be: See how markets were all lost under the Liberal government. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking in the house, told us about the restrictions placed against Canadian products in 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, and so on. All I want to say to him in the way of argument is this: If you look at the statistics for 1921 you will find that the trade of Canada amounted, in round figures, to $1,600,000,000; but if you look at the year 1929 you will find that it was $2,400,000,000. During that time Canada enjoyed greater prosperity than she ever enjoyed before; I defy anyone to contradict that statement. Where did we get the trade? We were the only country in the world at that time that had reduced tariffs; every other country had raised its tariffs; but in spite of that, Canada's trade increased by leaps and bounds until we became the fifth trading nation in the world. Then this Conservative government came in, and what happened? They raised our tariffs against other countries and immediately our trade began to fall away. We find that in 1932 it had gone down to $950,000,000, whereas in 1930 it had been $1,900,000,000. In 1933 it was about $950,000,000. From being the fifth trading nation in the world we fell away until we became the eleventh through the policy of this government. Yet they try to tell the people that under the Liberal government Canada lost all her markets. What market have we had for our wheat within the last few years? Our chief market has been England, but that market has been and is being lost day in and day out by the policy of this government.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: May I ask a question? If our tariff were wiped out—

Mr. DONNELLY: You make your speech later.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Even if our tariff were reduced to zero would that restore our markets?

Mr. DONNELLY: I do not know what the hon. member is talking about; I did not hear him so I cannot answer him. I say that the only open market we have, the market that has remained open for many years, is the English market, but day after day and week after week that market for our wheat has been lost. Why is it that Argentina has been able to increase her sales of wheat to England month by month during the past year and yet we are told that under our Ottawa agreements she must pay six cents a bushel duty before she can unload? Argentina has increased her exports to England while ours have gone down. Yet they tell us the Liberals lost it all. Let me tell you that the duty is of no account so far as France or Germany or certain European countries are concerned, because they are not allowed to import wheat except as they export some. For every bushel they export they are allowed to import a bushel, and they take Canadian wheat generally speaking because it is the strongest and best. Look at our exports to France and Germany and those countries to-day.

Mr. MacMILLAN (Saskatoon): Those markets were all closed to us when we came into office.

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, I am telling you that, and are still. But we are selling to them practically as much as we ever sold because they have to have our wheat, and when they export a bushel they are allowed to import one free of duty. That is the only wheat they are allowed to grind in those countries. So it is restrictions as well as duties that block us. In most of those countries the restrictions mean that they have to use one hundred per cent of the wheat they grow themselves in order to make the flour they use, but if they bring in wheat in exchange for their own they are allowed to grind that.

As far as exporting cattle is concerned, England is too far away from us in western Canada. As to the export and sale of butter, certainly we are selling more from western Canada than we ever sold, and we are making more. Back in 1920 to 1930 the people were so prosperous that they did not bother to sell butter; they used it for their cooking. To-day they are selling the butter and using dripping; they have to because they are so hard up. They have to do almost anything to make a nickel. This is a nickel government, that is what it is. Talk about a five cent piece; this government looks like a nickel! Well, the people of Canada figure it is time they called it quits and gave the people a chance to operate, and when they do it will be just too bad. They will never get over the operation; they will die on the table.

In conclusion I will just say that when this government came into office there was a state of unemployment, and it was claimed that in the dominion there were about 117,000 people unemployed.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the marketing act?

Mr. DONNELLY: We are told continually by hon. members on the other side of the house that Canada has stood the depression as well as any other country. What about our unemployment? Surely that is the index. Well, in 1929 we had 117,000 and now we have about a million on relief. Five countries in the world have reduced their unemployment until to-day it is less than twice what it was in 1929. Those five are England, Australia, Japan, Sweden and Belgium. What about ourselves? As I said, we had 117,000 unemployed when this government came into office and now we have over a million people on relief. I do not know whether that takes into consideration our farmers in western Canada; I do not think it does. In my district ninety-eight per cent of our farmers are on relief. I do not know that any government could affect that; I do not think they could, because it is due to climatic conditions. We hope and trust that this year we shall have a crop, and the prospect seems good. But what are we going to do with it when we get it—a crop of perhaps four hundred to five hundred million bushels, when this government has not been able to market a crop of two hundred to three hundred million in the last five years? We have not had normal crops ever since they have been in office, but year after year our surplus has piled up. What can this marketing act do for us? We had a vote on it in western Canada, and the people in my district almost to a man voted against it. They had a recollection of the operations of a poultry pool down there, and this pool had a monopoly. They came in there and gathered up the eggs and paid the farmers five cents a dozen. Suddenly some trucks came in and began to compete, and then what did we find? We found that the moment they began to compete the price of eggs shot up within one week to nine or ten cents. Those people said: We do not want any cooperative having a monopoly on eggs and poultry, because this is what will happen if they ever get this marketing act applied. They claim that the overhead is too great. If, for example, a man is getting $7,000 a year as the head of the pool and we are selling eggs at five cents a dozen, it will take several loads of eggs to pay his salary. It is going to be hard on the hens.

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): What about the turkeys?

Mr. DONNELLY: Yes, we have turkeys.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the geese?

Mr. DONNELLY: The turkeys are bought and crated and shipped under the pool. I was there and saw them myself being loaded in the car, the finest turkeys in the world; do not make any mistake about that. For the best turkeys, specials, we received nine cents a pound back there; for A grade we received seven cents; for B grade, six cents, and for C grade, four cents. We boxed them and sent them to England. We sent our Prime Minister and another bird over there to look after the marketing. He came back and they told us in the House of Commons that we had received the best price ever for our turkeys, that they brought thirty cents a pound in England. The farmer received ten cents. Where did the rest of the money go? It all went in overhead. In these cases the overhead is absolutely out of reason, and that is why the people are against these things. They do not want monopolies; they want competition of some kind, because they claim that competition will bring them a better price than any monopoly.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: Just a short time ago I asked the last speaker a question in what I thought was a very gentlemanly manner, but he answered me in such an uncalled for way that it calls for a speech on my part, and I did not intend to make a speech. The hon. member introduced the tariff element into this discussion. Possibly that has not so much bearing on the Natural Products Marketing Act as we would like it to have, but it was mentioned by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) and the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly). I asked the last speaker whether he thought that by lowering the tariff on all the items in the schedule we would restore our lost markets and find new markets for our wheat. When I asked that question the hon. member for Willow Bunch said I did not know what I was talking about.

Mr. DONNELLY: Pardon me; what I said was that I did not know what you were talking about. I could not hear you.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: I spoke quite loudly. Possibly the hon. member for Willow Bunch wanted to be conveniently deaf at the time I asked that question, because it is indeed pertinent to the subject he discussed. Up in my district farmers are asking that question every day, as to whether a lowering of the tariff would restore the European market for our Alberta wheat. According to my recollection, in 1929 a binder cost just as much as a binder costs at the present time, so out there we do not feel that the tariff has done as much for the farmers as the hon. member for Willow Bunch and others who hold the same views would like us to believe.

There are gentlemen in my district who are telling the farmers that if they elect a Liberal government not only will the old markets be restored but new markets will be found. I wonder where they are going to find new markets at the present time. Are they going to send that colossal genius Bob Deachman, who I understand is a candidate in one of the Huron ridings, and the hon. member for Weyburn down to the Fiji islands to teach the natives there how to bake bread? Are they going to send the histrionic member for Vancouver Centre to inveigle them out of their present food habits? Or are they going to employ the editorial pen of the lugubrious gentleman from North Battleford to stop the Chinese raising rice and make shredded wheat and pancakes all the rage in that country? For the life of me I cannot understand where they are going to find these new markets. The hon. member for Melville well said that there is a glut on all the markets, that there is a surplus of wheat throughout the world at the present time which has prevented us from sending our Canadian wheat to the European market. If the other members of the party to which the hon. member for Melville belongs would only say that on the stump instead of promising that when they get into power mushrooms will grow under every blade of grass and this country will be with milk and honey blessed, I think we would be much further ahead than by listening to outworn arguments such as the free traders are preaching throughout the country at the present time

I believe there is an essential difference between Conservatism radicalism and Conservatism liberalism. I did not rise either to praise or to bury the government that introduced this marketing act. Personally I feel, like the hon. member for Melville, that this is a step in the right direction. Perhaps mistakes may have been made in certain particulars, but I certainly feel that it is a step in the right direction. It has been introduced from the point of view of what I have designated as conservative radicalism, and as between that and conservative liberalism I prefer the conservative radical application of the act as it is now presented to the House of Commons. After all, what is radicalism? It comes from the word "radix", which means the root. In other words radicalism means nothing more than going to the root of the problem, and I feel that this Natural Products Marketing Act goes to the root of the problem at the present time. I do not believe in the methods of those political dinosaurs and dodos who live in an age that is past, who still believe that by a policy of laissez-faire we can restore prosperity to this country. We are living in a changed world; there is no question about that, but they still chant the old slogans and apply them to new policies, and the thing is absolutely impossible. The farmers of my part of the country feel that we must approach this problem from a more radical point of view, whether that point of view be conservative radicalism or the point of view that we in this corner of the house have expressed. As a member of the United Farmers of Alberta I should like to go into the matter a little more radically than the government have done up to the present. Economics and government must be brought into better co-ordination.

I cannot see, as some members of this house claim to see, that we are going to restore prosperity by some system of lowering tariffs. That is not enough. Certainly I will vote for any reduction in the tariff. When the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) introduced a resolution calling on the government to lower or remove the duty on farm implements and machinery I was prepared to vote for that resolution. I was quite surprised, however, when in one breath the hon. member defended low tariffs and in the next breath said, "Well, this might not bring about any lower prices of machinery because of the system of combines that we have in this and other countries, which will prevent any decreases in the prices of machinery." Well, why not be practical about it; why not tackle the fundamental problems? Why not tackle the combines, the trusts and all those other ramifications that are doing so much to prevent the return of prosperity to this country? I think the Natural Products Marketing Act is a step in the right direction; personally I support it, and I believe the great majority of the farmers in my district are advocating it also.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, I have not taken up much time this session so I do not think I should be criticized for saying a few words now. On March 18 I requested certain information from the Minister of Agriculture, which he was kind enough to furnish. I made reference to the fact that last year in northern Ontario we had a bumper hay crop. Within the last three weeks I have visited nearly every section of that part of the country, and I must tell the committee that there are tens of thousands of tons of hay there unsold at the present time. The people in that part of the country, whether rightly or wrongly, blame the government for the present state of affairs so far as the hay market is concerned. I mentioned on a previous occasion that early last fall, after the farmers and settlers began to press their hay, we had in the Canadian market some American buyers. In those weeks our farmers were selling their hay on cars at an average price of $15 per ton. The minister was kind enough to tell us that the Americans took restrictions off the importation of hay to their own country, but that the federal government licensed the buyer. The reason indicated by the minister was that of maintaining a higher price. We know that last summer there was a drought in western Canada, and that to some extent the same condition existed in New Brunswick and Ontario. I do not believe the minister was explicit enough in the statement he made on March 18; his statement has not been clear enough to satisfy the people in my constituency. He stated that it would be impossible for us to ship our hay to the three western provinces affected by the drought. Due to the restriction imposed by the federal government, and the licensing of the American buyer, these agents in Canada immediately ceased to buy our hay. To-day it is a drug on the market; you cannot give it away.

I do not know whether or not the marketing act has affected the situation, but I must say that in the past twenty or twenty-five years we have paid very high prices for hay purchased in eastern Canada. In those days we did not obtain help from the federal government, nor was there any attempt made to help pay the price. At the present time the people in my constituency are paying more for Canadian wheat, Canadian flour and Canadian grain because of governmental activities. We do not begrudge the expenditure, because we want to see the western farmer prosper. But surely the federal government should not place a restriction against our agricultural production when practically the only natural market we have for our hay is in the United States. I know the minister wishes to be fair in his statement, but I must say to him sincerely that the statement he made was not satisfactory to my section of the country. If to-morrow we could sell the hay in northern Ontario at an average of $12.50 or $15 per ton, ninety per cent of our settlers would be taken off relief. They have to be maintained, however, because they cannot sell their hay crop.

I trust the minister will give a satisfactory answer to my question. I believe action has been taken which has had the effect of restricting hay export to the American market. I trust the minister will reply so that I shall be able to give a satisfactory answer to my constituents. I am not speaking politically, but am addressing the minister broadly and am taking the wider view. Undoubtedly the minister is well aware of my stand in the matter.

There is another point to which I should like to bring the minister's attention. When the people in my constituency buy fruit from the Niagara peninsula or from some other of the older sections of the province a flat express rate of 32 cents per basket is charged for transportation from those older sections to northern Ontario. Naturally we are satisfied with that charge, but when the people in northern Ontario wish to ship their natural fruits, such as blueberries, the gathering of which constitutes a local industry, and particularly at points such as Iroquois Falls and Porcupine, we find that we must pay a rate of more than 60 cents on baskets of the same size as those in which fruit is shipped from the older sections. The minister will readily appreciate that an injustice is done our shippers. The blueberry industry employs hundreds of people during the summer months when the fruit is ripening, and I believe the marketing board should take steps to adjust the rates on shipments from northern Ontario to the older sections of the province. The minister will readily realize what the rate means to the growers in the Porcupine district which at the present time has a population of nearly 50,000 people, and is increasing by leaps and bounds. I trust the minister will see that we receive reciprocal treatment in the shipment of our fruit. These are practical questions which should be answered in a manner satisfactory to the people of northern Ontario.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate the opportunity now given me to correct what is no doubt a wrong impression concerning the restrictions placed upon the export of hay which, it is suggested, have interfered with the market in the hon. member's district. When I made my answer I had in mind the fact that due to the very high freight rates it would be impossible profitably to ship hay from his section of the country to western Canada. Last year there was a very definite scarcity of feed in certain districts of eastern and western Canada, and upon the representations of different organizations it was thought advisable to have some provisions whereby governments undertaking relief would not be left in such a position that there would not be sufficient fodder to feed live stock. The provision made to protect against this condition was a very generous one. Every possible effort was made to facilitate and expedite the issuing of a licence. Any man with a legitimate sale of hay could apply for a licence and in every case in eastern Canada I understand such licence was granted. No licences were refused, and I believe it was made clear that no licence would be refused to a man who had a legitimate sale of hay, unless conditions should arise where the scarcity of feed was such that there was not sufficient feed available to supply the live stock. Even then licences would not be refused but the province interested would be given permission to buy at the same price. I appreciate the opportunity the hon. member has given me, and I have confidence in his fairness. Undoubtedly he will take the first opportunity to correct any wrong impression in his constituency. I have made a note of his observations regarding express rates, but I must say that such matters would not come within the administration of the marketing act. The situation he has described seems almost incredible, and I appreciate his having brought it to the attention of the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: It is my understanding of the act that a provincial board may prevent the products of one province from entering another.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is not my understanding. I believe there is no provision through which that restriction could be imposed.

Mr. POULIOT: There is no provision in the act to that effect, but boards are given that jurisdiction. They may prevent the goods of one province from entering another.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am afraid the hon. member is in error. I should be pleased to have him submit a specific instance.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the item is carried I have something further to say. This act is essentially parochial, and it is against the terms of the British North America Act. We have a Minister of Agriculture in Ottawa to facilitate trade between provinces and with other countries, and therefore the act in its present form is in my judgment against the spirit of the British North America Act. This is a very serious matter which I have brought to the attention of the committee. Soon we will have the opportunity to submit it to the people.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, may I have the consent of the house to revert to the order, Introduction of Bills, in order that a bill standing on the order paper may be advanced one stage by being given a first reading?

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 88, to amend the Admiralty Act, 1934.

He said: May I explain, Mr. Speaker, that in the Admiralty Act passed last session there is a provision that an appeal from the local judge in admiralty shall be heard by two judges of the exchequer court. The president of the exchequer court has pointed out that it is very seldom there are two exchequer court judges in the city who could hear the appeal, and this amendment is merely to restore the old practice that such an appeal may be heard by one exchequer court judge.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, June 10, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

SANTO DOMINGO TARIFF

Mr. BENNETT: On May 27 the hon member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) moved for the production of papers. These papers subject to the limitation which I then expressed, are now presented. A number of the dispatches are of a confidential character.

BANK OF CANADA ACT

On the order for the introduction by Mr. Reid of a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act:

Mr. SPEAKER: I will now give a decision on the motion of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) for leave to introduce a bill. When the hon. member for New Westminster moved on Thursday last for leave to introduce the bill standing on the order paper in his name—an act to amend the Bank of Canada Act—he stated in part, as reported at page 3338 of Hansard, that "There are two changes contemplated in the proposed bill; the first is to amend paragraph (b), subsection 3 of section 25, and would empower the minister to purchase silver for the redemption of dominion notes."

If it is true that the bill will do what its sponsor states, empower the minister to purchase silver, then it will be generally agreed that it is out of order on the ground that a private member cannot introduce a measure which involves the expenditure of public moneys.

Upon looking up original section 25, I find that paragraph (b) of subsection 3 of the Bank of Canada Act, reads as follows:

3. On the day on which the bank is authorized to commence business the minister shall transfer to the bank—

(b) silver held by the minister for the redemption of dominion notes valued at the market price of the fine silver content thereof.

Mr. Reid's amendment proposes to add to subsection (b) just referred to the following words:

and at any time thereafter the minister may transfer to the bank silver held by him for the redemption of dominion notes or hereafter purchased for the redemption of dominion notes valued at the market price of the fine silver content.

The original section as just quoted provides that "on the day on which the bank is authorized to commence business, the minister shall transfer to the bank silver held by him for the redemption of dominion notes." The amendment provides that "any time thereafter the minister may transfer to the bank silver held by him for the redemption of dominion notes or hereafter purchased for the redemption of dominion notes," etcetera.

While I do not think the amendment goes as far as the hon. member suggests, that is "empowers" the minister to purchase silver, it certainly contemplates the purchase of further silver by the minister and does empower the transfer of silver held by him to the bank.

The purchase of silver by the government certainly involves the expenditures of government moneys. Speaking of silver in the narrow sense as "money," its transfer from the minister to the bank, as authorized by the proposed amendment, involves the expenditure of public moneys. It is quite clear that legislation involving the expenditure of public moneys can only be introduced by a responsible minister of the crown upon the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General. On the ground that the expenditure of public moneys is involved the amending motion is out of order.

It is, in my opinion, also out of order on a second ground. Giving silver the wider meaning of "property" its transfer as proposed by the amendment involves the disposal or alienation of crown property. No private member may introduce a measure for this purpose without first having asked the house to agree to an address for leave to proceed thereon, such leave to be obtained prior to the introduction of the bill. (See Bourinot 4th edition, page 414.) No such leave has been obtained.

I therefore rule that the motion to introduce the bill in question is out of order.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the thought and the great care you have given the matter, and also the fairness with which you have dealt with it. But I must say I am disappointed at being prohibited from introducing this bill.

[Mr. Speaker.]

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

OREGON BOUNDARY

Mr. REID:

According to a treaty entered into in 1846 between the United States of America and Her Majesty on behalf of Canada for the settlement of the Oregon boundary, in clause 2 thereof, it was expressly agreed that the Columbia river and its branches were to be kept open for the free use and navigation of all British subjects from the 49th parallel of north latitude to the Pacific ocean,—

1. Is the government aware that the provisions of this clause have been violated?
2. If so, what steps have been taken to protect the interests of the Canadian people so as to keep inviolate the provisions of the treaty and particularly clause 2 of the agreement?
3. If not, will steps be taken to see that the terms of the treaty are lived up to in every particular?

Mr. BENNETT: We are obtaining further information in respect to Question No. 4. It is, as I said the other day, a matter of some difficulty from the international standpoint.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the question stand?

Mr. BENNETT: Stands.

RADIO COMMISSION AUTOMOBILES

Mr. TOTZKE:

1. Have any automobiles been purchased by the radio commission for the use of any of the commissioners?
2. If so, what makes and at what prices?
3. Have any automobiles been rented by the commission for the use of any of the commissioners?
4. If so, what makes of cars, and at what rental?
5. Has an automobile been purchased in Ottawa and shipped to Vancouver for the use of one of the commission's inspectors?
6. If so, what was make of car, price of purchase and cost of transportation?

Mr. DURANLEAU:

The following information has been furnished by the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Commission:

1. No.

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the following convention between Canada and the United States relating to certain complaints arising from the operation of the smelter at Trail, British Columbia, signed at Ottawa on the 15th day of April, 1935.

Convention Between Canada and the United States

Relating to Certain Complaints Arising from the Operation of the Smelter at Trail, B.C.

Ottawa, April 15, 1935.

His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, in respect of the Dominion of Canada, and The President of the United States of America.

Considering that the government of the United States has complained to the government of Canada that fumes discharged from the smelter of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company at Trail, British Columbia, have been causing damage in the state of Washington, and

Considering further that the international joint commission, established pursuant to the Boundary Waters treaty of 1909, investigated problems arising from the operation of the smelter at Trail and rendered a report and recommendations thereon, dated February 28, 1931, and

Recognizing the desirability and necessity of effecting a permanent settlement,

Have decided to conclude a convention for the purposes aforesaid, and to that end have named as their respective plenipotentiaries:

His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, for the Dominion of Canada:

The Right Honourable Richard Bedford Bennett, Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Secretary of State for External Affairs;

The President of the United States of America:

Pierre de L. Boal, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the United States of America at Ottawa;

Who, after having communicated to each other their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

Article I

The government of Canada will cause to be paid to the secretary of state of the United States, to be deposited in the United States treasury, within three months after ratifications of this convention have been exchanged, the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, United States currency, in payment of all damage which occurred in the United States, prior to the first day of January, 1932, as a result of the operation of the Trail smelter.

Article II

The governments of Canada and the United States, hereinafter referred to as "the governments," mutually agree to constitute a tribunal hereinafter referred to as "the tribunal," for the purpose of deciding the questions referred to it under the provisions of article III. The tribunal shall consist of a chairman and two national members.

The chairman shall be a jurist of repute who is neither a British subject nor a citizen of the United States. He shall be chosen by the governments, or, in the event of failure to reach agreement within nine months after the exchange of ratifications of this convention, by the president of the permanent administrative council of the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague described in article 49 of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes concluded at The Hague on October 18, 1907.

The two national members shall be jurists of repute, who have not been associated directly or indirectly, in the present controversy. One member shall be chosen by each of the governments.

The governments may each designate a scientist to assist the tribunal.

Article III

The tribunal shall finally decide the questions, hereinafter referred to as "the questions," set forth hereunder, namely:—

(1) Whether damage caused by the Trail smelter in the state of Washington has occurred since the first day of January, 1932, and, if so, what indemnity should be paid therefor?

(2) In the event of the answer to the first part of the preceding question being in the affirmative, whether the Trail smelter should be required to refrain from causing damage in the state of Washington in the future and, if so, to what extent?

(3) In the light of the answer to the preceding question, what measures or regime, if any, should be adopted or maintained by the Trail smelter?

(4) What indemnity or compensation, if any, should be paid on account of any decision or decisions rendered by the tribunal pursuant to the next two preceding questions?

Article IV

The tribunal shall apply the law and practice followed in dealing with cognate questions in the United States of America as well as international law and practice, and shall give consideration to the desire of the high contracting parties to reach a solution just to all parties concerned.

Article V

The procedure in this adjudication shall be as follows:—

1. Within nine months from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this agreement, the agent for the government of the United States shall present to the agent for the government of Canada a statement of the facts, together with the supporting evidence, on which the government of the United States rests its complaint and petition.

2. Within a like period of nine months from the date on which this agreement becomes effective, as aforesaid, the agent for the government of Canada shall present to the agent for the government of the United States a statement of the facts, together with the supporting evidence, relied upon by the government of Canada.

3. Within six months from the date on which the exchange of statements and evidence provided for in paragraphs 1 and 2 of this article has been completed, each agent shall present in the manner prescribed by paragraphs 1 and 2 an answer to the statement of the other with any additional evidence and such argument as he may desire to submit.

Article VI

When the development of the record is completed in accordance with article V hereof the governments shall forthwith cause to be forwarded to each member of the tribunal a complete set of the statements, answers, evidence and arguments presented by their respective agents to each other.

Article VII

After the delivery of the record to the members of the tribunal in accordance with article VI the tribunal shall convene at a time and place to be agreed upon by the two governments for the purpose of deciding upon such further procedure as it may be deemed necessary to take. In determining upon such further procedure and arranging subsequent meetings, the tribunal will consider the individual or joint requests of the agents of the two governments.

Article VIII

The tribunal shall hear such representations and shall receive and consider such evidence, oral or documentary, as may be presented by the governments or by interested parties, and for that purpose shall have power to administer oaths. The tribunal shall have authority to make such investigations as it may deem necessary and expedient, consistent with other provisions of this convention.

Article IX

The chairman shall preside at all hearings and other meetings of the tribunal, and shall rule upon all questions of evidence and procedure. In reaching a final determination of each or any of the questions, the chairman and the two members shall each have one vote, and, in the event of difference, the opinion of the majority shall prevail, and the dissent of the chairman or member, as the case may be, shall be recorded. In the event that no two members of the tribunal agree on a question, the chairman shall make the decision.

Article X

The tribunal, in determining the first question and in deciding upon the indemnity, if any, which should be paid in respect to the years 1932 and 1933, shall give due regard to the results of investigations and inquiries made in subsequent years.

Investigators, whether appointed by or on behalf of the governments, either jointly or severally, or the tribunal, shall be permitted at all reasonable times to enter and view and carry on investigations upon any of the properties upon which damage is claimed to have occurred or to be occurring, and their reports may, either jointly or severally, be submitted to and received by the tribunal for the purpose of enabling the tribunal to decide upon any of the questions.

Article XI

The tribunal shall report to the governments its final decisions, together with the reasons on which they are based, as soon as it has reached its conclusions in respect to the questions, and within a period of three months after the conclusion of proceedings. Proceedings shall be deemed to have been concluded when the agents of the two governments jointly inform the tribunal that they have nothing additional to present. Such period may be extended by agreement of the two governments.

Upon receiving such report, the governments may make arrangements for the disposition of claims for indemnity for damage, if any, which may occur subsequently to the period of time covered by such report.

Article XII

The governments undertake to take such action as may be necessary in order to ensure due performance of the obligations undertaken hereunder, in compliance with the decision of the tribunal.

Article XIII

Each government shall pay the expenses of the presentation and conduct of its case before the tribunal and the expenses of its national member and scientific assistant.

All other expenses, which by their nature are a charge on both governments, including the honorarium of the neutral member of the tribunal, shall be borne by the two governments in equal moieties.

Article XIV

This agreement shall be ratified in accordance with the constitutional forms of the contracting parties and shall take effect immediately upon the exchange of ratifications, which shall take place at Ottawa as soon as possible.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Ottawa this fifteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord, one thousand, nine hundred and thirty-five.

(L.S.) R. B. Bennett.
(L.S.) Pierre De L. Boal.

And that this house do approve of the same

He said: Mr. Speaker, the convention which this house is asked to ratify deals with an agreement arrived at between the governments of the United States and Canada with respect to a matter that has been the subject of controversy for many years. When this government came into office in August, 1930, the subject matter of the dispute had been under consideration by the international joint commission who made a report in 1931, in which they recommended that $350,000 should be paid the farmers and others in the state of Washington who had suffered under the circumstances to which I shall presently refer.

As is well known the smelter at Trail is near the boundary line between Canada and the United States. In the course of its operations the chimneys emit large quantities of smoke which is heavily laden with poisonous substances that affect vegetation very adversely. Those members of this house who have visited one of the islands off the Pacific coast will recall that as they approached the harbour they observed that the vegetation had been entirely destroyed by the fumes from the smelter at that point. Prevailing winds carried the gases emitted from the chimneys of the smelter into the United States, and of course they had the effect of seriously injuring the vegetation of that area over which they circulated. The grasses, grains, flowers and to some extent the trees were greatly injured by these fumes and the farmers of the United States, through their government, claimed that the loss was substantial.

An agreement was arrived at between the two governments, the government of Canada and the government of the United States, by which the international joint commission investigated the matter as I have indicated, but those findings were not final; the commission acted only in an advisory capacity and not for the purpose of rendering a final judgment. The sum of $250,000 was recommended to be paid; the finding in that regard was unanimous, but the citizens of the locality affected in the state of Washington complained that this was not adequate and that the principles upon which the international joint commission had proceeded did not fully take into consideration the circumstances in connection with the injuries sustained. Much discussion has taken place; finally this convention has been arrived at. The $350,000 is to be taken on account, so to speak, up to the date indicated by the convention. That money, of course, is not provided by the Dominion of Canada; it is provided by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company and has been made available to the government of Canada for payment to the United States.

The provisions of the convention to which particular attention should be directed are found in articles II and III. In article II it will be observed that a tribunal is to be constituted, to consist of a chairman and two national members. The article continues:

The chairman shall be a jurist of repute who is neither a British subject nor a citizen of the United States. He shall be chosen by the governments, or, in the event of failure to reach agreement within nine months after the exchange of ratifications of this convention, by the president of the permanent administrative council of the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague described in article 49 of the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes concluded at The Hague on October 18, 1907.

The two national members shall be jurists of repute, who have not been associated directly or indirectly, in the present controversy. One member shall be chosen by each of the governments.

What they are to determine is set out in the questions mentioned in article III, as follows:

(1) Whether damage caused by the Trail smelter in the state of Washington has occurred since the first day of January, 1932, and, if so, what indemnity should be paid therefor?

(2) In the event of the answer to the first part of the preceding question being in the affirmative, whether the Trail smelter should be required to refrain from causing damage in the state of Washington in the future and, if so, what extent?

(3) In the light of the answer to the preceding question, what measures or régime, if any, should be adopted or maintained by the Trail smelter?

I think perhaps the house is not concerned at the moment except with respect to the two articles I have mentioned; that is, the circumstances under which the tribunal is coming into being, the personnel of the tribunal and the questions to be determined. I need hardly say to the house that the financial obligations under which this country may be placed by reason of any determination of this tribunal will be paid by the smelter company affected under an arrangement that has been made with them.

The question as to why the Dominion of Canada should be in the matter at all received very careful consideration before this government came into office, and it was felt that the only method by which the claim made by nationals of our neighbour could be disposed of satisfactorily would be through some action taken by the national government of this country on the one hand and of the United States on the other. When the international joint commission reported up to the end of 1931, the matter now is being treated as having been concluded up to that point, and the payment of money is being made for the liabilities that resulted from the poisonous fumes circulating in the state of Washington up to the date of that award.

I do not think there are any other questions calling for consideration in connection with this convention. If there are I shall be very glad to endeavour to answer them. I may add that the convention has been ratified by the senate of the United States.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): I am not just clear as to whether the $350,000 is settlement in full up to 1932, because I understand that there has been considerable damage since then.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Article 1 provides:

> The government of Canada will cause to be paid to the secretary of state of the United States, to be deposited in the United States treasury, within three months after ratifications of this convention have been exchanged, the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, United States currency, in payment of all damage which occurred in the United States, prior to the first day of January, 1932, as a result of the operation of the Trail smelter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I only asked the question because at one stage of his address the Prime Minister remarked that this was an interim payment. It is settlement in full?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, up to that date.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I realize that we are not in committee, but I should like my right hon. friend to say whether in its report the international joint commission recommended the appointment of a tribunal such as the one provided for by this convention. Is there any particular reason why there should be a special tribunal, because the international joint commission itself, under the law, has authority to deal with such matters when they are submitted to that body by one or other of the two governments?

Mr. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I believe it is only necessary to say that the United States was not prepared to accept the international joint commission as the tribunal to deal with this matter. Perhaps it will be recalled by the right hon. gentleman opposite that it was agreed between the two nations that the conclusion arrived at by the international joint commission with respect to damage up to January 1, 1932 would be advisory, rather than in the nature of a judgment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask if any of the cost of the new tribunal will have to be borne by this government, or by the smelters corporation?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall know nothing until the finding is made. So far as we are concerned they will be indemnified by the corporation.

Mr. POULIOT: In view of what has been said by the leader of the government may I ask if anything has been done by the government in connection with the commuter's problem in Windsor? Nothing has been done?

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN GRAIN BOARD

PURCHASE, STORAGE AND MARKETING OF WHEAT AND OTHER GRAINS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to establish a board to be known as the Canadian grain board with power to purchase, receive and take delivery of wheat, oats, barley, rye and flax-seed, or any one or more of such grains for marketing and to sell, store, transport and market such grains, and to provide for the appointment of such clerks, employees and assistance as may be necessary, and to provide for their remuneration and for the expenses of, and arising out of, the operations of the board.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to make a lengthy speech to-day upon this matter, or at any rate at this stage, because obviously what I might say would probably be in response to questions which might be asked, and it is perfectly clear that there is no opportunity to do that in the mere movement of the house into committee to consider the resolution.

I think possibly I should say that once in this country we had a grain board brought about, of course, by the exigencies of the war. The situation at the present time, without going into the matter in detail, is that this country has not been able to market all its wheat, and that there is a large surplus of unsold wheat, or an accumulation of surpluses beginning in 1929 and followed by a further large carryover in 1930 and in succeeding years, by reason of large crops.

I shall not at the moment deal with the political side of the observations which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite, because the matter is far too serious to discuss from the standpoint of narrow party politics. I should like to say however that I am prepared to give the committee the fullest information as to the world movement of wheat to indicate, notwithstanding what has been said notably by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) that tariffs had something to do in preventing the sale of wheat in France and Germany. If the hon. member would just look at the imports into France, the imports into Germany and the imports into Italy I think he would probably arrive at a different conclusion. All that is necessary to do is to point out that there has been no diminution in the use of wheat by the people of the world and that, for instance in 1934 the entire wheat purchases by France were from Canada, with the exception of 1,000,000 bushels. All the wheat France imported from abroad, with the exception of something like 1,000,000 bushels, came from Canada, and that of the importations into Germany the greater part came from Canada. But those importations were very trifling. For instance, in the last five years the largest sale of wheat to France was 31,000,000 bushels. That was a period of time, of course, when France was not herself producing ample wheat for her own requirements.

I have already traversed this matter on more than one occasion, and to-day I desire only to make this simple observation, that owing to the result of post-war action on the part of countries which were formerly wheat importing countries they have placed themselves in a position where to a very large extent they are free from the necessity of importing wheat from any country. For instance to-day France is a large exporter of wheat. In the year 1934 she exported large quantities of both wheat and flour to Great Britain and to other parts of the world. I suppose it must be known to hon. members that in this present year France is exporting wheat,—denatured wheat,—to the United States under the world's wheat agreement. I might add that the Pontine marshes of Italy, now available for the production of wheat, has placed under cultivation thousands of acres which never before produced wheat, and the use of fertilizers has increased the yield per acre in Germany to an extent even greater than it was before the war.

The essential fact for us to recall is that the countries of Europe which during the war did not produce wheat found themselves dependent upon the countries which did increase their production, notably Canada, and that unfortunately for us for some strange reason we did not realize that in 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929 and 1930 the countries of Europe had recovered their pre-war position—not only recovered it, but greatly strengthened it, and were supplying not only their own requirements but were also on an export basis.

Under these circumstances the position was a very simple one. The question was whether or not chaos should reign in respect to the largest industry we have, in point of value of exports, or whether something should be done to endeavour to save it from the chaotic condition prevailing. Something was done. It may be that there is some desire to discuss the matter at length. I am prepared to do it in every detail and in every particular. It will be recalled that when before a committee opportunity was afforded for discussing the matter in detail, by a majority vote it was decided that such discussion would not be in the public interest. The determining factor at that time in the committee was hon. gentlemen opposite.

But eliminating that consideration for the moment I am merely pointing out that the world has been producing so much more wheat than it has been consuming that there is a large surplus, and that that surplus must be taken care of by some orderly method or we will have a complete dislocation of the whole wheat industry in Canada. We might as well face it frankly. I am not going to dwell upon these matters at this time further than to say that there were certain well defined conditions which during war time necessitated the creation of a wheat board. At the present time we have a condition whereby we have large quantities of wheat unsold. We and the rest of the world, namely the wheat producing countries of the world, have a substantial surplus of wheat over world requirements, but, as I have stated previously I shall not go into a detailed discussion of the matter at this time. I merely state that I am in a position to give the figures when they are required.

I desire to direct the attention of the house to the particulars of the resolution itself. Assuming that the house is of the opinion that it is desirable in the public interest that there should be a board to deal with the most extraordinary situation that has ever existed in regard to wheat so far as we have a record, because it will be recalled that the price of wheat in 1932-33 reached the lowest point in four hundred years—there is a complete record of the price of wheat in the various parts of the world for over four hundred years, and as I say wheat never reached a lower price in five hundred years than it did in 1932-33—under those circumstances, and with the surplus now existing it becomes essential to deal with the situation in some orderly manner. To the extent to which it may be possible to do so except through a wheat board I shall be very glad indeed to hear opinions expressed by members of this house. But if we conclude, as I believe the house will, that a wheat board is essential, then you ask yourself two simple questions: First, what power has this parliament to create such a board; and second, what shall be its powers?

With respect to the first, there has been a modification of the legal position by reason of the fact that the Grain Act was amended when it was decided by the supreme court, by a majority with the Chief Justice dissenting, that the Grain Act was ultra vires in so far as certain sections of it were concerned; and it was indicated that it could be made intra vires if the facilities or elevators were declared to be works for the general advantage of Canada. And so, under section 233 of the Grain Act, as consolidated in 1927, the declaration is made that these elevators, which are usually on the right of way of various railway companies, are works for the general advantages of Canada.

The bill predicated upon this resolution would limit its operation to interprovincial and international trade. It would not seek to deal with purely domestic trade in any one province for that might be entirely beyond our jurisdiction.

The next question is, what shall be the powers of the board? The board will be empowered, as the resolution indicates, to deal with wheat as buyers and sellers and the sole marketers of it for the purpose of ensuring that it shall find at least as large a market as possible under the circumstances that now exist.

That is all that can be usefully said on the resolution itself, but at the appropriate time I shall make a more extensive statement than that which I have now made.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my purpose is not to discuss the resolution but rather to ask my right hon. friend a question as to his intentions in the matter of procedure. It has, I think, been customary in connection with a measure of this importance to have it referred either to one of the select standing committees of this house, in this case I presume it would be the committee on agriculture, or to a special committee. If we knew at this stage the intention of the government in the matter it would enable us to govern ourselves accordingly in the discussion on the resolution.

May I say that I agree with the Prime Minister that this question is far too serious to be dealt with in any narrow partisan manner. I believe it is as serious as any problem which has faced this country at any time, and too great care cannot be taken in the consideration of what is to be done. It is for that reason I feel that if the government could see its way to refer the bill to a select or special committee it is wholly probable that some of the points which may be obscure at the moment would be cleared up and possibly much in the way of confusion and controversy avoided.

As I read the resolution it is in very general terms, and does not go beyond recommending the establishment of a board. We shall not know what powers the board will have other than has been indicated thus far by the Prime Minister until we see the bill itself, and differences of view that otherwise might arise might perhaps be wholly avoided if the powers of the board were settled in a committee in advance. I therefore am asking the Prime Minister if he would say to the house that when the resolution carries and the bill has been introduced it would be understood that it would be referred to a select committee. If not, I may say that on the resolution itself a great deal of information will necessarily have to be sought.

May I say that, while to-day the Prime Minister has indicated his willingness to give full information, up to the present the opposition has not pressed the government either in the matter of proceeding with this measure or in respect to the wheat situation generally, realizing that the Prime Minister himself would wish to have charge of the measure and that there were considerations of public policy involved of which account should be taken, also that there might be in connection with this great problem some features or aspects which the government might feel it would not be advisable to disclose for fear of some effect the disclosure might have upon the market or upon existing or future conditions. That may or may not be the view held by the government. I do think that in a matter of this importance it is advisable that the fullest information possible should be given to parliament. If there is anything that for any reason should not be given to the public either immediately or possibly until later on, that knowledge should at least be in possession of hon. members of parliament. That could be so arranged in a committee, where there might be objection to making public at this stage some of the facts of which we would wish to have full knowledge.

Those are some of the considerations I have in mind in asking the Prime Minister if he is prepared to consider referring the bill to a select committee after it has been introduced.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I would be sadly lacking in consistency if, believing as I do that this is one of the most serious problems that confronts the Canadian people, I did not accept at once any suggestion made by the right hon. gentleman as to cooperation in dealing with the problem itself, and if he believes that the matter would be better dealt with by a committee than by discussion in this house I would be the last man not to accept his suggestion of cooperation in that way.

The question as to whether or not it could better be done by a select or special committee is one that I should like to have some time to think about. The right hon. gentleman was good enough to mention to me his suggestion as he came into the house to-day. He thought a committee should deal with the problem. Under those circumstances I should like to reserve the settlement of that question until I have had time to give it a little thought, but I believe that it is my duty to accept one of those methods in dealing with this question. I would therefore suggest, reserving the right of the opposition, or of any member of this house for that matter, not to be regarded as approving the resolution merely because we adopt it, that after the resolution is agreed to the bill be given its first reading so that hon. members will have the opportunity to read it. I believe that under the rules the bill must then be given a second reading and referred to a committee, whether a standing committee or a select committee. I would have great pleasure in following that course if it commends itself to the judgment of the house. In that event I probably on the second reading would make a statement that would enable hon. gentlemen who desire to consider the bill in the light of the facts as I understand them to be able to direct their minds more intelligently, if I may say so without reflecting at all on their intelligence—more effectively to the problem itself in the light of the information I might be able to furnish on the second reading.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say a very few words in regard to the resolution which has been introduced. First I would say that in my opinion the wheat problem is the gravest problem confronting Canada and confronting this parliament to-day. I shall quote just one statement that was made by Sir Edward Beatty in a recent address in Toronto, when he said, speaking of our wheat production:

> In the five years of expansion from 1925 to 1929 inclusive, our production rose to a value of $2,178,000,000.

In the five years of the depression, that is the following five years of 1930 to 1934 we produced $760,000,000 worth of wheat. Anyone who reads these figures must agree that that is perhaps the greatest underlying cause or factor contributing to the depression. In the next paragraph Sir Edward Beatty made this very significant statement when he said:

> No farmer in western Canada is more interested in the yield and price of our wheat crop than are you, the businessmen and workers of Toronto.

I am very pleased the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has introduced a resolution looking to the setting up of a wheat board and I should like to refer to one phase of this matter with which the Prime Minister dealt, that is the powers of the board. It is hardly necessary to point out that at the present time there is a large volume of wheat held in Canada. We all know that the government has been supporting the market price of wheat and this matter is of great importance to the Canadian wheat producer. I should like to know from the Prime Minister, either now or when we are in committee, whether this board will continue to have the financial backing of the government in the support of the market price of wheat. In other words, will the market price of wheat be supported by the government through the operations of this board? In my own opinion the desirability at this particular time of establishing a grain board hinges on this one question. This question is of supreme importance and that is why I wanted to emphasize that point.

Mr. BENNETT: The bill will disclose what the powers of the board will be. I do not propose to undertake on behalf of any government to say just what the government will do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have spoken already but I should like to add that I appreciate the position taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I realize that he will wish to decide whether it is preferable to refer this bill to a select committee or to one of the standing committees. It is understood that by proceeding in this manner no hon. member will be prejudiced or committed in the stand he may wish to take on any of the provisions of the bill in virtue of approving of the second reading. I repeat that, with this understanding, I think the course suggested, in which the government now acquiesces, will prove to be best with respect to this important matter.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. COOTE: Before the resolution is adopted formally I should like to know if the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) cannot give us a little more information with regard to the powers and financial operations of the board.

Mr. BENNETT: When the bill is submitted to the house the government will be glad to hear any suggestions which might be made by hon. members with respect to the powers of this board. It would be highly improper for me to undertake to say what any government might or might not do in the future. It is contemplated that the government will be given the power to give such assistance to this board as may be necessary to enable it to function. Beyond that I feel I could not and should not go. It is suggested that either a special committee be set up to which this bill would be referred or that it be referred to the standing committee. The government will welcome rather than regret any suggestions which might be made by hon. members in the form of amendments or otherwise. This is not a long bill and I do not think it is a difficult bill to understand. I believe the bill is printed as the copy I have in my hand is a printed copy which was approved this morning. If this resolution passes I would ask for first reading of the bill and take the second reading on Wednesday at which time I will make a statement as ample as possible with respect to the whole situation. By that time we will have decided whether this bill will be referred to a select committee or to the standing committee. My personal view at the moment is to refer it to a select committee of seven or nine members but this view is subject to modification as I give it further thought and consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I anticipate that I shall have a few things to say about this bill but I intend to wait until second reading before making any statement.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Bennett thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, to provide for the constitution and powers of the Canadian Grain Board.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FAIR WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOUR

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 75, respecting fair wages and hours of labour in relation to public works and contracts.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I should like the minister to give the committee some explanation of this bill. We have already upon the statute books a law concerning the hours of labour on public works and under public contracts. I can see that this bill is to add the forty-four hour week to the eight hour day which exists under the present law. But this is going to apply to public works. I wonder whether it is worth while to enact this legislation at this time when this country has delegates sitting even to-day at Geneva for the purpose of considering a draft convention to establish a forty hour week, more particularly on public works either undertaken by governments or subsidized by them. The international labour conference which is now sitting and where we are represented is at this moment studying this very question, except that instead of a forty-four hour week as proposed by this legislation, the draft convention contemplates a forty-hour week on public works either undertaken by the governments themselves or subsidized by them. I would like my hon. friend to tell the committee what is the stand of Canada on the draft convention which is being submitted at Geneva at the present time. It seems that by asking the house to enact this legislation, the government is not favouring the draft convention which is being submitted to our delegates at Geneva.

I should also like my hon. friend to say whether the delegates of the government of Canada have special instructions as to the stand they are to take on this Geneva convention.

Mr. GORDON: The purpose of this bill is obvious. We have now an enactment respecting fair wages and an eight hour day for labour employed on public works for the Dominion of Canada. The substantial changes in the present bill are to implement the royal commission's report by way of the adoption of a forty-four hour week with respect to contracts for the construction, repair and so forth of federal buildings and the adoption of an eight hour day in connection with work that may be performed by a province or any other body to which the dominion government subscribes public money.

The reason is not obscure why a forty-four hour week is not imposed under section 5. It was thought by the law officers of the crown and those who advised in the preparation of the legislation that the adoption of a forty-four hour week with respect to the class of work contemplated by section 5 might very well give rise to an invitation to impeach the validity of the legislation on the ground of its unconstitutionality. Those are the substantial changes that are made in the bill from the provisions which prevail in the enactment now on the statute books.

With regard to the deliberations now being carried on at Geneva with respect to a forty hour week on similar works, I would say only this: if such a convention is adopted at Geneva, is ultimately ratified here in Canada and is translated into legislative enactment, then it will be, I think, soon enough for us to take a further progressive step in the reduction of hours of labour. These things cannot all come at once. I would prefer—and I say this with the greatest respect to the hon. member for Quebec East—to take these matters up in progressive steps as we are sure of our course and certain of the legality of the legislation which we are enacting.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But we are taking a step at the present time; we have representatives at Geneva. Surely they must have some instructions as to the stand they are to take on this question, whether we should have a forty hour week on public works.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. member knows, communications between Geneva and the government of Canada are carried on through the Department of External Affairs. The Department of Labour was advised of this discussion. I think the hon. member in this and other matters has overlooked the fact that no draft convention binds any country until such time as that country accedes to it. It is for the parliament of Canada to say whether or not it accedes to it. If it is unanimous on this as it has been on other conventions submitted to it during the present session, there should be no objection on that score. But the government take the view, rightly or wrongly, that inasmuch as at this session of parliament we had expressed in formal terms our approval of the convention, our delegates should be instructed to inform the committee at Geneva of that fact and indicate that this government was not at the moment prepared to instruct its representatives to vote for or against the draft convention for a forty hour week but would rather they indicate what we were doing and state that if the draft convention were passed and recommended by the international labour office—it is not, as the hon. gentleman has said, the international labour conference—and the convention, if one were arrived at, dispatched to us as soon as possible we would communicate, as we have done heretofore, with the various provinces to indicate just what had taken place so that they might make their representations known to the parliament of Canada to enable it to determine what action it would take in the way of approving or disapproving the draft convention. But in view of the fact that this bill was standing on the order paper from the earlier part of the session we would not instruct our delegates to vote for or against such a draft convention but would ask them to indicate exactly what the position was and to act accordingly.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am grateful to my right hon. friend for stating that I had overlooked the fact we are not bound by this convention until we have ratified it. I knew that. I believe this parliament of Canada is not bound even when this draft convention is adopted over there. This question has been discussed previously. But I wish to draw my right hon. friend's attention to this fact. He seems to indicate that the delegates of Canada have no formal instruction to vote on this question when the draft convention is submitted to the conference. Well, that is what happened last year; in common with the delegates of other countries they abstained or refrained from voting, with the result that there was not a sufficient number of votes for the adoption of the draft convention. There was much criticism, in labour circles more particularly, with regard to the stand taken by the delegates of some of the governments at the conference. I infer from the statement of my right hon. friend that our delegates have no instructions even this year, and I am afraid that the result may be the same as last year.

However, I have no objection to this bill, except that it seems a little futile that we should enact this legislation at a time when the very matter of the length of the week of labour is being considered at an international conference where we are represented and our delegates are sitting.

Mr. BENNETT: I think perhaps the hon. gentleman has overlooked the fact that even if a draft convention were arrived at there it might be five or six years before it would become effective. Therefore it is desirable that this legislation should be enacted in the meantime. Mere discussion at Geneva and arriving at a draft convention does not give it any validity as far as Canada or any country is concerned until it is ratified or acceded to. That is the reason they are called draft conventions. It may well take a period of years before final action is taken. But there is always ample opportunity to accede to the draft convention during the time that elapses from the time of its adoption by the international labour office and the time that it is sent forth to the world and a sufficient number of nations have indicated their approval to give it validity. The action taken at Geneva does not in any sense do more than launch the draft convention, to enable the nations to determine what action they shall take. Canada's action at Geneva would not have any effect to bind Canada to a forty-hour week, that would have to be done by this parliament after the convention is settled and a sufficient number of nations have acceded to it to make it effective, as perhaps the hon. gentleman knows better than I, for he has followed these things longer and perhaps with more care. But I have satisfied myself that it is desirable to enact this legislation, having regard to the long period that may elapse before any substitute legislation may take its place.

As far as our own delegation is concerned, do I understand the hon. gentleman to recommend that our delegates should be empowered to vote for a convention containing a provision for a forty-hour week?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I should think the Canadian government should give instructions, whatever they be, not place our delegates in a situation where they could refrain from taking a stand, as last year.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. BENNETT: Last year there had been no ratification of the forty-four hour week, and it is because we have now taken that step that we have instructed our delegates to explain just what the facts are and that it is matter for discussion. The government has had no opportunity, in view of the ratification of the forty-eight hour week to discuss with the various provinces and bodies affected what might be their considered view with respect to this matter. But if as the hon. gentleman said, action is taken in the way of a draft convention, then this parliament will in the light of the knowledge it secures in the manner indicated be able to place before the Commons and the Senate a full statement with respect to the attitude of mind of those who may be affected.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I failed to follow the argument of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) a few minutes ago. I can understand that if after the ratification of a treaty we were bringing in legislation to implement that ratification it would be general legislation, and might have to be somewhat limited in character. But this bill does not provide general legislation with regard to the work day but is limited to the work day on public works, and works assisted by the government. I cannot quite see how the minister can take the ground that the dominion government is not competent to decide how long men may work on government works or contracts to which the dominion government is a party. It seems to me that in that case it is quite competent for this parliament to state any hours it pleases without in any way getting into constitutional difficulties.

Mr. GORDON: I do not think the question raised by the hon. member should cause any great difficulty. I am quite in agreement with him when he states that on purely federal works this parliament would have sovereign authority to make a one-hour week if it chose or a week of any other number of hours within the number contained in a week. The change with respect to purely federal works was to bring the construction of such works into harmony with the recommendations made by the royal commission on price spreads and mass buying. That amendment appears in section 3, subsection (1) (b) of the bill.

Then with respect to the new section, section 5, which deals with work to which the dominion, the federal state, may contribute by way of subsidy, loan, advance or guarantee; with respect to that class of work this enactment goes no further than the forty-eight hour week, because as I said a few moments ago, where the work is primarily being carried on by another agency and the federal state merely contributes, then we might well imperil the legality of the bill by going further than we believe we have the right to go under the legislation recently introduced with respect to the adoption of the eight-hour day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the very point.

Mr. GORDON: Just a moment, I shall try to clear this up. But while the legislation with respect to that class of work confines the dominion to an eight-hour day ostensibly, yet—and I think this keeps us clearly within the law—there is nothing in my judgment to prevent this government entering into an agreement, say, with a province, say, with any other agency, where it seems proper that the federal state should subscribe, that one of the conditions of that agreement should be that it shall conform to a forty-four hour week or such other regulation as might be imported into such an agreement as a condition for the advance.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then as I understand it would be quite competent for us in any section of this bill to provide for a forty-four hour week or a week of any number of hours?

Mr. BENNETT: Forty-four is in.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In one place it says forty-eight. My suggestion is that it seems to be quite competent for us to provide in any section or all sections for the forty-four hour or even the forty hour week.

Mr. GORDON: I am afraid I have not made myself clear. This parliament may insert any number of hours they want, and invite the impeachment of this law on constitutional grounds. That is what I do not want to see happen. But, as I have explained, in section 5—which deals with work to which the federal government may contribute—we are careful to see that we conform to the authorities and powers that we believe we presently have under the eight hour day bill which recently passed through parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But surely we would not need to contribute—

Mr. GORDON: That is exactly what I have explained. That matter can be easily made the subject of any agreement that may be entered into, and a condition imposed that certain hours of work will have to prevail if the contribution is to be made.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): With respect to the point under discussion, referring to government contracts that are entirely federal undertakings subsection (b) of section 3 says:

> The working hours of persons while so employed shall not exceed eight hours per day nor forty-four hours per week—

Apparently the right to make that provision is unquestioned. Then turning to section 5, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has referred, this deals with agreements for work involving dominion aid. That is, aid may be granted by loan, by credit or by any other means, to any undertaking, and we must bear in mind that such aid always will be granted under some agreement with the province concerned. In any such agreement, according to this section, there shall be inserted certain stipulations, including:

> —the following conditions respecting fair wages and hours of work, that is to say, the condition respecting fair wages set forth in paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 3 of this act—and then—

> —and the condition that the working hours of persons employed in the execution of the work shall not exceed eight hours per day—

The suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is that there is no reason why there should not be inserted, after the eight hour provision, the phrase that appears in subsection (b) of section 3, "nor forty-four hours per week." I quite agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; in fact I had made a notation to suggest that these words should be inserted.

With respect to the point raised by the Minister of Labour, as I followed him he indicated that this has not been put in because it might imperil the validity of the enactment. But if you read the section in question you will see that by this bill provision is made setting a weekly maximum of forty-four hours in any undertaking into which a provincial or other body enters with the federal government, by inferring that in every agreement between this government and a province or municipality that provision will be inserted. But this whole section deals with cases in which aid is granted; this section sets out the agreement and then says that in every such agreement there shall be inserted certain stipulations. One is in connection with the eight hour day; another is in connection with the forty-four hour week. It seems to me that it is competent for this parliament to lay down the regulation that if the federal government enters into a contract with a province, a municipality or any other body to grant aid, they can lay down the terms upon which that aid will be granted. So I submit that it would be quite competent for parliament to do so, and obviously it would be valid to insert those words in subsection 2 of section 5, namely the words "nor forty-four hours per week" after the words "eight hours per day," as appearing in subsection (b) of section 3, and I so suggest.

Mr. GORDON: I will only refer to the point once again; at least I trust I will have to refer to it only once again. It is gratifying, at least, to note that two members from Winnipeg agree on one subject at the same time. In my mind there is a clear distinction in the interpretation of this section, and of course I get some comfort out of the thought that very eminent legal minds have assisted in drafting section 5. In this section it distinctly states that the working hours of persons employed in the execution of the work shall not exceed eight hours per day. That is in harmony with the legislation which passed through this parliament only recently. Some hold the view that that legislation is not constitutional; the government believe it is constitutional. To avoid the possibility of an impeachment of this legislation by reason of an imposition, direct or implied, upon some other agency whether it be a province or a municipality—and the province is what I am directing my remarks to at the moment—the provision is made in the legislation itself that in the agreement which may be fashioned under the provisions of the bill the forty-eight hour week shall not be exceeded. I have no doubt, however, that operating under the bill itself and through to the agreement which may be entered into between this parliament or the executive as the case may be, and a province, it would be quite legal to bring the working hours into harmony with the forty-four hour week or any lesser period of time that might be a condition imposed by this parliament when a grant was being made, and to withhold a grant under such an agreement if the spending authority did not conform to the condition that attached to the grant or guarantee.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not know whether or not we have made ourselves plain in this matter, but the legislation passed recently consonant with the ratification of the treaty was general legislation referring not merely to government contracts but to all work. It was in that connection that it was considered that if we had exceeded the terms of the treaty or the convention that legislation might have been regarded as unconstitutional. In this case, however, my point is that this bill deals particularly with dominion public works or such works as are assisted by dominion grants. That is a specific matter over which the dominion has control. In this measure we are discriminating between two classes of workers. On the one hand we have those on government contracts who are not permitted to work more than forty-hour hours a week; on the other hand we have those on contracts to which the dominion government makes grants, who are permitted to work forty-eight hours a week. The minister takes the ground that this section cannot be brought in harmony with the first section because we might invalidate the whole legislation.

Mr. GORDON: No. I say it can be done under the agreement but not under the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I was going on to say that the minister says it can be arranged under the agreement, but if he will turn to subsection 2 of section 5 he will find the conditions to be stipulated in every such agreement. We are talking about the very thing to which he has referred. We ask that these conditions be stipulated in the agreement; we are not asking anything else. We are simply providing that this be put in black and white in the agreement. I cannot see how in connection with any agreement there could be any difficulty about inserting the provision for forty-four hours, as was done in the preceding section.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If I understand my hon. friend's objection correctly it is that the forty-four-hour provision should be stated in connection with all contracts made for work which is not strictly speaking work performed by government servants. We make contracts here, and we can stipulate in connection with our contracts the terms we expect to be carried out. But we also make grants to provinces and to municipalities in connection with works which they propose to carry out; those are grants in aid. As the bill was originally framed and submitted to council the clause applied to all works carried on in provinces and municipalities to which we had made government grants or appropriations.

The bill was then submitted to Mr. Tilley, K.C., and Mr. Geoffrion, K.C., and they both pointed out that that provision in regard to the work performed by contractors other than government contractors would be invalid and beyond the powers of this parliament, as contravening provincial legislative jurisdiction. But they both said, "You can achieve the purpose you have in view by inserting in your bill section 5, as it appears in this measure." Namely, it was indicated that we could insert terms in our agreements with provinces and municipalities which would bind them in respect of any terms upon which we decided. They said that if we placed it in the bill it would constitute a clear infringement of provincial jurisdiction, but that we could put it in an agreement as a term or condition upon which a grant would be made, and that by doing that we would achieve the same end. Consequently the bill is in its present form.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Subsection 2 contains the regulation with regard to an agreement, and it specifies that we shall enter into such agreements only under certain conditions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: To which subsection do you refer?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Subsection (2) of section 5. It reads "In every such agreement—"

Mr. GUTHRIE: "—there shall be inserted" the stipulations which I have mentioned.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, and we suggest that they be inserted in such a way as to ensure no more than eight hours a day or forty-four hours a week.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We might wish to make them less than that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We are asking simply this, that subsection (2) be brought into conformity with section 3. I can see no objection to that. Of course, I hesitate to take issue with the eminent counsel to whom the minister has referred, but it does seem to me that we should not simply have great names hurled at us so as to silence us. We ought to use our own brains. The government has already sponsored certain legislation about which Mr. Tilley and the other eminent gentleman expressed some doubt.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Some doubt is correct.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is no doubt expressed by them in connection with this matter.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I should like to say a word on the point in question, namely, as to the validity of inserting after "eight hours per day" in subsection (2) of section 5 the words "nor forty-four hours per week."

I hesitate to differ from such eminent counsel as have been mentioned, but this subsection does not attempt to legislate as to the hours which any province or municipality shall stipulate. It merely provides that if the federal government grants money in aid of a province or a municipality, or in fact any other body, then it shall insert certain provisions in the agreement. In the event of there being no such regulation, when the federal government came to deal with a province asking money in aid of works the federal authorities could work out an agreement. It would competent for the federal government to make such terms as they saw fit, so long as they agreed with the other bargaining party. They could agree that they would grant money only on the condition that the men working on the job worked a certain number of hours per week or day. This section proposes to give directions to the government when entering into any such agreement that they shall insert a provision that the workman shall not work more than eight hours per day. I submit it is perfectly competent for this parliament to instruct the government to insert in any such agreement a further provision that it shall not exceed forty-four hours per week. That would not be legislating for the provinces. It would simply place the federal government, when dealing with the provinces, in the position of deciding whether or not it will enter into an agreement to grant assistance in respect of works, and in the position of stating that they will grant assistance only when that provision appears in an agreement.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Fair wages.

Mr. GORDON: I believe section 2 has been copied from the present act and gives rise to some ambiguity. Unfortunately the draftsman has carried the phraseology into this section. The section begins with these words:

> In this act, unless the context otherwise requires, "fair wages" means such wages as are generally accepted as current from time to time for competent workmen.

That wording, as hon. members will realize, might cause great confusion. A contract might be entered into to-day and wages change to-morrow. In order to clarify the situation I should like to move:

> That section 2 of the bill be amended by striking out the words "from time to time" in the third line of the said section, and substituting therefor the words "at the date of the contract, when such work is being performed by contract."

Mr. GUTHRIE: I so move.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the minister if that does not change the intention of the definition as set forth in the original act? Was the definition not intended to leave room for the possibility of altering the rate, assuming that the wages in the district were to alter over a period of time? For example, in a contract running for three or four years the rate might be one thing this year and another next year. I believe it was the intention in the original definition to indicate that if the general rate altered, the rate in the government contract should be made to correspond with it.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not believe the amendment would clarify the situation. I am of the opinion the point raised by the right hon. gentleman is pertinent, and the difficulty he points out would cause trouble in the event of a contract continuing for twelve months. The whole clause appears to be ambiguous, because it uses the expression "accepted as current from time to time" or, as the amendment suggests, "at the date of the contract." I can find nothing in the section which in any way compels the government to accept any fair wage clause or fair wage legislation which may be in operation in the various provinces. There may be in operation in a province a fair wage act which specifies certain wages to be paid on a certain class of work to mechanics or labourers. Under its present wording this section does not indicate that the fair wage must be accepted. But there may be wages paid that are considerably below the wages specified in the fair wage act and yet it might be the current rate of pay. You might have a dual rate of pay in a district, and unless this clause is made more specific than it is at present it probably will give rise to a good deal of confusion and misunderstanding. I would like to see something in this clause which would compel the contractors in various parts of the country to accept wherever they are in effect the fair wage laws of the provinces and pay that rate of pay on all government contracts. I think the word "current" should be cut out entirely from the clause. At the present time I think the minister must know that there is a good deal of dissatisfaction, and strikes I believe in one or two places, where government contracts are being carried on because the wages paid are below even the accepted rates of pay as understood in those localities. If this clause is going to give rise to confusion I think the minister ought to make it more specific than it is at the present time in order that there may be no misunderstanding wherever government contracts happen to be let.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, in the light of what the right hon. leader of the opposition has said we are prepared to drop the amendment. With respect to the observations made by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), if there has been any strike on federal government contracts by reason of the non-payment of fair wages I would like to be advised if the hon. member knows of any such strikes, because great care is taken and has always been taken by the Department of Labour to see that fair wages as defined by the act are inserted in the schedule attached to and which becomes a part of the agreement of every contractor who is contracting to do and is doing federal construction work. If that contractor does not pay the wages according to the schedule which is part of his contract, then when the Department of Labour is notified, and it does not need to be any formal notification, just a letter or a post card or a telegram, investigation is immediately made, and if it is found that in any class of labour on federal works the contractor is failing to pay the wages as stipulated by the Department of Labour and accepted by the Department of Public Works the amount is at once held back from the contractor until full investigation is made, and if it is found that the allegations are correct the amount is paid direct to those who have been underpaid according to the terms of the agreement.

Mr. HEAPS: I will give the minister privately a couple of instances perhaps later on in the afternoon, because I do not want to bring the names of any individuals into the discussion. But I do know of two instances. I think there is some trouble right now in the contract let for the building of a post office in Montreal. I have sent out for the newspaper files. There are also low wages being paid on government contracts in Manitoba, the facts of which I shall be glad to let the minister have.

Mr. GORDON: I would be glad to be advised of them.

Mr. HEAPS: What I am trying to do, Mr. Chairman, is to have this clause made a little more specific than it is at the present time because the word "current" referring to current wages is very ambiguous. The wages in a district may be only thirty cents per hour, and yet the wage stipulated by the fair wage act of the province may be forty-five cents per hour. In that case the contractor would be quite justified, according to the wording of the act, in paying the lower rate of wages because strictly speaking he would be within the terms of the act. I am asking the minister if he will not so word this clause as to compel the contractor to pay the wages as specified in the fair wage acts of the various provinces and of the dominion.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, I think that upon reflection the hon. member will not pursue that argument further. Surely the federal government is quite as able to determine what fair wages are as any province of Canada, and I do not say that disrespectfully of any province. If section 2 is examined further it will be observed that fair wages not only means "such wages as are generally accepted as current from time to time for competent workmen in the district in which the work is being performed," but at the end of the section there are these words, "but shall in all cases be such wages as are fair and reasonable." We have very competent officials who determine both those sets of facts, if both have to be determined—what fair wages are generally accepted as current in the locality, and in addition thereto, if the wages that are generally accepted as current are not fair and reasonable wages, our officers will fix as the wage a wage that is fair and reasonable rather than the current wage. I must say that in my experience in the Labour department in the last four or five years I have run across no difficulties, or difficulties so indifferent that I have not charged my memory with them, where the wages fixed by the department have not been fair and reasonable. Sometimes they are the current wages. They are never lower than the current wages, and very frequently they have been higher.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister indicate the nature of the amendment he proposed? I have only just come in.

Mr. GORDON: The amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. NEILL: What was its nature?

Mr. GORDON: It was proposed to strike from the third line of section 2 the words "from time to time" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the date of the contract when such work is being performed by contract." It was pointed out by the leader of the opposition that a contract for a considerable period of time might well work a hardship upon employees, and upon his suggestion the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just a word on this clause as to wages that are fair and reasonable. Evidently the contractors would have to have some indication of the wages they would have to pay before they could tender on the contract. They may have tendered intending to pay the prevailing wage. That is the wage which the fair wage officer must take into consideration. I understand that it means that the fair wage officer must find out the prevailing rate, how many employers there are in the district and how many pay such and such a rate, and if more pay a certain rate than another rate the rate paid by the greatest number is accepted as the prevailing rate. When and how is the government going to come to the conclusion that the rate being paid is not a fair and reasonable rate. Who is going to determine it? Is it going to be determined after a complaint from some of the employees on a particular work, or is the fair wage officer going to investigate and report to the government as to the wages being paid?

Mr. GORDON: The fair wage officers of the Department of Labour determine what the fair wages shall be with respect to any contract, and in determining what fair wages shall be they certainly inquire into what are the current wages for competent workmen in the class of work to be performed. They undoubtedly inquire as to whether or not there is a prevailing rate of wages and in all cases they are charged with responsibility of seeing that the wages paid are fair and reasonable. If the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) will investigate, as he undoubtedly has, the wages paid on federal contracts, he will find that very frequently the fair wage officers of the department have insisted upon the payment of wages which were higher than the current or prevailing rate—"prevailing" is not used in the statute—in order that the wages paid may be fair and reasonable. That has been the policy of the department and I trust it will be the policy in the future.

Mr. NEILL: That section has been in use for many years.

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: In the case of a dispute would the Department of Labour accept the fair wage act of the particular province in which the dispute might occur?

Mr. GORDON: It is not likely that the dominion would cast aside the judgment of a province with respect to a matter of that kind but the dominion would not be prepared to accept the statement of a province as to what was fair and reasonable wages. All these matters would be inquired into from all angles, including what was the judgment of the province as to what was fair and reasonable wages.

Mr. HEAPS: There might be two sets of wages for the same class of work and difficulty might arise. In order that the uniformity of pay within a province should be maintained I think the government should be prepared to accept the judgment of the provincial authorities as to what was considered fair and proper within the province.

Mr. GORDON: In my judgment that is just what the dominion government should not do. I do not think the dominion government should be committed to paying wages which are high or which are low simply because a province has adopted a scale and considers it as the proper current rate. The endeavour of the federal government is to see that fair and reasonable wages are paid on federal works. If the hon. member thinks over this matter I believe he will banish from his mind the idea that the true intent and meaning of this legislation would be brought about by the federal government subscribing to the judgment of the nine provinces of Canada as to what was fair and reasonable wages.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Government contracts for work subject to certain conditions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not a general rule that where the eight hour day prevails the forty-four hour week also prevails?

Mr. GORDON: I have no doubt that the forty-four hour week does prevail in some undertakings but there are many industrial undertakings where it does not prevail.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it not true in many trades, usually where the eight hour day prevails, the men knock off on Saturday after working four hours, which makes a forty-four hour week?

Mr. GORDON: That may be true but it is not my understanding of Canadian industry.

Mr. NEILL: This section calls for a forty-four hour week.

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Certain building trades in Vancouver have had the forty hour week for some years and I should like to know if these men will be compelled to work a forty-four hour week?

Mr. GORDON: It says, "shall not exceed."

Mr. RINFRET: I should like to repeat the observations I made when the eight hour day bill was before this committee. At that time I referred to special work, either seasonal or intermittent. The men engaged in such work are afraid that this eight hour provision will prove harmful. In the harbour of Montreal there are several thousand men who work only during the summer, some of them for only a part of the summer. Instead of having a time limit placed upon their work they are anxious to work longer hours as that provides compensation for the time they do not work. While in theory the eight hour day and the forty-four hour week may be very nice, when it comes to practice in these times we are much more concerned about the people who are not working rather than limiting the hours of those who are working. I notice that subsection (b) of this section provides for cases such as I have mentioned, when it states:

—or except in cases of emergency as may be approved by the minister.

The minister was very kind in meeting the suggestions I made when we were dealing with the other bill, and I should like to know from him whether this bill is to have the same effect. Will the government or the minister be able to allow men working in harbours, for instance, to work more than eight hours a day or forty-four hours a week? I have been greatly interested in the theoretical social reform legislation with which we have been busy for most of the session but when I go back to my people I find that they are not looking for minimum wages, they are looking for wages of any kind; they are not complaining because they have to work too much, it is the other way around, they are afraid that their week will be shortened. When the eight hour day bill was before the committee the longshoremen were afraid that it would interfere with them and I have had similar requests in connection with this bill from men employed by the government in the harbour of Montreal. They are not very anxious to have their work limited to so many hours a week when they know that the previous week they have not worked or may not work in the week following.

Mr. GORDON: Mr. Chairman, the object sought by the government in the reduction of hours is just what the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) has referred to: That is, to spread the work among more people by reducing the number of hours. But in cases like those suggested by the hon. member the inclusion in section 3 (b) of the right to except, was for the purpose of excepting from the operation of the bill those who work intermittently and perhaps for a very short time throughout the year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the minister make a distinction between prevailing rate of wages and current rate of wages? I notice he uses both terms. I understand in some cases a distinction is made between the two.

Mr. GORDON: I never made any distinction.

Mr. MacINNIS: Subclause 2 of this clause reads:

> The provisions of this section shall not apply to the purchase of materials, supplies or equipment—

And so forth. Is the government going to take any steps to see that fair wages and fair conditions shall obtain in the production of these supplies?

Mr. GORDON: The subject raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South has been debated many times in connection with both this and former legislation. It is my view that the government cannot fix wages where materials, supplies and equipment are being purchased, that is, traced back to the various factories or departments of factories where these things are being manufactured. This would not be practicable in the first place. If the federal government are paying higher wages, as they very frequently and indeed in most cases do, than industry is paying or able to pay; in other words, if they are giving at least some lead to those who are able to pay higher wages, then, if they were to undertake the project their activities back behind the actual construction, because we are dealing with construction of buildings, into the wages that are being paid in the manufacture of supplies that go into such buildings and that are not made on the ground, I think we would be in great difficulty and I doubt seriously whether this could be administered.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps in some cases it might not be possible to trace materials back far enough, but in many cases, especially in connection with building, this could be most readily done. For instance stone comes from a certain quarry. There are certain quarries in which fair wages are paid; there are others in which unfair wages are paid. Surely it is quite possible for the Dominion government to purchase only from those quarries where fair wages are being paid. The same thing is true with regard to steel used in certain building construction. We have some factories in which it is known fair wages are paid; there are others in which it is generally known unfair wages are paid and sweating conditions prevail. I think the report of the price spreads commission recommends that action be taken by the government along this line and even goes so far as to suggest general legislation so that there would be something in the nature of a white list and a label provided in order that we might know whether articles are being produced under fair conditions. Whilst it might be difficult to do that with regard to a number of commodities that pass through several hands, it is quite easy to do it with regard to materials that enter into building construction.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Agreements for works involving dominion aid.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: In harmony with my presentation of a few moments ago when on clause 1 the question of constitutionality was being discussed, I beg to move:

> That in line 29 after the word "day," there be inserted the words "nor forty-four hours per week."

I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat the arguments advanced half an hour ago.

Mr. GORDON: I have already covered the ground with respect to the observations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which have now found expression in the amendment he proposes. It is, I think, very desirable that when we are passing any legislation and particularly legislation that may challenge or invade provincial rights, every possible kind of precaution should be taken to see that any measure passed through this parliament is not open to impeachment upon the ground of its lack of constitutionality. I have already pointed out that section 5 establishes a forty-eight hour week and imposes a forty-eight hour week upon those who carry on operations to which the dominion government subscribes under section 5. The reason that a forty-eight hour week is imposed is because the federal parliament has established by legislation a forty-eight hour week. The opinion of the law officers of the crown and of very profound men who are students of constitutional law is that if a forty-four hour week is placed in the statute itself, that leaves it open to impeachment; but in order to make it possible that a forty-four hour week or less may prevail in connection with the expenditure of moneys by a province—and I cite the province as an instance—where the dominion contributes to that expenditure, provision is made that an agreement be entered into pursuant to the terms of this legislation, and in that agreement the condition may be imposed as to working hours per week. In other words the measure is inviolate; it provides that the working hours per week shall not exceed forty-eight, which we believe to be constitutional, and the stipulation can carry through into the agreement when one is entered into: Here is the dominion's contribution to you, but we will give it only on condition that you subscribe to, say, a forty-four hour week. They can either take it or leave it. In my view this places the legislation beyond reach of impeachment and places within the hands of the dominion government or the executive, as the case may be, the right to impose those conditions in the agreement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot let the minister get away with an argument like that. In section 3 we provide for fair wages. I submit that the provinces have control of wages under the British North America Act, I think the minister will not question that. Yet in section 5 we proceed to say that the condition respecting fair wages set forth in paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 3 shall be insisted upon. We do insist upon fair wages, a matter under the purview of the provincial authority, but we do so because, and only because, we are entering into an agreement. If it is true that we can stipulate what wages shall be paid I submit that we can also stipulate what hours can be worked. I am inclined to think that this whole matter must have arisen through some error in draftsmanship, because there is no real reason behind it. It seems to me to be eminently reasonable that if the minister could insist that wages should be not high or low simply to conform to the provincial scale, then the hours should not be short or long simply because there may be some provincial arrangement prevailing. This is a provision which relates, as subsection 2 very clearly indicates to the conditions to be stipulated in the agreements, the very thing the minister is talking about. I do not think it is a constitutional question at all. The minister has not shown how it affects the constitution. He simply asserts that he has had certain advice. I should like to have him produce the advice on this particular matter in written form; then we should be able to use our best judgment as to whether or not we think it is sound.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 3 of the bill provides for the payment of fair wages, for an eight hour day and a forty-four hour week. In section 5, subsection 2, instead of repeating the language of these clauses it is provided that:

[Mr. Gordon.]

—the condition respecting fair wages set forth in paragraph (a) of subsection one of section 3 of this act and the condition that the working hours of persons employed in the execution of the work shall not exceed eight hours per day except in such special cases as the governor in council may otherwise provide or except in cases of emergency which may be approved by the minister.

That part in relating to hours is identical with paragraph (b) of section 3.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, it is identical but for the one clause which I asked should be inserted: that is in line 29, after the word "day," there should be inserted the words "nor forty-four hours per week." It is identical with that exception.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not see any objection to putting that in.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Except that according to the Minister of Labour the law officers of the crown and two eminent counsel who have been specially consulted in the matter have declared that it would be invalid.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not as a stipulation in an agreement.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is what the Minister of Labour said.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not as a stipulation in an agreement, but as an enactment affecting labour laws in the province it would be invalid. But the counsel say you can achieve your purpose by stipulating expressly in your agreement upon what terms your money is granted. If we seek by legislative enactment to interfere with wages or hours of labour in the provinces, saving in regard to our rights under the conventions which we have adopted, then we are at least on controversial ground; our counsel say our act would be invalid. To get around that invalidity we are stipulating in the agreement for these very things. For myself I do not see any objection to placing "nor forty-four hours per week" there, as they appear in subsection (b) of section 3.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is this not section 5 practically enacting what the practice is now under certain orders in council that have been passed?

Mr. GORDON: You mean the resolution of thirty-five years ago and the subsequent order in council of fifteen years ago?

Mr. ELLIOTT: There are certain orders in council, I understand, providing for what is now sought to be enacted by section 5. Am I correct?

Mr. GORDON: In a measure, but section 5 goes further.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would the minister tell us to what extent it does enlarge upon what is stated in those orders in council?

Mr. RINFRET: I understand there is an essential difference between clause 3 and clause 5. In clause 3 we are dealing with dominion government contracts; in clause 5 we are dealing with works to which the government contributes, but which are carried on not by the government but by individuals or provinces. Is not that the reason clause 3 is drafted differently from clause 5?

Mr. GORDON: Yes.

Mr. RINFRET: When the Minister of Justice spoke he did not seem to make that distinction. I gathered that the government still maintains that it can impose the eight hour day on account of stipulations in the treaty of Versailles, but has no authority to impose a forty-four hour week. Are we now taking a new attitude on that last point?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We are trying to meet the very problem that my hon. friend has stated. The treaty of Versailles, by which we are bound, and the convention we have adopted, provides for a forty-eight hour week. Under these present arrangements, on all government work we are limiting the week to forty-four hours. In cases where we make grants either to provinces or to municipalities we are not in a position to dictate these provisions by legislation, but we can achieve our end by making a stipulation in our agreements that we will not grant the moneys unless they agree to these particular terms. An enactment that they shall do so would be invalid.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not want to press the point, because with my leaders I do not accept the attitude of the government that we have authority even by the treaty of Versailles to impose an eight hour day. But I thought the government had contradicted itself; perhaps I am wrong in that point, I was quite aware that by the treaty of Versailles the stipulation was for a forty-eight hour week. Now we have gone to forty-four hours.

Mr. GUTHRIE: On government works.

Mr. RINFRET: The Minister of Justice led us to understand that the reason forty-four hours did not appear in clause 5 was that the legal authorities had given an opinion that it should not. We seem to be losing ground constitutionally every day. Perhaps to-morrow we shall have a bill for a forty hour week. I am not pressing the objection, because as I say personally—and as a member of the Liberal opposition I follow my leader—we should not have legislation on that matter at all.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if the minister could tell us the differences between the order in council and the enactment?

Mr. GORDON: The difference as reflected in section 5 is that it applies the fair wages policy of the federal government to work done or moneys spent where the Dominion of Canada makes a contribution, subsidy, loan, advance or guarantee for aid in construction and so on. That is the main enlargement of the old resolution; where we make a subsidy or a grant, say to a province, under section 5 we have the right to impose the fair wages policy of the dominion government in connection with the work.

On section 8—Date of coming into force.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I see this will not come into force until May 1, 1936, and shall not apply to any contract with the government of Canada existing at that date. Why defer it for that length of time?

Mr. GORDON: It will be recognized that it is quite difficult in bringing into force an act of this kind to fix an arbitrary date that will not seriously interfere with existing rights and contractual obligations. It was thought that by postponing the operation of the act until the date mentioned an opportunity would be given to have present contracts completed and, if I may put it in this way, to educate those in the contracting business in the new order of things in order that they might accommodate themselves to this legislation. It may be that the act has been postponed too long, though in the judgment of the government it is not too long a postponement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have we not already a sufficient number of exemptions in the particular clauses without having this general exemption which might invalidate the whole act? This section provides that exceptions may be granted—> —to any contracts, agreements or works thereafter made or undertaken which are by order of the governor in council declared to be excepted from the operation of the provisions of this act.

It seems to me that this really throws the act wide open again, and that it is hardly necessary in view of the exceptions noted in the particular clauses.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 63, to create employment by public works and undertakings throughout Canada and to authorize the guarantee of certain railway equipment securities.

He said: The only amendment made by the senate is in line 36 of section 7 on page 2 of the bill, which now reads:

—with respect to a certificate as to the wisdom of such recommendation made by the chief or the assistant chief engineer—

That is, it shall be accompanied by a certificate of the chief or assistant chief engineer or architect in charge of such work. The senate have added the words "as to the wisdom of such recommendation made by."

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is this in connection with tenders?

Mr. BENNETT: It is in connection with cases in which tenders are not required.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It tells what the certificate is to be?

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 79, to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Perhaps the minister will explain the bill. Is it exactly in conformity with the recommendations of the price spreads commission?

Mr. GORDON: Yes, in substance. It is to amend the present act to give effect to certain of the recommendations made by the price spreads commission, but the major change is to transfer the powers at present invested in the registrar and the Minister of Labour to a federal industry commission, which it is contemplated establishing under the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act. Then the remainder of the amendments are merely to bring the present act into conformity by substituting the commission for the registrar, and I believe in one or two instances for the minister, so that throughout the present act the amendments will conform.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I believe under the present act the minister takes the ground that the report of the registrar need not be made public. Under the amended law will all reports of the commission be made public?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member will recall that in connection with the tariff board we had a long discussion about this matter. The two acts will be read together, so far as that is concerned, and the tariff board would be the judge as to whether it was not in the public interest or unfair to the individual to have the investigation published. That is, obviously everything is not published, but everything is not secret, and the board shall be the determining tribunal with respect to that feature of the matter. That is what has been determined in the past in connection with the Tariff Board Act.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me that this is distinctly a retrograde step, because under the Combines Investigation Act which we have had in the past at least the commissioner's findings were made public. Some of us have claimed that the registrar's findings should also be made public. Apparently, however, we are now to have a new commission, namely the tariff board, which shall have power to state whether or not its findings shall be made public.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I think the hon. member misunderstood me. I referred to the evidence, not the findings.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am speaking about the findings of the commission and my question was as to whether or not the findings were to be made public. Did I understand the Prime Minister correctly?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I was dealing with the evidence. The hon. member will recall that a great deal of discussion took place on this point when the tariff board was set up. The findings of that board are made public.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My question is whether or not the findings of the commission will be made public.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Not the evidence. At the present time the minister takes the ground that the reports of the registrar need not be made public. The question was whether or not under the new arrangement the reports of the commission would be made public.

Mr. GORDON: Yes, they will be made public.

Mr. ILSLEY: After reading the act I would not think that to be so. In the Combines Investigation Act the matter is covered in two or three sections. Reports of commissioners were made public, unless there was a provision in the report recommending against publicity, but the section dealing with reports of the registrar was silent. The minister took the view that the section being silent he had no authority to make the reports public. I know however it was the view of members of the price spreads commission that that opinion was incorrect, that the act being silent the minister had a discretion in the matter and could make the reports of the registrar public or otherwise, as he wished. In Bill No. 86, providing for the establishment of a dominion trade and industry commission, section 28 states:

> The commission shall within fifteen days after making any report, recommendation or finding under this act make the same public in such manner as seems desirable unless the commission is unanimously of the opinion that the public interest would not be served by publication or that the public interest would be better served by withholding publication.
> (2) Wherever possible the commission shall with the report, recommendation or finding make public the reason and the facts upon which the decision is based.

I do not know at this time whether that section applies to reports made under the Combines Investigation Act, but I assume that is the section that applies.

Mr. GORDON: It will apply.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it will apply when the two bills are passed. We gave some thought to the matter of publicity when we were considering the evidence placed before the price spreads commission. The members of that body were of the opinion that there was no good reason why reports should not always be made public.

Mr. GORDON: Of the registrar?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There might be reasons why all of the evidence in a case should not be made public, but we concluded that there was no good reason why every report should not be made public. There are a great many instances where six persons apply to the registrar, under the Combines Investigation Act, alleging that a combine exists and asking for an investigation. The registrar looks into the facts and circumstances and decides that the six persons who signed the application did not fully go into the matter, that they are proceeding on hearsay evidence and that they are wrong. In such event he would make a short report indicating that there was no reason why there should be any investigation. From time to time such reports are made. It is a very common thing for a few individuals from one part of Canada or another to write the registrar and allege the existence of a combine. Upon looking into the facts the registrar sometimes decides that what these people allege to be a combine does not contain the statutory elements of a combine, and makes a report to that effect. That would be the end of the matter. There is no reason why those reports should not be made public; they cannot possibly hurt anybody. When the registrar finds that the facts are such as to warrant an inquiry he may proceed to investigate and may in the end find that a combine exists. It may be that on some occasions a court may find that a combine did not exist. Only once in the history of the administration of the Combines Investigation Act has a judge found that a combine did not exist when in the first instance the registrar had found that it did; in every other case the court has corroborated the finding of the registrar. It seems to me rather theoretical and fanciful to state that in publishing the findings any injustice would be done. An intolerable condition exists when we permit the making of expensive and important inquiries into alleged combines and have the reports kept secret. That is what has happened.

We took enough evidence before the price spreads commission to know that in the rubber trade there is a condition of affairs which apparently constitutes a combine. We tried to get the report which was made in connection with this industry, but could not get it; it was kept secret, and has not been published. I can see no reason why it should not be published. It is most important, if matters of this kind are to be considered intelligently by governments or parliaments that publicity be given to them. I believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is asking for full publicity of reports, and if I understand his position correctly I strongly support it. I am sorry the necessary provision to bring that about is not made in this bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Decidedly I believe in such publicity, but I was attempting to get at the facts of the case. A few moments ago I asked the minister if all the reports would be made public, and apparently he was not quite sure. In the meantime the Prime Minister stated that in the case of the tariff board the evidence was not made public. I had not been talking about the evidence but about the report, and I again asked the minister, who stated that all reports would be made public. Then the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) read section 28 of the trade and industry commission bill, and I understood the minister to say that it was that act that applied in this case. If it does then it is quite obvious that the publication of these reports is not automatic but within the discretion of the commission, and in enacting this legislation we are taking a retrograde step because in the past, although we could not get the registrar's reports, at least we got the reports of the commission. Now apparently the commission itself may decide whether or not it gives us any report. I am strongly of the opinion that we should have full publicity with regard to these matters.

Mr. ILSLEY: I just want to add to what I said that the evidence before the price spreads commission revealed a startling concentration of business in Canada, great numbers of large corporations and what the experts call monopolies and quasi-monopolies. Times are changing. It may have been quite proper twenty or thirty years ago to be very careful as to what publicity you gave to matters of this kind, but it is highly important in these latter days that the public have all the facilities possible for coping with these great concentrations of industry, and to that end it seems to me important that the public be acquainted with the true state of affairs. The act is being amended not only to cover combines but to give better facilities for coping with monopolies such as mergers and the like, and it is exceedingly important that the public be acquainted at once on the conclusion of an investigation with the true state of affairs. If, for instance, eighty-five per cent of the packing industry gets into the hands of one company, which is what would happen if two of the largest companies were to merge at the present time, that is a fact which the public should know, and know at once. It would be revealed by an investigation under the Combines Act as amended, and it is not a fact that the commission should have the discretion to keep to themselves. There is no danger that I can see about publicity. The danger that always used to be urged was that publicity might prejudice the mind of the public in the event of a criminal prosecution, but an official report is no more likely to do that than the irresponsible reports in the newspapers—not nearly as likely, because what the registrar or what the commission finds about these great combinations and monopolies and quasi-monopolies is quite certain to be true. I would urge that the government provide for full publicity of these reports rather than leave it to the discretion of the investigating commission.

Mr. GORDON: The question of what sort of report, whether the report of the registrar's inquiry or of a commissioner, should be made public and be given publicity has been the subject of discussion since the first legislation was enacted in 1910, and upon its subsequent reenactment with amendments thirteen years afterwards. Rightly or wrongly, the Combines Investigation Act at present in force is silent with respect to publicity to be given to the report of the registrar, whether that report be a final or an interim one. It is equally true that since the act was amended in 1923 the practice of the Department of Labour and of the federal government has been to treat the silence of the legislation with respect to publicity as constituting the foundation of proper practice, that these investigations and inquiries should not be made public.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have in my possession a report dealing with the P.A.T.A., a report that was made by the registrar. Two reports were made in 1925 and 1926, one by the registrar and one by the commissioner, and the registrar's report was printed and published.

