Mr. RALSTON: I ask, then, that the words be struck out of the record, if they do not mean anything. I am asking that your honour direct that.

Mr. BENNETT: They are in my record.

Mr. RALSTON: With all due deference to the ruling of Your Honour, I submit that every lawyer in Canada except your honour and the Prime Minister will take the meaning from those words which I have suggested.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) sits beside me and he does not.

Mr. RALSTON: If the Minister of Justice can tell me what they mean, if they do not mean that, I would appreciate it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I certainly did not think that the words contained any such imputation as my hon. friend seeks to find in them. I have had considerable experience in the province of Ontario in the giving and taking of briefs and I have never seen the fee marked on the back of a brief. I know in England it is the custom and practice to mark the brief with the fee.

Mr. ILSLEY: Every lawyer knows that, and that is why he would take the imputation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not believe that is the practice in any part of Canada. I heard the statement made and no hon. member in the house placed the interpretation upon it which my hon. friend does.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) objected immediately afterwards.

Mr. ILSLEY: Every lawyer on this side took that imputation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The reference as to what was endorsed on the brief was an interrogation as to where the brief had come from, nothing more than that. It was an inquiry as to whether it represented this or that interest. I think my right hon. friend is putting the matter entirely beyond reason when he suggests that the Prime Minister made any such imputation.

Mr. RALSTON: I am only taking the Prime Minister's words, based on his knowledge of the practice of solicitors and barristers.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am satisfied that no such imputation existed in the minds of hon. members of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The Minister of Justice said that no one put that interpretation upon the words of the Prime Minister but immediately after they were uttered the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) got up and said:

> I must say that the right hon. gentleman is saying either too much or too little. He has reflected upon an hon. member in his absence.
> Mr. Bennett: I have no right to be interrupted.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I will not sit here and see a colleague misrepresented by anybody and especially by the Prime Minister. I wish to say that the hon. member of whom he has spoken is an hon. member and not open to the kind of reflections that have been made.

The observations of the Minister of Justice fall very flat indeed.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already ruled on the question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: I am speaking to the question of privilege and I have a precedent to quote to your honour.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already given my ruling in connection with the matter and I see no reason to change it. The matter has been dealt with quite fully. The Prime Minister has made an emphatic and clear statement that he did not attribute to the words he uttered the meaning suggested by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. I am bound to accept the Prime Minister's denial of the meaning which has been taken from the words.

Mr. POULIOT: Even if that is your honour's ruling—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: I am rising to a different point of order. My point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is quite in order.

Mr. POULIOT: The fact that the Prime Minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the point of order in connection with which the hon. member proposes to address the chair any relation to the incident we have been discussing?

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell your honour—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member either answer my question or be seated?

Mr. POULIOT: It is from a different angle, sir, and with regard to the decision—

Mr. SPEAKER: My decision having been given, the matter is settled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With all due respect to Your Honour—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I beg your pardon; I can rise any time I like to a point of order. I know the rules as well as any hon. member of this house. I am rising to a point of order directly concerning a question of privilege, and I submit that, as well as with respect to a question of privilege, any hon. member may rise to a point of order with respect to any incident in the course of debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The decision having been once given, the matter is closed.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not rise to discuss your decision at all, Mr. Speaker; I rose to a point of order with respect to the discussion that has taken place, and as a matter of privilege affecting all members. The point is this, with relation to the ruling you gave regarding what had been said by the Minister of Railways about a journalist of the west—your decision thereon. I abide by what Your Honour stated. The question of privilege is this. Two years ago—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Will the hon. member be good enough to state the point of order to which he is now rising.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot state it if I am not allowed to speak. I will be as brief as possible.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. gentleman either to retain his seat or to advise the chair as to the question he is now bringing up for discussion on a point of order. He must not discuss precedents of two years ago.

Mr. POULIOT: I hold Your Honour in high regard and I will abide by the ruling of the chair; and I may say that since Your Honour assumed the chair I have never challenged your rulings. Two years ago—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member please state the question he wishes to discuss on the point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, Mr. Speaker; but I cannot state the point of order by merely opening my mouth. I have to say something.

An hon. MEMBER: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman wishes to address the chair on a point of order he must direct his remarks to the point of order and not to something that happened two years ago.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. The only thing I wish to bring to Your Honour's attention is this fact, that at the request of the Prime Minister himself two years ago—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must state the question on which he is rising to a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: On account of the disturbance I did not hear Your Honour.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must request the hon. member to refrain from carrying the matter further.

Mr. POULIOT: It is a matter of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth inferred, from the observation made by me this afternoon, that I imputed to him financial benefits from the speech he made in this house, I desire to assure him that I made no such implication.

Mr. HANBURY: Just a little belated.

Mr. POULIOT: But, sir—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RALSTON: The language was, a professional engagement of some kind by the acceptance of a brief. If my right hon. friend withdraws that—

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot do that, nor do I propose to do it, for the simple and obvious reason that had he not been a solicitor he would not have been entrusted with the defence.

Mr. RALSTON: I said, "a professional engagement."

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say anything about professional engagement.

Mr. RALSTON: I said that and the right hon. gentleman said he could not withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT: I made no reference to professional engagement.

Mr. RALSTON: The reference is to the acceptance of a brief and what the right hon. gentleman says in effect is that the words to which I have referred, and to which I have taken objection, mean what they say and nothing more, and there is no imputation. Therefore it simply means that they are meaningless, like a good many of the remarks of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: Clearly, if that is the state of mind of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. RALSTON: I have a right to be in such a state of mind and to feel resentment.

Mr. BENNETT: Not nearly so much as I have. What was said, if I recollect, was, "I should like to see what is represented on the brief." Just look at it.

Mr. RALSTON: "What does it represent on the back of the brief?"—on the back of it.

Mr. BENNETT: Now if from that the hon. gentleman concludes that I inferred that he is receiving financial reward for what he said, I made no such inference at all. I was referring to the fact that an eminent counsel practising law in Montreal was making a defence, which was the defence of the particulars of transactions that were not known to him and could only be known from one source.

Mr. RALSTON: That is only adding insult to injury. I spoke in this house, not as a member of the bar, not as a member of the Montreal bar, but as a member of this house, without any thought or intention or idea or motive from a brief or the acceptance of a brief or from any professional qualification or special interest whatever. I say that to you, Mr. Speaker, to this house and to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister. And when he suggests that I accept a brief as a Montreal counsel undertaking a defence, he states what is absolutely false and I throw it in his teeth, and I tell him so.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think there has been sufficient argument on the question of privilege, and the debate might very well continue.

Mr. POULIOT: Rising to a question of privilege and a point of order, what I have to say is this—and I will be very brief in stating the point. The point is this, that two years ago, at the request—

Mr. SPEAKER: While I admire the hon. gentleman's persistence, I must ask him not to proceed further with the point of order along the line he has been following, proposing as he does to discuss something that took place two years ago.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not with regard—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled on the matter and I must ask the hon. gentleman not to persist. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. RALSTON: I call your honour's attention to the fact that my right hon. friend imputed that I was defending someone as a Montreal lawyer, or otherwise, and I say again that I was defending no one whatever, but was endeavouring to defend the people of Canada against the machinations of this government. I ask him to withdraw the suggestion that I was engaged in the defence of anyone. I am asking my right hon. friend to withdraw that imputation.

Mr. BENNETT: He has said all that he proposes to say.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I regret that the Prime Minister does not see his way clear to withdraw the remarks he made.

Some hon MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Let my hon. friends contain themselves a moment. I was present just as the Minister of Justice was present when those remarks were made this afternoon and I am surprised to hear you say, Mr. Speaker, that you could not infer from them that there was an imputation of something that was intended to be derogatory to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. Why were those remarks made? What object is there in them, what could it be, if there was no suggestion that there had been something marked on the back of that brief? It is in keeping with the dignity of the house that those words should be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know whether the hon. member who has just taken his seat was in the house during all the argument.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I heard it all.

Mr. SPEAKER: He will remember that the Prime Minister did withdraw any imputation such as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has suggested, that the hon. member had been paid fees for representing certain interests in the house. I think the statement of the Prime Minister closes that matter.

Mr. RALSTON: My point was that he was suggesting that I was acting professionally in handling a brief in defence of certain interests, whether I was receiving a fee or not. I asked the Prime Minister to withdraw that suggestion. I thought he would, but apparently he has not done so. I am waiting for him to do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I have a right to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw that. It is a direct imputation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member certainly has a right to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw it, but the Prime Minister has a right to withdraw it or not as he sees fit.

Mr. RALSTON: I ask you, sir, to request the Prime Minister to withdraw the statement that I as a professional man held a brief in this house in the defence of certain interests, whether for fees or otherwise.

Mr. SPEAKER: I certainly did not take any such meaning from the remarks of the Prime Minister as made this afternoon. I state that again as I did so previously. Apparently the other lawyers held the same opinion as I did, because there was not a lawyer who got up and raised a point of order at the time.

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking about what the Prime Minister said just a few minutes ago when he said that he withdrew the imputation that I was receiving any fees of any kind, but he renewed the imputation that I as a Montreal lawyer had taken a brief in the defence of certain interests.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is quite legitimate.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the Prime Minister say it is quite legitimate to suggest that a member of the house is, as a professional man, even though he gets no money, taking a brief in the defence of certain interests.

Mr. BENNETT: It is perfectly obvious for an hon. member to make that statement just as it was for the hon. member himself to say "if I am correctly advised;" "if I am correctly informed."

Mr. RALSTON: I am not talking about "if I am informed." I am talking about what the Prime Minister said to-night—

Mr. BENNETT: I have nothing to withdraw as regards what I said to-night.

Mr. RALSTON: —and the imputation that I was speaking otherwise than as a member of the house and quite apart from any professional association of any kind. I have no professional association either for fees or otherwise in connection with the interests to which he refers. I ask the Speaker to direct the Prime Minister to withdraw that imputation.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already stated my position in connection with the matter again and again, and while there is apparently a difference of opinion, I am sure the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has expressed his honest views in connection with this matter. I have taken a different meaning from the words of the Prime Minister; I think the house took a different meaning from that taken by the hon. member, and I am not in a position nor do I feel called upon to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw his remarks, particularly in view of the statement which he has made on more than one occasion.

Mr. RALSTON: I think we are talking about two different things. I have heard what the Prime Minister has said and what you, sir, have said in connection with what he said this afternoon. I am referring to the other reference the Prime Minister made this evening in which he not only insinuated but imputed that I as a professional man from Montreal had taken a brief for the defence of certain interests without any hope of reward, fee or gain or anything of that kind. That is an imputation that I as a member of the house was speaking as a professional man rather than as a member of the House of Commons in the interests of the people I represent. I ask the Prime Minister to withdraw that statement and I request you, sir, so to rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have ruled on the matter more than once on other questions which arose out of this argument. I think the matter has been fully discussed and I do not think anything will be gained by further discussion.

Mr. RALSTON: I have the greatest respect for the chair and for you, sir, but you evidently did not hear what my right hon. friend said when you suggest that the incident is closed by what he said previously with regard to making no imputation. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, as a professional man to consider the imputation which is contained in the suggestion made by the Prime Minister that I as a professional man had taken a brief in the defence of certain interests, even though he withdrew the statement that I had any fee or hope of reward of any kind. That in itself is an imputation on the integrity of a member of the house, on his fairness and open mindedness, and should be withdrawn. I have already denied it and I deny it again.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member has covered the point on more than one occasion. I see no reason for coming to a different conclusion from that which I have stated more than once on both points which have been raised by my hon. friend. So far as I took the meaning of the words of the Prime Minister, during the address which he made this afternoon, he cast no imputation upon the motives of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not the address which he made this afternoon; it is what he stated to-night.

Mr. SPEAKER: And I will add to that, to-night.

Mr. RALSTON: Before the incident is closed and with great respect to you, sir, I feel that the matter is most serious and I respectfully appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member reduce the question to writing?

Mr. BENNETT: I think there is no appeal from a ruling on a question of privilege.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where does the Prime Minister get that?

Mr. POULIOT: On a question of privilege, the Prime Minister is following along the lines of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. When I rose to a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Are we not to enjoy parliamentary rights in this chamber? Here we have Stalin preventing us from defending our rights in parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, you directed the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth to set out his reasons in writing. That is not in accordance with the rules of the house. The question was that the statement made by the Prime Minister was an imputation of improper motives to another member of the house. The member concerned, exercising his privilege as a member of the house, requested your honour to direct the Prime Minister to withdraw those remarks. Your honour refused to do so and we appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Quite frankly, I am not certain whether, because I refused to accede to the request of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw certain remarks, there is any appeal from a decision of that kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the remarks in themselves reflect upon a member of the house. I ask that they be expunged from the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: Quite naturally I am in the judgment of the house, but I do not know whether the appeal will lie. It is apparently a question of interpretation of words that may or may not have been used.

Mr. HANBURY: Nobody's interpretation except the Prime Minister's.

Mr. POULIOT: And he himself cannot understand himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth if he will kindly give me his opinion whether or not there is an appeal on the matter under discussion. I am under the impression at the moment that there is not.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, I am not as well versed in the rules of the house as either your honour or the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition. What I was going to do, should you rule that there is no appeal, is to appeal from that ruling, from which there is no doubt there is an appeal.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to be a rather ridiculous situation.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not ridiculous.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not referring to the merits of the matter; I mean it seems to be a rather ridiculous position for the house to be in, when the Speaker rules that there is no appeal, to say, "I appeal from that decision."

Mr. RALSTON: That has been done before.

Mr. SPEAKER: I accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. The reason I asked that the matter be put in writing was that I myself am in doubt of the exact words of which the hon. member complains.

Mr. HANBURY: Then why did you rule?

Mr. SPEAKER: What are the exact words of which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth complains?

Mr. RALSTON: I have already stated it three or four or five times I think, but in deference to your honour I will endeavour to state again the effect of what my right hon. friend said, because of course we have not the record before us of what was said to-night. I understood my right hon. friend to say that I, as a professional man from Montreal, had accepted a brief in defence of certain interests. He withdrew the imputation that there had been any fee or remuneration or consideration of any kind attached, but the other part is what I objected to and what I ask Your Honour to request the Prime Minister to withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: I say again I have no right to ask the hon. member to withdraw the remarks when I do not impute to them the meaning which the hon. member has placed upon them.

Mr. RALSTON: If it is said that a member is speaking as a professional man and not as a member of this house, surely that is a reflection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely when an hon. member on this side gives his word with regard to any kind of reflection or imputation, which is either directly or indirectly an imputation of motive, it is for the hon. gentleman to accept the word of the hon. member. The Prime Minister should set an example in that respect.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is what we have had to do here all along.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know whether the suggestion I am about to make will meet with the approval of the house. I think the house will agree that I want to do what is right.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Would it be possible that the matter be allowed to stand until I see Hansard and see just what was said?

Mr. HANBURY: The Prime Minister does not deny it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) came in we had a discussion which lasted some time, and there have been arguments pro and con, and I cannot recall the exact words which were used by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister states that he did not impute any improper motive to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, and the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth states that he did. Whether or not the suggestion I make is acceptable—

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to make a suggestion, that is that the Prime Minister himself repeat what he said before. Then your honour will have exactly the words to which I refer.

An hon. MEMBER: No, let Hansard give it.

Mr. SPENCE: Why worry so much if your conscience is clear?

Mr. RALSTON: I have heard the hon. gentleman on the other side; I want to say that my reputation is just as precious to me as is his to him, and I have not been used to this sort of thing, particularly from the right hon. the Prime Minister.

Mr. REID: And they will repeat it, too.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why withdraw?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In a matter of this kind the rights and privileges of every hon. member are at stake. Surely the Prime Minister, who is custodian of the honour of the house, ought to be prepared to set the example that is necessary in a matter of this kind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Had my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition been present during the earlier part of the discussion—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I know what took place.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —I think he would agree that a full withdrawal of any improper imputation against the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth was made.

Mr. RALSTON: There cannot be anything but an improper imputation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Now the new suggestion comes from the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth—

Mr. RALSTON: No, from the Prime Minister.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —that it is a breach of the privileges of this house to say that an hon. member has received a brief on a discussion. I have never heard of that being taken as a breach of privilege on any occasion. The imputation that he has accepted a fee I grant is improper; that has been fully withdrawn. In my judgment the matter ought to be dropped.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Surely an hon. member cannot at one and the same time act as an independent member of parliament and one who supports a brief which he has received.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Can my hon. friend cite any case where that has been called a breach of privilege?

Mr. RALSTON: No one has ever been accused of it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. RALSTON: I have made an emphatic denial of the statement made by my right hon. friend, and I submit that under the rules of this house my right hon. friend must accept my statement. Does my right hon. friend—speaking to my right hon. friend through you, Mr. Speaker—does he decline to accept my statement as a member of this house?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer.

Mr. CAHAN: There are two sides to this. The Prime Minister stated that he withdrew any imputation upon the honour of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman is bound to accept that. But he does not accept it; he is now striving to find some other statement to which he can take exception. If he accepts the statement of the Prime Minister, then this debate should certainly close.

Mr. RALSTON: Apparently my hon. friend has not heard the debate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He has been asleep.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not talking about the imputation which the Prime Minister withdrew or stated he did not make. I am referring to another imputation altogether. I say my right hon. friend has no right to insinuate in this house or suggest that any hon. member is speaking other than as a member of this house, or that he is speaking in a professional capacity. I denied that I was speaking other than as a member of this house and denied that I accepted any brief. I ask my right hon. friend to accept my statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit, Mr. Speaker, you should ask my right hon. friend to accept my statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think we are getting any further with the matter beyond the point at which we had arrived some time ago. I can quite understand the matter from the point of view of the hon. member who raised the question of privilege, but I have already stated, and I state again, that the Prime Minister emphatically stated that there was no such meaning in the words which were quoted by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth as he gives to them. As to what subsequently happened, the exact words used by the Prime Minister I do not know. That is on the second point.

Mr. RALSTON: But, Mr. Speaker, you ruled on them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ruled there was no imputation.

Mr. RALSTON: If you did not get the words how could you make that ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER: I took it from the statement which the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth made.

Mr. RALSTON: With the greatest possible deference I must appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker, because I submit if that is permitted in this house any imputation can be made at any time that hon. members are not speaking in good faith.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) on a question of privilege has stated that certain improper imputations have been directed to him by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I have ruled that there were no improper imputations that were not withdrawn. From that ruling the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth desires to appeal. Have I stated the question correctly?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I understand it, the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has stated on his word as a member of this house that such and such of his own knowledge is a fact, and he has asked the Prime Minister to accept that statement Surely it is the duty of the Prime Minister to accept a statement of that kind by an hon. member, and of your honour to rule that he should so accept it.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the greatest deference, there has been no denial by the Prime Minister. The gist of the complaint of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth, as I understand it, is that the Prime Minister has imputed to him improper conduct. I have ruled that no improper conduct has been imputed to the hon. member, and from that ruling the hon. gentleman has appealed.

Referring to paragraph 282 of Beauchesne I see that the procedure in a matter of this kind usually is to direct the clerk to take down the unparliamentary words to which objection has been taken. That has not been done in this case and I shall endeavour to state the complaint of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth as fairly as possible. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has complained that certain words used by the Prime Minister this evening imputed to him improper conduct as a member of parliament. I have ruled that the words so used did not impute to the hon. member improper conduct, and from that ruling the hon. member desires to appeal.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chair be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the atmosphere of the house is such that it is difficult to make a speech on such a subject as the Companies Act at this hour of the evening, but there are a few observations that I would like to make on the bill. I want to congratulate the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) on the very full explanation that he gave of the bill on the second reading this afternoon and to-night. He took the recommendations of the price spreads commission one by one, stated the reasons why he disapproved or approved of them, as the case might be—he did not approve of very many—and explained the bill very fully.

I do not intend at this stage to deal section by section with the bill that is before us, but I think the time is opportune to review the history of this companies legislation. About a year ago the Secretary of State introduced a bill which he regarded as the last word in a companies act, a bill upon which he put a great deal of time and a great deal of work, which embodied the suggestions he was able to get from the profession, and which he considered was as good a piece of work as could be done by this parliament on company legislation. Members from this side of the house offered certain suggestions. One of those suggestions was that no-par shares should be prohibited. Several amendments were proposed, notably by the hon. member for Last Mountain (Mr. Butcher) who had made a particular study of company legislation, but very few if any of those amendments were accepted by the Secretary of State. That was the first chapter in the attempts of the government to put the Companies Act in shape.

The second was the radio speech of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in the early part of January. In the reform speeches, so called, which went out over the radio in the early part of January the Prime Minister made a great point of the defects in the Companies Act. By implication he attacked the work of his colleague the previous spring. I have his words here, and so that there may be no mistake about it I want to put them on Hansard. Speaking of the Prime Minister the report in the Ottawa Citizen says:

> Turning then to what he termed "the social and economic evil commonly called 'stock watering,'" Mr. Bennett said this constituted a definite impairment of the economic system.
> "Notwithstanding the legislation of recent years, the protection of the investor must be improved," the Prime Minister declared. "It is still inadequate. There must be stricter government regulation of finance in this field so that improper practices may be detected in time and effectively dealt with. The ravages of the promoter who operated in the period of 1922 to 1930 cannot now be repaired. But we can at least see to it that he does not again operate in the same way.
> Our Dominion Companies Act will, therefore, have to be strengthened. There must be drastic simplification of capital structure so that the investor will be able to understand the nature of the stock or security he is purchasing. At the next session of parliament, the Companies Act will be amended so as to abolish the right to issue shares of no par value. The searchlight of publicity must be focussed on every issue of securities offered to the public. Adequate machinery must be set up to inquire into and report on corporate developments which tend towards consolidation and concentration. In other words, the door must be locked before, not after the horse is stolen.
> Between 1922 and 1930 a great many of our people were the victims of practices against which the law provided no adequate safeguards. From time to time, attempts have been made to cure these persistent and recurring evils. None have been wholly effective. The many victims of stock promotion, in the years before the crash, are the certain proof of that. The problem bristles with difficulties. But the government will enact legislation at the next session of parliament which it confidently expects will, with the wholehearted cooperation of the citizens of Canada, stamp out this evil in corporations operating under dominion authority.

Those are the resounding words which the Prime Minister uttered in January last. That is the second chapter in the government's activities in the reform of company law.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Cabinet solidarity.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to refer to the two points stressed by the Prime Minister. The first point was the abolition of shares of no par value, and the second point was the drastic simplification of capital structure so that the investor might be able to understand the nature of the stock or security he might purchase. I have no doubt that the Prime Minister then had in mind the abolition of the right to issue class A, class B and other classes of shares. Those were the two specific reforms the government was going to introduce in the Companies Act. The Prime Minister made an attack by implication upon the work of his colleague the Secretary of State. In the previous spring after the consolidation of the act had been completed the Secretary of State said that that was as good a job as could be done by any parliament.

We come now to the third chapter, the price spreads committee which later became the price spreads commission. This body heard certain evidence, not very much, in connection with the operation of dominion companies. The opinion of the commissioners was that the concentration of business in Canada in the hands of the great corporations was one of the most notable phenomena of the present day. The commissioners then went on to consider what evils might be corrected by amending the Companies Act, and they made certain recommendations. The Secretary of State stood up this afternoon and, if I understood his argument correctly, argued that according to the reference they had no power to consider amendments to the Companies Act. Upon a literal interpretation of the terms of the reference no doubt that would be correct, but broadly speaking they certainly had the power because that is the legislation of which individuals avail themselves when they form themselves into companies. It was impossible to consider intelligently the problems before the commission without giving some consideration to the Companies Act. The Secretary of State said that many other witnesses should have been brought before the commission, that he should have been consulted and that we should have gone about our work in a different way. There may be quite a bit of force in the suggestion that the Secretary of State should have been consulted to a greater extent, but I would remind the house that we sat for fourteen months, with the exception of four months in the summer, and dealt with a wide range of subjects. It was impossible to get as much evidence as we would have liked to get about the matters before us, but after a great deal of discussion the commissioners decided to make certain recommendations, and it is the implementation of those recommendations which is now before the house.

This afternoon the Secretary of State went over this bill, section by section, and subjected it to the most masterly analytic and devastating criticism. I listened attentively to his remarks, and in recent years I have never heard a more able attack upon a piece of legislation than that made upon this bill by the hon. gentleman this afternoon and evening. What is the meaning of this? The hon. gentleman directed his attack to two points. The first was the suggestion that we should abolish no-par shares, and the other was the suggestion that we should abolish classes of stocks. These were the two specific reforms which the Prime Minister advocated over the radio last January, but they were destroyed by the Secretary of State this afternoon in the devastating rebuttal to which he subjected them. Talk about cabinet solidarity, talk about unity of effort, talk about the strong position taken by the government; was anything like this ever heard of before in the Dominion of Canada? Why does the Secretary of State sponsor this bill when he does not believe in it? Why does he sponsor a bill the principle of which he disapproves? I commend to hon. members and to the country generally a comparison of the speech made by the Prime Minister last January and that made by the Secretary of State this afternoon and this evening. I think such a comparison will show how much unity and solidarity there is in the government of the Dominion of Canada at the present time. I can only speculate, but I suppose the government decided in cabinet council that they must make some sort of pretence at carrying out the recommendations of the price spreads commission, otherwise the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) would raise such a row throughout the country that there would be no government; there would be no Conservative party left. I cannot imagine there being any other motive for the exhibition before the house this afternoon.

I felt a little sensitive this afternoon as I listened to the Secretary of State attacking with his masterly ability this price spreads commission report and the legislation based upon it. I realize that there were certain weaknesses in the constitution of the commission and the committee. I do not think I am guilty of violating any confidences when I say that I think we should have had at least one corporation lawyer to advise us. Unfortunately, there is a feeling that most corporation lawyers have a single line of approach. It is believed that their business is to act for persons incorporating companies, for promoters, for investment houses and the like, to see that they do not get into trouble, no matter who else may. It may have been that the judgment of my colleagues was sound when they felt that we should take the line we did and go ahead without the assistance of a highly experienced corporation lawyer.

I have no doubt that there is considerable force in much of the criticism to which the Secretary of State gave utterance this afternoon, but I would point out that there must also be considerable force in some of the criticism which the price spreads commission uttered against the existing Companies Act. The Secretary of State admits this when he introduces this important bill, which amends the legislation which he said last spring was the last word. I should like to refer to some of the recommendations of the commission. Recommendation No. 9 contained in the summary of recommendations reads:

> The prospectus provisions of the present act should be altered to place upon a company and its directors the responsibility for representations made on any offering for general public subscription, whether made on behalf of the company or not. If this change cannot be made through the Companies Act, it should be made a criminal offence to offer for public subscription securities of a company, with federal incorporation if those securities have not been subjected to the prospectus obligations of the Dominion Companies Act.

The Secretary of State has exhibited a great deal of ability in the way he has drafted the sections of this bill to carry out those recommendations. But he has stated that this bill impinges upon the field of property and civil rights, and he states also that he has never been in favour of a dominion parliament filching under the guise of criminal legislation jurisdiction which belongs to the provinces. He sponsors the bill, but he went on to damn practically every section and almost pleaded with the house for leave to withdraw certain parts and to amend others which would destroy to a great extent the effect of the bill. Is this government legislation or is it not? Is this one of the great reforms? I go back to the Prime Minister, who said:

> In other words, the door must be locked before, not after the horse is stolen.

And further he said:

> The ravages of the promoter who operated in the period of 1922 to 1930 cannot now be repaired. But we can at least see to it that he does not operate again in the same way.

And this is the bill that does it. This is the reform promised us over the radio—the reform of the Companies Act of this dominion. The second recommendation is:

> All shares offered, both common and preferred, should bear equal voting rights.

That recommendation must be taken with a grain of common sense, and that grain of common sense is that shares having the same par value or issue price, representing the same amount of investment, must have equal voting rights. The Secretary of State spent a good deal of time attacking the recommendation and the bill—because the bill carries out the recommendation—on the ground that it would never do to give a five dollar no par value share the same voting right as a one hundred dollar preferred share. It does not require an elaborate argument to establish that fact, and if the wording of the commissioners who brought in the report is ambiguous in any respect it is the business of the draftsman advising the government to set right such a detail. The next section is:

> Management shares should be prohibited.

The minister accepts that recommendation without change. The next recommendation is:

> When the management of a company have become aware of the serious impairment of the capital of that company, they should be required forthwith to inform the directors of that fact, who shall be under obligation immediately to call a meeting of shareholders and put the above situation before them.

The Secretary of State spent some time this afternoon pointing out that this was wrongly worded. He said there might be cases of serious impairment when the shareholders should not be told about it. He remembers a case where the capital of a company with which he was acquainted was impaired to the extent of $3,000,000, and if the fact had not been kept from them there would have been a panic. And so he drafts the section, properly, in such a way as to define serious impairment. But the whole matter was done in such a way as to give the impression that those who were on the commission or who made the recommendation had no understanding, or at any rate only a primitive understanding of what they were talking about.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true, isn't it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I imagine we could get a lot of assistance from the hon. gentleman who made that remark. The next recommendation is:

> Directors should be prohibited from speculating in the shares of their companies. They should be required to disclose annually to their shareholders the extent to which they have directly or indirectly purchased or sold their company's shares during the year.

That recommendation the Secretary of State criticized very severely but adopted, and I congratulate him upon the skill with which he defined the word "speculating." He did that very well. Then there is this recommendation:

> The first permanent directors of a company should be held responsible for all business transacted by the provisional directors.