Mr. GORDON: It may be that the registrar's report was published but I am stating that the general practice was not to make them public. The act, of course, did and does make provision for publication of a commissioner's report. When the Combines Act was before parliament in 1923 a long discussion took place with respect to its operation and with respect to what was expected of it in the way of curbing combines and monopolies which were against the public interest and in restraint of trade. Great things were expected of the combines act, and so far as the act went I think it did bring about some sort of useful progress. But there is no manner of doubt that while the present combines act was upon the statute book great combines came into existence. I am not prepared to condemn them as detrimental to the public interest, or to commend them as the kind of monopoly that is in the public interest—for there are the two kinds, as everyone admits. But with respect to the publication of a preliminary inquiry into the business of people where full facilities are given for such inquiry and where it is expected that a full and confidential disclosure shall be made of all the intimacies of the business, I have no doubt that that was the consideration that influenced those in the past to be extremely careful about publishing to the world and to the man's competitors the complexities and the inner workings of his business. I am sure that every member of this House of Commons could have his own private business investigated and would welcome complete publicity with respect to his every activity, and that every member would emerge as pure as the driven snow, but at the same time there were those in years gone by who thought that to make public a confidential and complete disclosure of all a man's business was something that should not be done in a hurry, that the information should not be just poured out through a funnel for his competitors. I believe that was the argument that then prevailed, but as the hon. member for Hants-Kings has said, since the investigation of last year, times have changed. We are undoubtedly in changing times, and perhaps it is proper and right that these things should be published to the world, whether they are right or whether they are wrong, on the principle I assume that if a man is right his business should be known to everybody, and if he is wrong he should be pilloried at once. These are just observations that you can take in any way you like. But would it not be better to defer the argument as to the publicity which should be given to these matters until section 28 of Bill No. 86 is before the committee. The section has been read already to the committee by the hon. member for Hants-King and I shall not burden the committee with a re-reading of it. In substance it states that within fifteen days after making any report "the commission shall make the same public" if they deem it in the public interest to do so. That bill has not been dealt with in committee, and I think it would be desirable to await its presentation in order to determine the extent to which this section might be amended. Section 28 of the dominion trade and industry commission bill might be amended also in order that the proper course may be taken. Let us hope that we do adopt the proper course in all cases. I suggest that we postpone this discussion until the section which deals directly with the matter is under review.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Contrary to his previous statement, the minister now admits that these reports are not all made public.

Mr. GORDON: I scarcely think the hon. member can pin me down like that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will the minister make a direct statement?

Mr. GORDON: Section 28 says that within fifteen days of making any report, recommendation or finding under the act the commission shall make the same public in such manner as seems desirable unless the commission is unanimously of the opinion that the public interest would not be served by publication or that the public interest would be better served by withholding publication.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that in this bill?

Mr. GORDON: No, that is section 28 of Bill No. 86.

Mr. RINFRET: I think this discussion is very improper. The bill now under consideration is based principally upon the establishment of a commission which does not now exist and will not exist until Bill No. 86 has been passed. The present bill might be passed and sent to the senate, and the house might decide not to adopt the other bill. It is close to six o'clock and perhaps the minister will consider whether we should not deal first with the other bill. That bill, which states that "commission" means the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission which will be established under the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935, has not been read a second time and might not be adopted by this house. What would be the good of this bill if the other were not adopted?

Mr. GORDON: It might be well to take up the other bill first.

Mr. RINFRET: The minister has found it necessary to refer to a section in the other bill in order to make his point clear. Perhaps he would give some thought during the dinner recess to the question whether we should not go on with the other bill first.

Mr. ILSLEY: One section of this bill repeals a large part of the Combines Investigation Act. If that is repealed and there is no commission set up, we would have no legislation.

Mr. GORDON: There is virtue in what the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) has said as to the order in which these bills might properly be taken up. I shall consider this during the supper recess.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GORDON: In the light of what has been said with respect to the other bill, I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Wednesday, May 29, consideration in committee of Bill No. 73, to amend the criminal code—Mr. Guthrie—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 6—Discrimination in trade.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Returning to this bill which was partly discussed on a former occasion, I think I should put on record the recommendation of the price spreads commission with regard to the matters with which it deals. At page 135 of the report of the royal commission, certain amendments to the criminal code are recommended. I need not read that section. On page 246 there is another recommendation in regard to fraudulent advertising, dealt with by clause 4 of the bill, but the portion of the report which I desire particularly to read is at page 270. I will start in the middle of the page:

> We suggest that practices should be prohibited as unfair which are characterized by bad faith, fraud, misrepresentation, or oppression; which are resorted to for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor; which facilitate the development of monopoly; or which destroy fair com-competitive opportunity and prevent the survival of those who can organize and carry on the production of goods most efficiently. It is in this sense that the word "unfair" should be used in the act.
> Without attempting to restrict the application of this test of "unfairness" by the commission, we feel that certain practices which we have examined should very definitely be considered "unfair" under the act. They are so widespread and generally condemned that their complete prohibition by the commission is justified. We refer specifically to—
> 1. discriminatory discounts, rebates and allowances,
> 2. territorial price discrimination and predatory price cutting.

The reference in the extract which I have just read is to the trade commission which is recommended in this report and is not to the criminal code. Clauses were drafted to carry into effect that recommendation for the purpose of inserting them in the federal trade commission measure, but immediately we had done so we realized that our troubles were beginning. In view of the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council in respect to the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, if we had placed in that bill prohibitory sections in regard to the matters recommended in the report, according to the opinion of the law officers of the department they would have fallen to the ground as ultra vires; they could not be supported. It is true that the general regulation of trade and commerce is, under the British North America Act, within the competence of this parliament; but the moment you go to the point of interfering with private rights, the moment you begin to fix prices, to interfere with contracts or matters of that kind, you have gone, according to the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council, beyond the realm of the regulation of trade and commerce. Property and civil rights within a province are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, and for that reason these sections which were drafted originally for the trade and commerce bill were omitted from it. While there was serious doubt as to our right to pass such legislation—and indeed it was not doubtful; it was definitely decided that we had no such right—we have the right in this parliament to pass criminal laws as we see fit to do, and these particular sections were therefore transferred into the bill to amend the criminal code of Canada.

The question of course arises whether the amendments which we now submit are really in their pith and substance, which is the language used in so many of the judicial committee's judgments, of criminal legislation. We submit they are in so far as they are for the protection of the public, for the good of the community and to frustrate unfair practices by traders throughout Canada.

Let me, after making that preliminary statement, place upon the record the opinion which I had not with me when this matter was before the house on a former occasion. At that time I read the opinion of Mr. Tilley, K.C., upon these sections, and it will be remembered that he pronounced upon them as follows: that section 4 of the bill was good and within the competence of parliament. In regard to section 5 he said: "I think it is intra vires; in regard to section 6, paragraph (a) is of doubtful validity, paragraph (b) is valid, and paragraph (c) is valid." Such is the opinion, in brief, of Mr. Tilley, K.C.

I desire to place upon the record the opinion of Mr. Geoffrion, K.C., in regard to the same section. His opinion under date of May 15, 1935, to the Deputy Minister of Justice is as follows:

Sir,—In conformity with your letter of the 6th instant, I have read the bill to amend the criminal code, sections 4, 5 and 6, with a view of giving my opinion as to the powers of parliament to adopt it.

I believe this is good criminal legislation, therefore within the dominion's powers, except possibly paragraph (a) and (b) of section 415A as enacted by section 5 of the bill.

I take it that, generally, these paragraphs aim at punishment for violation of provincial legislation respecting minimum wages and maximum hours. Of course, there can be no doubt in so far as federal legislation on that subject is concerned. The majority of cases would, however, be covered by provincial laws because the subject of minimum wages and maximum hours of labour is, it seems to me, normally a provincial subject.

I know the dominion parliament has already claimed power to decree punishment for the violation of a provincial statute; section 164 of the criminal code is an example of that and this has never been challenged but I doubt the validity of such an enactment in view of section 92 of the British North America Act, paragraph 15, which gives to the provincial legislature exclusive legislative power concerning the imposition of punishments for enforcing any law of the province, et cetera, et cetera. If the dominion can decree a punishment for the breach of a provincial law, it can do so whether the province has decreed one or not. The legislative power in that respect ceases to be exclusive, notwithstanding the terms of the British North America Act and the dominion statute must prevail so that the provincial legislature enacting mandatory or prohibitory provisions will be exposed to have a punishment attached to its orders quite different from the one it desired. The power to order and the power to punish for disobedience should logically be united.

I would think the words "criminal law" in section 91 should be restricted by paragraph 15 of section 92, just as "marriage" in section 91 is restricted by "solemnization of marriage" in section 92. The general words in the assignment to the dominion in both cases being restricted by the special exclusive assignment to the province.

I do not think however, that these provisions, if unconstitutional, would affect the validity of the rest of the act.

Yours truly,

A. Geoffrion.

Now it will be noted that Mr. Geoffrion states as his opinion that sections 4 and 6 of the bill are within the jurisdiction of this parliament, and section 5 is also valid except possibly subsections (a) and (b). As to the contention of Mr. Geoffrion that we would be imposing penalties in regard to laws of the provinces in respect of which penalties are already imposed, it is to be noted that for many years. I think since 1888, our criminal code has contained clause 164, which I am going to read:

Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to one year's imprisonment, who, without legal excuse, disobeys any act of the parliament of Canada or of any legislature in Canada by wilfully doing any act which it forbids, or omitting to do any act which it requires to be done, unless some penalty or other mode of punishment is expressly provided by law.

That section has never been directly challenged in the courts. If anyone thinks it is a doubtful section, as Mr. Geoffrion does, at any rate it has stood the test of forty-five years and I think more than that. I know that an opinion was given on that question by the late Hon. Edward Blake, an eminent lawyer, who while Minister of Justice affirmed our right to impose these penalties notwithstanding penalties imposed by provincial laws, and that opinion has been followed in the department ever since.

Let me summarize the position. I leave out section 4 for the moment, because according to all legal opinions that we have obtained, both of the law officers of the department and of the two eminent counsel I have mentioned, section 4 is within the competence of the parliament of Canada. With regard to section 5, Mr. Geoffrion entertains doubts as to subclauses (a) and (b). Mr. Tilley expresses the opinion that the whole section is within the legislative competence of this parliament. In regard to section 6 Mr. Tilley expresses doubts as to subclause (a) but says subclauses (b) and (c) are valid. Mr. Geoffrion expresses the opinion that the whole of section 6 is within the competence of this parliament. On a former occasion it was very much criticized that the government should introduce into this house a bill in regard to which there should be some doubt expressed. It is not the first time such a course has been taken. There is doubt up to the present time about many of our constitutional rights, which have never been tested, and some provincial rights too. If on account of these doubts the provinces withhold their hands and pass no legislation, and if we are to do the same here, the result of course is stalemate and no legislation occupies the field. My hon. friend the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is not in his place, but he will well remember section 1025 of the criminal code, which abolished all appeals in criminal cases to the judicial committee of the privy council. That was a section of doubtful validity which was passed by this parliament. In 1928 when it came before the judicial committee they held it as ultra vires of this parliament—as bad, void. When the statute of Westminster was passed by the British parliament and re-enacted in this parliament, section 1025 was again passed by this house and the senate and became law, but recently it has been challenged again before the judicial committee, and on Thursday or Friday I think of last week a judgment was given maintaining the right of the parliament of Canada to enact section 1025.

Mr. DUFF: Did they know it was doubtful when they enacted it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It was always looked upon as doubtful.

Mr. DUFF: Was it so expressed here in parliament?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is an opinion in the Department of Justice that it was doubtful. I could enumerate a score of acts in regard to which there was doubt. I am going to mention one because it was up in the house to-day, that is the Canada Grain Act. When that law was enacted the late Mr. Justice Newcombe expressed the opinion that many of the sections were of doubtful validity. Subsequently the act was before the Supreme Court of Canada and certain sections were held invalid, as beyond the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. But in that case the supreme court suggested a remedy to us. They said: If you declare the elevators to be works for the general advantage of Canada, you might overcome the difficulty. In the following session, to cure the difficulty and remove the doubts, parliament passed an act to declare these elevators to be works for the general advantage of Canada. But there are some sections of the act not yet without doubt, and in order to remove further doubt or make the act secure so far as it might be possible to do so, this ingenious clause was put in at the end:

> 234. If it is found that parliament has exceeded its powers in the enactment of one or more of the provisions of this act, none of the other or remaining provisions of the act shall therefore be held to be inoperative or ultra vires, but the latter provisions shall stand as if they had been originally enacted as separate and independent enactments and as the only provisions of the act; the intention of parliament being to give independent effect to the extent of its powers to every enactment and provision in this act contained.

I submit the present measure in the form in which it is drawn is a serious attempt to carry out as far as it possibly can be done by this parliament the recommendations of the price spreads commission in regard to unfair trade practices. The best legal opinion we can get on the subject says that if we place these sections in the trade commission act, as recommended in the report, they will be ultra vires of the powers of this parliament as an interference with property and civil rights within the various provinces. If we place them in the criminal code, however, and treat this as criminal legislation, probably they will stand fire, although as I have elaborated doubt has been expressed in the opinions of Mr. Tilley and Mr. Geoffrion. The other sections of the code, of course, are not open to that constitutional conflict, but sections 4, 5 and 6 of this act are prepared with an eye to carrying out the recommendations of the price spreads commission.

I would ask this committee to give serious consideration to these clauses. I know they were rather roundly denounced the other night, but that does not get rid of them. They are entitled to serious consideration and in the main according to the best legal opinions obtainable, they are valid. Some of the subsections are called not invalid but doubtful. That is the spirit in which this bill is submitted to the house at the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Chairman, I think there could be written across the face of this bill, particularly sections 5 and 6, "sic transit gloria reform." If this is the best this government can do to implement all the promises contained in the radio speeches which were made last January, then it does seem to me that His Excellency the Governor General would be well advised to come down and dissolve this house.

I am going to deal with what my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has said in regard to the legal aspect of the matter, but I hope that the discussion will not entirely centre around the legal phases of this bill. This is just another instalment of the series of anti-climaxes to those radio speeches of January last, which has been furnished to this house during the last three or four months. From time to time we have had shreds and patches of the resounding sentiments which were expressed on that occasion. We have had the unemployment insurance act, which was broadcast so as to hold out the hope to the working people and the unemployed of this country that it was going to solve all their problems. But when the unemployment insurance act was brought down we found that it did not benefit anybody for a year at least; that it would not assist in the slightest in connection with the unemployment which exists in this country, but that it would only help those who were already employed and who were able to pay the assessments for the time set out in that act. We also found that it left out three of the four primary industries of the Dominion of Canada.

Then we had the eight hour day bill before us this afternoon, the law with regard to hours of labour on public works. In either the last or the next to last section of the bill we find that the act will not come into force until May 1, 1936. Then there was the Companies Act. We were going to do away with no par shares, those things which are said to have been the delusion of the investor. The amendment to the Companies Act has been brought down; no par shares are not struck out. They will continue to be issued notwithstanding the strictures of the Prime Minister regarding them. The dole was a rotten thing according to the radio speeches, but the dole still exists in Canada and we have been voting goodly amounts of relief money for that purpose. Now finally the report of the price spreads commission is crystallized into a few sections which appear in this act, and notwithstanding the statement which was made during the radio broadcasts with regard to the open market place, I would almost think that the open market place is going to continue. During the course of those speeches last January the Prime Minister said:

> You would agree that free competition and the open market place, as they were known in the old days, have lost their place in the system, and that the only substitute for them, in these modern times, is government regulation and control.

And, according to this act, that government regulation and control is going to consist of making it a crime for a man to give a greater discount to one man than to another.

I want to deal for a moment with section 6, which has been referred to by the Minister of Justice, and the legality of which has been discussed, in order to give the committee the effect of what section 6 really provides. Section 6 says in substance that if Mr. A is doing business and gives to Mr. B a greater discount on a similar quantity of goods than the discount which he gives to Mr. C, Mr. A is guilty of a crime and should go to gaol. It does not make any difference that Mr. A is giving that larger discount to Mr. B in order to meet a price which Mr. B had been quoted by somebody else; Mr. A is still a criminal because of the fact that he met the price of his competitor. There is nothing in the act which intimates that Mr. A cannot give Mr. B a lower price than he gives Mr. C; all that is provided is that he must not give a greater discount. That is to say, while he cannot quote a price of $100 and give one man ten per cent off and another man fifteen per cent off, there is nothing in the section which says he cannot quote one man a price of $80 and another man a price of $85, because that is not giving a discount. Neither is there anything in the section to suggest that he could not take a base price of $80 and say to one man, "I will give you these goods at $80 plus ten per cent," and to another man, "I will give you these goods at $80 plus fifteen per cent"; in that case he has not committed any crime because he has not given any rebate or discount.

I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that we ought seriously to consider the legislation we put on the statute books. All we are doing here is to make law evaders of the people of the Dominion of Canada when we pass sections of that kind, and I am leaving out altogether the question of the validity of the act. I say on the construction of the act itself it is nothing less than a snare and a delusion so far as the mercantile people of this country are concerned, and nothing less than a sham and mockery so far as the relief of the consumer is concerned. There is nothing real in it. People can readily evade the law; anyone can read it and see that he can easily get around a section like this, but still the section is put in in deference to some of those who feel that if they could have their feelings salved by having at least a little of the report of the price spreads commission carried out that would at least save their faces. I submit that a section which prevents an honest trader from meeting competition and makes no allowance for savings in sales costs on account of selling a large volume is not the sort of section which should be written into the criminal law of the Dominion of Canada. We had a commission which cost this country $500,000. If this is the best this government can bring down in implementing the report of that commission then that $500,000 has been worse than wasted. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that a section of this kind is just silly; it is just meddling, that is all; interfering and irritating without doing the slightest good.

I am not the only one who holds that opinion. The other night I noticed, and I intended to read, an editorial which appeared not in a Liberal organ but in a newspaper which is supposed to support this government, the Montreal Star. It was referring to the remarks of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when he introduced this bill, when he admitted that some of these sections were of doubtful validity. This is what the Star said:

> Doubtless our parliamentarians, both inside and outside the cabinet, will have this phase of the matter well in view. The senate just the other day had to hold up and rewrite a government measure which had passed the commons. Last week we heard a minister introduce a bill with the amazing statement that he was not quite sure of its constitutionality.

That was the Minister of Justice, in connection with the bill we are now considering.

Surely now there will be an end to this sort of thing. Parliament will have the full support of the people in adopting legislation which promises to ameliorate, even to a small degree, the genuinely distressing conditions under which our people are to-day living, but it will not earn any public gratitude by driving through sham relief measures which profess to work miracles but which will lead only to chaos, disappointment, a further paralysis of business and the general confusion which to-day pervades the United States.

I do not think any more apt words could have been used concerning the bill before us to-night, in view of what the Minister of Justice has just said, than the words I have just read. We remember what occurred in the United States. Chaos and confusion reign because a law was enacted; business had to set up new machinery and make expensive readjustments to meet it and when attempts were made to enforce it it was held to be without legal foundation. The result is that the man who played the game and lived up to the letter of this invalid law has been penalized because his competitor had nerve enough to disregard it. The same situation will arise in Canada, one which would lead only to disappointment. The people who do attempt to live up to it will be prejudiced and, will be at a disadvantage with their competitors.

Now, with regard to the legal situation I am not going to attempt to discuss the opinions which the Minister of Justice has read to-night. I should be perfectly satisfied, had we definite opinions from either of the gentlemen whom he has quoted. I should be satisfied if we had a definite opinion from the Department of Justice itself. But the minister a few nights ago, upon introducing the bill, and in a discussion in committee intimated clearly that he himself held the gravest doubts as to its validity. We do not have to go farther than that. At page 3166 of Hansard he makes the statement that the opinion of the law officers of the crown is that section 5 presents some difficulties. He has now brought forward Mr. Geoffrion's opinion in which it is stated that that gentleman is doubtful about the validity of clauses (a) and (b) of section 5. And the minister tells us the Department of Justice was doubtful about all the clauses of section 5. On the other hand Mr. Tilley felt they could be supported; so there we are. There is no doubt that the Minister of Justice and his department are doubtful about section 5. In fact the minister is doubtful about the whole section and Mr. Geoffrion is doubtful about subsections (a) and (b), and still it is proposed to pass this bill.

The Minister of Justice has said that if we do not legislate and if the province does not legislate, both being fearful of our jurisdiction, what will happen? I say to him, and I think he will agree with me that there is no reason in the world why the province could not legislate in connection with subsection (a) and (b) of section 5. No person has suggested that the province has not the right to legislate with regard to employment of persons at rates of wages less than the minimum rates fixed by law or public authority. There is no difficulty about the province legislating in that matter. Up to this time we have assumed that the provinces have had jurisdiction with respect to minimum wages. In fact, all the parliamentary utterances from the Prime Minister down for a long time past have indicated that the provinces were the bodies which had the jurisdiction with regard to wage rates. Therefore there should be no question that the province has power to legislate with regard to the matters contained in subsection (a) of the new section 415A and the same applies to subsection (b). The minister's fears about nobody being able to legislate if we do not attempt to do it here seem quite groundless.

If I were permitted to express an opinion about subsection (c) of section 5 I should have thought it was valid. That is to say, in connection with the subsection which reads:

(c) falsifies any employment record required to be kept by law or any competent public authority;

I should have thought that falsification was a criminal offence, and that in its very nature it was morally wrong and detrimental to the public interest. But subsections (a) and (b) are different. They have to do with matters of contract and civil rights. Then, subsection (d) reads:

(d) punches a time clock with intent to deceive;

That would seem to be a crime. Then, as to subsections (e), (f), (g), and (h) I would say that subsection (e) may contain an element of crime but, as the law officers of the crown have properly indicated, subsections (f), (g), and (h) seem to deal with matters essentially having to do with private contracts.

I now turn to section 6 of the bill. What are the opinions respecting this section to which the Minister of Justice has referred. He stated in no uncertain terms that he had doubts as to the validity of this section—and when I refer to section 6 I direct your attention particularly to subsection (a), with which I have just dealt, and which makes it a crime for a man to give a greater discount to one man than to his competitor. The Minister of Justice has doubts about this section. The following opinion expressed by Mr. Tilley appears at page 3166 of Hansard:

> Subsection (1) of section 6 is, I think, of very doubtful validity, but sections (2) and (3) are, I think, valid.

By subsection (1) he means, I think, subsection (a). At a later point, at page 3167 of Hansard, the opinion of Mr. Tilley is cited as follows:

> All I can say is that in my opinion the subsections is of very doubtful validity, and I incline to the view it is invalid.

Here he is again speaking of subsection (a) of section 6. I do not think we need much more than that. However, let us turn to the statement of the Minister of Justice as it appears at page 3168 of Hansard. This is what the minister says:

> I am giving the committee an opportunity of passing an opinion on the point. I think myself that they would be very inefficacious even if they were passed. I do not believe you could ever support a prosecution on them because you never could prove your case.

What is the use of our passing legislation of that kind? Why waste our time on it? First we have the opinion of Mr. Tilley that the subsections are doubtful, then we have the opinion of the Minister of Justice that he has grave doubts; then we have the opinions of the law officers of the crown that there is doubt. On top of that we have the opinion of the Minister of Justice that in any event it would be inefficacious.

I submit it is time we go to something more substantial than writing formal crimes into law books, knowing in the first instance that there are grave doubts as to the validity of the statutes enacted and graver doubts as to the possibility of securing convictions under them. I should have thought the Minister of Justice would have withdrawn these sections as to which doubts have been expressed by these eminent jurists. I submit for the consideration of this committee and that of the Minister of Justice that we had better devote our attention to something which holds in it more hope for the urgent problems of the people of this dominion than does the legislation before us.

I conclude my observations by quoting a statement which appeared in a letter written last fall by the Prime Minister to one of his colleagues, upon which occasion he pointed out the danger of raising the hopes of people with regard to legislation of doubtful constitutional validity. Writing to the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), the Prime Minister said:

> In due course a committee of eleven was appointed and you were elected chairman. From that time the committee had an absolutely free hand and no effort of any kind, shape or form was made to in any way limit or restrict its activities except that on more than one occasion we pointed out to you the danger of creating in the minds of those interested, especially in the retail business, the impression that parliament could provide a remedy for the conditions of which they complained in view of the decisions of the courts as to the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures over contracts and price fixing.

I commend that passage to you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee. I believe we may well take note of it and the warning contained therein, namely, not to take our time in the passage of legislation of doubtful validity, and the attempt by a stroke of a pen to make the people of Canada conform to some idealistic standard of business ethics couched in such general language as to prohibit perfectly legitimate and straightforward business transactions, and which cannot be enforced.

I submit to the Minister of Justice that the sections which he is advised by these eminent jurists are invalid or of doubtful validity ought to be withdrawn, so that we may get on with something more practical and useful.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Chairman, may I make bold to attempt to reply to some of the objections raised by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), the critic of the opposition. I wonder whether he has made it clear even to himself what his plan is so far as the carrying out of the report of the price spreads commission is concerned.

Mr. RALSTON: Ask some of your own friends.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): This attack is a fair example of the guerilla warfare that is being carried on by the Liberal party throughout Canada, and a very considerable section of the financially interested press, so far as implementing the report of the price spreads commission is concerned.

Let me first refer to the question of the legality of the amendments. I refer specifically to section 6 of the bill now under discussion. With reference to the opinion expressed by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) quoting

Mr. Tilley as to the legality of these sections, I refer the committee to an article which appeared in the Toronto Globe of June 4, under the heading How Great Minds Think Alike.

A new and remarkable example of identity of thought expression, showing how great legal minds can think, speak and give legal opinions alike, and in strangely similar language, has brightened the annals of Canadian law. It is supplied by two legal opinions—one of the late Hon. Edward Blake, K.C., and one of W. N. Tilley, K.C., regarding the same questions of law submitted for their views at periods forty-five years apart.

Then is quoted the opinion of Mr. Tilley in 1935. His opinion has already been put on record in Hansard of this session at page 3166. The article then goes on to quote Mr. Tilley as follows:

The result may be an inconvenient exposure to a double liability, but that possibility affords no argument against the right of the dominion to exercise its powers.

Continuing, the writer of the article in the Globe says:

The same legal questions as to a conflict between dominion and provincial legislation arising out of convictions and penalties for offences under dominion and provincial laws, within the power of both to legislate upon, arose in two old cases in Ontario in the years 1890 and 1892 respectively.

Mr. Blake—1890.

In one of these—that of Regina versus Stone, in the year 1892, reported in volume 23 of the Ontario Law Reports—the late Mr. Justice Rose, at page 49 of that case, said:

"In my opinion, Mr. Edward Blake, in his argument in Regina versus Wason, correctly stated the law as follows: 'The jurisdiction of the provinces and the dominion overlap. The dominion can declare anything a crime, but this only so as not to interfere with or exclude the powers of the province of dealing with the same thing in its civil aspect and of imposing sanctions for the observance of the law (See No. 15 of section 92) so that, though the result might be an inconvenient exposure to a double liability that possibility is no argument against the right to exercise the power.'"

So much for the opinion of the late Hon. Mr. Blake. Now I refer to a comparatively recent case, as recent as 1931, a case with which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Ralston) is thoroughly familiar, the Proprietary Articles Trade Association et al, appellants, and Attorney General for Canada et al, respondents, which was heard by the privy council on appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada (Law Reports appeal cases, 1931, page 310). Without referring to other matters which may be more appropriately dealt with when the bill creating the dominion trade and industry commission is receiving the attention of the house, I refer to a certain phase of the judgment which is entirely in point. It discusses the question of the right of the parliament of Canada to declare acts criminal, and the whole principle is discussed in detail with respect to the limitations or otherwise of the federal parliament to declare acts criminal and to fix penalties. The views there expressed are to my mind particularly important in view of the contention that is sometimes made that the jurisdiction of this parliament to declare an act criminal must be in respect of some act that is by its very nature venal. I submit that that is not the law, and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth I opine is also clearly aware that that is not the law. In any event the unanimous judgment of the privy council delivered by Lord Atkin on behalf of the committee, dealing with the point under discussion, will be found at the bottom of page 323 of the report to which I have referred. In discussing federal jurisdiction as to establishing criminal offences, Lord Atkin states:

The definition is wide and may cover activities which have not hitherto been considered to be criminal. But only those combines are affected which have operated or are likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public whether consumers, producers, or others; and if parliament genuinely determines that commercial activities which can be so described are to be suppressed in the public interest, Their Lordships see no reason why parliament should not make them crimes. "Criminal law" means "the criminal law in its widest sense."

Then is cited the case of the Attorney General of Ontario versus the Hamilton Street Railway, 1903, A.C. 524. Continuing, Lord Atkin says:

It certainly is not confined to what was criminal by the law of England, or of any province in 1867. The power must extend to legislation to make new crimes. Criminal law connotes only the quality of such acts or omissions as are prohibited under appropriate penal provisions by authority of the state. The criminal quality of an act cannot be designed by intuition; nor can it be discovered by reference to any statute but one; Is the act prohibited with penal consequences? . . . . It appears to Their Lordships to be of little value to seek to confine crimes to a category of acts which by their very nature belong to the domain of "criminal jurisprudence"; for the domain of criminal jurisprudence can only be ascertained by examining what acts of any particular period are declared by the state to be crimes, and the only common nature they will be found to possess is that they are prohibited by the state and that those who commit them are punished.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend not think that Mr. Tilley had that judgment in mind when he gave the opinion that notwithstanding that judgment this bill is of doubtful validity? And the Minister of Justice was also perfectly aware of that judgment and still is of the opinion that this measure is of doubtful validity.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I can no more guess what was in the mind of Mr. Tilley than I was able to guess when my hon. friend sat down what was his real attitude towards implementing the report of the price spreads commission.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend not think that Mr. Tilley would have taken occasion to examine the decision which has just been quoted before he gave the opinion which was read by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I would assume, if my hon. friend asks me to speculate, that Mr. Tilley was familiar with that judgment.

Mr. RALSTON: Thank you.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): And as I understand the opinion he has given, it is not that the proposed amendments to the criminal code which I am now discussing are invalid.

Mr. RALSTON: He said the section is of doubtful validity—

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Chairman, if my hon. friend wishes to question me on any matter on which I can provide information I shall gladly give it, but to ask me to speculate as to what was in another man's mind—

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me? I am only pointing out to my hon. friend, who said that Mr. Tilley had not given that opinion, that Mr. Tilley distinctly said, "I incline to the view that it is invalid."

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): What particular section?

Mr. RALSTON: Section 6, subsection (a).

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): We go to the privy council for the law and there is the law as laid down in the most recent judgment of the privy council by Lord Atkin in 1931. I think my hon. friend if he were arguing a case in the supreme court here would feel that he was entitled to rely on this judgment of Lord Atkin until such time as it was overruled. I submit, therefore, apart altogether from the question whether these sections will effectively achieve what the report of the price spreads commission hoped to achieve, that they are quite valid. As to their effectiveness, that is another matter on which I shall perhaps have something to say when the Dominion trade and industry commission bill is before the house.

Let me say very humbly as ex-chairman of the royal commission on price spreads that I am indeed gratified to know that the government, even in the face of the attacks levelled against it on account of the possible doubt as to some of the legislation they propose, are going so far in spirit to implement the recommendations contained in the price spreads report. I congratulate the government upon their willingness even to submit themselves to the attacks to which they have been subjected to-night in their desire to carry out in spirit the recommendations of the price spreads commission.

Let me make another observation. It may be that upon challenge some of these provisions will be found to be invalid. As a member of the bar of twenty-five years standing I am familiar with the attitude of lawyers towards legislation and contracts. In advising as to the validity or otherwise of contracts they are influenced by their very training. Out of abundance of caution—ex abundante cautela—they feel it to be their duty towards their clients to advise against entering into a contract which might possibly be invalid. But when we come to legislating in this house in the way of reform I do not think that that hesitant attitude should prevail. I have enough respect for my opinion and reputation not to argue in or out of this house for something which I believe to be obviously invalid. When the legislation being introduced is to provide remedies for abuses which are recognized by all hon. members as such; when it is agreed that the act or acts sought to be prohibited should be prohibited, then I submit we should be willing to break and occupy new ground. If on challenge this legislation be found to be invalid, I submit that it will not have been in vain. What purpose will it have served, even though it be successfully challenged? The federal government has sought to remedy practices which are considered unfair and against the public interest, and if it be held that the federal government has not jurisdiction so to do, then it will have served the purpose of directing the eyes of the people of Canada to the necessity of a readjustment of the legislative jurisdiction as between the federal and provincial governments. If it serves no other purpose than that, it has served well.

The comments of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth are very similar to those which have appeared in a large section of the press. What has been the purpose of this comment? I am not imputing any insincerity to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, but the purpose of his comments has been to condemn this legislation in one way or another and to condemn the report of the price spreads commission by this guerilla warfare, thus rendering it ineffective. He is, in effect, saying: Nothing can be done; let things go on as they were. In support of this statement I should like to make reference to some of the press comments, which have been very misleading in two important respects. First, they have exaggerated the number of boards and necessary employees recommended, and, second, they have implied that the report recommended price fixing and much more drastic control of actual business operations than the commission ever contemplated. I quote from the Financial Post of May 25, as follows:

> It would require about 3,000 new civil servants to implement all the regulatory measures proposed by the price spreads report.

And on May 18:

> It assumes that two score or more new statutes and several thousand new political office holders—

And on April 20:

> In all, the report recommends 13 new government bodies.

I quote from the Toronto Telegram of April 9:

> Price spreads report recommends score of new bodies.

Mr. YOUNG: Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): The hon. member laughs because I quote from a paper which supports the government. He is not accustomed to hon. members on his side being as fair as that. The same exaggerations appeared in the Border City Star of April 6, the London Advertiser of April 10 and the Winnipeg Free Press of May 2, but I shall not take the time to quote them. Hon. members opposite, both in and out of the house, parrot-like, have repeated the accusation that we proposed setting up thirteen new boards to be staffed with some three thousand additional employees. The facts are that two of the boards proposed, the live stock and fisheries—whatever their merits or demerits may be—are recommended to be set up under appropriate jurisdiction. In so far as the live stock board is concerned, the appropriate jurisdiction would be the Department of Agriculture; in the case of the fisheries board there is a pertinent department under which it would operate. In other words, the recommendation is for nothing more than a reorientation of some of the work now being done in the Department of Agriculture with respect to live stock, marketing, grading, statistics, et cetera; or in the fishing industry for the setting up of an agency of the sort already provided for by the Natural Products Marketing Act. So much for the two boards.

The new division of standards recommended for the Department of Labour was so described to emphasize the necessity of having the functions for which the department was originally created more adequately performed. No such recommendation would have been necessary if the department had been adequately staffed. The securities board and the consumer commodities standards board were so described to emphasize the importance of their functions. However, the report is very clear that they are only sections of the trade commission, and that their membership would consist of representatives of other departments having to do with the same or related problems. With the need for better coordination of government departments, it is surely no offence to recommend the establishment of inter-departmental committees. Surely it is better if we are going to tackle these problems at all to support the judgment of one official, for example, the director of the securities division of the trade commission, with the judgment of his colleagues who have to consider the same general problems from slightly different points of view. I refer hon. members to price spreads report, page 238.

In the sense in which the press refers to the creation of new boards and commissions, the report in fact recommended only three, live stock, fisheries and the trade and industry commission. It is true the trade commission would probably have several sections. It is true also that in various connections we recommended the creation of unpaid advisory committees, but surely no objection can be taken to the government making every effort to secure the practical advice and cooperation of those who are likely to be affected by the administration of any law, new or old. To say that a score of new agencies was recommended is the grossest distortion.

The frequently publicized suggestion that three thousand new civil servants would be needed is even worse. This would be from four to six times the number employed by the United States federal trade commission. Even if the dominion trade commission were given all the powers recommended, it would probably start with a staff of not more than twenty-five and the utmost expansion of its powers would not call for a staff of more than one hundred.

I quote from the Saturday Night of April 20:

> —the commission would decide whether its capitalization was fair, and that would mean estimating the earning power of the enterprise ... would decide whether there were enough in the industry already ... would have power to decide the price level and to determine discounts, terms and other trade practices.

Whoever wrote that editorial did not take the trouble to read the report, or if he read it, he did so without seeing its clear intent. With respect to securities the recommendations were simply that gross overcapitalization and deceptive prospectuses by which investors might be defrauded should be prohibited and conservative practices—I use the word in the best sense—should be encouraged. There was no recommendation that all businesses should be licensed, none that prices or even discounts should be fixed by government authority. In fact, price fixing was positively rejected as a generally unsound policy. I refer hon. members to page 144 of the report.

During the Easter recess I read a six or seven column article in Saturday Night which attacked the report on the basis of price fixing and which referred to the failure of the price fixing features of the NRA. Price fixing was the one thing which we studiously avoided recommending and, therefore, this long article is based upon a false premise. Such is the basis of much of the press comment. I shall not take up more of the time of the committee so far as press comment is concerned. As to why the press adopts this attitude, hon. members can judge as well as I; but when I see papers like the Financial Post and Toronto Saturday Night attacking the report, damning it out of hand, without a proper or adequate consideration of it, then I must assume they are actuated by some other motive than that of the public weal.

As to these sections, I will frankly state this: I think the section immediately under review, that is section 6, the amendment to the criminal code, section 498A with the subsections dealing with discriminating in trade, and so forth, really touches only the "fringe" of what was intended.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Well, my hon. friend agrees with me when it suits him. That section touches only the fringe of what the price spreads report recommends. As I have said, I believe these provisions are valid; but let me say this: When you come to deal in the criminal code with trade practices that are found and generally admitted to be unfair, I question the ultimate effectiveness of dealing with them exclusively in that way. It is all well and good to deal with them in the criminal code by making crimes and offences of certain practices that we all agree should be prohibited in the public interest, but I think there is too great a rigidity in that method of dealing with them. What may be an unfair competitive practice and against public interest on one set of facts to-day may conceivably not be unfair even on a similar set of facts to-morrow. Times change; competitive conditions change; the circumstances of commerce change, and even though you do outlaw in the criminal code certain trade practices that are obviously unfair, yet the ingenuity of the mind to find other means of unfair trade practices knows no bounds. You may outlaw certain practices to-day, but to-morrow other practices may crop up; so here I advance the view, which I propose to deal with more completely when we are considering the Dominion Trade and Industry Act, that in attempting to deal with unfair competitive practices, a trade and industry board should be given certain administrative power of its own volition and after investigation and consultation with those who are trained in the industry in question, to find what are unfair trade practices and to issue an order to cease and desist. In that way you escape the defect of the rigidity of putting such provisions in the criminal code alone. In other words, by such a procedure you have what may be called a continuity of administrative power. Therefore the best way to deal with the matter effectively is to set up such a board—and I submit the effectiveness of that board will depend largely upon its personnel—and give it power to determine from time to time, in the light of the investigations it may make and in the light of consultations with representatives of the industry itself, what are fair and unfair practices and to prohibit the latter.

Just one further point and I shall have finished. Another hurdle that is raised apart from constitutionality is the question asked by some: How can any board say what is "fair" and what is "unfair?" We have some leaders of business travelling across the country, even referring to us as "shyster politicians." Mr. Burton of the Simpson Company on a recent trip west was reported in the press as referring to conditions as looking good after the rains but saying that if they could only get rid of a few of these "shyster politicians," everything would be well. The same

Mr. Burton who decried the idea that it was possible for any member of the House of Commons to know anything about business or anything in respect of it, went to Saskatchewan and gave a panacea for employing all the unemployed youth of the country. He was going to regiment them with colonels, majors, captains, lieutenants, sergeant majors, sergeants, corporals and lance-corporals, and put them into camps, and all that sort of thing. I quote that merely as a measure of the value of his judgment as to what we can do in this house, and I would suggest to him that if that is a fair measure of the value of his views, he had better stay behind the ribbon counter.

As to what is "fair" or "unfair," there are some matters that are fundamental. The sense of right or wrong; the sense of what is fair or what is unfair—these are instincts that are embedded in every human heart. This is a sense that overleaps all barriers of race, creed or colour. And so, when such a board comes to deal with practices in the trade, with power to put investigators into any line of business, to put in experts or accountants, to have books opened to them, to call witnesses and to consult those interested in the industry in question, I submit it is not a too difficult task for such a board to decide within reason what is a fair or an unfair practice.

One other point is this: this proposed legislation is often attacked from the point of view that we seem to think all business is dishonest. That was not the impression created on the price spreads commission as interpreted by me; we found that there is an honour in business, which is the fine gold of it. I have enough faith in my fellowmen to believe the average man wants to do the decent thing; he wants to conduct business in a decent way. This legislation is designed not to make criminals out of honest men or to attack those who want to play the game, but to clip the wings of the "chisellers" in commerce and to make it easier for those who want to do business in a decent way to do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not propose to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) in everything he has said. I agree with some of what he has said; I think a certain section of the press has exaggerated the amount of government expenditure which would be necessary to carry out the recommendations of the price spreads commission, and I believe there would be no such addition to the civil service as such a paper as, for example, the Financial Post, suggests. But I do not think the hon. member should have imputed the motives he did to those who express sincere objections to some of the recommendations of the price spreads commission. I thought he went entirely too far and was a little bit too free in what he said in that connection; nor do I know of any guerilla warfare that is being conducted against any recommendations designed to remedy abuses that were revealed by the investigation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is all on the other side.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is all over there.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is all on the other side. What about your own government?

Mr. ILSLEY: The line between those who want a remedy of abuses that were revealed by the price spreads commission is not one that runs between two political parties. I would almost go as far as to say that I think every hon. member of this house would like to see these abuses remedied. But it is one thing to say that and another thing to say that everyone should agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre in the methods he thinks should be adopted for remedying those abuses. There was disagreement between the members of the commission, and there continues to be disagreement up to the present time. As the hon. member correctly said, the commission recommended establishment of three boards or bodies, a federal trade and industries commission, a board of live stock commissioners and a fisheries board. Three of the Liberal members of the commission, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Boulanger), the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor), and myself, dissented from the recommendation to set up a board of live stock commissioners because we thought it would be a fifth wheel to the coach, entirely unnecessary, and that anything it could possibly do could be done by existing agencies. In that respect our attitude seems to have met with the approval of the government. The government do not propose to take steps to set up a board of live stock commissioners, and I commend them for their good sense in coming to that decision. In regard to the board of fisheries, I suppose we shall be represented in the fishing districts of the maritime provinces as not wanting to help the fishermen. But nothing could be further from the truth than that. In as carefully reasoned a statement as we were capable of making we gave the reasons why we thought the establishment of a fisheries board with the powers that were recommended by the majority of the commissioners would hurt the fishermen more than it would help them.

We thought it would be a serious injury rather than a benefit to the fishing industry of the maritime provinces, and I do not want to be represented either here or elsewhere as being out of sympathy with the fishermen of the maritime provinces because I had an honest difference of opinion with some of my colleagues about what should be done to help them.

When we come to the matters before the committee—and really we are discussing sections 4, 5 and 6 of the amending bill—I want to say very frankly what I think about those sections. I listened with great care to the opinions read by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) which he obtained from Mr. Tilley and Mr. Geoffrion. I am so much impressed with the seriousness of the offences against the minimum wage acts of the provinces that I should be disposed to concur in the enactment of such criminal legislation by this parliament as would have the effect of putting an end to these abuses. So far as I can see, there would not be much objection to the enactment of 415A, that is section 5 of the amending act. It is true that there is an opinion of one counsel, Mr. Geoffrion, that subsections (a) and (b) are not within the competence of this parliament. I thoroughly appreciate the legal reasons given by Mr. Geoffrion for that conclusion. But it is not an extremely serious thing for this parliament to legislate beyond its jurisdiction on a matter of this kind. It is a very different thing when we come to section 6, as I shall try to point out. It adds another penalty, which may or may not be enforceable. I should think there is some argument for the validity of the section; apparently Mr. Tilley thinks its provisions are perfectly enforceable. What occurs to me is that the violation of minimum wage regulations, the payment of girl workers at less than the minimum rate and the fraudulent and cruel practices resorted to by many employers, are of national, not only of provincial, importance, and that there is considerable justification for the enactment of legislation of the kind set out in section 5.

But when we come to section 6 different considerations prevail. To put the matter very briefly I should say it would be a mistake to pass subsection A of section 498, which is found in section 6 of the bill. Let us look at that section:

> Every person engaged in trade or commerce or industry is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding $1,000 or to one month's imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding $5,000 who
> (a) is a party or privy to, or knowingly assists in, any transaction of sale which discriminates against competitors of the purchaser in that any discount, rebate or allowance is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate or allowance granted to the aforesaid competitors in respect of a sale of goods of a similar quality and quantity;

Perhaps the committee is not fully aware of the grounds for the recommendation against discriminatory discounts, rebates and allowances that is contained in the price spreads report. I do not know with certainty what was in the minds of my fellow commissioners, but I can say what was in my own mind in coming to the conclusion that discriminatory rebates, discounts and allowances are for the most part injurious to the economic life of the country. It was this, and this only: that the tendency of such discriminatory rebates, discounts and allowances is to eliminate competition. I suppose a person has to have a certain economic philosophy in considering our contemporary life in this country. Most of the commission did not take the socialistic view that competition should be done away with, but rather the view that competition should be preserved, that competition is a most important regulating factor, and that our legislation should be directed to the objective of preserving fair competition among our trades and industries. It was brought to the attention of the commission that manufacturers were giving much larger discounts to corporate department stores and perhaps chain stores—although I would not be certain of my recollection on that point—than they were giving to voluntary chains. The committee will understand what that means. A great department store with immense buying power is able to get a discount of say twelve or fourteen per cent off the list price. A number of independent retailers get together, form a voluntary chain and undertake to buy in just as large quantities, to pay cash and to warehouse, in other words as purchasers to put themselves on exactly the same footing as the corporate purchaser. But it was discovered that the members of the rubber combine, so-called, would not give them the same terms that they gave the corporate purchaser. The inevitable effect of such a practice on a wide scale is to drive out the independent competitors of the corporate purchaser. It lessens competition, and if continued for a long period of years results in something approaching monopoly, or quasi-monopoly. That is the basis of the legislation in the United States—I do not know whether in other countries or not—against discriminatory discounts, rebates and allowances, that it results in the elimination of competition and thereby deprives the consumer of the protection which he should be given by the preservation of competition. None of that, of course, appears from this section. It is quite possible that if the section were redrafted in such a way as to show that the public interest was being thought of, it might have a much better chance of running the gauntlet of the courts than it will in its present form. I direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to that; because he will recall that in the Combines Investigation Act case from which the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has read, that was a very important element in the decision. The judicial committee of the privy council said:

> —if parliament genuinely determines that commercial activities which can be so described are to be suppressed in the public interest, their lordships se no reason why parliament should not make them crimes.

But in the Combines Investigation Act it was expressly stated that only those combines which operated or were likely to operate to the detriment or against the interest of the public, whether consumers, producers or others, were to be regarded as criminal enterprises, and it might be possible by a change of draftsmanship to give this section a better chance before the courts. I do not agree with my hon. and learned friend from Winnipeg South Centre that we should pass invalid legislation for the sake of directing public attention to particular matters.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): If the hon. gentleman will permit me, I clearly pointed out that I had too much respect for my reputation to suggest that either in this house or out of it I would support the passing of obviously invalid legislation. My argument was that there was some doubt about the legislation, and I advanced the suggestion that where it was only a question of some doubt we might well pass it and run the risk of the challenge.

Mr. ILSLEY: My answer to that is that we should not pass even doubtful legislation if there is a possibility of making it valid. There is a tendency in this parliament this session to go at the passing of legislation in a very careless and irresponsible manner. The NRA decision in the United States rendered a great service in bringing it home to the people of this country that you cannot just put on the statute books anything you feel like putting there, whether or not it is constitutional, and that to pass a volume of doubtful, unconstitutional and invalid legislation causes immense misery, unrest, disappointment and discontent among the people of the country and leaves them in all kinds of losses, difficulties and trouble. When hon. gentlemen opposite attack this party for paying some attention to the constitutionality of this legislation they are overlooking that fact. A person is rendering a service to his country when he points out the respects in which legislation is doubtful or unconstitutional, and I think no one realizes that better than the hon. gentleman who preceded me in this debate. I said that was the basis of legislation such as this, but you can drive through this section with a coach and four. As the Minister of Justice very correctly said, under this section it will be impossible to get a conviction.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, I did not say that.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was something like that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said it would be difficult.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be very, very difficult. To begin with, as my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth pointed out, this affects only rebates, discounts and allowances; it does not affect price discriminations. For instance it is still possible, and quite properly so, for a man who, for example, has apples or fish on his hands to take on the same day from the second purchaser a different price from that which he took from the first purchaser. You have to do it in order to get rid of your product. There are many cases, particularly in connection with perishable goods, where there must be price discrimination, and anything that prevents price discrimination prevents the carrying on of business. If the section were changed to affect price discriminations there would have to be a great many exceptions and provisos.

Very little care has been exercised in the drafting of this section; apparently whoever drafted it had only a superficial view of the problem before him. The problem is a very difficult one to meet. It is hard to make the offences definite and put them in the criminal code because then, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre very properly pointed out, those desiring to evade the law think of a new form in which to carry on their evasion. On the other hand if you set up a board and leave it to the board to define offences, you give that board a dangerous power; you really give it the power to legislate in what is essentially the criminal phase, so it is a very difficult problem. I do not know whether the draftsman of this legislation studied what they did in the United States. In 1914 in that country they had extensive debates on these very topics, and since then they have had legislation under two acts, the Clayton Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act. I think I will place on Hansard section 2 of the Clayton Act in order to show the care with which this legislation was drafted in the United States, a very different thing entirely from this slapdash section.

2. That it shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce, in the course of such commerce, either directly or indirectly to discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any similar possession or any other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, where the effect of such discrimination may be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce: provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation, or discrimination in price in the same or different communities made in good faith to meet competition: and provided further, that nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade.

I do not know that I would advocate the adoption of that section but certainly I would be opposed to the adoption of subsection (a) as it is placed before the House of Commons. To begin with, it does not touch the question of volume discounts at all; it refers only to quantity discounts. The great evil—I know it is controversial as to whether or not it is an evil, but I consider it so—that we found was that a purchaser who was prepared to buy in equal volume to another purchaser, over a certain period, say a period of a year—

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Does not the term "quantity" mean the same as "volume"?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I do not think there is anything in common between the two. My hon. friend will remember that there was a clear distinction between volume discounts and quantity discounts. The quantity discount is the discount on a certain shipment; the volume discount is what the purchaser gets over a certain period of time. They are altogether different, and in turn they are both different from a quota discount, which is something else again. Then there are trade discounts and cash discounts. This provision only applies to quantity discounts. Volume discounts in my judgment, are the important discounts. The case I mentioned a while ago was a case of gross discrimination in volume discounts, something which I do not consider to be in the interests of the country, and something which should be prevented if it can be prevented by legislation. Certainly it cannot be prevented in this superficial way.

I do not know that I have very much more to say with regard to this section, but I consider it so far short of anything that is useful that I do not think this subsection should be passed. Of course none of these sections is any good unless you have a vigorous board or commission to do the investigating; I think my hon. friend admitted that. When we come to subsections (b) and (c), I do not see any objection to them; I do not think there is any question about their constitutionality or their validity, but in those sections the burden of proof on the crown is extremely heavy. The crown must prove that there is a policy of selling goods; they must prove in the one case that the goods are sold at unreasonably low prices, and they must prove that they are sold for a certain purpose, that purpose being to destroy competition or eliminate a competitor. There is no doubt in my mind that if that is proved there ought to be a conviction and there ought to be an enactment that will justify a conviction. The whole history of the Standard Oil Company in the United States is a history of predatory price cutting and territorial price discrimination, which resulted in that company driving out its competitors one by one until it had nearly the whole of the business in the United States. If there had been enactments like this which could have been enforced—I admit that they are very difficult of enforcement—they would have prevented a great evil in the United States, and I think possibly the same would be true in the Dominion of Canada.

So to put it briefly my position—and I do not think my hon. friend will say it is a position of guerilla warfare—is a mild position: Although there are some doubts about the constitutionality of subsections (a) and (b) of the new section 415A, and although the law officers of the crown condemn practically all the section, I should be disposed to support it. But subsection (a) of section 498A is so bad it should not be supported. Subsections (b) and (c) should be supported, but owing to the terrific burden on the crown of enforcing them I am doubtful whether there would be many convictions under those subsections. All the subsections of section 498A will be a dead letter unless we have a vigorous investigating body behind them to get out the evidence and to find out whether or not such evidence comes within the meaning of the sections.

Mr. STEVENS: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the observations of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) as well as those of the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley). I rather regret the attitude indicated by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. He is one of the outstanding legal minds of the house, and I think he will not accuse me of discourtesy if I say that really the substance of his remarks was to pour ridicule on the whole business. To one who is not a lawyer, but I hope not without some experience and some knowledge in matters of this kind, I felt a bit of despair come over me. Is it possible, Mr. Chairman, that when we are confronted with conditions which those who have given any thought to the matter at all must admit are tragic, this great house of parliament is so helpless, so hamstrung and tied hand and foot, that in connection with any question we must be confronted with the constitution? I am wondering: Is this constitution we hear so much about—and, strangely enough, largely from interests gloriously prosperous under it—is this constitution such that those who are suffering under the handicaps that have been described in connection with this very bill, namely unorganized workers of the most helpless type as well as the smaller businessmen to whom the hon. member has just referred, have no rights under it at all? Is it possible that it is not within the power of parliament to do anything for them? Yet that seems to be the case, because the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), in what I have no doubt was a very learned dissertation upon the matter, said that the measures we are asking for in the report cannot be granted because possibly they may be unconstitutional. Therefore he brings down this bill. The minister is followed by the most eminent legal light on the opposite side of the house—and I make that observation in no tone of irony, wishing only to pay tribute to my hon. friend's high legal attainments—the minister, I say, is followed by that hon. member who says: "Well, this is so ridiculous that we should drop the whole business; let us forget it and go on with something else." It is a sorry outlook for those of us who are not lawyers and are trying to do something.

In view of the fact that all those who preceded me wandered over half a dozen bills I wonder if I might read to the committee that which I believe hon. members opposite will agree is the reasonable and considered view of the commission. I do not think any of them will dissent from that statement. If perhaps I read at some length I shall ask the committee to follow me, because really I do believe we should try to get back to that which we are proposing to do, namely to correct the abuses which seem generally to be admitted as being present in our social and economic structure.

By the way, I shall read from this report the words which indicate what the trade and industry commission should do, but I shall ask the members of the committee to follow the other part of it, and later we will discuss the matter of the trade and industry commission versus this method. Under the paragraph headed "The definition of unfair trade practices" I read:

> We therefore recommend that the trade and industry commission should, in the manner and to the extent previously recommended in connection with consumer protection, supervise the enforcement of existing laws which prohibit certain business practices.

There is no dispute about that. Then:

> There are, however, other competitive practices, which while not illegal may be equally unfair. These take many forms, but the majority of them may be brought under the definition of unfair price discrimination; "unfair," because it operates inequitably as between competitors, because the burden of it is often pushed back to the wage earner or primary producer, without corresponding benefits to the consumer.

I pause there. What we found, sitting as a commission, was that these practices which were declared to be unfair and which subsequent to these words are elaborated, had this effect: they bore down upon the wage earners—we know that resulted in the sweatshops; they bore down upon the primary producer, or worked back to the primary producer who carried the load, and they conferred no great benefits upon the consumer. There you have the people about whom parliament is concerned. There are innumerable illustrations in the evidence in support of my statement. And, by the way, I sometimes think the House of Commons needs about a week's discussion on this matter in order to refresh the memories of hon. members on much of the evidence and enable them to have a full appreciation of it. May I interject at this point that a moment ago the hon. member for Hants-Kings said that price discrimination in the handling of fruit was inevitable. He will realize that we are discussing general unfair price discrimination, and not incidental price discrimination which might arise in connection with fruit, fresh fish or other perishable goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree the report covers that, but if the section under discussion extends to price discrimination—which it apparently does not—it goes entirely too far, and makes no exceptions.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. To continue the report:

Unfair price discrimination, or any other similarly unfair business practice, permits the survival of the powerful, rather than of the efficient.

Let us pause there. I think that point has been made clear to us. It does not necessarily follow that because a great institution survives and grows larger it has been because of its super-efficiency. Very often it is because of its capitalistic power; that is, it has grown large because of its concentration of capital and the power that it has in its mass buying, or by other means, over its competitors.

Unfair price discrimination, or any other similarly unfair business practice, permits the survival of the powerful, rather than of the efficient. The federal trade and industry commission should be given the duty and power of prohibiting such unfair trade practices.

I had intended waiting until we reached the bill in regard to the trade and industry commission, but as I shall then have only forty minutes and can fully occupy that time with other phases of the question I shall deal with this point now. I had hoped and expected that parliament might have been asked to consider a bill along the lines indicated here, and if hon. members will follow me as I proceed I think they will see that this proposal of the commission is perhaps the best that could possibly be made. I believe there is yet time to harmonize the views of the Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth and other hon. gentlemen by abandoning perhaps the suggestion in this bill or amending it and enlarging the powers that are to be given to the trade and industry commission. I suggest that that might be considered even yet by the Minister of Justice and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) who has charge of the bill relating to the trade and industry commission. I quote further from the report of the royal commission on price spreads:

We feel, further, that it would be unwise to write at present into statute law a rigid definition of what constitutes an unfair practice, with a list of such practices.

I think the commission showed commendable sense in that, and it did not make that statement except after worrying for weeks, I might say for months, and many months, over just what this committee of the house is now concerning itself about. Let me repeat it:

We feel, further, that it would be unwise to attempt to write at present into statute law a rigid definition of what constitutes an unfair practice, with a list of such practices. Such a list, if appropriate at the present time, would probably soon be rendered obsolete by changing conditions. At the same time we recommend that the act creating the trade commission and giving it power to prohibit unfair competition should establish certain principles for the determination of unfairness. We recognize that there is a very real danger of confusing the economic, legal, and ethical implications of "unfairness"—

That has been amply demonstrated here to-night. My hon. friend in a very able way ridiculed the whole business. There is the danger of confusing the economic, legal, and ethical implications of unfairness, but no one will say that we must confine ourselves merely to that which is strictly legal. We have at least some duty to make some provision for dealing with that which might be unethically or inequitably unfair. I quote again from the report:

We recognize that there is a very real danger of confusing the economic, legal, and ethical implications of "unfairness" and we feel that this danger might be removed to some extent if certain general criteria were laid down in the act.

That is, in the act respecting the trade and industry commission we should endeavour to lay down certain general principles that might be a guide to commerce and which would be adopted I believe by business men generally, so that by the very force of public opinion we would be able to achieve what the lawyers all tell us is so difficult to achieve in statutory form. Let me proceed:

We suggest that practices should be prohibited as unfair which are characterized by bad faith, fraud, misrepresentation, or oppression; which are resorted to for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor; which facilitate the development of monopoly; or which destroy fair competitive opportunity and prevent the survival of those who can organize and carry on the production of goods most efficiently. It is in this sense that the word "unfair" should be used in the act.

We do not say that we should work out in an ultra constitutional manner all of those things in statute law, but we do say that it is surely possible to frame an act which will declare to the Dominion of Canada that certain practices in business come within the terms of unfair and unethical practices. Having defined them, even if those who impinge upon those practices cannot be punished by criminal law or some other process, the very fact of the existence of those practices, with the publicity that is given to them, of which I shall speak later on, will hold such people up to the public as guilty of an unfair act. The commission's report proceeds:

Without attempting to restrict the application of this test of "unfairness" by the commission, we feel that certain practices which we have examined should very definitely be considered "unfair" under the act. They are so widespread and generally condemned that their complete prohibition by the commission is justified. We refer specifically to

(1) Discriminatory discounts, rebates and allowances;

(2) Territorial price discrimination and predatory price-cutting.

It seems that there is no real difficulty in so dealing with those, and they are dealt with perhaps in a measure in this bill, but let us look at that for a moment.

Discriminatory discounts. My hon. friend from Hants-Kings I think has covered this ground reasonably well and I do not wish to enlarge very much on what he has said. But there is a very common practice in this country whereby great institutions, largely due to what really instigated this whole investigation, the weight of mass buying, so impose their will upon manufacturers and producers that they have been able to get discounts or prices quoted to them which are so much out of line with the general prices as in some cases to make competition almost an impossibility. I think the most glaring case of all, and hon. gentlemen who were on the commission will recall many, is the selling to one chain institution of canned tomatoes at seventy cents a dozen when they cost I think something like eighty-two cents to put up, and when the ordinary price to the consumer was about ninety cents. I may be slightly out, but those were approximately the figures. What chance was there in the first place for competitors? But do you not see, Mr. Chairman, where it goes? It goes back to the canner, and from the canner back to the farmer, who gets 25 or 22 cents instead of 35 or 40 cents a bushel for his tomatoes. That is the point in the thing; that is the very essence of it.

Then we have in the industrial line a great institution which handles we will say thousands —many of the orders we examined went as high as five thousand suits of clothes. Now obviously an institution that can take 5,000 or 2,000 or 1,500 suits of clothes or ladies' dresses has a power that a smaller institution could not possibly have. They simply say: We will take these goods at such and such a price, and they name the price. It is not a case of the manufacturer paying a fair wage to his employees, buying his cloth and by the process of efficient competition offering his goods to the distributor at a certain figure. That is not the practice at all. That practice has long since become obsolete and out of date. The practice is for the great institutions to dictate to the manufacturer.

There is this other point. That great institution, while it buys in the mass, may have, as one institution that I have in mind has, some fifty or sixty establishments, and the goods it buys may be distributed amongst those fifty or sixty establishments. There again you see is an unfair element, because that institution gets the advantage of mass buying. It gives a mass order and insists upon the goods being sent out to the fifty or sixty establishments. The quantity sent to each establishment might not warrant a very great discount to any one of the fifty or sixty, but he gets a discount comparable to the discount on several carloads as against the discount his competitor gets on a dozen or so articles. There is a type of discount and discrimination which is very serious. I made the suggestion, which has been made an appendix to the report, that in my opinion this commission should reduce to a scientific basis what discounts should be. I think that can be done, and I say that from some experience and study of the situation. For instance, cash discounts should be based upon the value of the cash to the institution that pays. Credit discounts should be the value of the security of good credit as against normal losses, which I am told run only to about one or one and one-half per cent. Credit certainly does not rate a discount of five, ten or fifteen per cent, or, as it does in some cases, as high as thirty per cent. My own view, which I think the commission puts forth very well, is that this board which we propose should study such matters and fix rules by which they might be measured or lay down principles by which they could be considered from the point of view of whether they are fair or unfair. Let me proceed:

> The procedure and power for trade practice regulation. In outline, we think the procedure of the commission, in its work of regulating unfair practices, should be as follows. Either on its own initiative, or on complaint, the commission would make such investigation and hold such hearings as seem appropriate. Whenever any practice was found to be "unfair," the commission should then issue an order "to cease and desist" from such practice.

When we reach that point we arrive at the difficulty of clothing the commission with necessary power, but I suggest to the legal advisers of the crown that this commission could be clothed with authority to order these companies to cease and desist. Hon. members will then say: What is the use of that unless they have the power to enforce? As I read the law, there are certain alternative powers which this commission might have. With all due respect to the Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, the law officers of the crown, Mr. Tilley and Mr.

Geoffrion, I am still not persuaded that it is not possible to clothe this commission with that power. I am not a lawyer but I ask my legal friends to give some thought to this suggestion: In the preamble of the British North America Act the unity of the provinces is stated as the basis of confederation. Anything which tends to disunite must be in violation of the spirit of the act. This feature of the act has not been sufficiently, shall I say, brought to the front in this argument. There is a point I wish to make and one which I made before but to which no attention was paid; perhaps a reiteration will invite a little study even by those who have little respect for my views. Section 91 of the British North America Act contains a clear and mandatory declaration that the dominion parliament has power to legislate in connection with the regulation of trade and commerce. I can hear the answer to that statement: We all know that. During the sixty years since confederation the dominion parliament has made little attempt to occupy that field. We did a little about it in connection with external trade, but as far as the regulation of trade and commerce in Canada is concerned we have made little attempt to occupy the field. In other words, there are no precedents in our statute books in connection therewith. From my reading of the cases which have gone to the privy council I have come to the conclusion that invariably emphasis has been laid upon the invasion of property and civil rights as outlined in section 92. I am not suggesting that we should do anything to invade the rights of the provinces—not at all. It must be admitted because it is present in many statutes that there is concurrent jurisdiction, that it is possible to pass a dominion act which might invade a field specifically mentioned and reserved for the provinces and that act still be constitutional. I do not think anyone will dispute that where there is power, such as there is in this case, to regulate trade and commerce, there are no restrictions at all. Surely it is a matter of federal right. Unity is the basis of the British North America Act and surely it is reasonable that the dominion parliament should legislate in connection with matters of trade and commerce which must flow through the dominion from coast to coast. I venture to say that you could go into any small grocery store or any other type of store handling more than one article in Ottawa and find goods upon the shelves which come from outside the province of Ontario Even in the most minute way of doing business it would be scarcely possible not to find such goods. The very bulk and essence of our trade is interprovincial, and if we are to have trade regulations and preserve unity, they must be of a dominion-wide character.

I have a great deal of confidence—some may call it impertinence—in the right of this parliament to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce provided it does it earnestly and sincerely and, as is suggested by the report, upon the general principle of trade and commerce as outlined in the British North America Act and keeping in mind the welfare and unity of the country. These things are essential to any legislation of this kind which we might undertake to pass. The report continues:

> If an "order" of the commission were not obeyed, the commission should then have the authority both to prosecute for the violation of the act and also to apply to the courts for an injunction against the continued violation of its order.

I suggest to the Minister of Justice that we should study the erection of this commission in the light of the railway board. The railway board is a court of equity—I think that is the proper term—and through the years it has built up its own case law and has established certain precedents. I can recall when the interstate commerce commission of the United States commanded very little respect, or at least there was considerable challenging of its authority. But that is not done to-day. Why? Because that body has built up a confidence in the minds of the people as well as a position in the court. Decisions are accepted to-day which would have been challenged in the courts, perhaps with success, twenty years ago. That commission has built up its own case law; it has created precedents and has established a confidence in the minds of the people as to the equity, fairness and common sense of its decisions. That is what this board can do. I quote:

> There should be the right of appeal to the Exchequer Court of Canada from these orders within, say, ten days.

And again:

> In more serious cases, instead of issuing a "cease and desist" order, the commission might, at its discretion, prosecute directly under the act for the offence of competing unfairly.

I am going to read another paragraph and then I shall not bore the committee with any more quotations:

> Exposure to the light of day is just as effective in suppressing unfair trade practices as in checking monopoly. We recommend, therefore, that the commission be given the widest possible powers of investigation of, and publicity for, such practices. It should be required to publish the results of its investigations and of every major finding, and to require that firms or industries, where appropriate, publish their prices and discounts. Further, each decision published should state clearly the facts, the argument and the ruling, so that the reports would constitute a body of intelligible case law.

I think there is one other quotation I should like to make later, but I pause here to point this out: This is a weapon that the commission can use, that would accomplish our aims and objects in spite of these narrow and legal technicalities—the power of investigation, the publicity that would be attendant upon it, following of course upon what I said a moment ago, the laying down of general principles in regard to unfair practices.

I wish to read one other quotation and then I shall desist from that part:

> Having considered the more common form of price discrimination by which mass buyers are able to obtain preferential treatment, it remains only to draw the obvious conclusion. There is little serious objection to discounts, free deals, and allowances when these are available to all on the same terms, and are related to any measureable service rendered, or economy effected. At the worst they simply complicate the problem of accounting and costing. But when such concessions are given not in return for any service, not openly, and not to all on the same terms, they involve gross discrimination and become a powerful weapon by which mass buyers compete unfairly with their small rivals and use their massed purchasing power to take undue advantage of their weaker suppliers.

That is the finding of the commission. What I suggest is this: Inasmuch as legal advisers by their arguments and learned opinions of certain eminent counsel throw doubt upon the matter, I suggest that care should be taken to redraft those clauses so that they will be more to the point in regard to matters that ought to go into the criminal law, but that the Minister of Justice—and I appeal to him now—give earnest study to the proposals set forth on these two pages of the report and include them in the bill that has been introduced to create a trade and industry commission. I will discuss that bill further when we come to it.

But I draw to the attention of the Minister of Justice and of the members of the committee the spirit as well as the terms of this report as represented and set forth by the commission itself. I do not think any member of the commission will say that I am making an overstatement when I say that these suggestions were the result of long and careful handling of this question and of very minute and analytical discussion among ourselves. I do not think there is any difference between us other than the reluctance of certain hon. members to set up a new commission; on the other part of the matter there is not much difference of opinion. I therefore make that suggestion to the Minister of Justice in the hope that we may find some way of passing legislation that will be helpful to those who are bearing the brunt, shall I say the penalty, of the actions of others, the worker, the primary producer and the consumer getting no benefit, as the report indicates, not through any act of their own, but because of unfair, predatory and discriminatory practices in another realm altogether.

Mr. YOUNG: The commission on price spreads and mass buying—and I say this with all due respect to the majority of the the commission—spent much time and effort in exploring conditions and business practices as they exist. It spent little time in delving into the underlying causes of those conditions and trying to seek out the remedy. It appeared to me that for every evil that was found to exist, the commissioners had in their minds one and only one remedy, and that perhaps the most futile of all, namely, to pass a law against the evil. Were some people suffering from what they considered unfair competition on the part of their competitors, unfair trade practices, the commission would suggest the passing of a law against it. Were the farmers not receiving from the packers an adequate price for their cattle or hogs, the idea in the mind of the commission was to pass a law against paying low prices. Did merchants find themselves unable to get the cost of their goods out of their customers, the remedy that suggested itself to the commission was to pass a law against price cutting. As I said before, the one remedy that suggested itself to the mind of the commission for every evil was to pass a law against it.

There had arisen in this country a condition where business came almost to a standstill. Merchants found their stocks were not moving; manufacturers were unable to get orders for their goods and had to lay off their men. It seemed to me that this condition was not and could not be due to the business practices of any one class of merchants or any one class of buyers; there must have been an underlying cause for it all; for the business decline was experienced not only by the small buyer but by the large buyer; it was experienced not only by the small manufacturer but by the large manufacturer. Every class in the community experienced the same thing. The cause of the trouble in my opinion was the fact that the primary producers in this country had lost their income. The income of our farmers during the first two years of the depression was cut in half; fifty per cent of their income had disappeared, while retail prices of the goods they had to buy had fallen only about one or two percent.

An hon. MEMBER: That is wrong.

Mr. YOUNG: No, it is not wrong. I have the figures before me showing that where the net value of farm production for 1928 was $1,501,000,000, by 1930 it had fallen to $860,000,000, or almost one-half. The index figure given by the bureau of statistics of retail prices, taking 1926 as the base year, letting 1926 equal 100, stood in 1928 at 98·9 and in 1930 at 99·2; in fact retail prices had actually increased slightly while the price of farm products had dropped almost fifty per cent. That condition did not apply to the farmers only; the same condition prevailed in the fishing industry, the lumber industry and all our basic industries. Was it to be expected that under conditions such as these, business would thrive in this country? How can you expect the Canadian people to buy goods when their incomes are cut in half? The primary producers, farmers, fishermen, lumbermen and so on, constitute perhaps sixty per cent of our population, and with sixty per cent of our population unable to buy goods, everyone in business suffered. It seems to me that the logical remedy for that situation is not to pass laws against price cutting but to find what was the cause of the two price levels which had arisen. Here we have sixty per cent of the people of the country selling their goods at a lower price level, while the things they want to buy are on a higher level, so much so that they cannot buy them. The remedy lies in seeking the cause of that condition and removing it, not in passing laws against price discrimination and unfair trade practices.

To me it seems that one of the principal causes of that situation is the wrong fiscal policy which has been followed by this country. I am not blaming this government alone; it has been the policy of the country for years. But this government accentuated the trouble; it went to the extreme limit when on coming into power it found that prices of primary products were falling, and instead of taking steps to see that the prices of secondary products fell with them, they took steps to prevent that, with the result that retail prices were maintained at practically the former level, or in some cases at a higher level, while the prices of farm products dropped almost forty per cent. Yet a stranger coming to this country and reading the majority report of the price spreads commission and having no other source of information would have the impression not only that the fiscal policy of the country was in no way to blame for the situation, but that it had actually helped to improve conditions. Nothing could be further from the truth. The hon. member who just spoke (Mr. Stevens) referred to the price of tomatoes being cut to 70 cents when it should have been 80 to 90 cents. Why was it cut to 70 cents? Did any man cut the price just for the fun of it? It was cut to 70 cents because the people who had those tomatoes had to find a way of getting them into the hands of the consumer. As I said before, a condition arose in which the consumers could not buy the goods, and the merchants were then obliged to find goods at a price which the consumers could pay or not sell them at all. Some influence had to come into the market to force down the price of retail goods to a parity with the price of primary products. When we proceed to legislate against the forcing down of those prices we legislate for conditions which will perpetuate the depression instead of relieving it. Let me give an example. Beans were priced at 5 cents a pound. They were not selling at that price, because people could not pay it; therefore the merchants could not sell the stocks they had, and so could not buy any more from the farmers. The price of beans to the farmer dropped to sixty cents a bushel. Then one of the large chain store concerns said: We think we can clear up this situation. So they advertised beans for sale throughout the country at one cent a pound—that is price slashing for you. What happened? They sold thousands and thousands of bushels of beans at that price. Other merchants had to meet that price; they had to take the loss on the stocks on hand. Such large quantities of beans went into consumption that the market was cleared, the glut was removed and immediately the price began to rise. Now I ask you, was it not better for the farmer, for the consumer, for the merchant, for everyone concerned that the price of beans be slashed as it was so that beans would move into consumption, than that the price be maintained as the merchants were attempting to do, with the result that no one could sell any beans?

An hon. MEMBER: Would you apply that argument to wheat?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, absolutely. The hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) says that discounts should be placed on a scientific basis. On what scientific basis will you place discounts? The price at which goods should sell is the price at which they will move. No board can sit in an office and determine any scientific price basis at which goods will move. The price at which they will move is the price which the consumer is willing and able to pay for them.

We have had much discussion as to whether or not this legislation is valid. I leave that largely to the legal members of the house. I am more concerned with whether or not this legislation is desirable. Is it desirable even if it is valid? Let us look at it. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy), speaking the other night on this bill, said that when a man steals a loaf of bread he is branded as a thief and sent to gaol; therefore when a man steals the time of his employee he also should be sent to gaol for it. I agree; no one disputes that. But this legislation goes much further than that. It not only proposes to send the man to gaol for stealing the time of his employee; it proposes to send him to gaol for working his employee overtime even if he pays him for it. Section 5 says:

> Everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years imprisonment or to a fine not exceeding $5,000, or to both imprisonment and fine who, knowingly—
> (a) employs a person at a rate of wage less than the minimum wage rate fixed by law or any competent public authority;
> (b) permits an employee to work beyond the maximum hours fixed by law or any competent public authority;

What does that section contemplate? We are providing a penalty of fine or imprisonment or both for any man who permits his employee to work beyond the maximum hours, such maximum to be determined by some competent authority. We do not know what the maximum hours would be; we do not know what would be determined to be a crime in the different provinces, but we know that if any employer permits his employee to work overtime, even if he pays him double time for it, he can be sent to gaol. Let us take a few cases. Suppose a bricklayer is sent by his employer to build a chimney. Suppose when quitting time comes the chimney is almost finished, and he says: "I do not want to come back to-morrow morning and finish this; I will work an extra half hour and finish it to-night." His employer may be sent to gaol.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Is the employer permitting him to do that?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, under this legislation. Suppose a garment maker, making a lady's dress or a man's coat, when quitting time comes is not quite through, and the customer wants it that night. If the employer permits that employee to finish that garment, even if he pays double rate for the extra time, under this legislation he can be sent to gaol. So with a plumber mending a leak in a pipe. Or suppose you are out in the country, something goes wrong with your car, and you take it to a nearby garage and set a man to work on it. When his working time is done he is not quite through. But he must not finish it; if he does his employer can be sent to gaol, so you can wait until the morning, whether there is any place to stay or not. Or suppose a train is out on the road; when the crew's day is up they may be somewhere out on the main line, and if the dispatcher orders them to come to the terminal he also can be sent to gaol for permitting them to work overtime. This legislation might be made to apply to farmers, whatever is determined by the competent authority, and in some provinces they might decree maximum labour hours for the farmers, in which event a farmer who permitted his hired man to stay until he finished the field at night, or perhaps sent him to milk the cows after supper, could be sent to gaol. I went down Bank street the other night and saw them digging a sewer there, and I thought that if at just about quitting time that sewer caved in and half buried some workmen, and the contractors permitted the others to dig them out, they could be sent to gaol for it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friends laugh, but that is the way the act reads.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Has my hon. friend read the limitation of the Hours of Work Act? That would be the competent authority, as to emergencies and the like.

Mr. YOUNG: The hours of labour undoubtedly will be set by the local authorities, and they will be different in different localities. This provides a penalty for whatever act is passed by whatever local authority.

Mr. GUTHRIE: By a competent local authority.

Mr. YOUNG: I will admit that many of them are not competent. Speaking of incompetence, let us go back to subsection (a), which reads:

> —employs a person at a rate of wages less than the minimum wage rate fixed by law or any competent public authority;

During the investigation we found cases in which the minimum wage law had to be ignored, and this was particularly so in the garment trades. As I said before the public had ceased to buy garments; they could not buy them. What were they doing? The women had sewing machines in their homes, and they were commencing to make their own garments. Those engaged in the garment trades, therefore, had to compete with the housewives who had sewing machines in their homes. That is why wages are always low in the garment trades; they have to compete with the housewives. As I have already said, it was found that people would not buy garments at the prices which the factories had to charge. Then, by agreement between the employers, the employees and the unions, they said, "In order to get work at all in these factories we will have to take wages less than those provided by the minimum wage law." We asked the competent authority of one of the provinces how he arrived at his minimum wage. He replied, "Oh, we arrived at that fifteen years ago. We based it on the cost of living." Then he was asked, "Have you never changed it since?" He replied, "No, there has been no change in the cost of living since then, so we never bothered changing the law." He was so competent that he did not know that in the last fifteen years the cost of living has varied as much as twenty per cent, but the minimum wage had not been varied accordingly. Now let us look at the next offence:

(c) falsifies any employment record required to be kept by law or any competent public authority;

Have we not laws already against falsifying records? I think we have, so we do not need further laws. Then the next offence:

(d) punches a time clock with intent to deceive;

Is there not a law against that now? It is the same as making a false entry in a record. Then let us turn to the next offence:

(e) puts the wages of more than one employee in the same envelope with intent to evade the provisions of any minimum wage law;

Any person wishing to evade that section simply need not use envelopes. The offence is putting the wages in an envelope.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the offence we are aiming at.

Mr. YOUNG: The next offence is:

(f) makes any deduction from any employee's wages for any purpose not warranted by law unless such deduction has been approved first by a competent public authority;

Is it not quite apparent that any person who makes a deduction from his employee's wages contrary to the law is breaking the law? I do not think that section is necessary at all. The next offence is:

(g) employs any child or minor person contrary to law;

What is a minor person? I am not a lawyer, but I think it is a person under twenty-one years of age. Here we have a prohibition against the employment of children or minor persons contrary to law; a man can be sent to gaol for that. Then the last offence:

(h) does any other similar act contrary to law or the rules or regulations of any competent public authority.

Then the penalties follow; a year's imprisonment or $5,000 in fines for breaking any rule or regulation made by certain public authorities to be set up by other bodies. Then we pass on to section 6, and we find:

Every person engaged in trade or commerce or industry is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding one thousand dollars or to one month's imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars, who

(a) is a party or or privy to, or knowingly assists in, any transaction of sale which discriminates against competitors of the purchaser in that any discount, rebate or allowance is granted to the purchaser over and above any discount, rebate or allowance granted to the aforesaid competitors in respect of a sale of goods of a similar quality and quantity;

Translated that means that if you give a discount to one person you have to give the same discount to another person. The object of this provision is to give the small merchant the same chance in the market that the large mass buyer has, but this section will not achieve that end because in the investigation we found that one of the largest chain stores in the country, and I think perhaps one of the hardest buyers in the country, received hardly any discount. They did not go in for discounts; they did not ask for discounts. They said, "What is your price? This is what we will pay, no more, no less." As my hon. friend from Hants-Kings has pointed out, this section is almost impossible of enforcement. Then we go on to the next subsection:

(b) engages in a policy of selling goods in any area of Canada at prices lower than those exacted by such seller elsewhere in Canada, for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor in such part of Canada;

I wonder if that is meant to apply to goods that are sold prepaid. Let us take cigarettes manufactured in Montreal and sold at the same price all over Canada. The company has to pay the freight on those cigarettes all the way to Vancouver, and naturally they will have to take less for the cigarettes they sell in Vancouver than for the cigarettes they sell in Montreal or Ottawa. I do not know whether that would be considered discrimination. But let me give you an example of what is happening now, in order to see how this would work out. A certain chain store has a large number of units in different parts of this country. It adopts the practice of selling at the same price in all those units, as far as possible, but it finds that in one particular city it has a competitor, also a chain but a local chain with all its stores located in one place. Under this section that local chain can cut prices as to-day it is cutting prices, on the larger chain. Under this section the larger chain would be denied the right to meet those prices unless they sold their goods for the same prices in every part of the country, but they could not sell for the same price all over the country. What would you do about it? In that way you could tear that big chain to pieces, by letting this one chain undersell it in this place and another chain undersell it some place else, and so on. Then the next paragraph:

(c) engages in a policy of selling goods at prices unreasonably low for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor.

I do not know how you would determine whether prices were unreasonably low for the purpose of destroying a competitor or eliminating competition, but as I said before the trouble in this country to-day is that prices have not been low enough. The prices of primary products went down to the point where the producers of those goods could not buy the secondary products because they could not pay the retail prices for them. It has been found impossible to raise the prices of primary products. The only way to get business moving, the only way to increase employment, the only way to restore prosperity in this country is to bring down prices. Merchants were not willing to bring down prices because they did not want to take the losses it would involve in connection with the stocks on hand. Those cutting prices were the ones forcing prices to come down; they were really the benefactors of the people, because they were forcing on the mercantile trade generally the very policy that was required to get business moving.

On the whole I think the legislation, whether valid or not, is undesirable and for that reason, Mr. Chairman, I believe it should be opposed.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that as so far we have had speakers only from the government side and the opposition, possibly it would be well that some of us who belong to neither of these parties should have a word to say on this matter. As I understand it the Liberals take their stand in opposition to this measure very largely on two points, first of all that it is unconstitutional and secondly that it is undesirable as interfering with trade and private affairs.

With regard to the constitutional aspect of the question, we had that matter discussed earlier in the evening from the purely legal standpoint. I do not profess to be an expert in legal matters but I do know enough of the history of law to recognize that it is very largely a history of changes in public opinion and the very slow and lagging process of gradual change in law made reluctantly in an effort to come up to the existing development of public opinion. The law lags far behind, and it is only under very great pressure that at last we have recorded in our codes the decisions arrived at by the great majority of our people. I quite agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr Kennedy) when he states that there is no clear cut line between criminal and non-criminal acts. A few years ago it was not a crime to hold slaves. Many people of the most worthy classes held slaves, and justified themselves from the ethical standpoint in so doing. Undoubtedly in those days it was legal to hold slaves; there was no crime in it whatever. Then there arrived a time when it was declared to be a crime to hold slaves. I have not the slightest doubt that before that time there would be a great deal of legal argument to the effect that to do away with slavery would be an infringement upon the rights of private property. That would be a logical argument, because men had private property in the possession of slaves and, as the rights of private property were understood up to that time, the taking away of the slaves would be an infringement.

It seems to me that to-day we face the necessity of a higher code, a new code if you like, with regard to the protection of society, necessitated by the new conditions which have developed in this industrial period. To a certain extent competition used to act as a regulator. I am pleased that the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) pointed out that fact so clearly, but I believe he would also recognize that to a very large extent competition has ceased to be a regulator to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thought he had gone farther than he admits. It would seem as though the great mass of evidence before the price spreads commission went to show how hopeless is the factor of competition as a real regulator. From beginning to end the evidence before that commission shows the growth of large scale industry tending to monopoly, all sorts of agreements indicating an utter disregard of public welfare and certainly a very great disregard of the welfare of employees.

I do not think we can any longer count upon competition as a regulator of trade. Someone has called attention to the fraudulent practices noted by the price spreads commission. I have not time nor do I think it necessary to enumerate those practices, although in part they were enumerated by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). I do ask however whether it is impossible to-day for us to do something to safeguard the interests of employees. There is no doubt that people are being employed at a rate of wages less than the minimum rate fixed by law. I cannot see anything absurd or out of the way in making that a crime. The evidence disclosed that there were people employed at wages less than sufficient to keep body and soul together, as we put it, and quite insufficient to maintain a decent standard of living. Some received as low as $2 a week. In many cases it meant that girls were being forced out on to the streets. Yet when we suggest that some measures be taken to prevent this kind of thing we are told it is utterly absurd. Surely if it is a crime to deal cruelly with people it is a much greater crime to have that cruelty extended over a number of years.

We used to think that in Canada we had some ideals of sportsmanship. Some people exercise good sportsmanship when dealing with wild game. They will give a bird or an animal a chance for his life, but these same people will put an employee in a position where he has no chance, and where he is driven down, and down. I would suggest to the hon. member for Weyburn that he read the laws already on the statute books. If we have protection for wild game surely we might have some protection for the workers in our factories. Even the farmer cannot shoot game or catch fish in certain seasons of the year. I wish the hon. member for Weyburn would have a little greater sense of proportion and try to balance things up a little more than he does. We have all sorts of regulations, but when it comes to anything affecting trade and commerce it would seem that the whole realm is sacrosanct.

There is a provision in this bill against workers being allowed to work above the maximum hours. Is there anything wrong in that? We have legislation, which possibly the hon. member for Weyburn would uphold, preventing Sunday work. It is quite true that a man's automobile might break down on Sunday, and he might be held up. In spite of this, I think the hon. member for Weyburn would agree that the legislation enforcing respect for the Sabbath is quite proper. Yet any measure for that purpose is surely as arbitrary as this one prohibiting the working of employees beyond proper hours.

Then we come to the falsification of statements. Again, why is this not a crime when it affects the welfare of an employee? If we falsify a cheque, endorse or sign it improperly we are liable to the law of embezzlement, and have committed a crime. Why is it less a crime to falsify a statement supposed to indicate the hours of work of an employee? I cannot see why it would be. Possibly it would be considered a lesser crime merely because we are not accustomed to prohibiting these practices against the interests of employees. We have not yet seriously taken to heart the interests of the employee.

And so I could go on to a discussion of all the matters dealt with under section 5. The hon. member for Weyburn actually attempts to poke fun at subsection (g), which reads:

(g) employs any child or minor person contrary to law.

Well, when we consider that young children are being employed at pitiably low wages, and being stunted in body and mind, we must feel indignant when we find anyone ridiculing legislation designed to protect them.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the hon. member say what a minor is?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will leave that for general definition.

An hon. MEMBER: He knows well enough what it is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: "Employs any child or minor person contrary to law"—could you want anything more than that?

Mr. YOUNG: I want to know what a minor is.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The law defines it. Surely we have the right to protect minors. We have a solemn obligation to protect the youth of Canada and I do resent in this twentieth century any hon. member, even one calling himself a Liberal, trying to ridicule legislation designed to protect children.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No person ridiculed it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That was my understanding. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) has chosen to interrupt, and following that interruption I would turn to the next section of the bill. The Liberals oppose this section as being contrary to the freedom of trade. In a debate only a few days ago on the marketing act the hon. member for Northumberland protested against producers being coerced, and against their being enforced to adopt ideas and policies tabulated or formulated in the minds of so-called supermen who have been chosen by the Minister of Agriculture to tell Canadians what the producers know better than he knows. The hon. member waxed eloquent when he was speaking about the matter, stating that the Natural Products Marketing Act was the most vicious piece of legislation ever placed on the statute books of Canada. He said it was impossible to prevent bootlegging in liquor and he wondered how we could prevent bootlegging in potatoes. He asked how an ordinary decent Canadian citizen such as he himself claimed to be could possibly be prevented from selling his goods in any way he pleased. He wanted to know what you could do with him if he refused to sell his apples, and so on and so on. In connection with one of the clauses I happen to have had my attention called to the Milk Control Act of 1934 of the province of Ontario, which was modified very slightly by the Liberal government this year in order to make it more stringent. Let us see what they are doing in the province of Ontario. I quote from the act:

> The board shall have jurisdiction and power upon its own initiative, or upon complaint or request made to it in writing, to inquire into any matter relating to the producing, supplying, processing, handling, distributing or sale of milk and, subject to the approval of the lieutenant governor, to make regulations with respect thereto or to any of the said matters.

I want to call this to the attention of the hon. member for Northumberland. As I have said, the act was under review by the Liberal government in Ontario this year which made one or two slight modifications to make it more drastic. Quoting from the act again:

> (a) governing and supervising the producing, processing, handling, storing, hauling, delivering, distributing, keeping or offering for sale and the sale of milk, and all persons engaged or employed therein, and the reports and returns to be made by them to the board;

I suppose that what is true of milk may conceivably be true of potatoes or apples. I quote further from the act:

> (a) requiring persons or classes of persons engaged or employed in the processing, handling, storing, hauling, delivering, distributing, keeping or offering for sale, or the sale of milk to be licenced and to fix the term of such licences and the fees to be paid therefor;
> (c) governing disputes and the determination of disputes arising between producers and distributors of milk, or between any two or more classes or branches of persons engaged in the milk industry as producers, processors, handlers, haulers, distributors or vendors of milk, or as being otherwise engaged in the said industry;
> (d) governing agreements which may be entered into between producers of milk and other persons or classes of persons engaged in the milk industry.

Surely that legislation is telling the producers what they have to do, and it provides for fines in connection therewith. I want to read one or two other brief sections to give the scope of the act:

> No person shall engage or be employed in any branch of the milk industry as provided by and in accordance with this act and the regulations.

Again that is almost identical with the terms of the Natural Products Marketing Act, and certainly not less severe than that which we have before us this evening. Then section 11:

> Every person who violates any of the provisions of this act or of any regulation, rule or order made under this act or of the board shall incur a penalty of not less than $5 for each offence, recoverable under the Summary Convictions Act.

There you have a man made a criminal and fined for disobeying any of the regulations under the act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): That is what I objected to the other day.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite so, but I say that this is in force in the province of Ontario in regard to milk, and the whole act was under review and modified to make it more drastic by a Liberal government in Ontario.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I said the other evening that I did not care whether it was a Liberal, Conservative or Cooperative Commonwealth Federation government. Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My hon. friend repudiates the Liberal government of Ontario for retaining this law on the statutes?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): No, the hon. member is away off the mark. I stated quite clearly what I had to say.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The province of British Columbia under a Liberal government has taken very similar action. I am afraid the hon. member for Northumberland will have to withdraw himself from the Liberal party and its policies.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If I do I won't go down there among you; I can tell you that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That may be. I think the hon. member will have to adopt the policy of the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and form a party of his own. I repeat it was the Liberal government of Ontario that amended the Milk Control Act.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If I do form a party I will get further than you did in forming one.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I sent to the library a few minutes ago to try to obtain the official amendment that the Ontario government made to the Milk Control Act, but it was not available. I venture to read from the Canadian Co-operator of April, 1935, what I think may be taken as a correct copy of the amendment. This amendment to the Milk Control Act with respect to the prohibition of co-operative dividends, which was introduced by the Hon. Duncan Marshall, reads:

> Notwithstanding anything in the Companies Act or in any letters patent of incorporation or supplementary letters patent or in any other general or special act contained, no person, firm or corporation shall give or distribute any fund, refund, rebate, interest or dividend to any purchaser of milk therefrom, either directly or indirectly in respect of such purchases of milk, except such interest or dividend as may be earned on capital invested by such purchaser in such firm or corporation.

And the Canadian Co-operator adds this note:

> The exception in favour of payment of interest or dividends on their capital investment in dairies by milk consumers seems to be a deliberate discrimination in favour of capitalist dairies. In recnt years it has been the practice of some of them to conduct campaigns for the sale of dairy securities to producers and consumers of milk. Capitalist dairy corporations are specifically enabled to distribute their profits in a manner agreeable to them, but that right is denied to cooperative dairies.

I have read this amendment because I think there is a danger that we do precisely the same thing if we pass section 498A (1) without some modification or without adding some safeguarding clause. I received a letter the other day from the secretary of the Co-operative Union of Canada, who points out that:

> While manifestly not intended to embarrass cooperatives or to obstruct the practice of cooperative principles, it is possible that the distribution of the net profit surplus made by cooperative wholesales among retail societies might legally be construed to be within the prohibition of the payment of discounts, rebates or allowances, and a similar distribution of the net profit, surplus, by retail societies among consumers might legally be interpreted as reducing net prices to unreasonably low figures. The question of motive is a difficult one to establish in law, but unsympathetic courts might find as a fact that cooperative societies operate "for the purpose of destroying competition or eliminating a competitor."

He suggests that the following be added as an addendum to section 498A(1) of the criminal code, and I draw the minister's attention to this in order that perhaps he himself may see fit to incorporate it in the draft:

> The provisions of this subsection shall not, however, prevent a cooperative society returning to producers or consumers, or a cooperative wholesale society returning to its constituent retail members, the whole or any part of the net surplus made in its trading operations in proportion to purchases made from or sales to the society.

It would seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that an amendment of that kind would safeguard the cooperative societies. From the present draft I do not think the government is intending to penalize the cooperative societies but since it may have that effect I believe something of this kind is highly desirable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I may tell my hon. friend that a suggestion has been made already in the language in which he has moved it, and the view of the law officers is that this section as drawn would not apply to the cooperative societies. However, it may be necessary to clarify the matter and I will let my hon. friend know the next time the bill is before the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I thank the minister. I wanted this matter made very clear because while it is desirable to curb the avaricious practices indicated by the report of the price spreads commission, it is an altogether different thing for people to organize cooperatively and return their dividends. The report of the price spreads commission urges:

> —further development of consumers' cooperatives in Canada would be of general benefit.

It has also declared that the movement—

> —should not be victimized in the early stages of its development by unfair competitive practices or price discrimination on the part of manufacturers and wholesalers.

I have very little more to say on the bill as a whole, but in the few minutes left to me I should like to refer again to section 5.

Anyone who has been connected in any way with the labour movement or who has been in close contact with industrial affairs must realize that in many cases the employee is almost helpless. We see this fact in its most exaggerated form in the company towns where a large corporation, very often an American corporation, practically controls the life of the whole community. It is quite obvious that in such cases the employee is helpless. It may be said that he can organize with others but I submit that so far we have made no provision for the protection of the employee in his right to organize. Under these circumstances it has become practically impossible for employees to form a strong union. We in this house claim that this parliament is an impartial authority; as such it becomes incumbent upon us to protect the weaker members of society who are not in a position at the moment to protect themselves.

I cannot see why there should be such solicitude for the interests of the employers and the great corporations. Should an employee break a bit of machinery or smash a window he is considered a criminal, while through a long series of years employers have persisted in practices which have undermined the health of the workers, which have condemned them to a life in which they have no joy in living, and which have precluded them from the enjoyment of leisure. Yet these employers are not treated as criminals. In my judgment their crime is far more serious than that of the man who destroys a bit of property. Human life ought surely to be worth more than property. As yet we have hardly begun to protect human life, and while this legislation is far from being what I should like it to be, I feel that it is a gesture toward protecting the welfare of the employees and as such I welcome it.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 11, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

B.C. RELIEF CAMPS

REPORT OF MACDONALD COMMISSION APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table report of the commission which was appointed to investigate conditions in the relief camps of British Columbia. I should like on this occasion to make a statement thereon.

The report is presented by the Hon. W. A. Macdonald, C. T. McHattie, and the Reverend E. D. Braden, appointed a commission by order in council P.C. 861, dated April 1, 1935, to inquire into the conditions obtaining and all and any complaints which have been made with respect to the administration and management of the camps established by the Department of National Defence in the province of British Columbia.

In view of the general interest in this report as evidenced by the many enquiries made by hon. members of this house, I think it would be of interest should I briefly recapitulate the principal points adduced by the commission from the evidence which they collected in the course of a most comprehensive survey of the situation during which, in addition to public hearings in the larger centres in British Columbia, they visited 46 separate camps; in all 277 witnesses were examined.

The greatest care was exercised by the commission in order to ensure that all who wished to testify should have a full and fair opportunity of so doing and men were encouraged in the absence of members of the camp staffs to freely state any complaints and grievances which they might feel they had.

The commission "questioned all witnesses as to matters which were likely to create a grievance in camp life, such as food, cooking, sleeping accommodation, sanitation, medical attention, recreation, consideration of complaints and other matters." It may be assumed therefor, that every possible complaint or cause of complaint has been fully enquired into.

The commission reports:

> We are quite satisfied that the officers commanding these military districts properly performed their duties in administering and managing these camps, and that they acted with fairness and ability in discharging a new and difficult task.

The military districts referred to are military districts Nos. 11 and 13 with headquarters at Esquimalt and Calgary respectively. As regards the superintendents of groups of projects, the statement is made:

We contacted all the superintendents, and from the results obtained in their work, they appeared quite competent. When you consider the responsibility borne, the nature of the duties performed, the difficulty of maintaining discipline, and the nature of the employment of the thousands in these camps, then, almost without exception, they filled their positions satisfactorily.

The exceptions referred to relate to the cases of two individuals only out of the many whose services were commented upon. In one of those cases, in the light of all circumstances, the commission report:

We are not disposed to make any adverse criticism of this superintendent.

In the other case the evidence is of a failure in certain administrative arrangements and of a lack of judgment in the individual concerned. The replacement of this man has been under consideration for some time but action was deferred pending the reports of the investigation. Definite arrangements have now been made to replace him.

Several complaints of mail being tampered with were received. In this connection the commission reports:

We find that the charges were not supported by evidence.

As regards foremen in individual camps, after commenting on the difficulties inherent in their position, the commission state:

The foremen, as a whole, acted properly and patiently.

Certain individual cases, where complaints against foremen appeared well founded, were brought by the commission to the attention of the superior authorities concerned. These cases are not specificaly set out in the commission's report but as soon as full particulars are available they will be dealt with as the circumstances may require. It is pointed out however, that during the period of administration by the Department of National Defence, 192 changes of foremen and subforemen have taken place and of these thirty per cent were for disciplinary reasons or incompetency.

One of the complaints made against the camps was the so called "militarization." The commission states:

We feel no hesitation in reporting that it did not, and does not, exist in the slightest degree.

As regards food, the commission stated:

We consistently investigated this important feature of camp life, and became satisfied that the meals which had been, and were being, served to the men were good then, and had been so, long prior to our visits.

Reference is made to occasional "bad cooking which may have spoiled good food" and the steps being taken by the Department of National Defence to remedy this situation through the establishment of a school of cooking. The first of these courses has been completed and a second is under arrangement. The capacity of the course is for thirty candidates. In other comments on the satisfactory quality of the food supplied, the commission make a reservation as to the quality of milk and the condition of meat in certain cases. They state that the complaint respecting milk "has now been remedied." As regards meat they state that "care has been taken to provide for a proper supply of meat" but that "on several occasions, the strictness which should have been applied in requiring fulfilment of the terms of the contract was neglected." This matter is being further inquired into and the necessary action will be taken to terminate those contracts where neglect has been shown. There is definite information, however, that in many cases meat not up to the standard has been returned to the contractors at their expense.

The commission reports:

There was a complaint made as to beds, but this has been remedied, although an objection still exists in some of the camps.

Further particulars of this are being obtained and consideration will be given and also to a suggestion as to the issue of "cotton sheets."

The commission states that generally speaking they were satisfied as regards cleanliness of dining rooms, kitchens, bunk houses and store rooms, especially the kitchens. They refer to cases of vermin and comment that "steps were being taken to cope with the situation." They remark that "cleanliness was a characteristic of the men in the camps." They refer to one camp in which rats had become a menace. This matter will receive prompt and effective attention. During the past three weeks the rats have been practically eliminated by the use of gas. Except as regards one camp where immediate remedial action is being ordered, the commission reports favourably on sanitation and the same is true as regards water supply. They refer to "the wonderfully good health which prevailed."

As regards medical attention to the men in the camps the commission report investigating complaints as to lack of attention and neglect and state that they found these "not substantiated by evidence."

Certain suggestions as to a change in the system followed for the issue of tobacco are put forward for consideration and these will be carefully examined.

In their report the commission then examined the mental attitude of the men in the camps, the question of unsuitability of some of the men for the——type of life involved or the work expected to be done;—

the question of young men in the camps; of the difficulty of men keeping in touch with possibilities of employment; the limited assistance which the provincial labour bureau has been able to offer; the fact that the idea prevails among the men that employers deem them unsuitable for employment. In this connection the commission comment that—

We did not find evidence to substantiate this opinion.

Reference is then made to the so called "clothing racket;" to the alternative of giving a cash allowance in lieu of issues in kind and the opinion is expressed that this——would not be beneficial to the men utilizing these camps.

I may say that this opinion is fully shared by the administrative officers of the department; that the costs for clothing are remarkably moderate having regard to all circumstances and that it is clear that trafficking in this clothing, while it does take place despite all the precautions which have been taken, is not on anything like as large a scale as some reports from outside sources would seem to indicate. Further, measures to act as a deterrent to this diversion of equipment intended for relief, have now been instituted but it is too early as yet to judge the results which will be obtained.

I may say that the possible difficulties in connection with the issue of clothing and other necessary equipment were foreseen at the time the relief projects were first instituted and at that time it was decided to rely on the good faith of the men being cared for unless and until it had been established by experience that precautions against theft and misuse were necessary.

It must be realized that every restrictive measure which is instituted to prevent abuse by a few unscrupulous individuals impinges also on the vast majority of the men who act fairly in these matters.

The commission refer to isolation of some of the camps, to the absence of social contacts and the lack of any change of environment——with a consequent depressing mental attitude.

[Mr. Stirling.]

In this connection, as a result of a survey of the situation throughout Canada which had been placed in hand before the commission was appointed, the conclusion was reached that a system of leave with allowances should be instituted. The necessary instructions in this connection were issued on 8th May, 1935, and the railways are cooperating by the issue of transportation at reduced rates (2 cents per mile).

As regards recreation, the commission states:

A general complaint was voiced in all camps visited regarding inadequate recreation facilities and appointments.

Up to the present no recreational equipment has been provided as a charge against the public for the reason that it was thought that this should and could be provided otherwise. Many thousands of dollars either in cash or in kind were raised through the personal endeavour of the officers of the Department of National Defence, the units of the militia and of the air force and their friends who had a natural desire to assist in helping those less fortunately placed. These funds were supplemented by the small profits from the canteens and the whole has been very carefully administered with a view to doing the best possible, particularly for the outlying projects in isolated localities far from the observation of the public.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister if he has included all the recommendations of the commission in the statement he has just read to the house?

Mr. STIRLING: I would not say it has picked up every one of them, but it has dealt with the principal ones.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will copies of the report be available?

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) asked with regard to the printing of the report. The government's idea is that there would not probably be a large enough demand for the report to warrant the printing of it. However I have a spare copy in typewritten form, and if the hon. member asks me for it I shall be glad to let him see it.

Mr. MUNN: I should like to ask a question in this connection. I think all members from British Columbia would like very much to have a copy of the report; perhaps members from other parts of Canada would like to see it, too.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. MUNN: Would it not be possible to have it printed? I should like to have an answer from the minister.

Mr. STIRLING: Very well. I move:

That 200 copies in English and 150 copies in French of the report be printed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

APPOINTMENT OF MAJOR GENERAL A. G. L. MCNAUGHTON IN PLACE OF DOCTOR H. M. TORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask. Originally I intended to ask it of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) but I believe I shall direct it to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). My question is based upon a press report of a few days ago to the effect that Doctor H. M. Tory, head of the national research council has resigned, and that his successor was appointed, namely, Major General McNaughton at a salary of $15,000 per year. I understand Major General McNaughton has been chief of staff of the Department of National Defence for some time at a salary of $10,000.

My question is this: Has Major General McNaughton resigned as chief of staff of the Department of National Defence, and if so when; and when did he assume the duties of head of the national research council at $15,000 per year?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Some seven years ago a contract was entered into between the government of Canada and Doctor Tory employing him for a period of seven years from the 1st day of June, 1928, to the 1st day of June, 1935, at a salary of $15,000 per year, or until his successor was appointed. I believe communications took place between the Department of Trade and Commerce and Doctor Tory, and when the 1st of June came Major General McNaughton was appointed in his stead at the same salary for the same term, and of course he ceases to be chief of staff. He will be paid the emoluments of his new office, when he takes that over, after cleaning up his present office, Major General Ashton having been appointed chief of general staff.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not quite clear on the matter. I understood the Prime Minister to say that Major General McNaughton took charge of the national research council on June 1; is that right?

Mr. BENNETT: I said he was appointed as from the 1st of June.

Mr. SANDERSON: Is he still chief of staff of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. BENNETT: He is not drawing two salaries, if that is what the hon. gentleman means. But he is clearing up the business of his office until General Ashton takes over. The fact is however that he is appointed head of the national research council from June 1, 1935.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then, Mr. Speaker, Major General McNaughton is still acting chief of staff of the Department of National Defence and is also at the head of the national research council; is that right?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course that is not correct. If the hon. gentleman will listen again he will not have so much difficulty.

Mr. SANDERSON: I have been listening attentively.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that Major General McNaughton had been appointed head of the research bureau from June 1, 1935, and that he is cleaning up his department as a matter of detail, and will occupy the position as chief of the research bureau. That is his appointment. He is cleaning up his position, but is acting as head of the council, and has acted as such. He is doing the same as any man going to another position would do, namely, cleaning up his old office as his successor, General Ashton, has not yet arrived.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister if General McNaughton will be seconded for duty with the national research council or will he sever all connection with the Department of National Defence?

Mr. STIRLING: He ceases to be chief of general staff and becomes president of the national research council.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And not seconded,—or is he appointed for a number of years under contract?

Mr. BENNETT: I said that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is an important point. Is he seconded for duty or is he not?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: He is seconded, yes.

Mr. SANDERSON: I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence or the Prime Minister about the pension Major General McNaughton will receive after he leaves the Department of National Defence?

Mr. BENNETT: He will receive such pension as his payments entitle him to receive under the law.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Outside of the $15,000?

Mr. SANDERSON: If the Prime Minister is aware of the exact amount of the pension I think he should state it to us.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no idea what the pension would be, nor has anyone else until the moment for pension arrives. When that time arrives he will be eligible for the pension to which his payments to the superannuation fund have entitled him.

Mr. SANDERSON: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SANDERSON: I won't sit down until this is finished. My question is a very proper one and in the interests of the public generally. If the Prime Minister does not have the information in regard to the pension which Major General McNaughton will receive after he goes over to the research council and receives $15,000 per year will he when he finds that out give the information to the house?

Mr. BENNETT: He will answer at once. He will receive no pension. I made it so clear that I did not think any man with intelligence would have any difficulty in understanding it.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would say to the Prime Minister that my intelligence is not of the same standard as his, but I say further that this afternoon he is evading the question. Will Major General McNaughton maintain his pension rights when he goes over as head of the research council?

Mr. BENNETT: I made it clear that he has the right of pension which would be due him as a public servant when he terminates his services. He will secure such pension as his payments into the fund entitle him to receive. He will not receive pension and salary at the same time. I repeat, he will not receive a pension and salary at the same time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is better.

HIGH COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE

INQUIRY CONCERNING QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) to page 3451 of Hansard for yesterday, and particularly to a question having to do with the High Commissioner's office at London, and the expenditures in connection therewith. Yesterday when the question was called the minister called "Answered." To-day it appears in Hansard that he stated "Return tabled forthwith." I have telephoned the office handling sessional papers, and I find that there are no papers in that office. May I ask what the minister meant?

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe my answer was not correct. I thought I was answering another question. I understand the question was ordered to stand as an order for return then tabled or to be tabled. However there will be no difficulty about it.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

ADMINISTRATIVE, ADVISORY AND INVESTIGATORY FUNCTIONS—PROVISION FOR A DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. 86, to establish a dominion trade and industry commission.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the house for second reading is an honest, sincere attempt to give effect to such portions of the report of the royal commission on price spreads not otherwise provided for in legislation currently before the house and within the constitutional limitations of parliament.

It will be recalled that chapter 9 of the report of the royal commission, beginning at page 248 of the report, deals exhaustively with the problem of state control of business, and the general recommendations of the report have been summarized under the following headings and recommendations:

1. The setting up of a federal trade and industry commission with a structure consisting of five members appointed by the governor in council as a semi-autonomous board under the president of the privy council; (b) its status both in its authority and in its relation to the responsible minister and to parliament to be similar to that of the board of railway commissioners.

I shall allude to the question of the structure of the proposed board at a later stage in my remarks.

2. Functions of the commission. These were to be administrative, advisory and investigatory. I shall not go into the various subheadings of all these functions but would crave leave to have the summary of the general recommendations as they appear in the report printed in Hansard:

Chapter IX

The Problem of State Control

General Recommendations

1. Federal trade and industry commission.

1. Structure

(a) To consist of five members appointed by the governor in council, as a semi-autonomous board under the president of the privy council.

(b) Its status both in its authority and in its relation to the responsible minister and parliament, to be similar to that of the board of railway commissioners.

2. Functions

(a) Administrative—

(1) Rigorous administration of an amended Combines Investigation Act, for the purpose of retaining and restoring competition whenever possible.

(2) On instruction from the governor in council, to regulate monopoly, when competition cannot or should not be restored or enforced.

(3) On instruction from the governor in council, to a sanction and supervise agreements for industrial self-government.

(4) To prohibit unfair competitive practices.

(a) Such practices should not be set out in detail in the act setting up the commission, but a general definition of unfairness should be included.

(b) A definition for this purpose is suggested.

(c) Certain practices such as discriminatory discounts, rebates and allowances, territorial price discrimination and predatory price-cutting, should be included within this definition.

(d) The commission should act by inquiry, hearings and where necessary, prohibitory orders.

(e) An appeal from these orders to the Exchequer Court of Canada, should be permitted.

(f) The commission should be given adequate power, as outlined, for the enforcement of its orders.

(g) In more serious cases, the commission might prosecute directly under the act for the offence of competing unfairly.

(h) The results of its major findings should be published.

(5) To supervise generally, or cooperate in the administration of existing laws relating to merchandising and business practices for which no other agency exists.

(6) To administer new laws for the protection of the consumer.

(7) To administer the regulation of new security issues for protection of the investor.

(8) To cooperate with chambers of commerce and boards of trade in the development of commercial arbitration or the refereeing of business disputes.

(9) To cooperate with other government agencies, whether federal, provincial or municipal, in the solution of trade and industrial problems.

(b) Advisory—

(1) To government—

(a) To recommend to the governor in council the recognition and regulation of monopoly in special situations where competition cannot be restored.

(b) If so requested by an industry, and after investigation, to recommend to the governor in council the granting of powers of "self-government" in special situations where competition seems undesirable.

(c) To recommend to the governor in council such regulatory measures as each such situation seems to require under (a) or (b).

(2) To industry—

In cooperative trade practice conferences to advise industry and secure its advice about the elimination of unfair trade practices.

(c) Investigation and pubicity—

(1) Full power to inquire into the organization and practices of any industry.

(2) General economic investigation.

(3) Full publicity to the results of any investigation.

(4) Authority to require that firms or industries publish such information about prices or other matters as may be in the public interest.

2. Amendments to the Combines Investigation Act.

1. To facilitate the application of the act to single unit monopolies, as well as to combinations in restraint of trade, a definition of monopoly is given which should be included in the act.

2. Section 28 of the act should be amended to ensure that reports of inquiries by the registrar, when the inquiry has been such as a commissioner would make, should be subjected to the same provisions in respect to publication as are commissioner's reports.

3. Proposals for the extension of the general statistical work of the dominion bureau of statistics.

The second general recommendation relating to this problem of state control had to do with amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, and there were proposals for the extension of the general statistical work of the dominion bureau of statistics.

For the purpose of the report, the commission divides industry into five different categories, namely:

1. Monopolies which could be subjected to complete regulation or government control.

2. Industries wherein competition could be satisfactorily restored by the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act.

3. Imperfectly competitive industries wherein regulations must be resorted to rather than the restoration of competition.

4. Industries where competition is effective.

5. A few industries where competition is of such a cut-throat character that it must be modified. This is referred to at page 264 of the report.

The commission recommended the setting up of a trade and industry commission under the president of the privy council and which was to have among others the following powers:

A. Rigorous enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act. This is referred to at page 266 of the report.

This recommendation is incorporated in clause 13, of the bill, which provides that the commission shall be charged with the administration of the Combines Investigation Act, and shall exercise all the powers and jurisdiction and perform all the duties conferred on the commission under the said act.

Under this power, industries in the second and fourth categories above referred to, were to be dealt with. The commission pointed out that the Combines Investigation Act should be strengthened by rendering it more definitely applicable to "single company monopolies," as compared with combinations.

A definition of monopolies was recommended which has been substantially adopted as one of the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, bill 79, wherein under section 2 (4) "merger, trust or monopoly" is defined to mean and include "any combination resulting from the purchase, lease of, or other acquisition by any person of any control over or interest in the whole or part of the business of any other person; or any person or combination of persons engaged in industry or commerce who, in any particular area or district or generally in Canada, dominate or control any class of business; or any person or combination of persons possessing or exercising within any particular area or district or generally the sole right or power of manufacturing, producing, transporting, purchasing, supplying, storing or dealing in any commodities which may be the subject of trade and commerce." I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is a very wide definition of merger, trust or monopoly.

B. The second power to be given the commission was to regulate monopolies "where competition cannot or should not be restored. This is referred to at page 267 of the report.

The commission recommended that specific industries should be declared by the commission monopolistic and exempt from the operation of the Combines Investigation Act, and subject to regulation by the commission. Under this power industries in the first and third categories are to be dealt with.

In the bill as originally drafted and submitted to counsel for opinion, there was a provision which provided for the exemption from prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act or section 498 of the criminal code, of an industry which because of its monopolistic character should be regulated and controlled as the public interest would not be safeguarded by restoring or enforcing competition and it was the opinion of both counsel that such a provision could not be justified under the heading of "regulation of trade and commerce," by section 91 (2) of the British North America Act, and it was not an exercise of jurisdiction under criminal law.

I may be permitted to quote the opinion of Mr. Tilley, dated May 15, 1935, in this regard, in which he says:

> This section (15) seems to be bad. It purports to authorize the commission to exempt an industry from the criminal provisions respecting combines of the Combines Investigation Act, and of the criminal code, because of the monopolistic character of the industry or the nature or dimensions of any of its operations....
> The dominion has been considered authorized to deal with combines under the power of criminal law and also under its power over patents and customs. Otherwise, as a previous decision showed, the dominion had nothing to do with the matter. This is clearly not criminal legislation. It is regulatory legislation and on that account seems to be bad.

Undoubtedly the learned counsel had in mind the board of commerce case decided by the privy council in 1921 and cited as the Attorney General for Canada versus the Attorney General for Alberta and others to be found in 1922 Appeal Cases, page 1. It will be recalled that in 1919 parliament enacted two statutes called the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, to be read and construed together, under which it was proposed by the board to issue an order prohibiting retail clothing dealers from making unfair profits. The authority of the board was challenged and the Supreme Court of Canada was asked to decide two questions. First, whether the board of commerce had lawful authority to make such an order and, second, if so, whether they had lawful authority to require the Supreme Court of Ontario to make it a rule of court. The Supreme Court of Canada was equally divided in opinion and special leave was granted to appeal to the privy council. The privy council held that the first question must be answered in the negative, that is to the effect that the board had no lawful authority to make an order prohibiting retail clothing dealers from making unfair profits. As a consequence the second question did not arise. The privy council decided that the legislation setting up a board of commerce with power to make such an order was, in the absence of exceptional circumstances, imperilling the peace, order and good government of the dominion beyond the powers conferred on the dominion parliament by section 91 of the British North America Act.

It may be of interest to hon. members who are of the legal profession to study this judgment which was delivered on behalf of their lordships by Viscount Haldane. This reads:

The regulation of trade and commerce did not by itself enable interference with particular trades in which Canadians would, apart from any right of interference conferred by these words above, be free to engage in the provinces.

With reference to the criminal law he said that this power enables the dominion parliament to exercise exclusive legislative power where the subject matter is one which by its very nature belongs to the domain of dominion jurisdiction. It continues:

It is quite another thing, first to attempt to interfere with a class of subjects committed exclusively to the provincial legislatures, and then to justify this by enacting ancillary provisions designated as new phases of dominion criminal law which require a title to so interfere as basis of their application.

The third power to be exercised by the commission was to give approval to price and production agreements between the persons engaged in any industry where cut-throat competition was demoralizing the industry. This power of approval is now provided for by section 14 of the bill, which reads:

(1) In any case where the commission, after full investigation under the Combines Investigation Act, is unanimously of opinion that wasteful or demoralizing competition exists in any specific industry, and that agreements between the persons engaged in the industry to modify such competition by controlling and regulating prices or production would not result in injury to our undue restraint of trade or be detrimental to or against the interest of the public, the commission may so advise the governor in council and recomend that certain agreements be approved.

(2) The governor in council may, if of opinion that the conclusions of the commission are well founded, approve of any such agreement, and shall make regulations requiring the commission to determine from time to time whether the agreement is resulting in injury to or undue restraint of trade or is detrimental to the public interest.

(3) The commission shall require persons engaged in the industry to furnish full information relating to operations within the industry under the agreement and may at any time, of its own motion and in its absolute discretion, advise the governor in council to rescind the approval of the agreement and the governor in council may rescind the approval.

The fourth power recommended by the report related to the protection of the consumers, which was to be effected by two means: First, by the enforcement of the laws relating to weights and measures, trademarks, patents, commodity standards et cetera and, second, by improving and adding to commodity standards. Under section 20 of the bill the commission is given power to receive and investigate complaints respecting the various laws which exist for the protection of the consumer, as well as others generally described in the bill as "laws prohibiting unfair trade practices," and enumerated in section 2, subsection (h) of the bill. I would direct the attention of hon. members to the large number of statutes presently existing and in force which are named in subsection (h) of section 2. It is surprising to find that there are already so many acts on the statute books prohibiting unfair trade practices. As will be observed these include the Agricultural Pests Control Act, the Canada Grain Act, the Combines Investigation Act, the Dairy Industry Act and a long list of I think twenty-eight others including sections 404, 405, 406, 415A and 486 to 504 inclusive of the criminal code itself, as well as those other bills which are now before the house for enactment. The enumeration of these acts, including the criminal code, and of the regulations made from time to time under most if not all of them, would indicate that there is a very large body of legislation now on the statute books which has for its object presently and now existing the protection of the consumer as well as others.

It may well be that there is ground for the belief that in the past all of these laws and regulations have not been sufficiently or efficiently enforced and in order to remedy this defect, if defect there be, the bill gives authority to the governor in council under section 21 to appoint an officer to be called the director of public prosecutions and who shall be responsible for the prosecution of all these laws above enumerated, including the sections of the bill now before the house. It will be observed that under section 22 of the bill it shall be the duty of the director of public prosecutions under the superintendence of the Minister of Justice:

(a) to institute, undertake or carry on, at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada or the commission criminal proceedings for violation of any of the laws prohibiting unfair trade practices in cases which appear to be of importance or difficulty or in which special circumstances or the refusal or failure of any other person to institute, undertake or carry on such proceedings appear to render the action of such director necessary to secure the due prosecution of an offender;

(b) to give such advice or assistance to the Attorney General of any province in connection with the prosecution of offenders against laws prohibiting unfair trade practices as appears necessary to secure the prosecution of such offenders;

(c) to assist the commission in the conduct of any investigation where it is alleged or complained that an offence against any of the laws prohibiting unfair trade practices has been or is likely to be committed.

In addition to the foregoing the commission is given investigational and advisory authority in connection with commodity standards, as covered by sections 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19.

The royal commission further recommended that the dominion trade commission should have authority to regulate trade practices by means of "cease and desist" orders directed to any person engaged in industry whose conduct seemed to the commission to be unfair. This same method of mandatory regulation had been resorted to by parliament when it enacted the Board of Commerce Act, 1919, chapter 37, 1910 George V, 1919, and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, 1919, chapter 45, 1910 George V, 1919. This legislation, which was to be read together, was held to be ultra vires by the privy council in the board of commerce case above referred to in which it was held that orders issued by the board of commerce prohibiting certain retail dealers from making unfair profits was beyond the jurisdiction of the federal parliament.

The legislation setting up such a board with power to make such regulatory and mandatory orders was not clothed or made under exceptional circumstances imperilling peace, order and good government of the dominion.

In this connection Lord Haldane makes the following observations:

> The first question to be answered is whether the dominion parliament could validly enact such a law. Their lordships observe that the law is not one enacted to meet special conditions in war time. It was passed in 1919, after peace had been declared, and it is not confined to any temporary purpose, but is to continue without limit in time, and to apply throughout Canada. No doubt the initial words of section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867, confer on the parliament of Canada power to deal with subjects which concern the dominion generally, provided that they are not withheld from the powers of that parliament to legislate, by any of the express heads in section 92, untrammelled by the enumeration of special heads in section 91. In may well be that the subjects of undue combination and hoarding are matters in which the dominion has a great practical interest. In special circumstances, such as those of a great war, such an interest might conceivably become of such paramount and overriding importance as to amount to what lies outside the heads in section 92, and is not covered by them. The decision in Russell v. The Queen (7 App. Cas., 829) appears to recognize this as constitutionally possible, even in time of peace; but it is quite another matter to say that under normal circumstances general Canadian policy can justify interference, on such a scale as the statutes in controversy involve, with the property and civil rights of the inhabitants of the provinces. It is to the legislatures of the provinces that the regulation and restriction of their civil rights have in general been exclusively confined, and as to these the provincial legislatures possess quasi-sovereign authority. It can, therefore, be only under necessity in highly exceptional circumstances, such as cannot be assumed to exist in the present case, that the liberty of the inhabitants of the provinces may be restricted by the parliament of Canada, and that the dominion can intervene in the interests of Canada as a whole in questions such as the present one. For, normally, the subject matter to be dealt with in the case would be one falling within section 92. Nor do the words in section 91, "the regulation of trade and commerce," if taken by themselves, assist the present dominion contention. It may well be, if the parliament of Canada had, by reason of an altogether exceptional situation, capacity to interfere, that these words would apply so as to enable that parliament to oust the exclusive character of the provincial powers under section 92.

In this connection I may observe that in the original draft of the bill three sections were included which had to do with the question of mandatory and regulatory orders, the publication of price lists and other things of a like character.

Mr. Tilley, in his opinion submitted to the government, stated as follows:

> Sections 28, 29 and 30 are, I think, invalid. By subsection (3) of 28 a person who omits to comply with an order of the commission made under the section is guilty of an offence and liable on indictment or summary conviction to a penalty. While this provision gives section 28 the appearance of criminal law, I am of the opinion that parliament cannot under criminal law authorize a commission to declare what practices are unfair and to issue orders prohibiting the practice and then attach criminal consequences to a breach of the order. Where the matters dealt with are provincial in character, the provincial legislature can provide the sanction.

Mr. Geoffrion in his opinion of May 15 states:

> Sections 28, 29 and 30 of the bill as originally drafted also appear to me to be bad. The dominion can deal with unfair trade practices under its jurisdiction concerning criminal law but that is not what it does here. I would think that the judgment on the first combines act which is set aside would apply here.

I am not unmindful of the decision in the privy council in the Proprietary Articles Trade Association case, reported in 1931 Appeal Cases, page 210, where it was held that the legislation in question, being in its pith and substance within enumerated heads of section 91, it was not material that it affected property and civil rights in the province . . . and it further decided that it was unnecessary to discuss whether the legislation was intra vires also under section 91, head 2, "The regulation of Trade and Commerce." The difference between the Board of Commerce case and the P.A.T.A. case in substance is that, in the first case, the legislation endeavoured to make the commission of a prohibited offence which was not in its pith and substance a crime, criminal legislation. In the latter case, according to the judgment of Lord Atkin, if the legislation in its pith and substance was criminal in character, it was intra vires.

I submit, therefore, that the government was justified in not including in the bill presently before parliament provisions for the regulation of monopoly in the sense that I have outlined or for mandatory and regulatory orders such as is contemplated by the findings of the commission to which I have referred. Counsel have unanimously advised that the commission could not be clothed with these powers.

However, amendments have been introduced in bill 73, an act to amend the criminal code, (clauses 5 and 6) to carry out the recommendation of the commission with regard to unfair trade practices in so far as this may be done. A further recommendation in this connection was that the commission might require any person to publish price lists and this too was thought to be ultra vires.

The bill now before the house, therefore, naturally divides itself into five main departments of activity, namely:

1. Administration of the Combines Investigation Act.
2. Investigation of complaints respecting unfair trade practices.
3. Supervision of commodity standards.
4. Issue of new securities.
5. Price and production agreements.

There is also the general power of investigation into unfair trade practices and provision for fair trade conferences, cooperation with boards of trade, and economic investigation, to which are attached enabling powers.

A further outstanding provision of the bill is the initiation of the office of director of public prosecutions. Hitherto in Canada we have never had such an officer but in the United Kingdom they have had a director of public prosecutions with most beneficial results to the body politic, and I commend unreservedly this provision of the bill to the house and to the country.

I have not hitherto made specific reference to the powers of the commission to investigate the capital structure of companies and the issue of new securities as recommended by the royal commission. In the Dominion Companies Act itself and in the amendments contained in the bill proposed by the hon. Secretary of State will be found provisions which, in my opinion, go a long way towards meeting the recommendations of the royal commission, and in section 26 of the bill it has been provided that the commission shall have the power, if requested by the Secretary of State, who is charged with the operation of the Companies Act, to investigate and review the capital structure of any company incorporated by or under any act of parliament proposing to issue new shares, debentures or other securities to the public. Ample provision is made for the furnishing of such information as the commission may require, and provision is further made that the commission may disapprove or reject any such issue but shall not give formal approval to an issue. These provisions, together with the provisions of the Companies Act as proposed to be amended, should go a long way to meet the recommendations of the royal commission in this regard.

I should add that on page 272 of the report the royal commission further recommended that the commission should have investigational and advisory powers upon economic questions generally. This recommendation is implemented by clause 25 of the bill. In my opinion, however, that clause requires a slight amendment by inserting in the sixth line after the words "economic council" the following words: "Established under the Economic Council of Canada Act 1935."

I am not unmindful of the fact that in its recommendations regarding the problem of state control, the royal commission recommended the establishment of a distinct trade and industry commission with a structure consisting of five members appointed by the governor in council as a semi-autonomous board under the president of the privy council, and with a status both in its authority and in its relation to the responsible minister and parliament, to be similar to that of the board of railway commissioners with administrative, advisory and investigatory functions.

The structure of the commission set up under this act frankly does not carry out the terms of that recommendation but on the contrary constitutes a commission consisting of three commissioners, the members of which shall be the members for the time being of the tariff board as established pursuant to the Tariff Board Act, chapter 55, 1931, who shall by virtue of holding office as members of the said board and by virtue of the bill be the commissioners under this bill.

Objection may be taken to this method of constituting a dominion trade and industry commission, but I assure the house and the country that the government has given the most careful consideration to this aspect of the matter, and has arrived at the conclusion that if the functions of a dominion trade and industry commission can be efficiently carried on by a presently existing board, it is in the public interest that this should be done. I have taken measures to satisfy myself that the tariff board as presently constituted, or as it may be constituted hereafter by an enlargment of its personnel, is fully capable of performing the functions imposed upon it by the terms of this bill.

The whole matter is one of modus operandi, not of substance, and the method adopted should not be condemned because this provision of the royal commission report has not been translated into legislation. The tariff board, as presently constituted, is without question an efficient body and has performed most useful service to the people of Canada. If it is accepted as the dominion trade and industry commission the board will function efficiently and competently, and there will be the additional advantage of a saving to the public treasury of a large expenditure which would be necessary if a new and distinct board were to be set up. The dominion trade and industry commission will function as a separate branch of the tariff board, with its own officers and secretariat. It may be necessary in the course of time to increase the personnel of the tariff board for this purpose, but at this juncture it is not thought that we should set up in this country another new and expensive commission of the character indicated by the report.

I commend the bill to the best consideration of the house, and will welcome constructive suggestions with respect to the substantive clauses thereof, always assuming that such suggestions are consonant with the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (East Kootenay): Before the bill is read the second time I should like to make a few observations. This bill is one of several offered to parliament with the declaration that it gives effect in an adequate manner to the proposals and recommendations of the price spreads and mass buying commission's report. It might be interesting at this point to indicate to the house a number of bills which purport to participate in the discharge of that duty. There were several bills based upon the peace treaty; No. 21 for the eight hour day, No. 22 for the weekly day of rest, No. 40 to provide for minimum wages—not directly associated with the price spreads commission report but indirectly related to the problems which were exposed during that inquiry—and the bill to establish an economic council. That bill and the unemployment and social insurance bill may be said to contribute in some measure towards the discharge of that obligation although not directly associated with the report. Other bills, however, which I think may be said to arise out of the report are as follows. Bill No. 70, to amend the Weights and Measures Act, regarding which I have nothing to say except that it does, I think, add to the efficiency of that act; Bill No. 72, to amend the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, which I shall not discuss at this time other than to say that in my opinion it does not in any sense carry out the suggestions of the report—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear hear.

Mr. STEVENS: —or in any adequate way give that measure of correction of the abuses and faults which were found to exist in connection with the marketing of live stock and live stock products. Bill No. 73, to amend the criminal code was debated yesterday and is still before the committee of the house. As I pointed out last night it was declared on at least two occasions by the Minister of Justice to be in some of its clauses at least of very doubtful value. I should think a measure launched in that spirit would not inspire very much fear in the hearts—I think they have not hearts, but in the minds of those who were most guilty of violation of the ordinary ethics of business as employers. In addition to that the leading legal advisers and spokesmen of the opposition declared that it was so trivial that the house should not waste any more time considering it. That was not my own opinion, that was the opinion expressed by eminent legal authorities on both sides of the house. So one cannot take very much comfort out of the amendments of the criminal code. I made certain suggestions last night to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), and I hope that when the matter is again taken up these clauses may be amended so as to make them more effective and perhaps contribute somewhat to the discharge of the obligation to which I have referred. Then there is Bill No. 75, respecting fair wages and hours of labour in relation to public works and contracts. That is quite commendable, and is simply placing in statutory form matters which in the past were supposed to be done by governments, this government and preceding governments, and I think this bill should be welcomed by the house and the country as at least a clearing up or making obligatory by statute of practices that ought to be carried out in any case. Bill No. 79 to amend the Combines Investigation Act simply brings the administration of that act under the trade and industry commission. It does one or two other things as well, and to that extent I think should be commended. Then there is a bill to amend the Companies Act which has not yet been considered, which has to do with corporate structure, capitalization, prospectuses and so forth.

Then we have this bill, to establish a trade and industry commission. For the last couple of months I have been waiting patiently, I have scanned with great care the bills which up to the present time have been introduced, with the hope that the recommendations in the report of the price spreads commission would be put into such legislative form that we might expect effective remedies for the evils so completely demonstrated in the report. This bill now before the house I looked for with a great deal of hope and confidence, expecting that it would contain such provisions as would adequately take care of the case. It is a matter for regret to me and an extremely distasteful duty to have to say that I am deeply disappointed with the bill. I had hoped for much more from it, perhaps I had hoped for too much; but I am very much disappointed. I shall try in the limited time at my disposal to indicate the reasons for that disappointment, and perhaps suggest where I think the bill might yet be made more effective, in the hope that these suggestions may be received by the government with some measure of interest and consideration.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce referred to one or two matters with which I should like to deal before I proceed with the remarks which I have prepared for this occasion. My hon. friend cites the decision of Lord Haldane. Now I know that those who are of the legal profession rather resent a layman examining or offering opinions about decisions of the privy council or other courts. I do not do so with any desire to assert my authority, because I have none. Hon. gentlemen in this house constantly cite the decision of Lord Haldane on the Board of Commerce Act and its twin act as if it were the last word that can be said on the subject. But it will be noted from the very quotations made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who is a very able lawyer, that he pointed out that Lord Haldane said that the dominion government was exceeding its jurisdiction when it interfered with the practice of individual retail traders.

The report of the commission, Mr. Speaker, and the argument that some of us are making, is not that we should interfere with the activities of an individual citizen or trader but that we should set up machinery that will formulate rules to govern trade and commerce as a whole in this country. We are seeking to lay a foundation that will build up rules of practice which all industry will respect.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): In the public interest.

Mr. STEVENS: And in the public interest. I shall come to a more detailed argument on that in a moment. We are not therefore, going contrary to what Lord Haldane cited in that instance; on the contrary we want to establish rules of practice for all. Then my hon. friend cited the decision of the privy council under Lord Atkin in 1931 or 1932, and if he will not think me impertinent I should like to correct his interpretation of that decision. My hon. friend suggested that the decision of the privy council under Lord Atkin was to this effect, that you could not declare a thing a crime that was not in its nature a crime. My hon. friend will correct me if I am wrong in my interpretation of his words. Let me read what Lord Atkin said, because I think if we are going to stand on legal precedents at least we should take the latest precedent. Let us see what Lord Atkin said:

> The criminal quality of an act cannot be discerned by intuition; nor can it be discovered by reference to any standard but one: Is the act prohibited with penal consequences? Morality and criminality are far from coextensive; nor is the sphere of criminality necessarily part of a more extensive field covered by morality—unless the moral code necessarily disproves all acts prohibited by the state, in which case the argument moves in a circle. It appears to their lordships to be of little value to seek to confine crimes to the category of acts which by their very nature belong to the domain of "criminal jurisprudence"—

May I emphasize those words:

> It appears to their lordships to be of little value to seek to confine crimes to the category of acts which by their very nature belong to the domain of "criminal jurisprudence"—

That is precisely the reverse of what seems to have been accepted as his decision.

> —for the domain of criminal jurisprudence can only be ascertained by examining what acts at any particular period are declared by the state to be crimes, and the only common nature they will be found to possess is that they are prohibited by the state and that those who commit them are punished.

Let me pause there; any act prohibited by the state for which there are penal consequences is a crime. So Lord Atkin has said. That is not my opinion; that is the opinion of their lordships of the privy council.

> Their lordships agree with the view expressed in the judgment of Newcombe, J., that the passage in the judgment of the board in the Board of Commerce case, to which allusion has been made, was not intended as a definition.

There, sir, I have cited Lord Atkin. I am not presuming, in the face of men in this house learned in the law, to argue the pro or con of the legality of things, but I do think we have come to a position in this House of Commons where we have a right to make some sort of effort to legislate in the interests of the great masses of the people. And I say that in spite of the fact that one person has described me as an individual running amok. I say that, sir, because I know that the people of this country are looking to this house to bring about some measure of relief from the evils which are present with us.

I am not going to argue that point further, but I should like to point out this: In days gone by in this country there were laws regarding crime, just as there are to-day, but there was something else. There were standards of ethics; there were customs and practices in business which were recognized by and large as very largely controlling men in connection with their affairs. Do not let us forget that there was a much larger code of ethics than there was of laws. I would be doing business with another man; certain practices, customs and ethics governed me. That was all right so long as we had individuals in business, but what has happened? Let us face the fact. A complete change has come over the western world in the method of doing business. The old relationship of myself with hon. gentlemen opposite or individuals here and there has largely disappeared, and what do the business men find to-day? I will ask any business man in any part of this house; he can answer for himself as to what he finds to-day. You meet some individual in connection with some business transaction; it may be the sale of goods, it may be in connection with a building contract or anything you like, and what do you find? Usually you find that you are dealing with some official of a large corporation and, as our report shows, that has extended not to a few great industries or utilities but to every branch of human activity. The corner grocery has largely passed out of the hands of the individual into the hands of great international corporations. The five cent article that a shop girl will buy to put in her ear is now associated with corporations worth scores and, indeed, hundreds of millions of dollars. You go into a dry goods store to buy a suit of clothes and you are dealing with a corporation that has its tentacles spread over 171 different units, doing business all over the country, with a capital structure of $30,0000,000 or $40,000,000.

So, Mr. Speaker, we have a different method of orientation of business to-day, and I think it behooves parliament to face the common facts. This has been an evolution, a growth. I am not complaining; I am not condemning parliament or anyone associated with the past government of this country for not having advanced quite as rapidly as this development, because it was not perhaps realized or seen. Yet the report shows, as anyone who desires to read it will find, that many of the abuses to which we have directed attention have existed for quite a number of years. It is only during the last few years—particularly during the depression, it is true, because that accentuated the burden or the suffering—that it has developed that certain abuses have crept in due to this condition to which I have referred. The report describes that as due to the concentration and the control of credit and industry, and I should like to spend a few moments to impress upon the minds of hon. members the fact that concentration is with us, and the degree to which that concentration has developed. First let me refer to the report, from which I should like to read one or two brief extracts. I quote from page 13:

> The evidence ... has shown that a few great corporations are predominant in the industries that have been investigated; also that this power, all the more dangerous because it is impersonal—

I should like the house to note those words.

> —all the more dangerous because it is impersonal, can be wielded in such a way that competition within the industry is blocked, the welfare of the producer disregarded, and the interests of the investor ignored.

Then there is another point to which I shall now direct the attention of the house. In the years 1900 to 1933 there occurred in Canada 374 mergers, or, as it has been called by economic experts, consolidations, involving 1,145 firms. I am going to draw attention to a phenomenon which I think should be given close consideration and study. Of these 374 mergers or consolidations 246 occurred between the years 1924 and 1930, and 128 in the remaining 27 years. It will be noted that 1924 and the years subsequent to 1924 followed the passing of the Combines Investigation Act. I ask hon. members, Mr. Speaker, to give consideration to this point, because I am arguing at this time not to indicate that the Combines Investigation Act is responsible for the merger but to prove that in spite of the Combines Investigation Act the natural growth or evolution of business control and concentration went on and resulted in 246 consolidations. What does that mean? It means this that the Combines Investigation Act, while an admirable measure —and I wish to say at once that I stand for its continuance, but urge that it be placed under an effective board; I urge its continuance for the value that is inherent in it—it means that this Combines Investigation Act is not sufficient to control the situation. That has been demonstrated. It does not as a matter of fact to any extent deal with the situation which has arisen. This is an economic phenomenon outside the vision of the framers of this act, and calling for distinctive treatment by parliament.

Let us look at credit concentration. I shall give only a few illustrations, and since the time at my disposal is short I shall give them quickly. I should like to say to the house that in citing these facts I am not for one moment discussing the question whether the condition is good or bad; I am simply trying to indicate that what I describe is a factor in the economic life of Canada which we must face and with which we must deal. Four of the largest trust companies, three of the largest mortgage companies and six of the largest insurance companies have combined assets of $3,149,000,000, or seventy-five per cent of the assets of all such institutions doing business in Canada. Does that not indicate, sir, a growing concentration in Canada of capital control, of wealth control, of credit control? Then, turning to retail business I find that two concerns control 12·9 per cent, practically 13 per cent, of all the retail business in Canada. Probably 50,000 other concerns, or thereabouts, do the remainder of the business. There is good evidence of the development of powerful institutions within the activities of certain lines of business commerce and finance in Canada.

As was indicated last night by a speaker from the opposite side of the house I find that in the packing industry one concern controls 59 per cent of the business, two together controlling 85 per cent. There again, sir, you have a great concentration of power and control, and we have—how many?—we have 700,000 farmers who must do business under the shadow of that control. For the moment we are not interested in whether this is a good or a bad condition—although in fact we are deeply interested in it—but at this time we turn our attention to the terrific concentration of powerful control in certain lines of goods, on the one hand, as against the unorganized and diversified efforts of 700,000 farmers. Because, Mr. Speaker, nearly every one of those farmers is in greater or lesser degree interested in the meat packing business.

Let us now turn to agricultural implements. In this industry two concerns control 63 per cent of Canadian business—two concerns only. And without going into that in detail we know that the policy of those concerns—and again without debating whether or not it is good or bad business—has been one of expansion. They developed a condition under which there was a terrific overhead. Who bore that overhead? The farmer did. The purchaser of the implements had to bear it. You say, "Well, that must be, because the overhead must be considered." Well, if your sales drop from $50,000,000 down to $10,000,000 obviously the unit of overhead is multiplied tremendously; but the farmer pays it all. Is it any wonder that the producer is asking for some measure of relief, is urging that this new orientation of business should be looked at by parliament and some steps taken to protect him against unfair exploitation?

Let us turn to the textile industry. In that there are two great concerns, each of which has one subsidiary. Between them they control 79 per cent of the business in their line. And so one might go on; I have a number of others which I shall not enumerate. These must serve to indicate, however, that the concentration in the control of industry has been going on apace, and what is of still greater significance so has the concentration of the control of credit.

At this point may I say a word or two about interlocking directorates and individual control. Sir, I could spend at least an hour demonstrating to this chamber a situation which is amazing, if not appalling. Again I say it is not a question whether or not these men to whom I refer are good or bad citizens. It is the terrific responsibility that they have assumed by acquiring control of such a large proportion of the business of Canada with which I am now dealing. The significant point is that it constitutes in my opinion a drastic, if not a revolutionary, change in our business methods. I have before me two or three examples which I should like to read hurriedly to the house, and which I have worked out carefully.

I stated on another occasion, and I have the figures before me, that some twelve individuals by their position in the financial world control $9,800,000,000 of wealth in the form of company assets. These twelve individuals hold twenty-three presidencies, twelve vice-presidencies, three chairman-of-board-of-directorships, and forty-seven directorships. That is terrific control. As a matter of fact some individuals hold presidencies or the absolute control of companies to the number of eight, ten or twelve companies, any one of which would be sufficient to tax the energy and intelligence of a very able man. Yet they sit in control of these companies. No person could argue, as some attempt to do, "Oh well, they are only one on the boards of directors." I shall show you in a moment how boards of directors interlock. But that is not the point. Any person who knows, as I know, must realize that when these individuals walk into a board room they dominate the situation. One has but to glance back over the list to realize that in this instance the old saying would hold true, "Where McGregor sits is the head of the table." Where these men sit at meetings of boards of directors is the head of the table. Their policy, their direction and their control is almost if not wholly absolute.

Here is one illustration. One man is president of a chartered bank, which I shall call A, and a trust company which I shall call B. The assets of these two institutions are in the one instance $768,000,000 and in the other $657,000,000, in round figures, or a total of $1,425,000,000. One man is chairman of both boards. Analyzing these two institutions further we find that bank A has a board of directors of eighteen members who hold a total of 189 directorships, and trust company B has a board of twenty-five members holding 222 directorships. Taking the two institutions combined we find that out of a total of forty-three directors, eighteen in the bank and twenty-five in the trust company, only twenty-nine persons hold the directorships of these two companies. In other words fourteen are on both concerns. Still taking the two together these twenty-nine men who hold forty-three directorships on these two concerns, a big bank and a big trust company, also hold 248 directorships in other companies. Can it be said that there is no evidence of concentration?

Take another case, bank C and trust company D. These two have assets of $729,000,000 and $825,000,000 respectively, or combined assets of $1,555,000,000. The same person is president of both institutions, with another man vice president of both. These two men out of a list of twelve are members of both boards of directors. Taking them separately we find that 25 directors of the trust company hold between them 261 directorships in other companies while 25 directors of bank C hold 252 directorships between them. Taking them together we find that 50 directorships of these two institutions are held by 38 men, 12 out of 35 on the trust company are also with the board of directors of the bank. Again, these 38 men who hold 50 directorships on the bank and on the trust company hold 346 directorships in other companies.

I will now take a life insurance company. We will call it E. It has a directorate of 17 members who hold a total of 156 directorships in other companies. The important point in this is that of 17 directors 10 of them hold 16 directorships in the four institutions above referred to, bank A, trust company B, bank C and trust company D, with six of them holding two apiece and four holding one apiece.

I am not going to pursue that further than to say this. I advance that as a very meagre illustration of the extent to which the concentration of the control of credit and industry in this country has grown. I notice that my time is slipping by and I must not spend too much on that phase except to say to the house that it would bear most careful and critical examination. I would ask hon. members before these bills are finally passed to give study to that section of the report dealing with this question of concentration. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I have just been told that I am not limited as to time, although I thought I was.

In regard to the trend towards concentration, it is much greater than it would appear on the surface, and the reason I say that is this: Many distinctive corporate names are used whereas the institutions or the personnel of the institutions are actually much the same. Then there is the question of interlocking directorates, to which I have referred, and there is another question of enormous importance, the question of credit control. There are industries the president or some prominent member of which sits upon the directorate of a bank, and it is well known that those who have that favoured position frequently get much better and more generous treatment in respect to the credit granted to their company than those who have not that favoured position.

Then there is the question of stock ownership scattered all over the country, with management control of the business, which is also another form of concentration.

There is also the practice of dummy directors. Frequently a powerful institution will appoint to the board of directors a person who is just a clerk or salaried employee, but he is merely a clerk voicing the opinion and discharging the orders of those who are more powerful but who do not wish their names to appear.

There is the question of motive, which is very well dealt with in the report. The motives may be said to be two: power, profit and prestige is one of the motives impelling men to secure a larger degree of concentration. There is also, of course, the motive of production and administrative economies and reduction in costs.

Constitutionally, politically, and nominally, Canada is a democracy, but actually Canada is ruled by a plutocratic autocracy. I know there are those who will consider that an extreme statement, but I think it is necessary for the House of Commons to look the facts squarely in the face. It is not a thing to laugh about. It is something, sir, that we in this house, the last fortress I might say of democracy, ought to take into very careful consideration, because if parliament fails in its duty to a democratic state then I hesitate to say what may be the consequence of its failure to discharge such a duty. This house must take notice of these developments.

What I am asking for is not the surrender of the constitutional rights of provinces, municipalities, or individuals; I am not asking for that at all. What I am asking is that this house recognize its duty to the country, to a democratic state, and exercise its powers to the limits of its constitutional rights; and I think we can do much within our constitutional rights to remedy evils of which complaint is made.

Sir, it has been said by some: Leave the problem to be worked out in the courts. That argument is frequently advanced, but in my opinion it is futile and weak. Private citizens cannot possibly appeal to the courts against great corporations. It cannot be done, and it will not be done. Let me give you an illustration, Mr. Speaker. Only a few days ago there was brought to my attention a violation of the criminal code provisions against false advertising. There was no particular need for anybody to write to me about it that I know of, but they did; for it was open to these individuals to go to the nearest police court and swear out an information, and in that way redress through the courts was available. That is in the law and has been there for years. But what individual, what business man is there among the members of this house who on seeing a glaringly false advertisement in the press to-morrow morning will go out and swear an information against his competitor in his own town? It simply is not done; that is all. It is no use saying that it is the duty of a citizen to do it. I do not think it is his duty. It is the duty of some public official to see that the laws are administered.

But that is not all. What happens to the individual, to the small merchant with limited resources, who goes up against an institution with forty or twenty or fifteen or ten or five million dollars behind it? What earthly chance has he in the courts against a big institution like that? I care not how just the courts are; I care not how impartially justice is administered, as I believe it is administered by the courts; but what chance, I ask, has the individual or the small merchant when he attempts to carry on his competitive business against these powerful corporations? I had in my hands this morning a letter from a prominent business man in Toronto marked "strictly confidential" and "private," and in the body of the letter he said, "Mr. Stevens, do not under any circumstances disclose what I have written." Then he went on to give me all the facts of a case. But what can I do; what can any public man do in a case like that? He can do nothing. The only people who can do anything in the matter would be a properly organized government body. I agree with the proposal of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in this bill to set up a public prosecutor or official who will be in charge of prosecutions. Let me point out the situation to the minister. My hon. friend very properly says that the governor in council may appoint an officer to be called the director of public prosecutions. That is a very high sounding name and would seem to be all right, but let us see what his powers are to be. Section 22 reads:

> It shall be the duty of the director of public prosecutions under the superintendence of the Minister of Justice—

These things can be done to-morrow under the superintendence of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) without the appointment of any new official. The Minister of Justice can retain a lawyer in any part of Canada, as he does every day, to prosecute under any existing law. He can do this directly through the officers of his department or he can retain an official to prosecute. The section continues to state what he is to do, as follows:

> (a) to institute, undertake or carry on, at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada—

First he is under the superintendence of the Minister of Justice and then he carries on at the instance of the Attorney General of Canada, who is the Minister of Justice. The section continues:

—or the commission criminal proceedings for violation of any of the laws prohibiting unfair trade practices.

What were we told yesterday by the Minister of Justice and by the eminent legal authority on the other side of the house? We were told that it is impossible to make a law to deal with unfair trade practices. From the other side of the house we were told that it is so much eyewash and from this side we were told that it is doubtful. This prosecutor is to institute proceedings for violation of any laws prohibiting unfair trade practices. What I want to impress upon the Minister of Justice and the members of the government is that we should provide in this bill for a board to declare what are unfair trade practices. There is no definition of unfair trade practices. When members of the legal profession are asked to enumerate in legal form what are unfair trade practices, all of them will draw away from the task of making that definition and some of them will tell you that it cannot be done. Let us see what the report has to say in that respect. I quoted from the report last night but I shall repeat the quotation. I ask hon. members of the house and the government to listen to this part of the report which along with the other parts is the product of careful thought with respect to all these problems. It reads:

We feel, further, that it would be unwise to attempt to write at present into statute law a rigid definition of what constitutes an unfair practice, with a list of such practices. Such a list, if appropriate at the present time, would probably soon be rendered obsolete by changing conditions. At the same time we recommend that the act creating the trade commission and giving it power to prohibit unfair competition should establish certain principles for the determination of unfairness. We recognize that there is a very real danger of confusing the economic, legal and ethical implications of "unfairness" and we feel that this danger might be removed to some extent if certain general criteria were laid down in the act.

Will hon. members and particularly hon. members of the government pause for a moment and consider this matter. It is clearly admitted in the report, and as a result of our study we know, that it is almost impossible to lay down in legal phraseology what are unfair trade practices. Through the centuries we have built up, shall I say, a code of ethics to govern the dealings between man and man, but in the face of the reorientation of business, in the face of the concentration of the control of industry and finance in the hands of the few, we are confronted with a new situation. There is no code of ethics to determine the practice between myself and a great corporation. It may determine what is the truth and what is fair dealing between an individual in a corporation and myself, but that individual will say to me: I am sorry, Stevens; I would not do this of my own will, but the company whose head office is in New York, in Chicago, in Philadelphia, in Toronto or in Montreal tells me that I must do this. He is sorry, but who suffers? I suffer or the fellow who is not able to cope with them suffers. The rigid rule is: business is business. That is the rule laid down by the head offices of corporations at some distant point. This fact can no longer be ignored. It is all very well to say that the game will be played according to the rules, but how can you apply rules to a packing company which controls fifty-nine per cent of the business and which shuts up a factory here and a factory there? Will the rules apply to their dealings with ten, one hundred or three hundred farmers throughout the country? What rules have we to protect these farmers? None. What code of ethics controls the actions of the company? He is a fine man who runs the business, his relations are cordial with his staff, but when it comes to dealing on the part of the corporation with ten, twenty, fifty or one hundred other people, there is no code of ethics to enter into the proposition. What about the flour milling companies, which control sixty-three per cent of the capacity of this country; what about their relations with the three hundred and fifty odd small competitors? What does the head of the Ogilvie Flour Mills Limited care for the welfare of the three hundred and fifty small competitors in Ontario and Quebec? I tell you that there is no code of ethics, there is no control, there are no rules of the game. It is not a case of the survival of the fittest, as some have said; it is not the application of the law of supply and demand, it is the ruthless power of huge capital concentration against individual operations.

There is some need of a referee. There is some need of new rules of the game. We hear about business being conducted as a game of football or baseball is played, but that is not the case. We need a referee with the power behind him to enforce the rules. That is what is asked for in this report, that the house take hold of this situation earnestly and give the commission the right to lay down rules of practice which will be respected, honoured and accepted by the people of this country. I am familiar with this matter and I speak with a great deal of confidence when I say that the great body of business men, the retailers, the wholesalers, the distributors and the manufacturers, are keen and anxious to have rules laid down and are willing to observe those rules. We have laws against murder, but we have murderers. We have laws against theft, but we have thieves. We have a constitutional right to pass laws against these things but we cannot control them absolutely. There will be the chisellers who will seek to evade these rules, but with the building up of practice, with the development of public opinion and with the establishment of the justice of your case you will gradually build up for commerce a set of rules and ethics of procedure which in my opinion will be more efficacious in carrying on the business of this country than mere statute law. I say to this house with great earnestness that this country is waiting for the House of Commons to lay down rules which will relieve countless thousands of our citizens from the unfair and predatory practices to which they have been subjected in the past.

Before closing I wish to refer to one or two things in connection with this bill. There is a certain inherent and in my opinion fatal weakness in the bill. I hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not think me discourteous when I say that while I agree with him when he says that the tariff board is well qualified and efficient, I distinctly and definitely disagree with him in the suggestion that it is competent from the point of view of physical and mental effort and the time necessary to deal with this very important matter. I do not think it can be done. We have a customs tariff board presided over by one of the ablest judicial minds in Canada; so far as that is concerned no one can complain. Indeed, I think that the chairman of the board has added greatly to his laurels by the manner in which he has presided over its proceedings. But I venture this statement, that he has before him now specific duties outlined which will keep him and his colleagues busy for at least a year. I can cite matters that are crying out for consideration by that board, matters that will occupy them another year. Let me mention one. That board ought now, at the earliest possible moment, in anticipation of the falling in of the British-Canadian trade agreements, to be studying the whole textile schedule of our tariff. They ought to be studying this subject, and they ought to provide the government, long before those agreements fall in, with some guiding principles that will enable them to remove from the Canadian tariff those measures which are objectionable to our British trade relations. It does not follow that a statement of that kind is a condemnation of the agreements, but it does follow that out of our experience with those agreements there is ample opportunty for adjustment, which will greatly enhance our standing in Great Britain. That is a task they can undertake. I suggest that when it is said that the tariff board are efficient and qualified you do them tardy justice; but I reiterate that they are not competent from the standpoint of time and organization to undertake this task, which is a tremendously important one.

We speak of the difficulty of prohibiting unfair practices. I have dealt with them pretty fully. It is not a question of drafting some narrow legal definitions of unfair practices and penalizing people for indulging in them. Rather, it is a question of building up a broad based catalogue of rules and practices that should govern commerce. Do that, and in the years to come you will attain a position similar to that which the interstate commerce commission has established for itself. On the other hand, I am not suggesting that it should be confined to what is in the interstate commerce act or in the American federal trade board act—not at all. I do say this however. Take a board established on the basis of the Canadian railway board, which acts as referee between the public and the railways—a board which in this instance shall act as referee between competitors in conflicting conditions, and between the business elements and the public—and you will have done the country a service. Can we not draft a law based upon the unity of Canada, upon peace, order and good government in Canada, and upon the provision for the regulation of trade and commerce? Do you mean to tell me, sir, an ordinary layman, that there are not legal brains in this house competent to draft a law within the ambit of these three principles to deal with the matter? Let me refer to them—I did last night. The preamble to the British North America Act lays down, as the principle on which the provinces came together, the unity of Canada. If you have a minimum wage law here and a minimum wage law there, and practices in one province that conflict with practices in another, to the extent that discord develops between provinces, surely it becomes necessary, it becomes the duty of parliament in the face of that situation to declare that in the interests of the unity of Canada, which is the basis of confederation, thus and so shall be done. Then I come to the next point, peace, order and good government. Will anyone tell me that the practices which have been uncovered, the pitiful wages paid, due to mass buying pressure, and the ruthless action of many institutions in this country in carrying out their trade practices have not been conducive to the destruction of peace, order and good government in this dominion? Will anyone tell me that this country is so quiet to-day that we need have no fear? I pay this tribute to the people of Canada; it has been amazing during these terrible years of depression how well ordered the Canadian people have been, and this is due to their inherent characteristics. But it does not follow that there has not been provocation; the provocation is there. Here we are asking for recognition of the danger to the peace, order and good government of Canada and to have this power invoked as well. The third point is one I have already referred to; it is one to which I notice the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others pay very little respect or, shall I say, attach little weight, namely, the mandatory power for the regulation of trade and commerce. It is exclusive; it is unrestricted as far as the British North America Act is concerned. But, as I have said in this house on at least two previous occasions, the trouble is that the dominion parliament has never attempted to occupy that federal field. Look over the history of the dominion for the last fifty or sixty years; we have done something with respect to external trade, but so far as internal trade goes, what have we done? Mighty little. And now we find ourselves confronted with an entirely new method of trading, different from what it was twenty years ago, something never thought of before; yet we are unprepared to meet it by reason of the fact that no use has ever been made of the power conferred upon the dominion parliament. Let us invoke that power. Based on these principles—the unity of Canada; peace, order and good government in this realm; the regulation of trade and commerce and the recognition of undisputed rights—based upon these principles, I ask that the house give power to this commission to formulate rules and practices, to define what unfair practices are, and to enforce the order to cease and desist. I am convinced, in spite of the very learned arguments made by legal gentlemen in this house, that, given the will to do it, this parliament can effectively meet this great emergency, because it is an emergency, which is confronting us in this country and which is so clearly set forth in the pages of this report.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): As a former member of the price spreads commission I feel it is my duty to say a few words concerning the proposed bill.

I followed with much interest the speech of the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) and with much of what he said I am in complete agreement, particularly in reference to the concentration in industry. I often wonder, though, and I have had occasion to hear the hon. member a number of times, why he omits in all these addresses to emphasize the fundamental thing concerning the disclosures made in that investigation and the problems raised. I think we can agree that there is no single cause responsible for the distress both of the primary producers and the working people of Canada so great as the loss of our external trade. I have never yet heard the hon. member discuss that problem. I venture to suggest that if all the corporations and the present concentration of industry were disbanded and dissolved and all their wealth distributed among all the people it would not increase our total national wealth. If our external trade remains at its present low level or sinks to lower levels, nothing will help our primary producers and the working people of Canada. It seems strange that in all the speeches I have heard the hon. member deliver he does not recognize this problem. I suppose he does not because he was for a number of years a member of a government which pursued policies which destroyed our trade with the countries of the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FACTOR: Hon. members perhaps do not like to hear that statement, but the facts speak for themselves. I venture to suggest that if we had continued for the last five years on the same level of trade that we had in 1928 and 1929, we should have had approximately five billion dollars more trade than we had, and one can easily see the effect of that on the prosperity of our primary producers as well as our secondary industries. Hon. members can well realize that with the loss of our external trade the purchasing power of the primary producers was destroyed, as pointed out by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) in his minority report, to the extent of almost one billion dollars between 1928 and 1934. This loss of purchasing power was immediately felt by the secondary industries, with the inevitable result of unemployment, under-employment and shocking conditions in employment.

May I also make a second general observation before I follow the argument of the hon. member. This investigation has been called a mass buying investigation, but may I suggest that in some of the shocking conditions of labour that were disclosed therein mass buying played no part at all. I propose to show in a few minutes some of the conditions both of low wages and long hours in industry in which mass buying played no part. I am not prepared to say that mass buying has not developed and in the last five years induced some evils and trade abuses, on the contrary I propose to show that it has, and perhaps we need legislation to remedy those evils. But to blame mass buying or mass merchandising for some of the shocking conditions of the working people or the pitiable plight of the primary producer is putting the cart before the horse.

Beyond these general observations I must agree with certain statements made by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce. Undoubtedly the concentration of industry has been responsible more than anything else for some of the conditions disclosed by the investigation, and for the exploitation, using the word in its economic sense, of weak and unorganized groups, both producers and workers. Let me illustrate the point with one or two examples. Take the tobacco industry. In that industry one company controls seventy per cent of the business of Canada. The hon. member referred to the meat packing industry in which two companies control eighty-five per cent of the business in Canada. In the fruit and vegetable canning industry two companies control, or endeavour to control almost eighty per cent of the business. And so on down the line, even in industries which have not been investigated by the commission, pulp and paper, cement, rubber, rubber footwear, electrical appliances and many others. There has been this concentration of industry in which one or two companies control the production and sometimes the distribution of perhaps seventy to eighty per cent of the commodities, or by acting in unison with other companies or by some arrangement manage to get control of particular commodities. The result of this concentration in industry has been the creation of mergers and monopolies having great power, which power they have used to the detriment of both the primary producer and the working people.

Let me go a step further and endeavour in a few words to show how these huge corporations through their corporate powers succeeded not only in causing great wrong to society by taking millions of dollars from the innocent investing public, but built up huge financial structures with a rigid overhead, which, when the depression came and business fell away they were unable to maintain except by taking it out of the primary producer and the working people. I have no quarrel with the investment dealer and the promoter, I believe they occupy a legitimate place in the economic scheme, but the unscrupulous promoter, and the incapable or dishonest investment dealer have created the situation through which in the last ten to twenty years the public has lost millions of dollars. This concentration in industry and misuse of corporate powers has resulted in the establishment either of monopolies or monopolistic competition. There is no use blaming anything else. If we succeed in removing these monopolies from our national economy we shall have solved a great many of the problems that are facing us.

Let us glance for a moment at the other side of the picture. I am not going to discuss the condition of our primary producers, I leave that for members of the commission who can speak with greater authority, but I should like to say a few words concerning the shocking conditions of labour that were shown to prevail. For a young country endowed with great natural resources it came to me as a distinct shock to learn of some of the labour conditions that exist; low wages, long hours, deliberate flagrant violation of the present inadequate minimum wage laws and factory inspection laws and generally speaking a grinding and oppressive condition in industry which is a disgrace to a civilized country. We have a labour chapter written in this report of which I, as a Canadian, am not proud. We have got to realize what has been so amply demonstrated, particularly by my distinguished leader, that industry has two arms. There is the capitalist investor and the labour investor. The capitalist investor invests money with which to buy plant, machinery and equipment, materials and the like. The labour investor, on the other hand, invests his health, his energy and sometimes his very life. In the last twenty-five or fifty years there has been too much control in the arm of capital and the labour arm has been weak and limited. There must be a reallocation of control in our industrial structure as between these two arms, the labour investor and the capital investor; we must see to it that the labour arm is strengthened, because after all if wages are low or if wages are cut the purchasing power is destroyed, and we will never get out of this economic depression unless the purchasing power of the primary producer on the one hand and the workingman on the other is restored.

Time will not permit me to go into many of the details disclosed by the investigation. I could cite example after example; perhaps it would be well to refer to one, the textile industry. That industry has been treated pretty well by the present administration in the way of protection and tariffs; it has been very profitable during the years of the depression, but what do we find? In the most profitable branch of the textile industry, the silk industry, we find an average annual wage of $600 a year. Or consider the tobacco industry, which also has been well protected, which has made huge profits during each year of the depression, which has paid enormous salaries to executives and which controls its own distribution through its own mighty power. What do we find to be the wage picture in that industry? The annual wage of thousands of people working in the tobacco industry is $574. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that things cannot go on in this way. We must remedy these conditions.

Now let us see for a moment how the present government propose to deal with these problems, and first let us take the problem of concentration in industry. I am sorry the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) is not in his seat just now. He very rightly pointed out the evils of concentration in industry, but what has he done in the past? He opposed the Combines Investigation Act, and as a member of the present government he was responsible for enacting the marketing act which, perhaps more than any other legislation that has been passed, fosters and creates monopolistic concentration. I want to direct attention to that part of the majority report with which the four members of the Liberal party on the commission could not agree, the right to combine for the purpose of fixing prices and controlling production. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the trend of the whole report directs attention to that question and to the evils growing out of monopolies and monopolistic competition. We want to abolish these monopolies; we want to destroy these price fixing agreements. Our country is honeycombed with these monopolies, these mergers, these secret agreements and understandings. What does the hon. member for East Kootenay propose to do; what do the government propose to do? They propose to enact legislation enabling industry to enter into these price fixing agreements, to control production, to create and foster monopolies. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that section 14 of the act is a vicious piece of legislation that goes absolutely against the whole trend of the report of the price spreads investigation.

Now may I go a step further, and say this: How does this government propose to deal with some of the shocking conditions concerning labour that were disclosed during that investigation? The hon. member for East Kootenay has enumerated the legislation so far introduced, which I understand completes the so called reform program. The weights and measures amendments certainly will not help the labouring men, though they are steps in the right direction. The innocuous amendment to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act will not be any great help to the labouring men. The amendments to the combines act are all right in their place, but certainly they will not improve the lot of the labouring men. The amendments to the Companies Act are all right; they are needed, and I am supporting them, but certainly they will not help the labouring man who at the present time has no money to invest in companies. Even the present milk and water legislation, the trade and industries act, will not in any way help the working people of this country.

The price spreads report dealt very extensively with labour problems. It recommended a more complete organization of industry into employers and trade associations; more complete and adequate general statistical work and more intensive research into the personnel problem. It recommended collective bargaining by trade unions and associations; more complete organization of workers into trade unions; more adequate recognition of trade unions by governments and employers; more adequate appropriations with larger and better staffs and better labour law administration both dominion and provincial. So it goes all down the page, with recommendation following recommendation. Where is the legislation implementing those recommendations? I realize that some of the recommendations are entirely within the confines of provincial jurisdiction, and I am not quarrelling with the decision of the government not to enact invalid legislation. Rather than see these ineffective pieces of legislation put on the statute books merely for political purposes, in order that hon. gentlemen opposite may say they have implemented the recommendations of the price spreads commission, I would prefer to have the government withhold any such legislation until a provincial conference could be called and this report presented to the provinces. Then, in cooperation with the provinces, legislation might be enacted that would be valid and effective, and that would prove of some benefit to the workingmen and the primary producers. What is the use of enacting legislation that is admitted by the Minister of Justice to be invalid and unenforceable? What is the use of making amendments to the criminal code under which the minister says no convictions can be obtained? What is the use of passing a bill establishing a federal trade and industry commission when that commission is to be composed of members of the tariff board which, as the hon. member for East Kootenay has pointed out, has sufficient work to do already?

Then there is another point, Mr. Speaker. The administration of the Combines Investigation Act is to be placed in the hands of this trade and industry commission, which is to be the tariff board. I venture to say that we have never had more efficient administration of the Combines Investigation Act than we have had under the present registrar, though it is true he was handicapped and his powers were limited. Unquestionably he was a servant who tried to administer that act effectively, but now we are to relegate the administration of this act to the tariff board, who will have this multiplicity of duties to perform. I venture to suggest that we will not have an equally efficient and effective administration of the act in future. Then why was there left out of the bill any provision for the regulation of monopolies, as recommended by the price spreads commission? It seems rather peculiar that this parliament should have authority to permit the creation of monopolies and not have any jurisdiction to control or regulate those monopolies.

Time will not permit me effectively to deal with all the weaknesses of this legislation. There are many perplexing problems facing the Canadian people to-day, and it is our duty to deal with them heroically and courageously. I am not prepared to say that we should put invalid legislation on the statute books, but I am prepared to say that the time has come when we must deal courageously with the constitutional problem. Due to the development of industry, the progress in science and inventions and the complete change in our national economy, I believe the time has come when in a proper and constitutional manner we should consider the question of the allocating of jurisdiction between provincial and federal authorities. However, the problem cannot be solved merely by riding roughshod over constitutional matters or merely stating we have jurisdiction when in fact we have not. The time has arrived when together with the provinces we must have a conference with regard to the allocation of jurisdiction, and particularly with regard to matters affecting the social and human problems of the day. I believe that in these days the provinces are controlled by reasonable governments, by men who understand these problems and are concerned with the interests of the people.

May I observe that there are many subversive and destructive forces trying to bring chaos, or perhaps something worse than that, under these depressed conditions. Many who propose fantastic schemes have a special appeal because in these days people are influenced by and are labouring under a depression psychology and are ready to grasp at almost anything. One way of encouraging these destructive forces and fantastic schemes would be to ignore some of the conditions the price spreads commission disclosed. One way is simply to say that everything is all right, that things will clear themselves, that we must not interfere with anything, and that we had better let things go as they are. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come when we must establish certain rules for the game of business just as we have established rules in games of sport. I am not advocating a regimentation of business or industry. Far be it from me to advocate any ideas or ideals which would proximate the establishment of fascist groups or a fascist state. If we turn our attention to European countries which have endeavoured to bring about regimentation of business and industry, what do we find? We find a tragic state of affairs wherein the people have lost their personal and political freedom. I would rather have the present democratic system with all its faults than the tragedies of dictatorships such as exist in Germany or Italy. I do say however, not by way of advocating regimentation but in the spirit of dealing fairly, of giving the small man a chance, of giving the retailer a chance and giving a chance to the man who has struggled and sacrificed his all during the past five years, that while businesses and large corporations have lost money and have gone through difficult days, we cannot compare their position with that of the man who must work for two or three dollars a week. I am not talking about the unemployed; I am dealing more particularly with the underemployed and those in employment receiving inadequate wages. How can we compare the position of these corporations with those of the small retail man and small merchants who in the last five years have been struggling to make ends meet and to keep body and soul together?

I appeal to every hon. member, irrespective of political affiliation or partisanship, to try at least to help solve some of these problems. We cannot legislate morality in business; I realize that. No law put on the statute books will in any way bring about an adequate remedy for all these business evils, but at least it will be a step in the right direction. It would act as a brake and would help to remove some of the evils and abuses. I believe the men in control of our industrial and commercial structures now realize the problem. Only a few days ago I read a speech delivered by the president of the Ford Motor Company in which he stated that human life is more important than a balance sheet. Even the president of the Imperial Tobacco Company spoke along similar lines. We must come to a realization of the fact that we must give the small business men, the working people and our primary producers a decent chance to enjoy life.

May I conclude by citing something which President Roosevelt said a few days ago to a correspondent who asked him to restate his position on the new deal, following the decision rendered by the supreme court. Here are his words, and I commend them to the attention of the house:

> The social objective, I should say, remains what it was, which is to do what any honest government of any country would do; to try to increase the security and the happiness of a larger number of people in all occupations of life and in all parts of the country; to give them more of the good things in life; to give them a greater distribution not only of wealth in the narrow terms but of wealth in the wider terms; to give them places to go in summer—recreation; to give them assurance that they are not going to starve in their old age.

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, following the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) I should like to say a few words on the bill before the house. My line of approach will be roughly to present the point of view of the three members of the price spreads commission who prepared the memorandum of reservations appended to the majority report.

As I stated last night in my observations concerning certain criminal code amendments, the majority report provided for the setting up of three commissions. One of these was the trade and industry commission, another a board of live stock commissioners and the third a fisheries control board. In connection with the two last named boards we disagreed with the majority, believing that they would be either ineffective and superfluous or positively injurious. We did agree with the majority, however, about the setting up of a federal trade and industry commission. We offered our support, believing that there were functions, a half a dozen in number, which such a commission could discharge.

Speaking on the second reading of the bill this afternoon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) enumerated five of those functions, and in a sort of way provision is made for those functions in the bill now before the house. The sixth has been dropped, the reason given being that there is a constitutional difficulty. About that point I may have something to say later. These six functions, subject to what I have to say about price and production agreements, we considered of importance to the Canadian people. First, and to my mind the most important, was the necessity for the better enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act. As hon. members are no doubt aware, this act was placed on the statute books in 1923. Of course there had been anti-combine or anti-trust legislation dating from the year 1889, at which time a section of the criminal code, now numbered section 498, was enacted. The original section through the years has to some extent been amended, but section 498 of the code contains substantially the provisions of the original section. After some experience it was found that it was almost impossible to obtain convictions under section 498, unless before launching a prosecution there was set up an investigating body to obtain evidence and to report as to whether or not there was a combine in a particular industry. So in 1910 the first Combines Investigation Act was passed. It remained on the statute books till 1919 when it was repealed. Its place was taken by the Combines and Fair Prices Act of 1919 and the Board of Commerce Act, twin acts placed on the statute books that year. That legislation was declared unconstitutional by the privy council in 1921, and in 1923 the present Combines Investigation Act was passed. It has been called by a good many competent observers the best anti-trust legislation in the world. Under that act there have been hundreds of investigations; there have been many reports declaring that a combine existed in particular industries; there have been prosecutions following the reports, and in every case except one, as I said yesterday, the verdict of the court has been in accordance with the finding of the registrar under the combines act. There is no doubt about this fact, that the existence of a combines investigation act is a fact that is in the minds of everybody engaged in trade or industry in the Dominion of Canada, and to my mind, and in this I understand that all my colleagues on the price spreads commission agree, the Combines Investigation Act is good legislation. No one in this parliament advocates its repeal, although some business men in the country do. It is one of the main measures of protection which the consumers of this country have against monopolistic exploitation. It is therefore very important, Mr. Speaker, that proper machinery be furnished for the enforcement of the act.

With regard to the machinery which exists at present, we were of the opinion, and I am still of the opinion, that it could be improved upon. We think that instead of having a registrar serving under a minister, a branch as it were of a department, the Combines Investigation Act would be more effectively administered and enforced if it were placed in the hands of an independent commission. The registrar is an admirable official, none better in the government, but the conditions under which he has to function hamper him to a great extent.

We have had something to say in this house about publicity. The minister has not made public the reports during the last three or four years. Because there was some little dispute about the facts in connection with publicity I took steps to ascertain what the practice has been in other years. I find in the Labour Gazette of May, 1935, on the first page, a list of the publications of the Department of Labour, and among them are the reports published by the commissioners and the registrar under the Combines Investigation Act. I will leave out the reports of the commissioners, but the reports of the registrar published are five in number: the first was published on June 9, 1925; the second on March 25, 1926; the third on September 6, 1926; the fourth on February 5, 1931, and the fifth on March 4, 1933. That last one was the report of the registrar on the alleged combine of tobacco manufacturers and buyers of raw leaf tobacco in Ontario, which the minister at first refused to produce and did produce only under pressure of the house and because of the circumstances that a by-election was pending in one of the counties in Ontario.

The matter of publicity is therefore important, and we put in our report a very definite recommendation that the reports of the registrar under the Combines Investigation Act should automatically be made public. I think that that provision should be contained in this act instead of section 28, which provides for publicity at the option of the commission. Publicity certainly should be the rule, if and when the opportunity has been given to the persons investigated to be present at the investigation either in person or by counsel.

My first criticism of the bill before the house is that if the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act, instead of being entrusted to an independent separate commission, is entrusted to the tariff board, I am afraid it is not going to be as well enforced as it has been up to the present time, and I say that very sincerely. The members of the trade and industry commission are to be the members of the present tariff board, and the present registrar under the Combines Investigation Act apparently is left entirely out of the picture. I do not know what will become of the registrar. Certainly I would say that he should be a commissioner. He has had more experience than the others. The others have no experience whatever, and that is one great defect in this legislation. Provision is made for any one of the members of the tariff board to conduct investigations under the Combines Investigation Act, but the one person in this country who has had experience in the conduct of these investigations is the present registrar, who has, within the limitations imposed upon him by circumstances, discharged his duty with great efficiency and distinction. That is my first criticism of the legislation which is before the house.

The second function that we thought this trade commission could effectively discharge for the benefit of the people of this country was that of a bureau of commodity standards. The Financial Post says that a bureau of commodity standards is to be set up as a separate board. Not at all; it was to function as a branch or committee under the supervision of the trade and industry commission. What does that mean? In 1924 we set up a national research council, and it has been examining different commodities to see whether or not they were adulterated, or whether or not they met the requirement of purchasers; but the national research council is primarily a scientific body, and its research is scientific. It is occupied with the scientific rather than with the commercial side, and we considered that it would be very much better for the consumers and for persons in business if they could have a body of men with some commercial contacts, rather than a body with scientific contacts, to establish commodity standards. The evidence was that in Great Britain they have established five or six hundred of what they call British standards, and sellers of goods and makers of goods whose products come up to these standards have the privilege of putting upon them the words, or the initials therefor, British Standards, which gives the purchaser some guarantee as to the quality. I am pleased to note that this bill makes provision for Canadian standards, and I think quite a lot can be done along that line. There is a great deal of fraud being practised on purchasers in this country. The most startling evidence given to the commission was on that point. Evidence was given that substances were being sold as paint which were hardly paint at all—they would wash off with the rain; lubricating oils were sold which did not meet the requirements of the purchaser in any sense; gasolines were being sold with very widely varying degrees of efficiency, and the grades had no relation to the price at which the gasoline was sold; silk was sold as pure silk which was largely artificial silk and weighting material; putty was being sold with mineral oil in it instead of linseed oil, which caused it to crack and come out shortly after it was put in; anti-freeze and cleaning preparations and soaps were being sold at prices entirely out of line with what was in these articles. It was considered by the commission that much progress could be made in the way of giving the consumer the properties of the article which he was buying; for that reason we brought in a recommendation that a bureau of commodity standards be set up, and so far as I can see that is fairly well provided for in this bill. I have not critically examined the provisions of the bill in this regard, but the principle of the bill, I would say, in that respect is entirely right.

The third function of the board was to act as a securities control board. On that point let me read a brief passage from page 44 of the report:

> The machinery outlined above, however, can only come into action after the securities have been issued. It should, therefore, be supplemented by and combined with some machinery which would review the situation before the securities were issued. This leads logically to the formation of an investment or securities board, functioning as a section of the federal trade and industry commission, recommended later in this report. It should cooperate closely with that department of the government responsible for incorporations but should not, we feel, be an administrative division of such department. The functions of such a board should be to review the proposed capital structure of all companies incorporated under the dominion act and desiring to issue bonds or stock to the public. In other words the board would pass on all issues of bonds or stock after thorough investigation. In performing this duty, the board would necessarily give careful consideration to the proper relation that bonds or stock to be issued bear to the company's assets.

We on this side of the house have insisted for some years that some such board should be established. My right hon. leader stated in 1933:

> The Liberal party believes the financial mismanagement of industry is largely responsible for many conditions obtaining to-day.
> To prevent exploitation of the public through the sale of watered stocks and worthless securities, it believes an investment control board should be established, with supervision of issues of securities by companies incorporated under federal charters.

These being our convictions we naturally concurred in the recommendations of the price spreads commission, but when I come to consider the bill I find that this federal trade and industry commission is not to function except upon the request of the Secretary of State. Without going further into the matter I would say that that provision is entirely inadequate to meet what we had in mind when we made that recommendation and to meet what we on this side of the house have had in mind for some years.