That is accepted, but in such a way that a coach and four can be driven through it at any time; and from what I could gather from the minister's remarks, that is true of a good many sections. In connection with one section he said, "I can think of six or seven ways to get around that section." I do not know, therefore, what to say about this legislation; I do not know whether it is worth accepting or not. I think there are some good features about these recommendations and some good features about the legislation, and I am inclined to think the legislation is a little better than the minister would lead us to believe. His strictures upon his product are a little too severe; this is a sort of baby left on his doorstep by the hon. member for East Kootenay, and he is very much concerned about what to do with the child—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The unwanted child.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, the unwanted child. I would remind him, however, that there are a good many people in this country in whose ears there still resounds that radio speech by the Prime Minister wherein he said, "No longer will there be stock watering in this country; no longer will the horrible conditions that existed between 1922 and 1930 prevail"— not between 1930 and 1935 but between 1922 and 1930. We were told that radical amendments would be made to the Companies Act.

I have two or three criticisms of this bill. I do not believe that the government has tackled the problem of stock watering in an effective way. I do not believe that the Prime Minister, when he delivered his radio speech last January, had in mind any idea as to how to tackle it. If he had anything in mind then, why does he not embody it in legislation, instead of sending the Secretary of State into this house with a measure which he damns, not with faint praise but with positive censure in every sentence of his speech? How will they stop stock watering? We offered two or three suggestions, one of which was that there should be set up a securities control board. The Secretary of State did not say anything about that this afternoon. It is to be through the dominion trade and industry commission, but it is not to sit and function on issues except when directed to do so by the Secretary of State. If we are to have an effective means of stopping stock watering, why did he not state this afternoon what he had in mind? There are certain sections of the bill through which a coach and four can be driven or around which anyone can get if he only exercises enough ingenuity.

When we come to the different provisions of the bill I may have a suggestion or two to make to improve some of the sections. In the meantime I make these general observations on this whole absurd situation. I have never seen or heard anything like it, and I have been in this house since 1926. Possibly I am speaking with a little more heat on this subject than I otherwise would had it not been for the occurrence earlier in the evening, but I want to make any constructive suggestions that can be offered. What can we expect, however, of legislation launched in this pessimistic, deprecating spirit?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Insincere.

Mr. ILSLEY: What can we expect of legislation launched in a spirit which makes it impossible for the legislation to do anything much—under the administration of this government at least—no matter what is said. I do not know whether it is intended to go into committee to-night on the clauses of the bill, but I would suggest that we go into it at a time when more than three members of the price spreads commission are present. It is not for my friend from Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) and myself to defend the legislation against the Secretary of State; it is not for us to give him permission to withdraw it, as he seemed to think this afternoon, when he looked at us and said, "I do hope that hon. members will consider the withdrawal of that section or that amendment so as to make it different from the way I drafted it." The price spreads commission made certain recommendations and he proceeds to tear them to pieces because they are in conflict with his own bill of last spring. And then he says, "I embody them in this legislation but I hope the house will allow me to withdraw parts of the legislation because I think they will do a whole lot of harm."

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. CAHAN: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Tokyo—
Representation, including salaries and allowances for minister plenipotentiary, secretaries and staff, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act or any of its amendments, $68,800.

Mr. REID: When this item was up on a previous occasion, I asked some questions regarding this appropriation and it was allowed to stand for the time being until the Prime Minister's return.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have a note of the questions. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) asked why the government itself did not advance the money and make the payment for the building at the time. Mr., now Sir Herbert, Marler came here on his leave and he expounded to us the very great necessity of a building. Money was then costing us approximately five per cent, and we told him that the pressure of economic conditions was such that we did not feel we could provide the money until there was an improvement in revenue. He said that if we would permit him, he would construct the building and he himself would arrange a loan with the bank at five per cent; which would include charges of all kinds. The last money we borrowed at that time was costing in that vicinity. This year, at the earliest moment we felt we could do so, it will be remembered we placed an item in the estimates of the Public Works department to pay that.

The next question was as to the number of employees in the office. There are twelve employees in all. The other question was as to how many rooms there were in the building. There are thirty-six. I am told by those who have visited Tokyo that the building is excellent, and its cost was within $549 of the estimate given by Sir Herbert Marler. It was felt that while under the circumstances it was a departure from the ordinary rule, nevertheless as we had a very, shall I say inconvenient building at the time, it was desirable, as a site was available, to construct the building that was erected.

Mr. REID: There is a good deal of doubt, especially in British Columbia, whether title to land in Japan is given to foreigners.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as ordinary tenure to individuals is concerned, I cannot say, but so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned, I can say that we have title to the land on the same terms as has the British embassy.

Mr. POULIOT: May I put on record a return given in connection with the Tokyo building? It is dated April 9, 1935, and is as follows:

1. What percentage of interest has the Canadian government paid and still pays for the amount spent for the building of a Canadian legation in Tokyo?

The Canadian government has paid interest at the rate of 5 per cent on the cost to the government of the Canadian legation in Tokyo and will continue to pay interest at that rate until the principal is paid, which is provided for in estimates 1935-36, vote 96—Public Works, chargeable to capital.

2. What was the percentage of interest of the last issue of dominion bonds?

The last issue of dominion bonds previous to the agreement entered into by the government for the purchase of certain lands in Tokyo, Japan, and the erection thereon of buildings suitable for legation purposes yielded, on the two maturities, 5·17 per cent and 5·13 per cent.

The interest yield on the last issue of dominion bonds in October, 1934, was as follows:

2 year bonds, to yield 2·57 per cent.
5 year bonds, to yield 2·90 per cent.
8 year bonds, to yield 3·43 per cent.
15 year bonds, to yield 3·81 per cent.

This is a return, sessional paper No. 326 of this year. What is most extraordinary is that the government for a time was ready to pay five per cent interest on the expenditure for the building when it could borrow money at a much cheaper rate. This was not a sound business proposal, and it was only after the opposition drew the attention of the government to the matter that it decided to pay the capital sum and inserted in the estimates an item of $200,000 in order that no more interest might be paid. This is one more occasion when a constructive suggestion from the opposition is accepted by the government. If it accepted all the suggestions that come from this side of the house, it would be in much better shape now and so would the country.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid that statement cannot be allowed to go uncontradicted. The fact is that long before the return was moved for, the anticipated discussion had taken place in council and provision been made for payment to Mr. Marler for the money advanced.

Mr. POULIOT: What the Prime Minister has said just confirms what I said before.

Item agreed to.

Canada's portion of expenditure of the imperial economic committee and imperial shipping committee and the executive council of the imperial agricultural bureau for 1935, $18,690.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose it is within the knowledge of hon. members that after the empire marketing board ceased to function, a conference was held at London of representatives of the United Kingdom and the various dominions and colonies, and it was arranged that instead of Great Britain paying the entire sum payments should be made by all dominions and by Great Britain. Great Britain made the largest unit payment, Canada the next, then Australia, then South Africa, then New Zealand, and finally one unit was paid by Newfoundland. That committee looks after our imperial shipping interests in connection with insurance matters for instance in Hudson bay and matters of that sort as well as the other items that are mentioned in the appropriation.

Mr. POULIOT: First of all there was a political union among the different parts of the empire and then it became economic. While in London some years ago the Prime Minister said that it was not so much an economic empire that we had, but we had to look for spiritual values and wider hopes—It was not a material thing. This item proves that our union with the British empire rests on an economic basis. When the Prime Minister speaks about spiritual values and wider hopes, this is for the future, but for the present we must rest upon economic matters. This vote shows that he was quite wrong when he was speaking only about spiritual values and wider hopes. We have enough of these hopes for the future. We must look to the present.

Item agreed to.

Expenses in connection with the negotiation of treaties, $9,000.

Mr. POULIOT: This has to do with treaties. Some years ago the Minister of Finance said they had appointed Mr. Breadner to a privileged position because he was an expert in drafting treaties. When he had that job he did not draft a treaty. Now he is out, and we have treaties with different countries. May I ask the Prime Minister who is drafting treaties now that the expert Mr. Breadner is out of his job and on superannuation?

Mr. BENNETT: The government is getting along with the aid of such assistance as it has in the various departments.

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right, but either Mr. Breadner was an expert or he was not. We had the word of the Minister of Finance that he was an expert, and he was appointed to that new job made for himself because he was an expert to draft treaties, but he drafted none. It goes like that. They have no one at their disposal to draft treaties in the proper way, and that is why Canadian trade is going to the dogs.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is it out of this appropriation that expenses are being met in connection with negotiations with the United States for a trade agreement?

Mr. BENNETT: There are no expenses in particular at the moment. The gathering of material and matters of that sort have been done by the permanent staff. When they have to leave Ottawa their living and travelling expenses are paid largely out of this vote. Last year this vote was not wholly expended, and I apprehend it will not be this year.

Mr. POULIOT: Not only that, but may I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that since this government have been in power our loss of external trade has been an average of one billion dollars a year, or three million dollars each day except Sundays, on account of the wrong drafting of treaties, and this government are responsible for that enormous loss. Now they come here like the burghers of Calais with the rope around their necks saying, "We ask for this little vote for the drafting of treaties." Everyone feels indignant over the wrong policies pursued by this government in regard to trade. They have wrecked our trade, they have never realized the importance of external trade. If you go back to what has been happening with regard to our external trade for the last five years you will be greatly surprised. I have here Hansard showing what has been the decrease in our external trade due to the nefarious policies of this government. Those figures have just been put on Hansard. I asked the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day what were our exports to Great Britain, he said: Our exports have been larger. He showed it as the domestic exports. I obtained some figures from the bureau of statistics and from himself, and the figures I got the other day from him were entirely different from those I got previously for the last calendar year from himself and from the bureau of statistics for the same period. What has been the loss in our external trade with Great Britain, and not only with Great Britain but also with other English possessions and countries excepting—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. POULIOT: No, it is not carried like that. I have it here. Sir, we have been told that the Ottawa agreements were a success. How is it the Prime Minister spoke on different lines at Bristol when he unveiled a monument to Lord Durham? He is here listening to me. What did he say? He asked for anonymous postcards, asked the people to send anonymous postcards lodging their complaints with him in regard to the business of Canada. Canada, the weekly published in London, mentioned the fact that he was the first Prime Minister who ever asked for anonymous postcards complaining about his own country. In England no one complains about Canada, but they complain about the way Canada is governed under his leadership. Is it not most ridiculous to think that the leader of the government of this country published an advertisement in the London papers asking the English people to send him anonymous postcards telling him their grievances about Canada? This, sir, is most absurd, it is inconceivable, but it was published in that paper. Was the right hon. gentleman sick at that time? I presume he was because a man of sane mind would never have done it.

The CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. member to withdraw that.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not an assertion, sir, it is a presumption. If it is against the rules of the house I withdraw it. But I find it absolutely absurd. This is a vote with regard to treaties; let us go further with it. What happened with regard to our trade with the United Kingdom? How much was lost each year since this government came into power compared with the last twelve months that the Mackenzie King government was in power? These figures come from official records and no one on the other side from the Prime Minister down can contradict them. The first year he was in power our trade with the United Kingdom was $155,143,483 less. The second year it was $247,341,815 less. The third year it was $226,594,446 less. The fourth year it was $114,375,846 less. Yet they say: We are doing better than the Liberals did when they were in power. The total loss for the four years this government was in power up to August 31, 1934, was $743,455,590. This appears on page 2237 of Hansard. This is how we have lost our trade since this government have been in power on account of the wrong way in which treaties have been drafted since 1930.

Sir, it is very difficult to draft a treaty. It takes experts. You remember that when President Wilson went to Versailles to attend on the drafting of that famous treaty, some provisions of which have been before us in this house this year, he was surrounded by a legion of experts, including the chef of the Waldorf-Astoria. He was surrounded by geographical experts, economic experts and experts in this and that. Who were the experts who accompanied the right hon. gentleman on his numerous trips abroad? They were just freshmen and sophomores without the least bit of experience in regard to the changes that might be made in the drafting of one item in one treaty. Does not the Prime Minister and each of his colleagues realize the importance of the least change in a treaty? Sir, how were the tariff items changed from 1930 to 1933, when for the first time a tariff board was appointed by this government? They were changed at the request of some shortsighted people, the privileged few who were friends of this government and who came here asking for favours. Properly they should have asked for rights, not for favours, because they were asking the Prime Minister and his colleagues to kill the goose that laid the golden egg. During the special session of 1930 the corridors of this house were infested with those birds of prey who made so much money during the war, those well known profiteers who were so close to the government as to be subscribers to Tory party funds. They came here asking for a ransom, and they got it, in the stupid tariff of the special session of 1930. Was that drafted with the care with which a treaty would be drafted? It was not.

During the last campaign we heard a great deal about the treaties with New Zealand and Australia, which were condemned throughout this country. The Prime Minister and his colleagues said everywhere, "We will draft treaties that will fight for you." They drafted policies that fought against the Canadian people. The London conference of 1930, at which all the mistakes could have been mended, was a complete failure because of the attitude of the Prime Minister. It was a fiasco. There the right hon. gentleman met the representatives of the other British dominions, but probably he was not on speaking terms with them. Therefore, there was no agreement with Australia and New Zealand, with whom we had been trading all the time. There was an instance in which the Prime Minister showed that he was not an expert in drafting treaties and coming to agreements with other parts of the British Empire. Afterwards what did we see? We saw the then Minister of Trade and Commerce go to Honolulu to meet the representatives from the antipodes, with whom he arrived at agreements after the Prime Minister and his colleagues, in different parts of Canada, and especially in the eastern townships, had condemned the previous government for importing butter from New Zealand and Australia.

During the three months preceding the election of 1930, huge quantities of butter were imported into this country. In the records of this house will be found a question by the hon. member for Témiscouata, asking who were those who imported such quantities of butter during that period. The Prime Minister rose in his place and said it was not the policy of the government to divulge that information. Is it not true that this butter was imported mainly with the funds of the Tory party in order to lower the price of butter as propaganda against the Liberal party? It was most absurd to import butter at that time, July, June and May, because those are the months during which the production of butter in the antipodes is the smallest. That shows clearly that this butter was imported only for political purposes, and probably that is why the government refused to answer that proper question.

What about those treaties, sir? Is it not right to ask the Prime Minister and his colleagues about their treaties with Australia and New Zealand? During the special session of 1930 they raised the tariff, but a year later they lowered it when the then Minister of Trade and Commerce met the representatives of these countries at Honolulu.

Progress reported.

CORNWALL BRIDGE COMPANY

Mr. J. S. STEWART (Lethbridge) moved:

That pursuant to special order of the house made on the 6th instant the following bill be now read a first and second time and referred to the select committee on miscellaneous private bills, namely Bill letter S-2 of the senate, intituled an act respecting the Cornwall Bridge Company.

Mr. F. T. SHAVER (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I had expected that this bill would come up in the house, and it is my desire to oppose it on second reading. Therefore I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, June 17, 1935

The house met at 3 o'clock.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

EVIDENCE IN APPEAL TO JUDGE FROM RULING OF REGISTRAR OF ELECTORS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 109 to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this another elections act? Are we to have one every day?

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, as the explanation would be somewhat lengthy I prefer to state simply the purport of the bill and give the details on second reading. This bill provides for a new subsection 5 to section 32 of the Dominion Franchise Act which section deals with the hearing by a judge of appeals from the decisions of a registrar. The amendment is to the effect that, in making an order for the retention of names on or the removal of names from the list, the judge must have before him affirmative evidence showing that the person is disqualified and nonresident or that he is qualified and resident. This will affect prospective appeals in connection with 4,000 cases in one constituency alone. The next amendment has been suggested by the law clerks of this house and is to make a change in one word in the French version. The French law clerk says that this is merely a clerical correction. The word "removal" is used in the English version and he contends that this should be translated as "déménagement" intead of "destitution."

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the first amendment referred to by the minister apply to the present revision?

Mr. CAHAN: It will if this bill is passed before June 30. If hon. gentlemen desire me to go into details I am perfectly prepared to do so but otherwise I prefer to leave that discussion until the second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the first reading of Bill No. 106 to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

He said: This bill which comes from the Senate proposes to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act by a clause limiting the time for the bringing of prosecutions. It proposes also to amend the section with regard to probation officers, which section does not apply to Alberta. The government of that province have requested that this section be made applicable to Alberta. There is another slight amendment adding some words to the clause which provides that it is no defence if a child does not eventually become delinquent.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 107, to amend the criminal code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is another bill passed by the Senate. It provides for the amendment of two sections in the criminal code having regard to offences against the delinquency act which now appears in the code. It is to make the bills correspond.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. GOTT:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between the Mininster of Finance or any officers of his department and any minister or official of the Ontario government, regarding the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, since the coming into effect of the said act to date.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. SANDERSON:

For a copy of all the correspondence between the government and Dr. H. M. Tory, concerning the retirement of Dr. H. M. Tory, as head of the National Rerearch Council.

CIVIL SERVICE GRADE FOUR

On the orders of the day:

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL Southeast Grey): I wish to direct to the Secretary of State a question based upon a letter I have received from the Canadian Federation of University Women, signed by Mrs. J. L. Savage. It has to do with the establishment of a new grade of civil servants, grade 4, which seems to provide for the passing of highly qualified university graduates directly into this grade of the service. This letter informs me that only men and not women are to be accepted in grade 4. I should like to have a statement from the Secretary of State.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I shall have to examine the documents and make reply at a later date. I will reply as early as conveniently possible.

B.C. RELIEF CAMP STRIKERS

MOVEMENT OF SOLDIERS INTO CALGARY TO PROTECT GOVERNMENT PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): May we have an answer from the Minister of National Defence as to whether troops were moved into Calgary at the request of the Alberta government or not.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): On the 6th instant the district officer commanding, consequent on information which had reached him, decided to bring back a small party of Lord Strathcona's Horse, thirty-seven in number, to the barracks in Calgary. They were so moved on the 7th. On the 8th the attorney general telephoned him from Edmonton, asking him whether troops were available should they be required. That message was in consequence of a communication which he had received from the mayor of Calgary. The district officer commanding informed the attorney general that troops were available but could not be moved except at his request or in accordance with the proper precedents. He could not supply troops at the request of the mayor of Calgary. The attorney general then informed the district officer commanding that he was then informing him that the situation might become such as would make it necessary for him to request that troops should be provided. The district officer commanding informed him that the troops were there and, if the proper course of procedure was followed, would be made available.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The point then is that there was no direct request from the Alberta government for the movement of these troops.

Mr. STIRLING: It had not reached the situation where the attorney general saw fit to ask for the assistance of troops.

PRIVILEGE—MR. SANDERSON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I rise to a question of privilege. I was not in Ottawa on Friday, the 14th, and on my return to the city this morning I read Hansard of Friday, June 14. I wish to refer to the remarks of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on Bill No. 98, with reference to the Canadian grain board. As reported in Hansard at page 3640, the Prime Minister made a statement in regard to a meeting of the banking and commerce committee on March 22, 1934, a committee of which I happen to be a member. I would bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, the fact that on March 22, 1934, the standing committee on banking and commerce met at four o'clock in the afternoon, adjourned at six o'clock, and had another meeting in the evening at eight o'clock. I assume that the Prime Minister is referring to the afternoon session of that committee, and he is reported as saying:

> The committee voted, with eastern Canada Liberals forming the minority, not to have Mr. McFarland give that information.
> The information is in connection with the holdings of wheat by Mr. McFarland.
> This is from the morning Citizen of March 23, 1934. The following Liberals voted to disclose the figures:
> Hurtubise, Nipissing; Raymond, Beauharnois; Lapointe, Quebec East; Power, Quebec South; Mackenzie, Vancouver Centre; Ralston, Shelburne-Yarmouth; Howard, Sherbrooke; Donnelly, Willow Bunch; Duff, Antigonish-Guysborough. Conservatives, Progressives and the remaining Liberals on the committee opposed the publication.

I take exception to that last remark of the Prime Minister, that Conservatives, Progressives "and the remaining Liberals"—I am referring especially to "the remaining Liberals on the committee"—opposed publication. I am surprised that the right hon. the Prime Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will please state the question of privilege.

Mr. SANDERSON: Am I not within my rights?

Mr. SPEAKER: Not to discuss a statement made by the Prime Minister. If the hon. gentleman wishes to state his position, he may do so.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am attempting to do that. I am only referring to remarks of the Prime Minister on Friday last when he said—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have heard them read by the hon. member, but he was continuing to say that he was surprised at something. Will he be good enough to make whatever correction he wants to make?

Mr. SANDERSON: My surprise is this, that the Prime Minister in referring to a vote of a standing committee of this house, should take the vote from a newspaper rather than from the recorded vote of a committee of the house. I am attempting, if Your Honour will permit me, to refer to the recorded vote.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member kindly state the point to which he wishes to take objection? I presume he wishes to make the correction if he did not vote.

Mr. SANDERSON: I would prefer to make my own statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member be kind enough not to make a speech, but to make the correction he wishes and confine his remarks to that.

Mr. SANDERSON: I am not attempting to make a speech. I want to put on record that I was not at that meeting on March 22 as a member of that committee. I was not in Ottawa and consequently was not at the meeting. The recorded minutes of that meeting—and I have them under my hand—of Thursday, March 22, 1934, show that there were forty-four members present at that meeting out of a total of fifty. I was one of the absentees; I was not there and consequently I did not vote. My point is that the Prime Minister has no right to count me as opposing the motion in regard to publishing the quantity of wheat that Mr. McFarland and his associates had on hand. Had I been at that meeting, I would have voted to publish the report.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has no right to make a statement like that. He can make a correction, but he should not make such a statement.

[Mr. Sanderson.]

CANADIAN GRAIN BOARD

MEETING OF SELECT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER BILL

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister, who is chairman of the committee to which the grain board bill has been referred, if he will kindly advise the house as to when the committee is to be called together?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I am not chairman of it. The committee selects its own chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I assume the right hon. gentleman will be.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman should not make any such assumption. The point is I am not the chairman of the committee; it will select its own chairman, but I have ascertained that the course to pursue is to try to give notice for it to meet to-morrow morning. As my name is the first alphabetically and the convener, I have asked that the members of the committee be communicated with as far as possible to meet to-morrow morning at half past ten o'clock.

AIR TRANSPORTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): In the absence of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion), I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is a fact that the two railways, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, have formed an organization for the purpose of carrying on the business of transportation by air?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I have no advice to that effect, nor had I heard of it until the hon. gentleman raised the question. Both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National were shareholders in Canadian Airways, each having subscribed—and this was I think before we came into office—for $250,000 worth of stock in that enterprise. It is possibly that to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. EULER: It may be.

Mr. BENNETT: That is some time ago.

PERFORMING RIGHT SOCIETY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Might I ask the Secretary of State when he expects to receive the report of Judge Parker who was appointed to investigate charges against the Canadian Performing Right Society? When he does get it, will he make it available to the house?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I have no knowledge of when the proceedings will be terminated. They are being carried on as rapidly as possible and, as I understand, are approaching a conclusion, but so soon as I ascertain that the investigation is closed and I receive a report, I shall announce that fact to the house.

FIRST NARROWS BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): On behalf of the promoters of the First Narrows bridge at Vancouver I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question. This application has been before the government for several months and in the meantime the promoters have spent upwards of a million dollars working on a townsite in West Vancouver. My question is: If as suggested, the south pier of the proposed First Narrows bridge, as shown on the plan, be moved fifty feet north, giving full 1,500 distance between piers, will the government consent and give authority for the promoters to proceed with the construction?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The hon. gentleman sent a note to my office this morning stating that he proposed to ask this question. I have not had an opportunity to look at the map, so I shall endeavour to give him a detailed answer tomorrow. The sole question is whether the north pier is sufficiently far north to prevent the possibility of its being said during the seventy-five years that will elapse in the lifetime of the bridge, that the widest possible channel is not available for navigation in the narrows fairway of the harbour of Vancouver, whether it cannot be moved to a sufficient distance to prevent further dredging to widen the channel. The question from time to time has been whether the pier would be moved so far north that it could not be moved further north, so as to make it impossible to contend that the channel has been unduly narrowed. That is the whole story. At any time the promoters satisfy the government that the pier cannot be moved further north so that the narrows fairway cannot be enlarged in the future, the matter is ended. I tried to make that clear to the hon. gentleman some months ago.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Might I ask the Prime Minister a question? Last week a motion to concur in the report of the committee dealing with old age pensions for the blind was stood over at his request. Does he intend to let it proceed or to make some statement in connection with it?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The matter has been engaging the attention of the government. If the report is adopted in the terms in which it now stands, this involves a radical departure from parliamentary procedure, and no decision has been reached as to just what action should be taken.

MAJOR GENERAL ASHTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I have a question to direct to the Minister of National Defence. Major General Ashton has been appointed chief of staff of the minister's department. What salary will he receive, and if he is on a contract for a number of years, will the minister kindly state the terms?

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): The salary of General Ashton on assuming the duties of chief of general staff is $7,500. It is not under contract.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Senate have made to Bill No. 70, to amend the Weights and Measures Act, several amendments, all of which except one it is desired to concur in. The first amendment is to section 1 of the bill, adding to the statute a new paragraph (f) defining the expression "pre-packaged goods." The proposed amendment is to add the following as subsection 2 of section 1:

(2) Section two of the said act is further amended by adding the following as subparagraph (f):—

(f) the expression "prepackaged goods" or "prepackaged articles" includes any article which is packaged or made up in advance ready for resale in a wrapper or container, and where any article packaged or made up in a wrapper or container is found on any premises where such articles are packaged, kept or stored for sale, the article shall be deemed to be packaged or made up in advance ready for retail sale unless the contrary is proved.

There is no difficulty about that.

The next amendment proposed by the Senate is to section 8 of the bill, page 3, where in line 25 the word "and" is struck out and replaced by a comma in the interests of charity and good English. That amendment may be accepted without question.

The next amendment is to section 10 of the bill, page 4, which amends section 63 of the act which by the bill is repealed and a new section substituted therefor. Section 10 of the bill is the section that sets up new penalties for short weights, measures or counts. In the bill as drafted and passed by this house the minimum penalty for a first offence was a fine not exceeding $50, and the Senate have amended that by reducing the minimum to $10. For a second offence the minimum set up by the bill as passed by this house was $100 and the Senate amendment reduces that to $50. That is accepted.

The Senate have also amended section 10 by adding thereto a new subsection (4) which provides:

(4) No proceeding shall be taken under the provisions of this section in respect of prepackaged goods or articles if the person proceeded against has already been convicted under section twenty-three of the Food and Drugs Act, of a breach of the provisions of section seven, paragraph (f) of the said act in respect of the same goods or articles.

The idea is that a person accused should not be convicted under two different acts for the same offence. I think that is perfectly sound.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister in reading the amendment said section 17, but the amendment reads section 7.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is section 7 of the Food and Drugs Act. Perhaps the right hon. gentleman did not catch my statement. The idea is that if the person against whom the proceedings are taken under the Weights and Measure Act has been already convicted under a similar section of the Food and Drug Act no proceedings shall be taken on the same set of facts. The two acts more or less overlap, and that amendment I think is quite in order.

But the Senate have added a further subsection (5) to section 63 of the Weights and Measures Act with respect to an alleged deficiency of weight or measure of prepackaged goods. I will read the amendment as passed by the Senate:

(5) In any proceedings under this act in respect of an alleged deficiency of weight or measure of any prepackaged goods, the court shall disregard any inconsiderable variation in the weight or measure of a single article, and shall have regard to the average weight or measure of a reasonable number of other articles of the same kind, if any, sold or delivered by the defendant, or in his possession for the purpose of sale or delivery, on the same occasion.

Very considerable thought has been given to that proposed amendment by the departmental officials. The subsection put into the act by the Senate is substantially similar to a section of the imperial Sale of Foods Act, 1926 (Weights and Measures) 16 and 17 George V, chapter 63, and was placed in the imperial act as "a safeguard to traders." In the imperial act this safeguarding section is unquestionably justified, as that act establishes two offences: (a) sale of prepacked article short weight; (b) having in the trader's possession for sale or delivery, prepacked article short weight. Section 10 of the imperial act gives weights and measures inspectors authority to inspect prepacked articles and to compel the sale of any short weight article disclosed on any such inspection. In view of the offence created by paragraph (b) mentioned above this safeguarding section is quite reasonable.

It is pointed out that the Canadian Weights and Measures Act establishes only one offence, namely, sale by short weight, and the weights and measures inspectors, if short weight in prepacked goods is disclosed upon inspection, have no authority to compel sale to secure evidence of an offence, such as they have in the English act.

In this connection I am advised by the field officers that the trader generally refuses to sell short weight prepacked articles to them for evidence, in which he is quite within his rights in our statutes. It is submitted that this safeguarding section is unnecessary and should be deleted. Should it remain it is pointed out that the enforcement of section 63 as amended by the Senate is going to be seriously handicapped and the courts placed in a quandary in applying this section to any offence taken to prosecution, in which the accused may set up the defence that the articles in question were prepacked and claim the protection of the section.

The offence of sale by short weight under our act is disclosed by test purchases made by the independent shoppers. In a test purchase of four items, should two be short weight an offence is undoubtedly established. If these two short weight items be "prepacked" then this section applies, and the following difficulties will have to be considered: (a) How can the article in hands of an independent shopper be identified as a prepacked article (b) How can "reasonable number of other articles of the same kind"—that is the language of the section—be inspected and found short weight "on the same occasion"—those are the words in the English act—when only one was purchased.