The fourth function of the commission is the prevention of unfair trade practices. Unfair trade practices can be divided roughly into two classes, those which are ethically unfair and those which are economically unfair. There can be no argument as to the provision of adequate machinery to control ethically unfair trade practices such as short weighing, deceptive packaging, misleading and false advertising, and that sort of thing. I think every hon. member will agree that adequate machinery should be supplied, I believe by the dominion rather than by the provinces, to curtail and prevent ethically unfair trade practices, of which there is a surprisingly large number. There are more of these in existence than I thought possible before I heard the evidence presented to the commission. I am sure that all hon. members will agree to the providing of effective measures for the curtailment of these practices. It may be that the director of prosecutions may be able to attain this end but we may have to find out more as to how that official is to function and what checks there are to be upon his functioning.

It is very difficult to define what are economically unfair trade practices. The hon.

member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) made it very clear to the house this afternoon that there is great difficulty in defining this type of unfair trade practices. If we needed a further illustration I think it was furnished by the debate last evening which demonstrated the great difficulty of providing proper amendments to the criminal code. Attempts have been made in other quarters to curtail what are known as economically unfair trade practices. Since 1924 the federal trade commission of the United States has attempted to deal with these matters and I think we should make some attempt to act within our powers as a parliament to curtail and prevent unfair trade practices. We had a long discussion on this whole matter last evening and I have not the time this afternoon to take it up further.

The fifth function which we recommended for a federal trade commission is what I might call the regulation of monopolies, and I should like to say a word about this. The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Factor) has shown the trend towards monopoly and the serious concentration of business in fewer and fewer hands, in the hands of huge corporations. I am thoroughly in accord with all that the hon. member said. No one could listen to the evidence given before the commission, no one could read the reports which were presented to the commission, no one could read the report of the commission itself without realizing that that is true to a tremendous extent in the Dominion of Canada. The packing industry has been mentioned two or three times. In the United States the largest packing company controls only twenty-seven or twenty-eight per cent of the business while in Canada one company controls fifty-nine or sixty per cent of the business. There is a tremendous concentration of control in the tobacco industry, the Imperial Tobacco Company controlling seventy or eighty per cent of the business while two of the largest companies control eighty-five per cent. As the hon. member for Toronto West Centre has said, such monopolies eliminate competition and both primary producers and consumers are undoubtedly put in positions of great disadvantage. Competition is the regulating factor, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has said, and when the growth of these monopolies causes the disappearance of competition I am convinced that something must be substituted, that there must be some way provided by which the public can meet these great concentrations of industry on their own ground and get for the people with whom they are dealing some of the advantages which otherwise would be provided by free competition.

Some attempt should be made to bring about that position. We thought that a body should be set up which would have the power to recommend to parliament after careful investigation that certain industries had attained the dimensions of monopolies and should be declared monopolies and that extraordinary measures should be taken with reference to those industries. They would not exactly be made public utilities, but regulations could be applied similar to those applied to the public utilities. We differed with the majority of the commission on two points. In the first place, our colleagues were of the opinion that the governor in council should have the power to declare these monopolies on the recommendation of the federal trade and industry commission. We disagreed with that because we claimed that the situation could not possibly be an emergent one. We contended that matters could remain in statu quo for some time. It might be a great advantage to a particular industry to be declared a monopoly because if it once got into the position of a public utility its profits might be more or less guaranteed. Many industries might desire to be classified as monopolies rather than to remain in the competitive field and come under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. We thought it a serious thing to allow the status of an industry to be altered by governmental action; we contended that it should be submitted to parliament rather than to the government, that it should be the subject of legislative rather than executive action. That was the first point upon which we differed from our colleagues.

The second point upon which we differed was this: They were of the opinion that there might be times when even though competition existed to some extent in an industry, even though it could be restored to an industry, nevertheless that industry should be declared a monopoly; but we considered that competition was by all means the most efficient regulating factor and if there was any chance of restoring competition, it should be restored. Those are the two points upon which we differed from our colleagues in connection with monopolies. I would call attention to the fact that this bill contains no provision for the handling of these monopolies. To that extent it is a disappointment to us and it is obviously a disappointment to the hon. member for East Kootenay.

This subject is too important to be dealt with in the dying hours of a moribund parliament. I contend it should be left to be dealt with by a parliament fresh from the people. In my opinion this will have to be dealt with in the near future because it will never do to leave the consuming public open to the power of these embattled monopolies which are gathering up more and more of the business of the country along certain lines. Those are my submissions with regard to the regulation of monopolies.

The sixth function as recommended by the majority report was the authorization of price and production agreements in certain competitive industries. With that recommendation we on this side of the house flatly and decisively disagree. We believe it is thoroughly illogical to confer upon the commission, as its primary function, the prevention of combines and then, further down on the list, to confer on it the power to sanction combines. That is thoroughly illogical and contradictory. I admit that in times of distress and depression you will find highly competitive industries where there seem to be cutthroat competition, waste and chaos. But our contention is that competition is the best protection the public has; and if you authorize price and production agreements between those engaged in any industry, limiting production and fixing prices charged the general public, you will get stagnation in industry, exploitation of the public and monopoly—the very thing which is admitted to be one of the greatest evils we have to contend with. We are most emphatic about that. We believe in the principles of the Combines Investigation Act and do not believe in its nullification by conferring on the trade and industry commission or on the government, on the advice of that commission, the power to sanction combines, monopolistic combinations, when one of the primary functions of the commission should be to prevent combines. I would point out that these attempts have not succeeded where they have been tried. Take the codes in the United States under the NRA. The attempt was made there. I am not familiar with the codes but broadly speaking that was the object—to sanction combines within various industries, allowing them to fix the prices they would charge the public. As everyone knows, prices went up faster than wages and a great many of the codes broke down for that very reason. That is a very large subject and I have not the time nor am I prepared to go into it fully at the present time. I do not believe in that provision of the Natural Products Marketing Act which enables the manufacturers of secondary products to enter into these price and production agreements, such as the jam agreement entered into not long ago. I do not believe in that principle at all. There is the dominion marketing board, with power to sanction certain combines, and it would be a very foolish thing to set up a second body to sanction combines under similar circumstances. There would be overlapping jurisdiction which would be farcical. I am therefore thoroughly opposed, as those on this side of the house are, to that section of the act which authorizes the sanctioning of these price and production agreements, section 14. and I want to make that clear on this second reading.

Those are the six functions which the majority had in mind for the commission, and it will be seen from what I have said that we regard the bill as in some respects a disappointment and a failure, though in some other respects we approve of it. Speaking for myself, I think the two great weaknesses are these. In the first place it weakens rather than strengthens the administration of the Combines Investigation Act; and the second great weakness of the bill is that it authorizes the formation of price and production agreements in competitive industries, depriving the public of the benefits of competition and sanctioning what is declared against earlier in the bill.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT

PROPOSED REPEAL OF SECTION 138, UNAUTHORIZED ISSUE OF NOTES OR SUBSTITUTES FOR MONEY

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved the second reading of Bill No. 69, to amend the Bank Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, money is a creation of government, and in Canada under our constitution the federal parliament is given control of the issue of all money. Parliament in its wisdom has given this right to the Bank of Canada and to the chartered banks. So far as the public is concerned we can get money for the transaction of our business only through the chartered banks. Under section 138 of the Bank Act the banking system is given the exclusive right to issue money. That section reads:

(1) Every person, except a bank to which this act applies, who issues or reissues, makes, draws or endorses any bill, bond, note, cheque or other instrument, intended to circulate as money, or to be used as a substitute for money, for any amount whatsoever, shall incur a penalty of four hundred dollars.

(2) If any such instrument is made for the payment of a less sum than twenty dollars, and is payable either in form or in fact to the bearer thereof, or at sight, on or demand, or at less than thirty days thereafter, or is overdue, or is in any way calculated or designed for circulation, or as a substitute for money, the intention to pass the same as money shall be presumed unless such instrument is—

(a) a cheque on some chartered bank paid by the maker directly to his immediate creditor; or

(b) a promissory note, bill of exchange, bond or other undertaking for the payment of money made or delivered by the maker thereof to his immediate creditor; and

(c) not designed to circulate as money or as a substitute for money.

The bill which I have introduced asks that section 138 should be deleted. The first objection that I raise to the section is that it is almost impossible for any ordinary person to understand it. The second objection, and I think this is a valid one, is that if certain forms are used the intention to pass them as money, which is a contravention of the act, is to be presumed. That is, any person who is charged under certain clauses of this act with an offence is presumed to be guilty, and the onus is upon him of proving that he is not guilty. It seems to me that proof of violation of the act should rest with the prosecuting authority. I think this is a very bad feature to introduce into the law.

However, my chief reason for introducing the bill is the financial situation of many of our cities and municipalities and also of some provinces. There are many cities in Canada —I do not wish to name them—that have been capitalizing their relief costs for perhaps the last two or three years, and many of them have been borrowing to pay their interest charges. In many cases they have not been keeping up their sinking fund. This debt creating process, it seems to me, must stop some time. Then many municipalities cannot borrow money from the banks to carry on their necessary public services. If not prevented by this section I believe there are many municipalities which could not only carry on necessary public services but might also collect a lot of taxes which are at present going unpaid, and at the same time effect some public improvements. This section has been invoked in one or two cases at least to stop municipalities from doing this very thing. Last year when we endeavoured to have section 138 struck out of the act the minister said that there must be some protection for the currency of the country. Of course I would agree with that, but even so I do not see why we should impose a penalty of $400 for the issue of a substitute for money as distinct from what might be termed money itself. If we had an adequate money system in Canada operating at the present time—it may have operated adequately at certain times, but it seems to me it has not done so in the last few years—I would not be introducing the bill. But if the people of a community who have goods and services to exchange with each other have no money and can get none from the banking system, I do not see why we should by law prevent them from providing and using a substitute for money if they can do so.

A good many cities in the United States have made experiments with municipal scrip, and the story of the efforts of these towns has been published in book form by Professor Irving Fisher. In that book he also tells the story of the town of Wörgl in Austria where I think half the people were unemployed, and the mayor persuaded the town authorities to issue what was known as stamped scrip. A stamp in value equal to two per cent of the face value of the scrip itself had to be placed on the scrip once a week. These stamps had to be bought with legal money, so in fifty weeks enough money was secured from the sale of these stamps to retire the scrip in full. In that town they succeeded in putting practically all the unemployed back to work; they built a new town hall and many other improvements, and made a great success of the use of this stamped scrip. That success I believe might be duplicated in some of the cities of Canada. I have talked with some town authorities who said they would like very much to issue a small amount of scrip but they were afraid they would be found guilty of an infraction of section 138 of the Bank Act, and they could not run the risk of being fined $400 for the carrying out of such an experiment.

It seems to me that the term money as used in this act or as used in the British North America Act, that is currency and coinage and paper money, is undoubtedly within the jurisdiction of this parliament. But such money is only a small percentage of the money which we actually use to-day. In the general acceptance of the term the bulk of our money is in the form of bank deposits and is passed from one person to another by cheque. That naturally raises the question whether cheques are substitutes for money. When we discussed this matter in the banking committee last year I noted it was the opinion of a good many members of the committee that cheques were not money. If they are not money they must be a substitute for money, and it seems to me that according to the strict interpretation of section 138 many people who are passing cheques around are guilty of an infraction of that section. It is true that if the cheque is for less than $20 there would appear to be an exception; in that case it is not considered to be a substitute for money. But if it is for a larger amount it is so considered, and if the cheque passes through the hands of a third or fourth person, under the terms of this section the party who issues it would be liable to a fine of $400. It may be presumed that it is his intention to pass it as money, and then it would be necessary for him to prove that it was not his intention so to do.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat that it is this section of the Bank Act which gives the banks a monopoly of all money and credit. I think the introduction of this bill will give all those opposed to the granting of this monopoly to the chartered banks an opportunity to register their objection. I hope the bill will receive at least the careful consideration of the house.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) I desire only to point out first of all that this matter was carefully considered by the banking and commerce committee last year, and the subject matter of the present discussion was then much debated. The conclusion of the committee was that the section should be incorporated in the Bank Act as it now is.

I cannot say that the practice of bringing to the attention of the house in a succeeding session a measure that was carefully considered less than a year ago and on which a conclusion was reached, has very great merit, nor do I think the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Coote) has quite made himself familiar with the provisions of the new Bank Act and the Bank of Canada Act. The old fashioned appeal that was formerly made, that we must vote against the banks that have a monopoly of the issue of bills, no longer has substance, because we have provided that ultimately the Bank of Canada will be the only issuing bank in the country. Therefore the last argument made by my hon. friend was one that might have found force and place some years ago but which perhaps cannot be taken too seriously now.

I wonder what would happen in the country if this bill were to be enacted. I wonder just what would be money. I sent the page out for Palgrave's Dictionary of Political Economy and turned up the word "money" because I recalled that there was a time when oxen were the standard of money; that in other cases iron bars were used as money, and that at other times various substances and commodities passed as money. But according to Palgrave we are thus able to give a full and final definition of money:

> —namely, that it is that which serves (1) as the common medium of exchange: (a) dispensing with the double coincidence of wants and of possessions involved in barter; (b) furnishing a price-current of all the commodities in the market. (2) As the standard of deferred payments. To put it in another form, money is that which passes freely from hand to hand, in full payment for goods, in final discharge of indebtedness, being accepted equally without reference to the character or credit of the person tendering it, and without the intention on the part of the person receiving it himself, to consume or enjoy, or otherwise use it than by passing it on, sooner or later in exchange.

I wonder what sort of money we would have in Canada if this bill were to pass. There would be scrip at Calgary, scrip at St. Paul, scrip at Red Deer, scrip at Winnipeg and at Regina, and the very essential idea of the word "money" would have perished and vanished. I do not think this house desires to have it seriously argued that the enactment of legislation such as this would turn our whole monetary system, such as it is, into a farce; I am sure the hon. gentleman has no such object as that in mind.

For the moment I need say nothing further on that phase of the matter. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) does object to the provisions of the act that state that the possession of certain things constitutes a presumption against the person who is in possession of or who tenders certain things as money. There is nothing new in the law in that regard. For example, if a man is walking down the sidewalk and a barrel of flour falls on his head there is presumption of negligence, and he need not prove it. That is res ipsa loquitur; the thing speaks for itself. In criminal or quasi-criminal cases there are certain things that in themselves constitute a presumption which it is essential that the person who is affected should discharge by evidence indicating that the presumption was not warranted. All that is said in this case is that if any such instrument is made for the payment of a less sum than $20, and is payable either in form or in fact to the bearer thereof, or at sight, or on demand, or at less than thirty days thereafter, or is overdue, or is in any way calculated or designed for circulation, or as a substitute for money, the intention to pass the same as money shall be presumed. It is not that the man is presumed to be guilty but that the intention is presumed, and there is a vast difference between a presumption of guilt and a presumption of intention. It is so difficult to prove intentions, however honourable they may be. It is so difficult to prove them even when they are dishonourable, and when the law says there shall be a presumption of intention that is an entirely different thing from asserting that there is a presumption of guilt. All this section says is that certain facts shall constitute a presumption of intention, and that only.

I do not desire to do more than indicate the views of the government with respect to the matter, in the absence of the Minister of Finance. In order that the matter may be presented from his viewpoint, since I understand that he has some views with respect to it, I think I might content myself with merely moving the adjournment of the debate and permitting the matter to end there for the moment.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Might I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. NEILL: If this bill should pass would it be possible for every private individual to mint or print his own money?

Mr. BENNETT: You see, it is very dangerous for a man who is a lawyer to express an opinion these days, but if I might be permitted to do so I would think it would be somewhat doubtful with respect to the individual. There would be no doubt about it with regard to the aggregation of individuals that might constitute a certain form of corporation, shall we say, whether it be municipal or otherwise. I am inclined to think that if he could get anybody to take it as money, if the printing were nicely done, he might be able for the moment to induce people to accept it as such.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) for the second reading of Bill No. 86, to establish a dominion trade and industry commission.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in discussing Bill No. 86, the purpose of which is to set up a dominion trade and industry commission, I hope not to detain the house at length but to confine my remarks to one phase of the principle of the bill, reserving until it has reached the committee stage a discussion of the details.

I should like first, however, to make a few observations of a somewhat personal nature. When speaking last night I made certain references to the official attitude of the opposition towards the implementation of the price spreads commission recommendations, and the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) took exception in these words:

> But I do not think the hon. member should have imputed the motives he did to those who express sincere objections to some of the recommendations of the price spreads commission.

I should like to state frankly that when I made my reference to the official attitude of the opposition I was referring to the attitude as reflected by the official financial critical critic of that body, namely the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). So far as the hon. member for Hants-Kings is concerned—and I might speak more freely if he were not in his seat—I would say that I had not that hon. member in mind. I have known him in this house for some years and during that time have formed the highest admiration of his fairness in dealing with all matters, and of his sincerity as well. In addition I had the pleasure of sitting with him as one of a special committee dealing with price spreads and mass buying, and later for a period of six months as a fellow member of the royal commission. I can say that throughout that time his attitude was the very fairest and most helpful. Time and again when futile arguments arose he displayed the rare ability of putting into precise language amendments disposing of the difficulties. I may add that the relations between all members of the committee and the royal commission throughout the whole time were of the most friendly nature and all co-operated in the greatest possible measure. In fact, whatever merit has been accorded the report which as chairman I had the privilege of signing, is fully and freely shared by me with all the members of the commission.

I believe it would be in order for m to say a word or two concerning the other persons who assisted in the preparation of the report. I refer particularly to the secretariat and the economic advisers. Mr. L. B. Pearson of the Department of External affairs acted as secretary, and Messrs. J. M. Boyer and R. A. Cameron as assistant secretaries. If I may be permitted to single out Mr. Pearson I would say that he was no ordinary secretary. I believe all members of the commission will join with me in paying the highest possible tribute to the assistance given to the commission and all members of it by Mr. Pearson. We were further assisted by economic advisers in the persons of Doctor W. J. Couper, Professor A. C. Curtis of Queens University, Doctor A. Rive of the Department of External Affairs, Mr. C. S. A. Ritchie of the same department, and other gentlemen whose names do not occur to me at the moment but who rendered notable service. Apart from them I was tremendously impressed by the calibre of the civil servants who assisted us, those who occupying positions of trust in various departments were consulted from time to time to assist us in matters being studied by the commission. One and all rendered most valuable service. I could not conclude these observations without acknowledging the great courtesies extended to the committee and the commission by Doctor Beauchesne, Clerk of the House of Commons, and Major Gregg, Sergeant-at-Arms, in making comfortable quarters available for our use.

Mr. DUFF: What about the solicitors?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I think perhaps the hon. member would agree with me that without any words of mine they have been suitably rewarded. However, now that the subject has been opened I would add that the commission did appreciate the services rendered by counsel.

Mr. DUFF: Did you sign their accounts?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg) We paid their accounts. I may be reprimanded for this, but I should like to make a personal reference to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). As we were sitting as a royal commission it is probably unnecessary for me to intimate that neither the Prime Minister nor any cabinet members interfered in any way, shape or form with our investigations. My only instructions when handed the order in council by the Prime Minister on October 29 last were words to this effect: "Kennedy, remember, this is a 'royal' commission, and remember all the term connotes—British justice. It is to be an investigation into the facts. Go as deep as you like, and go as wide as you like, but see that the great and small, rich and poor receive even handed justice." And to the best of my ability and with the wholehearted cooperation of the members of the commission we endeavoured to carry out the traditions of a royal commission.

Now I shall direct some observations to the bill. It would seem that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) is amused. Well, I hope the hon. member will follow me in the phase I am about to discuss, and I trust that I may convince him. I refer to the non-inclusion in the bill now before the house of regulatory and administrative powers of the commission, the power not only to determine what are unfair practices but the power to issue orders to cease and desist from such practices. To me it is a matter of considerable satisfaction that in the desire to carry out the recommendations of the commission in that regard, as was indicated this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Comerce (Mr. Hanson), the government in the original draft did include those clauses to which reference was made this afternoon by the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), namely the powers to which I have referred. As the Minister of Trade and Commerce has told us, they were dropped only after receiving advice from eminent counsel that such procedure was invalid. For that reason they were dropped from the bill.

I am not going to labour the law, but speaking on the principle of the bill I do wish to refer to that phase of the matter, placing it on record and possibly indulging the fond hope that if what I submit to-night is not the law, to-morrow it may possibly be the law. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the legal advisers to the government based their claim of absolute invalidity of the powers referred to upon the privy council case commonly known as the Board of Commerce case. I shall not discuss the case in detail but shall draw to the attention of the house only two matters in connection with it. The case is reported in Law Times Reports, new series, volume 126, year 1922, at page 290.

We have spent a lot of time this last day or two discussing the question whether a matter is obviously invalid or whether there is merely a question of doubt as to its validity. Resting the argument of invalidity, as it is rested, upon the Board of Commerce case I draw this to the attention of the house, that that case was on appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada, and that six judges of our own supreme court were not so settled in their minds that the powers referred to were invalid. I merely cite the facts as reported:

As the six judges who sat in the supreme court were equally divided in opinion no judgment was rendered. The Chief Justice and Justices Anglin and Migneault considered that the question raised should be answered in the affirmative, while Justices Iddington, Duff and Brodeur thought that the first question should be answered in the negative and that therefore the second question did not arise.

Then as to the subject matter of the decision I would draw the attention of the house to this fact, that that decision had to do with price fixing, and I submit that that is of some importance in view of the bill we are considering. That judgment I say had to do with price fixing, but in the report of the royal commission on price spreads we have not recommended price fixing; in fact, we found and so declared, that we believe it unsound, and we studiously avoided recommending any such thing.

Referring to the case report, the order in question was to the effect that certain retail dealers in clothing in the city of Ottawa were prohibited from charging as profits on sales more than a certain percentage of cost which was described as being a fair profit. I bring that to the attention of the house. That case was decided in 1921.

Now that very case has been distinguished in the later case to which I referred yesterday and which I shall again cite, the case of the Proprietary Articles Trade Association et al, appellants, and Attorney General for Canada et al, respondents, which was heard by the privy council in 1931 on appeal from the Supreme Court of Canada (Law Reports Appeal Cases, 1931, page 310). Just let me refer briefly to the judgment of Lord Atkin who delivered judgment on behalf of the committee. He states at page 316:

In determining judicially the distribution of legislative powers between the dominion and the provinces made by the two famous sections, 91 and 92 of the British North America Act, two principles have to be observed: first, the accepted canon of construction as to the general effect of the sections must be maintained. This is that the general powers of legislation for the peace, order and good government of Canada are committed to the dominion parliament, though they are subject to the exclusive powers of legislation committed to the provincial legislatures and enumerated in section 92, but—

I particularly draw the attention of the house to this qualification:

—but the provincial powers are themselves qualified in respect of subjects enumerated in section 91 as particular instances of general powers assigned to the dominion. Any matter coming within any of those particular classes of subjects is not to be deemed as coming within the class of matters assigned to the provincial legislatures. This almost reproduces the express words of the sections, and this rule is well settled.

The second principle to which I wish later to refer briefly is this:

The second principle to be observed judicially was expressed by the board in 1881, "It will be a wise course ... to decide each case which arises as best they can, without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the statute than is necessary for the decision of the particular question in hand."

I submit that that second principle is of importance because with the passing of time conditions change, and matters that were at one time purely local in their nature become interprovincial, national, and sometimes even international in their nature. So the privy council, I submit, has wisely established the principle that each case shall be decided on its own merits and in the light of the conditions at the time the case comes before them for adjudication.

Then at the bottom of page 326, and I submit that this is a rather important expression of opinion, Lord Atkin says, and here he distinguishes the Board of Commerce case:

The view that Their Lordships have expressed makes it unnecessary to discuss the further ground upon which the legislation has been supported by reference to the power to legislate under section 91, head 2, for "the regulation of trade and commerce."

Again:

Their Lordships merely propose to disassociate themselves from the construction suggested in argument of a passage in the judgment of the Board of Commerce case under which it was contended that the power to "regulate trade and commerce" could be invoked only in furtherance of a general power which parliament possesses independently of it. No such restriction is properly to be inferred from that judgment. The words of the statute must receive their proper construction where they stand as giving an independent authority to parliament over the particular subject matter ... they desire to guard themselves from being supposed to lay down that the present legislation should not be supported on that ground.

Again:

If then the legislation in question is authorized under one or other of the heads specifically enumerated in section 91 it is not to the purpose to say that it affects property and civil rights in the provinces. Most of the specific subjects in section 91 do affect property and civil rights, but so far as the legislation of parliament in pith and substance is operating within the enumerated powers, there is constitutional authority to interfere with property and civil rights.

My position is this, that if this parliament legislates in respect of matters of trade and commerce and such legislation impinges upon property and civil rights, the mere fact of that impingement is not a bar to the validity of the proposed legislation. What is the principle? The principle is this, that inasmuch as the right to legislate in respect of "trade and commerce" is given in section 91, subsection 2, of the British North America Act to the federal parliament, it has the right to legislate in respect of all matters of trade and commerce where such matters affect the general public interest under the general head of peace, order and good government; and if also it impinges on property and civil rights—and let me point out in passing that there is not a single power given under section 91 to the federal parliament which may not conveivably in one way or another in the course of legislation impinge upon property and civil rights—the fact of such impingement is not a barrier to legislation. It is not a denial of validity. The test is this: whether it is a matter of regulating in respect of trade and commerce, in respect of a matter that is not purely local and that does not merely affect contracts between individuals or localities; if it be a matter that affects the general public interest either for the general good, or to the detriment thereof, then the will of the federal parliament must prevail and the rights of the province must stand aside. I submit that that is the psoition.

Why is it that the federal governments have not more vigorously in times past sought to occupy the field of legislation for which I am now contending? I submit that one reason, and one very obvious reason, is this, that it has been hesitant to break new ground and to occupy it and to assert its rights federally by reason of political expediency. I am not referring to any particular administration but to the administrations through the past years. So often when the federal government has sought to legislate in respect of matters that in one phase or another affect individuals in the provinces, the cry of "provincial rights" has been raised. Hon. members know full well the potency of such a cry. Any government hesitates to proceed aggressively with legislation when the question of "provincial rights" is raised, and unless it be clear beyond peradventure that they have the right, the tendency has been not to assume an aggressive attitude. But I say that when the matter concerns the general wellbeing of the people of this country, political expediency should not stand in the way; the government should be courageous enough to occupy the ground which I submit they are entitled to occupy.

Further, even though it be argued, as it has been, that the federal government has not legislative jurisdiction to deal with what are found to be "unfair" trade practices, it may well be that some of these practices will be federal in their nature. Many of the unfair practices to which the price spreads commission's report refers are matters which affect not merely local dealings but interprovincial and sometimes international trade. I submit that power to deal effectively therewith should be included in the bill before the house. Assuming that the eminent legal opinions given are correct and that there are other unfair practices which fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, the federal government could be enabled to deal therewith through enabling legislation by the provinces. I earnestly suggest to the government that they include in this bill a provision to empower the commission to do those things to which I have referred, to deal with unfair trade practices in an effective way and to issue orders to cease and desist, with the proviso that where any such unfair practice is one which is deemed to fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces the federal government invite enabling legislation by the provinces. I suggest that such an amendment would fulfil the wishes of the members of the price spreads commission and I ask the government to take it seriously into consideration.

If it be that this parliament has no jurisdiction, as it has been argued, to legislate in respect of matters which were unanimously recognized by the commissioners as being unfair, as being bad, as being against the public interest and as being of a nature which ought to be prohibited; if hon. members recognize such practices to be of a category which should be prohibited; if it be that we have not the power to prohibit such practices in an effective way by legislation, there at once arises the question of the necessary amendments to the British North America Act.

I am fully aware that this suggestion at once raises the problem of the rights of minorities. So far as I am concerned I want to make it very plain that I would be the last one to challenge the rights of minorities as guaranteed to them by the pact of confederation. But in the matter of legislating for trade and commerce and in connection with business dealings between citizens of Canada there cannot be any question of minority rights. I submit that we are then face to face with the question of necessary amendments to the British North America Act.

This act has not been handed down to us as were the commandments to Moses. The British North America Act is a very human document, and being human, it is subject to the frailties of humanity. It was built by men who in their day constructed a document to the best of their knowledge and ability which would govern the affairs of the citizens of Canada, having regard to the rights of the individual provinces, having regard to the division of matters among provincial jurisdictions upon the basis of local interests, and giving to the federal government by section 91 control over those matters which were of general interest.

That document was prepared to serve conditions as they existed in 1867—this is 1935; times have changed. What was provincial, yes, even what was parochial in 1867 may well now be interprovincial, national or even international. The proper measure of distance is not in miles, it is the time taken to go from one point to another. What is distance in 1935 as compared to 1867? In point of time, in 1867 the distance between Montreal and Toronto was as great as the distance to-day between Montreal and Vancouver. Matters of business and trade and commerce which were distinctly local in 1867 are no longer local. In 1867 an industry in Montreal could not conceivably compete with an industry in Vancouver or Winnipeg, but to-day industries in every part of Canada compete directly with industries in the other parts. So when you come to deal with unfair competitive trade practices you are dealing with something which touches the whole of Canada and which is not confined to any particular province.

The British North America Act is not like the ark of the covenant upon which no man could lay a hand. It is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians which legend said could not be altered but which in fact have wholly passed away. The British North America Act has been amended, not once, but more than twenty times. Shall we not amend it again in the public interest? Let us remember that the written constitution of Canada should be the "servant" and not the "master" of the people. Let us remember that that constitution is "man-made" and being man-made it can be man-altered. Let us remember that not bricks and mortar, not tall buildings, but its citizens are the ramparts of the nation; it is in the interests of our citizens that we should legislate.

I commend to the house the words of John Bright: "The nation in every land dwells in the cottage, and unless the light of your constitution can shine there, unless the beneficence of your legislation is there reflected, believe me, gentlemen, you have yet to learn the principles of statesmanship."

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, after the discussion which we had this afternoon on this bill I do not feel I can add very much to what has been said, but there are a few things I should like to bring to the attention of the house. I shall try to be as brief as possible.

In the first place I want to say that I was impressed with the need of some such organization during the investigation by both the parliamentary committee and the royal commission. It is quite easy to set out the difficulties which such an organization will encounter; it is quite easy to argue that it will not be effective in certain ways; it is quite easy to argue that it will meet with difficulties which it will not be able to deal with as effectively as we should wish. But that is true of every organization. The railway board of this country has a very difficult task. We hear it said quite often that the railway rate situation in Canada and in the United States as well is a crazy patchwork which no one can understand, and yet I venture to say that railway rates as fixed in the United States, and railway rates as fixed in this dominion through the railway board, are much more satisfactory and much fairer than they would be without the railway commission here or the interstate commerce commission in the United States. And so we must approach the whole problem from the standpoint of whether we can expect by setting up a commission of this kind to improve conditions as they exist at the present time.

Some have pointed to the additional cost of establishing a commission of this kind. But costs are always justified where you provide greater efficiency; the well paid manager is better than the poorly paid manager if he is an efficient man. That is true always, and if there are in the social system abuses which the dominion trade and industry commission can correct, and I believe there are, then the cost is a small matter.

There is no question about the fact that there is a certain amount of regulation of business now. Those who cry against interference with business are actually crying out in favour of the interference that now prevails. I think it was very well established in the evidence that some organizations in this country were able to buy commodities from manufacturers and others at prices that would put the manufacturers out of business unless they got higher prices from someone else. H. G. Wells, in his book, Work, Wealth and Happiness of Mankind, points out that at one time the Standard Oil Company in the United States was able to do that very thing in connection with the railways. Whether it is done deliberately or not, the result is a differential between the price at which the mass buyer gets his commodities and the price at which his competitor obtains his. And so the question arises whether or not the spread is fair. I think it is quite evident, and it was generally agreed by the commission, that the spread was unfair; and the question then came up whether or not we ought to have a deliberate attempt to have regulation through the government. If the mass buyer is in a position to exact unfair discounts, so that the manufacturer or the other party who is selling to him must charge other retailers a higher price relatively, then I think we have something that justifies the government in stepping in. If the regulation is there now, if there is a partial regulation, if it is one-sided, I cannot see how we can avoid the responsibility of trying to establish effective and fair regulation in the interests of all classes of the community. Therefore I favour the establishment of a commission for that reason. That is one reason at least.

I wish to refer to the powers that are supposed to be provided in the bill for the federal trade and industry commission, and in this connection I would point to some of the arguments in the minority report as signed by three members of the commission. It is stated in this report that desirable regulation is that of the law of supply and demand. At page 276 there appears the following:

> Secondly, in parts of the main report there is a disposition to regard prices as being easily controllable by regulative measures of one sort or another, such as marketing schemes, regulation of business practices of large corporations, and control of corporate profits. We have been impressed time and again by the evidence presented before the commission that such regulative measures have, and can have, only a very slight effect relatively upon the principle of supply and demand. Our point may be illustrated by a brief reference to the tobacco and live stock industries.

Then there is a paragraph dealing with the tobacco industry. Briefly, it points out that because of the rise in the price of tobacco in the United States we had a demand for tobacco in Canada, and that this was really what raised the price. I submit however that while there is an element of truth in that statement, there was in the United States a deliberate attempt to deal with production and to raise price levels just as we had in the dominion. I have here a pamphlet entitled Agricultural Adjustment, a report of the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, May, 1933 to February 1934, issued by the United States Department of Agriculture. At page 74 I find the following:

> Reduction of Production
> Of the estimated tobacco acreage planted in these districts in 1933, about 12,400 acres—or around 15 per cent—were taken out of production under the terms of the contracts signed by growers. Those who participated in the program took out of production, on the average, about one-third of the tobacco which they planted in 1933. Figures showing the extent of the sign-up and the amount of acreage taken out of production are shown in table 11.
> The plan for adjusting production was announced during the 1933 planting season and many growers, in anticipation of signing contracts, refrained from planting the full intended tobacco acreage. Growers of these types reported on March 1, 1933, intentions to plant 91,200 acres. The acreage harvested in 1933 was about 67,400 acres. This represents a reduction of 23,900 acres, or 26 per cent, from the acreage growers intended to plant in 1933.
> The reduction from 1932 was 50,900 acres, or 43 per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: Is that over the whole United States?

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): This is a report covering the tobacco industry, and this refers to one type of tobacco, cigar tobacco. Now as to flue cured tobacco:

> In July, 1933, the administration began to formulate plans for a program with respect to flue-cured tobacco. In its development, all the available facts with respect to production, consumption, and world carry-over were taken into consideration. It early became evident that any plan to increase the price of flue-cured tobacco must be based upon a control of production, because the production of this commodity in excess of consumption was responsible, in a large measure, for the low price paid to the growers. Surplus stocks had begun to accumulate as early as 1929, and by 1932 they were the largest on record. In 1931 the flue-cured crop totalled 665,000,000 pounds, and sold for an average of 8½ cents per pound. In 1932 the crop totalled 374,000,000 pounds and sold for an average of 11·6 cents per pound. On July 1 the 1933 crop was estimated at 591,000,000 pounds, which was about equal to the estimated annual world consumption of this tobacco. But as the 1933 crop grew toward maturity it became increasingly evident that it would be a large crop, well above the annual consumption. (The December estimate of the 1933 production was 708,000,000 pounds).

The result was that an attempt was made to reduce acreage.

A tentative contract was drawn up and offered to the growers, under the terms of which they would agree to reduce their production in 1934 and 1935, as required by the Secretary of Agriculture, by an amount not exceeding thirty per cent of the average of the years 1931, 1932 and 1933. Through the co-operation of farmers, warehousemen, state and county officials, business men and professional men the campaign was rushed to a successful conclusion, and within a week more than ninety per cent of all flue-cured tobacco growers had signed the tentative contract.

Armed with these agreements on the part of farmers to control production, negotiations were immediately begun by the administration with the buying interests to obtain an increase in the prices to be paid for the 1933 crop. It was believed that with a knowledge that the 1934 and 1935 crops would be reduced below the level of consumption, thus liquidating the surplus produced in 1933, the buyers would be willing to enter into an agreement to make a material advance in their prices.

A few sections follow dealing with the agreement, and then it continues:

Following the inauguration of the adjustment program prices materially advanced on the flue-cured tobacco markets. During the month of November the daily average prices for a number of individual markets frequently exceeded twenty cents per pound. As a result of this price advance it is expected that flue-cured tobacco growers will receive for their 1933 crop on the market about $30,000,000 more than they otherwise would have received. The estimated total value of the 1933 crop is $115,000,000 compared with $44,000,000 for the 1932 crop and $56,000,000 for the 1931 crop.

This tremendous increase in total income from flue-cured tobacco has given a great stimulus to business in the flue-cured area and has brought about renewed hope, enthusiasm and optimism on the part of tobacco growers. Many old debts and mortgages are being paid off, trade in every line has been stimulated, and the flow of commerce in many channels has been increased. All this has worked toward the attainment of the objectives of the Agricultural Adjustment Act by tending to give flue-cured tobacco a purchasing power equivalent to its purchasing power during the base period from August, 1919, to July, 1929.

My point is simply this, that the attempts in Canada to reduce acreage and to market the crop through an organization had an effect similar to the effect of the same policies in the United States—deliberate interference, if you like, with supply in an attempt to give the producers, who otherwise could not get a reasonable living out of it something like a fair standard of living. I think we must admit that while the effort in the United States had some effect in Canada, if the policy is fair in one country and resulted in the raising of prices to a reasonable level, it is proper that we should apply it in another country and that we should expect the same results. I have dealt before with live stock, and I do not think there is any need to argue that. The same policy was followed to some extent in the United States with regard to cattle. It is described in this volume, but I do not think I need read it. My point is that it cannot be argued that the law of supply and demand, as we have used that term, is the only rule that will affect prices, in view of the experiments in the United States and Canada with regard to primary commodities.

It is said that there are great dangers if we give this federal trade commission power to ratify agreements, when the commission is unanimously of the opinion that wasteful or demoralizing competition exists in a specific industry. Human beings have, of course, a tremendous range of adaptability, but we have no right to expect people to deliver commodities to the markets of the world indefinitely if the price is much below the cost of production. I think every effort made by the Dominion of Canada to raise prices to the primary producer, even if it cost the treasury some money, has been justified, because I do not think this country has any right to expect its primary producers to sell commodities at the ruinous levels at which they stood through 1932. It is in the national interest as well as a matter of simple justice that some attempt should be made to raise prices. If that is not so, then I submit that minimum wage laws cannot be justified, but I do not think it requires arguing to-day that minimum wage laws are justified; that is generally agreed. If it is fair that farmers and labour should have consideration of that kind why should not the same rule apply to industry? Why should we be afraid to give a commission power, if they find that an industry is selling its product at ruinous levels, to make a recommendation to the governor in council to stabilize prices as suggested in this bill? I will admit that there are dangers. I will admit that there are problems. But I do not know any reason why an industry that has had to pay its work people less than a living wage simply because the prices of the products were at ruinous levels should not have the right to present its case for assistance towards stabilization. Of course stabilization could be at too high a level, which might be unreasonable and unfair to the public. But I do not think that danger is very great. I would be willing to take the chance, because the hardships that some industries and agriculture and the labouring people of this country have been through in the last four years require definite and specific remedy, and we ought to be willing to take some chance in an attempt to work out something better.

The argument has been advanced that every attempt to increase prices makes it all the more difficult for the consumer to buy. Well, that just depends on what prices are increased. I believe that when prices are ruinously low to the producer it is just as much a problem as when they are ruinously high to the consumer, and this commission and every other government agency, so far as it has deliberative power, must aim at prices that, as far as it is possible to ascertain, are fair as between the producers and the consumers. After all there is no such individual as a consumer or a producer; people are both producers and consumers, and if we can reach prices that are fair as between the two then in my judgment we will reach the best possible solution.

It has been suggested here that every other attempt at regulation should be cast aside and that our chief aim should be a lowering of tariffs to promote foreign competition. As between the various retail merchants of this country, mass buyers and small individual stores, I do not see that the lowering or increasing of the tariff would have a great deal of effect. If it did have an effect probably it would favour the people who have been in the most favourable position during these last few years, the mass buyers.

There is just one other thing I should like to say, having listened to the arguments of various witnesses who appeared before the price spreads committee and the commission. If their representations were fair, as I think they were in most cases; if they understood what they were talking about, and certainly a great many of the witnesses impressed me as knowing what they were talking about, the problems of trade and industry in Canada appear to me to be such that I do not believe it is too much to ask that another organization be set up in order to deal with them. I do not think the tariff board can take care of the duties they have at the present time and deal effectively with the problems that were presented to the price spreads and mass buying commission, and I believe the government ought to consider the advisability of establishing a commission separate from the tariff board.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, if I understood the argument of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Kennedy, Peace River) it was to this effect, that because the United States government, by taking vast sums of money out of the treasury of that country and paying it to the farmers for not growing tobacco, were able to create an artificial scarcity of tobacco in that country and thereby raise the price, it follows that the Canadian marketing act, which we passed in this house a year or more ago, was responsible for the increased price of flue cured tobacco in Ontario last fall.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I should like to say that I did not say that at all.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend says he did not say that. I hope he repudiates the idea.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I do not.

Mr. YOUNG: Then my hon. friend meant it. Now let us see what happened to the price of tobacco in Ontario last season. Prior to that there was a surplus of flue cured tobacco in the hands of the farmers of Ontario, amounting to some ten million pounds. In addition to that, one company, the Imperial Tobacco Company, the year previously had purchased some five million pounds of tobacco more than its normal requirements. That meant fifteen million pounds of tobacco in Canada more than ordinarily we would require, with a crop coming on. In the fall of 1933 the price fell to about 17 cents a pound, I think, and prospects were that the price would not be very good the next year. The manufacturers and the growers got together and tried to agree on a price; I think they did agree on a price of 27 cents a pound, but some of the manufacturers refused to sign the agreement. Later a scheme was organized under the marketing act and a board was set up. That board set the price of tobacco—and I say this with all deference to my hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), who says boards have no right to set prices—by some means or other, for the year, at 24½ or 25 cents per pound. That price was agreed upon and all the tobacco was used up; all the tobacco was sold at that price, not only the crop of that year but the carry over from the previous year. To whom was it sold? It was not sold to consumers or manufacturers in Canada. British buyers of tobacco, who ordinarily go to Virginia for their flue cured tobacco, found that they could buy tobacco in Canada for 25 cents per pound while the price for the same tobacco in the United States was 32 cents per pound, so they came to Canada and bought their supplies. That was why there was an advance in the price of tobacco last fall. It was not due to the marketing act; it was due to the artificial scarcity created by the United States government at enormous cost to the United States treasury.

Now my hon. friend says that we should use money out of the treasury in order to raise the prices of those commodities that are being sold at a loss in order that all our people should get a fair price for their products.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): No, I did not say that.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend left that impression on my mind. I think he did say that there was justification for taking money out of the treasury in order to increase prices.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): No, I did not say that.

Mr. YOUNG: Then I will leave it to Hansard.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I said there was justification for what the United States government did in connection with the control of acreage.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend said there was justification for taking money out of the treasury, anyway. I think my hon. friend said that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): I did not say that.

Mr. YOUNG: Then we will forget all about the hon. gentleman and we will start at this point: My contention is that in fixing our price structure in Canada—that is, the prices at which commodities are sold—we should start with the world prices of our export commodities; that is the price we cannot control, the price the world is willing to pay us for the things we export. Then our policy should be to bring our domestic prices in line with those export prices. If we do that we put those of our citizens who are engaged in the business of producing commodities for export in a position to buy other commodities in this country. In that way they give employment to those producing those other commodities that we buy on the same level and it becomes possible to exchange labour, one class with another. But when you maintain domestic prices at a higher level than export prices you put a large section of our people out of the market; they cannot buy the products of their fellow citizens and they are not in a position to exchange their labour for the labour of others, and in consequence other people are idle because they cannot sell the product of their labour. That is what leads to unemployment and distress generally.

This evening I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy), and as he argued I could not help but think of some of the arguments used yesterday in support of Bill No. 73. He contended we ought to pass this legislation because we have power to do so. I do not think we should be so much concerned with the question whether or not we have the power. The first thing we should decide upon is whether or not the legislation is desirable. As he argued in that way I was forcibly reminded of the old saying that no man can safely be entrusted with power except the man who does not want it. When you hear a man arguing that we should exercise power because we have it, then I say he is not a safe man to follow or to be entrusted with power.

Witnesses appearing before the price spreads commission were of all sorts and classes. They came to us with their grievances; we listened to them and then we asked what remedies they had to suggest. In nearly every case the suggested remedy was the same. They all said, "Eliminate our competitors, and we will be all right." That is all they asked—a monopoly in their own particular lines of business. The stockyards operators came before us and asked us to eliminate the competition of the packing houses and thereby force the farmers to send all their stock to the stockyard, so that in the end the stockyards would have the handling of it. The manufacturers came to us and asked not only monopolistic powers but what they called self-regulation in industry. They asked power to come together and form agreements, and requested that in such agreements they be allowed to determine who may be permitted to enter that business in Canada, at what prices they might sell, how much they might produce, and so on. The small merchants came before us and asked for the elimination of larger competitors. Even the trade unions were heard, and what did they ask? They asked not the right to join any union they wished, but the right to put competing unions out of business. Every person wants monopoly, yet inherent in every man is a distrust of monopoly. We are all afraid of it, though we all feel it would be all right if we were in on it. The distrust of monopolies is well founded; it is based on the experience of the human race and, I might say, on self knowledge. Our experience has been that whenever we are in the grip of a monopoly we suffer for it. In the bottom of our hearts we know what we would do if we had a monopoly, and that is why we do not want any other person to have one.

Mr. LOUCKS: That is quite a confession.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, but we are all the same. The majority of the commission do not believe in monopolies, but they have argued in this way: We have a certain number of monopolies, and since we cannot do anything else with them we had better regulate them. That is the effect of the recommendation they made to the government. They recommended that existing monopolies should be sanctioned and regulated. The legislation brought down by the government provides for the sanctioning of monopoly but leaves out the other part, namely the regulation of it. I doubt if a single member of the commission would have signed a recommendation to sanction a monopoly without another provision for the regulating of it.

The objections to monopolies are twofold. First they oppress the consuming public. Having the whole market to themselves and fearing no competitors they charge their own prices, dictate their own terms and become as arrogant as you please. The second objection is that a monopoly always leads to extravagance and inefficiency. Those are the two great objections. No act of parliament can provide against the second effect. The proposal in the recommendations of the commission was for the regulation of monopolies, but all we can regulate in regard to monopolies are their dealings with the public. We may say to a monopoly, "You must pay certain wages; you must work certain hours; you must produce at a certain rate and you must charge certain prices." We might do all that, but no commission will ever be set up competent to go into the facts in connection with a monopoly and determine whether or not the factory in question was run efficiently. Extravagance and inefficiency will grow up, develop and keep on developing so long as a monopoly exists. It is impossible to regulate that feature out of it. The only regulation which will force efficiency upon a monopoly is that of competition. The spur of a competitor will force it to be efficient to a degree a commission or regulation could never attain.

Then, in regard to unfair trade practices, will anybody tell me what is fair and what is unfair in business? This afternoon the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) pointed out that there were two kinds of unfair practices, those which were ethically unfair and those which were economically unfair. We may all decide that which is ethically unfair, but already we have laws against such practices. If those laws are not sufficient, let us make them sufficient. But when we come down to a determination of what is economically unfair we have an entirely different problem.

Let us go back to a consideration of tobacco. Complaints were made to the commission that the Imperial Tobacco Company were guilty of unfair trade practices in that they were not paying the farmer a sufficient price for tobacco. But that was not the only complaint made against the Imperial Tobacco Company. That was the complaint of the tobacco growers, undoubtedly, but it was not the complaint of the small manufacturer. The small tobacco manufacturers came before us and complained that they could not pay the price the Imperial Tobacco Company was paying. Their complaint was that the price was too high. Now, who will decide what is fair? Would a commission decide it? Would it not be better to have it decided by economic forces? Is it fair for a man in business to pass on any advantage he has gained from his higher efficiency or for any other reason? On the other hand, would it be unfair for him to pass that advantage on to his customer or to the consuming public? The mass buyer has a certain advantage over the small buyer, that of buying in large quantities. Because of his larger orders and because he pays cash he can buy cheaper than the small buyer. But he is under certain disadvantages, too. Being a mass buyer and operating in a large way he has to be more efficient than the small buyer, and efficiency costs money. He has to maintain a staff of supervisors and efficiency experts to keep all kinds of checks on his employees. That is an expensive procedure. Then, too, he lacks personal contact with his customers, something which the small merchant has and can maintain. There is a class of individual retail merchants of whom the mass buyer is afraid and with whom the mass buyer cannot compete. I refer to the individual merchant who will adopt the practices of chain stores and mass buyers. That is, he will be one who will clean up his premises, handle fresh goods, keep them moving and give as good service to his customers as the larger stores may give. That man, with the advantages I have indicated, plus personal contact with his customers, can back the mass buyer off the map. Not long ago I met a gentleman who told me that for twenty years he had sold shoes right across the road from one of the largest department stores in this country. He said, "If I could have got closer to them, I would have done so." I said, "How did you do it?" He replied, "By personal contact with my customers." He had the advantage of personal contact; the large store had the advantage of a larger organization. I have no doubt that each was passing on to his customers the advantage he gained, and who would say that they were unfair in doing it?

I ask this question: Should a manufacturer be compelled to keep step with his competitors in all things? Or, if he finds a way of improving his methods and of producing and marketing his goods cheaper than any other person, should he not be required to pass on that advantage to the public—or at least should he not be allowed to do it? Let us take the example of a manufacturer who produces, we will say, $2,000 worth of goods in one week, and in the production of those goods he pays out in wages $1,000. Let us suppose that by greater efficiency, by installing new machinery or something of that sort, he can reduce his wage bill to $500. Should he not be allowed to sell his goods to the public $500 cheaper? If not, this is what happens. He dismisses just that many men, turns them out on the street without work and without wages, and puts that $500 in his pocket. The result is that these men are out of work and you have technological unemployment. Now if instead of requiring that man to put that extra profit in his pocket, if you required or even if you permitted him to pass it on to his customers in the form of lower prices, it would mean that $500 would be left in the pockets of his customers with which they would buy other goods, and the production of these other goods would pay wages to just as many men as were displaced by the labour saving devices he had installed in that factory. Yet this legislation would forbid a man to undersell his competitor simply because he could produce at a price which they could not, and the result would be a greatly increased measure of unemployment.

Mr. BAKER: From his experience in manufacturing would the hon. member tell us how a manufacturer could cut down his wage bill from $1,000 to $500 without taking it out of his employees?

Mr. YOUNG: I have just explained that.

Mr. BAKER: You have not had a large experience in manufacturing.

Mr. YOUNG: Perhaps my hon. friend could tell us whether stocking manufacturers do not sell stockings to-day much cheaper than they did ten years ago.

Mr. BAKER: You cannot cut down your wages from $1,000 to $500 without taking it right out of your employees.

Mr. YOUNG: It is proposed in this bill, Mr. Speaker, to regulate monopolies. My hon. friend from Hants-Kings said this afternoon that he did not think the Combines Investigation Act would be as well enforced under this legislation as it has been in the past. One big advantage in the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act—as it has been done in the past has been that when would-be monopolists came to the registrar, and they came repeatedly, and asked, "Can we do this or that under the law as it stands?" he refused to tell them what they could or could not do. He would not encourage them to do a thing and afterwards have them say: Well, you told us we could do it. But this legislation proposes to do that very thing. It proposes to sanction any kind of agreement these people come along with, and in that way we shall encourage them to come along with all sorts of schemes, and you will have more combines than ever. The proper way to regulate monopolies, it seems to me, is by competition. Expose your monopolist to ruthless competition, and if he cannot compete, so much the worse for him; you have broken the monopoly.

Mr. LUCHKOVICH: How can the small retailer compete with the monopoly?

Mr. YOUNG: I have just answered that question, if my hon. friend had listened. We found in the investigation that every one of these monopolies had grown up under the shelter of a protective tariff, and without that tariff they could not live. When you have a monopoly producing any commodity in this country, and then you have competition entering the country from some unexpected source, how long is it until that monopoly is agitating for increased tariff protection, for some kind of government action to shut out the competing product?

Mr. BAKER: Without the tariff there would be tens of thousands more out of employment than there are to-day.

Mr. IRVINE: How would you prevent competition from leading to monopoly? That is what has happened.

Mr. YOUNG: By competition. No, that is not what has happened. A monopoly is created by eliminating competition. When the tariff is built up around this country it is a simple matter then, with outside competition shut out, for the domestic manufacturers to get together and form an agreement or a combine or some sort of monopoly. Take down your tariff walls, let competition come in, and see how long that arrangement or combine will last.

Mr. BAKER: How many more would we have on the dole?

Mr. YOUNG: We should not have as many on the dole. If my hon. friend wants to know the cause of the dole, let him look at the tariff policy of the present government.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker this trade and industry commission for which the bill provides is really the means suggested of exercising government control over industry. I note that in the report of the royal commission on price spreads the methods of public control are enumerated, with brief comments made on each class of control. They are (a) the protection of private economic activity; (b) the promotion of private economic activity; (c) the encouragement of monopoly; (d) licensing; (e) the protection of the public from the excesses of competition; (f) the prohibition of monopoly and maintenance of compulsory competition; (g) government acceptance of monopoly with regulation; (h) government toleration of monopolistic or quasi-monopolistic industrial combinations; (i) public ownership and operation. So far we have heard a good deal about regulation, something further with regard to competition of the very freest kind, but there has been very little said with regard to this latter mode of controlling the situation by public ownership and operation. The report says, if I might read a paragraph, at page 251:

> The extreme example of government interrention is where the government engages directly in the ownership and operation of business enterprise. Government ownership and operation of postal services, schools, and roads provide some of the oldest examples. In violation of extreme individualistic theories, governments nearly everywhere have taken these enterprises out of private hands, sometimes simply because private enterprise could not profitably supply satisfactory service, sometimes because it did not operate to produce maximum social welfare. Public ownership for a variety of reasons—to provide a competitive check on private enterprise, to supplement ineffective regulations of monopoly, to control consumption, to provide revenue—has continued to expand until a world survey of such ownership to-day would include every type of economic activity. In Canada governments are directly engaged in such businesses as railways, steamships, street railways, telegraphs, telephones, radio, electric light and power, water, gas, stockyards, grain elevators, public markets, liquor sales, banking and insurance.

[Mr. Young.]

From my standpoint it seems rather unfortunate that the commission should not have given much greater attention to this means of regulation than it has done. For some reason or other, possibly because of the composition of the commission itself, it has chosen the path of regulation. It has rejected uncontrolled competition such as has been suggested by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) and has chosen the method of state regulation. This bill which is now before us is the government's method for meeting the problem. This means that some of us who do not have very great faith in this method are placed in a rather awkward position when dealing with a bill of this kind. We may possibly vote in favour of it as being a small step in the recognition of the necessity for an ordered arrangement in society, but at the same time we recognize clearly that it is bound to be ineffective. We hear a good deal about regulation and we hear a good deal about unfair practices, but those of us who have in any degree adopted the socialistic analysis of society believe that our system as such is essentially unfair. We cannot hope that by merely regulating such practices we shall arrive at anything like an equitable state of society. Perhaps I could illustrate by refering to the age of chattel slavery. It might have been very well in those days to insist that there should be regulations under which the slaves should not be worked more than twelve or fifteen hours a day, or under which the slaves should be housed somewhat decently; there might have been regulations to prevent the slave owners from whipping their slaves but the fact is that the institution of slavery gradually came to be recognized as economically unsound and ethically unjustifiable. It took a civil war to abolish slavery in the United States. In the West Indies, largely through the efforts of Mr. Wilberforce, slavery as a system was done away with through government action, the slave owners being compensated to a certain extent for the loss of their slaves.

Some of us believe that the present system of capitalism under which a comparatively small number of people own and control the greater part of the production machinery of this country is essentially wrong in its very nature. It is becoming, like slavery, economically unsound and ethically unjustifiable. Under these conditions we cannot believe that petty regulations will solve the problem. The commission to be set up may do away with certain of the more gross forms of unfair practices; the amendments to the criminal code proposed last night may further advance the cause by making actually criminal certain of these unfair practices; I submit that that is all to the good, but it does not touch the vital problem with which we are faced under this system of capitalism.

During the investigations of the committee and later of the commission on price spreads an attack was made particularly on the departmental and chain stores. Very great solicitude was expressed for the smaller merchants. I confess that I feel a great deal of sympathy for the small business men who are being gradually crowded to the wall. In my judgment they are the victims of that competition which has been lauded so by the hon. member for Weyburn. Competition has been given free rein with the result that the larger merchant and possibly the more efficient or in some cases the more unscrupulous merchant has been able to crowd out his less efficient or more scrupulous opponent.

I would point out that after all the organization of business into larger units has meant an added efficiency, at least up to a certain point. The farmers of western Canada patronize the large departmental stores because they find that these stores give services which they could not receive from the small local dealers. I have lived on the prairies and I know something of conditions from the early pioneer days. I have great sympathy for the local man in the small town who has helped to build up his community, but at the same time I recognize that under the competitive system referred to by the hon. member for Weyburn there are services which cannot very well be provided by the local man. It seems to me that by emphasizing the necessity of keeping the small business alive we are, as it were, trying to turn back the clock.

In a general way I should say that what is happening to-day to the small business man is closely paralleled by what happened to the labouring man one hundred and fifty years ago. I do not know why it is, but in our schools even to-day comparatively little emphasis is laid upon the profound effect of what is known as the industrial revolution which occurred in Great Britain, about a hundred and fifty years ago. Before that time the handscraftsman was supplying the needs of his own immediate neighbours. There was a certain amount of competition between individual workmen. But the factory was set up with its large machinery and the small man could not begin to compete with the larger organization. These small craftsmen had to leave their little village workshops to go to work in the factories, which meant a complete revolution in the industrial life of Great Britain. I have not the time to outline the economic, the social and the political changes which occurred as a result of that revolution, but I would point out that instead of free competition there was organized production; instead of each individual workingman being, as we say, his own boss, he became a wage earner. The owner of the factory determined largely the conditions of work, and owning the tools of production he was able to retain whatever profits were made, the workingman receiving only his wage, large or small. The abominable conditions which existed at that time led gradually to the enactment of the factory acts which ameliorated somewhat the conditions of the labouring man. Later on there was a development of trade unionism which helped materially to better the condition of labour.

In my judgment the business man to-day is very much in the position in which the industrial worker was at the time of the industrial revaluation. We have the organization of industry which is something like a concentration of effort within the walls of a factory. In many ways a large departmental store is like a factory and many of the smaller business men have had to desert their small businesses to work as departmental heads in such concerns as Eaton's. Instead of making their own profits, running their own businesses, they are simply hired men in the large departmental stores. Looking at things in the large way, it would seem as if this concentration in a comparatively few hands was an almost inevitable development and that the change that is taking place in our merchandising is very closely parallel to the change that took place in industrial life at an earlier period.

To-day we must recognize the large number of people who are living under the wages system. In the price spreads report, in the chapter Labour and Wages, I note on page 105 the following statement:

> Two-thirds (2,565,000) of the total working population of Canada (3,923,000) are wage-earners. If agriculture, in which over a million people are employed chiefly as proprietors, were eliminated, the proportion would be raised to nearly five-sixths.

That is to say, practically five-sixths of the population are to-day working, not under the free system of competition but under a system in which they are merely wage earners, forming a part of the large industrial organization. All the discussion that we have ad, and practically all the ground that is being covered by this bill, concerns directly at best a very small proportion of the population of Canada, those people that are still in the stage of small industry, in the small business stage, who control or think they control their own affairs and are still in the competitive era. But the vast mass of the people to-day are no longer living under conditions of competition; they are wage earners, employees in great concerns in the conduct of which they have very little voice indeed.

A very similar process, although varying somewhat in detail, has taken place in recent years in connection with the farming industry. The farmer is still nominally his own master; he is still nominally a proprietor; but in effect at least two-thirds of the farmers of the west are so heavily under mortgage that they are practically under the control of the mortgage companies. They work long hours, they have to a considerable extent control over the details of their own work; but the mortgage companies step in and have the first claim on what they produce. That development has gone to such an extent that on a great many farms the mortgage companies and the banks are beginning to dictate the conditions under which even the farmer must carry on his work. Certainly when the farmer steps off his farm he is immediately brought into this larger organized sphere. He cannot get his implements unless they pass through a large number of hands, and so he has to deal with a certain monopoly of agricultural implements and all that sort of thing. He cannot buy his household necessities without coming in contact with modern industry with its monopolistic practices. He cannot sell his grain without coming in contact with the larger world outside. The proposal to establish a wheat board in Canada is simply the recognition of and the response to this new state of affairs which has developed, which means that we can no longer have free competition as between individual farmer and individual farmer, but rather that we must have some sort of control over marketing or processing or whatever it may be. We cannot go back to the period visualized by one or two members of the house, the old free individualistic society in which our grandfathers lived.

I regret indeed that the committee, owing to the terms of reference, could not make an investigation into the larger financial concerns as we have them in Canada. The hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) this afternoon referred to that matter, as he has been referring to it in a number of his more recent public speeches. In my opinion, concentration of finance in the hands of a comparatively small group of people is the most serious aspect of this present development. In the old days each man performed a whole round of activities for himself; he made his goods, he sold his goods, he financed the transaction. But gradually there has come about specialization with division of work, so that to-day one group of people manufacture goods, a second group do the merchandising in various ways and a third group of people do the financing; and we have developed to that stage where instead of the producer being the main factor or the distributor being the most important individual, as has been the case until recent years, the financier is the most important of the three. The producer can produce only as he can secure loans from the financial people, and the distributor can carry on only as he too can secure loans from them; and so to-day the financial people are in the very heart of the system.

Mr. BAKER: Is the hon. gentleman's statement quite correct?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I hope so; it is my point of view at any rate.

Mr. BAKER: There are producers who distribute and finance their own transactions.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am speaking of the general tendency, and I hope the hon. member will permit me to advance my argument.

Mr. BAKER: You are making a statement that is not fair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is my opinion.

Mr. BAKER: Well, it is unfounded.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My opinion is that, looking at the present trend, the financial people occupy the central, dominating position in the whole economic structure; and as the hon. member for East Kootenay remarked to-day, it is a comparatively small number of people who practically control the whole situation. I think it must be six or eight years since in this house I placed on Hansard the names of the directors of our banks and other financial institutions and showed how through a system of interlocking directorates a few men control the greater part of the economic life of this country.

Some of us for years past have been urging that the control of finance is essential if we are really to control the other phases of our economic life. I still believe that. I do not think we can get very far until the country itself controls its currency and credit, its financial instruments. So I cannot be very hopeful of the efficacy of this legislation until such time as the state on its own behalf takes over control of the currency and credit of this country. I do not intend to go further into that matter to-night; we in this corner have tried to emphasize that again and again. We may vote for the bill in the hope that it may bring about some amelioration in conditions and may do away with some of the more gross forms of unfair practices. At the same time, since it has not undertaken to control the financial mainspring of our economic life I cannot see that it is likely to solve any of our major problems.

Regulation then from my point of view cannot be effective. The only thing that can be effective is a change in our existing system. We believe that instead of a system built on the basis of profit we must have a system that is primarily designed, to supply the needs of the people. No other system will prove effective. This proposed legislation does nothing in regard to such a change of system. It is possible that it will provide machinery which later on may be used by an administration having the social ideal, but we cannot very well hope that it will produce very great results as long as the machinery is in the hands of those who still believe in the profit motive and in the present capitalistic system.

I know that it is difficult to impress upon Canadians the necessity for a new economic system. We are most of us children of the pioneers. Most of us have a good deal of the old pioneer psychology. Our fathers came to this country several generations ago and carved out for themselves homes in the wilderness; there was work for all who wanted to work, and there were unlimited opportunities for expanding their business affairs. That was the era of individualism, and undoubtedly it developed a great many excellent qualities in the people of that day. But we have passed beyond that stage. One of the major difficulties with us to-day is that, living in this complex state of society, we still adhere to the old traditions. Take our Slogan—"Competition the life of trade"; did we not all write that in our copy books? We were brought up to believe it.

An hon. MEMBER: Some still believe it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, a few people who belong to the earlier day still believe it and still venture to say it. But they are anachronisms antique specimens, and we must not bother very much with them. The trouble is there are a good many of them lying around.

Mr. YOUNG: Do you mean lying?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, if you insist on the term, because they necessarily misrepresent the entire situation. We cannot have that free competition when we have these great combinations that exist to-day. Take the five-sixths of the population to which the price spreads report refers; they know nothing about that free competition. They are simply wage earners taking the wages handed to them, unless they can combine in sufficient strength to force a little more. They know nothing about free competition in production. We must learn to adapt our policies to the new age in which we live. I wonder if I may give once more an illustration that is a favourite of mine; I feel sure I must have given it in this house before—

Mr. GEARY: We always like to hear it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All right. I refer to the traffic regulations we have to-day. In the old days of the horse and buggy we could drive as we pleased, here, there and yonder. But in our modern cities with their congested traffic it has become absolutely impossible to go as we please. We have our traffic policemen, our traffic regulations, lights and so on, and we have to obey them. I do not see how we can avoid it. Even an individualist of the old school like the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) must conform to the traffic regulations.

Mr. YOUNG: But that is no reason why we should travel in a chain gang.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: You can talk about a chain gang, but we all remember that in the streets the automobiles wait until the light changes and then almost as in a chain gang go forward together until they are stopped again. I think that is a close parallel to the situation we face in dealing with legislation of this kind. In the old days we had more or less free competition which developed certain qualities in the individual that were good; it helped to develop the present type of economic life. But it also developed a great many abuses and caused an enormous amount of suffering. Now that accidents have become so frequent and the traffic is so badly congested, surely the time has come that we should in some intelligent way devise regulations that will enable us to get on with the business of the world. That I take it is what we are trying to do to a limited extent by this bill. Gradually we must get rid of that old time pioneer psychology and develop a social psychology, recognizing that we are living in a cooperative world and must therefore act in a cooperative fashion.

There is one other point I should like to mention. I said I felt like voting for this legislation because it is at least an attempt to do something to meet the existing situation. Frankly, I am dreadfully disappointed with the attitude of the Liberal party throughout this entire parliament. They have stood pat, they have refused to give their own solution; they know that the problem is there—if they do not the whole country does—yet they refuse to lift a little finger to help solve that problem. It would seem they have no solution. The only ones among them who are vocal say: Let us go back to the good old days of free competition, laissez-faire and all the rest. But that is not good enough for to-day. So, although I have not any great confidence in the effectiveness of legislation of this kind, I welcome it as at least a move in the right direction.

The fact is that we are facing what the old socialist writers used to call the inherent contradictions in the present capitalistic system. We cannot make it work very much longer. I had an instance of that only the other day, someone writing me in regard to the enforcement of the minimum wage. In trying to enforce the act we are turning a lot of girls out of work, as the employers cannot afford to pay the wage. I can see some ground for the contention that the hon. member for Weyburn brings forward so often, that is the difficulty of enforcing this type of legislation, the ineffectiveness of it. But I differ from him in that, while he wants to go back, I want to go forward. He wants to go back to a system that is outgrown. We cannot go back; the only thing is to go forward. And the Conservative party, contrary to its name, has ventured at least to look forward. I do not think it is looking forward very far; I do not think its proposals are going to get us very far, but at the same time it is saying: We must make some attempt to solve this problem. But in working out its policies it is going to be faced with these "inherent contradictions of the present system." For example, the attempt to do anything towards enforcing fair practices may easily penalize certain more efficient firms. I think probably that would be its most dangerous effect. That is one of the dangers connected with it. In the United States, to which reference was made earlier this evening, we have had millions and indeed billions of dollars poured out in an effort to make this system work. The effort has been to put purchasing power into the hands of the people. That seemed very essential; I believe it to be so, but so far that effort has not been successful. Instead of raising real wages and thus the standard of living of the people, it has succeeded only in putting up prices and creating greater dividends. Whether we like it or not to-day we are faced with fundamental contradictions in the system. Capitalism cannot be made to work very much longer; that is at least my opinion, and that is why I am advocating changes in the system.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

It is not that I want to have a regimented population, as a matter of fact, we are regimented to-day by those people in St. James street, in Wall street and other financial centres; we are under their control. I want a cooperative system under which we will be free. Our present system—though collective—we do not control; we have an overhead control. What I advocate is a control exercised by the people themselves in a democratic fashion, a control that will no longer permit a few people to own the very tools by which we live, the machinery through which wealth is produced, but under which that machinery and those tools of production will be under the control of the people themselves.

That is the viewpoint I want to present once more to-night. I do not think it is understood by the majority of our people, but I feel confident that larger numbers are coming to understand. The best we can do for the time being is to seek to interpret these little pieces of legislation as movements in the direction of—indeed a part of—the larger movement which I have tried to outline to-night.

I propose to vote for the bill, though criticizing some of its clauses. I do so in the hope that it may prevent a few of the abuses that now exist and may lead us a little further along the road of reconstruction. Further it may help carry forward our education by showing the people generally how unworkable is any regulative measure under the existing system.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I doubt if anything that has happened in the last few years has stirred the people of Canada to such an extent as the shocking evidence brought out before the price spreads commission. In the mind of almost everyone there was a general feeling that all was not well, but official evidence was brought out before the commission which leaves no doubt as to the actual conditions that exist. I think it was the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), speaking this afternoon, who said that it might be well to leave this legislation over to be dealt with by another parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: One feature of it only.

Mr. LUCAS: One feature of it, at any rate. I think if there is one thing the people of Canada want and expect to-day it is action. We hear a great deal about the communistic propaganda that is being spread throughout the country. If there is anything that will spread communism in Canada it will be our failure to bring about some alleviation of the conditions that were exposed by this investigation. So I think a tremendous responsibility rests upon this parliament to see that speedy action is taken to bring about an improvement of conditions.

Up to the present we have heard a great deal, especially from our legal friends, as to what cannot be done. The question with which the people are concerned, however, is what can be done. The hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), in his very able speech this afternoon, referred to the tremendous monopolies that have been created in Canada in the last several years; he mentioned that 246 mergers took place between 1924 and 1930. I am of opinion that these mergers and monopolies could not have been carried through if it had not been for the fact that these men had the ability to manipulate finance, and if we want to deal with these monopolies I do not think there is any need to argue about the constitution. One thing is sure; this parliament has power to deal with finance, and until we reassert our sovereign power to deal with finance I am afraid we will continue to have monopolies as we have had them in the past. It cannot be said that up to the present governments have materially interfered with business management, so one must conclude that the responsibility for the present chaotic condition rests upon those who dominate the business life of this country.

I want it clearly understood that I am not making a blanket condemnation of all business, because I think it is well understood that the small business man finds himself in just as bad a plight as do the majority of other classes in the country. One hears a great deal these days, especially from opponents of government interference, about private initiative, rugged individualism and the pioneer spirit of our forefathers, and the argument is advanced that these qualities alone are needed to lead us out of our difficulties. It may be true, Mr. Speaker, that these qualities solved the problems of earlier times, the chief one being to provide sufficient to keep the people from starvation, or what is commonly referred to as the problem of scarcity, but that age is past. We no longer live in an age of scarcity; our great problem to-day is one of abundance. Prior to approximately one hundred years ago, down through all the centuries of time, there was very little advance in the art of greater production and the only agents a man had to assist him in making his living were his bare hands, a strong body, a few crude implements, and the animals which he trained. But following the discovery of solar energy and as the knowledge of its use increased, conditions changed rapidly. The main problem of our forefathers was one of scarcity. They were continually faced with the haunting fear of famine and starvation. Then what happened? Why has there been more progress in the art of production in the last one hundred years than there was in all the centuries that went before? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, that has been so because of the spread of education among the people. Let me point out that it was in 1832, also about one hundred years ago, that the first reform bill was passed in England, that was the beginning of the spread of education to the masses, and it is interesting to note that as education improved and spread more rapidly among the people, tremendous changes have taken place in our productive system until to day the picture is completely changed. Rugged individualism and the pioneering spirit of our forefathers may have solved their problem, but it left us with an entirely different one, namely that of learning how to distribute the abundance we are now able to produce. But surely if our forefathers faced with the haunting spectre of starvation were able to overcome their difficulties, we to-day, freed from that fear, should find it much easier to face the problem which confronts us. Human beings are mainly creatures of habit and custom; and like the small boy with bad habits will not give them up until compelled to do so, and it is only necessity to-day that is compelling us to change our views on many matters; and the struggle is a hard one.

The fact we must realize is that we are living in 1935 and not 1835. In the past great changes have come about only after a bitter fight. In proof of that statement one has but to remember the tremendous struggles which have taken place to secure our religious and political freedom, the abolishing of slavery and so on. But once those rights were secured we would not go back to the old conditions. I believe the biggest fight now confronting the human race is that of gaining our economic freedom. The solid foundation upon which our British civilization was founded was that of justice and fair play, and if we are to erect a superstructure in keeping with that foundation a great many changes will have to be made to curb the greed and avarice of certain predatory interests which threaten to wreck the whole structure.

The tremendous changes which have taken place in our industrial and economic life through the growth of the corporation, mainly since the beginning of the twentieth century, have relegated the individual to a secondary position, and no matter how strong may be his private initiative or pioneering spirit he is no match for the soulless corporation which opposes him. It has been the generally accepted idea that shareholders control the management of a company, but now we learn that to a great extent that is incorrect.

Let me quote one or two paragraphs from the report of the price spreads commission. At page 14 of the report, in that part dealing with the ownership and control of corporations, we find the following:

> The corporation has allowed the development of multiple ownership—that is, an indefinite number of people may own the corporation (and thus its assets) through the minute subdivision of ownership shares. This development has brought about a distinction between ownership and control.
> Under simple conditions, ownership implies the control of the thing owned. The development of the corporation, however, with its multiple shareholders, has made it possible for an individual to own without controlling, and to control without ownng.

Then on the next page we have an analysis of some 145 companies indicating methods of control in Canadian corporations. The summary at page 17 is as follows:

> The significance of the results above is further emphasized by the fact that very few directors owned more than one per cent of the voting stock of the companies they directed. In 91 of the 145 companies no directors owned more than one per cent of the voting stock. Of the 101 directors of the other 54 companies (owning more than one per cent of such stock) 60 of them held between 1 and 3 per cent; 25 held between 3 and 10 per cent; 7 between 10 and 20 per cent; 5 between 20 and 30 per cent and 4 above 30 per cent.

So we find that the individual has very little control. As the late Woodrow Wilson once said, all our activities are in the hands of a few dominant men who chill, check and destroy genuine economic freedom. The evidence brought out before the price spreads commission clearly demonstrates this fact.

[Mr. Lucas.]

The truth of it is found when we think of such companies as the Imperial Tobacco Company, Canada Packers Limited, Canadian Canners Limited, The Robert Simpson Company, Limited, The T. Eaton Company Limited and many others. Here we find managements composed of only a few men drawing huge salaries and bonuses, while the workers and the primary producers eke out a miserable existence. In addition to that about a million of our citizens have to depend upon charity. Of course the system is satisfactory for those who are in control. Men drawing salaries of $25,000 per year and over and bonuses of $40,000 to $60,000 have surely found Utopia. But is that justice; is it fair play?

Let me now turn to that part of the price spreads commission report dealing with wages paid in the tobacco industry. At page 115 I find the following:

> The most striking fact revealed by our evidence on the tobacco industry is the combination of low wages and high profits. In 1930, the average annual earnings of the workers on this industry, $662, were the third lowest in the 40 industries for which the Domnion Bureau of Statistics published data. Since that date they have declined to as low as $555.

Then, at a later point I find this statement:

> While workers in this company were being paid such low wages, an average of 28 chief executives received in salary and bonuses $616,318 in 1931, $506,982 in 1932 and $421,388 in 1933.

I would say at this point that if there is to be interference in business a maximum should be set as to the salary, including bonuses, which any one person may receive. One thing is certain, that the highly paid executives to whom we have been taught to look up and to consider as supermen have shown no great ability either in preventing or in leading us out of the present collapse. A publication of the Department of Labour indicates that a family budget requires from $800 to $1,000 for food and housing alone. On this basis a family would require from $1,200 to $1,500 to meet the minimum requirements for a decent standard of living. When one learns, however, that out of 1,947,771 male wage earners reporting at the last dominion census 1,178,975 or 60·53 per cent reported as receiving less than $1,000 per year, and that including all male wage earners the average yearly earnings amounted to $927, and for the female wage earners only $560, one realizes the seriousness of the situation. Is it any wonder that under these conditions we have poverty and unrest in Canada? I shall now place on record a table showing the classification of earnings as indicated by the last census reports:

Earnings	Males		Females
	Number	Per cent of total	Number	Per cent of total
Under $1,000	1,178,975	60.53	437,409	82.77
$ 1,000 to 1,499	400,781	20.58	71,836	13.60
1,500 to 1,499	198,577	10.20	14,173	2.68
2,000 to 2,999	112,527	5.78	4,485	.85
3,000 to 3,999	33,895	1.74	440	.08
4,000 to 4,999	9,959	.51	62	.01
5,000 to 9,999	10,982	.55	51	.01
10,000 to 24,999	145	.10	1	.01
25,000 and over	145	.01	....	....
Totals	1,947,771	100.00	528,457	100.00

If hon. members will study that table they will find it very illuminating and it will give them an idea of the small number who are earning sufficient to provide a decent standard of living.

When we come to agriculture, it is even worse. In 1930 the net value of agricultural production in Canada, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, was $758,791,743, and in 1931 it was $538,192,000. Deducting from $758,791,743 the ordinary payments such as taxes, rents, interest on mortgages, repairs and so forth in order to arrive at the farmers' personal income, it is estimated that the amount would be in the neighborhood of $500,000,000 in 1930. In the census year there were 728,623 farms in Canada, so that the average income per farm would be slightly less than $700. This figure would include cash income and the value of products raised on the farm for consumption by the farm population. The farm population other than hired workers was slightly more than three million persons in 1931, so that we have thirty per cent of the Canadian population subsisting on an income of $500,000,000. Those are the figures for 1930, and from that year until 1933 the value of farm production fell tremendously and the farmers' income was reduced by about one-quarter.

There is something terribly wrong with the distribution of our national income when, as disclosed in the income tax returns for 1932, only 203,957 persons out of ten and a half millions, in other words only about two per cent, were able to pay the tax. With all male wage earners getting an average of only $927 per year, female wage earners an average of $560, and with farm income from $500 to $700, and on top of this with 1,250,000 of our population on relief, is it any wonder that conditions are bad?

In the shocking evidence brought out before the price spreads committee we heard of workers getting as low as two and three dollars per week. Here is a clipping from one of our Ottawa newspapers carrying the following headline:

> Skilled men get $3 weekly pay.
> Average wage for 26 furniture plants is placed at $9.94.

The article goes on to say:

> Weekly wages of $3, $4 and $5 to skilled workmen were found to-day when the royal commission on mass buying investigated the furniture industry, which centres in Ontaro and Quebec. Boy apprentices were paid as low as $1.68 a week and women received $4, $5 and $6.

The Ottawa Journal commenting on these facts on June 22, 1934, has this to say in part:

> In considering evidence before the Stevens parliamentary committee, all of us should want to be fair. Fairness, however, must work both ways, and it is hard to read of what was told to the committee on Wednesday without indignation—or shame. Consider the following, concerned with the operations of a boot and shoe factory in Quebec:
>
> It has made substantial profits for four years.
>
> The average weekly wage paid women employees in October, 1933, was $8.75.
> The average for 172 men was $9.39.
> Of the 172 men, 126 were married, with 401 dependents.
> Eighty-two men received less than $6 a week.
>
> In one department only two of 55 girls received the minimum wage, and boys received $2.50 and $3 for a week of 52 hours.
> Business itself, decent business, can't afford sweated labour. More than that, and more important, Canada can't afford it. Cheapness may be important, may be often desirable. It is not as desirable or as important as the maintenance of Canadian citizens in a condition of human dignity and decency.

Last fall we read in the press a story about twelve hundred miners in Hungary who went down into a mine and refused to come up because of the starvation wages that were being paid them. It was reported they were receiving two dollars per week. They decided to die rather than try to live under those conditions. And yet, Mr. Speaker, we have right here in Canada conditions almost as bad. It is enough to make every decent Canadian hang his head in shame. Yet these conditions have been brought about or have come about with highly paid executives in command. I do not say that they are entirely responsible, but they are the men who have been in control, and with no government interference; they have had a free hand. Yet there are those who say: Hands off business and let these terrible conditions continue.

I think it is safe to say that everyone in Canada and indeed in most countries of the world is dependent for his daily happiness not merely upon the protection of his own property rights but also upon some limitation of the property rights of others. There seems to be gradually emerging from generations of trial and error, from hard work and hard thinking, a broad principle which can be soundly applied in the writing of laws needed to protect the public and private interests in business enterprise, the principle that every right carries with it a corresponding obligation, that every freedom carries with it a corresponding servitude. The right to own a cobbler's tools and the freedom to make shoes as and when and where one wished carried with it little social obligation and imposed little servitude. But the right to own the factories that are sufficient and necessary to produce the shoes of a nation and the freedom to control the operation of these factories carries with it a heavy social obligation and a servitude to the nation. No community can long sustain by law the right of any one man or group of men to decide by the wisdom or folly of their arbitrary decisions whether a community shall be well fed, well clothed or well housed, or shall starve and shiver in hovels. Those who seek power must accept obligations, and so as the property under individual control increases, the owner's social responsibility must likewise be increased as a matter of law. Public obligations must be imposed in exact proportion to the public interest. The owner of a ten acre farm or a little business may operate his property, may run his business to suit himself, but the owner of 100,000 acres or a huge factory has power to give a thousand men employment and the opportunity to earn a living, or to deny them that opportunity or grant it only on oppressive terms. The operation of any great business furnishes opportunities for employment to thousands of men, whereby they obtain the wages which are the means to life and liberty, and whereby they produce goods to meet the needs of thousands of consumers. Surely the community has a claim against the owner of such a business for a wholesome use of its property rights which is at least as valid as the claim of the owner of the business for a wholesome protection of his property rights by the community.

We are inclined to boast a great deal about the liberties and freedom of our people, but I say without fear of contradiction that the present system has brought about the most insidious form of slavery that has ever existed among the human race. If any man challenges that statement just let him place himself in the position of some of those lowly paid workers, and then he will very soon realize that he has neither liberty nor freedom. When one sees the poverty of the many on the one side, and the affluence of the few on the other, one sometimes wonders at the patience of the workers. I should like to quote briefly from a speech made before the Canadian Club in Ottawa last December by the Hon. W. D. Herridge, Minister to Washington. He said in part:

> Are those who are profiting entitled to the same tags of virtue and innocence as those who are suffering? Are the former beyond all criticism and indeed like sweepstake winners, to be congratulated as the group arbitrarily chosen by providence to be the beneficiaries of a system which just won't work in any other way?

This total disregard for human welfare, this blind grasping for huge profits, belongs to an age which is passing and it cannot pass too soon. We are beginning to realize that we are all in the boat together and profiteers will not be tolerated much longer. They should not be permitted to scuttle the welfare of whole large groups and play havoc with honest business. A great deal has been said about respect for the constitution, and I should like to quote John Bright as follows:—

> I believe there is no permanent greatness to a nation except it be based upon morality. I do not care for military greatness or military renown. I care for the condition of the people among whom I live. There is no man in England who is less likely to speak irreverently of the crown and the monarchy of England than I am; but crowns, coronets, mitres, military display, the pomp of war, wide colonies and a huge empire, are, in my view, all trifles light as air and not worth considering, unless with them you can have a fair share of comfort, contentment and happiness among the great body of the people. The nation in every country dwells in the cottage: and unless the light of your constitution can shine there, unless the beauty of your legislation and the excellence of your statesmanship are impressed there on the feelings and condition of the people, rely upon it you have yet to learn the duties of government.

We all know that a fair share of happiness and contentment does not exist among the masses of the people. How can it with the wages received by ninety per cent of the people? I should like to make a short quotation from a report presented to the League of Nations, as follows:—

> Millions of children are the innocent victims of the world's economic depression.
> The general lowering of the standard of living "from which millions of families totally or wholly unemployed have been suffering for a long time past, constitutes a serious danger to public health," states the report presented by the international labour office to the child welfare committee of the league of nations.

And again:

> The dangers to which the health of the children of the unemployed are exposed are lack of clothing and bodily care, deterioration of housing conditions and underfeeding.

And again:

> As a whole, the information collected by the international labour office shows that the economic crisis has produced almost everywhere such a reduction in conditions of life that there is grave danger that millions of children will not be able to grow up in normal conditions of health.

Every hon. member should be impressed with the realization that many of the rising generation is being undernourished; it is facing a handicap which will possibly never be overcome in this life. These matters should give us grave concern. Why does this condition exist? Is it that we have not the resources, the man power or the plant and equipment to supply all with abundance? Of course not. Our resources have only been scratched, we have over half a million idle men pleading for work and a chance to live. Our plant and equipment is working less than fifty per cent of full time. A headline which appeared in one of the Ottawa papers last winter, commenting on the price spreads report, stated that the Canadian milling plants could supply the entire world.

Mr. YOUNG: That is wrong.

Mr. LUCAS: I was simply quoting a headline which appeared in one of the papers. If the hon. member believes it is not right he can take that up with the newspaper. I am told that if the shoe factories in the United States worked full time for seventeen days they could manufacture sufficient shoes to last the whole nation for one year. It is general knowledge that the productive capacity of our plant and equipment is far beyond the ability of our people to purchase. On the one side we have a tremendous capacity to produce; on the other side we have a tremendous unfilled demand, but there is a barrier between. We have the resources, we have the man power, we have the plant and equipment and we have the demand, but we have not the purchasing power with which to make the exchange and in my opinion until we deal with this matter our efforts to bring about an improvement will be of little avail.

Surely no one will say that he is satisfied with present conditions. The committee dealing with price spreads considered many of these problems and brought in a report recommending that certain rules should be laid down for the governing of business and that legislation should be introduced to see that the game was played according to those rules. The question is whether we are going to see that that end is brought about, or are we going to continue the unfair rules which exist to-day. It is a onesided game which enables 64,434 persons out of a population of over 10,500,000 to obtain some or all of the luxuries of life while the rest have difficulty in obtaining the necessities. These figures are taken from the income tax returns and show the number paying tax on incomes of $3,000 and over. Business and industry have had a free hand and having failed to make proper rules it then becomes the duty of the state to interfere and endeavour to evolve rules which will be fair and satisfactory to all concerned. But if we are to make these rules we should have a complete understanding of the game.

While I have no criticism to offer of the investigations carried on by the price spreads commission as far as they went—in fact I believe they were restricted by the reference—I claim that they left untouched the most important problem of all, that of finance and its relation to our economic life. I would make this suggestion: No matter which party may be in power after the next election, one of the first things which should be undertaken is a full and complete investigation into our whole financial system. There is no question about our power to deal with such a matter in this parliament. Last year a group of prominent business men appealed through the London Times for such an investigation in Great Britain. The London Chamber of Commerce, the Southampton Chamber of Commerce, the British Rotary and other bodies are on record as asking for a change in the financial system of Great Britain. In my humble opinion until something is done to bring the factor of consumption more nearly into balance with our greatly increased factor of production, our efforts to improve conditions will be of little avail. The greatest thing we can do to-day to help industry is to give it a chance to produce. The producer is being strangled simply becouse he cannot sell his goods, the very goods which the people would buy if they had incomes large enough to do so. Everywhere people are beginning to realize that there is something wrong with our system of distribution. The fundamental principle of finance is to facilitate the distribution of goods; it superseded the barter system. We all know why we have an agricultural industry; we all know why we have developed an industrial system; we know why we have a transportation system. But why have we built up a financial system? In my opinion it is simply to facilitate the distribution of goods among the people, and apparently it is not functioning properly. Henry Ford put the situation very well when he said:

> Although money is supposed to represent the real wealth of the world, there is always more wealth than there is money and real wealth is often compelled to wait upon money thus leading to that most paradoxical situation, a world filled with wealth but suffering want. The poverty of the world is seldom caused by lack of goods but by a money stringency.

We hear a great deal about sound money and one is inclined to ask, what is sound money. I think it reasonable to say that a sound money system is a system that works, a system that makes effective the necessary demands for goods. Our present money system is therefore anything but sound. In this connection I might quote the following extract from the London Times under the heading Money System's Disease:

> Money System's Disease
> The Times (London)
>
> There are millions of decent, hard-working people and their children in the richest countries in the world, including ours, who are living below the poverty-line at this moment. Why? Is it because of scarcity? No. It is because of over-abundance. That is the supreme paradox of our generation. We are producing too many and too much of the commodities that these poor people need, therefore they must go without. The prolonged flood of good things has created a drought.
> There is too much corn, too much beef, mutton, bacon, butter, and in order to cure it millions of deserving people have to be kept on half rations. We are turning out too many clothes, too many boots, so little children in the distressed areas must go in rags and tatters until this overproduction is stopped—of the very things for lack of which they are shivering in this damp climate.

Certainly we in Canada have an abundance of practically everything we need. Our labour is of a high standard; our machinery is of the best; our electrical and other power now developed—and that development is only in its infancy—is equal to one hundred and fifty million slave men ready and willing to do our bidding. No one will say that we have not sufficient transportation; our banks are efficient and adequate and our retailing equipment is more than adequate. Thus purchasing power in the pockets of the people is the only thing lacking. This can be secured not by using the printing press but by a scientific credit plan to balance consumption more nearly with our production. This can be secured by a national credit account based, not on a gold reserve but on the country's capacity to produce. Just as slavery lifted the burden of toil from the backs of the free citizens of olden days, so should the power-driven machine do now. The machine is now our slave instead of the human slave as in olden times.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Mr. BAKER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He quoted something in which reference was made to children going without shoes, and shivering. I hope there are no such cases in Canada. Certainly there are none that I know of. If there are, they should be reported to the government.