I need only point out that difficulty to gentlemen of the legal profession to have them appreciate the point (c) Should the short weight item be brown sugar for instance, would a package of tea short weight for the second item be an "other article of the same kind" under this section? (d) Would short weight in the trader's store, found on an inspection after the test purchase was made, be on "the same occasion"? These difficulties as set out, it is submitted, practically nullify section 63 of the act in so far as it applies to its enforcement against prepacked articles, and it is thought by the officers of the department that we cannot accept the Senate amendment.

Other amendments made by the Senate are such as can readily be accepted. For instance, section 15, page 5 of the bill, has been amended by the Senate by inserting the words "guilty of an offence and." Also the same words have been inserted in section 16 after the words "shall be" in line 7. I may say that I suggested the insertion of these words myself but the draftsman said they did not matter and he overruled me as I did not like to enforce my own opinion against his.

The next amendment is to section 17, page 6 of the bill, where the Senate have struck out the section altogether, and the officers of the department agree that section 80 of the existing act should be repealed. That has to do with the sending of inspectors from one district into another. If the section is repealed the limitation which was on the authority of the inspectors to go from one district into another will be removed entirely. The section as drafted in the bill gave authority for the inspectors to go in, but it is pointed out that if we repeal the section altogether there will be no question about their authority.

Then the Senate have amended section 18, page 6 of the bill, by inserting the word "lawfully" in line 26 of the new section 82A. I would have assumed no regulation would be of any effect unless it was made lawfully, but if it is considered that the word "lawfully" should be used, of course there is no objection.

The Senate have added another section to this bill at the end thereof, section 19.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no section 18 in the original act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think there is.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think that was added when the bill was in committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, it was. Section 81 (a) was added in committee and the bill was reprinted before it went to the Senate. A new section 19 was added by the Senate, as follows:

The said act is amended by inserting the following section immediately after section eighty-two thereof:

82a. In prosecutions under sections sixty-three and sixty-four of this act—

Those are the short weight and unjust scales sections, the two important sections of the act.

—although absence of mens rea shall not be a defence it may be deemed to affect the amount of penalty to be imposed in the circumstances and as to that issue it may be proved.

It will be recalled that in the Canadian Weights and Measures Act there is no necessity of proving intent to deceive. In the English act they have inserted the principle of mens rea. This is a compromise position, I should say, between the two points of view. The officers of the department take the ground that if you have to prove guilty intent you will never get a conviction. This proposed amendment provides that while it is not necessary to prove guilty intent the absence of mens rea may be taken into consideration by the magistrate in amelioration of the offence. I think perhaps that is quite right, and I think this house will agree to the amendment.

I think I have covered all the amendments, with one possible exception. In section 16, amending section 77 of the act, they have added the words, "guilty of an offence" in the twenty-first line. That is agreeable to the government. In view of that, therefore, I move:

That all the amendments made by the Senate to amend the Weights and Measures Act, be concurred in except subclause (5) of section 10, proposed to be added to the bill by the sixth amendment, which is not agreed to for the following reasons:

If allowed to stand, this section would practically nullify section 63 of the Weights and Measures Act in so far as its enforcement in connection with prepackaged articles is concerned.

Evidence of short weight under the Weights and Measures Act must be obtained by a test purchase, usually made by independent shoppers.

Such being the case, it is pointed out that to get the "average weight or measure of a reasonable number of other articles of the same kind on the same occasion" is clearly impossible. It is not practicable to purchase what might be considered "a reasonable number of articles of the same kind" and an inspection of prepackaged articles in a store by an inspector, either before or after the making of a test purchase, is not "on the same occasion."

The trader is adequately safeguarded against picayune or vexatious prosecutions, by the fact that all proceedings under section 63 of the act must receive the consent of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in writing.

The amendment proposed by the Senate is substantially the same as section 10 of the imperial Sale of Foods Act. In addition that act provides that an inspector can compel the trader to sell him short weight articles as evidence for prosecution when short weight in prepackaged articles is found on inspection on the trader's premises.

Such authority is not contained in the Canadian Weights and Measures Act, which renders the proposed amendment unnecessary while making the enforcement of section 63 extremely difficult in so far as prepackaged articles are concerned.

And I should add:

And that a message be sent to their honours acquainting them with the attitude of this house.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I regret that under our rules we do not go into committee on these amendments, and that they are not subject to debate. I believe there is another bill coming down to which fifty-three amendments have been made, and I do not think we can adequately consider those amendments without going into committee on them. I should like to ask the minister, if he will allow me to do so informally—I know I am not within my rights—if it would not be better to put in the English translation of those words "mens rea." Some of these prosecutions no doubt will be conducted before justices of the peace, and it is hard to explain to a couple of country J.P's in a remote place, just what mens rea means. It would be quite easy to put in the correct English interpretation, so why not do it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may be allowed to speak, I would refer my hon. friend to any legal gentleman in the house, who probaby will tell the hon. gentleman that the term is so well understood in the legal profession that I do not think we should change it. I suppose "guilty intent" would be a fair interpretation or translation of the words, but I think we had better leave them as they are. I think everyone knows or should know what mens rea means.

Mr. NEILL: I am willing to gamble a small sum with the minister that the average country justice of the peace could not give a correct definition of mens rea.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

ADMIRALTY ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 88, to amend the Admiralty Act, 1934.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are two amendments proposed. The first is to correct what was evidently a mistake in the act passed last year, in section 24, where the word "debtors" was inserted where the word "creditors" should have been inserted. The second amendment is in regard to appeals from a local judge in admiralty. The bill as passed provided for an appeal to two judges of the exchequer court. The president of the exchequer court has informed us that it is very seldom that both exchequer court judges are in the city of Ottawa at the same time, since they have to travel about the country, and he requests that the act be left as it was formerly, with the appeal to one judge of the exchequer court.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING MINISTER OF FINANCE TO RAISE FUNDS FOR REDEMPTION OF SECURITIES

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars, for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada, and for purchasing and withdrawing from circulation unmatured securities of Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the minister if there is any substantial change from the resolution passed last year?

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Chairman, this resolution and the bill which will be founded upon it are in precisely similar terms and amounts to the borrowing bill passed in the year 1933. It will enable us to take care of maturing obligations and certain refunding operations, as the opportunity may present itself during the course of the year, and projecting into the following year. It merely makes provision for the necessary legislative authority for such funding and refunding.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Has the minister before him the details of the amounts refunded by the administration during the last year?

Mr. RHODES: I am sorry I have not at the moment, but I shall give the hon. member the information when I move second reading.

Mr. EULER: What sums actually mature?

Mr. RHODES: On June 11, treasury bills falling due amount to $35,000,000; on June 22, treasury bills to the amount of $15,000,000; July 1, debenture stock, school lands, to the amount of $33,293,470.85; July 15, treasury bills, $15,000,000; August 1, one-year treasury bills, $50,000,000; October 15, a maturity of $25,000,000, and on the same date $89,393,000, making a total of $262,686,470.85. Those are maturities in Canada.

Then, in New York on August 1, there is a maturity of $874,000; on September 1, one-year notes, $50,000,000; January 30, 1936, treasury bills dated August 30, 1934, $2,737,986.67, and on February 1, 1936, a loan of $40,000,000 falls due.

Mr. EULER: What is the total?

Mr. RHODES: The two amounts, that is the total of the maturities in Canada and New York, make $356,298,457.52. As a matter of fact, at the moment we have not legislative authority to refund anything like that sum. Then, in addition to that there are maturities of Canadian National Railways obligations.

Mr. EULER: I should like to draw attention to what some of us have advocated in the past, repeatedly, namely, that the government should undertake the refunding of unmatured obligations at a lower rate of interest. I would be very glad if one might infer that with the amount over and above the actual maturities of about $400,000,000 the government intends at least to attempt to refund obligations they are not compelled to refund, with a view to getting interest rates down. I wonder if the minister would tell us whether or not in the resolution there is anything more than he has already indicated. Is it merely asking the same authority which was given last year, under which they did not exercise the powers given—powers which I would like to see exercised, no matter which party may be in power.

Mr. RHODES: The government is eagerly availing itself of every opportunity to exercise the callable provisions in bond issues which, at the moment, it is in a position to do. The hon. member will realize that wherever possible we have always sought to refund, and have been very successful in that respect. I have not the figures before me at the moment, but upon second reading I shall present figures which will indicate that we have made very substantial savings in interest, and I believe we have not lost any available opportunity to refund so as to take advantage of the market situation, and we have always refunded at a lower rate of interest.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Have any tax free bonds matured during the present year?

Mr. RHODES: Speaking offhand I think, not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On second reading would the minister give details as to dates of maturity?

Mr. BENNETT: I believe it is 1937.

Mr. SPENCER: Is it the intention of the minister to take full advantage of the clause in the Bank of Canada Act permitting us to borrow. It is well known, of course, that the only money which goes to the shareholders is the 4½ per cent, and that the profits beyond that will come back into the treasury. Therefore, to the extent borrowing is done through that system it will be done in the cheapest possible way.

Then, I should like to ask the minister this question: Does he intend to do any borrowing outside of Canada? Personally I am opposed to the dominion government borrowing, at all. However if it is going to borrow I hope it will do so within and not outside of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: I regret I was unable to hear the first portion of the question, but I shall consult Hansard and answer upon second reading. With respect to the second portion of the question, which I did hear, I must advise the hon. member that in every instance, where possible it has been the policy of the government to issue only in Canada and to have our maturities payable in Canadian funds. The hon. member will realize that if we have maturing obligations in London or in New York we may not at that time be the arbiter as to the character of the new issue. The fact of the matter is that if they are payable in New York they are payable in New York funds, and if they are payable in London they are payable in London funds. However in all instances wherever possible it is the policy of the government to refund in Canada and in Canadian funds.

Mr. BENNETT: In addition to what the Minister of Finance has said with respect to callable bonds, the hon. member for North Waterloo must also know that the price at which bonds have been sold permits such a low yield that it would not be possible to purchase them in the open market and retire them at a lower rate of interest. That condition we experienced two years ago, when the price of bonds became very high and the yield rate became very low, making it impossible to purchase outstanding issues, because they were then being sold on the basis of the current value of money.

Mr. EULER: I believe the resolution provides for an amount of about $400,000,000 in excess of the amounts maturing. I take it from what the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have said that they will deal only with those bonds that are callable. Perhaps the Prime Minister is quite right when he states that at the moment returns are so small one cannot buy outstanding bonds and refund them. What I was going to ask was this: Is there an amount as large as $400,000,000 that is callable? I would judge there is not that much outstanding that is at all callable, because I understand the greater part of our obligations are not callable.

Mr. RHODES: I shall be glad to give complete details upon second reading.

Mr. SPENCER: In what are these moneys going to be paid? Are they going to be paid in gold, or in anything the dominion government may decide to pay them?

Mr. RHODES: Maturing issues?

Mr. SPENCER: Yes.

Mr. RHODES: They will be paid in the terms of the document.

Mr. POULIOT: Will the $750,000,000 include the redemption of tax-free bonds?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member for Témiscouata will appreciate that we seek only the ordinary and customary legislative authority to enable the government from time to time to fund and refund.

Mr. EULER: I have in my hand a bill of the Bank of Canada issued since we went off the gold standard. It contains these words, "The Bank of Canada will pay to the bearer on demand." What would happen if I were to demand payment for this one dollar bill? What would I receive for it?

Mr. RHODES: The hon. member would receive that which is legal tender, according to the terms of the statute.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

Mr. POULIOT: I regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has not decided to redeem the tax-free bonds outstanding, even though they mature in 1937. It is most absurd that the government should lose this large amount of income. The suggestion has come from this side of the house in order that the revenue should be increased. The government should follow this suggestion as it would be appreciated throughout the country. I ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who were holding these bonds but I received no answer. When the by-election was being held two years ago in Restigouche-Madawaska I told the electors the particulars of the questions I had asked to which I had received no satisfactory answers. The limit of taxation has been reached and as the Prime Minister said, not this year, not the year before but two years ago, it is time that those who have the money should pay. At the present time those who have no money have to pay it all. This country is becoming alarmed because of the advantages given to the privileged few who are exempted from taxation while the common man, the man on the street has to pay for everything. Even members of parliament who have no means at all have had a cut of ten per cent in their indemnity until this year, when it was reduced to five per cent. We must pay this while our responsibilities are so great. The government should be strongly censured in this connection.

Mr. RHODES: Whether it was wise to issue these bonds tax-exempt is a matter beside the question but the fact is that they were issued tax-exempt and we must honour our obligations in that respect until they mature. This government has issued no tax-free bonds nor have any been issued for many years. If my hon. friend would apply his very astute mind to the problem of finance I can assure him that he will discover that if we were to go into the open market to buy these bonds at the price at which they are now selling we would lose money. That procedure would cost us much more than to redeem them at par value when they mature in 1937. It is a question of dollars and cents and if the government could save money by entering a transaction of that kind it would gladly do so.

Mr. POULIOT: That is a very nice answer but it is ambiguous. One must consider the time when these bonds were issued. They were issued during the war to give an opportunity to the profiteers and the sharks to take advantage of the treasury of this country by not having their profits taxed. It must be remembered that it was the Tory union government which issued these tax-free bonds in order to give a chance to the profiteers to keep their profits without carrying a part of the burden of taxation. This is what was done with loan after loan. The government was not imposing much taxation, it was borrowing money and the next Liberal administration had to look after the payment of the debt of Canada which was out of all proportion.

We hear a lot about the sanctity of contracts but what about the sanctity of the British North America Act which has been destroyed by this government. This government has had no regard at all for the constitution of this country but when it comes to protecting profiteers they invoke the sanctity of contracts. It would seem as though the Minister of Finance was a high priest. This government reminds me of Lytton Strachey who spoke about a crank who thought he was Adam, Melchisedec and the Lord himself. That is what the Prime Minister thinks, that he is Adam, Melchisedec and the Lord himself but it does not impress me at all. I can speak just as loudly as he can. Very often the Prime Minister speaks in a loud tone to prevent people from seeing that his knees are trembling. I can speak just as loudly as he can; I do not suffer from a heart attack and he does not either; I can speak even louder than he can. I want to be heard by all hon. members, I want to be heard by the Prime Minister even though he feigns sleep at the moment. Let me wake him up when I tell the people of this country that he cannot protect the profiteers by being unwilling to redeem these tax-free bonds.

Mr. SPENCER: Are all the tax-free bonds falling due in 1937?

Mr. RHODES: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Rhodes thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 110, to authorize the raising by way of loans of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

ADMINISTRATIVE, ADVISORY AND INVESTIGATORY FUNCTIONS—PROVISION FOR A DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 11, consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) for the second reading of Bill No. 86, to establish a dominion trade and industry commission.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Can the minister give us the figures in connection with the fines levied under the various acts referred to in subsection (h) and particularly under the Weights and Measures Act?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not those figures here but I can supply them to the hon. gentleman. I gave certain figures when the weights and measures bill was under consideration with respect to fines collected but I shall be glad to furnish the hon. gentleman with full information. He could get it himself from the public accounts but I do not want to put him to that trouble.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Officials of tariff board to be officials of the commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish to add a subsection for the protection of those members of the staff, under the Combines Investigation Act, who are now being transferred to the tariff board. The amendment has reference to the question of superannuation, and I think it is only fair that these employees should be protected in the manner proposed. I would therefore ask my colleague to move:

That section 9 of Bill No. 86, an act to establish a dominion trade and industry commission, be amended by adding the following subsection as subsection (3):

(3) A civil servant who prior to or at the time of his appointment under the Tariff Board Act was or is a contributor under the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act shall be eligible, notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, to continue to be a contributor under the said act; his service under the Tariff Board Act shall be counted as service in the civil service for the purposes of the Civil Service Superannuation Act and he, his widow and children, or other dependents, if any, shall be eligible to receive the respective allowances or gratuities provided by the said act; and in the event of his being retired from his office or position under the Tariff Board Act for any reason other than that of misconduct, he shall be eligible to receive the same benefits under the Civil Service Superannuation Act as if his office or position had been abolished.

The employees of the tariff board are not under the Superannuation Act but certain bodies of civil servants being about to be transferred to the tariff board are under that act and their rights should be protected. If this section is not adopted they will not be permitted to continue contributing to the superannuation fund.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not make any difference to the present employees of the tariff board?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; the present employees of the tariff board are not under the Superannuation Act. A group of employees under the Combines Investigation Act—the registrar and his staff, for whom we vote a sum every year—are about to be transferred by this bill to the tariff board. They are now under the Superannuation Act, and I am advised that unless an amendment of this kind is inserted, while they will be still under the Superannuation Act after their incorporation into the tariff board, they will not be permitted to contribute further to the fund and therefore will not be entitled to the increased superannuation which they would receive if they continued their contributions from now on. They would be in a static condition. It is only fair, I think, that they should be allowed to continue contributing. This is for their benefit and nothing else.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will these clerks be transferred with the same classification and the same salary which they enjoyed in the past?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I cannot answer that question; I do not know enough about classifications in the civil service. They are going into the tariff board and I assume that the chairman of the board will deal with that; and the civil service commission will no doubt have something to say. These employees are under the civil service commission.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is why I asked the question—whether they were going to be transferred with the same classification.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would say so, but I am not in a position to answer with certainty.

Sir EUGENE FISET: The minister realizes, of course, the awkward situation that will arise. They are being transferred from a permanent department to a department that does not come under the civil service commission, and provision is being made simply for their pension. They are going to contribute five per cent towards their pension, notwithstanding the salary they may be receiving later on. But how will they be classified? Will they continue to be under the civil service commission for purposes of classification or promotion? It is rather a queer situation which the minister is creating.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My understanding is that they are now under the Civil Service Act and I assume they will continue to be, but the hon. gentleman is asking me to give an opinion on a matter of law, and I cannot do so without consultation. I assume, however, they will continue to be in the same classification they now hold, unless the commission orders otherwise.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is all I was asking. Their future classification will depend entirely on the commission.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I understand that all those who are now employed in the Combines investigation activities will be taken over?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is the intention.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the minister propose any amendment to this act which will enable the present registrar under the Combines Investigation Act to continue to make investigation himself?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have given some consideration to the question but I am not announcing any amendment at the moment. The commission under this act will make preliminary investigations. It may be that it will be necessary at some future time to have some arrangements made for the conduct of preliminary investigations, but we have not set up any tribunal at the moment apart from the commission itself.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is a distinct step backward. I know that the act contains a provision by which any one of the commissioners may make an investigation, but none of them has the experience of the present registrar of combines. I suggest that the commission should be enlarged so that the present registrar of combines should have the status of a commissioner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The present registrar, who will go into the staff of the tariff board, may be used for that purpose if the commission so decides. There is no reason why that should not be done. The question of enlarging the personnel of the commission is one to which the commission itself will give consideration if, as and when they meet with difficulty, not being able to devote to matters the time considered necessary. At the moment, I understand, it is the view of the chairman of the commission that he will be able to do this work in addition to the work he now performs, notwithstanding the opinion expressed in other quarters.

Mr. YOUNG: What advantage is it to transfer the activities of the combines investigator and his staff to the tariff board, if they are going to be transferred also and do the same work?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That opens up a very large question. The royal commission advocated that the work of administering this act should be transferred to a commission and they also advocated the setting up of what is considered to be a very expensive commission. The whole matter was considered most carefully, and it was decided that the tariff board as presently constituted or as it might be constituted hereafter was admirably fitted for the work of this commission including investigations under the Combines Investigation Act. I would suppose that it would perhaps be better fitted for the work of administering that act than would the registrar himself who, while he has had a very wide experience under the act since he went into that department, is not a lawyer. But I would point out that there will be the advantage of having all the experience and ability of the registrar, an officer under this board. This was an effort to meet the principle of the recommendation of the royal commission without going to the expense of setting up a new commission.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It strikes me that the suggestions made by the hon. member for Hants-Kings as well as by the hon. member for Weyburn deserve a good deal of consideration when we are making the changes that are now being made. The tariff board was established under an arrangement by which a tariff board was to be established to perform certain duties. At times that board with the duties it now has, will be very busy. At times in the past the party who is investigating, the registrar, or in some cases where he did not make the investigation, some other investigator, has had to spend days and, I might say, months on one investigation. The act is so important and the investigations are of such an important character that to say that the tariff board should conduct those investigations is going to create difficulty in the case of long investigations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know that I can add anything to what I have already said. That is a matter of point of view. Perhaps it might be necessary to do something another year in regard to it if the difficulties that are suggested arise. At the moment it is not thought there will be any difficulties.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On section 13—Duties of commission.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think this section is a mistake. It proposes to transfer to a commission, which is to be the tariff commission as has just been said, the administration of the Combines Investigation Act. The minister a moment or two ago stated that the government was seeking to carry out the recommendations of the royal commission on price spreads.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is not quite what I said; there was a limitation on that. If the right hon. gentleman will permit me, what I said was that the bill sought to carry out the report of the royal commission without setting up a new commission. I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That only strengthens what I was about to say. The essence of the report as I read it, is that the Combines Investigation Act is the important act, and what the commission recommends is that its provisions should be strengthened as much as possible. Had the government extended the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act so as to put its administration under a commission specially qualified and appointed for that purpose, it would then have been carrying out the intent and purpose of the royal commission in the matter. But what the government is doing now, instead of appointing a commission that will be primarily charged with the important function of administering the Combines Investigation Act, as was the price spreads commission's intention, is to place that act under a body already in existence for the purpose of dealing with the tariff, thereby subordinating the Combines Investigation Act and the carrying out of its provisions in a very material way. In other words, the tariff board has already pretty much all the business it can attend to if it is going to attend to it properly. It will be found, I think, if the tariff board is asked what length of time it will take to complete the work it has already on hand, the reply will be that there is enough on hand at present to keep the board busy for another year. To add to the functions of the board the business of carrying out the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act is simply to sidetrack the Combines Investigation Act altogether. The Combines Investigation Act is the important measure, and while there may be the strongest reasons for extending its provisions in a way that would serve to bring into being a special commission in the nature of a trade and industry commission to carry out the provisions of the act more effectively, this particular method of dealing with the matter is, as I have said, simply negativing in large part the benefits that already exist under the act.

Members of the tariff board are, I think admirably qualified for some of the work they are doing at the present time; at least the chairman is; I am not speaking of the other members. But I question very much whether even the chairman has the sympathy with the Combines Investigation Act that will incline him to give most of his time and attention to its provisions, rather than to deal with matters affecting the tariff as he has been accustomed to doing since his appointment to that office. The administration of the Combines Investigation Act is of such importance that whoever has charge of the administration of that measure should be particularly concerned with protecting the public interest in the manner in which the act makes evident it was the intention that the public interest should be protected; in other words, that the interests of the community at large should in every particular override where they come into conflict with those of any special interests. I may be wrongly informed, but if I am not mistaken the chairman of the board himself has been acting for some of those interests in the past, not that I believe this would make the slightest difference to his attitude in administration, but it does suggest that in the government's mind there has not been the effort to secure for the administration of the Combines Investigation Act the type of person who the public generally would feel was the one who should be specially charged with the administering of that measure. What I want to stress is that the tariff board with what it is already doing has just about all it can do if it is going to do that properly. Under this bill it is not merely the administration of the Combines Investigation Act that is being added to the duties of the tariff board; it is going to have to do with the administration of such other matters as price and production agreements, commodity standards, prosecution of unfair trade practices, fair trade conferences, cooperation with boards of trade, investigation into general economic and social conditions, and the supervision of security issues. When all of these obligations are added to the board's present obligation, I think the Combines Investigation Act will pretty well fade out of the picture.

But may I point out to the minister that the tariff board has already had the power to hold inquiries similar to those which are being held under the Combines Investigation Act, but in all the years the tariff board has been in existence, nothing of that character has been referred to it or attempted by it. Subsection 4 of section 4 of chapter 55 of the statutes of 1931, establishing the tariff board, reads as follows:

> The governor in council may empower the board to make any investigation or hold any inquiry authorized by the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, or of a relative nature, and for these purposes the board shall have all the powers, authority and jurisdiction vested in the registrar or in a commissioner appointed under that act to hold investigations.

The tariff board has already all these powers and there is no need to confer these powers upon it for the administration of the Combines Investigation Act because the board already has those powers, although it has never exercised any of them. If the government had reason to feel that the Combines Investigation Act was not being administered as effectively as it should be by those in charge of it, it might have taken advantage of this provision, but it never did do so. It can do so in future, under existing legislation, if it so desires. While I sympathize with the government's desire in not wanting to have an undue number of commissioners, it seems to me that they have appointed new commissions where there was no need of any, and here where there would be justification for enlarging the provisions of the Combines Act to place its administration under a commission specially for that purpose, in view of the obligations cast upon it, they are taking the opposite step. I think the government is making a great mistake.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I have listened to all the observations of the right hon. gentleman and I have no fault to find with the manner in which he has voiced his criticism, but it was for the very reason that the tariff board already had jurisdiction that parliament thought the board would be the proper body to take over these duties rather than setting up a new commission. It is a matter of opinion whether the tariff board as presently constituted or as it may be constituted in the future is the proper body to do this work, but parliament has already put its approval on that, and from my knowledge of the chairman of the board extending over a period of thirty-five years, ever since he was at the same university with me, I think he is admirably qualified to do the work of investigation and carry out to the fullest degree the administration of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. EULER: If he has time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My hon. friend says he has no time.

Mr. EULER: If he has time, I said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I beg pardon. There is much virtue in an "if." The chairman of the board thinks that with the necessary assistance that will be given to him by the transfer of the staff, that work can be done. I do not think the right hon. gentleman has any right to assume that the work of investigation under the Combines Investigation Act will be subordinated to the present work of the tariff board. I think we have the right to assume that a board with the character of that board will carry on conscientiously and do whatever work comes to their hands to the very best of their ability. For the moment I think we can very well allow this phase of the bill to go through, and then if it is found that they cannot do the work it will be very easy at another session to add one other member to the personnel of the board. It might be a legal man or one versed in combines investigation work, or the board might act in two divisions. That is what I have had in my mind since I have been delegated to take charge of this bill. I do not think anybody ought to question the ability of the tariff board to do the work. It is merely a question of operating, and if it is found that they have not the time to do it, it would be a simple matter to set up another commissioner and perhaps have the board work in two divisions, as has sometimes happened on the railway commission.

Let us try this for a year anyway. As the right hon. gentleman says, the tariff board has already been clothed with these powers of investigation of combines, although that question has never been referred to them because there was the machinery set up under the Combines Investigation Act; but if that were the intention of parliament at the time the tariff board was created this is quite in line with that intention. If we can save three or four hundred thousand a year which I anticipate would be spent if we set up a new and expensive commission I think we ought to do it. We may be accused of parsimony. I think it would cost a substantial sum of money to set up a new branch. There is the sum of $22,000 in the main estimates this year for the present staff of the registrar. In addition it will cost probably $100,000 for investigations under this statute because you will have to hire auditors and certified accountants and others, and there will be travelling.

I think this is a reasonably good start, and I do not think there is any doubt as to the ability of the tariff board to carry on the work. With all due respect I do not think it is correct to say that this important work in connection with the Combines Investigation Act will be in any degree subordinated to other work of the tariff board.

Just one other observation. The chairman of the tariff board, although in days gone by a very active practitioner, has never shown that he has been influenced in the slightest degree by his former associations. That is one thing we are proud of in the judges we appoint, that they entirely dissociate themselves from the associations of their private practice the minute they go on the bench. I do not think my hon. friend meant just what he said in that connection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree with what my hon. friend says in that regard.

Mr. YOUNG: I cannot see how you expect to save three or four hundred thousand dollars a year by this arrangement. The great bulk of the expense in connection with the establishment of the trades and industries commission will not be the salaries of the commissioners themselves but of the enormous staff that will be necessary, and that staff will be the same whether they operate under the tariff board or under the Combines Investigation Act or under any other commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One man's guess is about as good as another's about the expense. None of us knows what the expense will be. We can only take the best advice we can get from the best quarters available. My idea is that the present set-up will be very much less expensive than the setting up of an independent body as proposed by the royal commission. I have been here a long time and I have noticed that when you set up an independent body it immediately begins to extend and aggrandize itself and to grow and grow, and there is no limit at all unless someone has strength enough to say: This sort of thing shall not go on any longer. That is bureaucracy in government, and we have had many illustrations of it in Canada. I cannot say any more than that.

Mr. BENNETT: I think no one complains of the terms of the criticism of the hon. gentleman opposite. It is only fair to say that this question gave the government a very great deal of concern. Take the railway commission, for instance. There is a commission that has at least three or four members with nothing to do; that is a fair way to put it. I am not disclosing anything I think I should not say when I say that I consulted the chairman of the tariff board whether he thought he could discharge these duties or not, and he believes he could. Parliament will meet again within a reasonable time from now, and if it is found that the work is too onerous for the board a second division could be created or an appointment could be made by adding a few sections. I desire to point out, however, that possibly the right hon. gentleman has not given sufficient consideration to that part of the bill dealing with combines and investigations. I did not desire to interrupt a moment ago and take part in the discussion with regard to the registrar, but it will be observed that the section which deals with investigations provides:

> The commission shall on application made under the last preceding section or on its own motion whenever it has reason to believe that a combine exists or is being formed, cause an inquiry to be made—

My understanding, of course, is that this would enable the use of the present registrar who is being transferred to this commission under the circumstances mentioned by the minister in charge of the bill. If these two acts are read together I think it will be found that without incurring any unnecessary expense in the first instance the recommendation that a commission should be charged with the responsibility of dealing with the problem with which the price spreads commission dealt, has been carried into effect. It is intended to utilize an existing body, not to subordinate the duties that will thus be cast upon it to their other duties, but to bring about coordination, co-extension and co-equality so far as jurisdiction and the power to act is concerned.

It may be observed that one of the differences is that at the present time the commission reports to the president of the council, on the assumption that you thereby get the closest communication between the government of the day and the commission itself. That, of course, is in the act which it was suggested the other evening should stand until this act was considered, but the two acts must be read together and as you read them together I think you will conclude that there is a very earnest effort on the part of the government to give effect to the proposals that have been made that there should be a body charged with the responsibility, and that this body should report directly to the president of the council. It does not follow, of course, that the president of the council is the Prime Minister, but it has been so in this country in a general way, with few exceptions. If when the bill is before the house it is thought desirable that the words "Prime Minister" should be substituted for "president of the council" it will be quite satisfactory.

This may enable me to take this opportunity to correct the impression that the words "Prime Minister" have no place in the statutes of Canada. The other evening my hon. friend the former Minister of Justice asked who drew that statute concerning the economic council, which makes reference to a Prime Minister. I am responsible for that. The hon. gentleman said that certainly the law officers of the crown would not make any such mistake. If he had taken the trouble to turn up the supply bills for the last few years he would have found that they contain reference to the Prime Minister's department, so we have that authority for the use of those words. Since the Prime Minister of Great Britain was given the status of third private citizen of the country, by act of the king, the words "Prime Minister" have come into use, and in the greatest of all our bills, namely, the supply bills, you will see those words used.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are not used in the British North America Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If I made a mistake I had good company, in the leader of the Senate and another good friend of my right hon. friend in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite well aware that my hon. friend the Secretary of State was of that opinion. The matter was mentioned to me while I remained indoors and at that time I had not an opportunity to turn up the statute, but I directed my colleague's attention to the fact that the supply bill does provide for the Prime Minister's department, in place of the old designation, which was the office of the privy council. I am quite well aware of the provisions of the British North America Act, but I have indicated why that expression was used. It may be that the house will think it better to provide for the first minister in the Combines Investigation Act. I only desired to point out that this is merely an effort to give effect to that recommendation, without establishing a new commission, to see to what extent it may be possible to utilize the services of those at present in the service, designating them for that purpose by the name indicated in the measure now before the committee. Then if in practice it is found necessary, in the interests of those concerned, the body may be expanded by the addition of new members or a new body may be created.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister has referred to the section which places this act under the president of the privy council. I had intended to refer to that point when we reached that section, but we slipped by the section so quickly that I had not a chance to do so. Personally I think that is a mistake. This session we have heard a good deal about the extent to which the Prime Minister is overtaxed in connection with the duties of his office and the many obligations which attach to it. During my right hon. friend's absence from the house because of ill health occasioned by overwork we had a long discussion here on the very question as to whether some arrangement might not be made with respect to the Prime Minister's office which would give him more in the way of assistance to carry out the duties of that office. Now this act proposes to place on his shoulders the responsibility for the tariff board which is to have additional obligations with respect to the administration of the Combines Investigation Act and other matters.

I think that is a mistake. I am assuming that whoever holds the office of Prime Minister will also hold the office of president of the privy council, and I do not think it is possible for the Prime Minister, in his capacity as president of the privy council, to give the attention that should be given to the administration of acts of this character. They ought to be under separate ministers of the crown. To-day the Minister of Finance has the responsibility with regard to the tariff board and the Minister of Labour has the responsibility with respect to the Combines Investigation Act. In questioning the Minister of Labour in regard to the Combines Investigation Act we discovered that he was not as familiar with what was being done under that measure as this house had reason to hope and expect he would be. I cannot see how the Prime Minister is going to find it possible to devote to this additional work the time and thought which should be given to it. There again I think that the government by this measure is subordinating the importance of the Combines Investigation Act and the significance that should be attached to its work.

I can sympathize with the view of the government in not wanting to appoint more commissions than are absolutely necessary. I do not know whether or not the government considered giving the officers now charged with the administration of the Combines Investigation Act additional help in the way of some legal assistance. I think if the act had been amended to make provision for a director of prosecutions and possibly a director of publicity, two such officers functioning under the new provisions of the act would have been infinitely more effective in carrying out its intent and its provisions than any staff, no matter how large it may be, which may have to do with the act as transferred for purposes of administration to the tariff board. I feel that here there is a move in the wrong direction. I am glad to gather from what the Prime Minister says that there will be an opportunity to test out the arrangement during the ensuing year, that he sees the need for further consideration of and no finality in the present step. I hope in that interval, while this transfer is taking place, the matter will not be left in such shape that the whole effect of the Combines Investigation Act will be nullified for the time being, or in any degree for all time. That is one feature to which I shall wish to direct attention a little later on, but I think it should be kept in mind at this time.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think at the present time, when the change is to be made, it is a great mistake not to take something in the way of a definite step towards increasing, if possible, the efficiency of the administration of the Combines Investigation Act instead of decreasing it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why do you say this bill does that?

Mr. ELLIOTT: If my hon. friend will permit me, it is on that point that I am going to endeavour to convince him. It was my privilege, as Minister of Labour for a time, to have charge of the Combines Investigation Act. At the time the fines were levied on the fruit men I happened to be Minister of Labour, and I happen to know something of the great amount of work that was entailed in that prosecution. The prosecution was instituted before I came to that office. I do not see how this provision could do other than weaken the efficiency of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is an assertion, not proof.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Well, the minister is merely making an assertion, and one of which he cannot give proof. The Combines Investigation Act, under this bill, would be handled by the tariff board. I can agree with the minister's observations concerning the efficiency of the chairman of that board, but because a man is efficient as chairman of a tariff board is not sufficient reason for loading him with the administration of several other acts, including one as important as the Combines Investigation Act.

One of the most important recommendations of the price spreads commisison has reference to this very act. Looking through the activities of recent years I am bound to say that it would appear as though the Combines Investigation Act has not been as actively enforced as it was some years ago. In this connection I shall refer hon. members to some observations of the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). Speaking a short time ago, his observations are reported at page 3300 of Hansard as follows:

> They might mention the Combines Investigation Act, which was a justifiable and sound piece of legislation, but my hon. friends, in all their nine years in power, never made use of it. They pigenholed it and it has been there, dusty, ever since.

I point that out merely to indicate—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps the hon. member—

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would the minister kindly control himself, for a moment. I have pointed out these observations as an indication of the extravagant statements not founded on fact made by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You never make them, of course.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I shall now draw the minister's attention to the manner in which prosecutions have been carried on, so that he may realize something which I believe he does not now know. If hon. members will turn to page 3229 of Hansard they will find reported figures indicating amounts received from fines under the Combines Investigation Act, as stated by the Minister of Labour. The total fines imposed and collected between July 1, 1924, and July 1, 1930, amounted to $226,500, making an average for those six years of $37,750. An additional $44,900 in fines was collected after July 1, 1930, as a result of investigations commenced prior to that date. The total fines collected as a result of investigations begun between July, 1924, and July 1, 1930, amount to $271,400 or an average for the six years of $45,233 per year. That is, investigations begun in those six years brought in fines aggregating $271,400.

Mr. BENNETT: Practically all from the one source, namely, the fruit companies. Take that out and you will have very little left.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Take that away and you have left nearly double the amount of all the fines collected as a result of prosecutions since the present government took office.

Fines collected as a result of prosecutions begun since the present government took office total only $45,000. This is less for those five years than the average for one year resulting from prosecutions commenced between July 1, 1924, and July 1, 1930.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. member suggest that the amount of fines collected is a criterion of the work done under the act?

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not necessarily the sole test, but it is one of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not think so.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I believe it is perhaps the best test.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Another complaint under the present administration arises from the lack of publicity. After all, I believe exposure to the light of day of what has been taking place is just about as effective as a fine. The people of Canada, and particularly hon. members in this chamber have complained about prosecutions being instituted and the findings not being made public.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. member suggest that the law has not been carried out in accordance with the manner indicated on the statute books?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will answer the minister. Let us, for example, consider the investigation into the tobacco combine. The law was not changed between the time the minister in charge refused to table the report and the time it was actually tabled. For months members of the opposition endeavoured to have the findings of the investigator tabled, and later on they were tabled. The reason given for the delay was that the investigator was not really a commissioner. I believe that point should be cleared up while the bill is under consideration, because after all the investigation of combines is a very important matter. I believe we should have before us the findings and information as to the fines imposed, together with any publicity that may be given, because there is a feeling abroad to-day that in recent years there has not been as active prosecution under the Combines Investigation Act as there was formerly. The result of the prosecutions would indicate that that is so. I have been induced to obtain these figures, partly as a result of the statement I have already read made by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. I believe that quotation is sufficient to indicate how unreliable and extravagant are the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. By burying prosecutions under this act along with prosecutions under other acts, and the work of the tariff board, we will not improve the administration of the Combines Investigation Act. On the contrary I am satisfied its efficiency would be greatly curtailed.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe the hon. member will observe that the price spreads commission did recommend that the act be under the control of the president of the council. So far as I can ascertain, the only reason for that being done was to make sure that there would be a medium of communication between the commission and the government. It was never intended that the president of the council as Prime Minister or otherwise should be responsible for action, but merely that he should see that in accordance with procedure in the council a matter might be referred by him to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Justice or that minister responsible for the matter. That is the ordinary practice which governs in matters of this kind. I take it that the president of the privy council was suggested for that reason, not that he would do it but that he would merely make a reference to the appropriate head of a department to deal with the matter. It might be a matter affecting trade and commerce or something else, or he might make a notation "refer to the Minister of Justice." I take it that the reason the president of the privy council was suggested as the member of the cabinet to whom the commission should communicate was in order that there might be a clear and certain line of communication between the commission and the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to refer to one matter to which the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) has referred, the question of publicity. Under section 28 of the Combines Investigation Act there was some question as to publicity when a preliminary investigation had been made by a commissioner or the registrar. I should like to point out to the hon. member that the situation to which he referred in connection with the tobacco investigation has been cured by the repeal of that section by Bill No. 79 and the enactment of section 28 of this bill, which provides:

(1) The commission shall within fifteen days after making any report, recommendation or finding under this act make the same public in such manner as seems desirable unless the commission is unanimously of the opinion that the public interest would not be served by publication or that the public interest would be better served by withholding publication.

(2) Wherever possible the commission shall with the report, recommendation or finding make public the reasons and the facts upon which the decision is based.

It will be observed that this bill which provides for the setting up of this new commission provides also for the publication of certain reports unless the commission is unanimous that it would not be in the public interest to publish such reports. I think any such case would be a very strong case.

The hon. gentleman indicated that he thought this government was suppressing the operations of the act but I would direct his attention to the fact that every case handled under the act has gone through the usual operations after 1930 as well as before. I am not charged with the operation of the act. I have no doubt that if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) were in his seat he would be able to set the hon. gentleman right. Perhaps the most celebrated case under the Combines Investigation Act was not the one to which the hon. gentleman fell heir as stepfather; it was the coal case which was started by this government and carried through by the administrative officers of the province of Quebec, and then carried on to the privy council with the results known to everyone.

Mr. ELLIOTT: My hon. friend points out that I became the stepfather to some case but he is not even a stepfather. I know of no investigation which has been conducted since he assumed his duties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not expect there will be because if I can help it I shall never be Minister of Labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with the registrar and his staff. A moment ago the minister moved an amendment to safeguard the registrar and his staff as far as the provisions of the superannuation fund are concerned but I should like to know if anything else is being done to safeguard their positions in the public service of Canada. At the present time they are members of the civil service and subject to the Civil Service Act but they are being placed under the operations of a temporary board which has a life of only ten years. Is any provision being made which will ensure these members of the civil service continuing as such?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The statement of the right hon. gentleman that this board is a temporary board is not quite correct. If he will allow me to correct him, the fact is that the board is not a temporary board although the incumbents have been appointed for a period of years. I am not unmindful of certain observations which were made at the time this board was set up as to what would happen under certain contingencies but this board is like any other board set up by parliament. I have no other idea than that the registrar and his staff are going to be properly taken care of. As far as I know he and his staff will function just as they have in the past under the direction of this commission. Instead of being queried about this matter I think we should be commended for what we are trying to do.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, well. We are safeguarding them and the price spreads commission did not suggest that we should do that. We are putting them under the superannuation act so that their positions will be looked after. I assure my right hon. friend that nothing sinister is intended, on the contrary we want to preserve their positions in the service. I am giving that as a bona fide statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was not assuming that my hon. friend would act in any other way. I simply wanted to direct attention to the fact that certain members of the public service would naturally wish to have their positions in the service definitely secured and have this right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As far as I know, I think they are.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Section 13 provides for the placing of just one act under the administration of this commission but I should like to know what is to be done in connection with the other acts referred to in subsection (h) of section 2. What will be the procedure in order to prosecute under those acts? For instance, an offence might be committed under the Seeds Act; what will be the procedure to have that offence handled by this commission?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am afraid the hon. gentleman has not read the bill.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The minister is here to give information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member had read the bill he would not have asked that question. Section 13 deals with only one situation, the administration of the Combines Investigation Act. If the hon. member will look at the other provisions of the bill and read them in conjunction with subsection (h) he will see that in certain contingencies in connection with unfair trade practices these acts are dealt with by section 20. This section reads:

The commission shall receive complaints respecting unfair trade practices—

That is, the unfair trade practices referred to in the acts mentioned in subsection (h) as well as in this bill——and may investigate the same and, either before or after an investigation, if of opinion that the alleged practice constitutes an offence against a law prohibiting unfair trade practices, shall communicate the same to the Attorney General of Canada and to the director of public prosecutions or to the attorney general of the province within which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

Of course the acts referred to in subsection (h) are not transferred to the jurisdiction of the board except in the sense that they contain provisions with respect to unfair trade practices or in the sense that regulations have been or may be made in connection with any of these acts. This commission is to investigate unfair trade practices.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will the officers of any of these departments that have charge of these bills not initiate action?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then you will be a long while getting action taken if you have to go through that rigmarole. I know there is a lot of routine to be carried out now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, I understand all right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These statutes should be enforced, as they are to-day, by the officials of the appropriate departments. But if complaint is made that under any one of these sections unfair trade practices have been engaged in by anyone in violation of any of these statutes mentioned, then another course may be followed; but it does not derogate from the powers of the departmental officials to enforce the statutes now. I am not saying that I have personal knowledge of any failure, but it might be argued that there has been failure on the part of departmental officials to enforce all the regulations against unfair practices for which provision is now made, and this is an additional power and authority for investigation, and then direction to the public prosecutor, to the Attorney General of Canada or to the attorneys general of the various provinces.

Mr. NEILL: I had intended to reserve my remarks for section 20, but as the matter has been brought up I may say a few words here. Will the minister point out where in the bill there is a definition of unfair trade practices; and if it is not in the bill how is he going to define it? It is no use giving his individual opinion, because when the question comes before the courts they will have to deal with a specific act or a specific regulation, and the word "unfair" is so very vague. I have a business difference with someone; we both want to be fair but each thinks the other fellow unfair, and according to our own lights we are both right. It may be said that the courts will deal with it. But the business of the court is merely to determine whether a definite and specified offence has been committed. It is not the jurisdiction of the court to define the offence, apart from the confines of the act itself. This is an important question; it is given a headline by itself—unfair trade practices. If you say that each court will deal with the matter then we shall have a different version from each court. If the minister will turn to section 2, paragraph (h) he will find that there are enumerated twenty-five different acts and some thirty sections of the criminal code, which are defined as laws prohibiting unfair trade practices. But surely it is not suggested that any infraction of any one of these laws in any degree constitutes an unfair trade practice. For example, we find the Electricity Inspection Act mentioned, the Maple Sugar Industry Act, the Patent Act, the Precious Metals Marking Act, the Water Meters Inspection Act, and so on. Can one readily conceive wherein the Water Meters Inspection Act prohibits an unfair trade practice? It may be that some of them do, the Live Stock Act, for instance; but the majority of them do not define in so many words what an unfair trade practice is, and if you have no definition anywhere in the act it becomes an important question as to how the matter is to be dealt with. Section 22, in this connection, institutes the office of director of public prosecutions, whose business it is to institute criminal prosecution for violation of any of the laws prohibiting unfair trade practices. If some section of these acts creates a trivial technical offence, in connection with the inspection of electricity, for instance, will it be dealt with as an unfair trade practice?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. gentleman cannot have read the concluding part of subsection (h) of section 2. I do not want to break in on his speech but I desire to correct him on that point. In subsection (h) of section 2 he will find, not a definition of unfair trade practices but reference to laws prohibiting unfair trade practices, meaning all those different statutes set out, including the criminal code and regulations under the act. Then these words follow:

> ... which provisions prohibit acts or omissions connected with industry as being fraudulent, misrepresentative or otherwise unfair or detrimental to the public interest.

It is only the commission of these prohibited things which may in certain circumstances be deemed to be unfair trade practices; but not all prohibited acts are unfair trade practices.

Mr. NEILL: "As being fraudulent, misrepresentative or otherwise unfair or detrimental to the public interest." It is difficult to find out where you will get a reasonable definition of unfair trade practice from a statute dealing with electricity, or even from the patent law. However, we have not yet got down to the point which I rose to make. What is the definition under this act, under section 20 and under section 2, subsection (h) of unfair trade practices?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The price spreads commission wrestled with that, and I do not think that any lawyer could put in legal language a concrete definition of unfair trade practice. It might be held that certain practices were unfair trade practices, and that is what we have attempted to do. It is the same with the definition of negligence; no lawyer or judge so far as I can recall has ever yet been able to give a concrete definition of negligence, though there have been hundreds of them in the last hundred years. It is one of the most difficult things in legal draftsmanship which I know of, to define such matters as negligence or unfair trade practices. Any lawyer in this house who has read Beven on Negligence will find a dozen definitions set out by judges with respect to specific cases, but I do not think you can define unfair trade practice. I am advised that the departmental officials came to the conclusion that you could not define in legal phraseology what was exactly an unfair trade practice, but you can do what has been done here; you can bring under the statute unfair trade practices set out in all the acts, and I think they did pretty well.

Mr. NEILL: Are unfair trade practices mentioned in these acts?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is getting back to the same thing. I do not think that unfair trade practices are specifically mentioned in the act, but these acts contain provisions prohibiting acts or omissions connected with industry as being fraudulent, misrepresentative or otherwise unfair or detrimental to the public interest. It can only be described generally; that is as far as the draftsman can go.

Mr. NEILL: I am willing to state that none of these acts define anything as "unfair." Are you going to leave it to the individual judge to decide what is unfair? You might as well leave it to him to decide what is improper or unkind or unfeeling. What kind of code of decisions will you have when it is left to the individual judge to say whether a thing is unfair or unkind or unjust? We should at least approximate to some definition. Are there not a long series of decisions defining what negligence is in relation to certain actions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is one statute mentioned in subsection (h) of section 2, the Unfair Competition Act, which does define in a degree and in certain specific cases what is unfair competition. But this, I submit, is as far as we ought to go and as far as parliament can go.

Mr. NEILL: That act has to do with unfair competition; I am talking about unfair trade practices.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have not attempted to do it.

Mr. HEAPS: As far as I understand the act, it deals with the marketing of commodities under fair conditions. I know how difficult it is to define what fair conditions are; what might be fair in one province might be unfair in another. I understand that this act is specific and lays down certain instructions as to how the commission shall go about its work, but I see nothing in the bill which gives to the proposed commission any power to investigate the labour conditions under which the goods are produced. If that is not mentioned in the act I should take it that the commission would not have the power to make such an investigation; for after all it may be that under certain labour conditions the most unfair trade practices may be engaged in by various industries. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether under this measure the proposed commission would have power to investigate labour conditions which are brought to its attention?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should think this commission, generally speaking, would have power to investigate anything relating to production, which certainly would include labour. If that is not a satisfactory answer, then I suggest that the commission would have power, as commissioners under the Combines Investigation Act and under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, to investigate conditions of labour. I do not think the objection is well founded, if it be an objection.

Mr. HEAPS: While the minister feels the commission may have such power under the bill, does he not think it would be far better if there were inserted a clause which would definitely give to the commission the powers which he considers it may have under the measure?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A general power is very much better than a specification of special powers.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think the commission would go beyond the powers set forth in the bill, and if there were conditions relating to labour that the commission wanted to investigate and it found nothing in the bill to give it such power, it might claim that parliament did not give it power to make such an investigation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think there is in the bill full power to investigate labour conditions.

Mr. HEAPS: Under what clause will the commission have power to investigate labour conditions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Section 13 would give it those powers. Then under section 14 there is "price and production agreements." If the hon. member wants more specific information, I would say that the commission has power under the Combines Investigation Act and under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act to investigate anything relating to production, which includes labour.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand from the minister that this commission could become an arbitration board or a conciliation board under this bill?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; that is under another law.

Mr. HEAPS: But the minister mentioned that act just now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that the commission would be an arbitration board; what I said was that it would have power to investigate labour conditions. That is as far as I went.

Mr. HEAPS: In spite of the minister's statement, I think it would be far more satisfactory if something of a specific nature were inserted in this bill so as to give the commission those special powers which personally I do not see mentioned anywhere in the bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think I can add anything more to what I have said.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was wondering what would happen to this bill if section 13 were dropped out altogether. It selects one particular law out of about thirty or forty and says that this shall come under this commission. It says nothing about the other thirty-nine or whatever the number may be. Then when section 20 is reached, would that section not cover them all?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Section 13 is quite different; it is inserted because of the specific recommendation of the royal commission itself; that is the reason why the Combines Investigation Act is specifically mentioned. The other statutes are mentioned in the definition of laws relating to unfair trade practices so as to be enabling, so as to enable investigation of unfair trade practices that may arise by the commission of offences or prohibited actions under all those various acts now on the statute books. The direct answer to the hon. member's question is that this was one specific recommendation of the price spreads commission; that is why it is specifically mentioned in the way in which it is.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a concession to the commission, and really not necessary in the act.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Agreements regulating price and production.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a controversial clause. I just want to repeat what I said on the second reading. As a minority member of the price spreads commission I am opposed to this clause as are the other Liberal members of the commission. It authorizes the formation of agreements regulating price and production; that is to say, it authorizes the sanctioning of combines by the governor in council on the recommendation of this commission. Perhaps the major activity of the dominion trade and industry commission is the prevention of combines, the enforcement of the Combines Investigation Act, and this clause to a very considerable extent may effect the nullification of that act. Clause 14 is a sort of echo of the NRA; it makes this body into a code forming or code sanctioning authority and authorizes what has always been illegal in this country, that is the formation of combines in industries for the purpose of enhancing prices and limiting production, which inevitably is to the prejudice and detriment of the consumers. I went into this question fully in my remarks on the second reading of the bill, and it is not necessary for me to repeat what I said then.

I admit certain safeguards have been inserted in this clause. Apparently those who drafted it realized that they were doing something very drastic when they introduced this principle into legislation; it is not anywhere else on the statute books except in the Natural Products Marketing Act. They drafted it so that the commission must be unanimous, and they also by the last words of the last subclause indicated that under some circumstances prosecutions for violations of the Combines Investigation Act might be possible even though those who had entered into the price and production agreement were merely following out the agreement. The concluding words of the clause are entirely inconsistent with the purpose of the clause itself. But I am not objecting to those concluding words; I am objecting to the whole clause as entirely at variance with the principle of the Combines Investigation Act, and unwise, unnecessary and injurious. The Natural Products Marketing Act was passed to authorize producers of natural products to enter into such agreements. It went further and authorized manufacturers of products made from natural products to enter into such agreements. Therefore you have this absurd situation: two code sanctioning authorities set up within the last two years to authorize combines which are monopolies. The whole tenor and principle of the price spreads report, the whole doctrine that underlies it, is that one of the greatest evils in Canadian contemporary life is monopolies and monopolistic combines. The introduction of this provision in the statute implementing the recommendations of the price spreads report, while it does follow the recommendation of the majority, is something which in my judgment should not be done. I could not say any more than that if I talked for a long time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite understand the hon. gentleman's point of view, and he has put it forward both on the second reading and again to-day in a very moderate way. But I disagree with him when he suggests that this is not a beneficial thing. I should like to point out to this committee and to this house and the country that this section of the bill is aimed at cut-throat competition. It is an attempt to give effect to agreements which will not be detrimental to the public interest, and then only after the fullest investigation and report.

Mr. HANBURY: Detrimental to what portion of the public?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am using the word generally—not detrimental to the public interest. The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) says there is an inconsistency in the language of the section when you read the first one or two subsections with the last subsection. But I suggest there is no inconsistency, because if the agreements are such that they are not detrimental to the public interest, then they are not in violation either of the Combines Investigation Act or of the criminal code, and no offence has been committed. Subsection (1) reads:

> 14. (1) In any case where the commission, after full investigation under the Combines Investigation Act, is unanimously of opinion that wasteful or demoralizing competition exists in any specific industry, and that agreements between the person engaged in the industry to modify such competition by controlling and regulating prices or production would not result in injury to or undue restraint of trade or be detrimental to or against the interest of the public, the commission may so advise the governor in council and recommend that certain agreements be approved.

That is one thing—investigation and recommendation. Then subsection 2 provides for approval and review by the governor in council. It says:

> The governor in council may, if of opinion that the conclusions of the commission are well founded, approve of any such agreement, and shall make regulations requiring the commission to determine from time to time whether the agreement is resulting in injury to or undue restraint of trade or is detrimental to the public interest.

Then subsection 3 provides for information and rescission of approval, which of course is a safeguard; and subsection 4 provides that there must be the consent of the commission for prosecution. I should like to put this to the committee. We have had in this country for a number of years now cut-throat competition in newsprint production. Our production of newsprint, apart from the small percentage that goes into domestic consumption, about which I do not think there is very much trouble, is largely for export. It is one of the products which Canada produces in large quantity and exports, bringing new wealth into the country. We all know, if we know anything at all or are interested in and have been following the newsprint situation in recent years, the tremendous cut-throat competition there has been in that industry to the detriment of Canada; I think that is a fair statement—to the detriment of this country. If we had had the machinery in the last five years or longer under which we could have had governmental approval of fair trade agreements respecting newsprint for the export trade, I think it would have been to the great benefit of Canada.

Mr. DUFF: What about meeting competition in the foreign market?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will take care of that. I say that if we had had anything like that, then in my humble opinion, and I am putting it forward with great humility, it would have been of great benefit to the newsprint industry, and consequently of benefit to Canada. I can think of other examples. Look at the situation of the furniture industry in Canada to-day—every reserve of every company wiped out. Ask our colleague across the floor what is the position of the furniture industry in Canada to-day as a result of cut-throat competition. I put this query to the committee: Is it in the public interest that an old established industry in Canada like the furniture industry—I see my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) is ready to spring; I may possibly be stirring up trouble—should be subject to such conditions as have existed in the industry for the last few years. The public have no right to get their stuff below cost.

Mr. HANBURY: That is a new theory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will say this; as a general rule the public have no right to get the stuff below the cost of production.

Mr. HANBURY: What about efficient industry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is another story.

Mr. DUFF: The consumer is the forgotten man.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How can fair wages be paid under those conditions? Are we to lower the standard of living? I apologize, Mr. Chairman, for getting off on this angle, but I do suggest to the committee that this clause has some merit.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If power is to be given to permit of agreements for regulating prices and production has the minister considered the wisdom of receiving the approval of parliament rather than that of the governor in council? If these agreements are to be in the public interest it seems to me that parliament is the right body to give its approval in a matter that goes the length of establishing a combine.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That I understand was the minority report, but I suggest that you would never achieve anything by that method because of the delay. Anybody who has had any experience in business knows that if it was necessary to await the approval of parliament, it simply could not be done. You simply would not get anywhere; it is not practicable. It may be a good democratic theory to suggest, but from my knowledge of business I would say that it is not practicable; it cannot be done.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The British parliament has found it practicable to approve of various agreements, and it has vaster affairs than ours.

Mr. BENNETT: Not of this kind, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very similar, they are agreements of less important and less significance than these.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, under their marketing act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And those agreements would be less extensive than the ones my hon. friend suggested relating to the newsprint or furniture industry.

Mr. BENNETT: The steel cartels were not approved of by parliament in England?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say as to that. May I direct attention to another subsection of this act. I think the minister went further than he intended. Subsection 4 of section 14 says:

> In any case where the governor in council has approved an agreement under this section, no prosecution of a party to such agreement shall be instituted under the Combines Investigation Act or the criminal code for an offence arising in the performance of such agreement, except with the consent of the commission.

Should there not be some restricting or limiting words before or after "criminal code"? Should the section not read "the provisions of the criminal code relating to combines" or should the sections of the code not be specified? Otherwise a party to such an agreement could not be prosecuted for an assault.

Mr. BENNETT: You could say "the relevant sections of the criminal code."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the right hon. leader of the opposition is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is that danger in leaving it as it is.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, this section provides that wherever wasteful or demoralizing competition is found to exist in an industry, those engaged in the industry may be permitted to formulate agreements to regulate prices and production, in other words to form some sort of combine. Now, wherever wasteful or demoralizing competition exists in an industry it is generally the result of overexpansion, and overexpansion is generally the indication of a lack of judgment on the part of somebody engaged in the industry. When we find that condition existing should we permit those who have been guilty of this lack of judgment and have overexpanded their industry to come together and form an agreement to regulate production and fix prices? Should we not in that case be doing something that was detrimental to the public interest? We are deliberately keeping more people in an industry than the country can afford to maintain in it, and by that very act we are doing something against the public interest.