Mr. LUCAS: Unfortunately I had to go to hospital during the past winter and while there I discussed this problem with many of those in authority, and I was told that in the public wards there were very many children and older people as well who came in undernourished. There are many cases in Canada where people are suffering for lack of proper nourishment.

On motion of Mr. Heaps the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 12, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

> That the name of Mr. Gray be substituted for that of Mr. Urquhart on the select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

THIRD REPORT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina) presented the third report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations, as follows:

Your committee has held two sessions and has heard statements from eleven persons with respect to the subject matter of the resolution referred to it for consideration under an order of the House of Commons, dated January 31, 1935, which resolution reads as follows:

"Resolved that in the opinion of this house the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act should apply to blind people over forty years of age."

The committee has under instructions of the House of Commons reconsidered the said resolution, together with the instructions of the House of Commons—

"That they have power to amend their second report by recommending that the house pass a special blind act applicable to the nine provinces of the dominion and providing pensions for the blind over forty years of age on the same basis as the Old Age Pensions Act."

As persons seventy years of age and over, whether blind or not, fall within the application of the Old Age Pensions Act in its present form, your committee considered the position of the blind persons between the ages of forty and seventy.

Evidence submitted to the committee indicated that the Old Age Pensions Act is in force in only seven provinces out of nine and its provisions therefore when amended will not affect blind persons living in the remaining two provinces unless these provinces subsequently adopt the Old Age Pensions Act or the proposed amendments thereto.

It is also indicated that records of organizations interested in the blind place the number of the blind between forty and seventy years of age at 3,016 in the whole nine provinces. After making fair deductions, it was stated that approximately 2,600 persons would be affected by legislation requested by the said resolution. These figures are sufficiently in harmony with census returns to be considered reasonably accurate.

The estimated expenditure by the dominion government on the present basis of contribution, occasioned by the proposed legislation, if the above figures are accurate and allowing the maximum of $240 per person per annum, would be under $500,000 apart from administration expenses and the expense for the present fiscal year would probably be less than $125,000.

The committee regrets that an amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act may result in lack of assistance in those provinces that may not feel inclined to adopt appropriate legislation to bring such amendment into effect within their respective borders.

In view of all the circumstances, including possible constitutional difficulties, the committee recommends that the government of Canada consider amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act in such manner as to make that act apply to blind persons of forty years of age and over. The committee are of the opinion that in drafting such amendment provision should be made whereby any province might by appropriate provincial action, provide for the operation of that portion of the act dealing with pensions for the blind without the necessity of providing for the operation of the whole act within such province.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

F. W. Turnbull,
Chairman.

Mr. TURNBULL moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the house—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I would like this report to be printed in the votes and proceedings, before it is moved, so that we may know exactly what we are voting upon.

RADIO BROADCASTING

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 99, respecting radio broadcasting.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Explain.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 100, to amend the Post Office Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill stands in my name by reason of the fact that it is a legal and somewhat technical matter and involves a very slight change in section 77 of the present Post Office Act.

Mr. POULIOT: Is it too technical for the Postmaster General?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section to which I have referred provides that mail contracts may be renewed. The provision in the act is that they may be renewed on conditions advantageous to the public interests for a further term not exceeding four years. This has been the law of the land for many years, and the interpretation placed upon it has been that it enabled the Post Office Department to renew not for a further "term" but for further "terms,"—succeeding terms of four years. That has been the practice for thirty or forty years. The auditor general has pointed out that all the act authorizes is one renewal for a further term of years. This bill is to correct that condition, by adding the words "term or terms."

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is nothing very technical in that.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*TRANSLATIONS OF PUBLICATIONS

Mr. FAFARD:

Does the government intend to have a French translation made of bulletin No. 72: "Birds of Canada," by P. A. Taverner, also memoranda numbers 126: "Botanical Exploration of the North Shore of the St. Lawrence," by H. St. John; 146: "Retreat of the Last Ice-Sheet in Eastern Canada," by Ernest Antevs; 154: "Geology of Anticosti Island," by Twenhofel; 162: "Peat Bogs in Southeastern Canada," by Vaino Auer?

Mr. CAHAN: With respect to this question, the translations of the various bulletins issued by various government departments is a matter entirely within the control of the officers of those departments. I have made inquiries and I learn that no instructions have been given to the bureau for translations to make translations of these documents. Therefore, so far they have not been translated, published or laid upon the table of the house. However, it is a matter entirely within the discretion of the department which issues the bulletins, and if there are any special bulletins which it is desired should be translated into French and published I have no doubt the head of the department in question will upon request see that such translations are made.

8. Is the authority under which rebates are paid out of the consolidated revenue fund based upon section 12 of the Customs Tariff Act?

LOAN OF $750,000,000

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil) (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee tomorrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars, for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with I desire to make a statement on behalf of the Minister of Finance, who has been called away owing to the illness of his mother. He would have on Monday made the following statement: That in reply to the question of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) of June 5, what he had in mind was to emphasize the overriding power of parliament in connection with any trade agreements, and that anything in the nature of a formal agreement should be submitted for ratification or approval by parliament. In making that statement, however, he did not have it in mind to imply that the putting into effect of any reductions of rates agreed upon would require to be deferred until such approval had been given, or to impair in any way the full operative force of section 11 of the Customs Act, with which he was then dealing.

[Mr. Fontaine.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): What the right hon. the Prime Minister has just said would indicate that he has in his mind the subject to which I am about to refer. On May 20 I asked my right hon. friend whether negotiations were still continuing between the United States and Canada with respect to a trade agreement, and whether he contemplated the probability of submitting an agreement to the house before prorogation. My right hon. friend replied as follows:

I can only say that negotiations with Washington have been continuing, but it would be idle for me to express any view at the moment as to whether or not they would crystallize in the form of an agreement within the period of time which will elapse between now and the rising of the house. If, as and when I am informed so as to be able to give an answer to that question, I shall be glad to give such information to the house.

I notice that yesterday, speaking in another place, the leader of the government in the Senate said that a good reciprocity treaty can be made. It is therefore apparent, if the hon. leader of the government in the Senate was speaking as a minister of the crown, which no doubt he was, that the government is now in a position to say that it has found it possible to make an agreement. What I would like to ask the Prime Minister is whether such is the case, and if so whether matters could not be so arranged as to have the agreement placed before this parliament before it rises, in order that it may receive consideration here, and that if, as stated, it is a good agreement, it may receive approval, and the public thereby have the advantage at the earliest possible moment of any benefits that a reciprocal trade agreement may give.

Mr. BENNETT: I very much regret that the right hon. gentleman has placed a wrong construction on a head note which he read in the newspaper. It is not correct to say that any agreement has been negotiated with the United States.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon, I was not referring to a head note in the newspaper. I was quoting from the Senate Hansard of yesterday, page 415, in the report of a speech by the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen the words "a good reciprocity treaty can be made."

Mr. BENNETT: What the leader of the Senate was dealing with was not that there was an agreement made, but that Canada was desirous of making a good agreement if a good agreement can be made, which is an altogether different thing. No agreement has been made. Had any agreement been made I would have informed this house. Negotiations will be proceeded with next week, I believe the time has been fixed at which the discussions will be resumed. The only reason I made the statement on behalf of the Minister of Finance was in order to remove any doubt as to the desirability of our being able to act under section 11 if the occasion should arise. I quite share the right hon. gentleman's view that if it were possible to have an agreement arrived at between now and the rising of this house it would be desirable, and I assure him that if one were arrived at it would be submitted to parliament at once without any delay at all.

FARNHAM, QUE., POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): I read in the paper to-day this article:

> Tenders tabled for post office
> Privately invited bids received June 6, for Farnham, Que., project.

I understand this has to do with the erection of a post office building at Farnham. It proceeds to say:

> Tenders from a selected list of contractors were received by private invitation until Thursday, June 6.

I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) how it is that tenders were invited privately, also the names of the privileged few who were invited to tender.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): I shall inquire into the matter and give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

THE CONSERVATIVE IDEA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government if there is really a conservative idea and, if so, what is it, and if there is more than one?

Mr. F. J. LAFLECHE (Richmond-Wolfe) (Translation): The hon. member for Témiscouata should first have an idea himself.

REHABILITATION OF DROUGHT AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) with respect to the water conservation committee of the west. What are their present activities and what are their future plans, if any?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): During the last month a careful survey has been under way of all applications received for consideration of certain localities with reference to the conservation of water. This is being done by engineers well and specially qualified to do it in cooperation with the three western provinces. There have also been appointed other staffs that will be required to proceed with the work without delay.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): May I ask if that survey is confined to the drought area?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): First, yes.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Is it possible that this plan of investigation in regard to water conservation will be extended to all areas in those provinces instead of just the dried-out areas?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The drought area will receive first consideration.

CANADIAN GRAIN BOARD

PURCHASE, STORAGE AND MARKETING OF WHEAT AND OTHER GRAINS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 98, to provide for the constitution and powers of the Canadian Grain Board.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the second reading of this bill I am not unaware of the public interest in its contents, nor yet of the fact that complaints have been made that the matter might have been dealt with at an earlier time in the session. Before I was ill I had placed upon the order paper the resolution which was adopted the other day, and on my return, but for the illness of Mr. McFarland, who is still confined to the hospital, the matter would have been proceeded with more promptly. I think I should say that in fairness to the house.

I indicated a few days ago that unquestionably the wheat problem is the most important problem that concerns the Canadian people. Canada is the largest exporter of wheat in the world. She is not the largest producer of wheat, production is larger in the United States and larger in Russia. In the latter country production has reached 1,000,000,000 bushels per annum, and in the United States the average has exceeded 800,000,000 bushels until quite recently. We have not reached a production of 600,000,000 bushels of wheat in this country in any one year as yet. We are the largest exporters and as such we are concerned as to the price at which our product may be sold. Need I remind the house that the reason wheat plays so large a part in the economic life of Canada is that it is a product which is more readily converted into new wealth than any other resource upon which we can have reliance to take care of our adverse trade balances and to increase the purchasing power of our people. I need hardly remind the house that when there is a favourable crop with a favourable market the railways have traffic and that when the railways have traffic employment on the railways is larger than it otherwise would be. I need hardly remind the house that in eastern Canada, whether it be Quebec, Ontario or any part of the country, the ability of the industrial population to produce in their factories and mills the requirements of the population west of the lakes depends entirely upon our ability to market our crop of wheat. If the crop is slight and the demand is limited there is no purchasing power on the part of the population west of the lakes to enable them to purchase the goods produced in the factories and mills of eastern Canada. There is no constituency represented in this house, except possibly the Yukon, which is not directly affected by the production and sale of wheat in western Canada.

For the last thirty-seven or thirty-eight years it has been my privilege to make western Canada my home and I have seen the development of that country from small things to large things in the way of wheat production. I have seen great areas which did not produce wheat, produce wheat in large quantities and I regret to say that I have also seen great areas in which wheat was produced, no longer capable of producing anything. Drought with the consequent movement of the soil by the wind has made it impossible for crops to be produced and like many other hon. members I have seen dust piled like snowbanks against the fences along the dividing lines between the farms. This is the condition which prevails in a country which at one time produced more bushels of wheat per acre than almost any other part of the world. I repeat that there is no part of this country which is not affected by the production and sale of wheat.

For these reasons we, perhaps more than most countries, are vitally concerned in a reasonable price being secured for our product. When I say a reasonable price I but reflect the views which have been expressed by every economic council which has met since the world war. The view has been that commodity prices should be increased. This view has been expressed at great economic gatherings of world wide extent, it has been expressed by the League of Nations and it has been expressed in this house, too frequently for me to refer again to it. Canada has a responsibility which is not limited to the Canadian producer. As I said a moment ago, Canada is the largest exporter of wheat in the world while Great Britain is the largest buyer of wheat. May I say what is possibly known to many that in the four crop years ended August last, out of every 100 bushels of wheat which, in the form of wheat or manufactured into flour, went into the markets of the world, 35 bushels came from Canada, 20 bushels came from Australia, 20 bushels from Argentina, 8 bushels from Russia, 10 bushels from the United States and 7 bushels from the Balkans and other countries. These figures should have the effect of making every hon. member realize that during the last four seasons for which we have a record Canada has sold nearly as much wheat as Argentina and Australia together.

I repeat that Canada is concerned about the price structure. Canada has a duty not only to its own farmers but also to the smaller countries which are marketing wheat to see to it that a lead is given with respect to the prices which may be received for a commodity of such importance to the world. Wheat is the most important commodity in the export business of Canada. I do not like to repeat, but there is no constituency in this country outside of the Yukon which is not affected directly or indirectly by the sale of our wheat. Under these circumstances let us approach this problem in the sense to which I have directed attention, namely, as a problem which affects not only Canada but all the other wheat producing countries, as a problem which is not only a factor in international trade but also a vital factor in determining our international balances.

As I proceed this afternoon I shall endeavour to point out what has been done during the last four years. I shall offer this record to the house without apology or excuse and with some sense of justifiable pride for the results which have been obtained. I look back upon this record with some degree of pride as paying some part of the debt which I owe to western Canada. I intend to put upon the records of this house figures which will tell their own story, figures which will indicate just as clearly as figures can the history of the dealings in wheat during the last four or five years. It has been said that we should not be concerned as to what the price of wheat is and I shall show presently that there are public men in this country to whom the people have sometimes listened who say: Let wheat go to any price, we are not concerned about it. There are others, and I shall deal with them also, who say that the difficulty is not over-production but under consumption. I shall be glad to show that during the years when we had the largest crop, when the world's carry over was the greatest and when the price was lowest, there was less consumption than during the preceding years. These are facts, not fancies and it is time attention was directed to these matters. I shall later consider the observations which have been made on various platforms of this country and which in many instances were unworthy of the public men who made them. They seem to have had no regard for the injury they might be doing their country by making misstatements which if made by those who have to transact business would constitute actionable misrepresentation. These are facts to which I direct the attention of the house this afternoon.

I repeat that there devolves upon this country a responsibility as the greatest wheat exporting nation in the world not only to discharge its duty to its own citizens but so to measure its international responsibilities with other nations of the world which are wheat producers that we may be regarded as giving them assistance in their endeavours—to do what? To raise the price of commodities and thus bring about some measure of rehabilitation and recovery in the world. This is what I submit to this house. I should like to give the house the number of acres which have been sown to wheat in Canada since 1920. They are:

1920	18,232,374
1921	23,261,224
1922	22,423,000
1923	21,886,000
1924	22,056,000
1925	20,790,000
1926	22,896,000
1927	22,460,000
1928	24,119,000
1929	25,255,000
1930	25,584,939
1931	26,355,136
1932	27,182,100
1933	25,991,100
1934	23,985,000
1935 (estimated)	23,344,900

I next desire to place on Hansard the record of the production, in bushels, of wheat in this country, which includes not only the west but also the east, since 1920:

Wheat Production and Value

Years	Production (bushels)
1920	263,189,000
1921	300,858,000
1922	399,786,000
1923	474,199,000
1924	262,097,000
1925	395,475,000
1926	407,136,000
1927	479,665,000
1928	566,726,000
1929	304,520,000
1930	420,672,000
1931	321,325,000
1932	443,061,000
1933	281,892,000
1934	275,849,000

The value of that crop, as indicated by the figures accumulated in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, is as follows, beginning with 1920:

Years	Value
1920	$ 427,357,300
1921	242,936,000
1922	339,419,000
1923	316,994,700
1924	320,362,000
1925	487,736,200
1926	442,221,000
1927	477,791,000
1928	451,235,000
1929	319,715,000
1930	204,693,000
1931	123,550,000
1932	154,760,000
1933	136,958,000
1934	163,972,000

The wheat that we produce is used for the following purposes; (a) for seed purposes in the succeeding year; (b) for domestic purposes; (c) for the production of flour for export; and (d) for export as grain.

For the purposes of making computations it is usual to add flour on the basis of the quantity used in the production of the barrels of flour exported. I will now give the house exports of wheat in the form of grain and wheat utilized in the production of flour for the crop years from 1919-20 up to date. I need only point out that the crop year ends on the 31st day of July in each year, but for purposes of dealing with problems of this kind —it is scarcely necessary to say this—an exact date can hardly be fixed. The end of the crop year is when the crop becomes available on the markets of the country, and therefore we deal in crop years:

Exports of Wheat and Wheat Flour for the Crop Years 1919-20 to 1933-34

	Total export
	Quantity	Value
Crop years	Bushels	$
1919-20	89,003,023
1920-21	167,163,305
1921-22	194,003,408	Not
1922-23	279,492,557	available
1923-24	332,146,980
1924-25	192,721,772

Exports of Wheat and Wheat Flour for the Crop Years 1919-20 to 1933-34—Con.

Crop years	Total export Quantity Bushels	Value $
1925-26	324,592,024	475,023,624
1926-27	292,880,996	409,654,715
1927-28	332,963,284	441,068,200
1928-29	407,564,186	451,820,887
1929-30	186,267,212	227,317,090
1930-31	258,693,887	188,421,364
1931-32	207,029,559	128,117,128
1932-33	264,304,328	151,321,746
1933-34	194,779,876	140,488,606
1934-35 (end of May)	146,387,083	121,178,831

We have not available the prices received for this wheat up until the beginning of the year 1925-26, but from that time on we have a complete record of what was received in the way of new wealth by the Canadian people through the export of wheat in the form of grain and flour, and those figures are given in the foregoing table. That gives the history of the production and of the new wealth received by this country from the sale of wheat. I need hardly remind this house, if it has followed me in what I have said up to the moment, that having regard to the purposes for which we utilize wheat, to the size of crops to which I have referred, and to the statement as to quantity exported, that there was a very large carryover. The word "carryover" is used therefore to indicate that quantity of wheat which has not found a market during the crop year. These figures are interesting; for part of our crop that was carried over was in the United States, some of it in elevators, some of it in ships. But it had been included in the export figures when it cleared from Canada, so that while it appears as part of our exportable surplus, it must also be regarded as part of the carry-over, because until wheat enters into consumption it of course is not off the market. For instance, all the crop in this country might be shipped to Europe, but until such time as it had been consumed it would always overhang the market as something that has to be taken care of before additional markets would be available. The carry-overs for the different years from 1920 are as follows:

Year ending August 31:	Canada bushels	United States bushels	Total bushels
1920	9,847,591	.....	9,847,591
1921	13,727,088	299,037	14,026,125
1922	19,462,664	1,558,092	21,020,756
1923	11,749,995	483,324	12,233,319

In 1924 the increase was perceptible:

Year ending July 31:	Canada bushels	United States bushels	Total bushels
1924	41,118,536	2,958,084	44,076,620
1925	25,454,635	3,027,284	28,481,919
1926	34,817,757	3,664,179	38,481,936

May I direct attention to the following years:

	Canada bushels	United States bushels	Total bushels
1927	47,839,285	4,835,148	52,676,433
1928	77,626,071	13,604,780	91,230,851
1929	104,383,221	22,604,398	126,988,619

Now we come to 1930, which was the last year in which my hon. friends opposite were in office:

	Canada bushels	United States bushels	Total bushels
1930	111,094,912	16,065,242	127,160,154

Notwithstanding the fact that we carried over these large quantities, we were growing, as I have indicated to the house, increased quantities of wheat. In spite of the fact that this country harvested so large a quantity, the total carry-over in 1931 had risen to only the following:

	Canada bushels	United States bushels	Total bushels
1931	134,078,963	6,798,312	140,877,275

Or slightly over 13,000,000 bushels more than the year before. In 1932, when hon. members will recall we had the third largest crop in our history, the carry-over was as follows:

	Canada bushels	United States bushels	Total bushels
1932	131,844,806	5,888,255	137,733,061

Or slightly more than 3,000,000 bushels less than the year before, notwithstanding the fact that we had the third largest crop in the history of Canada. In 1933 the carry-over however reflected the large sales of the year before with the additional crop of 1933:

	Canada bushels	United States bushels	Total bushels
1933	211,740,188	7,688,210	219,428,398

Or something over 81,000,000 bushels more than the preceding year, for reasons that I shall presently discuss.

	Canada bushels	United States bushels	Total bushels
1934	193,990,281	9,954,252	203,944,533

Or approximately 16,000,000 bushels less than the preceding year. Those are the facts as disclosed by the records with respect to the history of carry-overs in this country from August 31, 1920, to the end of the last crop year.

In order that the house may have all the information it desires, I shall give the average price, recalling to the attention of hon. members the fact that immediately after the war, for reasons that need not be discussed, but largely because of the revolutions in Russia, there was a steady, large price for wheat. These figures are on the basis of Fort William and Port Arthur for number one northern Manitoba wheat:

Crop year:	Average price per bushel
1919-20	$2 17.5
1920-21	1 99.3
1921-22	1 29.7
1922-23	1 10.5
1923-24	1 07.1
1924-25

To which reference will be made later.

Crop year:	Average price per bushel
1925-26	$1 51.2
1926-27	1 46.3
1927-28	1 46.3
1928-29	1 24
1929-30	1 24
1930-31	64.2
1931-32	59.8
1932-33	54.3
1933-34	68.1

From the beginning of the present crop year to the end of April, 1935, the price was 82 cents, for reasons that I suppose are known to all members of the house.

That is the story with respect to wheat production, wheat exports, wheat carry-overs, wheat prices and new wealth derived from wheat by this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has not given an estimate of the carry-over for the present year. Will he give that?

Mr. BENNETT: I gave it. I am not making estimates to-day; I am talking about facts. I am not giving estimates at all; I think the time has come to deal with facts and not fancies and I am dealing with facts. Before I resume my seat, I am going to discuss some of the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Can my right hon. friend give the carry-over for the present crop year?

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot. Until the end of the crop year, how can I?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If he cannot give us the facts, can he give us an estimate?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not propose to make estimates at the moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the situation at the present time?

Mr. BENNETT: I will discuss that presently. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) need not be the least bit exercised; he will get all the facts he wants before he is through with this matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to the Prime Minister that if he cannot give the facts or an estimate, at least he could give a courteous answer. Mine was not an interruption; it was an effort to get a complete statement, which the Prime Minister said he would give.

Mr. BENNETT: If hon. gentlemen interrupt they violate the rules of this house. Under present conditions I have a right to make my statement, and that is what I propose to do.

The next point to which I desire to direct attention is one to which I doubt whether sufficient importance has been given. I refer to the circumstances over which this country has had no control. There are those in this house who on the public platform have talked about tariffs abroad as though they were something over which Canada could have control. Some months ago the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) delivered a speech down in Quebec in which he referred to the fact that here was France willing to sell wine and buy Canadian wheat, and we were not doing our duty in the premises. Let me ask the hon. member this: Did he at any time when he was negotiating a treaty with France say a word about wheat at all, in any shape or form, when he was giving France preferences? Did he stipulate for anything then, when he might have done so in respect to wheat?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We were selling our wheat at the time.

Mr. BENNETT: We were not; that is exactly the point. In any case, it is the duty of a statesman to look a bit into the future in respect to these matters.

Now let us see why there has been a diminution in the sale of our wheat abroad; let us look at it frankly. What is the reason? It is because the nations of the world that formerly bought wheat have desired to become self-sustaining communities. They were afraid of war; they were afraid of the submarine menace with respect to the transshipment of wheat and they were afraid of the price they had to pay during the war for wheat. There on the one hand you have the development of nationalism to the extent that the nations desired to become self-sufficient and self-sustaining with respect to wheat, and on the other hand you have bonuses, tariffs, quotas and every device imaginable being relied upon for the purpose of enabling the countries of the world that did buy wheat no longer to find it necessary to do so. When I was sitting in the seat now occupied by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) I pointed out that during his régime every nation of the world made it more difficult for Canada to sell her products than at any time in the history of this country, and I repeat that statement. What is more, that was admitted by the then Minister of Finance with respect to wheat and other commodities about which I shall speak presently.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding I propose to place upon Hansard the changes that have taken place, country by country, and the dates on which they took place, with respect to the sale of Canadian wheat. First I take France. In June, 1928, the French franc was stabilized at 3·92 gold cents, so we have converted the figures into Canadian terms on that basis, not upon the actual exchange, which perhaps would not be fair, but upon the basis of the steady rate that has prevailed, because the duties would be higher if we dealt with them otherwise. Conversions prior to June, 1928, are made at the approximate prevailing rate of exchange, because the French franc was not stabilized until that time. These are the figures in regard to wheat:

Commodity	Date of change	General Tariff	Minimum Tariff	Approximate Equivalent of Rate to Canada
Wheat	Rate in 1921	Same as minimum	14 frs. 100 kgs. (C)	29c. bu.
	Jan. 7, 1924	Same as minimum	7 frs. 100 kgs. (C)	11c. bu.
	Aug. 1, 1924	Same as minimum	14 frs. 100 kgs. (C)	20c. bu.

(C) indicates the rate applied to imports from Canada.

On October 1, 1934, the rates were again lowered to 85 cents a bushel, where they remain at the present time xcept that since August 10, 1934, these rates have been increased by four per cent of the duty.

There is the story with respect to France; there is the limitation placed upon our ability to sell wheat in that country. When hon. gentlemen opposite left office the rate was 85 cents a bushel; to-day the rate is the same, 85 cents a bushel, plus four per cent in additional surtaxes that have been placed on all commodities since 1934.

Now let us take Germany, because we have heard much talk about that country. The reichsmark at par equals 23·82 gold cents and the conversions are made on that basis; if they were made at the prevailing rates of exchange at different dates the rates, as expressed in Canadian cents, of course would be much higher. For instance, the gold reichsmark now is worth about 40 cents in Canadian money, and of course it is known to this house that 100 kilograms equal 220·4 pounds. Wheat, except where the rates are modified by special regulations, in 1921 entered under the rate of seven reichsmarks per 100 kilograms, or 42 cents a bushel. That rate has varied as follows:

Commodity	Date of Change	Rate to Canada	Conversions at par
Wheat	Rate in 1921	7 Rm. 100 kilogs	42 cts. bush.
(except where rate modified by special regulations).	May 1, 1922	Free	Free
	Sept. 1, 1925	3·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	23 cts. bush.
	Aug. 1, 1926	5 Rm. 100 kilogs	39 cts. bush.
	July 10, 1929	7·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	49 cts. bush.
	Jan. 10, 1930	9·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	62 cts. bush.
	Mar. 27, 1930	12 Rm. 100 kilogs	78 cts. bush.
	April 25, 1930	15 Rm. 100 kilogs	98 cts. bush.
	Sept. 28, 1930	18·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	$1.20 bush.
	Oct. 26, 1930	25 Rm. 100 kilogs	$1.62 bush.
	Oct. 22, 1934	35 Rm. 100 kilogs	$2.27 bush.
	Rate at present	35 Rm. 100 kilogs	$2.27 bush.

And that is the rate prevailing to-day. I need hardly point out to this house that any rate in excess of 40 cents per bushel is a prohibitive rate, and that when you get to a rate of 75 cents, 80 cents or 90 cents it does not make any difference whether it is 90 cents or $2. The table continues:

Commodity	Date of Change	Rate to Canada	Conversions at par
Wheat flour	Rate in 1921	18·75 Rm. 100 kilogs	$2.03 100 lbs.
	May 1, 1922	Free	Free
	Sept. 1, 1925	8 Rm. 100 kilogs	86 cts. 100 lbs.
	Aug. 1, 1926	10 Rm. 100 kilogs	$1.08 100 lbs.
	April 1, 1927	12·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	$1.35 100 lbs.
	July 10, 1929	14·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	$1.57 100 lbs.
	Feb. 11, 1930	18·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	$2.00 100 lbs.
	Mar. 29, 1930	23·25 Rm. 100 kilogs	$2.50 100 lbs.
	April 25, 1930	31·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	$3.41 100 lbs.
	Sept. 28, 1930	38·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	$4.17 100 lbs.
	Oct. 26, 1930	51·50 Rm. 100 kilogs	$5.58 100 lbs.
	June 10, 1931	43·16 Rm. 100 kilogs	$4.67 100 lbs.
	Oct. 22, 1934	59·80 Rm. 100 kilogs	$6.48 100 lbs.
	Rate at present	59·80 Rm. 100 kilogs	$6.48 100 lbs.

I need hardly say that any of those rates are prohibitive. I now turn to Italy, and a discussion of the tariff changes on wheat and wheat flour. The gold lira at par equals 19·3 gold cents in Canadian money. The paper lira at par equals 5·26 gold cents in Canadian money. Conversions are all made at the aforementioned gold equivalents of the Italian currency. If the conversions were made at the rates of exchange prevailing at the different dates the rate of duty as expressed in Canadian money would be higher. For example the present value of the gold lira in Canadian money is approximately 30 Canadian cents and the value of the paper lira about 8 Canadian cents. The table is as follows:

Commodity	Date of Change	Rate to Canada	Conversion at Par
Wheat	Rate in 1921	Free	Free.
	July 24, 1925	7·50 gold lire 100 kgs	39c. bush.

In the United States market we had the Underwood tariff from 1913 to 1921, when it will be recalled we had reciprocity with respect to wheat. Then there was the emergency tariff from 1921 to 1922, which increased the rate. Then the Fordney-McCumber tariff from 1922 to 1930, and the Hawley-Smoot tariff from 1930 to date.

The following table will indicate the United States tariff rates.

——	Underwood	Emergency	Fordney-McCumber	Hawley-Smoot
Wheat	10 cts. per bush	35 cts. per bush	30 cts. to 42 cts. per bush.	42 cts. per bush.
Barley	15 cts. per bush	15 cts. per bush	20 cts. per bush	20 cents per bush.
Rye	Free	Free	15 cts. per bush	15 cts. per bush.

Other items, namely cattle, sheep, butter and cream may be dealt with on another occasion. That is the action taken by those countries. But in Great Britain what action was taken? In Great Britain the British government by its Wheat Act has guaranteed the wheat producer of the United Kingdom a price of approximately $1.25 per bushel. And they have provided a maximum production of 27,000,000 long hundred weight, which is substantially 50,000,000 bushels. That act came into force last year, namely in the year 1933-34. It has been renewed this year, and according to figures given out a few days ago the sum paid to the farmers of the United Kingdom under that act last year amounted to £7,178,500. That is pounds, remember. In Australia in 1932 a bonus of £2,000,000 was paid to the farmers. In 1933 a bonus of £3,000,000 was paid to the farmers on the 1933 crop. In 1934 a bonus of £4,000,000 is being paid, as recommended by the royal commission which inquired into the wheat industry of Australia.

Those are the facts with respect to these countries, but I have not yet mentioned the Argentine. In the Argentine the government operates the sale of wheat on the following basis. Of the 1933 crop—the figures for 1934 are not yet available—they purchased 144,685,000 bushels. They paid the farmer 182,183,290 paper pesos, and the wheat sold for 176,402,264 paper pesos, leaving a loss of 5,781,025 paper pesos. The administration costs were 3,018,975 paper pesos, making a total loss of about 8,800,000 paper pesos, which in our money at the present time at the Montreal exchange would be about $2,200,000.

I have mentioned this matter in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to what has been happening in the world in connection with restrictions placed upon the sale of our wheat in the first place, and in the second place the stimulus which has been given for the production of wheat in other parts of the world,—whether it be by bonus or otherwise.

I have prepared further figures showing the development of government control in the marketing of wheat. Whether or not it is desirable to take too much time of the house in a discussion of this point, I cannot say. However they will be available if later they are desired. It is sufficient to say now that they make perfectly clear that what has happened during the last few years has been, first, a restriction against the importation of wheat and, secondly, a stimulus on the part of wheat producing countries given to their own farmers by way of bonuses and other payments, for the purpose of developing their wheat areas.

Without taking up too much time I shall proceed to point out what we in this country have been doing towards the marketing of our wheat. There has been a tendency on the part of some to conclude that this country has done very little in connection with the marketing of wheat. I shall show presently by figures the percentages of supply of Canadian wheat flour to the bread-stuff purchases of the world are higher than they have been in some years, notwithstanding the abnormal crops we have produced. Just let me give this house a picture as to how wheat is marketed, without going into the question of the financial side of it.

As I said a minute ago in 1932 we produced the third largest crop in our history. I was curious to see how it was marketed. In the five weeks from September 9 to October 7 the farm deliveries in western Canada reached the record total of 145,000,000 bushels, or an average of 25,000,000 bushels per week. In nine weeks 206,000,000 bushels were delivered to the elevators, and wheat had to move out of the country. Otherwise congestion was inevitable, because of the inability of the elevators to carry it. Let us see what the effect was upon the price of wheat. First it dropped to 50 cents, then to 45 cents, then to 40 cents, then to 38½ cents delivered at Fort William, despite the enormous purchases to which I shall presently refer, under the guarantee given to the Cooperative Wheat Association.

I wonder if the house realizes what it means to deliver 206,000,000 bushels of wheat in nine weeks, involving a complete cessation of activities in the wheat market, unless it moves out of the country. And in order that that might be done, notwithstanding the enormous purchases made by the pool under Mr. McFarland, with the guarantee of the government, the fact is that the price dropped to 38½ cents per bushel. We have a record in this world of the price of wheat for the last 400 years. In that year the price was lower than it had been at any time in those 400 years. I suppose hon. gentlemen have seen the chart prepared in Great Britain showing the record of wheat prices for this long period of time. I may say it is an exceedingly interesting document. Converted into money on the same level—that is, having regard to the value of money as such, it was shown that the price paid for wheat in this country was lower than at any time in 400 years. I put this question to the house,—because it has a distinct bearing upon what I am to say later: What would have happened if no support had been given? That is the question. What would have happened in this country if no support had been given? We have a condition in western Canada that is very difficult to describe; I just touch upon it. You have farmers who had been well to do, with fine homes, who because of the unproductiveness of their land owing to drought are in a condition which compelled them to seek relief. What would have happened to the body politic, to this country, to its economic structure, if this government had not taken the action it took? That is the question to which I invite attention, that is what I want hon. gentlemen to devote their attention to on the platform. That question was answered by at least two public men. There is an organ of public opinion in western Canada called the Winnipeg Free Press. Whenever anything is done by this government, good, bad or indifferent, it opposes it. It has but one purpose in the world, that is partyism pure and simple and all the time. Listen to its words when the farmers were endeavouring to get a bigger price for their wheat.

Mr. McINTOSH: A splendid paper though.

Mr. BENNETT: It may well be so, compared with the weekly paper which the hon. gentleman runs. Now let us see what in 1928-29 under similar circumstances was the attitude taken by this paper that has no regard for anything that touches the public interest if it can make party propaganda at the expense of any government that happens not to see as it sees. We have not consulted Doctor Dafoe, that is the trouble. As long as you consult him his vanity is tickled and he is quite content that all is well, but if the government do not consult him anything they do is wrong, even although their predecessors did it. Let us see what he said in 1929, when the elevators of Canada were bursting with the largest crop we ever had in our history, when the tariffs of France and Italy and Germany were as I have indicated, when the Argentine was selling its wheat on the markets of the world, so that Canadian wheat could not find a market. What were his words then? On October 4, 1929, he said:

Since July enormous quantities of low-priced wheat have been exported to Europe from the Argentine. Liverpool buyers were under no necessity to buy Canadian wheat at $1.59 per bushel or thereabouts when they could buy from Argentine at $1.12.

A spread of 38 cents or thereabouts. Then on October 23 what does he say? In the editorial column were these words:

In such a situation, with more wheat offering to buyers than they want, the argument that Canadian wheat should be freely offered at competitive prices seems curious. If it were thrown on the market at prices which made it highly attractive to speculators, it might be bought, but would it be used? The price might fall, and the wheat still remain in storage.

As late as October 23 of that year, 1929, dealing with the carry-over to which I have referred from the crop of 1928 and preceding years, he said:

Whatever the economic effect has been this summer in the Argentine, the fact is that Argentine wheat is being sold at prices in Liverpool which would be disastrous to Canadian producers.

Now I could go on and give further extracts, but I put to the house this question: If it was desirable that the Canadian farmer should not sacrifice his wheat at a loss in 1929 at the Argentine price to which reference has been made, which was then $1.12, is it not equally true that it should not be done now? That it should not be done during the last three or four years? That and none other is the question to be considered. There are the figures, and I ask, and the people of Canada have a right to ask, why a great organ of public opinion would endeavour to induce the people to believe in 1928-29 that the right thing to do was to cling to their wheat until they got a decent price for it, and that in 1935 the right thing to do is to throw it to the winds and let anyone buy it at any price they will. That is the issue.

Now, sir, it is not as though it ended there. I say that my right hon. friend opposite and those associated with him have not the slightest appreciation or understanding of this problem as it then existed. Why? I will tell you: On February 20, 1930, in the last speech from the throne prepared by the right hon. gentleman there occur these words:

The dominion is already recovering from the seasonal slackness evident at the end of the year, and it is not to be forgotten that the bulk of the 1929 wheat crop still remains in Canadian hands for final disposition.

I commend that to thoughtful men. What was done about it? That was in 1930, the crop of 1929 still remained unsold in the hands of the farmers. When we inherited that condition we had to deal with it. And what is more, we did. Now let us proceed. I am going to give some figures with respect to the acres that were sown to wheat in the wheat-producing countries of the world after the war. I shall give a few figures to show what was withdrawn from production in European countries because of the war. I suppose it is hardly necessary to say that if during the war a country could not produce wheat, and subsequently came back to wheat production, it just means that they supply themselves with what during the war they had to buy elsewhere. Now I have given figures with respect to the prices to which wheat had fallen, and I have endeavoured to give some figures indicating the prices which were being received for that wheat. Look at these figures. In 1932 when we had this enormous crop, when the government supported the operations of the pool to the extent they did, when they bought, for reasons that I shall presently say that no government could disregard, I do not believe dared disregard unless they were prepared for complete chaos in this country, what happened? Let us look at the facts. In February, March and April 1933, the average price was 49 cents at Fort William or 30 cents at elevators in western Canada for No. 1 wheat. The imports at that low price averaged only 11,000,000 bushels a month in that three-month period. The reason was that the importing countries had, as I pointed out, accumulated sufficient wheat to carry them over for that time. Now take the last three months of that crop year. In May, June and July, when the government was taking action to which I have referred, buyers in importing countries bought and cleared an average of 21,000,000 bushels a month from Canada. At what price? At 70 cents f.o.b. Fort William. For the six months' period to the end of January in the crop year 1932-33, 285,000,000 bushels were marketed, for which quantity our farmers received only $86,000,000. I wonder if the true significance of that is in the minds of hon. members of the house. In the same six months of 1934 we marketed 177,000,000 bushels of wheat for which the farmers received $107,000,000. That is they sold 108,000,000 bushels less wheat than in the corresponding six months' period of 1932-33 but received for it $21,000,000 more money. In the first half of that year, 1932-33, therefore they really paid $21,000,000 for producing and feeding the world with 108,000,000 bushels of wheat. Now has this house realized just what that meant to Canada? Just what it meant to the citizens of Canada, just what it meant to the factories of Quebec and Ontario, just what it meant to the artisans of this country, just what it has meant in the way of maintaining the integrity of the body politic? That is what I put to this house.

I come now to a point which I think is perhaps somewhat interesting as it indicates the average increase of acreage in other countries. I give these figures in order that we may see why this price structure has been what it is. I want hon. members to realize that other countries have also increased their acreage. The average acreage in Canada for the five years 1909-13 was 9,940,000 acres; in 1927-31 it had risen to 24,590,000 acres and in 1933 it had risen to 25,990,000 acres. The acreage for 1933 showed an increase of 161·5 per cent over the average acreage for the five years 1909-13. In Australia the average acreage for 1909-13 was 7,600,000 acres; for 1927-31 it was 15,000,000 acres, while for 1933 it had fallen to 14,970,000 acres. The 1933 figure was an increase of 96·9 over the 1909-13 figure. In the Argentine the average sown acreage for 1909-13 was 16,050,000 acres; in 1927-31 it was 20,500,000 acres; then followed a decrease in 1933 to 19,660,000 acres. In the United States for the period 1909-13 the acreage was 47,100,000 acres; in 1927-31 it had risen to 60,400,000 acres while in 1933 it had fallen to 47,520,000 acres. This latter figure showed an increase of only nine-tenths of one per cent over the 1909-13 figure. If you take these figures you will see that on the basis of the Argentine increase which was only 22 per cent, we should have increased our acreage to less than 13 million acres instead of to almost 26 million acres. For reasons which are obvious these are the increases which should have obtained. Argentina which has been forcing its wheat upon the markets of the world has increased its acreage relatively less than our own country and other wheat producing countries. Further than that, the Argentine had actually decreased its wheat acreage at one time before it started in to increase the area sown. We are sometimes prone to blame the Argentine for the action it has taken in forcing its wheat upon the markets of the world at a low figure.

We come now to another important matter and one which I think should be considered carefully. I intend to refer to a statement by Broomhall's which gives the consumption of wheat in Europe outside of Russia. I pointed out in this house some time ago that Russia first became a factor in the international trade in wheat after her rehabilitation, to the extent to which she was rehabilitated, in 1930 when she was selling wheat at 60 cents per bushel delivered in Liverpool and London. These figures leave out Russia as that country has not been a factor during the last year or two.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the date of that statement?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member will see as I proceed. The average production of Europe (ex Russia) for the period 1923-24 to 1927-28 was 1,240,000,000 bushels. The average importations by importing countries for the same period were 601,000,000 bushels. The average consumption by European countries was 1,841,000,000 bushels. It will be observed that you have an average consumption during that period of 1,841,000,000 bushels. It has been stated that there has been a diminution in consumption but I give these figures to show that such is not the case. For the period 1929-30 to 1933-34—these are the crop years ending July 31—the average production of Europe (ex Russia) was 1,496,000,000 bushels. The average imports by importing countries for the same period had fallen from 601,000,000 bushels to 469,000,000 bushels while the average consumption had risen to 1,965,000,000 from 1,841,000,000 bushels. I come now to the last crop year, 1933-34. The European production for that year was 1,749,000,000 bushels while for this year the imports had fallen to 374,000,000 bushels. I ask the house to note that the average imports for 1923-24 to 1927-28 were 601,000,000 bushels and these had fallen to 469,000,000 bushels for the period 1929-30 to 1933-34, there being a further decrease to 374,000,000 bushels for the last crop year. In this last year the total consumption had risen to the largest figure in history, 2,123,000,000 bushels.

I wonder if the true significance of those figures will find lodging in the minds of hon. members of the house? While the average consumption of Europe (ex Russia) had increased from 1,841,000,000 bushels in 1923-24 to 1927-28 to 2,123,000,000 bushels in 1933-34, at the same time the importations by importing countries had fallen from 601,000,000 bushels to 374,000,000 bushels. There is the answer to your problem and I submit it is quite impossible to find any other answer than that you must take care to accumulate your surplus and by the efforts of your country and other countries remove that from the market at a price which will not destroy those who produce it. That is what you must do.

Before I proceed further I should like to place another authentic statement upon Hansard. I have given figures showing the consumption by world countries. I have shown how these countries have diminished their imports of wheat while increasing their production by the methods to which I have alluded. I now propose to indicate to the house the percentage of the entire quantity of world foodstuffs which Canada has supplied since 1922-23. I notice that the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway made some reference to these figures in a speech he delivered the other day. I am placing these figures on Hansard so they will be there as a record. They are issued by Broomhall's and show that in the year 1922-23 Canada sold to the world 41·4 per cent of all the foodstuffs consumed.

Mr. HANBURY: Is that grain?

Mr. BENNETT: No, foodstuffs.

Mr. YOUNG: Imports?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. We sold to the world 41·4 per cent of their imported foodstuffs.

Mr. HANBURY: Was that grain or cattle and hogs?

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about wheat. In 1923-24 we sold 44·4 per cent but in 1924-25 this had fallen to 26·9 per cent. In 1925-26 it had risen to 48·6 per cent but in 1926-27 it had fallen to 36 per cent. In 1927-28 it was 42 per cent, in 1928-29 it was 43·9 per cent and in 1929-30 the year in which we inherited our carry over, it had fallen to 30·4 per cent. In 1930-31 it had risen to 32·9 per cent and in 1931-32, for the reasons given in the table just presented, it had fallen to 26·9 per cent. In 1932-33 it had risen to 43 per cent. The house will note that this last figure is within one and a fraction per cent of the highest figure since 1923. How does that fit in with the statement that we are losing our markets? According to the figures given at the board of trade in Toronto the other day, in 1932-33 43 per cent of the world's breadstuffs—I said foodstuffs, but it should be breadstuffs—came from the Dominion of Canada, and the next year, 1933-34, the figure was $37\frac{3}{10}$ per cent. This year the figures as given by the president of the railway were up to the end of April, but I have the figures to the end of May, and up to the end of May we have supplied 32 per cent of the world's breadstuffs from Canada—32 per cent, which you will observe is a higher figure than we have had for a total year in some years. It is 6 per cent higher than it was in 1924-25 for the whole year; and since that date, to-day being the 12th of June, we have sold substantial quantities of wheat, one day a million and a half bushels, there being an average of half a million a day during that period; and our percentage is going up rapidly. So that I have every reason to believe—I am not venturing an estimate but merely giving a statement of my belief—that we shall find that this country will sell its percentage of breadstuffs to the world in 1934-35 at a figure much higher than it has been at any time during the last few years.

Now I am going to give the house one more set of figures; some hon. members may have seen them but I think it desirable to place these figures on Hansard in order to indicate just what action has been taken to deal with this tremendous problem. In the last five crop years, 1934, 1933, 1932, 1931 and 1930, this country produced 1,734,000,000 bushels of wheat, or an average of 346,000,000 bushels a year; and the carryover on the first of August, including that in the United States, was in round figures 127,000,000 bushels. On August 1, 1930, that is what it was This was prior to the harvesting of the 1930 crop. Let us see what we have to add to our carryover, which was the largest we had, of 127,000,000 bushels. We harvest the 1930 crop and we have additional crops amounting in all to 1,730,000,000, all harvested; and at the moment the total carryover of this country is less than 100,000,000 bushels more than it was on the first of August, 1930. I will deal with the exact figures presently. Let me go one step further, however. The average Canadian carryover in five years of prosperity ended July 31, 1929—reckless speculation, so-called prosperity—was 70,000,000 bushels a year, made up in the manner I have indicated. Now I ask this question: Can the people of this country afford to see the wheat that plays so large a part in our economic life become the sport and play of what is called supply and demand at 38 cents a bushel? That is the issue. That is the whole story. And when I said that part of that wheat was used and consumed, it is only fair to add that part of it was used for other than human food; that is to say, part was used, when the prices of other grains went up, for what I call husbandry food purposes.

Those figures are, I think, perhaps worth considering. They indicate as clearly as can be indicated just what the situation has been. And now I arrive at a consideration of what the situation is. If the house has followed me up to this point, during these years beginning 1930 Mr. McFarland undertook, without salary, to serve his country and western Canada particularly, to the best of his ability. He received no salary, as was stated in the committee a year ago; and he has given himself so unremittingly to his toil that he is now another wreck of this depression, physically. I put this to the house. We did not employ Mr. McFarland; I was in England when he undertook the duties of manager of the wheat pool. We guaranteed the wheat pool's liabilities later, for the purpose of enabling it to protect and stabilize the Canadian market. Some people have said that that is speculating, and I will deal with that promptly.

The Canadian wheat pool has been the hedge-taker on the Winnipeg exchange. I am going to explain to the house, especially to my hon. friends from parts of Canada other than the west, what is meant in the use of these terms. I have already given the house a clear statement, though not as clear as I should like, of exactly the bushels of wheat that have been marketed in a short period of nine weeks in a great year. I trust that hon. members appreciate that it means there has been a movement of wheat just as fast as it could go through the separators into the elevator and, through the elevator, move to some other point for the purpose of being sold if possible. Now, if the wheat is sold on the market the elevator companies must pay the farmer for it in full, or he may store it and get an advance; but if he does what is done so frequently, he puts his wheat in the elevator and gets his ticket as to weights, and is paid on the basis of the Fort William price for that grade—it being graded to ascertain its quality —at the prevailing rate of that date, converted into terms of price at the elevator, wherever it may be, whether High River or Okotoks or Gleichen or some other point. That being so, the bank provides the elevator with credit to enable it to pay in full. No elevator company has liquid capital sufficient to enable it for longer than a few weeks in the year to carry on business with its own resources. It therefore has to seek accommodation from the banks, and the banks grant a line of credit on the hypothecation of wheat by the elevator company. But they do not stop there. The banks are never willing nor prepared to have a loss by reason of great fluctuations in price, and so they compel their customers, the elevator companies, to hedge their purchases every day, by which is meant that they must find someone willing to buy that wheat. That is a hedge; that is what has to be done. Now I put to this house very simply this single question. When the speculator disappeared from the markets, he having been the hedge-taker in days gone by, and when the purchasers were not on the market to acquire the wheat, who was going to hedge it? That is the question. Who is going to hedge that wheat? There was only one hedge-taker and that was the Canadian cooperative wheat organization, and they had to take, day after day, thousands and even millions of bushels, hedged for the purpose of preventing the development of absolute chaos in the marketing of Canadian wheat. Is there any gentleman in this house who will say otherwise? There were no speculators as in days gone by to take hedges. In days gone by there used to be speculators who took a chance. Many of them from the south had millions of dollars at their disposal; they, including Mr. Cutten whom the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) mentioned, and others, were always prepared and willing to buy on the market as speculators. But with the disappearance of the speculators and there being no demand for export by the purchasers who had heretofore been buying wheat, for the reason before given, namely, that they were producing wheat on the scale I have mentioned, then what? Should we have chaos? Should we have wheat backing up until it could not leave the farm? Should we allow the farmer to have his wheat piled up in great dumps on his farm, or should we do what we did, namely, make it possible, by hedging this wheat, for the buying and selling to continue? That is what we did anyway. In hedging the wheat we thereby became ultimately the owners of its unless there was a sale for it, because the hedge taker is the man who becomes the owner of the commodity unless he sells it. That is the story.

I know how difficult it is in the stress and strain of acute partisan politics for hon. gentlemen to agree that anything done by the government of the day is soundly done; but still I put it to the house and to the country: Is there in Canada any living man who would take the responsibility for the chaos that would have resulted had this action not been taken? Now is the time during the debate on the second reading of this bill, not on the hustings where no man can answer, for hon. members to rise in their places and speak. I see the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) is not present. Let him on the second reading of the bill rise in his place and say that he would not have hedged this wheat nor provided the credit of the Canadian people to save the greatest industry in this country. Let him say that he would support bankruptcy for the whole of western Canada and the destruction of the entire economic structure we have built up during the last fifty years. That is what the matter comes to; let there be no misunderstanding about it. Would any hon. member opposite take such a stand? Would the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) do so? These are not promises; they are achievements; they are the result of what has been done, and he who runs may read. But if partisanship is so blind as not to be willing to read even the record, so unwilling to grant to your opponents an effort to save the country from destruction and ruin, then of course let your sneering observations be sent to the farmers of western Canada; they are the people to whom they should be sent.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order!

Mr. BENNETT: Let the hon. member rise in his place and say that he votes against this bill.

I have indicated to the house why we took the action we did, and I am content to leave that record to the judgment of the future; I am content to leave it to my fellow countrymen, to the man who has toiled with his wife and family upon the soil to produce wheat that in 1932 he could not sell for thirty-eight cents a bushel even though we took what we did for the purpose of hedging. I am content to leave the record to them. I am content to leave it to the more fortunate people who live in great cities and towns in eastern Canada to say whether they believe the action taken was sound. When I listen to the sneers of hon. gentlemen opposite, I invite them to rise in their places and say that they are opposed to this bill. That is the test of their sincerity, and not the sneers they make as they sit in their seats, not the sneers they express as they talk among themselves. Let them speak up like men.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite laugh as I paint the story of those who have endured toil; I am glad to hear those members to whom such toilers have some right to look for support laugh and jeer. Let the hon. member for Willow Bunch lead the procession.

I should like to refer to what was done with respect to marketing the wheat which we had to take. I have said that we have taken these hedges. We took them in 1933; we took them in 1934 with the only body that was left to do so. Either government support was required or there would be the chaos to which I have referred. Let us see what we have done in the way of selling to Great Britain. The other day I said that I would take several countries and point out what we had done with respect to them. I am not unmindful of the fact that the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), whom I am glad to see in his place, declared in the house that the trade commissioners can do nothing toward selling wheat. His observation in that regard is a perfectly clear statement and it is one that has met with approval from many hon. gentlemen opposite. He said, as reported in Hansard of March 14, 1929:

> The Department of Trade and Commerce is not exercised over the sale of such commodities as wheat, because those commodities find their own markets; but we are interested in assisting the sale of manufactured products.

To that statement hon. gentlemen opposite have given their approval. Let us go a step further and see what we have sold in the United Kingdom in the way of wheat and flour converted into terms of wheat. Up to the end of April of this year, in this crop year, the United Kingdom has imported 136,800,000 bushels of which Canada supplied 48,100,000 bushels or 35·1 per cent. The percentages of her imports that we supplied are as follows:

Percentage of total imports of wheat into United Kingdom supplied by Canada

Fiscal year:
1933-34	34.4
1932-33	50.4
1931-32	25.7
1930-31	25.4
1929-30	22.7
1928-29	36.3
1927-28	33.7
1926-27	31.6
1925-26	36.9
1924-25	30.2

The ten year average being 32·73. Thus far in nine months that is excepting the months of May, June and July, we have already supplied the United Kingdom with 35·1 per cent of its total purchases. How does that sound as loss of markets?

The story is that we have lost with respect to the quality of wheat they have been accustomed to, and therefore the bread to which they have been accustomed is an inferior product. I have given the figures to the house. I have shown that the United Kingdom produced 50,000,000 bushels upon which last year they had a subsidy, which was operative for the year before for the first time. I think it is only fair to say that undoubtedly those percentages prior to 1932 should be increased, because there was no clear distinction between all the wheat that was cleared for the United Kingdom and wheat that sometimes went to continental countries. I remember the former Minister of Trade and Commerce pointing out how difficult it was to secure accurate figures with respect to the matter. But since the preference in 1932, the figures are such that unquestionably I think they may be regarded as accurate, for these figures were secured from the British Board of Trade. Let us bear in mind the fact that from August 31, 1934, to April 30, 1935, the Dominion of Canada has supplied the United Kingdom with 35·1 per cent of its imports of wheat and wheat flour in terms of wheat. How do hon. gentlemen reconcile that with the statements which have been made not in the house but on the hustings? It is not correct to say "the English are eating more bread," because recently the mills appropriated $2,500,000 for an advertising campaign: "Eat more bread." The quality of the bread, by reason of the very circumstance to which reference has been made, namely the use of softer wheat, had not appealed to the British people as it had previously, and they were using less bread. Eat more bread; that was the cry, and they are spending $2,500,000 in that campaign. I repeat that at the end of nine months of this year this country has supplied the United Kingdom with 35·1 per cent of all its importations of wheat and of flour in terms of wheat.

Mr. MALCOLM: Will the Prime Minister permit an interruption?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MALCOLM: I should not like to break the current of my right hon. friend's speech, but he is aware of the fact that in 1929 the total volume of business in wheat done with the British Empire was 229,000,000 bushels and that in 1934 the volume was 112,000,000 bushels. There is often a great difference between the amount of wheat which the British re-export to other nations and the amount they themselves consume.

It is wrong to estimate that while Britain did not consume as high a percentage of the 229,000,000 bushels, they were buying less from us. As a matter of fact I think they consumed as much then as they do now, but they re-exported more.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say that these are the board of trade figures. In 1933-34 the total importations were 200,100,000 bushels, and of that total Canada supplied 68,100,000 bushels or 34·4 per cent. Since the preference was granted these figures have been kept very accurately, for reasons which the hon. gentleman will appreciate, because of the preference of 2s. a quarter.

Mr. MALCOLM: But has the right hon. gentleman the re-export figures in order to compare them with 1928?

Mr. BENNETT: These are the figures without the re-export figures, because there has been no re-export of the wheat that came in under the preference.

Mr. MALCOLM: But has the right hon. gentleman the re-export figures for 1928?

Mr. BENNETT: I said a moment ago that the figures with respect to 1929 were: Total importations, 192,500,000 bushels; total amount supplied by the Dominion of Canada, $69,900,000 bushels, or 36·3 per cent. Those figures, however, in my judgment would be inaccurate because they do include re-exported wheat. The figures I gave previously did not include re-exported wheat, and that is the point I am making.

Mr. MALCOLM: I quite admit that, but my right hon. friend will admit that there was also wheat exported from Canada to the extent of 229,000,000 bushels, all of which did not reach Great Britain.

Mr. BENNETT: That is hardly accurate. The hon. gentleman has the year wrong; in the year 1931-32 total exports to Great Britain from all countries were 229,400,000 bushels, of which 58,900,000 bushels came from Canada.

Mr. MALCOLM: But some of that was re-exported.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be true in connection with the figures up to the time of the preference.

That is the situation in connection with Great Britain. Now let us turn to France. I have heard a great deal of talk about losing markets in that country. Canada shared in the French market to the following extent:

	Bushels
1926	1,483,054
1927	12,016,273
1928	10,300,373
1929	16,647,328
1930	9,906,775
1931	31,606,308
1932	24,628,895
1933	13,746,663

Let me repeat:

	Bushels
1931	31,606,308
1932	24,628,895
1933	13,746,663

And what about 1934, when France had the largest wheat crop in many years, when she was selling denatured wheat in the United States, and when French flour and French wheat were displacing British empire wheat on the English market? How much do you think we sold France in that year? France only imported 10,953,159 bushels in 1934, and of that total Canada supplied 9,606,530 bushels. Those figures were given me by the French ministry of commerce.

Mr. MALCOLM: All for seed.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so; I am not talking about the Morocco situation at all.

Under the agreement we have with France, when France sells 100 bushels of wheat they are allowed to acquire 100 bushels of wheat, and as I say, of the 10,000,000 bushels, the total that have gone into France, exclusive of the importations from France's own dominions, 9,606,530 bushels came from Canada.

Mr. MALCOLM: But my hon. friend knows that France bought no wheat except for seed.

Mr. BENNETT: I know just the opposite. I trust that in his absence the hon. gentleman has not been entirely asleep. That is not so, and my hon. friend knows that it is not so. He knows that 10,000,000 bushels of wheat were not imported by France in 1934 for seed; he knows that the importations for seed went to Morocco, Algeria and other countries. I am taking the figures they themselves gave as to the quantity of wheat they imported, and they used that wheat for strengthening their own wheat. They did not use it for seed; they used it for bread.

Mr. MALCOLM: Then my right hon. friend had better refer to his own minister, the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), who gave that explanation at the time he put through the French treaty.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about last year, 1934, about which apparently the hon. gentleman knows nothing, and I am giving the figures as they have been given me by the French people.

Now let us come to the next country, Germany. How much wheat did Germany import last year? Germany has been cultivating every little corner for the purpose of growing wheat, and everyone knows what has happened in connection with present conditions in that country and the production of foodstuffs. Germany imported 23,771,356 bushels of wheat, of which the Dominion of Canada supplied 15,944,040 bushels. But in Italy the situation is entirely different. The Danubian countries supply the wants of Italy. All you have to do is read the recent diplomatic history of what has taken place in connection with the Balkan countries and Italy to realize the situation there. Of a total of 17,241,700 bushels of wheat imported by Italy, Canada supplied 1,581,239 bushels.

There is the story. Those are the three great countries about which discussions have taken place, and I have shown why they have limited and lessened their importations. I have not touched upon the draining of the pontine marshes in Italy and the increasing acreage that has resulted, though I have the information before me. I have shown, however, that despite the increase in acreage, the purchase of wheat they have made abroad have come largely from the Dominion of Canada, except in the case of Italy, which has bought wheat from the Danubian and Balkan countries.

Then there is another class of countries, those on the gold standard, who found it impossible to buy wheat from across the Atlantic ocean. They had what were called clearing house agreements. I heard a distinguished member of the French ministry of the day say in Geneva that they were very bad, because they were the very negation of the promotion of international trade. What are these clearing house agreements? They merely mean that if Switzerland wishes to buy wheat she says, "You must buy from me commodities of equal value in order that I may have the exchange with which to make the payments." So instead of having a free and open transaction a clearing house is set up and there is an entry in the clearing house of all the purchases that come into the country and all the sales that go out, all the imports and all the exports, and the exchange is then made available for the purpose of meeting the obligations incurred in connection with the purchase of wheat, for example.

These clearing house agreements are impossible in this country unless we are prepared to accept the manufactured goods from these other countries, to displace Canadian production. That is the story. If we are willing to do that all we have to do is say so, but if on the other hand this country desires to maintain its economic structure and have regard to the welfare of half its population, in cities and towns, it is quite obvious that these so called clearing house agreements cannot be maintained successfully. They are the very negation of international trade, because the essence of international trade is not that it should be balanced but that there should be adjustments between respective countries from time to time, between A and B and C and D, a surplus here and a deficit there. With England, for instance, although we pay out £12,000,000 annually for interest on our obligations, the truth is that even with that, owing to her purchases from us of foodstuffs, there is a favourable balance. With the United States, with branch factories, and with the purchasing of raw materials there is a balance against us which is compensated by invisible items such as tourist trade and matters of that kind. These clearing house agreements mean the very negation of the establishment of international trade and the return to normal conditions. I heard a French economist say that at a meeting of the League of Nations last fall, and I agreed with him, because that is the reason we have not had provisions of that sort up to this time. I will say frankly however to this chamber that with these clearance agreements, such as now exist between South America, Europe and Great Britain it may be essential for this house to grant authority for putting clearing house agreements into operation.

But despite all that can be said, the figures I have just read to the house are those supplied by competent authorities to show that this country has supplied almost 90 per cent of the wants of France with respect to wheat, 15,000,000 bushels out of 23,000,000 to Germany and, it is true, for reasons which I need not labour, less than 2,000,000 bushels to Italy.

I believe I have about concluded all I desire to say. One matter however I think should be stated, and that is our present position with respect to the current year. The current year finds Canada in this position, namely, that by accepting hedges in 1932, 1933 and 1934—by acquiring hedges the pool has left upwards of 200,000,000 bushels of wheat as an accumulated carryover from the years I have indicated.

Mr. VALLANCE: There are 227,000,000 bushels.

Mr. BENNETT: Possibly the hon. member has better information than I have. Probably I should say there are between 200,000,000 and 230,000,000. Only the other day 1,500,000 bushels were sold, and on another day a half a million bushels were sold. I should say the figure would be approximately 220,000,000 to 225,000,000 bushels. At any rate, that is my idea of what it would be.

It is true that last year in committee the view was expressed that it was not desirable to make these figures known. The debate which developed indicated that there was a sharp division of public opinion as expressed by the members who were there. On that vote a large number of members expressed their desire to disclose the figures. The following Liberal members voted to disclose them: Hurtubise, Nipissing; Raymond, Beauharnois; Lapointe, Quebec East; Power, Quebec South; Mackenzie, Vancouver Centre; Ralston, Shelburne-Yarmouth; Howard, Sherbrooke; Donnelly, Willow Bunch; and Duff, Antogonish-Guysborough. Conservatives, Progressives and the remaining Liberals on the committee opposed the publication. There was a vote of 26 to 10 not to disclose the financial position of operations.

In view of the evident desire of men occupying high positions in the Liberal party I have no hesitancy whatever in making known the figures which, although it changes from time to time, is I believe at the present time between 220,000,000 and 225,000,000 bushels. That has accumulated in the manner I have indicated. This has been accumulated on the guarantee of the Dominion of Canada, under the circumstances to which I have alluded.

I shall add only one word further. I have endeavoured as fully as possible to disclose to this chamber the position of the wheat business in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: You didn't say how much.

Mr. BENNETT: I didn't say what? I have endeavoured to make known to this house the world conditions which have rendered it impossible to find a market for the over-production of Canadian wheat. Had I desired to take the time I could have given the surpluses, and carry-overs of other countries. Nature has limited production in some countries and stimulated it in others. But I know of no method by which we could have prevented a debacle on a scale never before known in this country than the method we adopted. I know some have suggested we should have let the wheat go at any price and withdrawn our guarantee. I am not prepared to do that. I do not yet think that is a sound policy; I have not changed my mind with respect to that point.

The bill, the second reading of which I have moved, is one predicated upon the fact that the general manager of this company whose operations have enabled this end to be accomplished is not further able to discharge his normal duties. I have indicated, therefore, that a wheat board in name—because we have had one in reality during the last two years—that a wheat board in name and reality should be set up. The terms and provisions of the bill are short and simple. It provides for the marketing of the Canadian wheat crop through the channel I have indicated, not through a private enterprise. It is to be done through a public board created by the Dominion of Canada for the purpose of ensuring against the destruction of that measure of economic stability, weak though it may be, that we through our efforts have been able to build up in the last few years.

I should not care to contemplate what the position would be had this action not been taken. I shall await with great interest the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite as to what course they think should be pursued, other than that which I have suggested to meet the situation now confronting us. I repeat now what I stated at the beginning: We have an obligation that is not limited to our own country, because as the chief exporter and the third greatest producer of wheat we have a duty to all wheat exporting countries to give such help and assistance as we may to prevent wheat being sold at a price ruinous to the producer, one which will not permit him any return on his money and does not enable him in any sense to reap the reward for the effort of his hands. It is for that reason that the bill is commended to the house. I offer it with a great deal of confidence that it will meet with the approval of those who believe that the welfare of their country transcends that of any party.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, there is one thing upon which hon. members on this side of the house may congratulate the Prime Minister, and that is on his return to normalcy. I do not think he has ever so excelled himself in truculence, bombastic utterances and general partisanship, as he has in the speech to which we have just listened.

At the last minute the right hon. gentleman has appealed to the house to have this matter considered in no party spirit. But almost every line of his speech, every sentence of it, has been an attempt to glorify the government of which he is the leader, and to deprecate the efforts of anybody else. I say this, too, that the right hon. gentleman has not hesitated to misrepresent the attitude of hon. members in this chamber, thinking possibly that he might bring support to a cause he now espouses. I propose to deal with that point before I have concluded. Let me say to the right hon. gentleman that I have neither the information before me, much less the ability, to deal with the mass of figures with which he has smothered this house and with which he has smothered the real issue contained in the bill. The right hon. gentleman has taken a tilt at the editor of the Winnipeg Free Press, a gentleman who is not here to answer for himself. The editor of the Winnipeg Free Press I think is quite able to take care of himself, and we need not worry about him. My right hon. friend has also set up some invisible opponent—because so far as I know no hon. member sitting in this house has as he suggests opposed the assistance which has been given to the western wheat grower during this time of stress and strain. There is not a man sitting on this side of the house who has opposed that assistance. My right hon. friend's brave challenge to stand up like men and vote, and all this bravado which he has exhibited this afternoon, is quite beside the point. He is only setting up a straw man and knocking him down again. Of course he had to inject a certain amount of that sort of thing into his speech to indicate that he was making his come-back, of which we are all glad, but I say to my right hon. friend that on a subject which he asks to have dealt with seriously he should not give way to the truculent tone and bombastic utterance in which he indulged this afternoon. His speech was nothing more or less than a partisan appeal, an election appeal of a dying government.

My right hon. friend has left his headliner for the campaign to the last. Up to this day, June 12, let it be known this house has never been told the amount of wheat on hand carried by the central selling agency to which my right hon. friend has referred. On May 21 last my right hon. friend in answer to the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) made a reply concerning this question which he now puts before this house in this long speech, which would rather indicate that he was then of a somewhat different mind than he is to-day respecting the importance of this matter. As reported on page 2926 of Hansard Mr. Vallance asked the following question:

> I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he can indicate to the house when we may expect to deal with the resolution now standing in his name proposing to set up a wheat board or at least a grain board.

And what was the answer?

> Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister): When other business more pressing is disposed of that will be dealt with in due course.

What has been the pressing business which has been dealt with in the meantime? Facing as we do the close of the session probably next week, we are called upon to deal with this momentous question which my right hon. friend says, and I think quite properly, almost transcends in importance any other question facing the Dominion of Canada at the moment except perhaps unemployment. What business have we had which has been regarded as more pressing than the wheat question? Well since the Prime Minister made that answer we have dealt with fair wages on public works, simply the putting into statutory form of an order in council which has existed all along, this measure by the way not to come into effect until May 1, 1936. Much more pressing than the wheat question! We have dealt with weights and measures. We saw two sessions of this house devoted to consideration of a bill respecting patents, and a debate between the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) with regard to a particular provision, and the Prime Minister taking a rather prominent part in that debate. We had the amendment to the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, simply an enabling measure which permitted complaints to be made to a board set up under the act, this being I understand since rejected in another place. We had amendments to the Criminal Code in connection with legislation which the Minister of Justice admitted was invalid and inefficacious and that convictions could not be secured under it. All that took precedence of the matter of the establishment of a Canadian grain board. And we have had supply in connection I think with half a dozen different departments. That answer, Mr. Speaker, was given three weeks ago; and now, with this house expecting to prorogue next week, my right hon. friend introduces this bill, dealing with the biggest and probably the most pressing problem before the Dominion of Canada at the present time. In that deluge of figures which my right hon. friend put on Hansard he omitted to tell us how much this country is committed to in connection with the guarantees given by the government, guarantees which were not even formulated by an order in council but by a letter written by my right hon. friend in January, 1931, not put into shape as an order in council until September, 1931. In those four years we have not been given a single item of information on that matter, nor have we had any information on it this afternoon in spite of all my right hon. friend has said, going back as he has to ancient history, 1920 and 1921, telling us the acreage of the different countries during these years and the amount of production and value of exports and all these one hundred and one things. This fills up Hansard, but I submit with all respect to my right hon. friend that it does not assist us in considering intelligently and deciding the problem which he says is the greatest problem of this country to-day. He has cited reams of figures even the duties put on by all the countries of the world beginning back in 1921. Has my right hon. friend in giving his comparisons, in stating that 35 per cent I understood him to say, of Great Britain's imports of wheat came from Canada, given a comparison between Canada and the Argentine, which I had the opportunity of putting on Hansard a short time ago? My right hon. friend has dealt in percentages, but with all the wealth of figures it seems to me it would interest us to know whether or not our competitor, which admittedly is the Argentine, is gaining on us in the British market. The figures which are on Hansard already, and which I shall read again in order that this matter may be easily available at this time, are these:—I give just the round figures:

British Imports of Wheat from September 1, 1932, to January 31, 1933

	Bushels
From Argentine..	3,635,000
From Australia..	10,358,000
From Canada..	51,696,000

For the same period in the following year Britain imported from Argentine not 3,635,000 but 12,176,000; from Australia instead of 10,358,000 she imported 17,661,000, and from Canada instead of 51,696,000 in 1932-33 she only imported 29,406,000.

My right hon. friend deals in percentages; I am dealing with bushels. I think the western Canadian farmer understands those terms better. From September 1, 1934, to January 31, 1935, I find that Argentine, which the year before had, as I have said, only exported to Great Britain 12,176,000 bushels, had increased this amount to 26,000,000; from Australia, Great Britain imported 17,000,000 bushels in 1933-34, and 15,900,000 in 1934-35. From Canada the bushelage imported by Britain actually fell off by 2,000,000, although the imports from Argentine had more than doubled.

Why does not my right hon. friend give us these figures?

Mr. McINTOSH: Another case of depending on the newspaper.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit they are rather relevant in considering the effects of the policy of this government. He gave us the duties in France back in 1923 and told us about the lira in Italy and paper pesos in Argentine, why did he not give figures which would assist us in considering this bill?

While mentioning Argentine may I call attention to the fact that my right hon. friend has done us the honour of putting on record the fact that Argentine in cleaning up her situation only made a loss of something like six or seven million, including administration expense perhaps eight million in all.

Mr. BENNETT: Only $2,200,000.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend in his delightfully vague way said that we had a carry-over of less than 100,000,000 bushels more than 1930, a rather left-handed way of conveying the real fact that our carry-over is more than 200,000,000 bushels this year under the policy of my right hon. friend.

Now those are the matters which my right hon. friend has dealt with. I hope he does not expect me to go into the mass of figures he gave. I do not propose to deal with Mr. Dafoe and I do not propose to deal with the many statistics which have nothing to do with the question now before this house.

However, I do want to submit something which we in this house have pointed out in debate, not on the hustings but across the floor of this house. We have called attention to the disastrous results of the policy of this government in connection with the wheat growers but my right hon. friend has not deigned to mention that. He goes to some newspaper and quotes someone who is not here, he quotes something which has been said on the hustings somewhere by someone else who is not here but he has not dealt in any way with the statements which have been made across the floor of this house as to the effect on this country and the wheat growers of the policy of this government.

We have dealt with that policy as it affected the farmers and we have dealt with it also as it affected the country generally. We now know at last that we have over 200,000,000 bushels of a carry-over this year and we do not know what are the commitments of this government to the bankers. Should this wheat be marketed at to-day's price we do not know whether the loss would be $30,000,000, $100,000,000 or no loss at all. We have received no information of any kind but in the dying days of this session we are being asked to commit this country, not to a hit and miss policy such as my right hon. friend has had in force during the past four or five years during which he has been the wheat dictator of Canada, but to a permanent policy. Now when we are within probably one week of the end of the session we are being asked to do this. It is over five years since the previous parliament was dissolved and we are at this late date suddenly confronted with the policy that Canada shall go permanently into the wheat business, that there shall be created a government monopoly in connection with the handling of grain. That is what my right hon. friend advocates by this bill but he is very careful not to defend it when he makes his speech. He contented himself with challenging people to vote against—what? Against what the government has done in the past in connection with assistance to farmers. That is all. There is no challenge as to voting in connection with this bill. He hardly mentioned it.

I do not intend to deal at length with the policy outlined in this bill but I submit that the first point for the consideration of the government and the country is this: If the policy embodied in this bill is to be a permanent policy, this is no time to place upon members of the House of Commons and the people of the country the obligation of deciding as to such a permanent policy without being in possession of more information than we have to-day. How can we at this stage intelligently consider what should be done and how can we know what the western wheat grower wants? We have not been told by my right hon. friend. There has been no consultation with the western wheat growers with regard to this matter, my right hon. friend suddenly brings down a bill which will place the government in the wheat business. It is not fair to the country, it is not fair to the western wheat growers and it is not fair to this house for my right hon. friend to bring down a bill at this stage and attempt to fasten on the people of the dominion of Canada by means of his majority in this house—it is not a majority in the country—a permanent policy in connection with wheat. Has this government any right to commit this house or to commit the people of the Dominion of Canada to a policy as farreaching as this one?

Mr. HANBURY: Or to any policy.

Mr. RALSTON: Or to any policy, as my hon. friend suggests. This government has been told repeatedly at every by-election that they have not the confidence of the people of Canada and yet my right hon. friend proposes at this time to saddle the western wheat grower with a policy of his kind. He has had five years in which to inaugurate or develop a policy but only in the last hours of the last session of parliament does he act. It is very much like the unemployment relief policy with which my right hon. friend has been shuffling along year after year, making the one hand wash the other; he has had no constructive policy or no definite objective. The wheat business has been in the same category but my right hon. friend now emerges at the eleventh hour, yes, at the half past eleventh hour or about a quarter of twelve with a policy which he proposes shall be accepted by the people of this country willy nilly because of the majority he has behind him. I submit that my right hon. friend should not expect the House of Commons and the country to accept from his hands a permanent policy concerning this great question which affects not only the western wheat grower but the whole Dominion of Canada. We should not be asked to do this without being afforded the opportunity of giving it more consideration than it has been possible to give up to this time.

I do not believe that the people of the Dominion of Canada are favourable to a compulsory wheat board, to a board the constitution of which will mean that every wheat grower, every elevator man and everybody engaged in the wheat business must deal with the government agency and no one else. This matter of policy has been discussed before not only in this house but throughout the country. The government has carried on with a voluntary system for five years as Mr. McFarland and the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited have been nothing more or less than a board conducting voluntary market operations. A man was entitled to sell or not sell to Mr. McFarland as he saw fit. I submit that so far as the western wheat grower is concerned that the voluntary system should be continued until there has been more opportunity to consider the matter. I do not believe the compulsory feature of this bill will meet with approval, either in the west, in the east or in this house. After all the people still feel that subject to government regulation and control they should have some rights in connection with the marketing of their product, but my right hon. friend has injected that feature into this bill.

What is the real problem facing my right hon. friend? Why is this bill being brought down at the last minute to shear Mr. McFarland, whom we all regret to hear is ill, of his authority and replacing him with somebody else? We submit, and we are not afraid to tell this to the public of Canada, notwithstanding the truculent challenge of my right hon. friend, that it is being done for the purpose of covering the mistakes of this government in connection with its wheat policy. It is to cover up the particulars of which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) with all his show of candour, with all his show of furnishing information has not put upon the records of this house up to this moment. What is the situation? Subsection (b) of section 7 of the bill provides that the Canadian grain board to be constituted by the bill shall be empowered to take over on such terms as the governor in council thinks fit the wheat held by the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. What does that mean? It means that all the bookkeeping, all the guarantees, all the liabilities of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited and all the mistakes and errors will be handed over to the new grain board. So far as was indicated this afternoon by my right hon. friend, this house is to have no information as to the extent of those liabilities and the extent and nature of the operations carried on during the past three or four years. We are not to be told what has been bought and sold or what was the amount of wheat on hand from time to time except that in answering a question this afternoon the right hon. gentleman at this last moment put the wheat on hand at somewhere between 200,000,000 and 225,000,000 bushels. That is the extent of the candour exhibited by my right hon. friend on this occasion, he tells us something which every hon. member, every person in the country, and every newspaper has known and in order to surround the whole thing with a proper degree of mystery he attempts to smother us with statistics.

Let me say to my right hon. friend that the house will not accept subsection (b) of section 7 of the bill without the fullest information being furnished as to the operations of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited during the last three or four years under the direction of the Prime Minister.

With regard to the operations of Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, under the direction of the Prime Minister during the last three or four years, let me say this. When I observe that the board has made some mistakes I am not saying anything that has not been said in this house before. I have indicated it very plainly and I only want to mention it now so that my right hon. friend will not think that I am simply dealing in generalities. I can only tell him what the reports are; and if they are as authentic as the reports that have been given with respect to the amount of wheat he has on hand, they are not far from being correct. The reports are that my right hon. friend and the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, which he was directing, in the earlier part of 1933, although the price of wheat was at least equal to the amount which it cost the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, and notwithstanding the fact that the world price was up to that price, did not dispose of a bushel of wheat but held on to that grain, and that lack of action is one of the contributing factors accounting for the two hundred million bushels odd which we have to-day. That is the first thing to be noted. As a matter of fact, at that very time, if the reports are correct, when the duty of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, by virtue of the order in council under which they were appointed, was to dispose of wheat, instead of selling it they increased their holding. They increased it at a time when stocks should have been reduced as much as possible; and if the reports are correct, in that same year, a little later on, Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, with my right hon. friend's approval —because, according to the records on Hansard, the government was fathering and sponsoring everything they did—in that same year, 1933, I say while they sold twenty or thirty million bushels, it was not more than fifteen or twenty days after that before the same agency which had sold the twenty or thirty million bushels, in order to get it out of the bins and out of the country, solemnly turned round and bought it back—not at the price which it had cost them originally, and which was probably between 55 and 65 cents? No; not at that price but at the market price at that time, between 75 and 80 cents. They paid more for it than the wheat originally cost them—why? My right hon. friend will pardon us if we wonder whether it was not for the reason that the government thought they saw an opportunity to catch wheat on the way down and then sell it on the rebound, thus demonstrating to the country how successful they had been as operators in wheat. There can be no other explanation for it. This was in the summer of 1933. My right hon. friend insists that they did not speculate, but I do not know what he calls it when the fact is that they sold twenty or thirty million bushels and then turned round and bought the same quantity a few days afterwards, not at the price which it cost them but at a price at least 15 cents above the amount which they had paid—and this, I presume, in the hope of taking advantage of a rise later, believing that this was only a recession in the market. And there were no farmers selling wheat at that time as my hon. friend from Willow Bunch points out. The result was that this agency set up by the Prime Minister and this government, which was to dispose of wheat and which had only seventy-five million bushels to dispose of on the original take-over, as it appeared on July 31, 1931, and having on hand in May, 1933, one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty million bushels, increased their holdings by four or five million bushels in August of the same year. That is the way the liquidation process was carried on.

Again in the summer of 1934, if the reports are correct, although they had on hand between one hundred and sixty-five and one hundred and eighty million bushels—and remember that they had only seventy-five million bushels to dispose of in the first place—in order to be good fellows they purchased three or four million bushels more—for what purpose? To stabilize the market? No; wheat was 80 cents a bushel at that time and the wheat they already had cost them 65 cents, but they took a little flyer in wheat, hoping that it would go up. And in July or August, if the reports are correct, although as my hon. friend knows wheat was consistently advancing in those two months, not a bushel of wheat was disposed of, so far as we can gather from any information we can get. Yet my right hon. friend defies us to stand up and vote against the assistance that has been given though he has not offered us any information with regard to these matters, which are already on Hansard, which are not unknown to him, and which were brought up in the budget debate.

The right hon. gentleman did omit to mention the fact that the manager of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, speaking at Moose Jaw—I cannot give the exact date but it was about four months ago—predicted that those who in this dominion were assuming that there would be a large carryover, would be very much mistaken because the carryover as he figured it out would be eighty-one million bushels and at the outside not more than one hundred million bushels. Well, we have heard the Prime Minister's statement that the figure is from two hundred million to two hundred and twenty-five million, and he thinks we ought to open our mouths and shut our eyes and take the bill at a gulp, in the absence of information with respect to the administration of this undertaking.

These are some of the matters on which it seems to me this house as well as the country is entitled to receive information. I repeat to my right hon. friend that he will not find any record of any man in this house opposing or criticizing the action of the government in granting assistance to the western wheat situation. No criticism had been made of the action taken but there has been criticism expressly on this point, namely, as regards the method whereby the undertaking was carried out. That is the only criticism which is levelled at him, and that criticism he has to meet in the country on the hustings when the time comes.

What has been the effect of all this? The result is that we have over two hundred million bushels of wheat on hand. What, I ask, has been the effect, not simply on the taxpayers of Canada but on the western wheat grower? The western wheat grower with his new crop will in a month or two find himself in competition with about two hundred million bushels of wheat which he thought he had sold but which is being held at the present time by this government and is hanging over the market. And my right hon. friend, with all his knowledge of the western situation, with all his knowledge of the financial situation, must know that this is bound to be a very important factor in relation to any possibility of increasing the price of this commodity in world markets, as he is so anxious to do. We have two hundred million bushels held by the government of this dominion and no information as to when it may be thrown on the market—nothing to indicate what may be the policy of the government with respect to it, but it is simply to be handed over to the grain board, under this government for the time being, if my right hon. friend intends to appoint the board before the election. It is to be left to the mercy of this policy of hit or miss, the interests of the producer being left out of consideration entirely.

As regards the interests of the producer, let me read a dispatch which appears in the Ottawa Journal of June 12, to-day, in connection with wheat shipments:

The dispatch is from Fort William as follows:

> World Wheat Shipments In Substantial Increase
> Fort William, June 11.—World shipments of wheat and flour during May increased substantially over April, it was shown to-day in the monthly report of the board of grain commissioners. Exports from North America, the report shows, so far this crop year have decreased sharply from the same period of last year, in comparison with increases in Argentine and Australian clearances.

My right hon. friend, in his desire to be fair, went back as far as 1920 and 1921, but he omitted to give the figures for to-day, June 12.

Mr. BENNETT: I may say that those figures were included in the statement I gave. I gave the figures up to the end of May.

Mr. RALSTON: Not to date.

Mr. BENNETT: Those figures were the same.

Mr. RALSTON: They might possibly be included in the mass of figures given by the right hon. gentleman, but I noticed very distinctly that when he was asked a question by my right hon. leader, the latter received a very sharp reply to the effect that my right hon. friend could give only the volume of exports to the end of the crop years. He used the expression "facts, not fancies."

Mr. BENNETT: I gave the figures to the end of May.

Mr. RALSTON: He gave prices to the end of May.

Mr. BENNETT: I gave the figures.

Mr. RALSTON: I accept the right hon. gentleman's statement, but I do not remember it. I made a very careful record of that and I do not find the volume of exports up to the end of May.

Mr. BENNETT: I gave the figures.

Mr. RALSTON: I accept my right hon. friend's statement, but Hansard will record what was said. I thought that was the question on which my right hon. leader had asked for information and had been rather cavalierly refused it when it was requested.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the question he asked.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. leader is within the recollection of every hon. member as having asked for a statement up to date with regard to the volume of exports.

Mr. BENNETT: He asked if I would give an estimate of the carry-over at this time. That is not a question as to the exports at all.

Mr. RALSTON: That is one point; that is to say, the necessity for the fullest information in connection with the transactions which have taken place in connection with the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers transactions and the other point is the one which I have already made, that this is no time for the government to attempt to impose upon Canada and the Canadian wheat growers a permanent wheat policy. I was proceeding to state what effect this policy had had on the western wheat grower himself. As I pointed out, he finds himself in competition with the wheat which he thought he had sold. Next, he finds, notwithstanding what my right hon. friend says about percentages, that the customer on the other side is learning to do without Canadian wheat and that, notwithstanding the fact that my right hon. friend boasts about having been given a preference of six cents a bushel on wheat, the Argentine is outstripping us in exports to Great Britain. That, the western wheat grower can appreciate fully. My right hon. friend may bluff and bluster, as he did this afternoon, on the platforms of western Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order!

Mr. RALSTON: Would hon. members permit me to use the word "bluster"? I will withdraw the word "bluff." My right hon. friend may bluster on the platforms of western Canada with regard to what this government has done for the western wheat grower, but the latter will have a very vivid and lively recollection of the fact that he is in competition with his own wheat which he thought was off the market, and that the market is very largely lost to him. My right hon. friend is only anticipating his own downfall when he makes such statements.

Mr. GOTT: Will the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GOTT: To show whether his party is going to be returned to power, I would like to have him indicate any section of Canada where there is any public enthusiasm for him or his party or his leader. There certainly is none in my constituency.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will consider four out of five ridings in which by-elections were held recently, he can find that out; and there were also a couple of by-elections which took place the year before.

Mr. GOTT: I am referring not to by-elections but to a general election.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend ought not to allow his enthusiasm to deceive himself with regard to his own constituency, because he may even find some difficulty there.

We recognize just as fully as does anybody else, the importance to the dominion of the western wheat grower, of the product which comes from there, of the value which it represents to those in the east and of the fact, to use my right hon. friend's resounding phrase, that the "body politic" is very much concerned with the prosperity of the men and women who till the land out in the west. Regardless of what my right hon. friend says, he will find on this side of the house just as enthusiastic, warm-hearted, sympathetic and sincere advocates of the interests of the western wheat grower as he himself assumed to be this afternoon. Let me say to him that we realize fully the gallant fight which is being made by the men and women in that part of Canada. But we believe they have some rights there, and the government of the dominion cannot and ought not to take from them without security the right to market their product subject to regulations and subject to assistance which may be regarded as necessary from time to time.

My right hon. friend has asked for suggestions, and I think he is entitled to the answer that he gave so often when he was on this side of the house—"When I am called in, I will prescribe." Speaking for myself, my view is that legislation of this kind should not be of a permanent character without very much more consideration than can be given to it at this late date. We on this side are quite prepared, as we always have been, to recognize the situation in the west. We are quite prepared to recognize that one of the great problems of the farmers of the west is the fact that their bins are not empty while those of the Argentine farmers are; we believe that a board when it is appointed, if it takes over the undertakings of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers, should be vested with authority and should have as one of its major duties the obligation to see to the liquidation of that wheat as soon as that can be done in an orderly fashion. That is one of the duties which seems to have been neglected by Mr. McFarland who under my right hon. friend has succeeded in increasing the holding of 75,000,000 bushels up to more than 200,000,000 bushels in the last few years.

Mr. GOTT: Is the hon. member for or against the bill?

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 13, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

PACIFIC COAST SHIPPING

FOURTH REPORT OF SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE ON INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina) presented the fourth report of the select standing committee on industrial and international relations, as follows:

Your committe has considered the following resolution as amended which has been referred to it and which is in the following terms:

"Resolved, whereas great numbers of Canadian seamen on the Pacific coast of British Columbia are out of employment and in many cases destitute; and whereas owners of ships and vessels of Canadian registry on the Pacific coast of British Columbia give employment in large measure to seamen, cooks and engineers of Oriental origin; and whereas other countries give greater consideration to the employment of their own nationals on ships and vessels belonging to their own country; and whereas the Canadian government grant large sums of money to the owners of ships and vessels by way of subsidies; and whereas it is desirable that every encouragement be given for the employment of officers, seamen, cooks and engineers of white Canadian citizenship in preference to those of Oriental origin on all Canadian owned and registered ships and vessels; therefore be it resolved that the question of employment of greater numbers of white Canadian citizens on all ships and vessels of Canadian ownership and registry, the owners of which receive grants of money from the public treasury of Canada, be referred to the standing committee on industrial and international relations."

No evidence was submitted to the committee to indicate the numbers of Canadian seamen on the Pacific coast of British Columbia who were out of employment or destitute nor with respect to the consideration given by other countries to the employment of their own nationals on ships and vessels belonging to their own country.

According to the evidence submitted to the committee, money is paid from the public treasury of Canada to owners of ships of Canadian ownership and registry in two ways —one by direct subsidy or grant and, second, for carriage of mails. Your committee is of opinion that the latter form of payment is pursuant to a contract for service and is not a grant and is therefore not within the terms of the reference.