The minister mentioned the furniture industry as an example. Let us take that industry. In this country we had a great many furniture factories producing furniture which the people of Canada were buying. Then, with the coming of the depression, the people lost a large percentage of their purchasing power. They simply could not buy as many goods as they had been buying, and furniture was one of the things they could do without, so furniture was one of the things they first stopped buying. If this clause had been in effect at the time and our furniture manufacturers had come together to form an agreement to limit production and fix prices, what good would it have done them? The people would not have bought their furniture in any case, and the higher they kept their prices the less furniture the people would have bought. The only way furniture went into consumption at all was by cutting prices. I know of a young man in this very city who got married and wanted to furnish a house. The depression was on and he saw that prices were coming down, but he said, "We cannot buy our furniture yet, but presently prices will come down." So he waited and waited, but apparently some understanding was arrived at among the furniture dealers of this city and this young couple could not buy their furniture until they discovered that someone in Toronto was selling furniture at lower prices. So they went to Toronto and bought their furniture for less money, and in that way they gave employment to people in the furniture industry which they never would have done if there had been an agreement such as this.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to say a word about the pulp industry. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is a much more experienced and an older lawyer than I am, but my understanding of the Combines Investigation Act is that it does not prevent any producers in this country from entering into a combine for the export trade.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not clear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If my hon. friend could satisfy some people in this country on that point I think they would be very much obliged to him.

Mr. ILSLEY: There would be no one to take any proceedings at all, because the pulp and paper people combined only in regard to the export trade. That is the rule in the United States.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have a special act over there.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the public interest must be affected before the combine becomes a criminal enterprise, and by the most elementary rules of interpretation that means the public of the Dominion of Canada. I never heard the point disputed until to-day. Now the minister says that if five years ago there had been a provision such as this the pulp industry could have saved itself by a combine in regard to export trade. They could not have done it any better than they could do it now. This provision does not impose any penalties; it merely removes the penalties that otherwise would exist under the Combines Investigation Act. It is not the place of the commission to enforce a combine entered into under section 14 or to prosecute for the violation of an agreement; they could not do that. You are simply leaving it to the producers here to agree among themselves, and you are saying that under certain circumstances they may enhance prices and limit production, and the penalties that otherwise would follow under section 498 of the criminal code or under the Combines Investigation Act will not attach while that agreement is in force. So with considerable deference I submit that the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is unsound so far as it applies to the pulp and paper industry.

Mr. BENNETT: I endeavoured to follow the facts as they were presented to the commission of which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was a member. As I understand it the commission had before it evidence which satisfied it that unrestricted competition had destroyed a large number of smaller companies or people and that the survival of the fittest had been brought about by a competition that involved loss on the part of the ultimate survivors at the expense of the others.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was overexpansion that did it, rather than competition.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. I realize the soundness of that statement, but all one has to do is take the history of the railways of the United States in the years 1850, say, to 1880. There is a classic work upon that subject. They were unrestrained and unrestricted, and the traffic had to pay what it could bear. I think those were the words of one of the famous creators of railways in the United States. Then there was a great system that gave rebates to one of its largest customers. They were secret rebates, known only to the railway company and the customer. That history is a matter of record. The result was that the people of the United States came to the conclusion, as did the people of England, that there ought to be a body created that would fix the same rate for the same service for all railways. As a result we in Canada have the Railway Act, which was drawn up by the present vice-chairman of the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. ILSLEY: You could not apply that principle to the furniture industry.

Mr. BENNETT: I am just pointing out what the result was with respect to carriers. They were common carriers competing with one another in the same area for traffic, at any price at which they could get it, ostensibly showing certain rates which in fact they overcame by giving secret rebates. As I say, that history is one of the most interesting that one could read. The United States found it necessary, as did Great Britain and Canada, to set up a board that would fix the same rate for the service rendered, having regard to what is called water competition east and west and the other factor, that is, where you have traffic to be carried to two ports, one of which is a little greater distance than the other, the rate to the further distant port is the same as it is to the lesser distant port. Without going into details those were the principles.

Now let us go a step further. Then came what are known in the United States as the great packer cases. In that country it was found that the packers drove out of business the small butcher who bought and killed local cattle and sold them in his own market. He was being driven out by the car that stopped at the siding. Usually before that took place the packer offered the local man the chance to sell out; sometimes he sold and sometimes he did not. The whole matter was reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the oil cases were also reviewed by that court at great length. The result of unrestricted and unrestrained competition was the creation of monopoly. The very thing my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) aims to prevent was brought about by unrestrained and unrestricted competition. In the end the survival of the fittest meant a monopoly, with great resources, with many branches and with activities extending to all parts of the world. Now let us see what we had in this country during the years to which reference has been made. My hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) said it was a case of over expansion. In very buoyant days the prospects of high profits from certain forms of industrial activity so affect others that they go into the business when purchasing power is high and large, and there being no reserves set up to meet the situation because of the effect of continuing competition there is undoubtedly great over production in periods of depression. The real truth is that because our combines act read as it did there came about large numbers of mergers. The mergers were the direct result of unrestrained competition, resulting in one corporation that created a monopoly in many communities and afforded no protection at all to the consumer. They were within the law, because twenty, thirty or forty plants had been carried into one plant, which did not come within the combines act. Therefore they could no longer be investigated as combines. I say to the hon. members for Hants-Kings and Weyburn, does it not come down to a choice between one of two things: Shall we permit the creation of a condition that will prevent the growth of monopolies and the creation of monopolies, by adequate restriction and regulation, or shall we permit the unrestrained operation of free competition to the destruction, ultimately, of all but the fittest?—and I am using the word "fittest" in the sense of meaning the largest resources. That is the position, as it appears to me—and I regret to say that I have come to this conclusion, because all my life I have followed with some interest this class of transaction. Hon. members who are members of the legal profession, and who will take the trouble to read the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States will recall that the former ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Kellogg, acted in several of these actions. There you have an illustration of another phase of the matter. Take tobacco, take oil, take packers, take the steel industry—all these matters were carefully considered and investigated; litigation was launched, in some cases with success and sometimes with failure. In the supreme court reports you will find in very comprehensive detail all the matters to which I have referred.

In this country we make no distinction between export and domestic business, so far as combines are concerned. The hon. member for Hants-Kings has suggested that there might be no opportunity for prosecution—

Mr. ILSLEY: I go farther; I say it is not an offence.

Mr. BENNETT: If a combine is bad, then it is bad whether it is applied to export or to import business.

Mr. ILSLEY: It must be to the detriment of the public.

Mr. BENNETT: The public interest of Canada, yes. But, just to finish what I was going to say: The Sherman Act, so-called in the United States, was an act not unlike our Combines Investigation Act—I say, not unlike it. In general terms the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States would apply with equal force to the provisions under our combines act.

There is an important distinction between the principles which govern British law and those governing the law of the United States. The great case in English law was the Great Mogul steamship case, where the ship lay in harbour and could not get a cargo. Certain prohibitions were brought about, and the House of Lords decided as there was no statute in the matter it could not be said to be against the public interest to do what was being done, because there was a regulation of trade and commerce in accordance with what they conceived to be a good and sound principle, and they did not interfere in that case.

About the same time in Brantford, Canada, there was a case in which a decision was arrived at indicating that under the provision of the criminal code there was no liability. A little later I defended what was known as the lumber combine case in the province of Alberta. I can recall the facts vividly, although it must be twenty-five or more years ago. When the papers were submitted to me I was clear that upon eleven counts they could be acquitted, but that upon the twelfth count I saw no chance of acquittal under the statute as it stood, because they were enabled to fix a price, inasmuch as they endeavoured to limit the creation of lumber yards by saying that a new yard should not be opened at a given point, without their permission. If it was opened without their permission there was no opportunity for the unfortunate man who opened the yard to secure a supply. In my judgment it was quite obvious that that violated the provisions of the section. Accordingly the case was tried before Chief Justice Sifton, and he acquitted my client upon eleven counts and found him guilty upon the twelfth count. That is an illustration of what I conceive to be proper conviction, because the regulation undertaken by the industry within itself was not such regulation as was in the public interest. In other words, it placed in the hands of the industry itself—I shall put it this way—the power to determine the terms and conditions under which people should be able to buy what is a necessary product in that province, namely lumber.

Here the commission had to deal with the importance of testimony which established clearly (1) that unrestrained and unrestricted competition, whether brought about by overexpansion or overcapitalization, or how else brought about, resulted, in the ultimate analysis, in the creation of a monopoly. That is an unfortunate thing to say, but it is true.

Mr. ILSLEY: Only in certain industries. There are many industries where there cannot be a monopoly.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wish to say. I thank the hon. member for Hants-Kings for mentioning the point, because it meets my view. There are many industries in which monopoly may be beneficial and not otherwise.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that. I said "in which there cannot be a monopoly."

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, I thought the hon. member said "in which there can be monopoly." I did not understand him. There are many things in connection with which there cannot be a monopoly. I have seen with my own eyes the destruction of competition by the powerful, advanced and efficiently managed concern squeezing out the small competitor by underselling him, and then getting control of the market and regulating the price according to its own sweet will. That is bound to happen where you have unrestrained and unrestricted competition. That problem is the most difficult one with which public men of to-day have to grapple. How are we going to do it? Are we to say that men shall not arrive at an agreement providing a reasonable profit? We know the weaknesses of humans, in their greed, their avarice and their desire for large returns.

But I do submit that the evidence heard by the commission satisfies me upon one point, and that is this, that what the minister described as cut-throat competition, but which I would describe as unrestrained or unrestricted competition, has in many instances created a monopoly which in the end has been injurious to the consuming public.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the commission has described it as "imperfect competition."

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so; I thank the right hon. gentleman. I think the adjective hardly gives the correct description.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the phrase they used.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is what was said. I have this to say: We are here to make a choice between one of two courses, the first of which is to prevent monopolies and the second to create if possible a situation which will ensure in the public interest that a reasonable price is paid by the consumer for his product. That is what we are endeavouring to do.

Let us leave out a discussion of the desirability or otherwise of monopoly. None of us wants monopolies; we do not want them in these days. Of course there are monopolies respecting telephones, and various other matters of that kind. That question has been discussed in a judgment delivered by the House of Lords in which the whole economic situation was reviewed. But, leaving that for the moment, we come to the second problem which confronts us: How can we create a condition by legislation which will ensure the benefits of a reasonable price to the consumers and at the same time prevent the maintenance of monopolies? In other words, how can communities 1, 2, 3 and 4 continue to operate, thereby maintaining the economic life of communities 1, 2, 3 and 4 as against the baneful effects of competition which would destroy communities 1 and 4 and leave 2 and 3 in control? How can we do it? Is there any way other than that suggested in the bill?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe the expression "wasteful and demoralizing" is used.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I put that to the committee. How otherwise can we do it? One, two, three and four arrive at an agreement. The agreement is that the profits resulting from their efforts shall not exceed either a percentage upon the turnover or a rate upon the business transactions, but shall be according to some agreement that commends itself to the commission as being reasonable. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) was right, namely, that we should not provide for inefficient business. We have always objected to inefficient business being made the standard of measurement with respect to operations, or anything else. There is nothing more injurious than, as was done in one case in Canada, to the detriment of every consumer, to take an inefficient business and make it the standard for the determination of tariff assistance or aid. You cannot do it. Efficiency is the first factor in determining whether or not there shall be a grant of tariffs to an industry. Speaking about inefficiency, I have in mind a case which was brought to my attention since I have been in office where the complaint was made that they could not make money. The answer was clear: "You cannot make money with obsolete machinery." You cannot make money or you cannot have a return unless you have good management and unless you have proper machinery. The unfortunate position is, as we have it in industry to-day, that you cannot do by man power that which is being done more effectively by machinery by a competing company. For instance in the cotton industry there are great mills. One mill in Canada is possibly equal to any mill in the world. But, what has been the result in Japan? Why is Japan in such a fortunate position to-day? Because Japan has efficient machinery and management, and in some cases is working in competition with old and worn out machinery.

The problem, I repeat, is this: How can I save one, two, three and four by ensuring that they get a relative share of all the business, and at the same time prevent the destruction of one, two and three by number four, which has a monopoly of the whole business and takes one, two and three out of production. I know of no way in which it can be done other than by providing that these people make arrangements among themselves. That is, if they do it amongst themselves, that we do not mark them as criminals for so doing.

Mr. EULER: Would it have to be unanimous?

Mr. BENNETT: That is a matter about which I shall not express an opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will have to be settled at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: I had about concluded all that I desired to say except to point out that I know of no method by which the end aimed at could be accomplished except by use of an agreement such as this. It will be observed that the agreements relate first of all to a specified industry; they must be arrived at by the persons engaged in that industry and are to modify existing competition by the control and regulation of price and production. If by so doing the action should result in injury to, that is one, or undue restraint of trade, two, or be detrimental to the public interest, three, or against the public interest, four, the governor in council must take official action, which means that the government approves of the action taken.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My purpose in rising is not to question what the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was saying earlier in the discussion with respect to unrestrained and unrestricted competition having led to mergers and monopolies but to take issue with what my right hon. friend said as to the combines act having in any way been responsible for the creation of mergers. That statement has been made by hon. gentlemen opposite from time to time, and, I think, wholly without any justification. Mergers have been part of the order of the day during the last quarter century or more and they certainly had become extensive at the time the Combines Investigation Act was first introduced in 1910. The purpose of that act was not to preclude mergers or combines, as it was recognized that, with world competition what it was becoming, large combinations of capital as well as of labour were part of the inevitable trend. In the light of that it was felt desirable that there should be enacted legislation which would prevent those large combinations which were likely to become more numerous and more powerful from operating in a manner which would be detrimental to the public. The offence was not the formation of a combination, a monopoly or a merger; it was the operation of these powerful combinations in a manner which was detrimental to the public interest. This whole question was gone into fully before the price spreads commission and in the light of the frequent representations from some hon. gentlemen opposite, including the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), the commission made a very definite statement on the point. In dealing with the administration of the combines act, the commission report on page 266 as follows:

> We regard the first, a rigorous enforcement of the combines act, as most important.

And continuing:

> The act does not by its terms, or by the manner of its present enforcement, hamper any combination that would operate in the public interest,—

That statement could not be more definite, and that is made, I gather, as the result of the discussion and consideration of that very point. My right hon. friend mentions that the combines act is very similar to the Sherman anti-trust act and that the Sherman anti-trust act had been directed specifically against combinations as such. That is perfectly correct with respect to the purpose of the Sherman act, but at the time our Combines Investigation Act was introduced the difference on the point in question between the Sherman act and our act was made clear to the house when it was considering the measure. It is true that certain provisions of both measures are very similar, for example those that have to do with investigations. The difference is that in the Sherman act a trust qua trust is an offence and is considered a combination detrimental to the public interest whereas under the Canadian Combines Investigation Act it was set forth frankly at the time of its introduction that in the order of things it might be expected that these large combinations would increase and that it was therefore necessary to prevent their exercising their power against the public interest. The offence that was set forth was the antisocial practices of any species of combination. The Combines Investigation Act might equally well have been called the mergers investigation act or the trusts investigation act or the monopolies investigation act as all were placed exactly on the same footing in the original act and are exactly on the same footing in the present act.

While I am speaking on this section there is another point I should like to bring up with reference to the report of the price spreads commission. The commission emphasized emphatically the necessity of the need of more effective control of monopolies and especially the enforcement of one or two provisions of the present combines act with respect to the lowering of tariffs or the withdrawal of certain patent rights in the event of offences occurring under the act where a remedy might be afforded through either of these methods of redress. I do not see anything in the legislation which the government has brought forward thus far to indicate that it is taking any action with respect to the recommendations of the commission as to the control of monopolies. I may not have seen all that is forthcoming, but that would appear to be one of the phases of the commission's report that is certainly deserving of careful consideration in the light of the tendencies of the day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to refer to the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman that there might be an improvement in the draftsmanship of subsection 4. This subsection reads:

> In any case where the governor in council has approved an agreement under this section, no prosecution of a party to such agreement shall be instituted under the Combines Investigation Act or the criminal code—

Perhaps this should read, "under the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act or under the provisions of the criminal code." If I got the right hon. gentleman's suggestion correctly, I believe that will cover the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The minister has not got my meaning. It should refer to those provisions of the criminal code which have to do with agreements which are against the public interest. As the section now reads a man might be guilty of any offence under the criminal code but if he was lucky enough to be a party to an agreement he could not be prosecuted under the code. My hon. friend would meet what I have in view if he would insert the words, "sections 496, 497 and 498 of the criminal code." Those are the sections of the code which relate to offences under agreements in restraint of trade.

Mr. BENNETT: We had that in originally but as the numbering of the sections of the criminal code is changing so frequently I suggested this wording. It is limited to offences arising in the performance of such agreements and I think it would be construed by a court to mean an offence of that nature. In view of what the right hon. gentleman has said, we might put in the words, "or the appropriate sections of the criminal code."

Mr. HACKETT: Does not the definition in (h) cover that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By unanimous consent this section might be amended to read, "or sections 496, 497 and 498 of the criminal code." If there is any difficulty in connection with the numbering, it could be made to read, "or the appropriate sections of the criminal code."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Or "the relevant sections."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Or the relevant sections." I suggest that amendment.

Mr. YOUNG: This afternoon, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was speaking, he referred to competition leading to monopoly and I think his argument was something like this: that where you have free competition the more efficient gradually gobble up, shall I say, the less efficient, and the numbers of those engaged in the industry are gradually reduced until the more efficient have a monopoly of the business. I wonder how many monopolies we have in this country that have grown up and have perpetuated themselves on that basis and that basis alone. Apart from what we might call natural monopolies, such as railways, telephones and so on, have we a single monopoly in this country that has not been fostered and is not living to-day by reason of some special privilege granted to it, aside from the efficiency of the operation of that business? I doubt whether we have a single one. As business grows bigger it becomes harder to manage and ultimately it reaches the point where efficiency is impossible in that business. One of the chief causes of inefficiency is bigness; there is a limit to what the human mind can manage. I was talking the other day to a man engaged in the warehousing and trucking business, the manager of a small company, and he told me he was in direct competition with one of the largest concerns in the dominion; and he said, "We can undersell them, we can undercut them everywhere. We can handle at 40 cents a ton a commodity which would cost them 70 cents." I asked him how this was possible and he replied, "Because of the very size of the concern. It costs a tremendous amount of money to be efficient."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And you accepted that as proof?

Mr. YOUNG: I accept it as an example of what happens; it is perhaps not sufficient for proof. but it is an illustration of what happens. Now how will you secure efficiency in an industry which is not exposed to competition such as that? The competition of the smaller concern will force the larger concern to become efficient or go out of business, or will undermine the larger concern in the end. Without that competition, and with such an arrangement as is contemplated in this bill, how will you provide that efficiency for the larger business? It cannot be done. The competition of the other concern is the only thing that will drive them to it. Mr. Carlisle, president of the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, came before the price spreads committee and told us that in 1920 a 30 x 3½ tire sold for $25.35; to-day that same tire sells for $3.96 and the mileage, he said, had been doubled. What has been the driving force that enabled the tire makers of this country to put that tire on the market at a mere fraction, about one-sixth of what it cost fifteen years ago?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Science.

Mr. YOUNG: Science?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Absolutely.

Mr. YOUNG: We will grant that. The development of science, improvement of methods and so on have made it possible to do that. But what has passed on to the consuming public of the country the advantage of that development? Competition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mass production.

Mr. YOUNG: If the company that first improved its methods and took advantage of all those improvements had had no competition, it would have charged the same price and put the excess in its own pocket; and what would have been the result? We should now be paying as much as ever for our tires and there would not be as many men employed in making them to-day. But because there were competitors, because one man found a way of improving his methods and selling his tires a little cheaper, in order to get business, he forced his neighbour to do the same thing, and one working against the other forced the price to what it is to-day, with the result that the public get the benefit of the advancement and workmen get the advantage of a wider market and more employment. Failing that, the benefit would all have gone to a few proprietors, capitalists as we call them, and there would have been less employment and less use of tires in the country.

The problem, said the Prime Minister, is this. You have industries 1, 2, 3, 4, located in communities 1, 2, 3, 4; are you going to allow competition to destroy industry No. 1, industry No. 2 and industry No. 3, and the communities that depend on those industries? Are you going to allow competition to destroy them and build up No. 4?

Mr. BENNETT: Unfair competition.

Mr. YOUNG: Well, we have first to define what is unfair competition. I want to ask this question. Are you going to set up in this country an industrial system under which, because communities 1, 2, 3, 4 are located where industries 1, 2, 3, 4 are operating, and because those communities are dependent upon those industries, industry must never change? Will you pass a law to provide that competition shall never be allowed to destroy industry 1, 2, 3 or 4? If you do you will petrify industry in this country—and I mean just that word. Not only will you stop it growing but you will drive the life out of it; you will ruin and kill industry in this country, because it is impossible to maintain industry on that basis and keep it going forever.

The Prime Minister referred to the competition of the Japanese textile makers, and what he said was most interesting. He said that the reason we find it so hard to compete with the Japanese is that they have the most up to date machinery, efficient workmen and efficient management.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He said those were some of the reasons.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not specify the real reason.

Mr. YOUNG: Well, those were the reasons he did specify, and he said that against that we are trying to compete with obsolete machinery and a capital structure that had been resold to the public three times.

Mr. BENNETT: I was talking about Lancashire.

Mr. YOUNG: Lancashire?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I was not talking about Canada at all at that moment.

Mr. YOUNG: I did not think my right hon. friend mentioned Lancashire.

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. BENNETT: I think I spoke of the Lancashire people. We have not had a recapitalization of these industries as they have had in Lancashire.

Mr. YOUNG: I think we have some obsolete machinery in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: We have some of the most up to date machinery in the British empire.

Mr. YOUNG: Well, I was going through a factory in Montreal and they showed me an immense room full of second hand machinery which they were bringing in from the United States. Now, by laws such as we are proposing to put on our books, or by the tariff structure, are we going to continue forever to protect any industry, simply because it is Canadian, against the efficient industry of Japan, or shall we rather say to the Canadian industry, "If you want to survive in this country you must become efficient, just as efficient as the Japanese or anyone else, and the test of that efficiency is to put you in competition with these people."

Mr. STANLEY: Starvation wages.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, 15 cents for women and 25 cents a day for men.

Mr. YOUNG: My hon. friend is guessing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not guessing.

Mr. YOUNG: This is the evidence that came before the price spreads committee, given by a Canadian textile man himself. He said that the people in Japan who were engaged in this industry were living well and were well treated; and that is more than can be said for the people engaged in the same industry in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Living on rice.

Mr. YOUNG: When the textile manufacturers came to the government in 1930 and asked for higher duties on their products, assuring the government at the time that they would not take advantage of those higher duties to charge a higher price to the people of Canada, I wonder whether they told the government then that if their request were granted, the people of this country would not be able to wear as many clothes as they had been doing. No, they did not. If they had told the government at that time that they would not be able to supply us with the same quantity and quality of goods we had been using before at the prices we had been paying before, they would not have got the protection even from my right hon. friend. But they did not tell him that; they told him that they would not raise the price. Technically they did not, but practically they did by reducing the quality, with the result that the people of this country had to wear fewer clothes than they were wearing before and the wages paid by the industries were reduced. Although imports of textiles from other countries were shut out, the Canadian manufacturers did not supply the deficiency, and I frankly accuse them of breaking faith with the government; for when they come and ask for a market for themselves, they are under a moral obligation to supply that market without any decrease in the supply or in the value.

Under this legislation it will be possible for those people to come together and agree on prices and terms which will make it unnecessary for them to compete with efficient producers in either their own country or abroad. As I said before, as concerns get bigger and bigger, it is harder and harder for them to become efficient. Left as they had been, if there were no competition from abroad, more efficient concerns would develop in this country and force them out of business or to become efficient. But under this legislation, once they reach a certain point they can get together; all they have to do is to cut prices under one another and then they can get permission under this legislation to form a combine and have a gentleman's agreement which will fix prices and make the people pay on the industry's cost of production and not on a basis of efficient production.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to leave the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) under a misapprehension; if what I said to-day left the impression that I was dealing with Canadian industry, I was not; I was talking about the recapitalization of business that had been sold to the public so many times in Lancashire. It will be recalled that at the very time we were dealing with the problem, there was a reduction by the courts in England in the capital structure of one of the enterprises by a sum that amounted in our money to millions. I am mentioning that only lest there should have been a misapprehension.

All trusts popularly so-called have not been offences against the Sherman act. The steel trust, so-called, won its case in the Supreme Court of the United States; Mr. Kellogg was able to convince the court that it did not contravene the provisions of the Sherman act. In this country what the leader of the opposition has said is true: the question of the public interest has been the test to be applied under the combines act's powers. In the criminal code we still use the word "undue." I daresay many members have read Mr. Herbert's Misleading Cases in which he refers so humorously to "the reasonable man" that no one has ever been able to discover, who determines the issue in all cases. That is what is meant by the difficulty of determining what is unfair, undue. I purposely did not touch this point this afternoon because it is not a proper thing to compare the scale of wages and things of that sort in other countries with that which obtains in our own. If the hon. member will take the trouble to read the Sunday number of the New York Times of two weeks ago yesterday, he will find a complete report upon the whole situation with respect to the cost of production. One of the very difficulties we are labouring under to-day in connection with our dealings with Japan is the question of cost production.

As regards efficient machinery, I desire to repeat that there is in Canada a cotton mill that has as efficient machinery as there is in the British empire, if it is not more efficient than any other. The second hand machinery that my hon. friend referred to and that came into Canada was efficient machinery, but it was because of the shifting of the business from northern United States to the south where cotton is produced, that the very best machinery that could be manufactured had to be sold and either moved down to where the cotton was grown or else brought into this country. That so-called second hand machinery contains the last word in manufacture in the way of patented methods for the production of textiles cheaply, just as the shoe making machinery that was sold by this continent to the countries of Europe has enabled them by improving on it to sell their boots in once free trade England and other parts of the world in successful competition against every other producer. I refer to the Battle Shoe Company of which my hon. friend has knowledge.

Mr. YOUNG: How will the right hon. gentleman provide for efficiency in the absence of competition?

Mr. BENNETT: Just as I suggest would be done here—make the most efficient the standard of your agreement. Then you have a measure of competition. Some people think there is no competition among the banks. They say there is no competition among the elevator companies. There was a time in western Canada, as the hon. gentleman knows—he has been there as long as I—before we had a statute to regulate the charge that could be made by elevator companies, when every man sought to charge just as much as he could get. Then a statute was passed by which a fixed charge was established. No one will say that because of that competition has ceased; on the other hand competition is extremely keen and the character of the business has been improved by that competition. You get competition under these agreements even if you do maintain the price, because each man will be struggling to advance his own interests by the service that he gives the customer.

Mr. YOUNG: Under this legislation let us take the case of my right hon. friend with industries numbers 1, 2, 3 and 4. Number 1 is, we will say, the most efficient, so it becomes the standard. Somebody else, not in No. 1, 2, 3 or 4, might devise a more efficient method of production, but under this legislation an agreement could be entered into by numbers 1, 2, 3 and 4 by which No. 5 could not come into the field at all, and thereby you would bring industry to the point where further production was impossible.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing to stop No. 5. This deals only with those now in the business.

Mr. YOUNG: The agreement stops progress.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not have anything to do with No. 5, that does not at present exist.

Mr. YOUNG: How is production regulated if others come in?

Mr. BENNETT: This applies only to those that are in existence.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 15—Duties of commission.

Mr. COOTE: Will this commission have power to set standards for motor oils and gasoline, for instance? It seems to me that would be a fine place to start if they have such powers. At the present time we are paying exorbitant prices at most service stations and garages for motor oils. We may pay the highest price that is asked for any oil and still have no way of knowing whether we are getting a high class oil. I would like to know what is contemplated as being possible for the commission to provide for us under section 15.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): Under section 15 there is no provision for fixing standards as such of any commodity. The duties of the commission are defined in subsection 1:

> The commission shall be charged with responsibility for the prosecution of offences against acts of the parliament of Canada and regulations thereunder, relating to commodity standards—

That may be set up under another section. If the hon. gentleman will look at sections 16 and 17, he will find that the commission may refer to the research council for study, investigation, report and advice upon all matters relating to commodity standards. They may also on the request of the proper department of government make reports, and furnish any information desired. But there certainly will be no fixing of prices. Under section 18 there is such a thing as setting up a standard to be a national trade standard.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Additional powers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether I understand this section or not; I know the national research council formerly had a good deal to say on a great many questions, but this is going to make it almost a monopoly in regard to graded commodity standards, including agriculture. I should like to know how far it is meant to go. In section 15 the commission is charged with responsibility for the prosecution of offences—in regard to standardized products. Standardized products are defined in the interpretation section. It includes making the grades for anything, not only processed commodities, but commodities like grain, vegetables, fruit, eggs, anything. Has all that got to go to the research council as a final court of appeal, but first through the commission? If it has, we are going to have a terribly circumlocutory way of getting these grades established or changed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is purely permissive. If the hon. gentleman will read section 16 carefully he will observe that it gives additional powers to the commission to "request" the research council to do so and so. It arms the national research council with authority on the request of the commission from time to time to do certain things.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Where does the commission get the authority?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not to the exclusion of other authority, such as the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It does not say that here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This very question was under discussion recently with the officials of the Department of Agriculture. Of course I quite understand that they want to preserve their jurisdiction and authority and power. I submit that there is nothing in the section which derogates in the slightest degree from the powers and authority conferred upon the Department of Agriculture or other departments of the government to do certain things. But in this section 16 power is given to the national research council to do certain things if requested by this dominion trade commission. Certainly if the national research council were not properly equipped to do the work, and a department of the government, such as the Department of Agriculture, was fully equipped, they would never ask the research council to do it. This is purely and simply an enabling clause; there is nothing compulsory about it. Neither, as I construe it, does it give any monopoly to the national research council to do certain things to the exclusion of any other authority.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That explanation does not explain at all to me, as there is no suggestion even that the various other departments first request the services of either the commission or the research council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In section 15 no reference is made to any department having any authority about it. The commission and the research council are the only bodies mentioned, and apparently they are the final court of appeal with regard to grading wheat, for instance—and I think we shall soon have to have something done about preserving wheat grades the way it is being administered. It all inferentially at least has to go to the research council. There is a monopoly being established right under our eyes.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Reports in respect of products forwarded.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I ask the committee to be good enough to allow clause 17 to stand, because at the request of the chairman of the national research council there has been drafted a very short subsection relating to their protection in case of adverse reports.