Again, according to the evidence, there are ships engaged in coastwise trade and others plying between Canadian and Oriental ports, some carrying freight and some carrying passengers as well. Some of these ships carry mail for the Post Office Department as a condition of receiving a subsidy from the Department of Trade and Commerce and some receive a subsidy from the latter department and are paid an additional amount for their services to the post office.

With respect to subsidized trans-Pacific trade it appears from the evidence that there is no contract between any department of the government and the steamship lines engaged in such trade requiring the employment of any proportion of white Canadian citizens. It was represented by witnesses from the departments of government concerned that with respect to freight traffic, Canadian lumber is being carried into a highly competitive market in competition with subsidized American ships carrying American lumber, and that any change that might result in increased cost might endanger that portion of Canadian export trade; and that with respect to the passenger trade there is the additional difficulty in employment of white Canadian citizens where a substantial portion of the passengers are oriental.

The evidence submitted establishes that the ships engaged in the coastwise trade, the owners of which receive subsidies, are required by contract to employ British subjects to the extent of two-thirds of their full personnel but these British subjects are not required by the contract to be white Canadian citizens. This term of the contract is being fully carried out in all cases and as a matter of fact it appears that more than the required two-thirds are white as well as British. The evidence established to the committee that no change in the contracts with respect to employees has been made in recent years.

Your committee are of the opinion that while in view of economic conditions and the keen competition existing for international trade the carriage of freight and pasengers should not be unduly hampered and while it appears from the evidence that owners of ships referred to are making reasonable efforts to comply not only with their contracts but with the spirit of the resolution referred to the committee, nevertheless the departments of government concerned should be urged to continue to keep close check on the operations of such ships so as to secure the employment of as many white Canadian citizens as is reasonably possible.

A copy of the minutes of proceedings and evidence is tabled herewith.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move that the third report of the standing committee on industrial and international relations be concurred in. That is the report in regard to pensions for the blind.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I ask that that motion stand.

Motion stands.

B.C. RELIEF CAMP STRIKERS

REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO MOVE ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the situation with regard to the relief camp strikers now marching towards Ottawa and, according to reports, to be stopped by orders from Ottawa.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is there any discussion of the motion?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I think I have a right to discuss this motion unless there is an objection raised.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may state the question but he cannot discuss the motion itself until after I have given my ruling whether it is in order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Quite right, Mr. Speaker, but I do not see how the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) can discuss the motion.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am raising the point of order that the subject matter of the motion is not such as should under the rules be brought into this house on a motion to adjourn. This is a continuing grievance, if I may use the expression. It has been going on in British Columbia, where it originated, since the beginning of April, and the difficulty is now moving eastward to a point in Saskatchewan at the city of Regina. If we are to discuss this question at each of the points where these marchers may determine to halt I think we would interfere seriously with the business of this house. It has been decided on a similar motion, when these men were in Vancouver, that it was not a question which could be discussed on a motion to adjourn the house, and I submit that the arguments then used still prevail and that the matter should not now be discussed.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) I would rather be inclined to agree with him if this were a general discussion. I did not hear the exact terms of my hon. friend's motion, but if the press dispatches are correct there have been recent developments, and on the orders of the day I intended to ask a question in regard to the specific matter which is of recent occurrence, affecting the employment of the Canadian Mounted Police and the question of jurisdiction as between the dominion and the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I expected that question and I was prepared to reply to it on the orders of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In that respect I think the motion would be in order, but I think generally speaking if there were no recent occurrence, it would not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, of course every event is connected in some way with all previous events; there is nothing new under the sun, but I do submit that there are aspects of this situation which are quite new. When the matter was discussed some weeks ago the men were in Vancouver; to-day they are on march to Ottawa. It is a different situation, entirely different, even although many of the men may be the same individuals.

In order that a matter may be discussed on a motion to adjourn the house there are two requirements that must be met under the rules. First, the matter must be recent, and secondly it must be urgent. I think that both those conditions are clearly fulfilled in my motion. First of all, the situation which has arisen within the last twenty-four hours is a very serious one, so serious that we have a protest from the premier of the province of Saskatchewan asking that the Prime Minister of this country, to use the premier's own words, "should keep his hands off the policing of the province." Surely a charge of that kind from the premier of a province against the Prime Minister is a matter that should receive the attention of this house now assembled. The premier goes that far and deliberately protests against the interference of this government, especially after the statement of our own Prime Minister that he would not interfere unless requested to do so by the province. I think that is a very anomalous situation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, this is not a point of order. This is an argument of the case.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am discussing the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I say that whether or not this motion should come before this house depends according to our rule on whether the matter is of recent occurrence and is urgent in character, and the Minister of Justice suggested that this was a matter that had been taken up before, a continuing matter. I am suggesting that it is altogether a new situation that faces us.

In the next place, according to the papers—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not think the hon. member should go into the facts other than what is necessary to state the question.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am trying to state why—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member cannot argue the motion. He must stick to the point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not arguing the motion, Mr. Speaker, I am stating the urgency. As a matter of fact these marchers are under guard. I would like to know under what authority these men are under arrest.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You can ask that on the orders of the day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will agree that the statement he has just made is not on the point of order at all.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Surely Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not in order for the hon. member to discuss the motion. The hon. member surely appreciates that fact. I am willing to give him every latitude in stating his case but he cannot argue the motion at this stage, or until he gets leave of the house to do so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am arguing that this is of recent occurrence, that the liberty of the subject is violated, that these men are forcibly detained and under guard, so we are told by the press. Now that is a new matter, and we ought to have the fullest information in regard to it in order to present our case. If that is the policy that is going to be pursued there is bound to be a clash probably resulting in bloodshed, and I submit that therefore the matter is urgent.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, whatever our views may be as to the merits of the question and the means that should be adopted to solve it, I think that the motion has the two elements which the rules require to permit it to be discussed at this time. First, it is of sufficient importance and, second, it is recent. The other day I voted reluctantly against the ruling of Your Honour but the question to-day is still more urgent and more important than that brought up the other day, especially in view of the apparent conflict which exists between this government and the provincial government of Saskatchewan and which should be settled immediately. I do not think that this House of Commons should be prevented from discussing this matter.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (South Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, there are three conditions precedent to a motion of this kind. First, it must be recent; second, it must be urgent and, third, it must be of public importance. What makes this an urgent matter of public importance is not the trek of the unemployed relief camp workers from British Columbia but the action of this government in stopping them at a certain point. If it is not urgent, why should the government give an order to stop the march? If it is not of public importance, why should the government give an order to stop the march? This order having been given, this matter then becomes a matter for discussion in the house and I contend that the question is perfectly in order.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I think the point has been made abundantly clear. We should first define the subject matter of the discussion. Unemployment has been discussed already in the house but that is not the subject matter of this motion. The subject matter is the march of the unemployed and the fact that the government took advantage of the peace, order and good government legislation to change its policies with regard to the unemployment camps. At first these camps were only for single homeless men, but now they are being used for all the men marching to Ottawa. This second point has not been discussed in the house as yet.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the first place I want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) for being good enough to draw my attention to the fact that he proposed making this motion when the house went into session this afternoon and thus giving me an opportunity of considering the matter. I should also like to express a pious wish that the day will soon arrive when the house will so amend rule 31 as to throw the responsibility upon the house and not upon the Speaker for decisions in connection with motions of this nature. However, as the rule now stands it is my duty to decide, subject to appeal to the house, whether or not this matter is one of such urgent public importance as to come under the provisions of rule 31. I may say that I consider that I have already settled this matter, as has the house itself. On May 22 last, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) moved the following motion, to be found on page 2970 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I ask leave under standing order 31 to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, to call the attention of the house and the government to the acute situation in the city of Vancouver, British Columbia, due to the presence in that city of a large number of men from the unemployment relief camps who are destitute and for whom the city authorities can make no provision, creating a situation which endangers the peace.

The motion moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre reads:

> I beg leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the situation with regard to the relief camp strikers now marching towards Ottawa and according to reports to be stopped by orders from Ottawa.

I would point out that substantially the same people are referred to in the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as are referred to in the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver South. The situation concerning those involved is very much the same as existed at the time the hon. member for Vancouver South moved his motion, the scene of action having merely moved from Vancouver to Regina. Nothing has apparently arisen since May 22, the date upon which the hon. member for Vancouver South moved his motion, concerning the matters under discussion which would in my opinion warrant me in coming to a different conclusion than I did on the previous motion. In fact there are now even stronger reasons for ruling the present motion out of order. Three weeks have elapsed since the first motion was moved and there have been opportunities when the subject matter of this motion could have been discussed without recourse to the special provision of this standing order. If I were right on the former occasion, and I think I was, I have greater reason now to rule this motion our of order, which I accordingly do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I regret very much to have to challenge Your Honour's ruling. It seems to me that possibly your ruling was written before you heard some of the arguments advanced this afternoon.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall have to challenge your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is quite right. The major portion of the ruling which I gave was written before I heard the argument but there was nothing in the argument which had not been considered before the memorandum was drawn up. I trust the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre intended no reflection upon the Speaker when he made the remark which he did.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There was no reflection intended. I thought there were one or two points advanced which were not mentioned in the written ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has moved the adjournment of the house, under standing order 31, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the situation with regard to the relief camp strikers now marching towards Ottawa and according to reports to be stopped by orders from Ottawa. I have ruled this motion out of order and from that ruling the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre appeals.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

EXCHANGE FUND

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister, for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 101, respecting the establishment of an exchange fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Explain.

Mr. BENNETT: I mentioned a few days ago that it be proposed to introduce permissive legislation with respect to this matter because it might be necessary in the interests of the country to utilize the surplus that would arise from the revaluation of gold for exchange fund purposes rather than to pay it into the consolidated fund. Provision is made in this bill accordingly. That provision will come into force on proclamation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NAVIGATION OF COLUMBIA RIVER

Mr. REID:

According to a treaty entered into in 1846 between the United States of America and Her Majesty on behalf of Canada for the settlement of the Oregon boundary, in clause 2 thereof, it was expressly agreed that the Columbia river and its branches were to be kept open for the free use and navigation of all British subjects from the 49th parallel of north latitude to the Pacific ocean,—

1. Is the government aware that the provisions of this clause have been violated?
2. If so, what steps have been taken to protect the interests of the Canadian people so as to keep inviolate the provisions of the treaty and particularly clause 2 of the agreement?
3. If not, will steps be taken to see that the terms of the treaty are lived up to in every particular?

Mr. BENNETT: The question does not quite correctly state the terms of the treaty of 1846 for the settlement of the Oregon boundary. The second clause of the treaty reads as follows:

From the point at which the 49th parallel of north latitude shall be found to intersect the great northern branch of the Columbia river, the navigation of the said branch shall be free and open to the Hudson's Bay Company, and to all British subjects trading with the same, to the point where the said branch meets the main stream of the Columbia, and thence down the said main stream to the ocean, with free access into and through the said river or rivers; it being understood, that all the usual portages along the line thus described, shall in like manner be free and open.

The government is fully aware of the development which is taking place in the lower Columbia river, in the United States of America, and of the possible relation of that development to article II of the treaty. It would not be in accordance with public policy for the government to state at this stage whether or not they are of the opinion that the treaty has been violated or may be violated by the completion of the construction plans which are under way. The question will continue to receive the attention of the government.

B.C. RELIEF CAMP STRIKERS

STATEMENT ON BEHALF OF GOVERNMENT OF ACTION TAKEN TO HALT MOVEMENT TOWARDS OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question. Has he a further statement to make with reference to the situation regarding the unemployed men proceeding eastward, according to press dispatches?

Mr. BENNETT: The matter will be dealt with by the Minister of Justice.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): As I had notice of this question, I have prepared a brief statement in regard to the matter as it now stands. From information which has come to the government, the government is satisfied that the present easterly march of so-called camp strikers from British Columbia, which has now reached Regina, has been organized and is under the direction of certain communist elements throughout Canada and is a deliberate attempt to disturb the peace, order and good government of Canada by unlawful means.

The marchers since leaving Vancouver have been trespassers upon railway property and railway trains, both upon the Canadian Pacific railway and Canadian National railways and are continuing their march in open disregard of the provisions of section 443 of the Railway Act. This unlawful movement of the marchers, now estimated at about 1,500, jeopardizes both the lives of travellers and the property of both railways. Both railway companies have intimated to the government that they are unable, through lack of sufficient railway police, to clear their trains of these marchers and have requested the assistance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to enable them to clear trains, yards and railway property of these trespassers. I have been informed that both of the railways have made representations through their officials to the government of the province of Saskatchewan in regard to the situation and have requested the cooperation of the provincial government in regard to the matter.

In the province of Saskatchewan, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police act as provincial police under the provisions of an agreement made between the dominion and provincial governments, under which agreement the mounted police act under the instructions of provincial law officers in regard to the enforcement of the criminal law of Canada, but in these agreements there is a special reservation providing that the mounted police shall have full authority to enforce the provisions of all dominion statutes, which would include the Railway Act of Canada, under the provisions of which act these marchers are now and have been since leaving Vancouver trespassers upon railway property. Both railways are apprehensive of serious consequences to their passengers, employees and property if a stop is not put to the further movement of these strikers.

The government has, therefore, decided to take such action as may be necessary, through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or otherwise, to assist the railway constabulary of both roads in stopping at Regina the further trespassing upon railway property, and instructions have gone forward to this effect.

Upon arrival at Regina the men will be expressly warned through their leaders by officials of the railways that further trespassing upon railway property will be definitely prevented, and in other respects the marchers will be required to obey the laws of the country.

The government views the action of the marchers as a distinct menace to the peace, order and good government of Canada, and it also realizes that unless discontinued it may ultimately produce serious damage to life and property upon the railways.

The government has, therefore, determined to utilize the forces at its disposal to assist in preventing further trespasses or other breaches of the law by the marchers and to maintain law and order.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Following up the statement just made by the Minister of Justice, may I ask a further question? Is he informed that, as I am given to understand is the case, during the period of the stay of the camp strikers in Calgary, soldiers were moved in from the Sarcee camp to that city? I would like to know whether the minister has any information on that matter, if so, for what purpose the soldiers were placed there, by whom they were requested and who placed the order for their presence.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no information whatever in regard to anything that transpired at Calgary.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he will give to a small group representing these men who are now on their way to Ottawa, facilities to come to the city so that they may interview him and lay their case before him.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Since I have been Prime Minister there never has been a time that the government has been unwilling to receive delegations from any body in this country, and we are prepared and ready to do so at any time that may be possible and convenient as to the hour.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether any definite charges have been laid against the men who are now being held under guard?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not aware that any men are being held under guard. There were not any this morning as reported to me and I have heard nothing since eleven o'clock.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): In view of the statement just read by the Minister of Justice, how can he contend that this is not a matter of urgent public importance?

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): May I address a question to the Prime Minister in connection with the statement just read by the Minister of Justice? Have any arrangements been or are any being made or contemplated through either the provincial government of Saskatchewan or the city of Regina for the maintenance of these men until more permanent provision is made for them?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No arrangement of the kind has been made as yet.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Will the government consider the situation in Regina with a view to assisting the city to maintain these people who are being thrust into its midst and to help in protecting the lives and property of citizens there?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not before heard any intimation on the part of anyone from the city of Regina that relief was at the time needed for these men. Should a request of that kind come, it will be very carefully considered, but so far none has been received.

Mr. HANBURY: May I ask the Minister of Justice a question arising out of his latest answer? Will it be necessary for the government of Saskatchewan to make the representations or must they come from the city of Regina, or will the government consider them only if they come from the city of Regina?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will wait until they come before I decide that.

FARNHAM, QUE., POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) addressed to me a question about tenders for the public building at Farnham and asked me to make a statement which I promised to do to-day. Public tenders were not invited for reasons that have been given in the house time and time again. In pursuance of the suggestion of many members on all sides of the house that in carrying out these public works, particularly those in smaller communities, all efforts possible should be made to see that the work be given to contractors in the locality rather than that the larger contractors should be permitted to secure all these works, tenders were invited from the following firms:

Stewart Construction Company Limited, Sherbrooke.
George N. Thompson, Sutton.
William Clark, Sutton.
N. L. Lussier, Farnham.
Ralph W. Wallace, Knowlton.

Four tenders were received in answer to this request, and I am pleased to be able to tell my hon. friend that the result of the tenders is very satisfactory; that we have competition and that the lowest tenderer offers to do the work for substantially below the architect's estimate.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Sir:— Ottawa, June 13, 1935.

I have the honour to inform you that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General will proceed to the Senate chamber this day at 5 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

F. L. C. Pereira,
Secretary.

CANADIAN GRAIN BOARD

PURCHASE, STORAGE AND MARKETING OF WHEAT AND OTHER GRAINS

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 98, to provide for the constitution and powers of the Canadian grain board.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): When the house rose at six o'clock yesterday I was emphasizing the point that a major duty of any grain board appointed now will be to liquidate or get out of the way the tremendous carry-over, the amount of which was disclosed for the first time by the Prime Minister yesterday. And at the same time I submit that the board will have the equally important duty to seek to maintain a stabilized price structure so as to protect the Canadian wheat growers against a runaway market. I submit that it is the failure of the government to carry out that first duty which has produced the critical situation in which we find ourselves to-day. There has been too great a tendency, as I have pointed out in this house more than once, to bet on uncertainties in the hope of winning and making a reputation. The stakes were too big and the consequences have proved to be altogether too serious. In 1930 the government took over the job of marketing the wheat crop. They took over 75,000,000 bushels, and instead of marketing that wheat the amount on hand has increased by about three times, so that as the Prime Minister intimated yesterday the carry-over to-day is between 220,000,000 and 225,000,000 bushels. I would think that by the end of the crop year probably that amount will not be reduced by more than perhaps ten or twelve million. Instead of paying the producer and selling the wheat and taking the loss if necessary, the policy of the government and its agency has been to try to make the customer pay the shot by holding wheat at prices out of line with the prices of our competitors.

The Prime Minister put on Hansard yesterday some figures with regard to the exports of this country to Great Britain. I complained then and I reiterate that complaint, that he did not compare the exports of Canada with the exports of her competitors, showing that the competitors of Canada have outstripped us in the matter of exports. Following the point I have just made I say that what we have been doing is to try to hold our wheat at prices out of line with those of our competitors, with the result that our exports and opportunities for sale have gone down and the western farmer is facing loss of markets, and hostility between his customers and himself which is going to be difficult to overcome. To illustrate that point, I hold in my hand a statement showing the spread between the prices of Canadian wheat and Argentine wheat during the last few years. On that I have put the figures given by the Prime Minister yesterday showing the exports of Canada. I find that in the year 1927-28 the average of the spread between Argentine and Canada was 12⅛ cents a bushel; that is Canadian wheat brought a price 12⅛ cents per bushel higher than Argentine. In that year we exported 332,000,000 bushels.

In 1928-29 the spread was 11⅞ cents, and in that year we marketed 407,000,000 bushels. In 1929-30 the spread was 17⅜ cents. What happened to exports? The logical thing happened, namely, they went down, and we were unable to sell as much because the spread was greater.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Would the hon. gentleman tell us what he means by that spread, is it the average or is it on certain grades?

Mr. RALSTON: Canadian Atlantic No. 2 over Argentine.

In 1929-30 with a spread of 17⅜ cents the exports were 186,000,000 bushels. In 1930-31 with an average spread of 8¼ cents we exported 258,000,000 bushels; in 1931-32 the spread was 8⅝ and exports 207,000,000; in 1932-33 the spread dropped to 7 cents and the exports rose to 264,000,000 bushels. For 1933-34 the spread went up to 18½ and we only exported 194,000,000. From August 1 to December 31, 1934, the spread for the five months was 21¾ cents and our exports to the end of May, 1935, have been 146,000,000.

That is the great difficulty which we have in connection with marketing our wheat. My right hon. friend talks about markets being closed and difficulties overseas. The markets want Canadian wheat, but the trouble is the government is holding it at a price that they are unwilling to pay, and the government is unwilling to take the loss which would be sustained by paying the producer a fair price and selling the wheat. The result is that we are losing our markets.

Now what is the situation in regard to exports? My right hon. friend went back to 1921. I am not going to trouble about 1921, but I have here an extract from the Montreal Star of June 12, 1935—last night. This is what it says with regard to comparative exports from the North American continent and Argentina and Australia:

> Exports from North America, the report shows—

That is the report of the board of grain commissioners.

> —so far this crop year have decreased sharply from the same period of last year, in comparison with increases in Argentina and Australian clearances.
> In the forty-four weeks of the current crop year, North America exported almost 139,000,000 bushels of wheat and flour, says the report, Argentina almost 160,000,000 and Australia 98,000,000 bushels. In the same period of last season, North America cleared 191,000,000 bushels, Argentina 110,000,000 and Australia 74,000,000.

That is North America exported this year 139,000,000 as against 191,000,000 last year, Argentina 160,000,000 as against 110,000,000 last year and Australia 98,000,000 this year as against 74,000,000 last year.

My right hon. friend may say, Well, but you are dealing with the whole North American continent, why not deal with Canadian wheat? Let me give the house Canadian exports for the first ten months of this crop year as they appear in the Montreal Star of last night. For the ten months, ending I presume with April, 1935, the exports from Canada were 113,802,184 bushels. For the corresponding ten months of 1934 they were 140,709,966, or a decrease this year of some 27,000,000 bushels. Argentina in the same ten months exported 160,000,000 as against 110,000,000 a year ago, in other words an increase of 50,000,000 bushels this year. In the same ten months Australia exported this year 98,000,000 bushels and for the corresponding period last year 74,000,000, an increase this year of 24,000,000.

There is Canada's situation, a decrease of 27,000,000 bushels for the ten months compared with last year, while Argentina increased by 50,000,000 and Australia by 24,000,000. My right hon. friend tells us that the Argentine situation is pretty well cleared up on an expenditure of something like $2,200,000.

I give those examples in order to indicate what it seems to me is one of the fundamental mistakes which this government has made. I also pointed out yesterday instances in which, if reports are true, this government not only held when they had opportunity to sell but actually bought more. The result was that we have piled up this year 220 to 225 million bushels?

So what is the position we are facing to-day and what is the reason for this bill which my right hon. friend has introduced? To-day we are facing the probability of a carry-over of 210 million bushels and a new crop of probably 400 million and the question is what we are going to do about it in this parliament and this country? My right hon. friend has been very good about asking for suggestions. But I ask him in all seriousness and I ask this house, has my right hon. friend any right to ask suggestions from anybody in view of the way this wheat business has been run for the last three or four years? This government and its administration have contributed greatly to that immense carry-over. Until yesterday they have never disclosed to this house just how much was being carried. As a matter of fact a year ago, and I believe also two years ago, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) inquired with regard to guarantees, and the answer given by the Prime Minister indicated that there was only one guarantee. But now I believe —and I can only assume, because we have not yet the exact information—I assume that there were several guarantees given from time to time.

Mr. BENNETT: Only one guarantee each year.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, that makes four guarantees, anyway, that were given. There were several orders in council passed, and we have yet to see the guarantees that were given, when the bill is considered in committee. I assume the guarantee contains some restriction as to the number of bushels which Mr. McFarland could buy. Surely the government did not give a blank guarantee to Mr. McFarland permitting him to commit this country to any number of bushels he wished to take on. If that is so, then it seems to me that those figures should have been disclosed to the house. When the hon. member for Quebec East asked for the guarantees the information was that they varied from day to day. But the guarantee must have, or at least should have contained in it a definite figure indicating the number of bushels to which this country was willing to be committed, and respecting which this country was endorsing the note of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. We have no information about that, at all.

Then, each year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) comes down with his budget and makes a laconic reference to the wheat situation. One year he said that probably if the wheat was sold at the price indicated we would come out square. Another year he gave us the illuminating information that the question as to whether or not we would lose on our wheat was dependent on the price for which we would sell it,—and perhaps in that he was not far out. This year all the information the house or country has received with regard to Canada's liability in connection with wheat is that information contained in the budget speech, when it shows the guarantee to the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers as being an unstated amount. There was no information as to the bushelage, let alone as to the amount.

We should have information as to the actual cash which has been advanced by the banks for the purpose of purchasing direct from the farmers, for the purpose of putting up margins, if necessary and, further, we should have a statement with regard to the actual bushelage on hand. Then, if my right

hon. friend can give it, or if anybody can give it, we should have information as to the prospective loss which this country might sustain if a policy of orderly marketing were carried out. I say my right hon. friend was not entitled, nor was he in a good position to ask for suggestions from this house, in view of the fact that his government has been so secretive about operations. They have carried on with a high hand; they have indicated that information was not to be given. As a matter of fact, there was no by-your-leave in any way. Certainly they have had warnings enough. In the press of Canada since 1933 their attention has constantly been called to it. Then, from time to time in this house we have pointed out the position in which this house and country have been placed because of the tremendous guarantees and unlimited liability under the order in council of January, 1931, and those following. But no information has been given. I do not think my right hon. friend could blame anybody for saying to him, "You have made this mess; get out of it."

That is not the attitude I shall take, personally. I should like to make one or two suggestions of my own, if I may. They may be of some assistance, and I should like the Prime Minister to consider them. In the first place I say this is an emergent situation. It is not a situation which should be covered by permanent legislation at this stage. This is not a time to evolve a policy. I repeat that this is an emergent situation because of the fact that this parliament, which is over five years old, has not a mandate from the people to take over our biggest industry, and make of it a government monopoly. It has no more mandate in connection with the wheat industry than it has a mandate to take over the fishing industry, the lumbering industry, the mining industry, or the marketing of butter, cattle, or milk. There is no mandate of any kind in this parliament to formulate at this late stage a policy revolutionary in its character, so far as this dominion is concerned. These facts, it seems to me, indicate that this is an emergent situation, because we are called upon to deal with it, notwithstanding the fact that we have not received from the people a mandate to do so.

Secondly, this is an emergent situation because of the fact that we have only now had disclosed the amount of carry-overs and have only now been permitted to guess or to contemplate the possible liability of Canada. Can we possibly deal with this matter by way of a permanent policy with no more information than that? Can we deal with it when that information has been brought down only at the last minute? We have no information about the advances this year to the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. We know nothing about the cash liability to the bank. We know only that we have about 225,000,000 bushels of wheat on hand, some in the form of futures and some in the form of cash wheat. Can we deal with this matter by way of a settled policy? I say we cannot. I repeat that this is an emergent situation, and all that can be done at the present time is to pass some legislation which may bridge the gap, and give an opportunity at some later date to deal with the matter.

I say, thirdly, that this is an emergent situation because the government of Canada is in no small measure to blame for these carry-overs, and has no right to ask parliament to pass a statute to whitewash and cover up the transactions for which it has been responsible, to establish a board to take over the loss which has been created, and then have that board damned from the start by a liability which it has undertaken and for which the government is responsible. And so, under the circumstances again making my suggestion to the Prime Minister, in view of his invitation—and these are suggestions which he may or may not consider worth while—I say to him that so far as I am concerned I would assent to the principle of a Canadian grain board. That is the first thing. But, secondly, I would deal with the situation which really exists, namely, I would treat it as an emergent situation, or if you wish so to describe it, as a crisis, and not as a permanent situation for which at this time we can legislate.

Thirdly, I say I would set up a board for some limited period—say until the next parliament, or for a year—in order to indicate that what we are doing is that which the Prime Minister suggested yesterday, namely, that we are perpetuating the existing organization in the form of a board, and giving statutory sanction to the operations which previously have been carried on by the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, such board having the benefit of the discussions which we will have in the house and committee as to the policy which might be followed later.

In his speech of yesterday the Prime Minister is reported at page 3577 of Hansard as follows:

> The bill, the second reading of which I have moved, is one predicated upon the fact that the general manager of this company whose operations have enabled this end to be accomplished is not further able to discharge his normal duties. I have indicated, therefore, that a wheat board in name—because we have had one in reality during the last two years—that a wheat board in name and reality should be set up.

That does not sound like a permanent policy. Mr. McFarland was not operating permanently. He was in charge of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited for the purpose of a limited job, and only in connection with the job of disposing of the 1930 wheat was he given power to go into the market and purchase wheat to stabilize the price. Although my right hon. friend's speech of yesterday indicated that Mr. McFarland's work is being perpetuated by this bill it is possible it is not to be adopted as a permanent policy. I will take the Prime Minister at his word. I will believe that that is what he intended—that this is being done simply because of Mr. McFarland's illness and his inability longer to attend to these duties. Along that same line I would point out what the Prime Minister said on the resolution itself, in order to indicate that this board is more or less a continuation of what has already been done, and in order to indicate also that it is not intended to be a permanent thing, but to follow along the lines of the work Mr. McFarland has been doing. He says, speaking in this house on June 10, 1935, as reported at page 3460 of Hansard:

> It would be highly improper for me to undertake to say what any government might or might not do in the future. It is contemplated that the government will be given the power to give such assistance to this board as may be necessary to enable it to function. Beyond that I feel I could not and should not go.

I say to my right hon. friend if that was the situation, and I take him at his word, then what is to be done here is not the determination of a permanent policy, but the creation of a board for a limited length of time, and in that same connection comes my next suggestion. I would strike out or eliminate the compulsory feature which is contained in this bill. Mr. McFarland has no compulsory power to make people sell their wheat to him, but this act by virtue of giving control over the elevators does create a situation whereby the whole grain trade is tied up and made subservient to this board. I say to the Prime Minister that I would eliminate that compulsory feature, taking him again at his word when he intimated that all we are doing is to carry on Mr. McFarland's work.

Mr. BENNETT: Not all.

Mr. TURNBULL: I suggest that the hon. member move an amendment.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend says that he did not say that that was all the board would do. I think it is quite clear that all he said was that we are going to have a board in name as well as in fact, but there was no suggestion that it was going to be anything more, and I suggest to my right hon. friend that the compulsory feature should come out of the bill.

I would give the board—here is another suggestion—ample power to liquidate and get the present dangerous overhang out of the way just as soon as it is possible to do it in orderly fashion. I would give them equally ample power at the same time to conduct stabilizing operations when necessary to protect the producer.

In connection with the whole matter, Mr. Speaker, I would recognize what I cannot say has been recognized by the government, that the board's operations are by way of assistance in a national emergency, and that if there is a loss the country pays it; but that gambling and speculating to minimize that loss is no part of the board's duties or functions.

I would recognize what I think has also been lost sight of, and that is that we still have to have customers if the wheat industry in the west is going to thrive, and while in this emergency there may have to be some spread between the price to the farmer and the world price, yet wheat is to sell and not to hold, and we are only stirring up trouble for ourselves if we try to exact more from the customer than we are entitled to by reason of the quality of our product. But that is the policy which has been followed, and which has contributed in no small degree to the serious situation in which we find ourselves to-day.

Mr. LOUCKS: Does the hon. member think that 75 or 80 cents a bushel at the head of the lakes is an extravagant price to the farmers?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Who ever said so?

Mr. RALSTON: I might just as well ask my hon. friend from Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) what he thinks about legal fees. I am not dealing with the matter in dollars and cents; I am dealing with the policy of the government. What I say is that the western farmer should get the best possible price for his product, and I am pointing out that at the present time the farmer is losing his market and is unable to get a fair price, and is faced with this tremendous overhang due to the action of this government.

I would recognize further that permanent action on this great question is not for a parliament which has outrun its allotted span of life, according to the usual constitutional practice, and faces dissolution almost hourly. I submit that that question is for a new parliament fresh from the people, and which can act in the light of full information in connection with the transactions of the past and have the benefit of the information which will be gained by the board as it operates this fall and winter. It is the action of that parliament, and not of this one, which it seems to me will exemplify the proper principles of representative government in expressing the will of the electorate of to-day rather than expressing as this parliament does the will of the electors of Canada of five years ago.

Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I want to assure you and to assure this house, if any assurance is needed, that the people in the east as well as in the west realize fully how vital it is for the wellbeing and the success of the whole of Canada that there shall be prosperity among the producers of western Canada. Even though this government has delayed this matter until the dying days of the session we realize fully that this problem which we have before us is not transcended in importance by any public or economic problem which is before the people of Canada to-day.

Somebody asked me a question last night as to what my position was in connection with this bill. I have endeavoured to make my position clear in making some suggestions which the Prime Minister has invited regarding amendment, and I say to my right hon. friend that as far as I am concerned I shall support this bill going to a committee on the understanding which was made clear by the right hon. the Prime Minister and by my right hon. leader, that that is without prejudice to or commitment in the start that I wish to make on any of the provisions of the bill, and in approving of the second reading I also want to reserve the right which the Prime Minister expressly stated of moving or supporting any amendments which I may see fit notwithstanding that the bill has had its second reading.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue the discussion on the motion of the Prime Minister for the second reading of Bill No. 98, it is not my purpose this afternoon to follow very closely the argument made by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) who has just taken his seat.

May I say at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, that I approve the principle of this legislation. There may be some features of the bill that might be strengthened to make it more effective, but I am sure that the special committee to which this bill is likely to be sent will be capable of attending to that matter. So far as the general principle of the bill is concerned I am in hearty accord with it.

Some doubt has been raised in this house as to whether the farmers of the west are in favour of this legislation. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the western farmers are concerned, there is only one real avenue through which they can express their opinion, and that is through their different organizations in the prairie provinces, and so far as the organization with which I am connected is concerned, the United Farmers of Alberta, we have for the last three years at our annual convention passed resolutions favouring the establishment of a Canada wheat board. These resolutions I am quite sure have been forwarded to the Prime Minister and his colleagues. Therefore as far as Alberta is concerned, and so far as the organized farmers are concerned, they are in favour of the principle of this legislation.

My hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth has suggested that this legislation should be of only a temporary character, and he bolstered that idea with the argument that we had a surplus of wheat to the amount of 210,000,000 bushels which at the present time was a very great handicap in stabilizing the price of wheat, but until such time as it was possible for us to sell that wheat and reduce that surplus he was more or less in favour of this legislation, and for that particular purpose. I want to say this, Mr. Speaker, that so far as I am concerned, and I believe I am speaking for the organization of which I have the privilege of being a member, we not only believe a grain board is essential at the present time to take care of that situation which my hon. friend so well illustrated, but I am satisfied that the farmers of western Canada to-day have come to the point where they recognize that as individuals they are helpless in selling the product of their labour against the monopolies of this country. Therefore, instead of looking upon this board as being merely a temporary organization, I believe we must realize that it will be continued into the future.

It is over thirty-three years since I went to western Canada and I have been a farmer all that time. I know something of the demands and the desires of the farmers through all those years to secure a better system of marketing their grain. The first demand of the farmers was made largely in the beginning of this century, some time during 1900. Before I proceed further with this particular matter, I should like to direct the attention of the house to this point: When charters were given to the railway companies to build railways in Canada, more particularly in the west, they proceeded to build the roads but when it came to providing warehouse accommodation for grain the companies found that it was almost impossible for them to handle the situation. The railway companies then leased sites to elevator companies, which companies built elevators and handled the grain. Those who are familiar with conditions in the west know that this method was copied very largely from that which existed in the United States. The elevator is a cheaper way of handling grain than a warehouse such as is supplied by the railways for other commodities. It is quite true that the railway companies did not give a monopoly to any particular elevator company but whatever elevator companies were in existence at that time had a virtual monopoly of the handling of grain by virtue of the fact that they possessed the only means by which grain could be put on the cars of the railway companies for transportation.

As I said, the first demand of the farmers in western Canada for improved marketing conditions took place in 1900. A commission was appointed by the government of that day to inquire into the situation and one of the results of the findings of that commission was that the farmer was granted the right to load his own grain over the platform into the car of the railway company. It might be noted that only those farmers who were located in close proximity to the railroads could take advantage of this new provision as a man living fifteen or twenty miles away could not haul in his grain quickly enough to load a car without keeping it on the siding for too long a time.

The farmers realizing that they were subject largely to the whims and policies of the elevator companies decided to organize an elevator company of their own. Many hon. members in this house will recall the hard times which were experienced during the winter of 1905 and I believe that these were responsible for the demand of the farmers for an improvement in the handling of grain. About the year 1908 the Grain Growers Grain Company was organized composed of farmer shareholders. This was an ordinary company incorporated like other companies but it was owned by the farmers and a limitation of eight per cent was placed upon the dividends which would be paid to the shareholder. This Grain Growers Grain Company did splendid work in eliminating many of the abuses so prevalent at that time and it handled considerable grain for the farmers. As time went on the farmers felt that even this company was not all that they required and eventually there was organized in Saskatchewan what was known as the Cooperative Elevator Company of Saskatchewan. A similar company was organized in Alberta. The Saskatchewan company was very successful. The difference between the cooperative companies and the Grain Growers Grain Company was this: In both companies the dividends were limited to eight per cent but in the cooperatives provision was made that after proper reserves had been accumulated dividends could be paid to those who contributed business to the companies.

A few years later the Alberta Cooperative Elevator Company was amalgamated with the Grain Growers Grain Company, forming what was known as the United Grain Growers Grain Company. This organization filled the need for a time but when war conditions came along a few years after conditions were changed. Hon. members will remember the grain board of 1919. This board was not organized as a permanent institution, it was meant merely to take care of a situation which had developed because of war conditions. This board was very successful and when it went out of existence the farmers of the west felt that they had lost something which was worth while. They immediately began to demand the reinstatement of this grain board for the purpose of handling their grain. Hon. members who were in the house during the sessions of 1922 and 1923 will remember the persistent demands which came from the west asking parliament to reorganize the grain board of 1919. Legislation was passed in 1922 and again in 1923 giving to the board to be created all the powers which this parliament possessed. The establishment of this board depended upon the provinces of the west passing complementary legislation giving to the board what powers the provinces possessed in connection with grain. The outcome of this legislation was the placing of the responsibility as to whether this board would come into operation mainly upon the governments of the three prairie provinces. Many conferences were held but the provincial governments failed to come to any agreement and as a consequence the formation of the grain board was not proceeded with.

After the farmers of the west realized that this board would not come into existence they began to devise ways and means to handle the situation in a different way, and the outcome of their deliberations was the formation of the wheat pools. Alberta took the lead in creation of these wheat pools, I believe in 1923, and Saskatchewan and Manitoba followed in the next year. These pools were voluntary in character although a contract was signed by which the grain grower agreed to market his grain through the pool system. The pools eventually came into existence and functioned very efficiently until 1929, when economic conditions the world over put them in the position where they lost a great deal of money owing to the fact that they had fixed their interim payments on grain too high for that year. It is not necessary to recount the difficulties which these pools met except to say this. Inasmuch as neither of the pools had 100 per cent membership in any of the three provinces, they could not meet the financial stress of 1929 and following years. Now that is a very rough and incomplete résumé of the efforts of the farmers of western Canada to secure better marketing conditions. With the financial stress that was occasioned by the depression, the farmers of the west again looked for some better method of marketing; and, as I have already stated, the organized farmers of the west, at any rate so far as Alberta and Saskatchewan are concerned, have requested by resolutions at annual conventions that the government consider the possibility of bringing into existence a new grain board.

That brings us to the present bill. There is no question in my mind that this bill, in so far as interprovincial and export business is concerned, does give monopoly rights to this proposed grain board; there is no doubt about that. In so far as provincial business is concerned, that is outside the scope of this legislation and outside the scope of the constitutional powers of this parliament; but so far as the rights of this parliament are concerned, I think that in this piece of legislation the government has given the board all the rights which this parliament has within its jurisdiction. And it is true to state, I think, that it is practically a monopoly right in so far as the four western provinces are concerned. Someone might take exception to that; but as far as I can see I have no objection whatever to it because I recognize the fact that the days of free competition are gone forever, and that out of free competition has come monopoly, so that we cannot expect those who are at the present time organized as monopolies to deal very tenderly with those who believe in free competition and practise free competition. If the farmers of the west or in any other part of Canada are going to secure anything like an adequate price for the product of their labour, I am satisfied that they cannot do it by selling that product in the markets of the world against each other. We have to meet monopoly with monopoly, and under these circumstances I believe that this bill does meet a very much needed requirement. I am quite sure, of course, that many farmers will object to it, but I am satisfied, on the other hand, that the great bulk of the farmers to-day, at least in the three prairie provinces, believe that this is the only possible method to pursue.

It is not necessary for me to take up much more of the time of the house except to make this observation. The farmers of the west object and have objected ever since I have been a resident of western Canada, to the speculator determining very largely the price that they will receive for their commodities. I quite realize that under the present method of handling our grain the speculator is a very essential part of the proceeding, simply because of the fact that he is the person to provide the money to hedge the grain when the elevator companies secure that grain in their possession. The Prime Minister explained that situation very well yesterday afternoon. As he said, these companies have not the liquid capital to buy all the grain offered to them; and we know that if the farmers of the west were in that position where they did not know whether the company was able to buy their wheat or not, it would create a tremendous problem, bearing in mind the long distances which they have to travel. Under the present method of handling our grain it is quite true that the speculator must provide the money to permit the companies to hedge. As the Prime Minister stated yesterday, the banks will not provide the funds for these elevator companies to speculate in wheat. They hedge the buying each day, and consequently, so far as the elevator companies are concerned, they reduce the speculative element to the very minimum. Under these circumstances someone must be in the market to provide the funds which will take up these hedges. The farmer objects to the speculative element being the force in the control of the price level of his product. It is quite true that the price level is largely determined by world prices, but nevertheless the farmers of the west feel that the time has come when the speculative element should be eliminated in the process of handling the grain grown in that part of Canada. That is a very important feature so far as the farmer is concerned. I feel sure that the farmers, when they realize this important point, that the speculator under this legislation will be to all intents and purposes and in fact, I believe, absolutely eliminated, will welcome the legislation. And even if they do think they would like to have the liberty of selling grain wherever they like, I think they will take more kindly to the legislation under these circumstances. But so far as the majority are concerned, I believe they will be in complete accord in supporting the measure.

It is a most remarkable fact that the primary producers, those engaged in the creation of new wealth annually, have received at the hands of governments less consideration than has been shown those whom we call secondary producers. Probably it is because the primary producers have not the wherewithal to make proper representations to the government. The fact is, however, that the past history of this country shows very clearly that so far as the primary producers are concerned, the same consideration has not been given them as has been given those engaged in secondary industries; and I must confess that I am far more interested in the welfare of the primary producer than I am in the welfare of the secondary producer, not only because I happen to be a primary producer myself but because the primary producer is the most important person in production in this country, because he creates new wealth each year. He creates that wealth either by growing crops or digging the wealth from the soil in various forms. Therefore the primary producer, creating new wealth each year for this country, is as much entitled to consideration from this parliament as any other class of producers.

I support this legislation and I hope that it will be finally drawn up in the best possible manner to make it effective. Before I resume my seat, let me say this again. In my judgment we must give more consideration to the primary producer, to see to it that he gets a reasonable standard of living, one comparable with that of other classes of producers in this country. There is no reason why he should not get that reasonable standard of living, and I assure the house that regardless of whatever political party may be in power, I shall be only too happy to do anything I can to achieve that result.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): I regret very much that I was not in the house yesterday as I note from the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that a challenge was thrown out to me to define my position on this particular bill. I thought my position in regard to bills of this character was very well defined. It is most remarkable that nearly every piece of legislation that has been introduced by the government this year has been along the lines of the well known policy of the Liberal party, and the most amazing thing is the attempt on the part of the government to make it appear that this is something they have just discovered, something new they are introducing, or, in other words, a new deal. The situation has become absolutely ridiculous, so ridiculous in the country that the only question one hears wherever one travels is: When is there going to be an election so that we may remove this moribund government from office and put in someone who will do some business? That is the only question one is asked on the highways.

The other day I listened to a conversation of a couple of members on the government side. They were congratulating themselves on the colourful performance of their leader and themselves. If that is a colourful performance, I do not know what the actual performance would be called. I know what I would call it, but we are not permitted to use that kind of language in parliamentary circles.

I should like to say to the Prime Minister, who does not happen to be in his seat just now, that he and I have been acquainted for a good many years, and I have always followed the habit of saying to his face what I have to say on any occasion. I want, for the dification of the Tory party and of the Prime Minister, to define very clearly where I stand on this grain board bill. I supported a grain board in 1922; I am prepared to support one now; I would have been prepared to support one in 1930 believing it was sound at that time to appoint a board. No one knows better than does the Prime Minister himself what happened in 1929. He knows quite well a mistake was made by the selling agents of the pools when they attempted to sell their own grain on British and foreign markets; he knows that because, on his return from London, he appointed Mr. McFarland to take charge of the selling agency. He made this appointment for no other purpose than to force the withdrawal of these selling agents and Mr. McFarland at once withdrew from foreign and British markets representatives of the Canadian pools. That was the inception of our difficulties. We had no difficulty between 1920 and 1930 in disposing of our grain. Let the members of the Conservative party just consider that fact.

Mr. LOUCKS: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. member will have a chance to speak when I get through. I propose to say what I am going to say to him so that he will be under no misapprehension and not go into the back concessions and misrepresent Liberal members of this house.

That was the beginning of the difficulty, and John I. McFarland, one individual, was appointed as a selling agency for Canadian pool wheat. Later he was put into the market by this government for the purpose of stabilizing the market. Let me say at once that I have never on any occasion raised my voice in opposition to the action of the Prime Minister in that regard. I believe it was a wise one; I said repeatedly and I say now: If you are going to give to the secondary industries of this country the protection mentioned by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), you must of necessity give assistance to the agricultural interests; otherwise you are going to penalize and ruin them, and that is just about what the government has done now. It has brought the farmers to the verge of ruin, and now it has discovered, in the dying days of this session and this parliament, that a grain board is needed. I am told that the Prime Minister was applauded tremendously yesterday because he came to this decision before he is to die, that is die politically,—the Lord knows, I hope he lives a long time because he is exactly the same age as I am and I hope he and I have a good many years to live. Let me say this to my hon. friends: In the dying days of this parliament you have suddenly discovered you are in a mess—and you are in a mess and you have brought it on your own heads; the Canadian people fully realize you have brought it upon yourselves—and you are going to appoint a grain board with power to sell the grain production of western Canada. The wheat farmer is entitled to bonus when, by the excessive tariffs you have imposed upon him and other basic producers, you make him pay through the nose for every article he buys.

The hon. member for Acadia was kind enough to say: If we are going to have monopolies, let the farmers have a monopoly. I would say to my hon. friend that I am doubtful if that is the way in which we are going to get out of our difficulties. One thing we have to do is not tighten our belts, not reduce production and drive out of business a whole army of people who have established themselves as wheat farmers. Put them out of business, John I. McFarland has said, and so has the Prime Minister. The only solution they can think of is to reduce production. Canada has come to a pretty pass if that is the only solution the Tory party has for the troubles of the producer. I say here; I have said it on the hustings and I will continue to say: If you had inaugurated reasonable policies, paid your bonus, sold your wheat at whatever price you could get for it and got it off the market, you would not have been in the difficult situation you are in to-day. An hon. member pointed out that the farmer ought to have eighty cents a bushel at Fort William. Of course he should; if he is going to be able to buy more farm implements and machinery, then he will require more than eighty cents a bushel, and I speak very feelingly as one who has been farming all these years. If you do not bring the prices of primary and secondary products into conformity you are going to have difficulty. But what does this government do? They are the greatest copiers in the world. They have just witnessed what has happened in the United States, and now they start in to regiment secondary industry. My good friend the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) stands by excessive tariffs and then he goes up and down the country complaining about the results of that policy, says we have got to regiment these people, bring them into line by law, because they are doing what? Taking advantage of the policies that he has placed upon the statute books of this country. We have regimentation of every sort. I do not know whether a man is going to be allowed to go out and plough without a licence soon, if this keeps on. Every activity is going to be regimented. It seems to me that there is just one person that this Tory government forget when they are introducing legislation, that is the consumer.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The forgotten man.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He pays through the nose every time. It has always been so when a Tory government has been in office, ever since 1892 the same thing has happened, the same difficulties have arisen, and then a group of Tories in Montreal and Toronto will start an agitation for a union government. As soon as they have made a bad failure of carrying on their business they want a union government; I have seen that suggestion at the end of every Tory regime. Now we have the additional one that the people should tighten their belts and live more sparingly.

Mr. MULLINS: That is not correct.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is. My hon. friend will have an opportunity to state his case when I am finished, which will be very soon. I am going to reserve some remarks until after the report of the committee on this bill. Let me reiterate that the government have brought this upon their own shoulders, it is the result of a mistaken policy that they have pursued, and pursued even ruthlessly. No man can do business in this country after this unless he has a licence, even if he is doing business legitimately. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) interrupts; perhaps they will regiment the doctors next, and I suppose my hon. friend will support it. Perhaps it would not be a bad thing to regiment a few of them.

My position is this. I would have supported the grain board in 1931. I believe if a grain board had been appointed then we should not have 210,000,000 bushels of carryover facing us at the end of this crop year with a prospect of a crop of another 400,000,000. Reports now indicate that we shall probably have that. It is a mighty unpleasant prospect. We cannot allow the basic producers of this country to be ruined as they have been in the past, because they have no reserves left. They have got to have relief, and I reiterate that as long as those policies of the present government are in effect I am in favour of a bonus to the farmer, not only for his wheat but for his other products. He is entitled to it. Moreover I want that wheat sold and that overhang got rid of in order that as the new crop comes on the market we have an opportunity to get the markets of the world stabilized. Every wheat purchasing country in the world knows exactly how much wheat Canada has.

CANADIAN GRAIN BOARD

PURCHASE, STORAGE AND MARKETING OF WHEAT AND OTHER GRAINS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 98, to provide for the constitution and powers of the Canadian grain board.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, when His Majesty's officer interrupted I had almost concluded my observations concerning this matter, because as I stated earlier I shall reserve further remarks until a discussion of the bill in committee of the whole house. However in order to be clear I should like to make one or two further observations, and to indicate the detrimental effect upon the milling industry of Canada the policy pursued by the stabilization board under Mr. McFarland has had. Instead of giving the miller his wheat at world prices this board insisted upon receiving for the grain the price they paid for it. Bear in mind, we are not complaining about that price. We believe the wheat producer should be bonused, and particularly when by way of excessive prices and tariffs granted to secondary industries he is mulcted for so much. So long as that condition exists, nothing else can happen. It is the result of a policy vicious in all its ramifications. I said I could have some sympathy with my good friend the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce if at once he would announce the real trouble about which he is complaining. But no, he does not do that; he simply wishes to regiment everybody.

In the milling industry the miller has been forced to pay for his wheat 7 or 8 cents a bushel above the world price, and has found himself in the unfortunate position that he could not sell his product in markets in which formerly he did business. From year to year the condition has been aggravated. To-day we have the spectacle of milled foreign wheat being sent into Canada as flour, something which has never happened before. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite will applaud a condition of that kind. They are the ones who always want to shut out products competing with anything produced or made in Canada, and I say they had better do something about imported flour. Hon. members will observe how as a result of this government's policy the vicious circle has widened. I am reliably informed that unless something is done for it the milling industry in Canada will be forced into bankruptcy. What should be done? As I stated previously we should bonus the farmer. Then we should sell our wheat at the world price, and get rid of it. It is useless for the Prime Minister or any other person to state that we are unable to sell our wheat. Had they been willing to buy goods in exchange, they could have sold our wheat. I say they could have sold it at all times, but they refused to take goods in exchange, have adopted the policy followed by other countries and have said "We cannot do anything because of the action of other countries." They accuse us of sitting by between the years 1920 and 1930, and doing nothing. Well, I say to hon. members opposite that they were going to blast their way into the markets of the world; they said they were going to sell our agricultural products. Retribution must follow.

If the leader, whom the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) follows, chose to make a speech in that city at this time, in view of the 1,500 gentlemen deposited at that place he would have no difficulty in obtaining a few men with white buttons who would form a parade. He had some difficulty in 1930, but he would have no difficulty in gathering them up now. The hon. member seemed quite perturbed because the condition he described has developed in Regina. I say to him it is the result of the policy he has been supporting for the last five years and that policy which I have no doubt he will continue to support.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Let us sell our wheat, and get rid of it. Let us pay a bonus commensurate with the bonus the secondary industries are obtaining. If that is the way you are going to run the country, then I am for it. I must say however that I believe I have a better plan. Let us have no more of this nonsense; let us get out, sell our goods, do business and not talk about reducing production and tightening our belts. That sort of thing makes me see red. If that is the state to which the Canadian people have come, then God help us. If that is the condition, then I say we are impotent and helpless. I say in all sincerity that I would not support over night any government which would make such proposals either to its followers or to the people throughout the country.

You are a pretty badly wrecked institution now, but I have begun to have some doubts about the Prime Minister—and I wish he were in his seat so that I might direct my observations to him. I have had all sorts of sympathy for him, but after his performance of yesterday I have begun to have some doubts. We have been sitting here, taking things quietly knowing you were going to annihilation, and feeling it was only a matter of time when you would declare for an election. We have had sympathy for you in your troubles—although you brought most of them on yourselves. However after the experience of yesterday and after the challenge thrown out, do not think that we are going to sit back and eat humble pie—because we are not. We have a better way, and as soon as we have the opportunity we will put it into effect and bring back to Canada that prosperity to which she is entitled. It will not be any belt-tightening process, nor any silly suggestion of that kind.

Mr. SPENCE: Tell us how you will do it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We will tell you in good time. Get out, and make way for those who will do things; for heaven's sake give this country a chance. You have sat there long enough and your departure is well overdue. Your political death and funeral should have been over long before this. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, what remarks I have to make further I will make when we are discussing the bill in committee of the whole house.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words to explain the vote I am going to give on this measure, but before doing so I have a little account to settle with the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who I am sorry is not in his seat at the moment. In the course of his vigorous and rather bitter speech yesterday he spoke almost as if we were the authors of the difficult situation in which he is placed with regard to this wheat question, and without any justification whatever that I could see he referred to my humble self and spoke of the negotiations in connection with the French treaty in 1922. I quote his words from page 3566 of yesterday's Hansard. I do not know what this had to do with his speech; nevertheless he uttered these words:

Mr. Bennett: Let me ask the hon. member this: Did he at any time when he was negotiating a treaty with France say a word about wheat at all, in any shape or form, when he was giving France preferences? Did he stipulate for anything then, when he might have done so with respect to wheat?

Mr. Lapointe: We were selling our wheat at the time.

Mr. Bennett: We were not; that is exactly the point. In any case it is the duty of a statesman to look a bit into the future in respect to these matters.

The right hon. gentleman took the trouble to state quite frequently in the course of his speech yesterday that he was stating facts, not fancies or theories, but facts. Well, what are the facts about this statement of the right hon. gentleman?

Article 1 of the convention of commerce between Canada and France in 1923 reads as follows:

The natural and manufactured products originating in and coming from Canada enumerated in schedule A to this convention shall enjoy when imported into France, the French colonies, possessions and protectorates having the same customs tariff as France the benefit of the minimum tariff and of the lowest rates of duties as regards present import duties and taxes and as regards any such duties or taxes which France may hereafter establish and also as regards surtaxes, coefficients or other temporary increases that France may establish.

What is that schedule A? Schedule A is a list of Canadian products enjoying the benefit of the minimum tariff of France, and item 68 of that schedule is "wheat, spelt and meslin (grain, flour)." Item 69 is "oats (grain, meal);" item 70 is "barley (grain, meal);" and item 71 is "rye (grain, meal)."

And in the right hon. gentleman's own speech he showed that in the following year when the treaty was in force the duty imposed by France was decreased to 11 cents a bushel. That was on January 7, 1924. In my right hon. friend's own list at this present time the rate is I believe 85 cents a bushel.

Mr. MANION: Before your government went out of power it was 85 cents a bushel.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Possibly.

Mr. MANION: Not possibly but positively.

92582—229½

Mr. LAPOINTE: But that was not at all the result of my not having said anything about wheat in the negotiations for the French treaty. We got from France the best treatment possible, the lowest tariff granted to any country on wheat, which is not what the Prime Minister said yesterday. He said that we did not even use the word wheat in the negotiations. Well, if the rest of his speech is as true as that part I pity the western farmers in connection with this question.

Coming to the bill before the house let me say first that I approve of the creation of a board for the purpose of endeavouring to clear up the present mess because a mess does exist.

Second, my vote does not mean that I approve in any way the speculative elements of the policy of the government during the last few years.

Third, that this board is for the purpose of helping and assisting the western farmer in the present emergency, and is not to be considered as a permanent scheme, especially a scheme of compulsion under which any Canadian farmer could be sent to gaol for disposing as he wishes of the product of his labour, of what he has produced by the sweat of his brow. In that regard I will refer to what has been done in Australia. Certainly Australia is a good deal more socialistic than Canada in her policies, especially during the last few years. In Australia they bonus the production of wheat. The commonwealth government gave a bonus of three pence a bushel on wheat, and they loaned a certain amount of money to the various states for the purpose also of bonusing the production of wheat. What was the procedure in Australia? First they appointed a royal commission to investigate the whole situation with regard to wheat, and what that commission said with regard to a compulsory marketing scheme for wheat I read in the Parliamentary Debates of the Commonwealth of Australia of March 13, 1935, at page nine. It is found in the speech of Doctor Page, who is the leader of the country party in Australia and who was acting prime minister at the time. He gives the recommendations of the royal commission upon which the Australian legislation was based, and the third recommendation of that royal commission reads as follows:

(iii) That, in any case, a compulsory marketing scheme for Australian wheat be adopted, provided that the majority of wheat farmers of each of three wheat-exporting states express their approval of such a scheme, and that the principles upon which the compulsory marketing scheme is based shall be those recommended in paragraph 273 of subsection 6 of section V of this report.

Even in Australia the commonwealth made it a condition of the enactment of a compulsory marketing scheme for wheat that it must first receive the approval of the majority of the wheat farmers in three of the wheat-exporting states of the commonwealth.

Fourthly, in connection with this bill, there should not be any price-fixing for a particular class of Canadian production. My hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) says, "You bonus the manufacturers, the secondary industries. Well, if you continue to do that you must bonus the farmer as well." But, Mr. Speaker, if you enter into that sort of thing you have to bonus all the farmers, and not only those who specialize in one particular form of agriculture. If you bonus the wheat farmers I do not see how you can explain to the satisfaction of those who produce butter or potatoes or any other farm product in my province or in other provinces why their products should not be bonused as well. And, fifth, I vote for this as a temporary emergency measure and not as a permanent scheme of socialistic government operations in connection with the production and distribution of wheat, especially since it is introduced in the dying days of a moribund government.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion which has taken place on this very important bill and with what has been said on this side of the house I am pretty much in agreement. When addressing the house this afternoon the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) said in effect that a permanent policy with regard to the marketing of wheat was absolutely necessary and that he was inclined to believe that the policy outlined in this bill was of a type which he could support. I suggest to the hon. member for Acadia that before he commits himself to that extent he observe what our greatest competitors in the world markets are doing and compare this legislation with what they have had in effect for quite a number of years. One thing this bill has proved to me is that the policy of this government as carried out through John I. McFarland for the last four years has not been right, and they admit that now. I propose to approach this subject by directing attention to what our greatest competitors have been doing to solve the same problem which prevails in their countries to a lesser extent. In my opinion the condition of the wheat grower in western Canada has never been worse than it is to-day. I do not care what government may be in power at this time, it would have to take some action similar to that set out in this bill. It is essential that the wheat grower be assisted by some means. When addressing the house yesterday, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) said:

> As I proceed this afternoon I shall endeavour to point out what has been done during the last four years. I shall offer this record to the house without apology or excuse and with some sense of justifiable pride for the results which have been obtained. I look back upon this record with some degree of pride as paying some part of the debt which I owe to western Canada.

At the beginning of his speech the Prime Minister stated that he had been in western Canada for thirty-seven or thirty-eight years. I am entering upon my thirty-eighth year, but unlike the Prime Minister I have spent those years in the growing of wheat. Like the Prime Minister I say that I hope the part I shall play in this matter will pay part of the debt which I owe to western Canada. The Prime Minister continued:

> I intend to put upon the records of this house figures which will tell their own story, figures which will indicate just as clearly as figures can the history of the dealings in wheat during the last four or five years.

I read those figures, and there is a great mess of them, but in my opinion they do not reveal the true picture. There is not one iota of evidence in the speech of the Prime Minister as to the monetary interests which Canada has in the wheat handled by John I. McFarland. Perhaps the Prime Minister thought that it was not the proper time to reveal this, since the bill may be sent to a committee of the house where it will be possible for all interested in the matter to appear. I am hoping that either Mr. McFarland or the Prime Minister will make a statement before that committee. I think this should be done, in view of the statement made by the Prime Minister in western Canada that the policy adopted by this government had placed some $200,000,000 more in the pockets of the wheat growers than they otherwise would have obtained. An opportunity should be given to the Prime Minister to state to the committee just how that $200,000,000 was put in the farmers' pockets. I think we should go back and look at the task which the Prime Minister imposed upon himself in 1930. I do not intend to go over all the promises made, but I should like to recite at least two. Speaking in Saskatoon on June 19, 1930, he said:

> There is only one way we can get the moneys of England for Canadian wheat rather than Russia and the Argentine, and how is that?

By providing our wheat cheaper than the others. Is that not so? And how are we going to do it? That is what we are promising to do at any rate.

Speaking in Regina on June 11, he said:

I trust you will realize that one of the reasons we are not selling wheat to England is because others are selling there, and another reason is trade conditions with the Argentine, and another may be Russia. We must deal with this problem on behalf of Canada and not in terms of any other country.

I propose to show just what is our position to-day in the only market which the Prime Minister said would be of any use to the Canadian wheat grower. I intend to give a true picture of the imports of wheat into Great Britain from Canada, from 1921, the year of the general election following the union government, down to the present time. For the information of the house I might say that these statistics are furnished by the bureau of statistics.

In the fiscal year 1921 we exported to the British market only 29 million bushels of wheat, in round figures. In 1922 we reversed those figures, our exports being 92 million bushels. In 1923 we went up to 166 million bushels and in 1924 we had a further increase to 173 million bushels. In 1925 we dropped down to 142 million bushels while in 1926 our exports increased to 186 million bushels; in 1927 they were 179 million bushels and in 1928, 186 million bushels. In spite of all that has been said about the British market having been lost before the present government came into power, in 1929 we exported 229 million bushels of wheat. Through the policies inaugurated by the late government we increased our exports of wheat to Great Britain from 29 million bushels in 1921 to 229 million bushels in 1929, an increase of 200 million bushels. It must be remembered that these are not my figures; they come from the bureau of statistics. Let us see what happened from 1929 on. The elections were in July, 1930, and in that year our exports dropped to 113 million bushels. In 1931 they were up to 131 million bushels; in 1922 they were 110 million bushels; in 1933, 150 million bushels and in 1934 they had dropped to 112 million bushels. The bureau of statistics furnished me with the values of these exports, but as I propose to try to finish by six o'clock I shall not give them. For the eleven months ended February 28, 1934, our exports amounted to 105 million bushels, and for the same period in 1935 they were 108 million bushels. It will be seen from these figures that the British market has taken the least wheat since this government came into being. Someone will ask—Where has it gone? I propose to deal with that question. The ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has dealt to some extent with the situation in Australia, and I will discuss it more extensively, touching also the situation in the Argentine. Let us take exports from Canada into some of the ports of Great Britain—and I want the Prime Minister to mark this. This is taken from the Commercial Intelligence Journal of February 23, 1935. It is a publication put out by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and therefore I take it that the statements it contains are authentic. At any rate, I have accepted them as such:

The inevitable sequel to the British government wheat subsidy was reduced importations. In 1934 the quantity of wheat brought in—102,652,387 cwts.—was some 9 per cent less than in 1933. As price generally governs movements of wheat, it was to be expected that Argentina should have been a strong factor in the market. The increase ascribed to that country, however, which amounted to about 42 per cent over the twelve months, is nevertheless remarkable. Imports from the dominion fell to 35,715,748 cwts. from 45,570,487 cwts. in 1933.

The Argentine followed out what the Prime Minister suggested in his speech at Regina. Because they were selling wheat in the world market, at a price which happened at that time to be, as it still is, cheaper than the price Canada is demanding for wheat, and which is all out of line with world prices, that country was able to capture the market at that time. Let us see what we have done with regard to flour. I quote from another issue of the Commercial Intelligence Journal—I will not go through them all—to indicate where our business is going. I take the issue of March 2, 1935:

Bristol, February 7, 1935.—At the end of 1934 the west of England market for Canadian flour was at as low an ebb as it has ever been. Furthermore, the market had been decreasing, and had been quiet for a longer period than the oldest importer can remember. Often in previous years months might have been expected to elapse when price differences would not permit of sales of Canadian flour, but compared with the present position such periods were definitely short.

During 1934 French flour was imported into the west of England in more than appreciable quantities, and at the end of the year this flour was being offered, but less freely, at 19s. Flour from Germany was not imported at all into the west of England during 1934. In the past some importation from Germany has been found possible, but 1933 saw the end of this trade. The French flour being imported has had some effect on the retail flour trade of the English millers as considerable quantities of it have been imported for the purpose of manufacturing self-raising flour. In South Wales a new trade has been started with the importation of French flour which, after processing, is packed in 1 pound paper bags for the retail trade. It is reported that four such blenders in 1934 filled and distributed 30,000,000 1 pound bags of such prepared self-raising flour.

As now can be appreciated, the market for Canadian flour has adversely been effected by these many factors. One serious result has been the discouragement of importers and merchants to carry stocks. One important merchant reports that his stock of Canadian flour at the end of 1934 was only 40 per cent of what he normally expected to carry.

That bears out the contention of the hon. member for West Edmonton, that we have lost not only our market for wheat but our market for flour. The report goes on:

The price difference which exists at the moment prevents bakers considering seriously the question of increasing the percentage of Canadian flour they should use, but at least hope is entertained that any levelling out of these price differences will make for an immediate increased demand for Canadian flours, the excellence of which is universally admitted.

Imports of flour into the port of Bristol during 1934 amounted to 18,695 tons as compared with 22,655 tons in 1933 and 18,099 tons in 1932. Imports of Canadian flour amounted to 9,807 tons as compared with 10,948 tons in 1933.

So that all along the line we are losing markets. Now I want to show what is being done in Australia. I have here another issue of the Commercial Intelligence Journal of February 9, 1935, and I want the house to note just what Australia did with the supposedly large carryover with which she was faced at the end of the crop year, that is to say, at the end of November. I quote:

Melbourne, December 19, 1934.—During the wheat export year which ended on November 30 the total shipments of wheat and flour from Australia amounted to 95,598,318 bushels as compared with 149,006,859 bushels for the previous year. Shipments since December 1 amount to 1,612,421 bushels. There has been much greater activity in the export trade since the beginning of December, and the movement from Victoria particularly has been very satisfactory. Considerable anxiety has been felt in the trade because of the congestion at country elevators and shipping points owing to the relative absence of export activity within recent months. This unfortunate condition still obtains in New South Wales, where the holders are still loath to accept the low prices ruling, and there is a risk of serious deterioration to the old crop if it is not moved very shortly. The stocks on hand from the old crop are of inferior quality as compared with the new wheat now being harvested, and the presence of relatively large carryover stocks, amounting to 20,000,000 bushels adversely affects the position of the new wheat crop.

I want to direct the attention of the house to what they did with this surplus of 20,000,000. If they were carrying a percentage of carryover comparable to ours, with relation to the crop we grow, Australia should be carrying, instead of 20,000,000 bushels, something more like 100,000,000 bushels, considering that we are carrying 225,000,000 bushels. I continue the quotation:

Owners of storage space are insisting upon the sale of a portion of the stored wheat, as it is in the best interests of all concerned in the production and marketing of wheat that all the past season's grain should be cleared by the end of January. Consequently, large quantities of wheat have ben offered for sale, and the low prices has attracted buying from Japan and Shanghai. Considerable sales have been made to that area, and although the prices are unattractive to the farmers, the position is greatly relieved thereby.

That is what Australia did last year. The ex-Minister of Justice discussed the present activities of that country, and I should like to read from the report of the royal commission:

The royal commission inquiring into the wheat, flour and bread industries of Australia have recently issued their supplementary report, copies of which are on file at the Department of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa. They have made important recommendations with respect to the present season's crop, and the commonwealth government have acted on their suggestions in providing £4,000,000 for distribution to wheat growers who have sown wheat during 1934. The ministry has agreed to the recommendation of the royal commission on wheat that the £4,000,000 should be made available by the commonwealth for distribution by the various states.

(1) There will be a bounty of 3d.—

This is six cents in their money.

—per bushel on marketable wheat delivered for sale, which involves an expenditure of about £1,500,000 on the basis of 120,000,000 bushels.

(2) Advances will be made to the states amounting to £1,926,750 for payment of approximately 3s. an acre sown to wheat.

So that Australia is subsidizing both the sale of wheat and production. I see nothing in the recommendation that curtails production of wheat in Australia, but here we are, in Canada, faced with competition such as we have to meet, and the only solution this government has to offer is that we should cut down production. Let us look at the Argentine. I would suggest that the government give serious consideration to a similar set-up in Canada rather than to proceed with the bill now before the house. In Australia they have set up what they call a purchasing board. The name probably is a misnomer; it should not be called that. Its function is at all times to be on the market, and when wheat takes what the board decides is the low level, it steps in and supports the market. You may call this "pegging the price" if you like, but the action of the board in taking wheat off the market has a tendency to bring about a rising market, and after the price rises eight or ten cents and there is a strong demand for wheat, the board immediately starts to dribble on to the market the wheat which it had taken off at the low level. Had this government pursued such a policy in the last four or five years, it would not have been necessary for us to-day to be discussing the bill now before the house. I suggest that the government give serious consideration to this matter.

I believe there is in the grain trade a very efficient machine; I think the government should not go further than to control that machine, and the best method I can suggest to the government of controlling it is by some such device as is used in Australia. I propose, if this bill is sent to a special committee, to do my best to see that all the information is forthcoming that is necessary to enable the house to arrive at the soundest conclusion. No one knows better than does the Prime Minister that as a farmer, as a grower, realizing that because of the serious situation we were in, information should not be given, I have given every consideration to the government in that regard. But an election is pending; the government is going to appeal to the people for endorsation of its policies, and it is only right and proper that the government should give full information as to the monetary considerations involved so that we may be able to vote intelligently. I hope the Prime Minister will carry out the suggestion he made at the request of my leader, that a special committee be set up to deal with this whole matter.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, it would not seem to be necessary to spend very much time on this bill, having regard to the fact that everyone seems to be desirous of sending it to a committee. So possibly the proper time to speak would be after the findings of the committee are brought before the house. Nevertheless a number of suggestions were made this afternoon that might be helpful to the committee, and I might possibly be fortunate enough to contribute some more. I am going to try to keep away from the tone of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) yesterday. Of course we feel entirely forgiving towards him because it shows he has been able to stage his come-back, as it is called. I hope he does not overdo it; we are all very anxious about his health. As the leader of one of the great parties we want to see him in good condition when he lines up for battle. It gives us more freedom in discussion, and besides we do not like to see any hon. gentleman of his standing and capacity only half well. I hope however not to continue the somewhat meat-axe style of discussion with which he challenged this side of the house yesterday.

I am going to run over briefly some of the government's blundering record in dealing with wheat. I am not going to be harsh, but they have developed a penchant that when they put their hands into the wheat problem they usually put their foot in it at the same time. That was quite manifest when the government first endeavoured to give a bonus of 5 cents per bushel. They attempted to give a much needed five cent bonus to the farmers of the west, and first proposed to distribute it through the medium of the railways, somehow absorbing it in their freight rates. The next proposition was to give it through the exporters. Some of us could not see how it would ever reach the farmer through that medium, and as it was ostensibly meant for him we made some candid criticisms of the method. Finally the government brought on Mr. Ramsay and he made a plan of distributing this five cent bonus based on the same policy as the 1919 wheat board adopted. That should have been known to the government, but apparently the then Minister of Trade and Commerce had forgotten the old method. We have been roundly blamed for opposing that bonus, and blamed no doubt in connection with the bonuses given since, simply because we criticized and showed how it could be done to better advantage and more effectively.

The next government move was the Sir Josiah Stamp commission dealing with wheat futures, although the preceding government had had an investigation into wheat futures by Mr. Justice Turgeon who dealt with that same question very completely and came to much the same conclusion as did Sir Josiah Stamp and his commission. But the government could not get even that simple thing done without putting their foot in it, and they did so by inserting what was called appendix 12. I do not know how it got in—, inadvertently, it was said. I have a good guess how it got in, but I am not sure. At that time the government did not seem to be quite as friendly with the wheat pool as they are now, because this appendix 12 certainly gave the pool and their general organization a jab in the short ribs that they felt. However after some discussion on the subject the government decided to call in all those wheat future reports about a thousand I think, and have that offending appendix removed. I think if we knew all the story about that distorted appendix it would take half an hour to tell it.

Then we had the Prime Minister going over to London in 1930 to try out his blasting methods of selling farm produce. We do not need very long to deal with that; he came home empty handed and the conference was adjourned to Ottawa at a subsequent date. It was to be within a year but it proved to be nearly two. I shall not dwell on that incident except to recite very briefly the great expectations that were aroused in the west as the Prime Minister came home. He arrived in this city; he was not banqueted if I remember rightly, because that was the occasion on which he came back empty handed, but the newspapers had him paged at every divisional point between here and Regina; a telegram went forward that the Prime Minister was one day's journey nearer the prairies, where he was going to give a message of great encouragement to the expectant farmers. But that was the greatest frost in which the Prime Minister ever figured; he had nothing to tell them, and he told it well.

Then we had the Ottawa conference of 1932, right in this building, and the famous six cent preference which was not meant to give us any more money for our wheat; it was to hit the other fellow. I do not think much of that way of doing business; hitting the other fellow does not do us much good. We do not hear much about that now, except that the foreigner with his depleted currency seems to have got the inside track of us. They have been hit and they thought we in Canada were responsible. The Prime Minister indicated on more than one occasion that the intention was not to make the mother country pay six cents more for our wheat but to give us a sheltered market. Is it a sheltered market now? From what? Not the Argentine, we rather are sheltering the Argentine.

Then there came the international wheat conference; that was another dud. I think perhaps the government meant well, but there was some preliminary spade work that, in my estimation, required to be done before they could ever hope to have a successful international wheat conference that could reach any conclusions that would be binding. We had grossly offended Russia, a great country starting out on its own line of government, which they had a right to do no matter what we might think of it. This federal government took authority at the very first session, and exercised it the second session, to embargo six or seven of Russia's major export commodities. At one time that would have been a sufficient international offence to cause war, but our government did not seem to have any hesitation in engaging in that kind of dangerous heroics. This international wheat conference was the aftermath of a great international conference that met in London in 1933, and not having accomplished much, this subsidiary conference was called, with our Prime Minister as chairman, of some twenty or twenty-one countries which import or export wheat. From that kind of setting how could one expect anything worth while? Argentina is blamed for breaking away from the quota agreement arrived at there. Russia never did sign the agreement so far as the quota was concerned. I do not see how we can blame Argentina very much when we never had this agreement submitted to this parliament for its approval. It never got the formal endorsation of this parliament, so any other country could well hide behind that well known fact and make it an excuse for defaulting. However, this international wheat committee has still a continuing committee, bumming around and drawing their salaries and affording some excuse for the government hanging on to another of their marketing illusions until after the election. Mr. Andy Cairns, the great statistician, and the gentleman who is credited with advising the wheat pool wrongly regarding the withholding of the full measure of grain sales which might have been made in 1929 and 1930, is Canada's representative on the international continuing wheat committee. So that that is another dud exploded. It has become a habit with hon. members opposite to make blunders in connection with the disposing of wheat and dealing with wheat problems.

We come now to the wheat debacle of 1929 and 1930. It will be recalled that in February, 1930, or therabouts, the three provincial governments guaranteed the banks against loss on wheat pool operations. They had the misfortune of making their initial payments too large. I hope the government will take cognizance of that fact and will not indulge in that procedure when this wheat board is in operation, unless it is intended to bonus that way. The fact developed that the three western wheat pools had paid out to contract signers over $22,000,000 more than was coming to them. It was impossible to get that large amount back so they entered into a statutory agreement with the Saskatchewan government to have the loan paid back in nineteen equal annual instalments. Up to this date I am pleased to report that all payments have been met on due dates. Apparently at that time the banks did not have much confidence in the wheat pool situation, and because of that they wanted further security and obtained it from this government.

At this point Mr. McFarland entered into the picture. I have a lot of sympathy for him because he took on an impossible job. When the Prime Minister introduced the resolution in March of this year I do not know how he knew that Mr. McFarland was going to be sick. However if the account of his speech which I read in the Ottawa Journal was correct and from what I heard of it myself I would gather that this bill is predicated upon the assumption that Mr. McFarland is too ill further to give his services to the country as chairman of the selling agency. How did the Prime Minister know at the time he introduced the resolution three months ago that Mr. McFarland was going to be sick? He could not have known. Mr. McFarland has delivered at least two outstanding addresses, one in Winnipeg in April and another in Regina in May, since the resolution was brought down, and showed himself in good form.

I should be interested to learn whether or not the Prime Minister has acquired the art of foretelling and foreseeing other people's health. He does not answer. I think that was just a little fairy tale; he forgot himself. He must have forgotten his resolution forecasting this bill, and he gave the only reason he could think of at the time, namely that Mr. McFarland was in poor health and would not be in a condition to carry on further stabilization operations, hence this bill. I believe it is a compliment to the Prime Minister to observe that he cannot think up a better fairy tale than that one, and it shows that he is not an adept at telling yarns. Therefore I shall conclude my remarks on this phase of the matter by complimenting him. He would ten times rather tell the truth than quibble even a little bit. However, he forgot himself, he forgot the resolution was on the order paper at least three months before the bill was introduced, and at a time when Mr. McFarland's health was good enough to enable him to give good public addresses.

I have said that when Mr. McFarland was asked by means of stabilization to give to the farmers a much needed bonus on their wheat prices, he was asked to do an impossible task as sales would drop off if such bonus were passed on to our overseas customers. It was proposed by the Prime Minister that the bonus which could be given under the stabilization policy would equal the five cent original bonus that was cancelled at the end of 1931. I believe the house will recall that the Prime Minister indicated one would almost equal the other. It would appear to me that at times the stabilization operations exceeded the five cent bonus and was appreciated accordingly.

Speaking at Moose Jaw in February last before the Saskatchewan school trustees' association Mr. McFarland gave the story of his appointment, and told why he was working without salary. Part of his speech is as follows:

> He was wholly in accord with my action. I was offered any reasonable salary—
>
> I presume by the pool or by the government, I do not know which.
>
> —I cared to name, but I refused to accept the position on a salary basis—
>
> Mark you.
> —because it was a national emergency, and I was well aware that the greatly over-expanded world production of wheat was such that no man could accomplish or expect to accomplish that necessary perceptible measure of success as would warrant a salary.

He admitted he was not able to do this job of giving a bonus to the farmers on top of the normal wheat price, and at the same time sell wheat to the world in competition with comparable wheats of other countries. What did he do? He put up the price and sold it to our complaining customers across the seas at prices frequently running from eight to twelve or more cents higher than the usual premium accorded our wheat. In other words, through the stabilizing agency, by giving a bonus, and making the customers abroad pay for it, the Canadian government were making good fellows of themselves with the farmers. They did that, instead of taking that money out of the coffers of the country and paying it direct, as they did when they paid the five cent bonus of 1931. They thought they were devising a cute way of doing things; they were playing a cheap racket and paying bonuses, but making our customers on the other side of the ocean pay enhanced prices. That is the story. No wonder Mr. McFarland said he would not undertake such a task and that he could not give value for a salary. As I am not corrected in any of these details I assume I am stating the accepted facts. Mr. McFarland admitted beforehand that the task he had been given was an impossible one. The government has found it so, and that is the reason this bill is before us.

Some hon. members on this side of the house have been represented as being opposed to bonuses. I believe most people would like to get away from them, but when you have the secondary classes in a community with their feet in the trough, what are you going to do with the others? Can you keep them out? No, you cannot play favorites in a crisis such as this. I have always felt some disappointment in the secrecy and furtiveness with which the government's stabilization policy has been surrounded. If the Prime Minister feels justified in complaining about a whispering campaign, why during all these years has he withheld the information from us and left the public to guess the wheat holdings of Mr. McFarland, and other important details? Why didn't he come out and tell us the facts and then the people would not have had to do any guessing? I have for at least two years right in this parliament objected to this star chamber method of handling the greatest export commodity of the country. There is no justification for it under the sun, and either it shows a disposition to want to cover up something or they did not know enough about the business to know that other wheat-bonusing countries were revealing the facts of their sales month by month. As I recall, in the United States the late Alexander Legge made no bones about what was going on in the United States, and he very soon got from under.

May I refer to the Commercial Intelligence Journal issued under the authority of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) and his deputy minister, Mr. Parmelee. Under date of January 12, 1935, the Commercial Intelligence Journal at page 50 carries an article by Mr. Scott, a Canadian trade commissioner, on Board of Control for Cereals in Argentina. It is an amazing thing, Mr. Speaker, that the government will hand out all this information without any hesitation not only in this issue of the Commercial Intelligence Journal but in another publication to which I shall refer in a moment, telling all and sundry what is being done in the Argentine and then refrain for four and a half years from telling us anything about the Canadian situation except what was told us last night as to the volume of wheat in the selling agencies' hands. Here is the statement on page 50:

> Following the announcement that the same basic prices would be continued for the coming season, a separate statement has subsequently been issued reporting on the operations of the grain board between December 4, 1933, and November 26, 1934. The statement shows that the operations of the grain board during the above-mentioned period have been carried on at a total loss of around 8,815,000 paper pesos.

A peso is about 53 cents, so that amounts to about $4,000,000:

> The loss sustained by the grain board in maintaining minimum prices has, however, been fully covered by the profits made by the government in the buying and selling of foreign exchange.

The Argentine is also giving bonuses to their farmers. The Argentine people go further into the business and gamble in foreign exchange, and they put up their profits on that against their losses on wheat sales. But our government wants to make our customers pay for the bonuses to farmers, thus driving them elsewhere for their wheat supplies. They have something to learn yet, and I think this committee could do a whole lot of good if we had the time to do it, but Mr. McFarland is in hospital and we had the Prime Minister in effect telling us last March in the resolution that Mr. McFarland was going to be sick today, and possibly could not come down here to give evidence. I hope that the committee will assemble in a very different spirit from that in which the Prime Minister addressed the house last night, and I am glad that I have sufficient self-control not to follow suit in the meat ax fashion that he then adopted.

Referring again to the Commercial Intelligence Journal, here is a table giving the monthly purchases, sales, cancellations, and stocks for the different months of the year; for instance, purchases for the month of December amounted in round figures to 571,000; sales, 28,000; cancellations, 3,000; stocks, 540,000, and so on. The figures are given for every month of the year. But not a word from this government. They have been as silent as the grave. Of course, they knew they were approaching their political graves and perhaps that suggested the silence. But is that the way to do business? This government that preaches ethics in business violates every decency of ethics in connection with our wheat business, and there is no one who does it more than the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce. We will get around to him later on perhaps.

Here is a note about these cancellations, and those of us who have conscientious scruples about the compulsory features will note this:

> The figures given under the heading of cancellations represent sales made to the board which were subsequently cancelled by the seller when able to dispose of his grain more advantageously elsewhere.

I support my hon. friend fronm South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) in the remark he made just before six o'clock when he recommended, as I recommend, that the Argentine policy of handling their wheat sales be studied carefully by the committee so far as time will permit, and this know-all government will find something to learn there. The people of the Argentine have learned how to bonus their farmers and yet sell their wheat,—something not yet learned by Canada.

Here is a very interesting document which is gotten out every month by this government, by the Department of Trade and Commerce, called the Monthly Review of the Wheat Situation. We can get all kinds of information about the Argentine. Just see what they say on page 25 of the issue for March, 1935:

The correspondent of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in the Argentine has forwarded the following report under date of March 4, 1935.

That is the correspondent of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in the Argentine. I would presume they have a resident correspondent there. I do not know whether he is a special correspondent or not. At any rate he is the correspondent of this government, whether an employee I do not know, but I would expect not. He says:

One of the features of the market during the month has been the brisk demand for Barusso wheat from Bahia Blanca territory. Of the various types of Argentine wheat this is the one which most nearly approximates that of Canada. Hence it is much in demand by millers as a substitute for Canadian wheat now that that is being practically held off the market by the high prices asked for it, and buyers are quite willing to pay a premium over the prices of other Argentine types, even the Rosafe which was formerly the leader here.

There is this correspondent making this admission in this document issued by the government, and I presume it is correct, that now that Canadian wheat is largely off the market because of high prices the people of the Argentine are selling their wheat quite freely in place of ours. I think it was no wonder Mr. McFarland got sick, carrying such a load of anxiety and responsibility in the attempt to do the impossible, as previously indicated.

Another issue of the Monthly Review of the Wheat Situation published by the Minister of Trade and Commerce says on page 11 under the heading, Grain Control Board:

Just as the month of November closed, the ministry of agriculture gave publicity to the long-expected statement as to the operations of the grain control board in respect of wheat.

They were anxious to hear about it, and apparently the information had been delayed for a few months. What if it had been delayed for four and a half years? The article continues:

Up to November 28 the official board has sold 138,756,000 bushels, having still on hand a remnant of 6,142,000 bushels.

That is all they had over.

The total expenses of the board amounted to 8,814,942 paper pesos of which 5,881,756 represents the loss on the grain sold; 2,455,000 interest money borrowed for the purpose of its operations—

And so forth. No trouble about getting information about other parts of the world, but we who supply the line of credit could not get a peep out of this government until last night, and then only a meagre statement of what we knew already, that there was approximately 200,000,000 bushels of wheat futures in the hands of Mr. McFarland. The country all along knew it. The grain men on the exchange day by day can make an estimate of how much the government or, as it is called, the pool agency, holds, so why the secrecy? Why has the government tried to keep this a secret? They must have had some object in mind but they cannot put it over on us by saying it was for the public interest—it was for their own interest, otherwise they would never have dared the criticism of the public for doing business in the clandestine way they have been doing it for the last four years and a half. There is nothing else but to send this bill to the committee and make the best of a bad business of losing markets in these dying days of a dying government. I am in favour of referring this bill to a committee for possible improvement, and I shall reserve my further remarks to a discussion of the findings of that committee.

Farmers were faced not only with the difficulty of having their wheat down to the lowest price it had been for four hundred years but they also had to compete with a monetary system where the currency of the Argentine was away down below ours. Those of us who sold five bushels of No. 1 northern for $1 and less at the point of shipment in December, 1932, know the crucifixion we had to go through; I sometimes wish the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his colleagues were personally aware of that so they would know the agonies the farmers had to suffer. What the government should have done was to go off the gold standard at the time Great Britain went off and not continue to crucify us on our export sales with a low British pound which had to be converted into high Canadian dollars.

It will be remembered that about this time last year I tried for four months to get a copy of a report made by Sir Herbert Marler, Canada's representative in Tokyo, Japan. I was jockeyed back and forth from the Prime Minister to the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), from him to the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and so on. I finally got a little huffy over it and the Prime Minister told me he would not give it to me anyhow as it was confidential. I did not think anything of it at the time but developments since have made me wonder whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce had been authorized to do what he did in preparing a summary of Sir Herbert Marler's report. If the Prime Minister will say that the former Minister of Trade and Commerce had no authority to give me this summary, I shall not read it.

Mr. BENNETT: I never heard of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If he had authority, there is no reason why he should not have given it to me. After I had got a little cross, in order to appease me Mr. Stevens came across the floor and handed me this summary. He told me it was for me alone but I told him that would not be much good to me. It was marked "private" and was not signed but frequently memoranda are not signed. I told him I would take it and look over it. This occurred on Friday night and on the following Tuesday I made an appointment to see him at his office. I told him that I thought he was giving me more information than he had anticipated and he had better take it back. He took it back and blotted out the "private." I then said, "How about signing it?" He then wrote and signed the following note:

Dear Mr. Motherwell:

I trust the attached memorandum will be useful and helpful.

H. H. Stevens.

I am trying to make it that now. I shall read only extracts as I have not the time to read it all. However, I will put it on Hansard if hon. members desire. When hon. members hear this synopsis I think they will realize what the original report was like. This reads in part:

In 1931 Mr. Marler visited Canada and interviewed the Minister of Trade and Commerce and various Canadian producers and exporters of products saleable in the far east. On his return to Tokyo, he commenced an analysis of Canadian trade with the far east in an attempt to discover the fundamental causes of the lack of progress of Canadian trade with these markets.

As a result of these studies, Mr. Marler drafted a plan to coordinate trade promotion work in the far east. This provided for the concentration of effort on a few major products, such as wheat and flour, which it was known Canada could export successfully. Believing that the chief difficulty in the way of expanding trade in wheat and flour lay in Canada, Mr. Marler recommended that a commission composed of representatives of grain exporters, flour millers, dominion government departments and the governments of the western provinces should be sent to the far east to investigate the whole situation.

Nothing was done. Instead the government agreed to the views expressed by the grain exchange and the Canadian millers' association. The summary continues:

Mr. Marler again urged the desirability of sending a commission to study the wheat and flour situation in the far east; failing that, an expert flour representative and a thoroughly qualified representative of one of the government departments should be sent.

Again nothing was done. The summary continues:

The difficulty here arose that the trades concerned did not view with favour the proposal to send a commission to the far east to investigate the possibilities for the sale of Canadian wheat and flour. They also did not agree with many of the views put forward by Mr. Marler.

What is the use of Canada having a representative in Japan if every Tom, Dick and Harry can stand up and say to the government, "I do not want Mr. Marler to do this or that?" And again:

The last mentioned point would depend largely on the stimulation of the demand for high grade flour, so that the Minister of Trade and Commerce endeavoured to explore the possibility of finding a suitable flour expert who could be sent to the far east to undertake the task outlined. On consulting the industry, however, little support was forthcoming for this proposal, both the grain trade and the mills considering that through the medium of their representatives they already have a complete knowledge of the situation in the far east.

I always knew this government was pretty close to the grain trade and the milling industry of this country, but it did not do any kindness to the mills by making them pay so much for their wheat that they were brought to the point of bankruptcy. However, the government took their advice instead of that of Sir Herbert Marler, who we all know is well qualified to discuss and advise on market conditions in China and Japan. These markets have been disappearing year after year. This government, with its recent wheat-hoarding policy has about come to the end of its tether. There is an accumulation of 225 million bushels of unsold stabilized wheat and the Prime Minister tried to carry the secrecy on this account a little further when he would not at first give us the sales figure for 1934-35. He finally did give us the estimated percentage, but I have them officially up to May 1, at 132 million bushels.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Even if we shipped 40 million bushels more this grain year it will only make 162 million bushels, very much less than the year before, and that in the face of so much crop disaster last year. Mr. McFarland has had the bull by the tail now for nearly five years and he apparently cannot either let go or carry on; hence this belated bill.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate but I finally decided to say a few words. Before I start I want to compliment the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) upon the bill now before us, and when I say that I think I voice the views of the wheat growers in my province and more particularly in my constituency. I cannot understand the argument of the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), nor can I understand the arguments of other hon. members who are growing wheat in my province. Reference was made this afternoon to the wheat pool, and I think I am right when I say—the former Minister of Agriculture can correct me if I am wrong—that he was in favour of the wheat pool. I believe the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) was also in favour of this pool. I think they will agree with me when I say that the object in the first place was the orderly marketing of wheat. I will not go back to conditions as they existed prior to the time we organized the pools, but I can remember very well that the wheat growers sent down a deputation —in fact more than one deputation—when hon. gentlemen now in opposition were in power, about the year 1922, asking them to reinstate the wheat board. And I can infer from the fact that they did not do so that the farmers of western Canada found it necessary to organize the pools. We were very anxious to have the old board reinstated because we felt that it was to the advantage of the farmers to have this done, and when it was not done it was decided to organize the pools. Hon. gentlemen who are now criticizing this bill so severely should bear in mind that they refused to give us the wheat board, and therefore there was nothing for us to do but to organize the pools. I believe that Alberta took that step in 1923 and we followed in 1924. We went into that business for the express purpose of having the grain marketed in an orderly way; that was the object in organizing the pools. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to say that the policy of the government in the last three or four years, or under Mr. McFarland, if you will, has not been for that same purpose, namely, to provide orderly marketing. What else is it? It amazes me to hear hon. gentlemen advocating the dumping of our wheat on the markets of the world, to the extent that they have suggested to-day. I do not wonder so much when I hear that proposal coming from the hon. gentleman who has been acting as critic for the opposition, because he is a lawyer; but I am surprised to hear farmers from western Canada advocating it. They know very well that round about 1923 or 1924 we found it absolutely necessary to take the action we did then, and I am borne out in this by what the Prime Minister said yesterday. When wheat production began to go up, increasing to hundreds of millions of bushels, what else could we have done? I have been thirty years growing wheat in the west and I can remember when our exports amounted to less than one hundred million bushels. But when they got up to three and four hundred million bushels, the farmers of western Canada decided that the time had come for a change of policy so far as the grain exchange was concerned, because they could not save the situation. The volume had increased to such an extent that we were obliged to make our own market, and that is why we went in for orderly marketing.

The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) this afternoon condemned the wheat pools; this attitude is characteristic of him. But I want to put on Hansard a few figures to show that the pools themselves did not have the carryover which the trade had for a period of four years. The total carryover for 1929 was 127,000,000 bushels, and the pool's proportion of that was 52,000,000 bushels. In other words, the western pools carried forty per cent of the carryover while the trade carried sixty per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: How much did the trade have?

Mr. LOUCKS: The pools had 52,000,000 bushels; that was their proportion of the carryover.

Mr. YOUNG: And the trade?

Mr. LOUCKS: The trade had the rest of it. At any rate, the percentage carried by the pools was 40—40·9, to be exact. For the four years from 1926 to 1929, inclusive, the total of deliveries was 755,719,373, the proportion for which the pools were responsible being 51·9 per cent. The total carryover for the four years was 402,000,000 bushels, the carryover by the pools being 170,000,000 bushels or 42·3 per cent. The hon. gentleman, however, still contends that the pools were the guilty parties with respect to the carryover. I cannot understand why he should take this view when, as I say, the pools were responsible for forty per cent only of the carryover in the last four years. In other words, they sold wheat whenever they got an opportunity.

I have known the ex-Minister of Agriculture for years and I have great respect for him. He is well qualified to discuss a subject such as this and he took his full forty minutes; I am sure he could have used another forty minutes if he had been allowed to do so. But surely, knowing conditions in the west as he knows them—and having been once Minister of Agriculture, he knows them probably better than most other hon. gentlemen—he must realize that his attitude to-night is unjustified in suggesting that we should have dumped the wheat on the market.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. LOUCKS: Well, I took it that his policy was that the wheat should have been dumped on the market instead of there being a carryover of 200,000,000 bushels.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I never said anything about dumping it on the market.

Mr. LOUCKS: How would you have got rid of it? I call it dumping; perhaps that is not the right term to use, but that is what we call it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I showed the hon. gentleman what the Argentine did.

Mr. LOUCKS: Since he has mentioned the Argentine, may I point out that he did not give us any statistics as to their exports. I challenge him or any other member to deny that our exports in the last four years have been greater than those of the Argentine. We exported some 400,000,000 bushels, and what did they export? About 100,000,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is there anything in this bill about stabilization?

Mr. LOUCKS: My contention is that we have shipped more than the Argentine. But there is another consideration that enters into this discussion, and it is something which my hon. friends do not realize. The Argentine is situated very differently from western Canada. They have no storage facilities there, and no matter what they get for their wheat it has to go out on the market. The ex-Minister of Agriculture knows that. I wonder how hon. gentlemen opposite feel about taking the premium on wheat, called a bonus. I imagine my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) has taken his share of it in the last four years. Well, why condemn the government that made it possible? If I were as conscience-stricken as apparently hon. gentlemen are, I would give it back to the government. That is what they should do, but they took it just the same. With the five cent bonus, I know that my hon. friend from South Battleford got more than I did, because they had a better crop up there that year. There is no doubt that we are faced with a surplus; we all admit it. But I ask hon. gentlemen this question: What would have been the situation if the government had not taken such action as it has? We know what our experience in 1932 was. I had to take thirty cents a bushel for my wheat. I am going to ask this question now: If the government had not stepped in last October, what would have happened to the farmers of western Canada? I said a few minutes ago: Our conception was that we farmers ourselves made the bear market. Not only our own farmers from western Canada but people from foreign countries were selling wheat in the Winnipeg market, and I make the statement that we would have been taking thirty cents and less a bushel had a pegged price not been put on our wheat last fall. Every hon. member knows that. I well remember that in 1932 I fertilized 700 acres of wheat, and what did I get for my wheat? I hardly averaged thirty cents a bushel and I took a loss of $2,000 on my operations.

But what happened as a result of the action taken by the government last fall? Unfortunately for us, in our particular district we did not have much wheat, but those who had, realized sixty cents instead of thirty cents a bushel, and that was because there was a pegged price last fall; that was what saved the situation. Nobody can deny that and nobody is going to deny it, because that is the fact. Nobody can say where the price of wheat might have gone had the government not taken the action it did because, as I have already said, not only our own farmers but people from foreign countries were selling short on the grain exchange. I believe that in less than ten days we would have been taking much less than thirty cents a bushel for our wheat had the government not done what it did.

When I hear hon. members who follow the same occupation as I do, that of farming, ridiculing the government for the stand it took in protecting us in the way it did, I cannot understand it. I must say that this is very cheap politics on their part; that is all it is. The ex-Minister of Agriculture can laugh all he likes, but knowing as I do the farmers of western Canada, I never want to adopt the position where I have to play cheap politics. The government has stood behind western Canada during the last few years; it has saved the farmers of the west if there is any such thing as saving us so far as wheat is concerned. I was surprised at the reply that came from the financial critic of the opposition, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), but I have been more surprised this afternoon and to-night to hear hon. members from Saskatchewan taking practically the same attitude as he did and saying, if they had been the government, what they would have done in connection with getting our wheat on to the market. If they were to carry out what they have been saying this afternoon and to-night, the situation would have been the same as in 1932; we would be taking around thirty cents a bushel for our wheat, and I speak from experience as a farmer when I make that statement.

Let me draw attention to another matter. The government has been accused of subsidizing the farmers. How much has the government been subsidizing the farmers since last October? Has wheat come down to the pegged price of seventy-five cents a bushel? No; it has been selling at above that figure, and I challenge any hon. member to say that the government has subsidized the wheat growers.

Mr. HANBURY: Who paid for that?

Mr. LOUCKS: The European buyers paid for that, and they have been glad to pay us eighty and eighty-two cents a bushel; that is what we are getting for our wheat now.

Let me give another quotation. Mr. McFarland has been quoted here to-night from speeches made in several places. What did he say? He said that a certain gentleman representing a great milling firm in Great Britain came to Canada for the purpose of buying 10,000,000 bushels of wheat not through the grain exchange but through him as agent for the pools. Mr. McFarland asked him what he was willing to pay. What was the quotation? If my memory serves me aright, the quotation was forty-five cents a bushel.

An hon. MEMBER: Forty cents.

Mr. LOUCKS: Perhaps I am wrong. An hon. member says forty cents. My recollection is forty-five cents for 10,000,000 bushels. What was Mr. McFarland's reply? He said: "Have you no bowels of compassion for the farmers of western Canada when you offer that price?" I am quoting Fort William prices, not those on the farm. Does that not show at what price the millers of Great Britain or any other country—and I would not exclude the Canadian millers—would take our wheat from us? Then, because the government pegged the price for us and said to those people: You cannot have this wheat for less than seventy-five cents a bushel, I hear this ridicule coming from hon. members to the left of the Speaker. I say shame! Is it any wonder that as a member of this house I say that this is cheap party politics? What else can it be? It is not in the interests of the wheat growers when an hon. member will ridicule a government because it has made it possible for us to get seventy-five, eighty and eighty-two cents a bushel for our wheat, when it is well known that otherwise we would not have got more than thirty for it.

Let us take the case of wheat at forty-five cents if you like. I believe an hon. member said that that is more than the price quoted, but let us take it at forty-five cents. What does that mean? It costs twenty-two cents a hundred pounds from my station to the terminal elevator, three-quarters of a cent for handling charges, one cent to put it through the exchange; or in other words it means scarcely thirty cents a bushel to me for that wheat. Do you think for a minute if I, a grower of wheat, were sitting to the left of the Speaker, I would rise in my place and ridicule the policy of the government, knowing it has made it possible for me to get more than sixty cents for my wheat? I would gladly sit over there, take my medicine, and say yes to the policy of the government. I do not take much stock of that sort of thing from professional men and others of that class, but when actual farmers begin to ridicule the government, that is more than I can understand.

I can well remember when we got the idea we were going to organize a wheat pool. The hon. member for South Battleford I think was with me one hundred per cent in putting that over. He can contradict me if he likes, but I do not think he will. We went out together to try to have the situation and to bring about an orderly market for the farmer.

Mr. HANBURY: Why did you not do it?

Mr. LOUCKS: We did do it. I gave the figures to show how much better we did than the trade did. Our carryover was about forty per cent while that of the trade was about sixty per cent. We carried out our plan. What happened to us? Who were the ones who were fighting us? The big interests were the ones who were fighting us. We knew what we were up against; we knew we were up against the grain exchange, the big interests, and I want to say to-night that the government is up against the same thing. When I hear some hon. members saying that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is for the big interests, I want to ask the house to-night: Who is he up against now if it is not the big interests, the big milling companies and so forth when he is taking the stand he is for the farmers of western Canada?

Mr VALLANCE: He is up against the wall.

Mr. LOUCKS: No he is not. I would like to see the ex-Minister of Agriculture making before the Rosetown farmers a speech like the one he made here to-night; he would not have a chance to stay in my constituency very long. Every move that has been made along these lines has been opposed by hon. members opposite. It was the same with the marketing bill. I admit we were defeated with our egg and poultry pool, but what did I find when I went home? Some of the men who voted against it were selling their eggs at eight cents a dozen at Easter. Who were the chief opponents? I suppose the packing houses at Montreal, and now they will get the eggs and sell them later on at about forty cents. If hon. members opposite, more particularly those from the prairies, think that the farmers of western Canada are going to endorse the attitude they take in connection with this grain bill, I say they are missing their guess. Why do I say that? In my own constituency we voted eighty-eight per cent for the marketing scheme in connection with our eggs and poultry so I think that the cooperative spirit is still there.

Then we have hon. members objecting that this is compulsion, and oh, what a terrible thing! When we put over the wheat pool, what did we do as farmers? We were not forced to so so but we signed a contract penalizing ourselves twenty-five cents a bushel for breach of the agreement, because we knew that some would be foolish enough to bootleg wheat. If we were satisfied with the grain exchange, why would eighty per cent of the farmers sign a contract with the pool which carried a penalty of twenty-five cents a bushel? We knew the condition and we were willing to do it. Yet we hear hon. members saying that this is compulsion and an awful thing. The farmers were told this poultry scheme was compulsion—Don't be forced into anything." Well, I do not know how they feel now, when they are taking around eight cents a dozen for their eggs.

An hon. MEMBER: They are lucky.

Mr. LOUCKS: Who said lucky? Imagine a farmer saying they are lucky to be getting eight cents a dozen for eggs.

Mr. YOUNG: I did not say anything.

Mr. LOUCKS: The hon. member is more concerned with politics than with the plight of the poor farmers.

Mr. YOUNG: I told my hon. friend I did not say anything.

Mr. LOUCKS: They were told it was compulsion, that they must not do it with eggs, and now they have learned their lesson; when it comes to signing up again you will see a different attitude as far as our part of the country is concerned. The day after I reached Saskatoon during the recess my wife said to me: "I sold a crate of eggs at eight cents a dozen. They were quoted in the stores in Saskatoon at two dozen for thirty-five cents or eighteen cents a dozen straight." Is that justice to the farmer, I ask my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young), who said "lucky"?

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Speaker, may I tell my hon. friend—

An hon. MEMBER: You have got him on toast.

Mr. YOUNG: Once more I would like to tell my hon. friend that I did not make that remark.

Mr. LOUCKS: Well, I am glad the hon. member did not say that; however someone over there said it. But that is the story. Then when there is a measure brought in to deal with the problem, the great argument is: It is compulsion for a small minority. Let me say, with all respect for farmers—for I have been one all my life and I know them—that the farmers are their own cutthroats and always have been, and it appears to me now that the argument and policy of the opposition is that they must continue to be cutthroats for another generation. What do I mean by cutthroats? I mean one farmer competing against the other, and that has been going on all my life and I am over sixty. When we have a government with vision who bring in reform measures and say: "We can take care of this thing and make conditions such that you will not be cut-throats any longer," what do we hear from the opposition? Oh, that compulsion again! I know who said that when we wanted a one hundred per cent wheat pool. I know that the grain exchange was very active in warning the farmers. The attitude of the opposition is just about the same. Quite a number from the grain exchange are down here at the present time; they are worrying, and no wonder. In Winnipeg walking about the streets I see their homes and I know we have not got such homes as some of these fellows have who have been buying our wheat the last number of years. I wonder if hon. members realize that it matters not as far as the exchange is concerned what wheat sells for. Twenty cent wheat is just as good to them as wheat at fifty or eighty cents; they get the same commission—volume is what counts with them. But that does not help the poor farmer. So I say there is only one hope for western Canada, and that is the action that is being taken by this government at this time.

The ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said that the Prime Minister must have known that Mr. McFarland was going to be ill. Then he attempted to make something out of the statistics not having been brought down long ago giving the number of bushels of carryover, and I suppose he wanted the dollars and cents as well. Well, my memory tells me that he was one of the members of the committee when Mr. McFarland was here and I think he was one of those who said that if it was going to be dangerous to the interests of the farmers to divulge it, by all means do not do so. I congratulate him on that. But he has changed his attitude, and so has the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). There is an election coming on, so it does not matter whether it is injurious to the farmers. Is that the attitude now?

Mr. VALLANCE: Sure.

Mr. LOUCKS: Cheap politics again, that is all I can say. There is an election coming on, so we must know just how much money is involved in this, whether it ruins the farmers or not.

Mr. VALLANCE: It will ruin this government.

Mr. LOUCKS: I am glad to say this bill will go over, and when it gets in committee, as has been said by some hon. members of the opposition, we shall have a further chance to discuss it. I am well pleased with the bill and I am here to support it.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): The bill now before the house to establish a grain board is a measure which I think a majority of the farmers of western Canada have looked forward to for a number of years. Wheat has now become distinctly a national problem, and I do not think it can be dealt with effectively except through a national agency. In fact wheat is not only a national problem, it is an international problem. Most of the nations of the world have gathered together in conference several times in recent years to discuss it. It may be these conferences have not been successful, but the very fact that all these countries thought it necessary to hold such conferences and take part in them should impress upon us the gravity of the problem.

No country in the world is more concerned in the wheat problem than Canada. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) pointed out yesterday, we have been the largest exporter of wheat in the world. The importance of the industry to Canada was so well stated by the Prime Minister yesterday that there is no necessity for me to do more than mention it. Wheat is not only a national problem but the wheat problem has now become a national responsibility. I should like to take a few minutes to try to prove that fact to the house. I say it is a national responsibility, first because of the national immigration policy which has been in force in Canada from 1896 until 1913, with the exception of the war period. The policy has been to bring as many farmers as possible to Canada, to settle them on the western prairies and to push the wheat acreage as far north as possible. In the period between 1922 and 1929, particularly, the organized farmers of western Canada protested against this policy, and I remember that in 1923 I stated in this house that the greatest danger facing western Canada was that of overproduction, or producing more than we could sell at a profit. I remember being questioned in the lobby by one of the Conservative members, and being asked whether or not I was sincere in that statement. He thought I was only talking for political effect, and when I assured him I was sincere he simply laughed and said, "You're crazy." The time seems to have arrived when we have produced more than we can sell at a profit. As a matter of fact that time arrived a few years ago. Between pre-war years and 1933 the wheat acreage in Canada increased by 161 per cent. We had a percentage of increase in wheat acreage greater than that of any other country. Surely the nation cannot disclaim responsibility for this; it was a direct result of government policy. There was the policy of immigration coupled with that of the development of new wheats so that the wheat acreage could be pushed farther north.

I remember a few years ago the former Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), who preceded me to-night with an excellent speech, stated he looked forward to the time when Canada would produce a billion bushels of wheat.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think not.

Mr. COOTE: I believe the statement is in Hansard. However if the hon. member states he did not make it I shall withdraw my observation.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It has been made by others.

Mr. COOTE: The statement has been made, anyway. The extension of the wheat area and the increase in acreage was responsible for the increased volume of production, and that was the outcome of a distinctly national policy.

The present problem of the farmer is one of price, and to some extent at least price is the result of another national policy. I now refer to the problem of the exchange value of Canadian money, a point which I believe was raised this evening by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell). Our chief competitors, as is well known, are the Argentine and Australia. Our difficulty in connection with the price of wheat has arisen in the last five years. Prior to that time we did not have much difficulty, with the exception of some odd years, in obtaining a fair price. The internal price, namely, the price to the producers in Canada, during most of the time—perhaps not during the last year—has been lower than the price paid to our competitors in their own countries and in their own currency. The internal price to our producers is dependent largely on the amount of Canadian funds we have been able to secure for foreign funds for which our wheat was eventually sold. Late in the year 1929, by government action, the Argentine abandoned the gold standard and devalued or depreciated their currency, thereby raising to the Argentine producer the price of wheat as expressed in paper pesos. Their internal currency is the currency in which their debts are expressed, and the currency with which they buy their requirements in the Argentine. In January, 1930, about a year later, Australia abandoned gold redemption and devalued her currency in the same way. The fact is that it depreciated very rapidly. For the past five years the pound sterling has been at a premium of twenty-five to thirty per cent in Australia; most of the time I believe it has stood at twenty-five per cent. Hon. members will recall that in the fall of 1932, when wheat was at its lowest point in Canada, the pound sterling in Canada was worth about $3.70 to $3.75. At the same time the pound sterling was at a premium of twenty-five per cent or was worth approximately $6 in Australia. At that time the Australian competitor had a sixty per cent exchange advantage over the Canadian producer. Had our currency then been at par with Australian wheat, on the worst day in 1932, instead of being worth 38½ cents I believe our wheat would have been worth at least 60 cents Fort William, in Canadian currency. That would have happened without any change in the world gold price for wheat.

I have not the figures to indicate the exact exchange situation in the Argentine at that particular time, but since January, 1930, their currency has been at least as low as and sometimes lower than it has been in Australia. At the moment I am not placing the blame for this policy on any persons. It is sufficient for my purpose to state that on many occasions hon. members in this corner of the chamber have urged that our currency be brought down to the level of Australian currency. On those occasions we received very little support from either the government or the opposition. In the fall of 1932 the opposition did support us in a proposal that the pound sterling be brought up to a parity in Canada. With that exception however I cannot remember having received any support from either side of the house, nor did we receive any from the financial authorities in Canada, namely, the heads of banks and other large financial institutions.

The point I wish to make clear is that it was the national policy of Canada to keep our currency at a high value in New York, and keeping our currency at that high value had the effect of forcing down the value of the British pound in terms of Canadian currency until, as I have said, in the fall of 1932 it was at one time as low as $3.70. That was the result of a national policy. I have indicated that by our policies of immigration, the development of wheat areas in western Canada and our stand on monetary matters we have in the last few years created a problem for the wheat grower. I believe the nation must assume the responsibility for dealing with it.

Most of the increase in wheat prices we have at the present time is due to the depreciation of the pound sterling in terms of gold, coupled with the fall of our dollar to the level of the pound. This latter factor, namely the fall of our dollar, was due to a change in the money policy of the United States. I should like again to emphasize the point that we should take whatever action is necessary to give the farmer a reasonable price for his wheat, and that the nation should assume whatever financial risk may be involved in meeting the problem. For the benefit of the house may I point out that the agitation for a wheat board in western Canada has gone on for many years, dating back to the wheat board which operated during the last year of the war. In 1922 or 1923 legislation passed this chamber to establish a wheat board, but the action was taken very late in the season and as we were told it was found impossible to get proper management the matter was allowed to drop. As long as I have been in western Canada there has been a feeling that the selling of our wheat on the grain exchange was not the best method of disposing of it. I believe in response to feeling which had developed in western Canada, in 1931 the so-called stamp commission was appointed to inquire into the question of selling our wheat on the grain exchange. The report indicated an approval of the present system, but inside of eighteen months the system had absolutely broken down and wheat reached its lowest level of 38½ cents. Not long after the Stamp commission had reported, Mr. Richardson of the Winnipeg grain exchange was before our agriculture committee advocating that the government should support the market. The government has been supporting the market for the last few years, and experience has proven that it is very difficult and expensive. We have not only had to support the legitimate hedges of the elevator companies to cover deliveries at country elevators, but we have also had to protect the market against the short selling of millions of bushels of futures. We understand this short selling came from the United States, and dear knows where else. We do not really know where it all came from, but I have heard that in one day alone orders for as much as ten million bushels of short sales came on the Winnipeg market and had to be taken care of or the market would have broken, and many farmers would have had to let their wheat go at a very low price indeed. There were at all times speculators who were willing to break the market if they thought they could do it, but the speculator that we depended upon to support the hedges seems to have disappeared. As one man in western Canada said to me, he has become almost as extinct as the dinosaur, and because there is no speculative interest to take up these hedges I feel that it is imperative that a wheat board should be set up.

It seems to me that under the old system it was no one's particular business to sell our wheat. We always seemed to take it for granted that Canadian wheat would sell itself. I have been told that the grain trade looked after that. The grain trade are largely interested in the elevator business; so long as their elevators were filled with wheat they were sure of storage charges, and I never could believe that they were desperately keen to get all this wheat sold and shipped out because once the wheat was shipped out the storage charges, and of course their earnings, would cease.

I repeat, I am in favour of this bill to establish a grain board, but I would also like to make it clear to the house that the board must have the financial assistance from the nation which will enable it to pay a fair price to the producer even if it has to sell the wheat to the world at a lower price. I believe that in the national sense it would pay us to guarantee to our producers a price covering the cost of production and to sell the wheat at the best price we can obtain. In this connection I would like to draw the attention of the members to the example that has been set by the Argentine. I quote from the Monthly Commercial Letter issued by the Canadian Bank of Commerce for the month of May, 1935. With reference to the operations of the Argentine grain board it says:

> In November, 1933, the Argentine government set up a grain marketing board to assist producers. Its chief functions were to set a basic price for wheat, flaxsed and corn, to purchase such grain at the fixed price and to sell it for export only at the prevailing world price. As the world price was lower than the basic price the government would have had to absorb a possible heavy loss. This difficulty was overcome, with the cooperation of the exchange control board, by lowering the rate at which the peso was pegged (it was already at a discount of about 40 per cent below its gold parity) and utilizing the resulting exchange profits to cover any loss on the grain board's operations. The board calculated at the outset that it might incur a loss of fifty million pesos, which would have to be recovered from exchange profits. A rise in prices consequent on the drought last year in the United States, however, reduced the subsidy per bushel to a relatively small sum, and to the end of September, 1934, a substantial net profit was realized on the whole operation, which it was planned to use in financing the next season's crops. It is important to note that the board claims that in buying grain as it was offered, and regulating its sales to demand, it avoided breaking the world market with abrupt offerings of Argentine grain.

Apart from the success which it achieved in disposing of all but a very small carryover of the large 1933-34 crop at a price satisfactory to growers and at no loss to itself, the grain board has undertaken to mitigate, and hopes eventually to remove, the two disabilities under which the Argentine grain trade is still operating, namely, the production of a large volume of certain varieties of wheat not readily acceptable by importers, and lack of elevator and storage space.

I would like to commend this method of financing the operations of the board to the study of the committee which I understand is to consider this grain board bill. I also wish to quote the concluding paragraph of the Monthly Letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce dealing with the Argentine's method of handling wheat. It says:

> We can no longer blind ourselves to the intensity of the competition Canadian wheat is meeting from Argentine, nor can we dismiss it as a temporary phenomenon. Argentina is now the world's leading exporter of grains, and is making every effort to consolidate her position. She has met and overcome difficulties just as great as those with which Canada now contends, and provides an example of enterprise and resolution in dealing with them.

In conclusion, I hope that we may show the same enterprise and resolution in dealing with the problem of marketing Canada's wheat. I trust that when this bill goes to the committee which I understand is to consider it, it will be dealt with expeditiously and thoroughly and that a plan may be evolved under which the Canadian producer may be guaranteed at least the cost of production for his crop, and that the very best possible methods may be provided for the sale of our wheat to all the buyers we can find anywhere in the world.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, I have taken a great deal of interest in this bill ever since it was introduced because I have been growing wheat in Canada for the last thirty years, and of necessity anything in connection with wheat is of great interest to me. As I sat here and listened to different members talking about wheat my mind went back to 1930, to the time of the election, and I thought of the way Conservative speakers throughout the country spoke on every platform at that time and told us of the wonderful prices we were going to get for agricultural products of all kinds if they were elected. Butter, why that was spread over every platform. Wheat, why it was then at one dollar a bushel, and we were told that we were going to get $1.50 a bushel at least. We were told that just as soon as the Conservative party got into power the price of wheat was going to rise in ten days by ten cents a bushel at least. But no sooner had the Conservative party got into power than wheat began to go down, and it went down and down until we thought it would never stop.

As I listened to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) yesterday I thought of what was said on almost every platform in 1930 in connection with wheat. Quoting the Liberal Minister of Trade and Commerce, Conservative speakers said:

> The Department of Trade and Commerce is not exercised over the sale of such commodities as wheat because those commodities find their own markets.

That was the statement made by the Liberal Minister of Trade and Commerce in those days, and it was repeated from practically every platform in western Canada. Now in those days we never thought of finding a market for our wheat. As my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote) has just said, we believed in those days that wheat would find its own market all over the world. And it was finding its market. I would ask the Prime Minister now what he would have done at that time when we had a carryover of only 127,000,000 bushels, which was nothing at all compared with the carryover we have had for the last four years? Would he have recommended that the government take it over and sell it? He would not have recommended anything of the kind. They used that as a sort of argument to throw up as a screen. Every step taken by this government in connection with wheat has been a mistake. They have made one error after another and there is not one move they have made in connection with wheat which has been right. Shortly after the Prime Minister was elected he went over to London. He returned and came out to Regina and the word went over the western prairies that the Prime Minister had a story to tell us. The Premier of Saskatchewan sat on the platform with him to introduce him to his audience, and the rest of us were listening at our radios to hear his message. What did he tell us? He told us he had a market in France, but where is that market? I am surprised that there is such a carryover. What has become of the market he claimed he had found? We do not hear anything about that market now. Have we lost it? Then he told us that at that moment the ambassador to Japan was on his way to China to find a market for our wheat in that country. Where has that market gone to? Apparently the Chinaman has gone back to eating rice altogether. These are some of the things this government has done.

What next? What happened after those faux pas? He then started the five cent wheat bonus. As the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has said, the Prime Minister was first going to pay this bonus on export wheat; then it was to be paid on the freight on wheat; then he brought the grain commissioner to Ottawa to talk things over and he decided to pay it to the growers of wheat when they brought in their wheat for sale. What did that mean? It meant that the man who had wheat received a bonus of five cents per bushel while the man who had none had to pay more for his flour and bread. We in the southern part of the province got nothing; we did not get one of the nickels he was talking about. The man who had the wheat got more while the man who had no wheat got less, even that which he had was taken away. The man who was hailed out, the man who was frozen out, the man who was dried out and the man who was eaten out by the grasshoppers got nothing, but the man who had a crop received five cents a bushel. This was done to stimulate production and urge the farmers to grow more wheat. That was a mistake.

What was the next thing? The next thing was to bring a man over here to look into the grain trade. Something was wrong with that trade and it had to be straightened out. Sir Josiah Stamp was brought over and he stamped everything. He told us the grain exchange was all right and that it should be kept up as a means of marketing our wheat. Now the Prime Minister turns around and presents a bill to do away with the exchange. Did you ever see such a series of contradictions? One thing right after another. Sir Josiah Stamp said that we needed the grain exchange; the Prime Minister brings a great economist over here to tell him that and then he turns around and says we do not need it and he presents a bill in order to do away with it. The government is going out of power and they will not be here to see this bill put into effect. The government will be lucky to be the official opposition after the next election. They know that they will not be here to see that this bill is carried out and so they are going to put it through.

What next did they do? The next thing was the Ottawa agreements. We were told that these would settle all our difficulties, that we would get into the English market without having to pay any duty on our wheat while the Argentine and other countries outside the empire would have to pay six cents a bushel. I can still hear the Prime Minister telling us about these agreements. He told us that there would be two ships lying side by side at the quay of one of the ports of old England, one from Canada and the other from some other country. The wheat in the ship from Canada would go in free while the other ship would not be permitted to unload its wheat until it had paid six cents a bushel. One would have imagined that all the wheat consumed in England would be going there from Canada and Australia, but what do we find? In 1932 the Argentine sold 19·5 million bushels of wheat; in 1933 they sold 21·9 million bushels and in 1934 they sold 34·2 million bushels. In two years there was a gain of 15 million bushels. What about Canada? Perhaps I had better give these figures under my breath. In 1932 we sold 44·4 million bushels of wheat to England; in 1933 we sold only 40·6 million bushels and in 1934 only 34·7 million bushels. Our sales have dropped 10 million bushels. We were given an advantage of six cents a bushel; this was a sheltered market which was going to solve all the difficulties of the wheat growers of western Canada.

Then when they saw that that was not going to work, they went to Rome to try to reach an agreement. They consulted with France but France replied that she was willing to reduce her duties and her restrictions against our wheat if we told her what we would buy from her. Was any one sent from here to try and make an agreement with France whereby we would take something in exchange for our wheat? No; nothing was done.

They then adjourned to London and a lawyer was sent from the prairies to sell our wheat. He went over there with all expenses paid and then we were told that the only thing to do was to put on a quota. We were told we would have to cut down our acreage as we were growing too much wheat. Can you imagine going down into the southern part of Saskatchewan where they have not had a crop for six years and telling the farmers they are growing too much wheat? The former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) made reference to the program of recovery in the United States under the NRA and its system of codes. Instead of a blue eagle he suggested to the government that they should adopt the grasshopper as their emblem. The grasshopper will cut down the acreage and get rid of a lot of wheat. The drought and the hail will get rid of a lot of wheat.

No one kept these quotas, and in fact our government loaned part of our quota to the Argentine. We are wondering when we will get that back. It is all just a farce because no one is adhering to the quota. This is just something else put through in an effort to deceive the farmer. The party opposite have done nothing else but try to deceive the farmers in one way or another ever since they got into power, and even before. That is the way they got in and that is the way they are going to slide out; make no mistake about that.

Now, having done all these things and having done them all wrong, and having made mistakes in everything, they said, "The thing to do is to stabilize the price; you have to get a man there." And so they put in this man McFarland to stabilize the price. In season and out of season for the last four years, both in the committee and in the house, I have tried to find out something of their activities, but I have not been able to discover anything. The first bit of information which we got was given us the other night by the Prime Minister, namely, that we have 200,000,000 or 225,000,000 of a carryover, held by Mr. John I. McFarland for Cooperative Wheat Producers, Limited. But what it has or has not cost the country we do not know.

I have said before, and I say again tonight, that this government is gambling in wheat. That is denied. When they buy futures, that is not gambling—oh, no; that is only supporting the market. But when I buy futures, or when anyone else buys futures, it is gambling, it is speculating. Listen to this from the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), who talks so glibly about trade ethics and all that kind of thing:

> The hon. member who took his seat a few minutes ago said that this government was guilty of gambling in wheat, and that we had lost $30,000,000. No statement could have been further from the fact than that. This government is not either directly or indirectly gambling in wheat.

Note that—not either directly or indirectly gambling in wheat; yet we have 225,000,000 bushels.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the date?

Mr. DONNELLY: This is from Hansard of February 13, 1934. He goes on:

> The hon. member for Melville made the same statement the other night. What this government has done is this. It has supported Mr. McFarland, who was chosen as their manager by the pool selling agency for the three western pools. The government has stood behind that selling agency, controlled by Mr. McFarland, in taking care of wheat futures on the Winnipeg market. What does that mean?... Anybody who knows anything about business knows that if a government were to disclose its hand day by day in regard to these things, it would have ruined the wheat market.

He does not mean the wheat market; he means the government. And surely it would ruin the government, because if they told the public that they were gambling in wheat, they know what the result would be. And what do we find on top of that? The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), discussing this question the other night, told us that in that year 1933 Mr. McFarland sold something like 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 bushels, and it was being sold then in the neighbourhood of 80 or 90 cents. Later on he bought back all the wheat he had sold—I wonder why. The Prime Minister said that the only reason Mr. McFarland bought it back was that prices had not been maintained. Let me quote from Hansard of March 13, 1934, page 1545, what the right hon. gentleman said:

> Prices have not been maintained at a fixed level but rather they were supported, particularly during the season of the year when farmers were, from necessity, forced sellers of their production in order to meet the demands and needs of their creditors.

This was in July, but no farmer was selling his wheat at that time to meet the demands of his creditors; it was not done for that purpose at all. During that year we sold 372,000,000 bushels—that is, in October for the crop year 1932-33—and the average price for the eleven months was 51⅞ cents. That was the average for the eleven months beginning the first of August, 1932, to the first of July, 1933. We had sold 359,000,000 bushels at an average price of 51⅞ cents, and then during the month of July the price went up and it averaged 83 cents a bushel. And that was the very time, when the price went up, that Mr. McFarland stepped in and sold. It went as high as 94 cents, and when he saw it coming down again he bought back the 20,000,000 bushels he had sold. Why? Was that gambling? Of course it was. He thought it would go up to $1; that was rumoured all over the country. He was buying, thinking he would get an extra price; but the 20,000,000 bushels he had sold he bought back. He bought back every bushel he sold, and all the wheat that came in from the country during that month of July was 13,000,000 bushels. Why was he doing that? He was doing it for no other purpose than to speculate; he was gambling in wheat. We are told that it was a matter of supporting the market. Well, when you buy anything you are supporting the market; anyone knows that who has anything to do with wheat. When you are buying you are speculating and you are supporting the market. But the Prime Minister knew that he was doing that; he knew that Mr. McFarland was gambling in wheat. He must have known it because before the banking and commerce committee Mr. McFarland was questioned and he said, as reported at page 236 of the evidence:

Mr. Bennett knew what was being done from time to time; he had the reports. The banks reported to him the position from time to time.

The Prime Minister knew that Mr. McFarland was gambling in wheat; there is no doubt about it. The next point I wish to refer to with regard to this gambling process is this, and it shows how many contradictions there are in the minds of members of the government. One of the things the Prime Minister said was that he would never set a price. I have sat in this house and listened to members opposite condemning the wheat pool just because, as they said, they had lost the market by setting the price higher than it should be. I have listened to member after member discussing the pool and pointing out how they had held the price up. Listen to what the former Minister of Trade and Commerce said, as reported at page 1742 of Hansard of May 14, 1931:

In the fall of 1929-30 a condition arose in Europe which was really an attitude of resentment rightly or wrongly, against the North American continent in regard to wheat. Rightly or wrongly they conceived the idea that to their detriment we were attempting unduly to advance the price of wheat. Hearing that rumour the European buyers turned their purchases in other directions. For instance, the Argentine got a very distinct advantage, and further we found that many of the flour mills in the consuming countries of Europe—Holland, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, and I think, France—had changed or readjusted their screens so as to mill the Argentine wheat instead of ours. Then this year we found that millers in those countries were very reluctant to change their screens back again.

And use the old screens so that they could use Canadian wheat. The hon. member said at the same time:

In the meantime recognizing that situation we have been doing our best to carry it and to disabuse the minds of the European people of the thought we had any intention of cornering the wheat market.

Referring to nobody but the western pools; that they were the ones that had lost our markets and that they had done wrong in trying to uphold the price. Then the Prime Minister himself, as reported on page 782 of Hansard of April 21, 1931, said this:

Practically one-half of that wheat was held by the pools of the country.

This government got behind those pools and said it would assist the orderly marketing of the wheat crop of western Canada. That assistance and support had, of course, the same effect upon non-pool wheat. That was what the government did. It did not peg the price; no government of which I am the head ever will.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. DONNELLY: Did hon. members hear that "hear, hear"? I wonder what Mr. McFarland has done if he has not pegged the price. The Prime Minister continued:

I have seen artificial prices placed upon commodities and whether that commodity be wheat or anything else, it matters not, I know the inevitable result. It cannot advantageously be done; it will not succeed. It may cause a temporary advantage but that disappears. Look at the situation in the United States to-day. Mr. Legge, with all his vast experience, with all the millions and hundreds of millions of dollars that he had behind him, declared that the principle of artificial price-fixing was unsound, and it has been abandoned. We did not adopt it, so we did have to abandon it.

Speak about contradictions! It has been just one contradiction after another. As regards everything they have attempted to put over, they have turned around, changed their minds and done something else. As the former Minister of Agriculture said, they have stepped into every hole from Vancouver to Halifax; there is no doubt about that. Now they are beginning to take great credit to themselves because they have set the price. The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) spoke of thirty cents a bushel as having been saved. Some of them say that $100,000,000 has been saved to western Canada and some of them have mentioned as high as $200,000,000. By the time of the election it will be up to $500,000,000; it is growing day by day and by leaps and bounds. I say: Go back to western Canada; stand up on the platforms there and ask the farmers to put their hands into their pockets and feel that thirty cents a bushel, that $100,000,000, that $200,000,000, you people have saved for them and you will be sure to get their votes; do not make any mistake about that! In my opinion, if hon. members opposite are depending upon that to get the votes of the western producers, they are depending upon a broken reed, a rotten stick.

Consider what this policy has done for the people of western Canada, especially those in the southern part where I come from. We have had no crop whatever for six years. The government say that they have kept the price up; some hon. members mentioned thirty cents a bushel, and the result has been that we have lost our markets; we are not selling our wheat. Every other country in the world has sold its wheat, but we are left holding the bag. The Argentine has got rid of all its wheat; Australia has got rid of all hers and so has the United States; we are the only country with any surplus of any account. We are holding the bag. Our people, thanks to Providence, expect to get a crop this year; weather conditions are good and they believe they will have a crop. The only thing this government has done for them in the past is to make them pay more for their seed, more for their flour, more for their feed, because if what my hon. friends opposite say is right—and I presume it is—they have kept the price up. Now our people have around their necks a millstone of 200,000,000 bushels of wheat preventing them from getting a price for their crop when they see one in sight this year. That is a great help to them. Let my hon. friends visit the southern part of Saskatchewan and tell the farmers there these stories as well as the others.

I say this: If you want to keep up the price and to bonus wheat, all well and good. You have bonused all kinds of industries in this country. We do not believe in bonuses; we do not think any industry or any article should be bonused; but if you are going to bonus all the industries, the farming industry should be bonused also. But I say. Sell the wheat; get rid of it; clear out our bins and let us get a world price. When this government goes out of power, as it will as soon as the election comes along, and we put proper policies into effect in this country, the farmers will be able to sell their wheat, but at the present time I believe a board is necessary. A board should have been appointed long ago, one that would tell us from day to day, from week to week or from month to month what is being done. We were not complaining when they were bonusing the farmers, when they were bonusing everything else; we were not condemning the wheat pools or anything else, but we were condemning the way in which the government was acting, this clandestine secret way of doing things, with no one knowing what was being done, and then the government expecting us to support it when no one knew what it was he was supporting. Is it any wonder we want to know now what the government activities are, how much it is out of pocket now, how much this policy is going to cost us? Now the government comes along and brings us this wheat board. What for? To bury the old corpse; that is all; to bury its mistakes in regard to its stabilized wheat policy. The government found itself with 220,000,000 bushels of wheat that will cost us we do not know how much and it wants to bury this in the new board. That is what the government expects to do, and that is why it is coming now in the dying days of the session with this kind of bill, this kind of proposition. It wants to appoint a board to bury this corpse, this doctor's mistake it has made.

So far as I am concerned I welcome this board if for no other reason than that it will bring about publicity. I do not think it will be necessary to have it for more than a year; I think it should be appointed only from year to year. We want to get away from it as soon as possible because it is only a false, a mistaken way of doing things. It may be necessary in order to clean up this mistake. What is the government going to do with this 220,000,000 bushels of wheat? How is it going to handle it, sell it, if not through a board? Of course the government has to have a board to sell that quantity of wheat. Why leave it to one man? Is it any wonder he is sick in bed to-day trying to carry a load of this kind, trying to market all this wheat, taking all the load upon himself, then trying to sell this wheat, make a profit and get away with it? We would never have heard a word about the matter if there had been a short crop this year. The government talks about excessive crops. Since the government came into power we have never had a crop that was more than an ordinarily fair crop; 1933 was the only year we had anything but half a crop in western Canada. This year we might likely have a crop of 600,000,000 bushels. What is the government going to do with it? When it sees this ahead of it and knows it is coming, it brings in this board and makes it carry the load.

I intend to support the principle of this bill; I support the principle of a board, a board to handle it instead of one man. Whether the bill when it comes from the committee is amended in such form that I can support it on third reading remains to be seen.

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): I listened with a great deal of interest to the speaker who has just taken his seat (Mr. Donnelly). He is a little bolder than hon. members who preceded him; he at least told us he is going to support the bill. As for the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) and the other wheat experts over there, like the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), we did not know when they sat down whether they were going to oppose or support it. It is very interesting to sit here and hear these experts discuss wheat. I am not a wheat expert, but I have lived in western Canada thirty-five years and have taken part in almost everything in the daily life out there, have rubbed shoulders with the farmers, and I think I know at least as much about wheat as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth or the hon. member for Quebec East. I wonder why the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not rise and discuss this bill. I understand he intends to oppose it along with the rest of his party. I think the only answer to that question is that he represents a western constituency and he does not dare to stand up and oppose it. If he does I know what is going to happen, and it is going to happen to every hon. member on the other side who has courage enough to oppose it. In one breath they tell us they are not in favour of it, and in the next that they are going to support it. It is hard to know where they are at. I hope that on the third reading a vote is called for; I want to see how many of those hon. members will stay in the house and cast their votes. I predict that most of them will run out.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): We don't do that on this side.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): They do, quite often. We heard the official mouthpiece of St. James street, Montreal, speaking for the people who are largely if not wholly responsible for many of the ills from which this country is suffering, discuss this wheat bill to-day. When he got through with his diatribe I did not know whether he was going to support or oppose it. However, I hazard the guess that he will not be in his seat when the vote is taken on third reading.

Mr. MALCOLM: Don't bet any money on it. He will be here.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): Well, he might if I bet too much money. Lawyers do not usually overlook money if they see a chance to get their hands on it. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth is living in Montreal; he has a large law practice there—I believe he is one of the most prominent corporation lawyers in Montreal. I have a great deal of respect for him; I like him, but the very atmosphere in which he lives would naturally cause him to take the attitude he does. He makes his money from the large financial interests in Montreal. He has opposed every reform bill that has been brought to the house. I congratulate the government upon bringing in this bill. I think the man who brought in this bill knows more about wheat marketing than any man in this house.

Mr. YOUNG: He ought to.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): It certainly is a revolutionary bill. I think it is pure socialism, if I understand socialism. It is one of the boldest strokes that has ever been seen in this temple of the people. The magnitude of this bill is such that it has got all hon. members on the other side in a dizzy spin. Why? Because they have been going from one end of Canada to the other telling people on the hustings that Right Hon. R. B. Bennett is a big interests man. But there is no other man in this dominion with the courage and capacity to bring in this bill. Certainly the right hon. leader of the opposition would not have the nerve to do it. He dare not do it because if he did he would not get the support he is getting now from certain interests.

Mr. YOUNG: He would never have got us into this fix.

Mr. STITT (Nelson): After hearing from the opposition a man does not need to speculate as to the source from which the Liberal party expect to receive their campaign funds. But the question which we as members of this house must consider when this bill comes up for third reading is, are we going to sacrifice seven hundred thousand farmers to greed and exploitation? That is what has been going on in this country the last fifty years. I hold that as representatives of the people we cannot sit by and let this thing go on any longer; if we do we fail in our duty to the people who sent us here. That is the way I feel at any rate, and I represent a very large farming constituency. As to the grain exchange in Winnipeg, it is just too bad we are going to sacrifice that. When I drive around Wellington Crescent and down by the river and see the great mansions there, all taken out of the sweat and blood of the farmer, as far as I am concerned I find very little difficulty in deciding on which side I am going to line up. I am going to support this bill with all that I have.

The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth said he did not think anyone in western Canada was in favour of this bill. I wonder if he heard the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) today, the president of the United Farmers of Alberta. I wonder if he read the remarks of the Premier of Alberta in yesterday's Journal. He quoted from that paper yesterday, but possibly he did not see that little statement by Mr. Reid in which he said the farmers would welcome the bill. He laid great stress on the fact that Argentina is selling more wheat than Canada, and also Australia. That statement was applauded by hon. members opposite; they seemed to be pleased to hear it. What are the facts in connection with Argentine wheat? It is produced at very low cost, it is soft wheat, very inferior to Canadian wheat, and they can afford to sell it at 20 to 25 cents a bushel less. It is not worth within 25 cents of what Canadian wheat is. The same thing is true of Australia, and in addition to that, Australia has inflated money; the pound in British money is worth a pound and a half in Australia. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) explained that to-night. Australia was able to inflate because they are not a debtor nation as we are. They owe money, but they owe it to their own people and so inflation does not cause them any trouble. If we did not have these enormous obligations to meet in New York and elsewhere abroad, we might be able to sell more wheat. We have got to meet our obligations in the terms of the agreement, in gold.

Then the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) said: Where is that great market in France that the Prime Minister referred to? Surely the hon. member if he reads must know that France has wheat to sell, that France exported wheat last year. More than that, they grew more wheat than Canada last year, so what is the use of asking where is that great market in France? Then he talked of gambling in wheat. Well, if I can interpret gambling—and I have done a little of it on the races once in a while—when I put some money say on a horse race, I expect to make a profit. I do not think it has ever been in the mind of the Prime Minister of this country or of Mr. McFarland to make a profit on that wheat. All this government did was to step in and strengthen the market in order to maintain prices. We have no desire to make a profit, to gamble; that was never the intention of the government. We would be happy indeed to get out on an even keel, but if we have to take a loss, we feel the sacrifice will be worth the cost. During the darkest days we have ever experienced, we have maintained one of the greatest industries in Canada. Western Canada would have been bankrupt to-day—heaven knows it is bad enough—had the government not taken action; the whole country would have been in the hands of receivers. There is no question about that; hon. gentlemen opposite know it, if they would just forget politics long enough to admit it.

The hon. member for Willow Bunch took some time in an effort to prove that from time to time the Prime Minister has contradicted himself. My only reply to that would be that when a man ceases to change his opinions and develop new and better tastes, the jungle forces of cynicism, doubt and reaction set in. There is no crime in a man's changing his opinion in a world changing so rapidly—no crime at all. If that is the best case hon. members opposite can make out against Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, the Conservative party has very little to worry about in the next election. If what hon. members opposite have been saying against this bill is the best case they can make out, then I pity them when they go to their people.

It is true that I have received telegrams from western Canada opposing the bill. I do not know whom they were from; I would not know the senders from a load of hay, nor do I want to know them. I have received no telegrams from my own constituents, and those are the only people to whom I will pay attention. They appear to be satisfied. My constituency was one of the few in Manitoba to support the egg and poultry pool. They had intelligence enough to do that, and they will have intelligence enough to recognize the merit in this measure. So far as I am concerned they may continue to wire me all they like. My belief is that those telegrams were inspired by people opposed to the bill and who would like to continue to fleece the farmer as they have been doing for the last fifty years without any regard to his position.

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to continue the debate at this late hour of the evening, but there are a few observations I should like to make before the bill is given second reading. I do not believe it is necessary to cover the early history of the efforts of western farmers to improve their marketing methods. That was ably done by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) this afternoon. The early efforts towards the organization of farmer's movements in western Canada culminated in the years 1923 and 1924 in the establishment of the three wheat pools. So far as their marketing operations were concerned those organizations were successful to the point of controlling roughly fifty per cent of the grain produced by the three western provinces.

In that connection may I digress for a moment. The three pool organizations, namely Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, were separate units so far as the gathering of grain was concerned. They were collective units, however, with respect to the sale of grain in that they joined together in what is known as the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. They were also united, as I recall it, in their financial arrangements. That is to say, the financial arrangement made with the banks was made with the central selling agency, which body, in turn, loaned the money to the provincial pools. In establishing themselves the pools made arrangements whereby voluntary contracts were signed by the growers in which the agreement was made to deliver all the wheat grown or acquired by each grower, except such quantities as might be used for seed and feed, to the provincial pool organization for a period of five years. It was on the strength of those contracts that the pool organizations were able to finance. The banks loaned money on the strength of the contract and the whole organization was established on that basis. However when it came to the actual purchasing of the grain, because they did not have share capital as ordinary companies have, the pools were obliged to adopt the policy of paying initial payments to the growers and then, as the grain was sold, to advance the full amounts of money. As I recall it, the arrangements made with the banks with respect to the financing of pool operations were that the pool was required to maintain with the banks a margin of reserve of fifteen per cent.

At that time it was considered that the financial arrangement by that procedure was quite safe and sound. In making financial arrangements with the banks at the beginning of each year, of necessity the pools had to consult with the banks as to what the initial payments should be. We come to the 1928-29 crop year and the 1929-30 crop year. The financial arrangements for those crops were made by the central selling agency, and an initial payment of $1 per bushel, at Fort William, was agreed upon by the banks. Unfortunately in the fall of 1929 the market broke sharply, and the pool found difficulty in maintaining its margin. Early in the spring of 1930, shortly after the new year in fact, the margin of security which the pools had with the banks in the form of grain and collateral became jeopardized to the extent that the banks were alarmed. It was then that the pools went to their respective provincial governments, as separate units, and asked for assistance. That assistance was granted, and what took place from then on has been told on different occasions. The banks were given a guarantee to provide for the respective shares of the different provincial organizations. In the fall of 1930 the Prime Minister went to the old country to attend an imperial conference, and he took with him the late A. J. McPhail who was then the president of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. The pool's financial difficulties were still of some considerable proportion. Upon Mr. McPhail's return to this country, however, Mr. McFarland was appointed general manager of the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited. The point I make is this, that from the appointment of Mr. McFarland until yesterday no statement has been made with respect to the pool's operations under his control, and at the same time there has been all kinds of confusion as to what the position actually was, for whom he was working and from whom he was taking his orders. It was generally understood that the government was guaranteeing his operations and endorsing what he was doing. However, as I have stated, until yesterday no definite statement was made.

So far as I am concerned, and I think so far as the general public is concerned, I believe no serious exception has been taken to the government coming to the assistance of the pool, and little criticism has been offered. I would be one of the last to offer any criticism for the government's coming to the assistance of the pools, because by so doing not only did it help the pools out of a difficult situation, but it helped the market for the non-pool farmers as well. I would state, further, that no government at that time could have afforded to act otherwise. Since the bill has been introduced considerable discussion has hinged around the 1929 carryover and the situation which has existed since that time. The Prime Minister even went so far as to twit the Liberal Minister of Trade and Commerce, (Mr. Malcolm), with respect to the statement he made in 1929, in regard to wheat when he said that the dominion government was not exercised over the sale of such commodities as wheat because such commodities found their own market. I do not know why the Prime Minister and others bring that up; I do not understand what they mean by so doing. It may be a nice political catch phrase, but I submit that the facts were that you had the pools controlling roughly fifty per cent of the grain crop of western Canada and you had the trade with practically an equal amount, each no doubt vying with the other in respect to price to a certain extent. The banks had already endorsed the pool's initial payment and were acquainted with their activities and with the activities that the trade was carrying on. Everybody was bullish at that time, and the question that always comes to my mind when that statement is repeated is, what would the Prime Minister have done under those circumstances? Would he have gone to the pool or to the grain trade or to the banks or to others interested in the grain market and said: Boys, you will have to reduce your price, change your policy and sell your wheat? Even had he done so, these were private companies operating on their own, and I doubt if they would have graciously accepted any advice from an outsider. I doubt if the suggestion would have been obeyed in any respect even if it had been given.

I hesitate to refer to the statements that have been made so often by other speakers with respect to what the Prime Minister has said on previous occasions about the wheat market. I shall not do so to-night, but I should like to give one extract from an old country newspaper with respect to the preference on Canadian wheat of six cents a bushel contained in the Ottawa agreement. I quote from the Daily Herald:

> The suggestion that the Ottawa tariff preference of 2s. per quarter accorded by Britain to Canadian wheat should be forfeited, on the grounds that Canada has not complied with Article 4 of the agreement, was made yesterday in the annual report of the Liverpool Corn Trade Association.
> The agreement provided that the preference "may be removed if at any time empire producers ... are unable or unwilling to offer ... at prices not exceeding the world prices."
>
> The report mentions that a deputation of British millers recently waited on the Dominion Secretary and represented that the high price asked for Canadian wheat as compared with Argentine, as a result of the Canadian government's holding policy, was in breach of this stipulation.
> The report states that while the article was not—perhaps intentionally— drafted with too much precision, yet taken from one angle Canada should have forfeited her preference long before now.

I think it is important to keep that in mind in view of the statement which has been made with respect to the marketing of wheat from this country.

Let me proceed a little further. I shall not refer to the other statements that I had in mind. Yesterday when the Prime Minister spoke he put about five acres of figures on Hansard, which to my mind confused the issue extremely. The figures went back over such a long period of time that I am afraid even my right hon. friend's friends will have difficulty in digesting them when the occasion arises. I have some figures which I have been successful in securing, not of 1921 but as of May 17, 1935, and I should like to quote them, keeping in mind the general sales policy with respect to wheat. They are taken from the Monthly Review of the Wheat Situation dated May 17, 1935, and supplied by the Department of Trade and Commerce:

> Since the commencement of the present cereal year the Argentine has shipped 149 million bushels as compared with 101 million bushels during the corresponding period of 1933-34. Since August 1, 1934, Australian shipments have amounted to 91 million bushels as compared with 70 million bushels cleared during the same period in the previous crop year. Shipments from North America are sharply lower during the present crop year as compared with a year ago. From August 1, 1934, to May 13, 1935, North American shipments amounted to 127 million bushels as compared with 178 million bushels during the corresponding period of the previous crop year.

Right under that I read this:

> In Liverpool, C.I.F. quotations for all classes of wheat are on about the same level as a month ago with Canadian No. 2 Northern (Atlantic shipment) now being quoted at approximately 96 cents a bushel, Argentine Rosafe at 74 cents a bushel and Australian wheat at 82 cents a bushel.

In other words, there was a spread between the Argentine and the Canadian price of 22 cents a bushel. I find an equally interesting statement on the next page:

> During the present crop year the Argentine has shipped 149 million bushels of wheat as compared with 99 million bushels during the corresponding period of 1933-34. On May 12, 1935, the Argentine had 114 million bushels of wheat available for export and carry-over as compared with 167 million bushels a year ago, a reduction of 53 million bushels. If an allowance for a normal carry-over of 80 million bushels is made, the Argentine has 34 million bushels still available for export during the balance of the crop year.

Then with respect to Australia:

> From August 1, 1934, to May 12, 1935, Australian shipments amounted to 91 million bushels compared with 69 million bushels during the same period of 1933-34. On May 12, 1935, Australia had a balance of 64 million bushels available for export and carry-over as compared with 111 million bushels on the same date a year ago. If the Australian carry-over on July 31, 1935, is placed at 50 million bushels, a balance of 14 million bushels remains for export during the remaining months of the present crop year.

Then turning to the last page I find figures which are very largely the same as those quoted by the Prime Minister last night. The balance of Canadian wheat for export and carryover in 1934 is estimated at 253,960,000, and for 1934-35, 230,499,000. But then this significant statement is made:

> April exports of wheat and wheat flour were slightly larger than those of the same month in 1934. In the nine months, August-April, however, the export movement has been 5·7 million bushels lower than that of the same months of 1933-34.

At May 1, 1935, supplies for export or carry-over were 230·5 million bushels.

That is very close to the figure which the Prime Minister gave. At the rate our present shipments are moving that would indicate that our carryover is going to be in the neighbourhood of 170,000,000 to 185,000,000 bushels. I just happened to notice last night that for the week ended June 7, 1935, there left Canada 1,315,000 bushels of wheat; in June, 1934, 18,000,000 bushels went out; June, 1933, 16,000,000; June, 1932, 15,000,000; June, 1931, 20,000,000; June, 1930, 18,000,000. That compares with 1,315,000 for the week ending June 7, 1935. Multiply that by four and you have a little over five million bushels going out during the month of June, 1935. You would have to multiply your shipments per week by ten in order to compare with previous year's shipments for the month of June.

The Prime Minister went to considerable trouble to place on record different figures. I think he would have been fairer if he had given the position with respect to Australia and the Argentine. He put on record that Russia's production had reached over one billion bushels in one year and that the United States average yearly production exceeded 800 million bushels. In checking over the figures it will be noticeable that in one year only Russia exceeded a billion bushels. In the case of the United States while it is true that the average over a long period of years has been more than 800 million bushels, for 1933 their crop was 528 million bushels and for 1934, only 496 million bushels. For these last two years they have had practically only half a crop and Canada has been in much the same position. Our position in the world with respect to grain movements should be better than it is.

Australia and the Argentine have adopted an aggressive selling policy with the result that their bins are empty, whereas considerable wheat has been left on the north American continent. Both the United States and Canada have had two short crops but we are holding the bag as far as the carryover is concerned. We regret to think of other countries having severe drought conditions but the fact remains that it has been a blessing to us that the United States had the misfortune of losing most of her crop last year and the year before. The net result is that most of the wheat carryover is in Canada.

One might ask the reason for this discrepancy in the sales of Canadian and Australian wheat. There is no doubt that our price relationship has been out of line. This afternoon the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth put on record certain figures with regard to the price discrepancies between Argentine, Australian and Canadian wheat. I shall not repeat these figures in full but I should like to give them with respect to the fall months during which we do our heaviest shipping. The average premium of Canadian No. 2 northern ex Atlantic c.i.f. Liverpool, for the four months September 1 to December 31, over Argentine and Australian wheat was as follows:

	Australian	Argentine
1931..	——	8¾ cents over
1932..	1 cent under	1⅞ cents over
1933..	3 cents over	12⅜ cents over
1934..	14⅜ cents over	22¾ cents over

To me these figures are significant, particularly when one considers that the logical time for wheat to move into export position in large quantities is in the fall months. Some observations have been made with respect to the selling policy for this country, and I would direct attention to the statement made recently by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). That statement was put on record this afternoon and I shall not repeat it in full. This is one matter which should be looked into very carefully, the rumour that a prejudice is growing up against Canadian wheat in the importing countries, particularly Great Britain. I do not know whether these rumours are correct but I think they should be investigated. Another reason for the advantage of the Argentine in the selling of wheat is the condition to which the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) referred this afternoon, the difference in exchange. The policy in the Argentine with respect to wheat has been such that they have been able consistently to sell their wheat in the world market and at the same time give a price to their farmers which has allowed them a greater purchasing power in their own country than is given to the farmers in this country. There is another matter to be considered, one to which the Prime Minister alluded the other evening. There is a growing disposition among countries to want to trade goods for goods. The sooner this method of trading is appreciated by this and other countries of the world, the sooner we will arrive at a reasonable basis of doing business.

I should like to deal now with the bill itself. If this bill is to be put into effect

I suggest to the Prime Minister that he include a provision whereby the board will be required to make a report to some responsible body. As I see it, there is nothing in this bill to require this board to report to anyone. In this connection I should like to refer to the grain control board of the Argentine and quote from a publication of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, as follows:

> Just as the month of November closed, the ministry of agriculture gave publicity to the long expected statement as to the operations of the grain control board in respect of wheat.

I notice that this board has made a very detailed report with respect to its operations. For instance, it gives the monthly purchases, sales and cancellations and shows the stocks on hand at the end of each month. It then lists the expenses of the board, which are more than covered by the profits. It was originally estimated that there would be a loss of 50 million pesos on the operations of the board, but this did not occur. There is a final announcement by the Minister of Agriculture that the board will be in operation for another year. If the country is going to foot the bills for this board it has a right to expect some kind of report. I would also direct the attention of the Prime Minister to section 7 of the bill, which reads:

> (b) to buy and sell wheat and, without restricting the generality of such powers, to acquire from the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited upon terms to be approved by the governor in council, all wheat or contracts to purchase or take delivery of wheat—

I submit that we have a right to know what obligations are to be taken over by this organization. I believe hon. members will remember the representations which I made with respect to certain operations in wheat in Manitoba. Personally I feel that this section cannot be allowed to pass without our receiving detailed information. I am not going to burden the house with full details, but I believe the Prime Minister will recall that representations were made with respect to the durum wheat handled by the Manitoba pool and then taken over by the central selling agency. In 1930-31 the pool accepted durum and common wheat from the growers at different prices. An initial payment was made of 70 cents per bushel for No. 1 northern and 64 cents per bushel for No. 1 durum. These prices were later reduced to 50 cents for No. 1 northern and 49 cents for No. 1 durum, but most of the wheat was accepted at 54 cents a bushel. The point in connection with it is this, that the durum wheat of that crop year was practically all sold at a substantial profit. It was estimated that it brought in the neighbourhood of 67 cents a bushel, so that these people feel that they have a just claim against someone, and it is in this arrangement now that Mr. McFarland has been directing.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman should be corrected at once. It is a matter between the organization of 1930-31 pool and the sellers; the government has nothing to do with it, directly or indirectly, remotely or near.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): That may be.

Mr. BENNETT: Not may be; it is so.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The situation at any rate is one which has not been cleaned up, and unless the pool organization or someone is going to make a statement which will satisfy these people, I hope the Prime Minister will not be averse to having representations made with respect to it.

Mr. BENNETT: They were made last year and are on the record, in the journals of the house.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I do not wish to delay the house, but I will say this. If I were criticizing the government at this time with respect to this legislation my severest criticism would be for bringing it in so late in the session. The farmers have already sown their crop. They sowed their crop feeling that the government was going to continue to peg the price. There is nothing in the bill to indicate that the government is going to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: The government did not peg the price.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The Prime Minister may make the distinction, but I can hardly do so.

Mr. BENNETT: It was made in the committee last year, clearly.

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): I do submit, however, that the bill should have been introduced earlier in the session. The situation to-day is this. The farmers thought they had sold their last year's crop, and though it is true that they disposed of it, they now find that there is about 200,000,000 bushels of it still in this country in competition with the crop they have just sown. There is prospect of a crop of 400,000,000 bushels this year, and we are glad that conditions have changed somewhat to make that possible. Under existing circumstances, and in view of the fact that the government is interested in the wheat already on hand and that that wheat is going to be a factor in the marketing of next year's crop, I frankly do not see how any government could get away from establishing some organization in the form of a board or whatever you may call it to meet the present emergency. At the same time I would hesitate very much to endorse a proposition whereby, at this stage of the game, a permanent compulsory pool organization or board should be established and set in motion to conduct the wheat marketing affairs of the country for years to come. I dislike to see the government go into the grain marketing business. I doubt if it is sound in principle and I hate to see it established. We had an effort on the part of the pool organizations in the west, to which I referred earlier, to establish a one hundred per cent pool which would have been a compulsory organization. The effort failed. We had also an attempt to establish voluntarily a coarse grain pool, but that was not successful. And recently we had a vote taken in connection with the poultry plebiscite, which certainly was not a very satisfactory vote, so far as compulsory pooling in Manitoba at any rate was concerned.

The whole situation is involved to such an extent that I doubt very much whether you will find the rank and file of the farmers very enthusiastic about being committed to a compulsory grain marketing organization. That I judge to be true of Manitoba at least. There is one other feature which perhaps should not be mentioned, but it is a fact nevertheless. A good many farmers in Manitoba consider that they have an advantage in marketing grain in that their harvesting period is usually earlier, thus allowing them to sell on an earlier, which is often a stronger, market. That may be selfishness, but it is nevertheless a fact to be taken into consideration when judging human nature. With respect to coarse grains, that would affect mostly Manitoba. Over half the barley is normally produced in Manitoba, so that a coarse grain pool would be of considerable interest there. Again I say that past experience has shown that the initial payments on these grains are so small as to make it impossible under existing conditions for people to carry on, and I am afraid there will not be much enthusiasm for a coarse grain pool. It did not work when tried before. My feeling at the moment is that if we could establish a grain board which would be in a position to take offers when the market fell below a certain point, and when the market was above that figure for everyone interested in the handling of grain to be free to market in whatever way they saw fit, we would have the most satisfactory arrangement.

I confess that I cannot see that this organization as proposed at the present time will meet with very general favour in Manitoba. From the reports I have been receiving I am inclined to think there is a good deal of opposition to it. At the same time everyone knows that the situation at present cannot continue with any degree of satisfaction or certainly without some governmental assistance. And so I would vote for the second reading of the bill on the ground that the Prime Minister has indicated that it will go to a special committee where we can look into all the questions affecting the marketing of grain, and probably from that committee there would emerge a measure that would be satisfactory to all concerned. It is too important to become a mere political issue.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Before the Prime Minister concludes the debate, I wish to make perfectly sure that we have a correct understanding of the situation. I believe it is understood that the bill will, after second reading, go to a committee and that the Prime Minister when he speaks will indicate whether it will be a special committee or one of the select standing committees of the house. In supporting the second reading to this end, it is understood that the opposition is not thereby committed to any of the provisions of the bill, beyond the establishment of a grain board, with such powers as may be agreed upon. In other words, we support the second reading on the understanding that we reserve our right to propose without prejudice any amendment in committee. Especially do we reserve our right to regard this measure as one to deal with a present situation, an emergency situation, and not as necessarily establishing a permanent policy. Further, we reserve our right with respect to any compulsory features of the measure, our final approval with respect thereto to be indicated only after the bill comes back from the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: It is just possible there may be some other members who wish to speak. If I speak now I close the debate.

The Acting SPEAKER (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I would direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that if the Prime Minister speaks now he closes the debate.

Mr. BENNETT: It is eleven o'clock.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 14, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

First report of the joint standing committee of both houses on the printing of parliament.—Mr. McLure.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce a bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1934.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Speaker, this bill proposes to make four amendments to the Dominion Elections Act. The first and the most important is to introduce by way of experiment the system of the alternative vote in the province of Saskatchewan, a system which has been commended in many quarters of this house on former occasions, as I shall be able to demonstrate I hope at a later stage of the discussion.

The second amendment is to keep the advance polls open on the Thursday and Friday preceding the election from seven in the evening until ten o'clock in the evening, and on Saturdays from two in the afternoon until ten o'clock in the evening. This amendment is made at the suggestion of the Trades and Labour Congress.

The next amendment is to waive the necessity of printing lists under the present Dominion Elections Act which is cast upon the chief electoral officer in respect of by-elections which are not to be held until the nineteenth of August. That is a matter of saving expense.

Then there are some provisions for some changes in the forms.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a painful death.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to protest at once against any proposal to introduce amendments to the elections act, to introduce what is practically a sectional election act at this time more than five years after the dissolution of the last parliament and immediately before a general election takes place. I do not think the minister should be permitted to introduce such a bill at this time.

The house divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

MONTREAL HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): May I ask the Minister of Marine whether he has received representations from public bodies in Montreal concerning the low depth of water in the harbour of Montreal and, if so, what action his department contemplates.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): This morning I had a telephone call from Montreal—I think it was from the chamber of commerce—asking whether a delegation would be received some day next week by the Minister of Marine with respect to this very question, and I answered that I should be pleased to receive them at any time.

THE BORSTAL SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Prior to the five week adjournment of this house, the Minister of Justice announced that the superintendent of penitentiaries would proceed to Great Britain in order to secure information regarding the working of the Borstal system, with the idea of establishing it in this country. As this was part of the famous social reform program, the house would be interested to know before prorogation what has been done in this matter.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I hope to have the report of the superintendent some day next week. It will not be necessary for the house to take action in the matter if it is decided to instal the system, but I hope to be in a position some day next week to make an announcement in regard to the matter.

B.C. RELIEF CAMP STRIKERS

MOVEMENT OF SOLDIERS INTO CALGARY TO PROTECT GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Yesterday I asked a question of the government regarding the movement of soldiers from the Sarcee camp into Calgary. I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence has a reply to that now?

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): My attention was drawn to the question the hon. member had asked in my absence, and I find that because of information from the government of Alberta, one-half of the squadron of Lord Strathcona's Horse which had been at Sarcee camp carrying out a musketry course, was by order of the district officer commanding, brought back to its quarters in Calgary and held in readiness with the rest of the squadron to protect government property should that be required; otherwise, the only movements of militia which have taken place and are in process are those to and from central camps for training purposes. Those are proceeding strictly in accordance with schedules arranged some time ago.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Was this movement of troops for the protection of property requested by the provincial government of Alberta?

Mr. STIRLING: I take it that it was based upon information which had been given by the provincial government to the district officer commanding.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I understand that information was given to the district officer commanding, but was the request for the movement of the troops made by the provincial government?

Mr. STIRLING: That I am not able to answer.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I have an answer to-morrow?

Mr. STIRLING: Not to-morrow.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Monday.

CANADIAN GRAIN BOARD

PURCHASE, STORAGE AND MARKETING OF WHEAT AND OTHER GRAINS

The house resumed from Thursday, June 13, consideration of the motion of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Prime Minister) for the second reading of Bill No. 98, to provide for the constitution and powers of the Canadian grain board.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the right hon. gentleman opposite upon the discipline of his troops, and I think perhaps this is one of the few occasions which I can recall that a speech has changed the policy of the opposition. If I adopt the policy of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), and add sufficient "ifs", I will say: If I am properly informed, the party opposite concluded to fight this legislation, to oppose it, but after they became aware of the circumstances as disclosed by the observations that were made, they hastily convened another caucus, and those who are familiar with Mr. Facing-both-ways in the Pilgrim's Progress will have no difficulty in understanding the result.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that he is entirely wrong; he is making statements which are wholly unfounded.

Mr. BENNETT: I am doing exactly what was done by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth in saying "if I am correctly informed."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is not.

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad to know in this instance I am not. The speeches that proceeded upon this measure were based upon a clear statement of an intention to support the legislation: "I will vote for this legislation"; "I am opposed to this legislation, but I think there are more votes in it for me if I vote for it than if I vote against it, so I will hearken to the views of my constituents and say that I am in support of it." That is the position that has been taken in this house. Again, it is very interesting to observe the discipline with which hon. gentlemen who are not well informed accept the brief that is tendered to them and then make a speech in the House of Commons. The leading member who spoke for the opposition is a distinguished lawyer; he did not desire to make that speech; he has made his statements and they are well known, but he was told to speak, so he took the brief and made the statement. From whom did he get his facts that he referred to with their "ifs"? Who supplied them to him? Who gave him his brief and what does it represent on the back of it? That is the question.

Mr. YOUNG: Why does the right hon. gentleman not give us the facts?

Mr. BENNETT: I have already done so. That is the question to ask—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I must say that the right hon. gentleman is saying either too much or too little. He has reflected upon an hon. member in his absence.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no right to be interrupted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will not sit here and see a colleague misrepresented by anybody and especially by the Prime Minister. I wish to say that the hon. member of whom he has spoken is an honourable member and not open to the kind of reflections that have been made.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no right to be interrupted by the anger of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no anger, but the right hon. gentleman talked about treating this matter in a non-partisan way.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I have the floor. I was observing that the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was very careful in the statements he made to say: "If they are correct;" "If I am correctly informed." I say that no solicitor in a police court would make a statement like that to a justice; no counsel with his brief would make a statement of that kind, because he either knows or he does not know, and what right has he to cast reflections upon honourable citizens of this country and wreck their reputations so far as he can by innuendos based upon "if I am correctly informed;" "if the facts are as I am told"? He dare not place his name and reputation behind them, but he hedged with the qualifications "if," "if," "if," and that is the basis upon which this bill has been met. Read Hansard; read the statements that were made as to the operations of Mr. McFarland, and in every case the hon. member indicated that he had with respect to those operations a knowledge which came to him from some source, and which certainly I do not possess. Then in order to save himself with his brief, he says: "If I am correctly informed." Is that parliamentary discussion? Is that the amenities of debate, when you attack and then say "if I am," more especially when the circumstances in this case are that the man against whom the statements have been made is lying on his back and cannot leave his bed?

Mr. VALLANCE: Poppycock!

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman knows those are the facts. Let us go a step further in respect to this.

Mr. VALLANCE: The right hon. gentleman has gone far enough.

Mr. BENNETT: Let us go a step further in reply to the observations that were made. It was said that there was no record of what had transpired during the years from 1930 to 1935. I hold in my hand the Journals of the House of Commons, No. 72, of 1934 and I commence with the select standing committee on banking and commerce. Turning first to the index, I find all the orders in council affecting the operations of this selling agency are printed in full and were before the banking and commerce committee and brought out in testimony. Second, as I shall presently indicate, Mr. McFarland was before that committee, and what is more, before he commenced his statement at all, a motion was presented at the opening of that committee's meetings by Mr. Power, seconded by Mr. Vallance, that certain information should be made available to the committee, the house and the country. Among these matters hon. gentlemen will find this resolution: At Page 17 Mr. Power, seconded by Mr. Vallance, moved the following—I leave out the others, take this one, No. 4:

> Relations of the chartered banks to the wheat pools, and the extent to which the guarantees by the dominion government to the banks, of the said pools' grain market account was utilized for the purpose of speculating in wheat on the Winnipeg or Chicago grain pits.

That was the language with which the resolution was clothed. Winnipeg or Chicago grain pits, and speculation.

When the committee met, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes), speaking for the government on the 13th of March, stated to the committee that so far as the government were concerned they had no objection to the motion passing. The motion in fact did pass, and what is more the order of conduct of that committee was arranged and settled by the committee itself, and Mr. McFarland was called as a witness for the purpose of giving the evidence required. In addition to that Mr. Roberts was called and produced the orders in council which as a matter of fact had been available long before that. So that upon the records there is at the moment a complete statement of the investigation carried on by a committee of the House of Commons last year in which questions were asked by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) who examined the witness, by the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) who spoke last evening, by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) who spoke the other day—not in respect to this matter—a long tedious examination going into all the details of these transactions. And when the question came up as to the number of bushels of grain that were then being carried a number of members raised the question, and the Minister of Finance said he had no objection so far as the government was concerned to this information being given if it was considered to be in the public interest, and the committee by a vote of thirty-three to nine concluded that it was not desirable that the evidence should be given. The committee voted, with eastern Canada Liberals forming the minority, not to have Mr. McFarland give that information. This is from the morning Citizen of March 23, 1934. The following Liberals voted to disclose the figures:

> Hurtubise, Nipissing; Raymond, Beauharnois; Lapointe, Quebec East; Power, Quebec South; Mackenzie, Vancouver Centre; Ralston, Shelburne-Yarmouth; Howard, Sherbrooke; Donnelly, Willow Bunch; Duff, Antigonish-Guysborough. Conservatives, Progressives and the remaining Liberals on the committee opposed the publication.

The committee was composed of fifty members, nineteen of whom were Liberals, Messrs. Bothwell, Casgrain, Donnelly, Duff, Euler, Fraser, Howard, Hurtubise, Jacobs, Lapointe, Mackenzie, McPhee, Mercier, Michaud, Power, Ralston, Raymond, Sanderson, Vallance.

So that so far as this government is concerned it did not in any sense interpose to prevent the fullest information being given. What is more, Mr. Rhodes, the Minister of Finance on the opening of the committee's session of March 22 said this:

> Mr. Chairman, apropos of the discussion this morning as to the method of our procedure, it will be recalled, in connection with the motion of Mr. Power, that, on the 13th of March, I made a statement to the committee on behalf of the government, which reads as follows:—
> Speaking for the government I wish to say that it is our desire that there should be no suggestion of narrowing the inquiry. With respect to those topics which are within the purview of governmental activity, the government especially welcomes the most thorough investigation.

That was a restatement of the circumstances under which Mr. McFarland assumed the obligations and responsibilities he did, and the manner in which he discharged them. It has been suggested in this house that instead of endeavouring to deal with the matter as he should he was speculating.

There is his answer, and I am bound to say that among those who know him Mr. John McFarland's reputation stands as high as that of any hon. member of this house. That is that.

Now let us proceed to the next point, which I regard as being of some importance; that is the meaning that has been attached to the words "option" and "futures." Mr. McFarland, realizing how great was the lack of appreciation of the technical use of those words, at page 212 said:

> The use of the word "options" has caused much misunderstanding. Cash wheat purchased by elevator companies is, of necessity, sold for future delivery because it cannot be delivered until it has been transferred to the place where delivery of it can be made to the purchaser. The result is that forward sales, which are called "options" or "futures" are constantly made. Every bushel of wheat that has been purchased by the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited can be taken delivery of at the dates fixed for delivery, upon payment of the purchase price.

That was a restatement of what had been said by the Minister of Finance on March 13. So that so far as this house is concerned, through its appropriate committee in the year 1934 there was a full investigation of these matters as I shall presently indicate, the questions asked and the answers given, and when hon. members stand up in this house and talk about secrecy and lack of information and failure of the government to provide them with facilities for securing that information, I say that Mr. Rhodes, the Minister of Finance, speaking to that committee fully indicated the policy and purpose of the government that there should be no limitation placed upon any information that might be sought except so far as the committee itself might determine the advisability or otherwise of it being given

That is the position up to that point. Mr. McFarland was called as a witness. He gave evidence commencing at page 211 of that report. After reviewing the circumstances under which he came into office he proceeded in this manner:

> I will now read you my reply to the notice of the proceedings of this committee:
> "I notice that the proceedings of this committee, before which I have been asked to appear, refer to speculation in Winnipeg and Chicago wheat. I wish to state most emphatically that we have not speculated in a single bushel of wheat in the operations which I have directed for the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited since November, 1930. Moreover, we have neither bought nor sold a single bushel of wheat or any other grain in Chicago. All our dealings have been in Winnipeg only. 'Speculation' as I understand it, means buying and selling stocks or goods in the hope of profiting by changes in the market value. Our operations were governed by no such considerations. Our only object since undertaking the operations which I have directed has been to assist the farmer in marketing his wheat, that is, transferring it from his farm to the ultimate consumer. Under normal economic conditions, when there was a fair equilibrium between supply and demand, the operations of the market so adjusted themselves that there had never been any difficulty in maintaining a reasonable price to the farmer in the transfer of his product to the consumer. Conditions in the past few years in the Canadian market have been such that the normal play of forces has disappeared, and some machinery had to be provided to take their place unless the wheat was to remain on the farms of the country. A wheat board was the usual suggested alternative. The method that has been pursued since November, 1930, has been an application of the principle of a wheat board although Canada has not been directly interested in the transactions which have been made through the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited, of which I was appointed by the directors, the manager, and which position I still retain. By the adoption of the method which we have followed, it was hoped to prevent the dislocation of the machinery of distribution built up over the last forty years."

That was the statement made at that moment, and which on cross examination by eminent counsel and by laymen as well was not challenged. Therefore when it is said that no opportunity has been afforded to enable this house to have a clear appreciation of the magnitude of the problems with which we have to deal I at once turn to what took place before that committee and ask this house whether in the light of those statements it can be said that opportunity has been denied. There are the facts. The committee went through the problems in connection with wheat from one end to the other. They dealt with the question whether or not he bought wheat that had been sold, the price at which it had been sold, the effort to operate on the market to prevent it falling below fifty cents, then falling to thirty-eight and a half, a statement of the world carryover, a statement of the world production, all those statements were made and the fullest possible information given to the committee. Can it be said therefore that it was fair, that it was right, or even decent for hon. members to stand in their places and say, "If I am informed correctly" so and so is the case? Can a man base an argument upon such a contingency? Would he be listened to in any court of justice if he did? Would any court or parliament that had regard to the rules permit any member to make allegations such as were made the other day with respect to the operation of this pool, and then qualify and surround them with such expressions as "If I am correctly informed," "If my knowledge is correct"? Never willing to assume responsibility for a definite statement, but always willing to predicate it on "if," and "if," and "if." That, sir, is my position.

I rely upon the statements contained in this journal of the house, to which the people of this country have had access through newspaper reports of what took place, in order to realize and ascertain just what is behind the attack that is being made here against Mr. McFarland, and just what it means. I ask this house to remember that they were not denied information, that they were not denied access to the orders in council, all of which are printed here right down to the end of the year 1933, and covering the operations of 1934, all the details of which were called for. It is true that with respect to the number of bushels the information was not furnished, but the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) said it was well known that there were 200,000,000 bushels, that it was common property, as has been said in this house by other hon. members. The hon. member himself stated it in the committee last year, yet they have the hardihood to stand up and say—

Mr. VALLANCE: I know the Prime Minister wants to be fair. Would he give the remainder of the statement I made at that time? That is only half of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I will finish it. The hon. gentleman desired that the witness should give a statement on it, and what happened was that by a vote, which I have just mentioned, that statement was not given though Mr. McFarland said he was ready to give it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Would the Prime Minister permit me to state what I really did say?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I have the record here and if necessary I will read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What page?

Mr. BENNETT: I will come to that presently, as I go along. That is the position. Yesterday the hon. gentleman had the fullest opportunity to make a statement, and I am going to show how inaccurate were the statements he made at that time, whether or not intentionally I cannot say, because in the one instance it is quite clear that he knew what he was talking about, and in the next instance he left out the information that would indicate that he did know. Now let us proceed further with respect to what was said by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth in dealing with this problem. I am not going to deal with the remarks of the hon. member at any great length, but for the moment I would like to deal with one problem which was dealt with by the hon. gentleman. At page 3595, column 2, he said:

Let me give the house the Canadian exports for the first ten months of this crop year as they appear in the Montreal Star of last night. For the ten months, ending I presume with April, 1935—

That would be only nine months.

—the exports from Canada were 113,802,184 bushels. For the corresponding ten months of 1934 they were 140,709,966, or a decrease this year of some 27,000,000 bushels.

The hon. member complained that I did not give those figures, which made it necessary for him to give them. As a matter of fact I gave the correct figures, which will be found in Hansard at page 3564, in the second column, showing that at the end of May the exports were 146,387,083 bushels. The amount exported for the corresponding period a year ago was 159,553,797 bushels, an excess over this year of only slightly more than 13,000,000 bushels. Again at page 3594 of Thursday's Hansard the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth referred to the carryover to-day as between 220,000,000 and 225,000,000 bushels. There can be no such use of the word carryover until the end of the crop year. There is no carryover until then, and I was at great pains the other day to explain the factors that make up a carryover, because I realized that many members were not familiar with them. Apparently, however, the brief was silent in that particular; the friends of the grain exchange had not given adequate explanation as to what constitutes the carryover. So instead of it being a carryover, properly used, the word should have been our surplus. The surplus of wheat, that is the quantity on hand at the present moment, is nearly 225,000,000 bushels. I said it was somewhere between 220,000,000 and 225,000,000 bushels, because sales are taking place every day and I did not know what might have been sold during the twenty-four hours prior to my speaking. So I said the surplus was between 220,000,000 and 225,000,000 bushels. For the sake of argument I will take the larger figure, 225,000,000 bushels, and in order that there may be no misunderstanding on that point I desire to point out further what was said by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) later yesterday, as well as what was said by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth who, when referring to our carryover, spoke of it as between 220,000,000 and 225,000,000 bushels.

The hon. member for Macdonald, who had had considerable experience in conection with these matters concerning wheat and grain, and some knowledge of them, because of his desire to support the orderly, cooperative marketing of wheat on the one hand and at the same time to retain the goodwill of what is called the trade on the other hand, as indicated by his looking two ways yesterday, said, "I estimate that the carryover this year will be from 170,000,000 to 185,000,000 bushels." When this government came into power there was a carryover of 127,000,000 bushels, so that in five years, with the third largest crop in the history of the country, with the bonusing that has been going on in all the countries of the world in the manner I have indicated and with the depreciated currencies in the buying countries to which reference was made yesterday, all this violent attack takes place, if the estimate of the hon. member for Macdonald is correct, with respect to the difference between 127,000,000 bushels and 170,000,000 or 185,000,000 bushels. If the figure be 170,000,000 bushels the increase will be 43,000,000 bushels; if it be 185,000,000 bushels of course the increase will be 57,000,000 bushels.

There are the facts. I merely take the figures used by the hon. member for Macdonald, speaking with knowledge of the operation of these matters in Manitoba, and those were the figures he gave last night. There is his statement, which you will find at page 3631 of Hansard, in which he estimated the carryover at 170,000,000 to 185,000,000 bushels. In that regard I think it very desirable that I should immediately point out to the house that the carryover of 225,000,000 bushels—which is not the carryover as the word was used by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, but I am using that word in order that there may be no misunderstanding—that quantity, that surplus at this moment of 225,000,000 bushels of wheat, is 25,000,000 bushels more than the estimated visible supply of wheat in Canada. I wonder if the true significance of that fact has dawned on the members of this house. The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks) had it in his mind last evening when he was speaking. This is what it means: If the farmers and millers have 10,000,000 bushels that means that the visible supply must be reduced by that amount, leaving 190,000,000 bushels of wheat, and there are 225,000,000 bushels held by Mr. McFarland in the form of cash wheat and futures. In other words somebody is 35,000,000 bushels short on the Winnipeg market. That is what it means.

What happened last fall? I am going to recite my own experience. At three o'clock in the morning I was gotten out of bed in my hotel in London because on the day previous there had been thrown upon the market at Winnipeg, from what source no man knows because it came into the wire houses, millions of bushels of wheat, just before the exchange closed. Someone sold one, two, three, four five million bushels of wheat short; somebody who had no wheat was offering wheat for sale. That is what was happening. What were we to do? The limit mentioned by Mr. McFarland, in his evidence before the committee, as to the amount of bushels for which he might become responsible under his credits, had been exhausted. My colleagues desired my view. I picked up the Daily Herald of London that day and read what I expected to see from the moment I received that cable, namely, that a raid had been contemplated by international dealers in this commodity, and for what purpose? Do I have to indicate the purpose when I indicate to you the present shortage? Before my message which was dispatched and which reached Ottawa at nine o'clock in cipher could be deciphered and telephoned through and the banks communicated with, there was thrown upon the market an additional quantity of wheat amounting to millions of bushels and the price fell six cents. Let us take the facts, Mr. Speaker. Let us realize clearly the gravity of the problem with which we are dealing. I said then what I say now, that I do not propose so long as I can help it that the Dominion of Canada wheat producers shall become the play and sport of international speculators.

Let me proceed a step further. What wrecked the Bank of England; what drove the Bank of England off the gold standard?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It did not wreck the Bank of England.