Section stands.

Sections 18 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On section 24—Cooperation with boards of trade, et cetera.

Mr. GERSHAW: Could the minister tell us why boards of trade and chambers of commerce are especially mentioned here? Would it not be in order for the commission to assist responsible bodies in any community, the city council or otherwise?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My understanding of the reason for naming the boards of trade and chambers of commerce is that it follows the report of the royal commission. The draftsman followed that as far as he could, according to his instructions. Those bodies represent the commercial community rather than the community as a whole.

Mr. GERSHAW: The board of trade may not be a very responsible body. If the commission could assist a council or an elective body it might be more advantageous.

Mr. BENNETT: It is only in connection with arbitrations, and the division of the Boards of Trade Act dealing with arbitrations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think if the hon. gentleman will refer to the Boards of Trade Act under which these boards of trade are incorporated he will see what it means. This is only in reference to a particular object, that is commercial arbitrations, being conducted by or under the authority of a board of trade or chamber of commerce. They are the only body authorized by the Boards of Trade Act to conduct such investigations.

Section agreed to.

On section 25—Investigations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The draftsman has called my attention to the fact that there should be a slight amendment to this section. The section at present reads:

> 25. The commission shall have authority, when so required by the governor in council, to study, investigate, report and advise upon questions relating to the general trend of social or economic conditions or to any social or economic problem of Canada, and shall cooperate, when so required, with the economic council in connection with any economic investigation.

I desire to have inserted after the words "economic council" in line 27 the words:

> —established under the Economic Council of Canada Act, 1935.

Mr. RHODES: I so move.

Mr. NEILL: In that connection who is to do the "requiring"? What body is to require the commission to take action?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The governor in council.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 26—New securities issues.

Mr. ILSLEY: This section I suppose is to carry out the recommendation of the price spreads commission that there be a securities control board. But I point out that this board is not to function under this section unless requested so to do by the Secretary of State. My submission is that it may not function at all. This section may be a dead letter entirely. If it is to be a dead letter it should not be put on the statute book as a sort of pretence. It should be made a real live section and it should apply to security issues. There was no part of the Prime Minister's radio addresses in which he was more emphatic than this:

> The searchlight of publicity must be focussed on every issue of securities offered to the public. Adequate machinery must be set up to inquire into and report on corporate developments which tend towards consolidation and concentration. In other words the door must be locked before, not after the horse is stolen.

That was taken by the people of Canada —it could only be taken—to mean that the door would be locked before the horse was stolen; that before securities were placed before the public for subscription some board or body would pass upon them.

Mr. BENNETT: It did not say that; it was very careful not to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should be much interested to know just what the Prime Minister meant by that.

Mr. BENNETT: He can tell you in a moment.

Mr. ILSLEY: This section 26 may mean nothing at all. When will the Secretary of State ask the commission to investigate and review the capital structure of a company? Will it be after there has been complaint throughout the country that investors have been taken in?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely my hon. friend is not serious.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly am. Let the Prime Minister or the Minister of Trade and Commerce state what the section means.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is very suspicious. If he will read what I said in January he will find that I made no observations that possibly could be construed as advocating the setting up of such a commission. I have given some little attention to this matter, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman said the other evening. I have given some attention to this question for some years, for a period of twenty years and more as a matter of fact, if that information is of any use to the hon. gentleman, and I will confess that whenever I found a government institution set up for the purpose of giving its imprimatur of approval to the issues of securities, it has created a difficulty because it is then relied upon. Notwithstanding all that you may say to the contrary, that fact remains. As will be observed, this section contemplates new security issues, which the Secretary of State may refer to this board for investigation. All new security issues do not require to be investigated; no one suggests that they do. A moment ago the hon. gentleman spoke of the door being locked after the horse is stolen. I am sure he was not deliberately exaggerating when he made that statement; surely he has not looked at the provisions of the Companies Act with respect to what I conceive to be the governing factor, namely the prospectus upon which securities may be sold. The law as it will be passed by this parliament will meet the difficulty that we have experienced in times past, of prospectuses being issued which have avoided making the statements that I conceive to be necessary for the purpose of informing the public as to the true condition of the companies whose securities are being sold. I may say that at one time I thought the purpose would be served by endorsing across the face of the share certificate in red ink that the property covered by the security issues of this company cost the promoters so many dollars. The prospectus as outlined in the Companies Act, as it will be amended by the act now before the house, is far stronger than that. It goes further; it meets the difficulty I have always experienced, the difficulty that probably most of us who have practised corporation law in days gone by will clearly appreciate. That is this: When the exploiting promoter got hold of the company he secured all its common shares, its preferred shares and its bonds for so much money, without determining how much was for bonds, how much for preferred shares and how much for common stock. Then he sold them as the purchaser of them, and the terms of the prospectus of the company, or the statement in lieu of prospectus, left him entirely out of the picture. As a result the public was hooked; that is the short way to put it. Now I do submit that the amendments proposed by the Secretary of State meet that situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: If they are constitutional. I am not raising the point; the Secretary of State raised it.

Mr. BENNETT: What the Secretary of State raised was the question whether it might not be an interference with property and civil rights in view of the fact that in the case before the privy council it was held that the security frauds act was intra vires of the provincial legislature in respect of provincial companies. It will be recalled that the case arose in Alberta and part of the court was of opinion that we could not interfere with a federal company in connection with these matters. The privy council took another view; it held that the province had certain powers that it could properly so exercise. The Secretary of State has nothing to guide him with respect to what the effect of that decision may be upon our powers in that regard, but the Secretary of State has inserted the provision that any purchaser, any broker, who buys these securities now must buy them on the terms of that prospectus which must be in the terms set out in the statute. That is the most advanced legislation we have had so far in this country to protect the public against fraud with respect to these sales of securities. I suppose the hon. gentleman knows from his practice, as well as I know, how difficult it has been adequately to safeguard the investing public by any suggestions that may be made. I have seen one suggestion after the other brought forward and tried, and if my own observation may be worth anything it is that the security frauds acts as enacted by the provinces probably have gone as far as any legislation that has been passed in Canada in that regard, but we had to go another step forward. It is the old story of publishing a statement in lieu of a prospectus and then having the securities sold as I have indicated, that enabled the irregularities to be created that brought about the scandals to which reference has been made.

Certainly in the legislation now before the house we have overcome that difficulty as the Secretary of State has said. Without desiring to express an opinion that might be open to question, in view of the security frauds case, as to how far the provinces may go in that matter, my own view is that we have followed the principle of law laid down by the privy council that when you have power to create something you have power to impose the conditions under which it shall exercise the powers that have been conferred upon it. When we create a corporation we say that one of the conditions under which that corporation may part with its securities is that the purchase of those securities by the promoters or the brokers shall be upon the terms of the prospectus, which shall constitute the terms of the bargain.

I think in fairness my hon. friend will regard that as a very distinct advance; I do, at any rate. The other evening the hon. gentleman indicated that I had no idea of my own intentions in the matter. Well, I am much older than he and I practised my profession for a considerable number of years before coming here. I have given a considerable amount of time to the study of that problem. Certainly I make no claim to any special knowledge of it, but I do say that in the discussions I have had with the Secretary of State for the purpose of trying to safeguard the public in connection with the sale of these securities, we believe we have gone further than anything that has been done before in Canada with that end in view. I do not intend to discuss the Companies Act to-night; that will come later, but I still think the section dealing with watered stock is one of the most difficult of all sections to deal with. I am still opposed to no par value shares, and if the price spreads commission had recommended that they be abolished I would have been glad to support that recommendation, but they were careful to suggest the alternative. They have given the imprimatur of their approval to no par value shares, to which I am opposed personally and against which I shall vote in this house if the opportunity arises. I am still against them.

Mr. ILSLEY: You are the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: But the Companies Act is an entirely different measure from these others. That is an act in connection with which recommendations were made, and the price spreads commission were not specific in that sense. I said to the Secretary of State, as he stated to the house the other day, that I believed it was a measure of such a character that every member of the house should be free to express his views and take the course that might suggest itself to him as the best way to serve the public interest. That is why the Companies Act is in that form. If the opportunity arises, however, I still will vote against no par value shares. There is an article in the last issue of the Canadian Bar Review, written I think by a gentleman in Montreal, which is well worth reading. He also is opposed to no par value shares as I am, but it does not follow that the price spreads commission may not have been right in saying that the alternative view is quite as sound as the view which I hold. Therefore I do not desire to say that I have any monopoly of wisdom with respect to that matter. It may well be that the members of the price spreads commission and those associated with that work were right in recommending the alternative suggestion to the Canadian people rather than the abolition of these shares, but the reasons given in the article to which I have referred I think are such as will commend themselves to anyone. So this country is able to have a revising, reviewing body in the case of new securities without giving the imprimatur of governmental sanction and without the necessity for referring to this body the issues of every new company created. If the law with respect to prospectuses is observed, and if the law with respect to watered stock is observed—and I shall discuss that phase of the matter when the time comes—under this section, namely:

> The commission shall in any case, if requested by the Secretary of State, investigate and review the capital structure of any company incorporated by or under any act of the parliament of Canada, proposing to issue new shares, debentures or other securities to the public

—We cannot deal with the old ones. That is clear. They are done. And the injury which has been done by the issue of some of them we shall never be able to undo, particularly among some people who purchased them. But we can say this: If it is of sufficient importance, and if it is felt there is any doubt, something may be done. If the hon. member will bear in mind this single fact he will realize how difficult it is to carry into effect the regulations of a body to which all these matters would be referred: that the provinces have coequal powers with us in the creation of companies. That is our difficulty. At a conference I attended with provincial premiers it was agreed that we should have a uniform act; then when we began to discuss the terms the only uniformity was the uniformity of objections. They were very uniform indeed. To-day we cannot take that power away from them. If we set up a board and said that every company incorporated had to pass that board before it was allowed to be incorporated, the business in federal charters would be insignificant. But if we do it, as I believe we have, by imposing such restrictions upon the sale of securities as will prohibit their being sold unless under the terms of a prospectus, then I believe we have met the difficulty. Our regulations for the issue of prospectuses are more stringent and those who issue them are asked for fuller information than is required in connection with prospectuses in any other country of the world. I say that, after some knowledge of British empire requirements, and those in the United States. I think after study it will be found that in no country of the world are there imposed as rigid and strict provisions regarding a prospectus and its contents, and the provisions for the sale of securities, as are found in our statutes. In this instance however if the minister in charge feels there is some doubt or difficulty he may refer the matter to the board, in respect of new securities.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know the Prime Minister has given a great deal of thought to this matter because I believe I read the first speech he made in this chamber, in 1911, when he made reference to the problem of watered stock and how it could be prevented. But that does not touch the question whether or not anything effective has really been done.

I was somewhat at a loss to follow the Prime Minister's argument. In one breath he states it is unsound for any board to give the imprimatur of government sanction to the issue of securities; in another he states the section is to have that effect. If the Prime Minister had control of the administration of the act it would appear that there would be no references to the board, because that would be doing what is essentially unsound, namely giving the imprimatur of government sanction to security issues, thereby leading the public to think that the stock was not watered. That is just our objection. We fear that is the spirit in which the act will be administered, and that there will be no security issues referred to the tariff board at all. The tariff board, whatever can be said about the time it may have to investigate unfair trade practices, the set-up of commodity standards, and the supervision and enforcement of a great number of things, certainly will not have time to supervise the issue of securities by public companies incorporated under dominion charters. I am of the opinion that practically nothing will be done in this connection, and that we are just deluding ourselves if we think there will be. Certainly the "searchlight of publicity" being "focused on every issue of securities offered to the public" would be taken by the ordinary individual to mean something more than the filing of prospectuses. Last spring the Secretary of State said that he went as far as he could in providing for the filing of prospectuses, and last Friday he stated he was going farther, but that he was afraid further action would impinge upon provincial jurisdiction in the matter of property and civil rights, and that he had always been against the filching of provincial jurisdiction under the guise of criminal legislation, when the legislation was not in its essence criminal. So, altogether, my humble submission is that the promises of January last have not been fulfilled. I consider if we are going to have a securities control board we should have a securities control board which would supervise all issues of securities to the public, and if we are not going to have a securities control board do not let us make a pretence of having one by passing an optional section which will impose upon the members of the tariff board, sometimes, and under some secretaries of state, a task which is beyond their ability to cope with, in view of their other extensive duties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry the hon. member thinks so poorly of this section, because I have to confess that I drafted it. Having considered the whole position we came to the conclusion that it would be wrong and not in the public interest to set up a board which would give such approval as would enable the buying public to say, "This has the O.K. of the Canadian government." I think that would be radically wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe the minister is overestimating the danger.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a matter of opinion in connection with which my judgment may be just as good as the hon. member's, or his as good as mine. However that is the view we took. The companies branch of the Department of the Secretary of State has always been very well operated, I believe. In days gone by I had considerable experience with that branch, and that was my experience. Under the present Secretary of State I have no doubt the branch has been well run, because I do not believe there has ever been in that position a gentleman who understood company law as well as the present Secretary of State understands it. It has been the practice under his aegis, during the past five years, to review all new applications, within the limitations of the Companies Act. Hon. members familiar with the companies Act and amendments thereto, particularly those relating to prospectuses, will know that it is not necessary to refer every new issue of stock. Take the case of a simple company with common $100 par value shares; why should it be necessary to have that new issue referred to a commission, such as herein indicated, if the other provisions of the Companies Act are complied with? Where there are several kinds of securities, such as contemplated by the Companies Act, there may be occasions when investigations are required. And there are safeguarding provisions in the following subsections. That will take care of any situation which may arise. There is full power of investigation if the Secretary of State thinks it is necessary to have an investigation. There is power to disapprove or reject, which is very important. There is no power of approval, and in my opinion we should not give effect to the formal approval of any issue because I can see that such approval would be capitalized by every bond and stock salesman in Canada. They would go out and say, "This has received government approval," and the people would be duped by that sort of thing. I think this section goes a long way, and I assure the committee that it was not put into the bill without the most careful consideration.

Mr. EULER: Will subsections 3, 4, and 5 apply independently of section 1?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. EULER: Subsection 1 reads:

(1) The commission shall in any case, if requested by the Secretary of State, investigate and review the capital structure of any company incorporated by or under any act of the parliament of Canada.

Should the Secretary of State not make that request, would the commission still be under the necessity of asking to be furnished with full information as provided by subsection 2?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Subsections 2, 3 and 4 follow on from subsection 1. If the Secretary of State requests the commission to investigate and review the capital structure of any company proposing to make a new issue, then subsection 2 would apply as an enabling provision, subsection 3 would apply as limiting the power, while subsection 4 would make it an offence for any person to be a party or privy to or assist in the issue of any securities which has been made without compliance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. EULER: If the Secretary of State makes no request to the commission as provided for in subsection 1, subsections 2, 3, 4 and 5 would not apply?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is my understanding.

Section 27 agreed to.

On section 28—Publication of certain reports.

Mr. YOUNG: Does this section mean that the agreements as suggested in section 14 shall be published?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It means just what it says. The section reads:

1. The commission shall within fifteen days after making any report, recommendation or finding under this act make the same public in such manner as seems desirable unless the commission is unanimously of the opinion that the public interest would not be served by publication, or that the public interest would be better served by withholding publication.

If the agreements to which the hon. gentleman is referring are included in any report, recommendation or finding, then they must be made public.

Mr. YOUNG: In the case of an agreement for the regulation of production and prices, would it not be better to have it published before rather than after it is entered into, in order to give any interested parties an opportunity to make representations?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member means after they are made but before they are approved.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, before they are approved?

Mr. BENNETT: There is something in that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That did not occur to me and I shall give consideration to the matter. Before the third reading I will read the remarks of the hon. gentleman, or perhaps I had better not take the bill out of committee.

Section agreed to.

On section 29—When the act comes into force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Why has the minister selected the first day of October as the day upon which this act shall come into force?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some time must elapse for the printing and circulating of the bill, but it could be September 1 or August 1, or it could come into force upon royal assent. This bill is being put in under the tariff board and some time must be allowed to them to make the necessary preparations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This bill must be considered in relation to the amendment to the Combines Investigation Act which as I read it will come into force as soon as it is given the royal assent. Unless some change is made in the provisions of that bill there will be a hiatus during which there would be no body charged with the administration of the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am advised that they are to amend the other bill in order that they come into force simultaneously. With the consent of the committee I should like to revert to section 17 which has to do with the national research council. The national research council will have to make reports from time to time in connection with the ingredients of any commodity or any adulterants which a commodity may be found to contain, and subsection 2 states that these reports shall not be used for advertising purposes. It has been felt that as a report might contain statements with respect to the commodity of certain companies or individuals, the members of the council, which is a body corporate, should be protected against action. For their protection the following subsection is being suggested:

(3) No action or other proceedings may be instituted against the national research council or any officer or employee of the council in respect of any advice, information, or report given or made in good faith under this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada.

Mr. RHODES: I move accordingly.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Under that subsection would the onus of showing good faith be upon the commission?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In my judgment the onus of showing lack of good faith would be upon the proponent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Not as it is drafted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that was the intention of the draftsman and I think it is covered by common law, as a matter of fact. I do not think this amendment would do any harm as it is being made at the request of the national research council.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It may not be very material but in my opinion the onus of showing good faith would be upon the commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think that follows.

Mr. ELLIOTT: If that is not intended it should be made quite clear. In my opinion the man who brings an action would have to overcome the question of good faith; he would have to show bad faith.

Amendment agreed to.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 111, to incorporate The Community General Hospital, Alms House and Seminary of Learning of the Sisters of Charity at Ottawa, Canada.—Mr. Gagnon.

EXCHANGE FUND

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 101, respecting the establishment of an exchange fund.

He said: The present state of international exchanges gives cause for apprehension on the part of all persons, especially having regard to the chaotic values in the leading currencies. It was hoped in 1933 that some stabilization would be possible, and efforts, as is known, were made to that end. But alas, nothing was concluded between the great nations of the world, and the result is that there have been very great fluctuations in values—the pound sterling, the dollar abroad, and all the currencies of continental Europe.

In his remarks in making the budget statement the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) referred to this fact; and it is in the opinion of the government desirable that machinery should be established that will at least serve some useful purpose if the occasion should arise to deal with a problem of this magnitude. Of course, it is only necessary for me to say that in Great Britain they have gone into the matter on a very tremendous scale. At one time they appropriated £150,000,000 to deal with this problem, and subsequently the amount was increased to £350,000,000 in order that the treasury might be able to take such action as might be desirable for the purpose of stabilizing the value of the pound sterling; and money for the purpose was obtained by the sale of treasury bills, that is, the sale of securities. During the last three years that fund has been operated with a very considerable measure of success. I will read from the statute, if it is desired, by which that fund was set up.

The government of the United States also provided for such a fund, resulting from the revaluation of the country's gold reserve from $20.67 to $35 an ounce. But that profit was not wholly used for that purpose; by a regulation passed in 1934 it was specifically provided that a portion of that fund might be available for that purpose, and the fund as established amounted to the very large sum of two thousand millions of dollars. It is entirely too early to express any opinion as to what the effect in that regard has been, but broadly and generally it must have served some useful purpose. That being so, we have concluded that we can serve some useful purpose in this country at this time by revaluing our gold reserves and permitting the profit that would accrue to be held in the special fund instead of being deposited in the consolidated fund, and if the occasion arises recourse can be had to this fund to stabilize our dollar abroad.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does this entail an amendment to the Currency Act?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it does not. There is no necessity for amending the Currency Act to accomplish the purpose we have in mind. The bill, however, will make this permissive rather than obligatory; that is, this provision will come into force when proclamation to that effect is issued. But it is intended to proceed with the revaluation at once. That, of course, arises from the action that was taken last year in the Bank of Canada Act and the subsequent order in council passed, to which reference has already been made in the house.

The change from the $20.67 valuation to the current value of gold is, of course, largely a bookkeeping entry. It is known that the forty per cent of the gold held by the banks has by order in council been made available for their foreign balances and foreign business. The effect of the revaluation will be to enable the Bank of Canada to make the necessary bookkeeping entries and complete the transaction; but the resultant profit, as I have said, will not be dealt with as provided for in the Bank of Canada Act but retained as a fund which may be available upon proclamation for the purpose of enabling whatever government is charged with the responsibility to utilize it for stabilization purposes.

It will be recalled that the gold purchases from the banks were on the basis of $20.67 per ounce. Some objection was made, but as a matter of fact all the gold was turned over to the Bank of Canada, and the reserves provided for under the Currency Act are twenty-five per cent in gold, under the Bank of Canada Act, with respect to our issue of paper money. This, of course, will have the effect of extending to some extent the issue power, because twenty-five per cent on the new valuation will create more gold than under the old valuation of $20.67. I think it will be agreed that it is probably not regarded as good common sense for the bank to be conducting business and making a report from month to month or week to week—I have the last week's beside me—on the basis of gold being valued at $20.67, as it has been doing ever since it came into being, when as a matter of fact in the markets of the world, alike in London, New York and Paris, gold has been sold at the figure of $35 and in some instances an odd cent or two more, in other instances an odd cent or two less than $35.

The provision of the bill does not contemplate any commitment being made in regard to the future policy of this country with respect to its monetary system. It is not intended so to do. It is rather to give effect by legislation to-day to the revaluation of our gold reserves and to provide by variation of the terms of the Bank of Canada Act that on proclamation this shall be available for the purpose of being utilized to support, if necessary, the value of our dollar abroad. As we proceed, I shall be prepared to answer any questions that may be asked as to the law prevailing in other countries, but I do not think I can say more with respect to the principle of the legislation than what I have already said.

Mr. EULER: What amount is made available under that rate?

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps we had better wait until we get into committee, and I shall give the information in detail.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not rise at this time to oppose the principle of this bill, the second reading of which has just been moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). At the outset of his remarks on the second reading, he referred to the apprehension in international circles and the chaotic values of various currencies. It is well known to every hon. member that the question of stabilization of international currencies was one of the major problems before the world conference in London in 1933. At that time, largely through the specific policy adopted by one of the nations at that conference of proceeding first of all with the raising of internal price levels before considering the question of stabilizations of international currencies, that question was shelved by the world conference. I regret that the government has not found it possible before this date to endeavour to do something along these lines.

The Prime Minister referred to the attempts already made on the one part by Great Britain and on the second part by the United States of America in the direction of creating exchange stabilization funds. I think it was in 1932 that Great Britain formed, as he said, a fund of £150,000,000. That was raised to £300,000,000 or £350,000,000 in 1933. The United States, when gold was revalued there, found themselves in possession of a profit of $2,800,000,000, of which $2,000,000,000 was immediately applied to the purposes of forming a stabilization fund. The point I should like to establish here is this, that despite the fact that this may be a desirable thing to do, it is giving only a very puny and insignificant protection to the Canadian dollar. We are sitting around the international table with only one chip while the other great nations have large stacks before them. What protection can we afford to our Canadian dollar with a humble $64,000,000, which is my estimate at the present time of what can be obtained from the present amount, when in Great Britain they have £350,000,000 probably augmented since that date because the operations of this fund are kept severely secret in both countries—in the United States $2,000,000,000?

Mr. YOUNG: Are we sitting in on a poker game?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My point is that you cannot protect the Canadian dollar with such a small fund as this. My opinion is that you must protect the Canadian dollar by the expansion of Canadian trade. That is far more vital protection than is the creation of a stabilization fund of the proportions of this one.

I wish to deal with the second feature which arises in connection with this bill. This is very largely by way of companion legislation to the Bank of Canada Act of last year. We remember that under that act power was taken to take their gold from the banks and transfer it to the Bank of Canada. Under the operation of that section a sum of $37,480,404.46 was taken over. Last year there was inserted in the Bank of Canada Act a section which gave the governor in council discretion to decide what proportion of the gold taken over from the chartered banks of Canada would be entitled to the profit as between $20.67 and $35; that is the proportion required by the banks for their outside commitments or foreign obligations. I should like to refer the house to some questions I asked during the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee last year of one of the heads of a chartered bank in Canada. I asked whether the banks themselves could definitely decide or assess the percentage that was required of the gold they actually held then for foreign commitments. The answer was as given on page 379 of the proceedings of last year: "I am sorry I cannot give you even an approximate idea. It would be difficult to tell you what the percentage would be." Despite the fact that the bank managers themselves, those who are running the chartered banks of Canada, were unable to assess the percentage of gold which was required for their external commitments, this government in its wisdom or unwisdom proceeded during the recess, on the 29th day of April, 1935, by P.C. 1110, to make an arbitrary assessment of 40 per cent to which the banks were entitled. Then it proceeded to give special concessions to two of those chartered banks, and the necessity for that is referred to, I must say, in the order in council, but has not yet been specifically explained to the house. As a result of the 40 per cent of the $37,480,404.46 I have mentioned, the amount of profit which will revert to the chartered banks would be $14,992,161.78, and to that must be added, according to the terms of the order in council, 60 per cent of the $300,000 to be returned to one chartered bank, or a sum of $180,000, and 60 per cent of $89,609 to another bank, or a sum of $53,765.40, or a total profit to be given back to the banks of $15,215,927.18, leaving the amount of gold with the Bank of Canada, which will be conjoined to the Finance Act gold for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of Bill No. 101, of $22,264,477.28. If we add to that the Finance Act gold which was also transferred to the Bank of Canada under the provisions of the legislation of last year, we have available for the purposes of the present bill a total of $91,670,500.31.

Last year we on this side protested very strongly against the principle of transferring not only the gold belonging to the chartered banks, amounting roughly to $37,000,000, but the Finance Act gold, the gold belonging to the taxpayers of the dominion, to a private corporation. Now we find that by Bill 101 which is before us for second reading, we have created a special fund, the profit arising from the revaluation of gold. I am very glad to see that in this bill most of the powers remain with the minister, with the government, except in regard to section 7 where there are some transactions and some powers given to the Bank of Canada in respect to certain negotiations concerning securities; in other words some negotiations affecting this gold are left, under the provisions of section 7, according to my interpretation, with the Bank of Canada. If they have left with the minister this power to deal with this contingent fund at a contingent date, I submit that the argument made last year is stronger than ever. This sum of $107,000,000 which has been transferred to the Bank of Canada will be worth to-day or to-morrow, whenever this bill is proclaimed, not $107,000,000 but $180,000,000. On a basis of twenty-five per cent of metallic coverage, which was the basis adopted at the conference of 1933 at which the Prime Minister was present, without the slightest suggestion of inflation that gold reserve of $180,000,000 entitles the Bank of Canada, if that should be its policy, to issue notes of the Dominion of Canada up to a total of $720,000,000 on a sound scientific principle. So I am sure the house will realize the tremendous power we placed in the hands of a private or quasi-private corporation last year, and I am glad that to a certain extent at least the government has abandoned some of its ideas of a year ago, and entrusted most of the control of this contingent fund to the minister, I presume the Minister of Finance.

I am not opposing this bill; as I have said before in this house I believe that we should use the note issue that is possible on a scientific basis due to the appreciated value of gold for the reduction of the national debt and for the substitution of non-interest bearing securities for maturing interest bearing bonds. That, however, is a suggestion that is not exactly germane to the principle of this legislation. I am not going to oppose the second reading of this bill; I hold as strongly as I did a year ago the opinion that the control of this gold, which belongs to the Dominion of Canada, should be vested in a bank that is under the control of the government of Canada, who are responsible to parliament which in turn is responsible to the Canadian people.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Like the last speaker, I am pleased that the government, even at this late stage, are about to take steps to revalue our gold stocks. It is not my intention to delay the second reading of this bill; I wish only to say that I am indeed sorry that the government are not also at this time taking steps to value silver and to use silver as further base for currency. It is my intention when the bill is in committee to move some amendments, because it will be remembered that I endeavoured to introduce two bills not long ago, and I am indeed sorry that I was prevented from laying before the house and the government certain suggestions which I think should be adopted in the interest both of our mining industry and of our currency. I shall reserve my further remarks until the bill is in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the Prime Minister explain how it is proposed to operate this fund?

Mr. BENNETT: That comes later.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "interpretation" comes out.

Mr. SPENCER: I think it was said that when we got into committee an explanation would be made.