Mr. BENNETT: It wrecked it so far as its ability to provide gold for its obligations was concerned because they had to pass a new statute to deal with the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not wrecking it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is, unfortunately. What happened? A gang of internationalists were operating. What happened the other day in France to their franc? Why did they have to deal with that situation? What did they try to do in this country with respect to our wheat? Now who holds that short interest? It is no wonder that the hon. member for Macdonald said that the carryover would be the figure he mentioned. I had not thought that it was perhaps wise to make a statement of this kind the other day but I am compelled to make it in view of the misrepresentations and misstatements that have been made in this house.

There you have your visible supply, known to all people, published to the world, 200 million bushels. There you have this wheat organization holding in cash wheat and futures as Mr. McFarland has indicated, 225 million bushels, and entitled to receive wheat for payment; the farmers, millers and other interests are estimated to have 10 million bushels or thereabouts. That would mean a shortage of 35 million bushels, or if you disregard the 10 million bushels, a shortage of 25 million bushels. Is it any wonder that they are looking with joy to see if we are going to dump Canadian wheat on the market? Is it any wonder that they are getting joy from that editorial in the Free Press in which it says:

> Any sensible business would say that the right course now is to remove the controls and see what can be done, in the way of speeding up trade and getting back lost markets by free selling.

Is it any wonder that this journal of the Siftons says that?

Mr. BOTHWELL: May I ask a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. BENNETT: Sit down. If, when I have concluded, the hon. gentleman desires to ask a question I shall endeavour to answer it, but I am dealing now with an argument. There is the statement made by the Free Press on the day this bill was introduced when they thought the Liberal party was going to oppose the legislation. That is the position known to everybody, known to people on the streets of Ottawa. This is the contingency the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was no doubt alluding to.

I ask this house whether or not they are prepared to dump Canadian wheat on the market to satisfy the greed of the exploiter and the international speculator. That is the problem; that is the explanation. Who is trying to drive down the price of wheat below 80 cents? Who sold short upon the exchange last fall? Who endeavoured to sell vast millions of bushels they did not own? Who were they? All we can ascertain is that over the wires there came the orders to Winnipeg brokers to sell. Have you ever seen a wheat pit operate? Do you know what it means to have, in the closing minutes, sellers rush in to the exchange and offer wheat at any price—five cents below the market, seven cents, ten cents. Then the market closes. It opens in the morning, and to make the debacle complete, more selling orders pour in and the price goes down still further.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. YOUNG: Why was not that matter investigated when Mr. McFarland asked for it?

Mr. BENNETT: Your friends the grain exchange can give the explanation. That is the reason.

Mr. YOUNG: It is up to the government to explain it.

Mr. BENNETT: Sir, I put this to the house. As Canadians I ask you whether you are prepared to hand over to the speculators from abroad, the internationalists, the wheat business of Canada. That is the question. Now, if the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) desires to ask his question—

Mr. BOTHWELL: I understood from the right hon. gentleman's speech the other day that Mr. McFarland was in the market for the purpose of buying hedges because there were no speculators in the market. If he was only buying hedges, how was it possible to buy 35 million bushels of wheat that was not there?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend was one of those who examined Mr. McFarland last year, and one of the very questions he asked Mr. McFarland was why he was buying wheat, and Mr. McFarland said he was buying wheat to protect the market. If speculators threw it on the market, he either had to buy it or see the market destroyed and chaos result. That is the very point. Somebody went on that exchange and sold 35 million bushels of wheat they did not own, and Mr. McFarland to protect the honest Canadian producer from ruin bought their wheat, and now they are trying to destroy the market and have a fire sale so that they can buy the wheat back and escape a loss. I want to make clear to this house and to this country what I had not intended originally to state with respect to this situation but which I regard it now as my duty to do in view of what has been said, in order that there may be no misunderstanding with respect to it.

Let us proceed a step further, and see what was said by the hon. member for South Battleford. He, with a great show of fairness, said that he was going to read figures that he obtained from the bureau of statistics. That is true. They are set out at page 3607 of Hansard, but Mr. Speaker, I cannot think that the hon. gentleman is so lacking in knowledge of the wheat business as to talk about the sale of 229 million bushels of wheat to Great Britain in the year 1929, for Great Britain's entire importation in any one year from all quarters does not exceed 200 million bushels.

Mr. VALLANCE: You want to be fair; did you read the letter?

Mr. BENNETT: I know the letter. The figures are set out at page 3607 of Hansard. They are the figures for the fiscal years ending March 31 of each year. They are the customs figures from this country, showing the clearances of wheat to the United Kingdom. Keep that in mind. They are the clearances from Canada to the United Kingdom of wheat. They include all the wheat that is re-shipped from Great Britain to the different countries of Europe.

Mr. VALLANCE: That is an entirely different argument.

Mr. BENNETT: And one of these years, 1929, gives 229 million bushels, while the next year, according to the hon. member's figures, gives 113 million bushels, and upon that he built an argument. Now, Mr. Speaker, why cannot we, even though partisans, be fairly frank with one another? The fiscal year ended on March 31, 1929, and for that year there cleared from Canada to British ports 229 million bushels of wheat—cleared for British ports. For the year ending March 31, 1930, there cleared 113 million bushels, a falling off of 116 million bushels, and the hon. gentleman says that the falling off indicates what had happened under this government.

Mr. VALLANCE: Oh no, read it all.

Mr. BENNETT: Hold on, just wait till I read it. The hon. gentleman said:

> In spite of all that has been said about the British market having been lost before the present government came into power, in 1929 we exported 229 million bushels of wheat. Through the policies inaugurated by the late government we increased our exports of wheat to Great Britain from 29 million bushels in 1921 to 229 million bushels in 1929, an increase of 200 million bushels. It must be remembered that these are not my figures; they come from the bureau of statistics. Let us see what happened from 1929 on. The elections were in July, 1930, and in that year our exports dropped to 113 million bushels.

That was for the year ended March 31, 1930 which was several months before the government came into power, and the hon. gentleman desires to make it appear otherwise.

Mr. VALLANCE: Follow what I said. I said that the elections were in July. Do not pick pieces out of what I said, read it all.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman perhaps will recall the words of scripture: Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.

Mr. VALLANCE: I could apply a few quotations to my right hon. friend which are not in scripture but the rules will not permit me.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman said that the elections were in July, 1930, and in that year our exports dropped to 113 million bushels. Now, as a matter of fact, it was for the year ended March 31, 1930.

Mr. VALLANCE: I said that.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member did not say so. At least he blamed on this government the falling off in exports and now when he is confronted with his own statement—

Mr. VALLANCE: They are not my figures.

Mr. BENNETT: I had thought he would have offered an apology for misleading us.

Mr. VALLANCE: I need not apologize for anything I said.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman apologizes. Let me proceed a step further. I took the trouble to secure the British figures because since the preference was granted the British have made very accurate reports to their statistical department. These figures which are supplied by the Board of Trade are checked very carefully.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Our figures are equally good.

Mr. VALLANCE: At least they should be.

Mr. BENNETT: Our figures cover the exports prior to 1932.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Going to the British market for export.

Mr. BENNETT: These Board of Trade figures are as follows:

Imports of Wheat into the United Kingdom from Canada, Argentina and Australia and all countries by crop years, 1930-31 to 1933-34 with the 9-month figures August to April 1934-35

	Canada	Argentina	Australia	Totals
		(bushels)
1930-31	52,957,000	30,594,000	33,199,000	207,621,000

*Nine month period.

As I pointed out the other day and as I desire again to direct to the attention of this house, Canada up to the end of May had provided the world with 32 per cent of all the breadstuffs bought by the world. For the reasons which I trust I gave with some clarity, this figure is constantly increasing. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth said that percentage is not the correct way in which to measure but I think that percentages of the quantities of grain imported into a country from several countries is the proper way to gauge. One hundred per cent is the total percentage shipped by Canada, Argentine and Australia and the number of bushels sold has no relation to the ultimate in determining the question of the amount supplied by each. As I said, the figures I have given were supplied by the British Board of Trade.

There is another question to which I think some little attention possibly might be given; that is, the circumstance of this legislation being introduced into the house. Before the house adjourned at Easter there was placed on the order paper a notice in my name that a motion would be made to establish a wheat board. It has been said that I did not treat this matter as being of any more importance than other matters. Mr. McFarland stated clearly before the committee last year that a wheat board was the usual alternative but he would endeavour to maintain the existing machinery and have the benefits of a wheat board without establishing such a board. In view of that statement I thought that there would be no difficulty on the part of the house in understanding just what was the situation. I think the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has misunderstood the purport of my observations. I said that at the present moment it was no longer posisble to contemplate relying upon Mr. McFarland to carry on his present operations. I did not know that Mr. McFarland was going to be ill when I placed the resolution on the order paper. I do not think even my warmest supporters on the other side would credit me with having that information.

May I proceed a step further? Has anyone suggested that the standing committee on agriculture should discuss this matter this year? Mr. McFarland has been here several times and has any hon. member asked that the committee convene? Has any one desired that there should be an investigation before the committee on banking and commerce or the committee on agriculture? I have been away and it may have been that some of the members of that committee asked that it should be convened but I have not been so informed. I have asked my colleagues and they tell me that to the best of their knowledge no such request has been made. We have a medium of communication between the people and their members through a parliamentary committee which has the right to examine witnesses; all this machinery has been there if it was desired to be used but no one has asked to use it. Is it fair to say that the government has endeavoured to prevent information being given?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With reference to what my right hon. friend has just said may I say that from the time the notice with respect to this bill was on the order paper in his name, the opposition refrained from saying anything with regard to it during the time he was ill. That was the attitude of the opposition. We felt it was a measure with which my right hon. friend would wish to deal himself. Although we would have liked to have had information earlier we waited until the right hon. gentleman was in position to deal with the matter himself.

Mr. BENNETT: Since I came back to the house no question has been asked as to when we were going to proceed with it. No one has suggested that the committee should meet. As far as my being able to deal with it before the committee is concerned, my knowledge would be just second hand. The witnesses who would be called before the committee would not be those who sit in Ottawa and receive reports, they would be those who have first hand knowledge. Last year Mr. McFarland said that he had not brought his papers in detail but could send for them if they were desired. Let us look at it frankly and see whether or not there has been any effort by any hon. member to secure any information with respect to this matter. Would it not be more fair to say that in view of a pending appeal to the people it has been thought desirable to endeavour to discredit Mr. John I. McFarland?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope my right hon. friend will permit me to reply to that. He referred a little earlier to Mr. McFarland being on his back. May I say that the attitude of the opposition toward Mr. McFarland has been just as chivalrous as it has been towards himself. Since Mr. McFarland has been on his back we have been particularly careful to say nothing whatever which could reflect upon him in any way. May I say that when my right hon. friend was on his back, and when he was absent overseas, we were just as chivalrous with him as any opposition could possibly be with any leader of a government.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank hon. members for the consideration extended but I shall have something to say about the chivalry shown in my absence. There are one or two matters to which I have not referred and what applies to myself applies with equal force to Mr. McFarland. Since I came home Mr. McFarland was in the city but no one suggested that the committee should meet. He was ready and available. But let us proceed to the second point which has been made. There is the evidence, a whole volume of it. It does not all deal with this; but at great length, with all the astuteness and the skill with which eminent counsel could ask questions, those questions were asked and answered; and at the end Mr. McFarland thanked the committee and told them what he was endeavouring to do and why. And the committee seemed to be in a generous mood, so far as their attitude of mind was concerned. The matter rested there.

Now it is said that this bill in an emergency should be temporary in its character. Well, there are some arguments which, if adduced by eminent men, are always listened to with that care which the authority of the source would demand. But there is not a member of this house who does not know that all legislation is subject to the right of repeal at the next session of parliament; and when hon. gentlemen in this house talk about a temporary measure it seems to me they are rather insulting the intelligence of the house when they do not point out that any government may proceed at the next session or even at that session to repeal an act that has been passed either during the current session or the session before. The power of parliament is untrammeled. The power of parliament to deal with matters of this kind may involve vested interests and they may be disregarded. There is no limit to the power of parliament in that regard. What is meant by anyone who stands in his place and suggests that the measure should be temporary? And hon. gentlemen in the next breath say that they will occupy the treasury benches in a few months. Well then, it will be their privilege to repeal this legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would the other house not have to assent also to action taken by this house before the measure could be repealed?

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, I take it that the right hon. gentleman will give me credit for knowing that parliament consists of the Senate, the House of Commons and the Governor General. But he cannot rely upon an assumption when he deals with a matter of that kind; he must face the fact that if, as he says, he proposes to occupy the treasury benches in a few short months it will be his privilege to repeal the legislation. That will be his privilege if he is thus situated; and when anyone suggests that the legislation should be temporary he is merely stating what is a commonplace to every student of the constitution, indeed every casual reader of it, namely, the right of parliament to repeal legislation which it has passed at a previous session.

Now I will deal with another matter. It has been said in this house that we should not have compulsory marketing of grain. I will not take the trouble to do more than state what Mr. McFarland mentioned last year, that by the operations that have been carried on by this organization the farmers of western Canada have profited to an extent variously estimated. The question was asked as to how much and he said that different figures had been mentioned, but he suggested that it was probably not less than $100,000,000, though some have said not less than $200,000,000. However, let us leave that for the moment. It is sufficient to bear in mind that I gave the average price received this year as 81 cents as against 64 the year before. I mention that because it has a direct bearing on what has been said. Now I put this to the house. With 225,000,000 bushels at the present time, with a carryover estimated by the hon. member for Macdonald at 170,000,000 bushels, and with a crop that promises at the moment to be some 400,000,000 bushels, as stated by one hon. gentleman yesterday, you must decide one of two things: Shall you have the orderly marketing of that grain, or shall you gratify the exploitation ambitions of certain gentlemen and have a fire sale, throwing it on the market? If you throw on the market the carryover you have, it at once affects your new crop. How are you going to fix the price of the new crop? Must it not be on the basis of making an initial payment, so that the value of the new crop may ultimately be determined by what can be secured for it? And must not all be treated alike, except with respect to sales that may be made domestically at the mills and matters of that sort? Does it not sound reasonable to say that cooperation in this instance means that all must unite together for the common good, and that if there be a few who take another view they must subordinate their interests to that common good? Why? Because during the last five years this country has placed its recources behind them all for their good. Is not that the basis on which we make the appeal? You will find it written in the bill; and when any of your constituents say, "We desire to have the right to sell our own wheat," must you not reply, "Ah, but you asked that the government of this country should stand behind an organization that would absorb hedges to enable you to sell at all." And when that was done, now that it has been accomplished and the agency finds itself possessed of large quantities of wheat which it would not otherwise have had, and by exerting steadying influences on the market—for obviously, the evidence shows, it was not for sale but for the purpose of destruction and chaos—under these circumstances is it more than fair to say, "Let us all stand together in the spirit of cooperation, that all may benefit from the results of what now has to be done." That is the reason why the clause is there; that is why it is written in the measure.

One step further. The ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and his friend the member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) have said that the government has failed. That is the statement of the Free Press—Bennett and McFarland have failed. Well, though perhaps a man has no right to feel a justifiable sense of pride about anything in these days, there is one thing which perhaps I may be allowed to say; we have been able to save from bankruptcy those who have made the greatest contribution to the foreign trade of Canada. To the foreign trade of Canada the farmers of the west have contributed over thirty per cent. I am not referring to this year but speaking generally—about thirty-two per cent. We have endeavoured to prevent them from becoming bankrupt. What stranger coming to this house yesterday or the day before, sitting in the gallery and looking on here, would think that the world has been passing through the greatest depression of all ages? He would have listened to defences of grain exchanges; he would have heard members say that because Sir Josiah Stamp reported that a future market has a value in the marketing of wheat, therefore now, because we enact legislation of this character, we are unmindful of that fact. Is there a member in this house who will not say that the machinery of the grain market, as heretofore existing in this country, has broken down? Why? There was no one to take the hedges. And what happened if there was not? Stark. complete, absolute disaster beyond the ability of any man to see. That is what it meant, and I say to hon. gentlemen that the question of failure is the question of the failure of the Winnipeg grain exchange to function. With respect to the machinery that has been set up for the handling of business during the long years that have passed, the first thing that Mr. McFarland did was to withdraw the agents from abroad in order that the Baltic might function, in order that the grain exchanges might function, whether Winnipeg, Chicago or Liverpool. What happened? The grain exchange at Winnipeg ceased to function. It could not take the hedges. It admitted that. There was nobody to take them. When the machine ceases to function, what are you going to do? That is the issue and this bill provides for it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. McFarland during all these years has endeavoured to do both things: on the one hand to save the machinery and mechanism set up by man over all these years, and on the other to see that the benefits of cooperative selling were maintained for the producers of this country. The reason that I am particularly anxious at the present moment is that we have a condition where the knowledge of one man is not available as it has been heretofore, and we have to do the best we can, not relying upon the judgment of one or two or three, for Mr. McFarland was in consultation with other people who pretended to know and did know something of the handling of grain, so that we may have at least something that has continuity, that has corporate existence, something that the country can support from its inception, for the purpose of enabling the grain of Canada to be marketed. If we ask the people to cooperate with us, we are merely saying: We are partners with you, not with a select few, but with all the producers for the purpose of enabling them to secure the benefit of what has inured to them by what has transpired in the past. That is number one.

I shall not discuss again—it has been discussed so often—the payment of a bonus to the wheat producers. I can speak only from memory of the many letters received from mayors and others that that little payment of cash to them when their crops were being harvested at a price that did not give them any return for their toil, their risk, enabled them to pay their taxes, maintain their upkeep, their schools, and small though that payment was, while it went to the wheat producers, it went in turn to producers of other commodities and in that way stimulated trade.

I was surprised at the reference of the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) to the statement put in by Andy Cairns the statistical expert. It was put in evidence and went into the report because it was put in evidence. It was not intended that it should be printed, according to the evidence that came to us later on, because we asked for it from the commission themselves. It was attached to the report that was made. It was inadvertently included in the printed report, but it was part of the record. It rendered a conclusion drawn by one man on one man's statistical understanding as to certain facts, and to that extent was wrong, because arguments based on facts are not evidence on matters of that kind. It is for the commissioners to draw the conclusions, for the witnesses to give the evidence and not for the conclusions to be drawn by the witnesses themselves. So far as that report is concerned, the government had exactly the same control over it as had the hon. gentleman himself.

Then as regards the question of our operations, that is said to be an admission of failure, of defeat. Well, I am content to leave that to history. I am not going to argue the matter further. The other day I took the time to place the facts upon the records of this house at some, shall I say expense of nervous energy, and I quite agree with the ex-Minister of Agriculture that, having recently not been upon my feet, perhaps I endeavoured to enforce my views with greater emphasis than I should have done; but I desire to make it quite clear that that record indicates the reasons why we took the steps we did. When I say "we" I merely say that we supplied the guarantee that enabled Mr. McFarland to carry on the operations he did. I did not assume to be and I rather resent the suggestion that I was a wheat dictator. I do not pretend to know the intricacies of market operations. All I know is that from time to time the government accepted the responsibility for determining the credits which that organization would receive, and when an appeal was made to extend more credit, we did so if we believed it was right; otherwise we declined to do it. Hon. members will remember Mr. McFarland's evidence. His credit was exhausted and in 1932 wheat dropped to thirty-eight cents. We did not in 1934 decline to extend credit because the economic situation in the country had become entirely too acute. What we did was by orders in council to provide him through the banks with credits that enabled him to function. One general manager of a bank who gave evidence last year before the committee indicated the basis upon which this was done. It was done through the clearing house; payment was made upon deposits made in the clearing house, the rate of interest at that time being four and a half per cent and to the banks five and a half per cent, making the net cost one per cent. I do not know what the rates are at this moment. This I do say, that having provided the credits and limited the operations as to bushels, I did not, neither would I undertake to go further, having enabled an expert, who was held out as an expert and whom I believe to be the best equipped of any man in this country to deal with the problem, to deal with it as he was selected by the cooperative enterprise. His appointment, I may say, was made while I was still in England, my first knowledge of it being when I had arrived on this side. That was my knowledge of the arrangement that was made. We used this organization from the standpoint of credits to enable it to discharge what I describe and believe to be the only course that could have been pursued to protect the producers under the circumstances that existed. It is neither failure nor defeat.

Mr. McFarland was not trying to secure great profits. I can recall his saying to me: "What is a loss of a few million dollars compared with the utter destruction of the farm industry of western Canada?" It is not correct to say that the government at any time talked about how profits would be divided. One of the counsel examining Mr. McFarland asked him who was going to get the money, and he replied that that was a question of law about which he could not speak. He has often said to me: "You can never talk about profits until wheat has entered into consumption." That is so wise an observation that I think it well worth while repeating it, because you can never count paper profits in either wheat or anything else. Paper profits counted by many friends of mine have left them ruined insolvents on the sands of time. That has happened and will happen. That is all I have to say in reference to what has been urged in the house.

Hon. members opposite say that they are prepared to support the second reading of the bill; the right hon. gentleman says "with reservations." I am content that that should be so, for I am much more concerned about supplying the western producers of this country with a sufficiently ample machinery to protect them at this time than I am in questions of party politics in connection with this bill. I am therefore quite willing that hon. gentlemen who accede to the second reading of this bill should do so without sacrifice of their rights. If they desire on the third reading to vote against this measure, I shall certainly be glad to afford them an opportunity to do so. I can only add that while the bill can go to a committee, I believe it is said, if once more I might emulate the example of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, that the suggestion came from the ex-crown prince of Saskatchewan. But be that as it may, the suggestion is not unworthy of consideration, and when the bill has passed as a matter of form its second reading, I shall move that it go to a select committee of nine members.

I have trespassed somewhat longer than I should on the time of this house in reply, but I want to make clear to all the world the fact that notwithstanding all the discussion that has taken place here during the last few days, so far as this government is concerned, whether its life be long or short, it will not permit bargain sales of Canadian wheat to be made to gratify the ambitions and exploitation tendencies of speculators in any part of the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to one remark that the Prime Minister made at the close, I do not wish there to be any misunderstanding. I did not quite understand the significance of his reference to some suggestion made by the ex-crown prince, but may I say to him that when the resolution first appeared upon the order paper which was early in March last the position that the Liberal opposition took with respect to it or was going to ask the house to take—and that is three months ago—is the position we have asked it to take in the last few days, namely that of having the bill referred to a committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the bill be referred to a select committee of nine members, composed as follows:

Messrs. Bennett, Alberta; Perley, Saskatchewan; Willis, Manitoba; Porteous, Ontario; Gobeil, Quebec;—

I think that makes five as far as we are concerned, and:

—Ralston; Stewart (Edmonton); Vallance and Lucas.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

COMPANIES ACT, 1934, AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 85, to amend the Companies Act, 1934.

He said: The revision of the Companies Act was commenced about September, 1933, preparatory to the submission of the draft of a new act to the interprovincial conference, which assembled at Ottawa on January 17, 1934.

The printed draft of a new bill, as then prepared, was presented to the representatives of the provincial governments who attended that conference from January 17 to 19 inclusive, and, at the request of the attorneys-general of the provinces, the further consideration of this draft bill was postponed till March 1, 1934. During that period the provincial governments were to prepare and forward any suggested amendments to the bill as first prepared.

Between January 19, 1934, and April 26, 1934, when the new bill was introduced to this house, printed copies of the proposed bill were widely circulated throughout Canada to economists, accountants, lawyers, universities, companies and corporations; and, after due consideration of all relevant suggestions and their incorporation into the draft bill, a bill intituled An Act Respecting Dominion Companies was introduced to this house on April 26, 1934. This bill was enacted as The Companies Act, 1934 on June 28, 1934. Three months were then allowed to all companies to re-adjust their accounting systems to conform with the requirements of the new act, which came into force by proclamation on October 1, 1934.

In the meantime, on February 2, 1934, a select special committee of the House of Commons was appointed by resolution of the house to enquire into and report upon certain matters. By order of His Excellency the Governor General in council, dated July 7, 1934, the eleven members of said select special committee were appointed as a royal commission to continue, complete and report on the enquiry ordered by the House of Commons on February 2, 1934. It is clear, I think, that the resolution of the House of Commons of February 2, 1934, appointing the select special committee, did not authorize the committee to report upon the dominion companies acts, which were then under the consideration of the representatives of the provincial governments, who had participated in the interprovincial conference of January 17 to January 19 inclusive. It is also clear, I think, that neither the order in council, P.C. 1461 of July 7, 1934, appointing the royal commission, nor the terms of the royal commission which issued upon said order, conferred any specific authority to investigate, consider or report upon proposed amendments to the Companies Act, 1934.

So far as I, as Secretary of State having supervision of the administration of the dominion companies acts, was concerned, I had no knowledge or notice that an enquiry into the terms of those acts or into the administration of those acts was proceeding. So far as the evidence submitted with the report of that royal commission discloses, no general enquiry was made by the original committee of this house, nor by the royal commission, which succeeded to the work of the house committee. I was surprised, therefore, when the report was submitted to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and laid on the table of this house, to find incorporated therein a long list of proposed amendments to The Companies Act, 1934, of the Dominion of Canada.

I am very confident that if it had been known that the committee had undertaken such a work of revision even without express authority, many representatives of Canadian companies would have sought leave to appear before the commission for the purpose of making representations on their behalf, which would not be entirely consistent with the recommendations of the commission.

In order that these recommendations may be considered fully by this house, this bill has been prepared and is now moved for second reading. But I am authorized to state on behalf of the government that each and every member on this side of the house is free to approve or to oppose each and every section of this bill and to move any amendments thereto which may be deemed advisable or expedient. The bill is placed before the house and it is wide open for consideration by all members.

I propose, therefore, to consider in sequence the recommendations of the royal commission on price spreads as shown in the summary to the report of the commission and to direct attention to the corresponding provisions of this bill in order that the house may have before it a clear statement of each and every recommendation made and a statement, by reference to the bill, of the extent to which these recommendations have been embodied in the terms of the bill.

The first recommendation for an amendment to the Dominion Companies Act was the abolition of shares of no par value or, in the alternative, a requirement that the full consideration received for no par value shares be credited to the capital account. In considering the proposal to abolish no par value shares it was ascertained that measures to make that recommendation effective would compel the reorganization of the capital structures of a large number of dominion companies at present engaged in industrial and commercial pursuits. If the house or any member so desires I will lay on the table of the house later the names of some hundreds of these companies that are actively operating from day to day and whose interests are vitally concerned with the summary abolition of no par value shares.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do I understand that there are some hundreds of dominion companies that have distributable surpluses?

Mr. CAHAN: But please let me get down to the question of distributable surpluses. My hon. friend will have ample opportunity to discuss every phase of the matter. The alternative that is required is that the full consideration received for no par value shares should be credited to capital account, and I shall deal with that in a moment.

Evils may arise, and evils do arise, in connection with all forms of corporate ventures. In my personal experience in the Department of the Secretary of State it would appear that no par value shares, under a strict system of accounting, such as was devised by expert accountants all over Canada and incorporated in the Companies Act, 1934, to which I fear careful attention has not been given either by the commission or the committee, are in fact as clean and as little deceptive as any class of shares issued to the public in this or any other country.

This bill, however, contains provisions in partial compliance with the alternative proposal. Subsection 7 of section 12 of the existing act will be repealed by section 4 of this bill, and hereafter no part of the consideration received by a company in respect of the issue of no par value shares may be so set aside, except it be provided in the original contract for subscription for such shares that a part thereof not exceeding twenty-five per cent may be set aside as distributable surplus. Then subsection 9 of section 12 of the existing act, which permitted directors at any time, with the sanction of a vote of two-thirds of the shareholders, to set aside as distributable surplus a part of the consideration received for the issue of no par value shares, is repealed by section 5 of this bill. Nevertheless it should be noticed that the repealed subsection only permitted such setting aside of such consideration as distributable surplus by the issue of supplementary letters patent, when the Secretary of State was satisfied as to the expediency and bona fide character of the proposal, and that the rights and interests of creditors were duly protected. I can assure hon. gentlemen that since I assumed the administration of the Companies Act no distributable surplus has been set aside under the section it is now proposed to repeal where the interest of any creditor was affected in the slightest degree, except when the consent in writing of that creditor was given to the setting aside; nor has such setting aside been allowed in respect of any fixed assets nor in any case in which there were not available cash or liquid assets for the purpose of being set aside. Iu that connection I am glad to note that of all the companies to which the report refers not a single exception or criticism is taken with respect to any company incorporated since August, 1930. I have not known, therefore, of any supplementary letters patent issued since August, 1930, giving rise to any injustice or any complaint. Nevertheless this bill, if enacted, will repeal subsection 9 of section 12 of the act, and it will be a matter for the consideration of the house whether, in view of the very severe and stringent restrictions which by the revision of 1934 have been placed upon the setting aside under subsection 9 of section 12 of the present act, the proposed repeal of subsection 9 should be carried into effect.

The second recommendation of the report is that all premiums from the sale of par stock should be placed in the capital or non-distributable account. The consideration, to the extent of 100 cents on the dollar, received from the issue of shares of capital stock having par value, is capital. I do not know, and I have examined the evidence to find out but I have been unable to ascertain, just what evil in fact the committee had in view in making that recommendation, because in my experience I have known of no evils resulting from the issue of such shares at a premium. In fact under the law as it prevails in Canada, and as it has been administered by companies under my personal advice and counsel, the premium on an issue of new shares represents money that is actually due to existing shareholders. It represents a premium upon a new participation in the assets of the company and therefore, in justice to existing shareholders and in accordance with English law, which I think our courts follow, if such shares are really valued at a premium they should first be offered to existing shareholders, to whom such premium belongs, inasmuch as in equity it represents an accretion in value of the existing assets which are the property of the existing shareholders. No effect is given in this bill to this second recommendation.

[Mr. Cahan.]

The third recommendation is as follows:

3. All increases in surplus or reserves which result from an increase in asset values (as a consequence of write-ups, appraisals, etc) should be regarded as capital surplus; that is, incapable of having dividends charged against them.

I should certainly advise a client of mine that such is the law at present as embodied in the Companies Act, 1934, and the English common law which applies to the administration of that act, but nevertheless in order to carry out this recommendation of the report this bill proposes to enact two amendments as follows:

Section 12 of this bill, to which I shall later refer in another connection; and section 17 of this bill, which amends section 112, subsection (2), clause (g), and subsection (3) clause (c), both of which relate to the preparation of the balance sheet of the company which is submitted to the shareholders.

The fourth recommendation is as follows:

4. Companies should be incorporated only for activities which they intend seriously to pursue at the time of incorporation. They should be prevented from engaging in activities not directly related to those for which they were incorporated, unless they have previously secured,—

(a) approval of the shareholders, and
(b) supplementary letters patent.

I think that that recommendation is carefully considered and carried into effect in respect to the administration of the present act. In a complicated code such as company law you must leave some discretion to the administration in dealing with exceptional cases which arise, but in order to give effect to this fourth recommendation we have proposed in this bill section 2 and 3, which read as follows:

2. Section five of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:—

"(4) Nothing in this part shall be construed to authorize the incorporation of any company for any purposes or objects other than those which it is intended the company shall actively pursue as set forth in the letters patent of the company.

(5) If any company in the opinion of the Secretary of State—

(a) carries on any business which is not within the scope or the purposes or objects set forth in the letters patent or supplementary letters patent, or

(b) exercises or professes to exercise any powers which are not truly ancillary or necessarily incidental to the purposes or objects set forth in the letters patent or supplementary letters patent, or

(c) exercises or professes to exercise any powers expressly excluded by the letters patent or supplementary letters patent, such company shall be liable to be wound up under the provisions of the Winding-Up Act as if it had become insolvent, and the Attorney General of Canada may, upon receipt of a certificate of the Secretary of State setting forth his opinion as in this section provided, apply to a court of competent jurisdiction for an order that the company be wound up."

I think that that, with section 3 of the bill, gives very complete control. Section 3 reads:

3. Paragraph (b) of subsection one of section seven of the said act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

"(b) The purposes for which incorporation is sought which shall be limited to the purposes and objects which it is intended that the company shall actively pursue."

So with respect to the application for letters patent and with regard to the granting of letters patent this recommendation is carried into very full effect. But I would remind the house that the dominion parliament is not the only legislative body in Canada which controls the incorporation of companies. It has been decided by the privy council that the grant of letters patent by the crown in the province of Quebec gives to the company the power to carry on every and any activitiy which is within the legislative competence of the province of Quebec, the same as if the company were a private person or individual, and other provincial legislatures have taken advantage of this decision of the privy council to the effect that the crown in the right of the province in Quebec is authorized to grant such charters. Other provincial legislatures by their own legislation have conferred upon their companies distinctly and expressly the same right as an individual would possess.

The fifth recommendation is as follows:

5. A company's annual statement, together with the auditor's report should be required to be published in the daily press and in The Canada Gazette, in such a way as to ensure the widest publicity.

This recommendation I have not felt free to incorporate in the bill now before the house. Under the present law every shareholder and every bondholder is entitled to receive an annual statement, and some amendment has been suggested to section 16 of the eixsting act for widening its scope. But there are approximately ten thousand dominion companies in active operation and we estimate, although we have not the particulars with regard to provincial companies, that there are about thirty thousand companies in active operation throughout the Dominion of Canada even in these days of depression, of which approximately one-third are dominion companies. The advertising of the annual statement of each of these companies in statutory form in the Canada Gazette would require at least one page of the Gazette for one company, and at the lowest rates at which the King's Printer can economically operate the Gazette, the charge would be $50 per page. The Canada Gazette now consists of approximately 2,500 pages per year, and it is becoming so extensive that I doubt if anybody ever reads it. But this recommendation would require the publication of ten thousand extra pages of the Gazette each year, and for an English version alone we would have to charge the companies all told $500,000, and if you insist upon publication in both the English Gazette and the French Gazette we would have to double that amount, but I am assuming that if this recommendation were put into effect parliament might be content with one publication either in French or in English.

To publish that same statement in the daily press would cost each company at the very least $150 for each such publication. At the rates charged by the daily press in many cases it would run up to $200 or $250 for each publication. Assuming an average of $150 the publication in the daily press would impose an annual burden upon these companies of $1,500,000. I can see no reason why, in these times of stress and strain, when dominion companies are subject to federal, provincial and municipal taxation, we should compel them to expend $2,000,000 per year upon such publicity, when any person who is really interested in the affairs of the company can obtain all the information in printed form at the cost of an envelope, a piece of writing paper and a three cent stamp.

The sixth and seventh recommendations are carried into effect, in part, by section 19 of the bill which provides that a copy of every balance sheet shall be filed with the Secretary of State, where it is available to everyone.

The eighth recommendation is that annual statements should be given in more detail than at present and should include information under the following headings:

(a) Fixed and intangible assets to be given in more detail than at present;

(b) Investments and securities—nature, and market value;

(c) Inventories—so as to show raw materials in process of manufacture;

(d) Accounts and notes receivable—in such a form as to make a distinction between current and overdue and doubtful accounts;

(e) Executive salaries and bonuses—so as to show the number of executives and the total amount paid;

(f) The amount, if any, by which fixed assets (including goodwill and other intangibles), have been written up.

I am doubtful if the author of these recommendations has considered carefully the express terms of the Companies Act, 1934, which requires more detailed accounting than any companies act of which I have knowledge. Nevertheless, in section 17 of the bill we have proposed certain amendments to the existing act. Section 17 reads:

Subsections two and three of section one hundred and twelve of the said act are repealed and the following are substituted therefor:—

"(2) Every balance sheet shall be drawn up so as to distinguish severally at least the following classes of assets and liabilities, namely:—

(a) cash;

(b) debts owing to the company from its directors, officers or shareholders respectively;

This is a re-enactment of the present provision.

(c) other debts owing by the company—

That should be "to the company."

—including accounts and bills receivable in such form as to distinguish between current and non-current accounts in all cases in which the estimated loss is not provided for;

I can see no reason why the shareholders would desire to go into individual accounts so long as the statement distinguishes between current and non-current accounts. This section of the bill has been taken from the corresponding section of the Bank Act of Canada which is very precise and definite. The section continues:

(d) inventory, if any, stating the basis of valuation adopted and the manner in which such value has been determined in respect of various subdivisions of such inventory;

The words "in respect of various subdivisions of such inventory" are new. I continue:

(e) investments and securities, if any, stating the nature and the market value thereof in case such market value is readily ascertainable.

I do not think it is possible to carry out the recommendation more completely because many companies own securities of other companies, operating industrially in connection with their own, with respect to which there is no way of determining the market value. If it is a subsidiary company the present act provides that the consolidated balance sheet must show with great precision and clarity the financial standing of the subsidiary companies. If its shares are on the stock exchange the market value can be ascertained, but in other cases it cannot be readily ascertained. I quote:

(f) expenditure made on account of future business, if any;

(g) lands, buildings and plant, stating the basis of valuation, whether cost or otherwise, and, if valued on the basis of appraisal, the date of appraisal and the name of the appraiser and the amount, if any, by which the value of such assets has been written up;

We have added the words, "and the amount, if any, by which the value of such assets has been written up." I have incorporated this recommendation but I do not think it can be carried into practical effect. During the revision of 1934 this suggestion was definitely brought before us and accounting firms and associations said that it would be impossible to carry it into effect unless it were limited to a term of years. Many of these companies have been in operation for twenty, thirty and forty years and during that period their fixed assets have been accumulated by the acquisition of property, the construction of new buildings, the restoration of old buildings, investments in new machinery and replacements of old machinery. From year to year these companies have set aside a certain portion of their incomes to cover depreciation. The accountants advise that in the case of a company which has been operating over a term of years it would be absolutely impossible to ascertain the amounts by which the value of such assets had been written up, that is, by which they have been appreciated. In many cases they are properly appreciated by the purchase of new fixed assets or the replacements of old fixed assets which are worn out. The accounts which have been kept hitherto under the provisions of the Dominion Companies Act do not permit of a satisfactory investigation. The accountants protested very strongly against the incorporation of such a provision in the 1934 revision as they claim that no conscientious auditor could give a certificate of that kind. I have incorporated in this bill the full recommendation, but I suggest that hon. members should consider whether it should not be limited to writings up within a term of three or four years, which would be ascertainable. In fact under the present amendment we are compelling such a system of accounting as will give very clearly and definitely either in the prospectus or the balance sheet the full particulars required here. I should like hon. members to consider in committee as to whether or not this should not be restricted to a term of three or four years. Clause (c) of subsection 3 of section 112 provides:

(c) If it is shown as a separate item in or is otherwise ascertainable from the books of the company, or from any contract for the sale or purchase of any property, the amount of the goodwill, franchises, patents, copyrights, trade marks, leases, contracts and licences as so shown or ascertained—

We have added the words:

—and the amount, if any, by which the value of any such assets has been written up.

I still think with regard to that item that there should be fixed a term of years, because companies which have been operating for twenty-five, thirty or forty years, with writings-up from year to year, by acquisition of new patents, franchises, trade marks, leases and contracts, which such companies are writing off to a certain extent from year to year when the returns are good, would require such a complicated system of accounting as to render this clause impracticable. Therefore, if it is desired to give effect to a recommendation of that extent, I still think the house should consider whether it should not be restricted to a term of years.

We have not given effect to the clause (c) of the recommendations "so as to show raw materials in process of manufacture." Large industrial companies operating in several different localities allege that they would require to cease operations for several weeks in order to make accurate statements in compliance with this recommendation. Moreover, we see no good reason why such companies should be compelled to disclose at any time to wholesale vendors of the raw materials, which any particular industry consumes, whether its stocks of any raw material are heavy or low, as such information could only prove valuable to the speculators in the wholesale trade in such materials, and we all know that there is a speculative market in all the basic raw materials which enter into the manufacturing industry.

As to the recommendation in clause (e) for the disclosure of executive salaries and bonuses, we have, I think, made full provision in section 18 of the bill, which reads:

18. Subsections one and two of section one hundred and thirteen of the said act are repealed and the following are substituted therefor:—

"113. (1) The statement of income and expenditure to be submitted at the annual meeting shall, subject to the provisions of this section, show as a separate item the total of the amount paid to the directors as remuneration for their services as such directors, inclusive of all fees, percentages, or other emoluments, paid to or receivable by them or from the company or by or from any subsidiary company, exclusive of the amounts paid to a managing director, if any, or any other director who holds any salaried employment or office in the company and who devotes substantially the whole of his time to the business of the company or its subsidiaries.

That clause provides for the disclosure of everything paid to the directors qua directors, and the second clause provides for the disclosure of executive salaries:

(2) The said statement of income and expenditure shall also show separately the total of the amount paid as salaries, bonuses, fees or other remuneration to the counsel, solicitors, or other legal advisers of the company, and also to the executive officers of the company including the managing director, if any, of the company, and any other director who holds any salaried employment or office of the company and who devotes substantially the whole of his time to the business of the company or its subsidiaries."

That is as full and effective a compliance with the recommendations as could possibly be made, but I have received protests against it because this new provision applies to private companies as well as to public companies. My own opinion is that the house should favourably consider some amendment which would make this apply solely to public companies. Where you have private companies, or three or four persons in a town or village operating as a private company under this act, where each knows the other and all are directors as well as shareholders, a provision such as this should not, I think, be made to apply. But expressing the terms of the recommendation, in the bill, we have attempted a full compliance with the recommendations made.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Could not that be limited to public companies?

Mr. CAHAN: I was going to suggest that in committee. I wish the hon. gentleman would consider it, because it certainly should not apply to private companies which have a few thousands dollars capital, operating in country towns and villages, which are prevented from seeking any subscriptions for stock from the public and prevented from selling their stock except to those who are shareholders with them in the same company.

The ninth, tenth and eleventh recommendations are as follows:

9. The prospectus provisions of the present act should be altered to place upon a company and its directors the responsibility for representations made on any offering for general public subscription, whether made on behalf of the company or not. If this change cannot be made through the Companies Act, it should be made a criminal offence to offer for public subscription, securities of a company with federal incorporation, if those securities have not been subjected to the prospectus obligations of the Dominion Companies Act.

10. Every prospectus should be required to state in clear detail all commissions, fees, and other remuneration received by promoters, underwriters or middlemen.

11. Whenever shares are allocated otherwise than through an offer to the public, a statement in lieu of prospectus should, as formerly, be filed. It should also be published in the press and in the Canada Gazette in such a way as to ensure the widest publicity.

At present an "underwriter" is any person who acts as agent of the company in procuring subscriptions for its securities when offered, by or on behalf of the company, to the public for subscription; and "subscription" includes a purchase or other acquisition of such securities, except by way of security only, on any sale or other disposal thereof made by or on behalf of the company. "Prospectus," under the existing act, is any document issued by or on behalf of a company, which invites persons to subscribe for securities of the company. In general, it may be said that any holder of securities who has purchased them outright, in whom the absolute title thereto is vested, is now deemed to be the "owner" of the securities and not an "underwriter" of the securities.

The underwriter of securities, who acquires and becomes vested with absolute title to the securities, is not, under the existing act in respect of his subsequent dealings in such securities, deemed to act as underwriter, but as owner. It has hitherto been accepted by the legal profession that any sales, made by an owner of securities to any other persons who become purchasers thereof, are subject to the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the provinces; and that the power of the dominion to legislate with respect to the incorporation of companies does not include the right to legislate with respect to subsequent sales of a company's securities after the company has issued, sold and delivered the same to the purchasers thereof who have fully paid for the same. I have a clear and decided opinion that to give full effect to the ninth recommendation would require the enactment of legislation which is not within the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament, and that to attempt to filch the provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights by the creation of new and unprecedented crimes would, in the end, be equally ineffective.

In drafting section 73 of The Companies Act, 1934, I gave very careful consideration to this issue, and I concluded that clauses (a) and (b) went as far as was within the competency of parliament. These clauses, which appear on page 14, lines 12 to 22 of the new bill, are as follows:

"underwriter" includes (a) any person who to the knowledge of the company, proposes to subscribe for securities of the company with a view to the resale to the public of those securities or a part thereof, and (b) any person to whom a commission is proposed or intended to be paid by the company in consideration of his subscribing or agreeing to subscribe, whether absolutely or conditionally, or in consideration of his procuring or agreeing to procure subscriptions, whether absolute or conditional, for any securities of the company to be offered to the public for subscription.

That is the present law which is reexpressed in this bill on page 14. The opinion then expressed to me by eminent counsel, in which I concurred, was to the effect that whenever the title to such securities became unconditionally vested in the subscriber or purchaser, then the subsequent dealings of such purchaser fell under the provincial jurisdiction and beyond the legislative jurisdiction of parliament. However, in order to bring before the house this issue and the full implications of the report, I have gone beyond my own professional opinion by proposing in this bill in amendment to section 73 of the existing act a new and unprecedented term to the definition of the word "underwriter" and to include, on page 5 of the bill, line 43 et seq., an additional paragraph (c), as follows, and this is new in any legislation of which I have knowledge:

"Underwriter" includes (c) any person who, in respect of any securities issued or to be issued by the company, has purchased or acquired or agreed to purchase or acquire such securities from the company, or has acquired from the company any option or right of disposal of such securities, with a view to effecting the first distribution of such securities or any of them to the public by advertisement or circular or in the course of successive transactions of a like character; and it shall, unless the contrary be proved, be evidence that such person purchased or acquired or agreed to purchase or acquire such securities or any option or right of disposal aforesaid, with a view to effecting the first distribution to the public of such securities, if it is shown that such person effected or attempted to effect such distribution within six months after such purchase or acquisition or the making of such agreement or that at the date when such distribution is made the whole consideration to be received by the company in respect of such securities has not been so received.

This will require litigation to determine the validity of it, but certainly it gives full effect to the recommendation of the commission. Then, in order to complete that recommendation and to tie it in a double grip, I have also included on page 7 of the bill certain proposed amendments to section 75 of the act, new subsections (4) and (6), which read as follows, and these provisions are new in any legislation:

(4) The company shall not allot or issue any of its securities to or on the direction of any person whose principal business, to the knowledge of the company, is offering, buying, selling or otherwise dealing or trading in shares, debentures or other securities, unless the company shall have first obtained an agreement in writing from such person to comply with the provisions of subsection two of this section;—

That is the previous one which I have read.

—and if and whenever, to the knowledge of the company, any offer to the public of its securities has been or is about to be made without due compliance with the requirements of subsection two of this section by such person, the company shall forthwith cause notice of the particulars of such non-compliance to be given to the Secretary of State by registered mail.

Then follows the penalty in subsection 6:

(6) Any underwriter who offers any securities of a company for public subscription before the provisions of subsection one of this section have been complied with by the company or without causing the provisions of subsection two of this section to be complied with shall be guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to both fine and imprisonment.

I think we have there utilized to the widest possible extent the criminal law of the country to carry into effect the recommendations made. I still think, if the commission had invited hearings from those interested and had heard the other side of the case, the recommendations might not have been so extreme and severe.

The tenth recommendation as to the disclosure of commission fees, etc., is quite fully provided for in section 77, clauses (j), (k) and (l), of the Companies Act of 1934.

The eleventh recommendation for the revival of the old form of statement in lieu of prospectus, which was abolished by the Companies Act, 1934, should not, in my opinion, be complied with. The statement in lieu of prospectus served to conceal many irregularities. It was deliberately abolished in framing the Companies Act, 1934, because under the present act every public company, that is, every company, except a private company, must issue and file a prospectus if it issues and allots any shares whatsoever to others than the original subscribers to the memorandum of agreement which appears as form 2 to the act. Having exacted a prospectus from all companies when shares are issued to the public, as is now the case, we see no sound reason for recurring to the old practice of requiring the statement in lieu of prospectus, which was so often used to contravent the provision of the act dealing with prospectuses.

The twelfth recommendation, that hereafter all shares issued to the public should be limited to common and preferred shares without any subdivisions, would prevent a company, after issuing preferred shares at the company's inception, when its prospects were doubtful, from thereafter, in times of proven financial success, issuing preferred shares yielding a lesser rate of dividend. We have not carried that into full effect. I do not wish to discuss the affairs of a particular company, but I know within the last few months one industrial company which has a large bond issue outstanding, chiefly held in the English market, received offers to substitute for the debentures outstanding, its capital indebtedness, an issue of its preferred shares. It was of the utmost importance to the company that in times of stress and strain such as these, its debenture indebtedness should be reduced by several million dollars and its capital assets increased by a corresponding amount. When they took the matter into consideration their existing preferred shares bore a dividend rate of eight per cent, if I remember correctly, and they had power under the letters patent to issue other preferred shares ranking with the first issue. But so cheap had money become, and so successful had been the operations of the company, that they were able to procure contracts for the purchase of the new issue of preferred shares yielding a rate of dividend two or three per cent less than the rate on the outstanding preferred shares. If you prevent companies from issuing preferred shares of more than one division or class you prevent absolutely such successful operations as those to which I have referred, which are entirely legitimate and worthy of commendation.

The thirteenth recommendation, that all shares offered, both common and preferred, should bear equal voting rights, is carried into effect in section 16 of this bill, which reads as follows:

The said act is amended by inserting immediately after section ninety-eight thereof the following section:—

"98a. Subject to the provisions of any by-law of the company duly enacted under the provisions of this act, each share of the capital stock of any company issued and allotted, shall, subject to the provisions of this part, carry voting rights and entitle the shareholders to one vote for each such share owned by him."

Well, sir, the object of that recommendation is obviously meritorious, or would seem so to the mind that conceived it. But, can you see any sound reason why the holder of a common share of $5 par value, for which five dollars has been paid, should necessarily have the same voting rights as a holder of a preferred share of $100 in the same company? That is a suggestion which I should like hon. gentlemen to take into consideration when they enter upon the discussion of the several clauses of this bill.

The fourteenth recommendation, is to the effect that management shares should be prohibited. This recommendation is carried into effect by section 5 of the bill, which enacts a new subsection 10 to section 12 of the act, reading as follows:

(10) In no case shall shares of the company of any class, or any subdivision of any class, whether with or without par value, be issued and allotted to which shall attach any exclusive right to control the management of the business or affairs of the company by the election or removal of the board of directors thereof or otherwise.

As I drafted that section I thought it might be opportune for me to go back again to practice of the legal profession, because I am sure I could find half a dozen ways to get around it. But it is the best effort to carry completely into effect the recommendations of the committee that I could conceive of.

The fifteenth recommendation, that a meeting of the shareholders should be called by the directors in case of serious impairment of the capital of the company, is carried into effect, so far as practicable by section 14 of this bill, which reads as follows:

The said act is amended by inserting immediately after section ninety-four thereof the following section:—

"94a. Whenever the officers of a company, or any of them shall have become aware of any impairment of the capital of the company, they shall forthwith inform the directors of the nature and extent of such impairment; and thereupon, if in the opinion of the directors such impairment of its capital renders the company insolvent, it shall be the duty of the directors immediately to call a special general meeting of the shareholders of the company for the purpose of making to the shareholders full disclosure of the nature and extent of such impairment of the capital of the company."

You must remember that any impairment whether of the company's capital should not be sufficient cause to place the whole assets of the company in jeopardy, as you would do in calling such a meeting; therefore it should be only such an impairment as affects the solvency of the company. I have known in my experience a company to drop $3,000,000 in twenty-four hours. If you called the shareholders together you would cause a panic. But by giving careful attention to the matter, inasmuch as the loss itself did not impair the solvency of the company, the directors were able to take effective measures to place the company on a sound basis for successful operation. I suggest that I have carried into effect as far as possible and practicable the recommendations of the commission.

[Mr. Cahan.]

The sixteenth recommendation, that the first permanent directors of a company should be held responsible for all business transacted by the provisional directors, is carried into effect by section 13 of this bill, as follows:

The said act is amended by adding to section eighty-eight the following subsection:—

"(2) The directors of the company elected by the shareholders at the first general meeting of the company shall be responsible for all business transacted as a board of directors by the first directors of the company."

The seventeenth recommendation is that:

Directors should be prohibited from speculating in the shares of their companies. They should be required to disclose annually to their shareholders the extent to which they have directly or indirectly purchased or sold their company's shares during the year.

I have known of speculation by directors in the shares of their company for the purpose of maintaining the company's reputation and preventing outside speculators from depreciating the value of its shares in the market in such a way as to ruin shareholders who were widely separated and unable to protect themselves. Speculation in the market may be evil or it may be of real advantage to the other shareholders of the company. But in view of this recommendation section 15 is inserted in the bill, reading as follows:

The said act is amended by inserting immediately after section ninety-six thereof the two following sections:—

"96a. (1) Every director shall furnish annually to the secretary, for the information of the shareholders of the company at the annual general meeting thereof, a statement setting forth in detail all shares or other securities of the company bought or sold by him, for his personal account, directly or indirectly, during the twelve months immediately preceding such annual meeting.

(2) No director of a company shall speculate, for his personal account, directly or indirectly, in the shares or other securities of the company of which he is a director.

(3) "Speculate" as used in this section means trading in securities in the course of successive and continuous acts; selling a security where the director does not own the security sold, or, if owning the security, does not deliver it against such sale within twenty days thereafter, or does not deliver the same within five days after such sale by depositing it in the mails or other usual channels of transportation; or selling securities not previously held by such director for at least three months, unless such securities were acquired in good faith in connection with a debt, obligation or liability of some other person previously contracted; or unless the director proves that such sale was made bona fide for reasons other than to affect the market price of such securities or the making of a profit by such sale.

Other hon. members of the house may be able to agree on a more exact definition of the term "speculation", but it is beyond me. The fourth clause imposes a penalty:

(4) Every director who neglects or fails to make a true and accurate statement of such transactions as required by subsection one of this section, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or to six months imprisonment or to both fine and imprisonment.

(5) Every director, who shall speculate, for his personal account, directly or indirectly, in the shares or other securities of the company of which he is a director in contravention of subsection two of this section, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or to six months imprisonment or to both fine and imprisonment.

After drafting this clause I began to meditate as to why any person should be so foolish as to undertake the office of director of a commercial or industrial company and render himself liable to such penalties as these.

With reference to the recommendation of provisions to prevent stock watering, so called, section 15 of this bill contains a proposed amendment to the act by inserting a new subsection 96b.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Would the minister mind reading the new section? I am very much interested in that.

Mr. CAHAN: The section reads:

"96b. (1) It shall not be lawful for the directors or promoters of a company to authorize the issue and allotment of any shares of the capital stock of the company as fully paid up unless the company receives, or is to receive what may justly be deemed, in all the circumstances of the case, adequate consideration therefor in cash, property or services.

(2) Subject as hereinafter provided, every director or promoter of a company who is a party to authorizing the issue and allotment of any shares of the capital stock of the company as fully paid up shall be liable, jointly and severally with his codirectors, at the suit of any director, shareholder or creditor of the company, to make good to the company the amount by which the consideration actually received by the company for any shares so issued and allotted as aforesaid, is found by the court, after full inquiry into the circumstances of the transaction, to be less than the amount of the consideration which the company ought to have received for such shares, if it is proved, as to any such first mentioned director, that such director

(a) had knowledge of the inadequacy of the consideration so received by the company; or

(b) failed to take reasonable steps to ascertain whether the consideration so received by the company was in fact adequate consideration.

(3) No suit shall be commenced against the directors of a company or any of them under the authority of subsection two of this section by any director or shareholder of the company without the consent in writing of the Secretary of State; and no such suit shall be commenced by any creditor of the company until an execution at the suit of such creditor against the company has been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part.

The next subsection provides an exception, which was recommended by the commission.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

PRIVATE BILLS

PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 97, respecting the Portage la Prairie Mutual Insurance Company—Mr. Willis—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. McPHEE: I have just seen this bill for the first time this afternoon and there appears to be a very considerable change in its meaning and purport. For instance, section 2 of the old act reads:

Any policyholder who holds a policy or policies to the amount of at least one thousand dollars who is not in default in respect of any premium or any assessment on his deposit or premium note and who has paid in cash all liabilities incurred by him to the company shall be eligible to be elected as a director, but he shall cease to be such director if the amount of his insurance as aforesaid becomes reduced below the sum of one thousand dollars.

The new section changes the whole tenor of the act. It reads:

Any policyholder on the mutual system or cash system who holds a policy or policies to the amount of at least one thousand dollars who is not in default in respect of any assessment on his deposit or premium note and who has paid in cash all liabilities incurred by him to the company shall be eligible to be elected as a director, but he shall cease to be such director if the amount of his insurance as aforesaid becomes reduced below the sum of one thousand dollars.

The sponsor of the bill can no doubt throw some light on the matter. I think the committee is entitled to a full explanation as to the reason for this change and as to what is meant by the mutual or cash system inserted in this new bill. I would ask the sponsor to give a full explanation not only of the changes but of the reason for the changes and all the circumstances surrounding the matter.

Mr. WILLIS: The purpose of the bill is to place the control of the company in the hands of the premium note policyholders. The company operates under two different systems of policies. That is to say, a man who desires insurance in this company may pay a cash premium for which he will get a policy, and in that connection there will be no contingent liability. He has paid his cash premium and he gets the benefits indicated in his policy. On the other hand, if he proceeds on the premium note plan he signs a premium note and subsequently he is assessed for the amount of the losses of the company as apportioned among the policyholders. It will therefore be seen that the premium note policyholder has a contingent liability. He may be assessed up to the full amount of the note; in other words, he is liable for his proportionate share of the losses of the company during that year, but the cash policyholder has no contingent liability. He has paid for something for which he receives a policy which indicates the benefits to which he is entitled.

The purpose of the amendments is to place control of the company in the hands of the mutual policyholders who are on the premium note plan in view of the fact that they have a contingent liability and have to pay the losses. The bill itself merely indicates two things. It indicates first that those who hold cash premium policies may be elected as directors. Secondly it indicates that only those who are under the other plan, the premium note plan, may vote and elect such directors.

I may say that the bill was considered by the senate committee, where it was approved by Mr. Finlayson, the superintendent of insurance who attended there, and also by the banking and commerce committee of this house where again Mr. Finlayson attended. The bill now before the house is similar to one which was passed here last year respecting the Wawanesa Mutual Insurance Company. There is little more I can say in connection with the bill except to point out that the Portage la Prairie Mutual Insurance Company is one of the oldest mutual insurance companies in Canada. It was incorporated in 1884, received dominion incorporation in 1930, operates in all the provinces of Canada except the maritimes, and has some $65,000,000 of insurance in force. The present bill has received the approval of the superintendent of insurance, the approval of the senate committee and the approval of the banking and commerce committee of this house, and I think it should go through this house without any difficulty.

WAPITI INSURANCE COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 87, respecting the Wapiti Insurance Company—Mr. Weir (Macdonald)—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Extension of time.

Mr. DUFF: May we have an explanation of this bill?

Mr. WEIR (Macdonald): The explanation of this bill is contained in the explanatory notes attached to it. Its purpose is to restore in force the act incorporating the Wapiti Insurance Company, chapter eighty-four of the statutes of Canada, 1929, which expired on May 1, 1933, under the provisions of the Insurance Act, and an act respecting the Wapiti Insurance Company, chapter seventy-four of the statutes of Canada, 1931, section 2, and in this way permit the Department of Insurance to issue its dominion licence to a Canadian rather than a provincial company.

This company has had a provincial charter for some time. In 1929 it applied for a dominion charter. It was unable to take out its dominion licence at that time, and in fact was unable to do so at the expiry date two years later. An extension of time was granted by act of parliament in 1931 but owing to the continuance of the depression the company was still unable to make the necessary arrangement to go ahead under dominion charter. It contemplated continuing as a provincial company and operating with a dominion licence only. On taking the matter up with the superintendent of insurance at Ottawa it was suggested that they should apply for a renewal of their dominion charter rather than continue as a provincial company. This was done. The reason for the delay in having the bill introduced in the House of Commons was that the proposal for a renewal of their dominion charter had to be approved at an annual meeting of the company, which could not be held until some time in February. The bill has already been before the committee of the senate and received its approval, also the approval of the banking and commerce committee of this house, and the approval of the superintendent of insurance. I understand that the company is now in a position to go ahead and reorganize, and this is merely to reinstate the company under a dominion charter and under the jurisdiction of the Dominion Department of Insurance.

FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANIES

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 14, to amend the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, 1932—Mr. Coote—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—surrender of policy.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, when we were considering this bill or the companion bill last week the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) made a statement to the effect that the insurance companies had expressed a willingness to file with the superintendent of insurance an agreement that the rate of interest on policy loans would not exceed six per cent. Since that statement was made I have been in consultation with the superintendent of insurance and I understand that the offer of the insurance companies was that if the amendment moved by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) was passed, rather than have this bill placed upon the statute book they would give a guarantee that they would not charge any rate of interest in excess of six per cent. At that time I did not know whether any correspondence had been placed in the hands of the Prime Minister other than the letter to which I have just referred, but it was intimated to me to-day that another letter had been written to him. I have not been made acquainted with the contents of that letter and I do not know whether it is in the same terms as the previous one.

This bill, which received a good majority vote in the banking committee, asks for a maximum rate of five per cent. I find myself in a difficult position in deciding whether I should accept the suggestion of the Prime Minister and withdraw the bill in order to secure the concession which the insurance companies have offered. I realize that to those indebted to the companies under a loan which was automatically advanced there would be a very distinct concession made in that regard. The policyholders who have borrowed under that method would be offered a considerable saving but at the same time I feel that as the bill has gone so far an opportunity should be given to hon. members to indicate their opinion in committee of the whole before it is withdrawn. I should like to have any hon. members who have decided opinions on this matter indicate whether they think the amendment of the hon. member for Mount Royal should be accepted. If possible I should like to see this bill discussed for at least a portion of the hour devoted to private and public bills.

I read very carefully the statement which the Prime Minister made last week and I cannot see that the bill as introduced interferes with any contract. Mr. Rowell suggested to the committee that in the case of loans made under the automatic advance provisions of a policy, the policy itself would be the contract between the borrower and the insurance company. But this bill exempts that type of loan from its operations and I think I am safe in saying that the bill now before us does not interfere with any contract. I believe in most policies the paragraph relating to the rate of interest at which loans may be made is generally worded to the effect that the rate of interest shall not exceed a certain per cent. There is no fixed rate mentioned in the contract, and speaking as a layman I cannot see how this bill could be regarded as interfering in any way with any contract.

I believe the rate of interest now being charged by the companies is so high as to be unfair to the borrower because in effect he is only borrowing his own money. Such a loan is not very much different from a loan made to a savings bank depositor. Such a man may have $5,000 in his savings account which he does not want to touch. He may go to the bank and ask to borrow $1,000 and tell the bank that they can earmark that amount in his savings account and hold it as guarantee for the loan. It may seem strange to hon. members but I know that such loans are made by banks to men who have savings accounts which for certain reasons they do not want to draw against. It seems to me that a loan under a policy is very much of that nature, and it does seem that at this time, with the low interest rates prevailing, we should not be doing the insurance companies any injustice if we enacted that the maximum rate they could charge should be five per cent. I would rather secure the concession which the insurance companies have offered than have nothing at all, but before going so far as to ask the leave of the house to withdraw the bill—I realize that it would call for unanimous consent—I should be glad if any members of the committee who have any opinion to express with regard to the matter would state their views, and if necessary at a later stage I would move that the committee rise and report progress or if it were preferred—indeed it would meet my wishes—the committee might take a vote on the amendment of the hon. member for Mount Royal. So far as I am personally concerned, I should then have a much clearer view of the course I ought to pursue.

Mr. DUFF: This bill as amended is not in the hands of members of the committee and consequently should not be proceeded with. I submit that there should be a copy in the hands of every member.

Mr. COOTE: I am quite sure there are printed copies available.

The CHAIRMAN: I am advised that there are only fifty copies.

Mr. POULIOT: Is the bill translated into French? If not, I object to going on.

The CHAIRMAN: There are copies in French.

Mr. DUFF: Let it stand.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand that not only has it been printed in French but copies have been distributed to members. A copy is on my file.

The CHAIRMAN: I am advised that there were fifty copies printed and they have been distributed.

Mr. DUFF: I think it should stand.

Mr. SPENCER: I sincerely support the bill sponsored by the hon. member. The feeling in the committee when the bill came before us was distinctly in favour of lower rates of interest.

Mr. DUFF: I submit that we should not proceed with the bill until we have copies of it as amended in our hands.

Mr. SPENCER: Could we not have the bill distributed so that we might go ahead with it?

The CHAIRMAN: There are no further copies in the distribution office at the present time. Shall the bill stand?

Mr. DUFF: Stands.

Mr. SPENCER: We had a week for the bills to be distributed, and any member interested enough in it could have got a copy.

Mr. POULIOT: We cannot run after bills; they must be distributed in the ordinary way.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee.

Mr. SPENCER: As the hon. member who is responsible for the bill has pointed out, in the committee and since on the floor of the house, the money that is being borrowed by policyholders is nothing more or less than their own money. The insurance companies are taking no risk at all, and the investments of the companies are not bringing in nearly as much as is being charged by them to their borrowers. I think there are very good reasons why we should stipulate a definite amount of interest, and that five per cent and no more shall be paid by borrowers. Moreover, the higher the rate the poorer the risk, and the policy is then not of as great a value to the company; and that is distinctly true also as regards the owner of the policy, because the greater the amount of interest to be paid the less possibility there is of the borrower being able to keep the policy in shape. I do think that the hon. member for Macleod has done a great service in bringing this matter to the house and asking that the interest rate on loans made by insurance companies to policyholders should be cut down in line with the rates that are being charged to-day for borrowed money.

Mr. COOTE: May I ask the Prime Minister whether a written proposal has been placed in his hands by the Life Insurance Underwriters' Association in addition to the letter sent to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BENNETT: I explained the situation the other evening when I indicated why the government was of the opinion that a bill such as this should not be passed, and I also intimated that the representatives of the insurance companies had filed with the Minister of Finance an undertaking to the effect indicated just now by the hon. member for Macleod. The representatives of the insurance companies stated that they would file a formal agreement in terms to be satisfactory to the Department of Finance and the Superintendent of Insurance, and an undertaking to that effect has been given. If the bill were withdrawn the reasons that apply to its not being proceeded with, as stated by me the other evening, apply with equal force to the amendment of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White). It is the principle of imposing an obligation upon either the company or the policyholder at variance with the contract entered into between them which I was speaking of the other evening. That is what I was discussing, and the effect upon the credit of the country generally. And especially is that so with respect to companies carrying on business in Canada, registered under the provisions of the statute. I am indebted to the chairman for a copy of the amended proposal, which reads:

(1) No company shall charge, stipulate for, or recover as interest in respect of any loan made to any person on a policy of insurance issued or effected upon the life of any person resident in Canada at the time the policy was issued or effected, any amount in excess of five per centum per annum, compounded annually, on the balance of the loan from time to time unpaid by the borrower.

That covers all expenses.

(3) This section shall not apply to any loan or unpaid balance thereof made under an agreement executed, or advanced automatically under any policy issued, before the first day of January, 1936.

So that its provisions do not become retroactive except from the first day of January, affecting no agreement that might be outstanding, carrying any rate of interest, and would automatically reduce the rate to five per cent. Apart from the question of jurisdiction, which is a delicate matter that has been discussed so often in this house and in the privy council, the other question still remains an integral part of the proposal, namely:

> This section shall not apply to any loan or unpaid balance thereof made under an agreement executed, or advanced automatically under any policy issued, before the first day of January, 1936.

It still has that effect on contracts that might be outstanding with respect to it. I think, however, I should say this to the hon. gentleman, from what was stated to me, that the companies would be prepared to execute with the Minister of Finance or the Superintendent of Insurance, whoever is the appropriate person, an agreement in the terms suggested, which he himself inspected at the office of the Superintendent of Insurance, reserving an interest rate not exceeding six per cent. May I say to the hon. gentleman that I think if he accepts the proposal, undoubtedly the agitation will be such that the companies will probably reduce the rate to five per cent in another year. Personally I think the companies should charge not more than five per cent; I am wholly in accord with that view. That is one matter. Another is how to effect this. Having regard to the conditions that exist, I cannot endeavour to impose the will of parliament upon parties who make the rates.

I do not intend to traverse the ground I covered the other evening, but I believe as a result of what the hon. gentleman has done, if he accepts the agreement and does not limit it as to time, the agitation that will be carried on will be sufficient to make the rate not exceeding five per cent rather than not exceeding six. That is my personal view about the matter. If it is not possible for the hon. gentleman to accept the proposal suggested, I would make a motion that the committee rise. If the committee did rise, that would be a short way of ending the difficulty.

Mr. COOTE: I wanted to make sure that I was not labouring under a wrong impression as to the attitude of the companies, and all that I had seen was the letter which was sent from them to the Minister of Finance, but I inferred from what I heard to-day that maybe a further letter was in the hands of the Prime Minister, and that is the reason I asked the question. If I am in order, Mr. Chairman, and so that I may have a chance of again discussing the matter with the superintendent of insurance and possibly also with the Prime Minister, I would move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again. If that motion is accepted, that will leave the matter open.

Progress reported.

COMPANIES ACT, 1934, AMENDMENT

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE MOTION OF MR. CAHAN FOR SECOND READING

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cahan for the second reading of Bill No. 85, to amend the Companies Act, 1934.

Mr. CAHAN: When the house rose, I was discussing a recommendation with respect to the prevention of stock watering. This is carried out in section 15 of the bill which contains a proposed amendment to the act by inserting a new section 96B. As I stated, section 96B in terms applies to private as well as public companies. When the bill comes before a committee of the whole house, I will suggest to the committee that this section might be amended by inserting the word "public" before company, because I do not conceive that the commission intended that this should apply to small and insignificant private companies.

There is also in section 96B, subsection 4, a provision to carry out the recommendation of the commission that this section shall not apply to any mining company. I thought it necessary however to attempt a definition of "mining company" in order that there might be no misapprehension as to the application and meaning of those words. Therefore in subsection 4 I have defined "mining company" as:

> Any company whose principal objects are the exploration, development or operation of mining properties and which, if it has commenced actual operations, is carrying out such objects as its principal business.

I have defined "mining properties" as follows:

> "Mining properties" includes mines, mining deposits, mining rights, metalliferous lands, mining claims or any interest therein including any option or licence in connection therewith.

I have attempted to give as precise a definition of "mining companies" and "mining properties" as I could under the circumstances, and I think the definition is quite clear. Personally I have sometimes found it difficult to understand the qualification in the report which states that mining companies are highly speculative. My experience is that most commercial and industrial companies are equally as speculative as are mining companies. If one could at the outset foresee the success of one of those other companies, it would be quite possible to accumulate a fortune in a short time. My own ventures have not been so successful, and I have often found that those companies, which I have regarded as most reliable and as having sure prospects of success, have been those which under adverse circumstances such as have existed during the past four or five years, have proved in fact highly speculative. There is no sure venture in either finance, industry, commerce or trade.

The final recommendation is this, that the whole trend of law should be toward putting the managers and directors in a trustee capacity with respect to all of the security holders. I think the English law which prevails in this country places the directors in the position of trustees, and I have not sought to give in this bill expression to that recommendation.

Certain suggestions have come to me since this bill was published. A number of the larger companies have already arranged to hold their annual meetings and have prepared at great expense, on the basis of the accounting provisions of the existing act, their accounts for the present year, ending many of them on July 1. Therefore they feel somewhat apprehensive that this bill may be brought into force immediately they think there should be a lapse of time of thirty days; indeed some of them would like a lapse of sixty days after the bill is enacted before it comes into force, and I shall ask the house in committee to consider whether such a section should not be added bringing the whole or parts of this bill into effect by proclamation.

All I can add is that we have endeavoured as best we can to bring before the house the recommendations of this commission in such form as may be easily understandable, with such correct definitions as we were able to devise. Therefore we leave it entirely to the judgment of the house on second reading and in committee, when the several sections of the bill may be more carefully considered.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): While I intend to support the second reading of this bill, there are a few observations I should like to make before it goes to the committee. The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) in moving the second reading stated that he was somewhat in doubt as to the right of the price spreads commission to make the recommendations that they did.

[Mr. Cahan.]

The scope of the inquiry of that commission was a pretty broad one, and in the inquiries they made I have no doubt they came to the conclusion that many of the evils from which we are suffering are attributable to faulty legislation under our Dominion Companies Act. Therefore in endeavouring to carry out the duty imposed upon them by the order setting up the commission they investigated as far as they could what had been reported or what appeared to them to be wrong with the company legislation, and as a result of that inquiry made certain recommendations. Not only has it appeared to the members of that commission that there is something wrong with our company legislation; it has appeared so to many others throughout the country. In fact before the report of the price spreads commission was brought down, the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), in one of his radio addresses, I think the fourth, used these words:

> Our Dominion Companies Act will, therefore, have to be strengthened. There must be drastic simplification of capital structure so that the investor will be able to understand the nature of the stock or security he is purchasing. At the next session of parliament, the Companies Act will be amended so as to abolish the right to issue shares of no par value.

The price spreads commission—

Mr. BENNETT: Took a different view.

Mr. BOTHWELL: —at page 39 of their report, after reciting certain difficulties that they believed existed, and also referring to constitutional questions that might arise, used these words:

> But whatever may be the solution of this constitutional problem, it is clear that growing public resentment necessitates further social control of the financial operations of companies. Accordingly, it is urged here that, within its legal competence, the dominion should to the very limit give leadership with a strict act. We feel that the prestige of a dominion incorporation is such that the provinces will follow such a lead.

The Secretary of State, apparently taking that as the basis of the situation was quite prepared to consider favourably the recommendations that they made, and although he has stated that many of these recommendations do not meet with his ideas, he nevertheless has brought them to the house for consideration. In doing that, although it may be an extraordinary proceeding, he has given us an opportunity of discussing the various recommendations.

At page 40 of their report the price spreads commission, in dealing with suggested amendments, say:

Therefore, in an effort to remedy some of the abuses discussed in the previous sections of this chapter, and pending some satisfactory solution of the problem of uniformity, we recommend certain changes to the Dominion Companies Act, irrespective of what the provinces may do.

These changes are based on the assumption that limited liability company legislation involves three sets of obligations, as follows:

a. upon the company to create a non-withdrawable fund of capital, which would operate as security for bondholders, for creditors and shareholders.

And a little further down on the same page:

To strengthen and make more effective the first obligation, we recommend either the abolition of shares of no par value, or the requirement that the full consideration received for no par value shares would be credited to the capital account.

And further on:

The alternative proposal to complete prohibition, namely, the abolition of the right to allocate any part of the consideration received for an issue of no par shares to distributable surplus, would achieve the same objective.

In the amendments that have been brought down it appears to me—and I have gone through them carefully—that those recommendations have not been carried out. The no par value share is still permitted, and the distributable surplus is still permitted. Under section 4 of the bill provision is made in these words:

In the absence of other provisions in that behalf in the letters patent, supplementary letters patent or by-laws of the company, the issue and allotment of shares without nominal or par value may be made from time to time for such consideration as may be fixed by the board of directors of the company; and in fixing the amount of such consideration, the board, subject to the provisions of this part, may provide in the contract of subscription for such shares that the consideration received therefor shall be deemed to be capital, excepting a part, if any, not exceeding twenty-five per centum thereof, which shall be set aside as distributable surplus;

In regard to this question of distributable surplus it strikes me that that provision of the bill now before us will permit a company, immediately after it is incorporated, before it has been able to earn anything out of which to pay dividends, to use twenty-five per cent of its capital set-up for the purpose of paying dividends. That is the effect of it. To that extent the company starts out by paying part of its capital back to bondholders or shareholders or whoever shares in these dividends—in other words, starts out depleting its capital. Surely there can be no excuse for that. I heard the comment of the Secretary of State on the point this afternoon, but it does seem to me, as it does to many writers on the subject, that here is no excuse for such a proceeding. There may be an argument in favour of no par shares; it seems to be a debatable question, but it would seem that the power to issue no par shares gives to promoters of a certain class just the opportunity they are looking for in order to pour water into the company. A no par value share is an elastic sort of thing. It is something like a rubber ruler. This was discussed last year when the bill was before the house; a full description was given of what can be done by a company with no par value shares, and I do not intend to repeat the arguments that were used at that time. The minister has had them put to him, and he is still opposed to amending the act to do away with no par value shares.

The next suggestion to which I should like to refer is found at page 42 of the report of the commission:

It is well known that a company customarily sells its shares, not to the public either direct or through agencies, but outright to an investment house. The investment dealer, in retailing the securities to the public, is not acting on behalf of the company, but is selling its own property and is not, therefore, subject to the new prospectus clauses. This, to a great extent, nullifies their value and should be altered.

The amendment made to section 73 of the act seems to provide for that; I think the minister has endeavoured to carry out fully the recommendation of the committee in that respect. Then on the same page I find this statement:

Furthermore, we believe that every prospectus should state in clear detail all commissions, fees and other remuneration received by the promoters, underwriters or middlemen. The net consideration received or to be received by the company should be clear to the investor.

So far as I can find out that recommendation has not been implemented in any way.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I do not intend to discuss these clauses at length, but those matters are dealt within the balance sheet, and the balance sheet must be incorporated in the prospectus, so that whoever made that suggestion had not carefully read the provisions of the 1934 act. I assure the hon. gentleman that now they must appear in the prospectus which is issued. If he looks into the matter I am sure he will agree with me.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I am glad to have that explanation from the minister, and as we go through the bill in detail in committee no doubt other matters that may not be clear to us at the moment will be explained. The next recommendation to which I wish to refer is at the bottom of page 42:

We recommend also that steps should be taken to simplify the capital structure of corporations, by limiting the classes of shares that may be henceforth offered to the public, to common and preferred—without any of the numerous subdivisions that now so often confuse and mislead the investor, and facilitate the concentration of control in the hands of entrepreneurial groups. Allied to this provision would be a stipulation that every share offered, both common and preferred, should bear equal voting rights. Management shares should be prohibited.

Some of the recommendations contained in that paragraph have been carried out. It is recommended that management shares should be prohibited; that has been provided for. Equal voting rights as between common and preferred shares is also provided for, but I am opposed both to the recommendation of the committee and to the amendment as it now exists.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So is the minister.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes, I believe the minister also said he was opposed to that. Equal voting rights are given the shares no matter what may be their denomination. It does seem to me that voting rights should be based in some way on the value represented by the share, and not on the share itself. In the first part of that recommendation the commission have asked that the classes of shares be limited. So far as I have been able to read these amendments, the only class of share that is eliminated is the deferred share.

Mr. CAHAN: There are only two other classes, common and preferred.

Mr. BOTHWELL: We have the common and preferred shares and we have all the classes that we had under the old act.

Mr. CAHAN: We have only the common and preferred now.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Yes, but there are various classes of preferred shares.

Mr. CAHAN: Would it not be better to discuss these matters as we reach the various sections in committee?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Possibly it would be, and we will discuss them as we come to them, but I am mentioning these points now because they may clear up some matters in my mind before we give the bill second reading, and it may save time in committee. Then I read from page 43:

The duty of investigating and determining the adequacy of such consideration, where such adequacy is involved in any litigation, should be placed squarely on the courts.

That has reference to section 96B, to which the minister has referred so often, and that can be dealt with in committee. Then I read from the middle of page 44:

Moreover, creditorship securities are now occasionally issued with such designations that they convey the impression that they constitute a lien or charge on property when in fact they are merely unsecured obligations ranking with other similar unsecured debts of the company. The proposed board should prohibit this practice.

No board has been set up; under the amendments apparently the Secretary of State takes the place of the board that was suggested by the price spreads commission. Then at page 45 they say:

We therefore recommend legislation making appraisal companies liable in damages to any one suffering loss through the purchase of stock, to which purchase any such appraisal has contributed, if it can be shown that such appraisal was untrue in any material part, and that it was issued or published by the appraisal company (a) without honest belief in its accuracy, or (b) without such company having first taken all reasonable means to verify the accuracy of the facts or opinions contained in the appraisal.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that not the law now?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Pursuant to that recommendation an amendment has been drawn up providing that actions for damages are permitted, but such actions can be taken only after securing the consent of the Secretary of State.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not like to interrupt, but that section does not apply to actions for damages against an appraisal company. This Companies Act does not deal with appraisals. Under the common law as it prevails in this dominion, if an appraisal company wrongfully puts out an erroneous statement it is liable to all who suffer damages by reason of that statement.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Reading the report of the price spreads commission one gets the impression that the members of that commission became convinced of the fact that appraisal companies were materially assisting in—I do not think this is too strong a word—fleecing the public, by not having regard to the ordinary ethics of business in making their appraisals. So it does seem to me that if this difficulty has crept into our business practice these appraisal companies should be bonded or very severe penalties should be provided for false appraisals or false reports on appraisals made by the company.

I should like to say just a few more words particularly in connection with sections 5, 15, 16 and 20. In section 5 I find these words:

> In no case shall any shares, whether common or preferred, or whether with or without nominal or par value, be issued and allotted as fully or partly paid up for less than what may justly be deemed in all the circumstances of the case adequate consideration—

I hardly know what you can take out of those words, "what may justly be deemed in all the circumstances of the case adequate consideration," or how wide be their scope. It seems to me that a simpler expression could be used in dealing with the consideration for shares that are being allotted. Surely the time has come in the history of this country when if men are able to form corporations and go out and sell their stock to the public, the public have a right to expect that either dollars or dollars' worth are going into the company, and not simply "what may justly be deemed in all the circumstances of the case adequate consideration." We know of cases of incorporations—they will be found in any book of company law—where assets properly purchased for a few hundred or a few thousand dollars were then sold to the company at greatly enhanced prices and yet they were called "adequate considerations."

Mr. CAHAN: But I used the very words of the report.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I am not staying with the report in that connection. I believe that the making of the report would be a matter of compromise between the various parties to it, and while it makes suggestions this house is in a position to improve on those suggestions if it is possible for it to do so.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Those words "deemed in all the circumstances of the case adequate consideration" may not mean dollars at all, but that is what the shareholders of the company will expect is going into the company—dollars or dollars' worth. I think that the Secretary of State will know that in the past the courts have refused to go back of what the directors have said was adequate consideration. If they the directors say that a lot bought for a thousand dollars and turned in to the company at ten thousand dollars, was at an adequate consideration the court then says the directors having decided that, we will not interfere.

Mr. CAHAN: I have read fairly well the decisions of the courts in Canada for pretty nearly fifty years, and I have never met such a case. I would like to be shown it.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I do not think we shall have any difficulty in doing that before we are through. If the minister would like to see these cases I will refer him to them. I have notes of them here.

Then in section 15 of the act, 96B, we have these words again, dealing with adequate consideration for fully paid shares: "or is to receive what may justly be deemed, in all the circumstances of the case, adequate consideration therefor in cash, property or services." It does seem to me that the shareholders of the company and the public itself that is reading its reports and helping to pay for the stock in order to earn dividends for the company are entitled to know that that company is operating on a sound basis and not on watered stock. Where you see words like that I can readily anticipate what arguments will be advanced in the courts of this country, and I am very doubtful if a judge will be able to say that dollars or dollars' worth are there.

Then it appears to me that section 16 of the bill is very weak. It says:

> Subject to the provisions of any by-law of the company duly enacted under the provisions of this act, each share of the capital stock of any company issued and allotted shall, subject to the provisions of this part, carry voting rights and entitle the shareholder to one vote for each such share owned by him.

I have referred before to voting on the value of the share instead of on each share, but here it says "subject to the provisions of any by-law of the company duly enacted under the provisions of this act." Surely it is possible there for the company to do anything they like in connection with these voting rights. Then of course there is the other objection to which I have referred. Section 20 provides that certain provisions of the act—> —"shall not apply to any company to which part one of the principal act is made applicable ... nor to any company incorporated under the principal act prior to the coming into force of this act, and every such company shall continue to be subject to the provisions of the principal act which shall, as regards such companies, be and be deemed to be in full force and effect in the same manner as if the foregoing sections of this act had not been enacted.

Now what the price spreads commission found was that certain abuses had crept into business through our Companies Act, and they made recommendations which they thought would tend to abolish those abuses. But some of the most effective sections of this bill are going to apply not to the companies that have been sinning in the past but only to companies incorporated after the coming into force of the act. Surely these provisions ought to be made to apply to acts committed by existing companies after the coming into force of this act instead of exempting them altogether.

I am throwing out these suggestions on the second reading, before we get into committee of the whole on the bill, because personally I am very much in sympathy with the move made by the price spreads commission, although I am not in agreement with everything they said. Most of their recommendations that are of value in controlling a certain type of predatory incorporation were recommended to the minister last year when the main act was being put through. I am only expressing at this time the hope that they will be embodied in the bill and that we shall endeavour to cure the abuses which the price spreads commission found to exist.

PRIVILEGE—MR. RALSTON

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. This afternoon when I was not in the house I understood that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) delivered an address in which he intimated that I had accepted a brief and that something was represented on the back of that brief, which only means one thing in legal parlance. The custom is among lawyers, particularly in the old country, for a solicitor to furnish a brief to counsel and on the back of that brief to endorse an amount indicating the fee. The imputation which my right hon. friend has made is absolutely unfair, unjust and wholly false, and I submit that it is unworthy of any member of the house, and particularly of the Prime Minister, who is a distinguished member of the bar. I can only think that it was done perhaps in the heat of debate. But I myself have endeavoured to observe the amenities of debate in the past. I have not hit below the belt as my right hon. friend did this afternoon. I call on him to withdraw any imputation whatever that I have been engaged in this matter professionally in any way, or that I have ever accepted or received or expected to receive or am to receive any remuneration or any consideration of any kind which would be represented by an endorsement on the back of a brief.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not make the statements that the hon. gentleman has mentioned. If he had read what I said he would have read it exactly as I said it, and that is what he should have done. I made no such imputation. I did take occasion to refer to the observations he made to conditions with respect to my friend, and I said that they were unworthy of this house.

The imputations, if he calls them such, were not made. There were no imputations. Just what I said I said. What he said about my friend he said, and he brought about exactly the observations I made as to a distinguished member of the legal profession residing in Montreal, speaking of details with respect to matters transacted on the Winnipeg grain exchange that could come to him in only one way, from information furnished either by the exchange or members thereof, by the brief that they gave him. I called it a brief because that is the term which would be used by professional men. That is what I said, if my memory serves me aright. The hon. member has the paper in front of him and he can see the exact words. I said that I should like to see what was marked on the back of it. I think that is what I said. If that is any different from what was said by him yesterday with reference to Mr. John McFarland, I want to know about it.

Mr. HANBURY: Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to read the extract as it appears in Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: As to what should have been done.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not necessary to read it on the question of having a withdrawal. This is what the right hon. gentleman said:

> That is the position that has been taken in this house. Again, it is very interesting to observe the discipline with which hon. gentlemen who are not well informed, accept the brief that is tendered to them and then make a speech in the House of Commons. The leading member who spoke for the opposition is a distinguished lawyer; he did not desire to make that speech; he has made his statements and they are well known, but he was told to speak, so he took the brief and made the statement. From whom did he get his facts that he referred to as "ifs"? Who supplied them to him? Who gave him his brief and what does it represent on the back of it? That is the question.

My right hon. friend knows perfectly well that that means only one thing, that there is a direct endorsement on the back of the brief to the effect that the person who receives it is entitled to receive a fee. I am surprised that my right hon. friend has not referred to that at all in the lame explanation which he made. He knows perfectly well what a brief is and he knows as a counsel that what is represented on the back of a brief is the amount of the fee. I say to my right hon.

friend that that is the imputation which was made immediately apparent to every lawyer in this house and throughout the country and I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT: I repeat that after having heard it read it is little different from what I thought it was. What does it represent on the back of it, I said. Let me say what it represents on the back.

Mr. RALSTON: What did you mean?

Mr. BENNETT: Just exactly what it says.

Mr. RALSTON: What is that?

Mr. BENNETT: There is no imputation of any kind.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Why was it said?

Mr. RALSTON: I ask my right hon. friend what he means by "what does it represent on the back of it"?

Mr. BENNETT: From whom the brief was received.

Mr. RALSTON: My right hon. friend as a leading member of the bar, as a former president of the Canadian Bar Association, as a gentleman who has the keeping of the discipline and the good name of this House of Commons in his hands—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege does not involve the opportunity to cross-examine. The hon. member has made his statement and I have made mine.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my right hon. friend think I am going to let it pass with the slipshod explanation he has made? I say that my right hon. friend has made an imputation which will be regarded as an imputation by every lawyer in the country, and he knows it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Withdraw.

Mr. RALSTON: I ask him to withdraw that imputation.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that I made no such imputation.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my right hon. friend permit that statement from any other hon. member of this house and say that he made no imputation?

Mr. BENNETT: I say that I made no imputation such as the hon. member has suggested.

Mr. HANBURY: Withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not withdrawing anything.

Mr. RALSTON: I ask the Prime Minister to explain what he meant by the words, "what does it represent on the back of it" if it was not an imputation?

Mr. BENNETT: Just what the words say.

Mr. SPEAKER: With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), I must say that I was in the house this afternoon when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) made his statement and as a lawyer of some years standing at the bar I must confess frankly that I certainly did not take the imputation from the remarks of the Prime Minister which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has. If I had taken any such imputation I certainly would have requested the Prime Minister to withdraw. The Prime Minister has stated that he made no imputation in the matter and naturally I must accept his statement. He has stated emphatically on more than one occasion since the question of privilege has been raised that he made no such imputation and that is the statement I am bound to accept.

Mr. RALSTON: I do ask if the words mean anything at all. If they do not contain an imputation why were they used? Those words were immediately followed by the words, "That is the question." What do the words mean if they do not mean to impute what I have just suggested? Can your honour as a distinguished lawyer conceive of any other meaning than the imputation to which I have just referred?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must confess frankly that I do not take the imputation from the words that the hon. member has taken. I am sure he will agree with me that had I taken any such imputation it would have been my duty as Speaker to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw it. But I took no such imputation.

Mr. RALSTON: What do they mean, then?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Prime Minister has stated emphatically that he made no such imputation with respect to the matter, and I must accept his statement.