Mr. BENNETT: The relevant sections of the Bank of Canada Act are printed on the bill. If the committee will look at the bill they will see the sections from the Bank Act to which reference is made. I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) will pardon me if I observe that in England, where the Bank of England, a wholly privately owned institution, has the control of the metallic situation so far as currency is concerned, the treasury took control of the fund created for the purpose of stabilizing exchange, by chapter 25 of the acts of 1932, which provides that:

> There shall be established an account to be called "the exchange equalization account," which shall be under control of the treasury and shall be used for the purposes specified in this part of this act.

Then followed the provision in 1933 that increased the fund from £150,000,000 to £350,000,000 by chapter 18 of the statutes of that year. So that at least we have a good example for what we are doing in that regard.

Turning now to the amount involved, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) asked a question. The last statement of the Bank of Canada, that for the week ended June 5, 1935, was as follows so far as reserves are concerned:

Gold coin and bullion	$106,936,427 29
Silver bullion	1,230,279 09
Reserve in sterling funds	186,492 93
Reserve in U.S.A. funds	12,564,441 00
Reserve in funds of other countries on a gold standard	15,822 18
Total	$120,933,462 49

And subsidiary coins, quarters and dollars, et cetera, amounting to $321,971.43. That is, the gold in the hands of the Bank of Canada was $106,936,427.29. It will be recalled that last year there was considerable opposition, shall I say, to the Bank of Canada taking over the gold from the banks at $20.67 an ounce. They pointed out that they had large obligations in their branches abroad, in the United States of America, in South America, in Newfoundland, two of them in particular, and they asserted that this gold had been accumulated by them for the purpose of taking care of their foreign commitments. The parliament of Canada provided that this gold was to be turned over to the Bank of Canada. It also provided that the gold in the hands of the receiver general should be turned over to the Bank of Canada, as the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has said. In the early part of the year, after the Bank of Canada had begun to operate, the banks desired that there should be an adjustment between the Bank of Canada and themselves; therefore an order in council was passed on April 29, 1935, as stated by the hon. member, and I think in order that the committee may have the story clearly before it I shall read the order in council:

> Whereas there has been laid before His Excellency the Governor General in council, a report, dated 23rd April, 1935, from the Minister of Finance, stating as follows:
> 1. Subsection (1) of section 28 of the Bank of Canada Act provides that "every chartered bank shall, on the day on which the bank is authorized to commence business, transfer to the bank all gold coin or bullion owned and held by it in Canada."
> 2. Under the authority and instruction of the above-mentioned subsection the chartered banks have transferred to the Bank of Canada gold owned and held by them in Canada in the following amounts:

Barclays Bank (Canada)	$ 10,482 23
The Canadian Bank of Commerce	13,182,326 77
The Dominion Bank	804,495 53
Imperial Bank of Canada	218,220 98
Bank of Montreal	13,043,245 93
Banque Canadienne National	419,002 56
The Bank of Nova Scotia	6,546,338 19
La Banque Provinciale du Canada	40,350 86
The Royal Bank of Canada	2,382,087 24
The Bank of Toronto	833,854 17

> 3. Section 30 of the Bank of Canada Act provides amongst other things that any profits resulting from the sale by the Bank of Canada of gold coin and bullion transferred to the bank by the chartered banks or from an increase in the value of such gold resulting from any change in the monetary standard of Canada, shall belong to the chartered banks, "if the governor in council is satisfied that the said gold was at the time of the transfer being held by a chartered bank against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada." It is therefore necessary for the governor in council to reach a decision as to the proportion of the total amount of gold and bullion transferred to the Bank of Canada by the chartered banks which was at the time of the transfer being held against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada.
> 4. The chartered banks have made representations to the effect that all, or substantially all, of their gold was at the time of the transfer held against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada. In general, they point out that with the monetary instability which has prevailed and the continued threat of wide exchange fluctuations, manifold risks and the possibility of losses are ever present in conducting foreign business; that if any major crisis occurred abroad the liquid assets which they held elsewhere than in Canada against foreign liabilities were likely to be immobilized, particularly as the foreign branches of Canadian banks have no right of rediscount with any central bank in any foreign country; and that all their gold had always been regarded and treated as a mobile reserve, free for transfer abroad either for the general protection of the banks' foreign liabilities or for use in the event of any specific emergency which rendered it expedient to ship gold.

In the opinion of the Minister of Finance, having in mind the traditional requirements of prudent banking and the necessity of maintaining adequate cash reserves against domestic liabilities, the general contention of the banks that all their gold owned and held in Canada was at the time of the transfer being held against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada cannot be successfully maintained. Moreover, a careful examination of the data showing domestic and foreign liabilities as well as cash, quick and liquid assets both in Canada and elsewhere of the various chartered banks discloses no precise basis on which the gold held in Canada may be allocated against domestic and foreign liabilities respectively. Nevertheless it is apparent that in view of the greater risks arising out of foreign liabilities, the inability of our Canadian banks to rediscount liquid assets with foreign central banks and the necessity of relying upon gold as the only satisfactory mobile reserve, a substantial proportion of the gold owned and held by the chartered banks in Canada can reasonably be regarded as being held at the time of transfer against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada.

And whereas detailed examination of the available information in regard to the domestic and foreign liabilities and reserves of the various chartered banks has been made;

Therefore, in view of the foregoing, His Excellency the Governor General in council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, is pleased to decide and doth hereby decide and order that forty per cent of the gold owned and held in Canada by the various chartered banks and transfered by them to the Bank of Canada, as set out above, be regarded, for the purposes of section 30 of the Bank of Canada Act, as being held at the time of transfer against liabilities elsewhere than in Canada, and that in addition, in the case of the Banque Canadienne Nationale and the Royal Bank of Canada, there be added to the amounts so determined sixty per cent of $300.000 and $89,609 respectively, being amounts representing special foreign deposits against which the Minister of Finance is satisfied that the said banks were liable to pay gold on demand.

That is the order in council that was passed. The banks made representations claiming a larger allowance than forty per cent. The minister, after examining the reports as to the character of their business in foreign countries, some operating largely in South America, some in the United States of America, several in Great Britain, some in the West Indies and some in Newfoundland, came to the conclusion that forty per cent was a reasonable amount to allow, and the order in council which I have just read directed accordingly.

With respect to the two special amounts I need hardly point out that the terms of the order in council itself indicate why these were given special treatment. During the war there was gold in British Honduras which was entrusted by the British authorities to the Royal Bank of Canada, and having regard to changed conditions ultimately it was transferred to this country and held as an earmarked deposit for that purpose, and treated by the bank as a liability in gold. Therefore, of course, it had to be treated in the way it has been treated in the order in council. The other is a small deposit which I believe is the balance of a larger deposit made by the Bank of France during some of the transfers that took place in connection with business between the two countries at a time long since past. That is why these special amounts, earmarked for special purposes, are treated as being amounts that, in the terms of their arrangements—to which in a sense it is fair to say the country was a party at the time they were made, since the Department of Finance had knowledge of the transaction—may involve the banks in the necessity of paying in gold. It will be observed that the sum total of the amounts held by the banks was $37,480.973, and of that sum $15,226,151 was required to pay forty per cent against outside liabilities, with sixty per cent of $300.000 in addition in the case of the Royal Bank of Canada in connection with the British Honduras deposit and sixty per cent of $89,609 in the case of the Banque Nationale.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was it sixty per cent of these two latter amounts?

Mr. BENNETT: The sixty per cent and forty per cent make one hundred per cent, and that is included in the sums I read.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Are the two sums of $300,000 and $89,609 respectively included in the total of $37,480,973 as the total amount taken over?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So that all the gold was actually delivered to the Bank of Canada on the due date?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, with the reservation that was made by the two banks with respect to these amounts.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But the actual gold was all delivered by the banks?

Mr. BENNETT: It was delivered in the sense that the Bank of Canada took delivery of it. I am not in a position to say that it was all moved from one place to another, for as a matter of fact much of it remained in the vaults in which it has been held for the last twenty-five years, but qua bank the Bank of Canada became the responsible custodian of the whole of the gold. I gather that is what the hon. gentleman asked. There therefore remained, as the hon. gentleman has just pointed out, something over $22,000,000 of gold in the hands of the Bank of Canada; that is, of the gold received from the banks, at $20.67, and the profit on that inures to the credit of the consolidated fund of the country. It amounts, as will be observed, to a fairly substantial sum of money at $35 an ounce instead of $20.67.

Mr. EULER: Might I ask a question? I take it from what the Prime Minister has said that the forty per cent rate was arrived at more or less arbitrarily, or was there any basis or any principle upon which they proceeded to fix that rate? While I am on my feet I might also suggest that in my judgment as between the various banks there would be a difference in the proportion of gold they had for foreign commitments. Were any representations made by the banks that some should get more or less than forty per cent, or why was the flat rate fixed?

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that some of the banks had very small sums of gold, but the banks contended that there was a liability that could be settled only in terms of gold because of dealings with countries still on a gold standard, bills of exchange and settlements of obligations which they had incurred. Those are the smaller ones. In the case of the larger banks, holding large amounts of gold, they presented elaborate claims based upon particular dealings over long terms of years and the necessity for being able to deal with a transaction on a gold basis. I cannot say that the banks were satisfied, but ultimately the minister concluded, after the most careful investigation, that forty per cent was all that he could possibly allow for the purpose of meeting foreign obligations, and he applied that principle to all the gold held, which as I say was a large amount in the case of three of the banks and a smaller sum in the case of one bank, of the others one had as little as $10,000, just the accumulation which goes on over a period of years. I suppose it is true to say that it was an arbitrary exercise of power based upon all the information that it was possible to obtain under the circumstances.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. EULER: My thought was that there must be a considerable variation between the various banks as to their foreign commitments, but the forty per cent was a flat rate.

Mr. BENNETT: With the exception of the two instances I have mentioned there was no variation, because each had a volume of business commensurate with its size and the magnitude of its holdings. Of the others one held $10,000, another $200,000, another $40,000 and still another $400,000, and it was not thought desirable to endeavour to differentiate between them. The minister concluded that a flat rate of forty per cent was reasonable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did I understand from the Prime Minister that a profit of $15,000,000 in round numbers was not transferred to the banks or not to be transferred, but was just to stand as a credit entry?

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. member misunderstood me. I say that the revaluation on the new basis will be a bookkeeping entry in the books of the Bank of Canada by crediting the banks with this credit which they will receive in the basis of valuation as fixed by the terms of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It has not happened yet?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it cannot, until this bill passes.

Mr. IRVINE: What check will the government or the central bank have on the forty per cent gold to see that it will be used for the purposes for which the government has permitted its retention for foreign commitments?

Mr. BENNETT: It is absolutely impossible for the Bank of Canada, or any other body, to exercise that control. They must in their own interests take such steps as may be necessary to protect themselves against their foreign commitments. For instance, for the banks which have substantial business dealings on the continent of Europe, with some of the old gold countries—and there are not many left now—but with France, with the Netherlands, in connection with sugar importations and sales, and in connection with the Dutch East Indies, the matter becomes important. In connection with Switzerland, and the little business we have with that country, owing to great differences and fluctuations in currency, it becomes important. I suppose it is known that last year those who had to go to Geneva found it necessary to pay an exchange rate of practically sixty per cent. That is, there was a sixty per cent exchange rate in dealing with the Swiss gold franc.

Mr. EULER: Would the Prime Minister give me an answer to my original question? What is the amount made available for the purposes of the bill? That is, we will get the profit by revaluation from $20.67 an ounce to $35 an ounce on the sixty per cent of the gold handed over by the banks, plus the full profit by way of revaluation on the gold handed over by the receiver general. What is the total amount?

Mr. BENNETT: We had $106,936,427.29 in gold coin and bullion on June 5.

Mr. EULER: Including the bank's gold?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. But we take away from that $15,226,151 leaving a total of a little over $91,000,000. We provide for the current sale, and I suppose it is fair to say it is probably not less than seventy per cent. Seventy per cent of $91,000,000 is nearly $64,000,000.

Mr. EULER: That is the net amount?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. COOTE: I believe it quite proper for the government to take steps to protect the external value of the Canadian monetary unit, but the important point for us to consider at this time is the policy to be followed by the minister in administering this fund. That is, at what level is it considered desirable to hold the value of Canadian currency as expressed in terms of other currencies? I speak particularly of the American dollar and the British pound. It seems to me that during the past few years our currency has been at too high a level in other countries, so far as our exporters are concerned, and Canada's basic industries are to a great extent dependent, so far as their price levels are concerned, upon the price which they receive for their sales in foreign countries, and the value at which they can translate foreign funds into Canadian currency. Undoubtedly we have suffered in our attempt to compete with many other exporting nations of the world. To-night we heard considerable discussion as to why it was so difficult for Canadian and even English textile companies to compete with those of Japan. I noticed that no person mentioned that which I believe to be the most important factor, namely that Japanese currency to-day is depreciated in terms of Canadian currency by approximately seventy per cent. I think that is the greatest factor in favour of Japanese exporters.

Then, to come to the industry in which I am most interested, agriculture, our chief competitors might be said to be the Argentine, Australia, New Zealand and Denmark. In each of these countries we find that, compared with that of Canada, their currencies are depreciated to very marked degrees. In Denmark the currency has depreciated 22 per cent as compared with the value of our money; in New Zealand the figure is 23 per cent, and in Australia 24 per cent. The official rate for the Argentine is given as 24 per cent, but the unofficial rate is approximately 60 per cent. What is needed in Canada to-day is higher commodity price levels, and the easiest way to do it would be deliberately to depreciate our currency. We must do it frankly and honestly, as has been done by the other countries I have named. In Denmark, Australia, New Zealand and the Argentine the step was taken as a matter of governmental policy, and now that the Canadian government is setting up an exchange fund to be administered by the minister it seems to me we are taking a very positive step towards making the level at which our currency is held in foreign countries a matter of government policy. I am not suggesting that we engage wtih any other countries in a race for currency depreciation, but we do require this depreciation to restore our price levels. There is a great deal of opinion expressed in financial papers in favour of stabilizing exchange rates of various countries. So far as I am personally concerned I do not believe that we can afford to stabilize our price structure at present levels. That would mean disaster for those engaged in most of our primary industries. It would mean that for many years to come they must carry an almost intolerable burden of debt. But with a currency depreciated to the level of most of our competitors our price level would be placed nearer where it really ought to be. I am sure even that would hardly restore the price levels of 1926. Some of the outstanding if not some of the best economists have said repeatedly in the last few years that a rise in the price levels to the point at which they stood in 1926 is absolutely necessary if we are to be able to continue to carry the present debt structure. We all realize the devastating effect of attempting to deal with debts in any other way. I think myself that that is the proper way to deal with them.

I should like to make it clear again that I am not opposing this bill, nor am I even criticizing it. I think the important point to be considered at this time is the policy of the minister who will be in charge of this fund. I hope it will not be used to stabilize price levels at where they are to-day and I hope it will not be used to keep our currency at its present high level if there are other factors which would operate to bring it down. I realize that this is a matter for debate and I have debated it in this house and have put my point of view before hon. members. I shall not repeat my views to-night at any length but I think it is realized by the majority of hon. members that there should be a rise in commodity price levels if we are going to compete with other exporting countries. Take the case of Brazil; their currency is depreciated forty-four per cent as compared with ours. Not long ago I was talking to a bank manager who had just returned from Brazil and he gave as one of his personal reasons why there had been no unemployment or distress in Brazil the fact that depreciation had taken place in their currency and they had maintained much higher price levels than otherwise would have been possible.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it the hon. gentleman knows the real reason.

Mr. COOTE: I suppose the Prime Minister is referring to the measures which they took to protect the price of coffee.

Mr. BENNETT: I refer to the fact that they have not paid the interest on their debt.

Mr. COOTE: No doubt that would be a big help. I shall not labour this point any further as I am sure the Prime Minister and the house realize the importance of this question. I have no objection to this bill. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he should amend the Currency Act to value gold at more than $35 per ounce and thus bring about a depreciation in our currency to at least the level of Australia, New Zealand and Denmark.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the value of the Australian pound in London?

Mr. COOTE: In Montreal it is given at $3.94 on June 15 and the British pound is given as $4.93. If we were on the same basis as Australia, so far as the value of the pound is concerned, it would give to agriculture that increase in prices which is so badly needed. I do not think there is anything which would do as much to bring back prosperity in Canada as the increase which could be secured in the price level for agriculture by a deliberate depreciation of our currency. I do not need to go into the method by which this can be done as I think the house, and particularly the Prime Minister, is well aware of what should be done. I approve of having the administration of this fund in the hands of a minister rather than under the control of the central bank, but I should like to urge the government seriously to consider a policy of depreciating our currency to the value of Australian currency.

Mr. SPENCER: I understood the Prime Minister to say that the larger banks of Canada had similar foreign obligations when the gold was taken from them to be deposited with the central bank. However, the figures he gave showed that of the larger banks two had $13,000,000 in gold, one had $6,000,000 and the other only $2,000,000. If their foreign obligations were similar why was there so much variation in the amount of gold on hand? Secondly, I should like to know if the forty per cent allowed the banks to permit them to meet their foreign obligations was in proportion to the gold which they had on hand to take care of their foreign obligations?

Mr. BENNETT: I tried to make it clear that the forty per cent was forty per cent of the gold transferred. In the case of the Bank of Montreal it was 40 per cent of $13,043,509 or $5,217,403. In the case of the Bank of Nova Scotia it was 40 per cent of $6,546,338, or $2,618,535. As to the variations in the amounts of gold held in Canada, it is only necessary to say that some of the banks with branches abroad held gold abroad to take care of the sudden fluctuations and our arm reached only to the gold in Canada.

In connection with the point raised by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) as to our dollar being valued too high, I think it is only necessary to say that in terms of gold our dollar is worth only about sixty cents, if my memory serves me aright, and I am subject to correction. Does the hon. gentlemer know the figure?

Mr. COOTE: I imagine that is about right.

Mr. BENNETT: To undertake deliberately to depreciate our dollar, having regard to our position with the United States on the one hand and with Great Britain on the other, is something that this government has declined to undertake so far. We are surrounded by very difficult conditions. We have to pay about £12,000,000 annually in Great Britain as interest upon our obligations, and I cannot undertake to say what we have to pay in the United States, but it is a much greater sum than that. These sums vary according to the renewals which may be made, but payment has to be made just the same.

Mr. COOTE: Is the Prime Minister referring to government obligations or the total obligations of Canadians?

Mr. BENNETT: I am referring to the total. It is £12,000,000 in Great Britain and a much greater sum in the United States. We were strongly urged—the hon. gentleman urged us himself—in this house to tie up our dollar to the pound. Having regard to what has since happened, had we done that it would have been rather unfortunate—not rather but very. There is some difference in the situation, as the figure just quoted indicates, but we must continue to remember that we are on the North American continent and have these obligations to the country to the south of us as well as obligations in sterling. The question of tying our dollar to the sterling group was brought up during the discussions on the empire agreements but subsequent events have shown that such action would have been disastrous to the country. I quite appreciate the point the hon. gentleman has made with respect to the depreciated currency in the Argentine, but it will be within his knowledge that so far as we are concerned the real difficulty in connection with the Argentine arises from the fact that they have not only a grain board but an exchange board and the two are operated together sometimes to the detriment of this country when it has been receiving payments for pulp or paper sold to that republic. There is a very considerable boom on in Brazil at the present time but it must be remembered that that country has not paid the interest on its external debt for I forget how many years. If you will relieve this country of the payment of the interest on its debt I should think that there would probably be a very considerable boom. Thus far we have conducted our affairs upon the theory that we would honourably endeavour to discharge our obligations to the best of our ability. If we ceased to be able to do so it would not be from choice but from necessity. It is on that theory that we have conducted our business during the last few years. I would not undertake to express any opinion as to how the fund might be administered, because the governing section comes into force on proclamation, and one never knows the fortunes of war. The hon. gentleman himself might be Minister of Finance and would have to deal with that problem; and when he had to deal with it he would find, I am sure, that there is a great difference between the practical realities of life and what I might call theorizing in the House of Commons.

Mr. COOTE: With reference to the remark of the Prime Minister, that suggestions were made from this corner that the Canadian currency should be tied to the pound, I may say that in any statement I ever made in the House of Commons I was careful not to use those words. As a matter of fact, a friend of mine who lives in the metropolis of Canada urged me to advocate that very thing, to make the pound legal tender at $4.87. I stated to him at that time that that was much too low a level because this country must have a pound worth more than that unless a change took place in the pound sterling itself. When the imperial conference agreement was under discussion I used on that occasion this language: I said that our currency should be brought to such a level as would make the pound worth $4.87 here. That would have been a distinct advantage to us at that time. I have not the exact words I used but that is as I remember. I am sure I never used the expression "tying our currency to the pound."

There is one other point which the Prime Minister made to which I would refer, and that is the payment of foreign debt. The Prime Minister will agree that so far as actually paying off any of this debt is concerned, we can pay only by the export of goods, commodities and services—and in commodities I include gold. Of course, it may be easier for us to renew these obligations if we keep our currency at a certain level, at par with the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been; that is a fair way to put it.

Mr. COOTE: I notice, however, that Australia was able to pay all her foreign obligations. I remember seeing a statement not long ago to the effect that in every case the Australian government's foreign obligations had been met in the terms in which they were expressed, and Australia has been able to borrow money in Britain at as good a rate as Canada. It is a fair subject for debate, but in my humble opinion Australia has followed the course that made it easier for her primary producers to carry on and meet their obligations than it has been for their Canadian competitors. I believe that Canada depends on the agricultural industry more than on anything else, and the financial policy which keeps our price level at a lower level than most of our competitors does make it very difficult for us to carry on.

Our price level has been pitifully low compared to what it was when our producers contracted their obligations. The prices of our products have fallen lower than the prices of the things we buy. I do not know of any other industry that has taken the same fall in the price level as agriculture has, and the thing for us to have done was to follow the method of our competitors, the Argentine, New Zealand, Australia and Denmark. They felt that they were forced to take this step, and I think we should be well advised to consider doing it even at this late date.

Section agreed to.

On Section 3—Valuation of gold held by Bank of Canada.

Mr. REID: I have an amendment to move to section 3 and I shall have another amendment in connection with a subsequent section. I realize that even if these two amendments were adopted they would not go as far as I should like in regard to the valuation or the use of silver. I am not unmindful of the fact that in Bill 101 I cannot go as far as I should like to go in advocating the adoption of silver. The amendment to section 3 is this:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of section 29 of the Bank of Canada Act, all gold and silver held as reserve by the Bank of Canada shall be valued by the bank at current market prices.

The only change there is the adoption of the two words "and silver." According to my interpretation of the Bank of Canada act there is no provision in it for the valuation of silver at the market price. When the silver was being turned over by the government to the bank there were three specific clauses dealing with it. The first one, clause (b) of section 25, comes under the heading, "redemption of notes." This refers to silver held by the minister for the redemption of dominion notes valued at the market price of the fine silver content. That was transferring silver to the bank at the market price, and I understand that has been done. But there was no silver held by the dominion for the redemption of notes. Why that was put in the act I do not know; at any rate that is the information given me by the department, because I inquired. The deputy minister states that no silver was held for the redemption of notes, and I am not quite sure why the act was so drawn up. If you proceed further in the Bank of Canada Act you will find in subsection 4 of the same section the use of the word "never." I think that is a very strong word to put in any act. No country stands to gain more than Canada by the adoption of silver. Canada is the third largest producer of that precious metal in the world, and yet we as a parliament passed last year an act declaring to the Bank of Canada, "You will purchase the amount required, under the London agreement entered into last year, namely, 1,671,802 fine ounces each year for three years, but never any more in any one year." That is a mandatory clause; it says to the bank that no matter what may happen with regard to silver, whether other countries adopt it or not, the Bank of Canada shall never purchase in any year any more than the amount required by the agreement we entered into in 1934.

Mr. BENNETT: That is only for those years.

Mr. REID: That is quite correct, but we see at this very moment what is taking place throughout the world in connection with silver. By to-night's newspapers I see that Italy has taken steps to nationalize the metal, and according to the reports I have several countries are now using silver as coverage for their currency. I am speaking now of some of the leading countries, not some of the smaller countries, but such countries as the United States, Germany, France, Colombia, Cuba, Mexico, Peru, Roumania, and Italy, which has now taken steps to nationalize the metal. We now value gold at $35 an ounce in consequence of the action of the United States. But it may interest the committee to know what the United States is doing now with silver. So far as I can see, the action which she is taking in regard to silver will have the effect of raising the value of silver. The Silver Purchase Act of 1934 in the United States authorizes an increase of twenty-five per cent silver to that of gold in monetary stocks. The gold stock of the United States is valued at the present time at $8,230,000,000. The total silver requirements of the United States is 1,433,000,000 ounces. The United States has on hand at the present time, according to the latest figures I can obtain, 400,000,000 ounces of silver, so she has yet to buy over 1,000,000,000 ounces. When one realizes that more than 1,000,000,000 ounces is equal to over five years of the total world production of silver, the average being about 260,000,000 ounces a year, and that the United States has embarked on a policy not only of holding practically all the gold but going out into the world and purchasing all the silver she can, setting a price in that country at $1.29 an ounce, in my opinion the effect will be that silver will also rise in price. Therefore, I believe this country would be doing well to take and should, I believe, take steps to take over the mine production of this country and to stop any further export of silver by way of either bullion or currency. We must eventually come to that. Nations are in a scramble just now to get proper coverage for their currencies; they cannot obtain gold, and have turned back to the use of the first precious metal, silver, which was used for currencies, and which has been used for ages.

It might interest the house also regarding the issue of the new Canadian silver dollar to know even today in Canada and in Vancouver particularly, it is at a premium of twenty-five cents. They are offering $1.25 just now for the new Canadian dollar; although there has been a third issue of $100,000, they have not yet reached the pockets of the people. Most of the issues have been taken up as souvenirs. When one realizes that out of every $100,000 issued, the government make a profit of $70,000, one cannot understand why they did not take the whole production of our mines and issue it as coinage or as coverage. The people are hungry for silver money and cannot get it. Of course I know the people are to-day hungry for any kind of money if they could get it, but here is the government making a profit of $70,000 on each issue of $100,000 and yet we are just putting this out in little driblets.

Mr. BENNETT: Just as fast as the machines are making it.

Mr. REID: I hope they keep on as fast for many years. In connection with the new Canadian bill, I might point out that it costs about four cents to issue, and I would draw the attention of the Prime Minister to how fast the colours in the new bills are fading. Whoever did the printing on the dollar bill in my opinion did a very poor job; it means that in ten years it will cost the Canadian people about fifty cents for the issue of every paper dollar, whereas if the government issued silver dollars, these would last for practically all time. I maintain however that now is the time for the government to take the necessary steps and before silver goes up, because with the demand made for it by all countries, including the policy laid down by the United States, silver cannot do other than reach a higher market value.

My amendment—and I am not going to discuss it at very great length—provides that silver as well as gold be valued at the current price. There is nothing in the Bank of Canada Act or any other act to compel the Bank of Canada to value silver if it goes up. As I have said, the only thing it did was to provide that when silver was transferred, it had to be transferred to the Bank of Canada at the then prevailing market price. We are looking these days for employment for our citizens. I believe if we went out after this precious metal silver, we would find employment for many thousands of our people, and we would not be as we are with wheat, wondering where we are going to find a market, because the countries of the world are just hungry for this precious metal and there will be no overproduction of it for many years to come. The annual production has dropped during the past few years. In this country at one time we produced 26,000,000 ounces, which dropped to some 16,000,000 ounces last year, of which amount I might point out that British Columbia produced about fifty per cent.

We speak sometimes about the sanctity of contracts, but I cannot help thinking what would have happened had the United States Supreme Court kept to the sanctity of the gold clause. I am afraid we in Canada would not have been as well pleased or as well off to-day because we have saved many millions of dollars by the fact that they said that although the bonds carried that gold clause it was not mandatory to pay it. If Great Britain had been asked to pay her complete war debts according to the sanctity of contract, I am afraid she would have been extremely hard pressed to pay.

I am going to ask the government to consider seriously the suggestions I have made. I know the arguments I am using go beyond the scope of the amendments I have offered, but the present bill limits me to amendments I can offer with any assurance of their being adopted.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. gentleman has overlooked the provisions of paragraph (a) of subsection 2 of section 26:

> 1. The bank shall always maintain a reserve, as hereinafter provided, as security against its outstanding notes and deposit liabilities.
> 2. The reserve required by this section to be maintained shall consist of gold coin and bullion in the unrestricted ownership of the bank equal to an amount not less than twenty-five per centum of the notes and deposit liabilities aforesaid; and may in addition include—
> (a) silver bullion received from the minister under the next preceding section or purchased under the authority of subsection four hereof, valued at the market price of the fine silver content thereof.

So that the value for the purposes of the reserve statement issued by the bank is the current market price. That refers of course to the fact that the bank is allowed to purchase only in 1935, 1936 and 1937 newly mined Canadian silver to the extent of 1,671,802 fine ounces in the year and shall not, during that period only, and not forever, purchase more.

Mr. REID: That is quite true; the right hon. gentleman has quoted the act, but is it not a fact that in the purchase of this, the bank will have to pay the market price? Why not purchase all the silver at one time? We are going to make purchases for the next three years. The act says in subsection 4:

The bank shall never be required to purchase more than 1,671,802 ounces in any one year.

But they purchase it at the market price. When the first 1,671,802 ounces was purchased it was valued, I believe, at the market price of some forty cents.

Mr. BENNETT: A little higher.

Mr. REID: It is going up now so that we stand to lose by our delay.

As regards the silver bullion received from the minister under the next preceding section, that is the silver to be turned over to the bank and held for the coverage of dominion notes, as I pointed out, we have no silver for the purchase or redemption or coverage of dominion notes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, we have.

Mr. REID: There is silver by way of currency throughout the country.

Mr. BENNETT: Silver bullion.

Mr. REID: We hold no bullion for reserves.

Mr. BENNETT: The statute says that we do.

Mr. REID: Where is it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It says "may include."

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact that was specially added to the statute in view of what took place at the conference in 1933. Section 26 permits in addition to the holding of twenty-five per cent of the notes in gold—

May in addition include—
(a) silver bullion received from the minister under the next preceding section.

Some of the silver bullion transferred to the Bank of Canada cost this country, if my memory serves me aright, in the case of a few ounces as high as $1.50 an ounce many years ago.

Mr. REID: Still, I maintain that the amendment which I have offered is to value silver at the market price, to the advantage of the government. I claim that under the Bank of Canada Act there is no provision whereby the bank is compelled to value the silver at the then current price.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it is already covered by the statute.

Amendment negatived on division.

On section 4—Profit to be credited to minister.

Mr. REID: I have an amendment to offer; I suppose it will meet the same fate as the other I submitted. I see that the attitude of the government is not in favour of any silver policy. I move that the words "and silver" be inserted after the word "gold" in lines 19 and 21. The section will then read:

(1) Any profit resulting from the valuation of the gold and silver in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of this act, being the difference between the value of such gold and silver held by the bank on the date of the coming into force of this act as computed on the basis established by the currency act and its value at current market price, shall be credited by the bank to a special account in the name of the minister:

Surely the Prime Minister cannot take any exception to this, because I am really providing some further value for the government, for silver as well as for gold.

Mr. BENNETT: We have already covered it by the Bank of Canada Act. In the reserve which the bank showed in its statement of June 5, silver bullion appeared at $1,230,279.09, and the statute says that it is to value that silver bullion at the current market price of the fine silver content thereof. That is subsection 2, clause (a), section 26. That is exclusive of subsidiary coin consisting of twenty-five cent pieces and other pieces of money that the Bank of Canada has.

Mr. REID: Subsection (a) reads:

silver bullion received from the minister under the next preceding section or purchased under the authority of subsection (4) hereof, valued at the market price of the fine silver content thereof;

There will be very little silver received from the minister if the government does not go out and buy it.

Mr. BENNETT: But there was a substantial sum of bullion—I do not carry the figures in my head—some of which cost $1.50 an ounce.

Amendment negatived on division.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Control of exchange.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the Prime Minister now explain how this fund is expected to work?

Mr. BENNETT: The fund is under the direction of the Minister of Finance. The reason it is under his direction is that under the Bank Act it was to go into the consolidated fund. Now it is to be maintained for a special purpose. It is still under his administrative control, for reasons that are obvious. Ultimately it should find its way to the purpose for which it was appropriated, as indicated by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). The fund is set up for the purpose of endeavouring to control the external value of the Canadian monetary unit or of checking undue fluctuations in its exchange value, and the minister may directly or through such agencies as he may designate cause any balances in the special account to be invested—a limitation as to the form of investment—in:

(a) gold;
(b) foreign exchange as defined in section 26, subsection two (b) of the Bank of Canada Act;

That means countries on the gold standard; and Great Britain as well:

(c) balances with any bank in London or New York designated by the Minister of Finance.
(2) gold or other investments purchased under the provisions of the preceding subsection may be resold on instructions from the minister.
(3) This section shall not come into force until a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council,

Under these circumstances I do not think any explanation is required as to how it is to operate. The limitation as to the form in which it is to be invested is made by the section itself. The amendment offered by the hon. member for Macleod was that the following words be added to the proposed resolution: "subject also to the establishment of parity of the Canadian dollar with the British pound." So that if he had had that done as he then asked, and for which the hon. member for Weyburn voted, the conditions would not have been exactly to the benefit of Canada during the intervening period.

Mr. YOUNG: I do not think I ever advocated anything of that nature. But coming back to the operation of this fund, I understand that Great Britain has maintained an enormous fund for this purpose, and so has the United States and other countries. So far as I can learn, the operation of these funds is shrouded in mystery; no one knows what has been done. That is why I asked the government what they proposed to do in the matter. Apparently if they know they are not prepared to tell. How is the sum arrived at? This $64,000,000 is the profit on a certain transaction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Read section 10; there is the answer.

Mr. YOUNG: Now we find that the British fund is £350,000,000, and the American fund some $2,000,000,000. The American fund for this purpose is about thirty-one times as large as ours, the British fund about twenty-seven times. In view of the fact that as the Prime Minister says, we are a debtor country, it would appear to me that it would take a relatively larger amount to establish a Canadian fund than that required either in the United States or in Great Britain. However, on the basis of population we are establishing a much smaller fund. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) spoke of sitting in at a poker game with only one chip while our competitors have a greater number. It would appear to me that if we are to set up such a fund for the purpose of stabilizing our currency, and the currency begins to fluctuate violently, we should have some idea before we start how much money we are going to require to play that game. It should be based not on the amount of profit we made on a certain transaction but how much we are going to need to carry the thing through. Does the Prime Minister not agree with me?

Mr. BENNETT: I should be only too delighted to agree with my hon. friend about anything. But I point out that this section does not come into force except by proclamation, and if all his provisos are true he may have the responsibility of carrying out the operation.

Mr. YOUNG: The hon. member for Macleod was to have it a few minutes ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the honours may be divided. Undoubtedly what he says has a great deal of force. It is a small sum. But Mr. Chamberlain in Great Britain said the other day that he had not used any such sum as he was authorized to use; he had used it only "to iron out the wrinkles," I think were his words, in connection with exchange transactions. This, as I tried to point out—I said it very poorly at the threshold of my observations—is to endeavour to place Canada in a position in which at a time of great difficulty we might have some fund that would be available for that purpose on proclamation. That is all. I cannot tell anything further as to the circumstances under which it might become necessary to use it. It is true its operations are shrouded in some secrecy; that was necessary in Great Britain, in the United States and in other countries. The very foundation of its use is that there should be no public knowledge, because its value would then become problematical. You know the circumstances under which the Bank of England was compelled to go off the gold standard. People sold securities in London and then went around with their cheques and got Bank of England notes and presented the notes and demanded gold for them. Of course there came a time when there was no more gold. That was the combination worked on that particular occasion. This is a fund to take care of extraordinary conditions to the extent that we may be able, and it will be done only if the governor in council is of the opinion that circumstances warrant its being done.

Mr. YOUNG: If, as Mr. Chamberlain said, the fund in Great Britain has been used only to iron out the wrinkles, I believe other prominent men over there have stated that they were not able to use the fund to fix the pound at any given level, but only to make the ups and downs less violent. I do not see how this fund is going to overcome our difficulties. According to that theory we cannot fix our dollar at any given value.

Mr. SPENCER: I take it for granted that this bill will give the government power to increase that fund to any extent that may be desired if it is in the interests of the country to do so?

Mr. BENNETT: No, this bill does not go that far. This bill only goes to the extent of enabling a specific fund, namely, the profits from the revaluation of gold at $35 or the current market price as against $20.67, to be earmarked as a fund available on proclamation for the purposes indicated by the bill. No such powers as those suggested by my hon. friend are sought at this time, strange as it may seem.

Mr. SPENCER: I take it for granted that this small amount, as some members think it is, is only one chip in the poker game, and if at some future time the country needs more chips, certainly ways and means can be found of getting them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would this amount increase under section 5 if world market prices should increase?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: This follows the complete failure of the London conference of 1933. In a broadcast from London to Canada and the United States prior to that conference the Prime Minister said that unless the nations of the world came to an understanding with regard to the stabilization of currency the conference would be a failure. That was one of the four reasons for which the conference would have to succeed, and after the conference was over the right hon. gentleman said that he hoped the conference would meet some time later. At the time he said the conference had met too soon, that they were not ready for it. That was the famous world conference that the right hon. gentleman saved and which died a natural death three days later. It was a great success. It was just as great a success as the London conference of 1930 and the Ottawa agreements of 1932. Now we are told that it is the opinion of the governor in council that stabilization should be carried out by this government. The stabilization they should carry out is to give the Prime Minister a chance to remove himself from the picture. For years we have had fiasco after fiasco, but the government come here and tell us a lot about the success of this and that, and in a very serious way they speak of the stabilization of this and that, of sound money and of the attitude of the people. The right hon. gentleman said we should not look to the past, that we should look to the future. That was two years ago, but those two years have not been very successful. If the government want to continue their successful ways, let them drop out of the picture, and then public confidence will be restored for good.

On section 7—Surplus funds how dealt with.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the Prime Minister if this is purely in the discretion of the minister in charge? Does he direct the bank in regard to these securities, or has the bank a discretion in reference to them?

Mr. BENNETT: As the section stands this is a departure from the preceding section to the extent that the minister may direct that a certain portion of the money be invested in Canadian securities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Still the control rests with the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Winding up of account.

Mr. RALSTON: I wanted to ask the Prime Minister if it is intended, when the special account is wound up, that it shall go to the consolidated revenue fund. I wondered if there was any doubt as to the actual ownership of the fund. The special account is in the name of the minister for the special purpose for which it is constituted, but when it is wound up where does the profit go?

Mr. BENNETT: It was intended that it should go to the consolidated fund, as the hon. gentleman said. That is, if it should be wound up it should seek its original lodging place, namely the consolidated fund, to reduce pro tanto the debt of the country.

Mr. RALSTON: The original lodging place would be the profit of the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the consolidated fund. If I remember correctly the profit was to go to the consolidated fund, not to the banks.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Mr. BENNETT: By consent I would move the third reading now, so that the bill may go to the senate. That can be done only by consent.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

UNEMPLOYED CLASSIFICATION

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition of Jean-François Pouliot, M.P., praying that the House of Commons may give due consideration to the attached report, of 138 pages, on the classification of one half of the unemployed on relief in this country.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens) moved:

That the first report of the joint committee on the printing of parliament, presented to the house on Friday, June 14, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE GRADE FOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): On the orders of the day I wish to reply to an inquiry made yesterday by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I am instructed that in connection with the examination now being held by the civil service commission for clerks, grade 4, with university graduation, there appears to be a certain amount of misunderstanding. This is not a new class but one which has been in existence for several years, and positions in the class in general are not limited to university graduates nor to members of the male sex. The positions for which the current examination is being held, however, are suitable for men only, and on that account this particular examination was limited to male candidates, the commission feeling that it would be unfair to invite applications from female candidates when no positions were at present available for them. For positions in which female appointees will be suitable, however, the examinations will be open to them.

MAJOR GENERAL ASHTON

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): Yesterday, in replying to a question of the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson), I stated that the salary which the chief of the general staff was to receive was $7,500. What I should have said was $8,000.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

EVIDENCE IN APPEAL TO JUDGE FROM RULING OF REGISTRAR OF ELECTORS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of Bill No. 109, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Last night I asked my right hon. friend about the order of the day and he specifically said that we would not take the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This bill was introduced yesterday and has been distributed to-day. I think we have the right to read the Dominion Franchise Act as it is and consider the purpose and the effect of this amendment. To move the second reading of this bill the day after its introduction would seem to be rather too much urgency.

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps after I have explained the bill the hon. gentleman will have clear information regarding it and then, if it is necessary to consider it further, he will have full opportunity in committee of the whole house to discuss it at a later date.

Section 3 of the Dominion Franchise Act, which is the interpretation provision, defines the following terms:

"Commissioner" means the dominion franchise commissioner, who is appointed commissioner by resolution of the House of Commons under section 5 of the act;

"Registrar of Electors" means an officer appointed by the commissioner for each electoral district, pursuant to section 11 of the act:

"Electoral District" means any place or territorial area for which a member or members may be returned to serve in the House of Commons of Canada;

"Polling Division" means any division, subdivision, district, subdistrict or other territorial area within which a poll is held.

The commissioner was appointed by a resolution of the House of Commons. The registrars are appointed by the commissioner and the commissioner and registrars are responsible to the House of Commons and are really in effect officers of the House of Commons and entitled to the protection of this house. Section 7 of the act provides that:

7. (1) The commissioner shall—

(a) exercise general direction, supervision and control over the administrative conduct of all registrations and revisions of lists of electors for dominion elections;

(b) issue from time to time to franchise officers appointed under this act such instructions as may be deemed to be necessary to or proper for the securing of effective execution of the purposes of this act, and

(c) hold all such franchise officers to fair and impartial performance of their duties and to faithful compliance with the provisions of this act.

The commissioner has issued his instructions to the registrars throughout Canada. The registrar as a franchise officer is subject to the direction, supervision and control of the commissioner, except, as provided in section 32, subsection 5, that in cases of appeals to a judge:

5. The judge shall report in writing to the registrar of electors the result of all such appeals as relate to such registrar's electoral district, and the registrar shall be governed in placing, retaining or removing any name on or from the list of electors by the decision of such judge concerning that name.

Sections 20 and 22 provide that, beginning with the year 1935, the revision of the lists shall begin on the 15th day of May and continue to the first day of July in each year.

Section 25 of the act provides that:

25. Any elector whose name appears on the list of electors for the electoral district of any registrar of electors may, at any time during the month of April in any year, by notice of objection in form No. 26, file with such registrar two copies of a notice in writing setting forth, with grounds, an objection to the retention of any name appearing on the then existing list of electors of any polling division. The notice shall state the actual post office address, if known, of the person against the retention of whose name on the list objection is made and, in any event, it shall state his address as appearing on such list. Objection may be made under this section on the grounds of death, removal, or want of qualification, or on any ground that would disqualify the elector from having his name retained or registered as an elector on any list of electors prepared under this act.

Objections are made in duplicate in form No. 26, and filed with the registrar. Form 26 reads as follows:

Form No. 26. (Sec. 25.)

Notice of Objection to Name on List

Electoral district of.. .. ..

To the registrar of electors of the above-mentioned electoral district:—

Take notice that I, an elector whose name appears on the list of electors of polling division No..... of the above-mentioned electoral district object to the retention of the name of (state name, and, if known, the actual post office address of the elector concerned) on the list of electors of polling division No.....of that electoral district, on the ground that (state ground). The address of such person as appearing on such list is (state the address) and his occupation as it appears thereon is that of a (state occupation).

Date.. .. ..

(Name of Objector.)

This is to be signed by the objecting elector.

Section 26 of the act provides as follows:

26. (1) Upon the receipt of a notice of objection in form No. 26 the registrar of electors shall forward to the person against whose name objection is made a notice in form No. 27 attaching a copy of the notice of objection, and stating the place and date of the sitting of the court of revision at which the objection will be heard. The notice shall be sent by registered mail addressed to the person at the address shown on the list on which his name appears; and where the address set forth in the notice of objection filed with the registrar differs from the address shown on the list, the registrar shall also send a copy of the notice, in form No. 26 by registered mail addressed to the person at the address set forth in the notice of objection.

(2) An objection under this section shall not be heard at any sitting of the court of revision which is held within fourteen days after the date of the mailing by the registrar of the notice in form No. 27 in respect of the objection.

Fourteen days must elapse between the mailing to the elector of the registrar's notice in form No. 27, and the hearing of the objection by the registrar sitting as a court of revision.

Section 28 of the act provides that the registrar of electors, sitting as a court of revision for his electoral district, shall revise the lists of electors, and the time is specified in the section which I have read as between May 15 and July 1 of each year.

Paragraph (b) of section 28 provides with respect to the registrar that:

(b) He shall deal with each objection separately upon the merits to be disclosed by examination on oath of the person making the objection, the person against whom the objection is made, and the witnesses present on their respective behalf.

I wish to call attention here to the fact that there is no provision in this franchise act and there has been no provision in any previous franchise act whereby witnesses can be summoned to appear at the court of revision. Paragraph (b) proceeds:

After each objection is dealt with the registrar shall, in his discretion, either strike off the name of the person from the list in which it appears or allow the name to stand. The onus of substantiating sufficient prima facie ground to strike off any name from the list shall be upon the elector making the objection, and it shall not be necessary for any elector against whom objection is made to adduce proof in the first instance that his name properly appears on the list, or until the registrar avers that in his opinion prima facie ground to strike off the name has been established. The absence from a non-attendance at the court of revision at the time of the objection is dealt with of any person against whom objection is made shall not relieve the elector making the objection from substantiating a prima facie case by evidence which, in the absence of rebuttal evidence, is considered by the registrar sufficient to establish the fact that the name of the person objected to improperly appears on the list.

It will be noticed that, at the hearing of the objection, after the fourteen days' notice provided in section 27, subsection 1, the absence or non-attendance at the court of revision, at the time the objection is dealt with, does not relieve the elector making the objection from substantiating a prima facie case by evidence, which, in the absence of rebuttal evidence, is considered by the registrar as sufficient to establish the fact that the name of the person objected to improperly appears on the list.

This paragraph (b) also provides that:

After each objection is dealt with the registrar shall, in his discretion, either strike off the name of the person from the list in which it appears or allow the name to stand,

This statutory discretion is the discretion of the registrar, and not the discretion of any other person.

There can be no doubt as to the meaning of the words prima facie. Murray's New English Dictionary, the Oxford edition, defines prima facie as "at first sight"; "on the face of it"; "as appears at first without investigation"; "based or founded on the first impression."

Cases, to which I desire to draw the attention of the house for a few minutes, have arisen in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, Montreal, which I have had the honour to represent in this house for the past ten years.

During the past twenty-five years the fraudulent impersonation of persons, whose names are on the voters' list, has prevailed to an alarming extent at both federal and provincial elections in this district. On several occasions, before the standing committee on privileges and elections and before this house, I have discussed these matters very frankly.

During the month of February last a group of young men and women determined to ascertain whether the lists of electors, as recently compiled, represented electors actually resident in the various polling divisions of this electoral district, or whether the lists contained, as had been suggested, the names of persons who were disqualified from voting as being aliens, dead or absentees. In all, about seventy investigators undertook to visit each residence or the apartments in each residence in the district to ascertain the facts. A card system for the residents of the entire district was also prepared by which the names on the list could be compared with the ascertained facts. It was ascertained by this careful investigation and scrutiny that between four and five thousand of the names on the list did not represent qualified voters resident in the district, and these names were checked by investigators two or three times before notices of objection were filed.

Prior to April 30 last qualified voters of this electoral district, who had, in each case, personally investigated the facts, prepared and filed with the registrar written objections, in duplicate, in form No. 26, signed in each case by the objecting voter. The registrar thereupon mailed by registered post, as prescribed by the act, one copy of the objection together with the registrar's notice in form No. 27 in respect to each objection, addressed to the name and residence of the alleged elector, as his name appeared on the list of voters for one of the polling divisions of the electoral district. These envelopes, so addressed and registered, were returned through the post to the registrar, with the exception of less than four hundred, I am informed, with the postman's note thereon, "Removed," "Not known at this address" or the like.

These facts disclosed that there were several thousand names on the lists of voters for these polling divisions in this electoral district, who were not qualified by residence as voters in the district. The retention of these names on the lists would, at the ensuing election, facilitate impersonation and fraudulent voting to an unprecedented extent—and when I say that, it means something, because there are precedents for impersonation in that district that have had no equal in any other constituency in Canada of which I know.

There is no provision in the present act, nor in any previous act, for the issuing of a summons or subpoena to compel the attendance of witnesses. The objector, in each case of the first lot of objections filed, attended before the registrar and on oath proved that he had investigated and made search and found that the person objected to was not resident at the address indicated on the list of voters. In addition, the registrar had the registered mail returned as I have stated, which he had sent out to the elector at his address as shown on the various voters' lists.

To facilitate such investigations upon which the objector had to rely, the present act provides that in urban polling divisions the names shall be entered by streets, roads, avenues, arranged in form No. 13, thus giving the number of the alleged place of residence on each such street, road or avenue in the urban electoral district. When these cases came before the registrar, he had before him the returned envelope sent by registered mail to the alleged voter at his address as it appeared on the list of electors, and he took the evidence on oath of the objecting voter, who previously had personally investigated the facts.

The registrar thereupon in the exercise of his statutory discretion found in a large number of cases that a prima facie case had been made out for the removal of names from the lists, and he thereupon called upon any person who wished to produce rebuttal evidence to do so at a date fixed. In none of these cases was any rebuttal evidence whatever offered. The registrar thereupon proceeded and struck from the list of objections first heard something less than two hundred names. A notice of appeal to the chief justice of the superior court of the Montreal district was thereupon filed by or on behalf of an elector, who in no case was the elector objected to and who admittedly had no personal knowledge of the facts. In one hundred and five of the cases in which such objections were filed and appeals so asserted, which first went on appeal before the chief justice, the objector had failed after exhaustive search in sixteen of the cases to find the new address, if any, of the elector whose name was objected to. But as to what he did, I am going to call attention to a few of the facts.

Mr. Henri Bougearel resided at 1429 Bishop street in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. His name appears on the list of electors for polling division No. 31. An investigator, who is an elector in this district, made inquiry and by investigation ascertained that this gentleman was not a British subject, and then filed with the registrar an objection in writing, in duplicate, in form 26 against the retention of this name on the list of electors. On April 24 last the registrar, by registered mail, sent a copy of this notice, together with a notice in form 27, signed by himself as Registrar of Electors and Revision Officer, to Mr. Henri Bougearel at the address shown on the list. On April 30 this gentleman replied in a letter to the registrar, acknowledging receipt of this notice and stating that, as a French citizen, he was not entitled to have his name inscribed on the Canadian electoral lists, signing himself as Vice-Consul of France, and requesting that his name be removed from the list. When the case was called by the registrar, the investigator gave evidence accordingly. The registrar then decided that a prima facie case had, in his opinion, been made out, and called for any rebuttal evidence. No evidence in rebuttal being forthcoming, the registrar struck Mr. Bougearel's name from the list.

The chief justice held, on appeal, that there was no legal evidence on which the registrar could exercise discretion, and ordered this gentleman's name entered on the list of electors as a resident of this electoral district.

Take another case. The late Mrs. J. G. Greaves, a lady quite well known in her vicinity, resided during her lifetime at No.

3517 St. Famille Street in this same electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. An investigator made an investigation and ascertained from her former neighbours that Mrs. Greaves had died, and then filed his objection in duplicate with the registrar in form 26, one copy of which the registrar sent by registered mail, with his own notice in form 27, to the address of the late Mrs. Greaves as shown on the voter's list for polling division No. 17. The registered letter was received by the late Mrs. Greaves' married daughter, Mrs. Shehyn, who opened the letter addressed to her mother, apparently not knowing the purport of a registered letter arriving in that way. Ascertaining that this was a notice with regard to the possible removal of her mother's name from the list, she wrote to the registrar confirming that her mother was dead. The investigator, not knowing of this letter to the registrar, again visited the neighbourhood and ascertained that Mr. Shehyn, who I believe lived in the vicinity, was a son-in-law of the deceased lady. Thereupon he called personally upon Mr. Shehyn and confirmed the fact of Mrs. Greaves' death.

The chief justice has held that these facts did not constitute a prima facie case upon which the registrar, in the exercise of his discretion, could order the removal of the late Mrs. Greaves' name from the list of voters. In open court, as reported by the court stenographer, the chief justice said:

> I would not take the word of the son-in-law, Mr. Witness. The wish was father to the thought.

The chief justice thereupon declared to counsel:

> You will proceed as you would before the court and prove the death of Mrs. Greaves in the proper manner or not at all.

This chief justice is expert in criminal cases. I suppose if this were a murder case some additional evidence would have to be provided showing the death, such as bringing in the undertaker or something like that.

Mr. POWER: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to criticize a judge of the superior court of the province of Quebec.

Mr. CAHAN: I am restraining myself very much; I have not and will not cast any reflection upon the chief justice.

Mr. POWER: The hon. gentleman is getting worse and worse.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand the Secretary of State to criticize the judge. He stated that in a criminal case the chief justice might require a little different evidence or a higher class of evidence than he might require in a case of this kind, but the Secretary of State did not criticize the chief justice, as I understand it.

Mr. POWER: May I explain, Mr. Speaker, that the chief justice of the province of Quebec is well and widely known throughout that province as having been one of the best criminal lawyers to practise there. The indirect reference by my hon. friend is to the effect that he imputes to the chief justice a lack of knowledge of any other law than criminal law.

Mr. CAHAN: Nonsense.

Mr. POWER: That is the remark to which I object.

Mr. CAHAN: If there was any such imputation I withdraw it at once, but I am going on to read from the final judgment of the chief justice, as reported and signed by him.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): The chief justice was right, the proof was not sufficient. The certificate of death should have been filed.

Mr. CAHAN: There will be ample opportunity to discuss these points later. In his final ruling the chief justice said :

> Fortunately for the dead persons there is no proof of their death, and so far as the registrar is concerned and the proof made, they are alive.

I will restrain myself as much as possible, but I am not impressed—

Mr. POWER: I again rise to a point of order. At page 96 of Beauchesne I read:

> (j) cast reflections upon the conduct of judges of superior courts unless such conduct is based upon a substantive motion;

I submit, sir, with all respect that the Secretary of State is casting reflections on the conduct of a judge of the superior court of Quebec.

Mr. CAHAN: The facts may cast some reflection, but I am not doing so.

Mr. POWER: I ask for your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I quite agree with the authority that has been quoted but, as I stated a moment ago, I did not understand the Secretary of State to be casting reflections upon the judge. He is stating certain facts and says that he differs with the findings of the judge.

Mr. POWER: As to the conduct of the judge.

Mr. SPEAKER: No, he does not agree with the findings of the judge and he brings in an amendment to the act to overcome a situation which he thinks is contrary to the spirit of the act.

Mr. CAHAN: The names of these dead people were restored to the list by judicial decree, and the result is that opportunities for impersonation and fraud during the ensuing general election are facilitated. Let me refer to one or two other cases. I will make no imputations; the facts speak for themselves. In the case of Miss Madeline Comeau, whose name it appears was misspelled Conceau on the list of electors for poll No. 17, as residing at 110 Prince Arthur street in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, an investigator ascertained that Miss Comeau had removed from this address to 525 Sherbrooke street east, in another electoral district. Miss Comeau was interviewed at her new address and then, in the presence of the investigator and another witness, she signed a declaration that on the 10th of November last she had removed her residence from the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George to 525 Sherbrooke street east, which is in another electoral district, where she now resides. The investigator gave evidence on oath before the registrar to that effect and, when the registrar called for rebuttal evidence and none was forthcoming, the registrar declared that a prima facie case had been made for the removal of Miss Comeau's name from the list of electors for poll No. 17, and in the exercise of his statutory discretion the registrar removed Miss Comeau's name from that list. Chief Justice Greenshields, without hearing any other evidence, has ordered Miss Comeau's name restored to the list of electors for poll No. 17, in an electoral district in which according to her own statement she has not resided since November 10 of last year.

Take another case. Mr. and Mrs. James Buttress formerly resided at 130 Prince Arthur street in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. An investigator ascertained from Mr. E. Buttress, the janitor at 130 Prince Arthur street, who is a brother of Mr. James Buttress, that the latter had removed to 5690 Seventh avenue, Rosemount, in another electoral district. This investigator then sought out both Mr. and Mrs. James Buttress at their new address and each of them signed a declaration in writing, before this investigator and another witness, that they had removed from their former address in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George on November 15th of last year and that they were residing at the new address in another constituency. The investigator gave evidence on oath to this effect before the registrar, who called for rebuttal evidence and, none being forthcoming, the registrar declared that a prima facie case for the removal of these two names from the list of voters for poll No. 17 had been made out and then, in the absence of rebuttal evidence, struck these two names from the list for poll 17 in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. The chief justice, on an appeal being taken by a third party who had no knowledge of these people—an election agent, I suppose—neither called for nor received any rebuttal evidence whatsoever, but ordered the names of Mr. and Mrs. James Buttress restored to the list of electors for poll No. 17, in which they have not resided since November 15 of last year.

Take another case; these are a few samples. Mr. W. Roberts' name is on the list of electors for 3599 Ste. Famille street in polling division No. 17 in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. An investigator ascertained, upon enquiry at that address, that Mr. Roberts, who is engine foreman in the employ of the Canadian National Railways, had vacated his residence at that address and removed to a new residence at No. 1815 Ste. Catherine street west.

The investigator sought out Mr. Roberts and received from him a declaration in writing that, on December 18 of last year, he had removed from the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, first to Ottawa, where he stayed for two months, and thereafter he had taken up his residence at apartment No. 4, 1815 Ste. Catherine street west, where he now resides, in another constituency outside the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. This investigator gave evidence accordingly before the registrar, and the registrar, in the exercise of his statutory discretion, declared that a prima facie case had been made for removal of the name of Mr. Roberts from the list of electors for poll No. 17, in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. Chief Justice Greenshields, without hearing a scintilla of new evidence in rebuttal, ordered the name of Mr. Roberts restored to the list of electors for poll No. 17 in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, in which he has not resided since December 18, 1934.

Mr. and Mrs. Gideon Albert Bernard formerly resided at No. 3519 Clark street in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, and both their names were on the list of electors for poll No. 18 in that electoral district. An investigator personally visited that residence and ascertained from Mrs. Crandall, the landlady, that Mr. and Mrs. Bernard had removed to No. 8588 St. Dominique street in another electoral district. The investigator proceeded to the new address at 8588 St. Dominique street and obtained from each of these two persons a statement in writing, signed in the presence of the investigator and another witness, that Mr. and Mrs. Bernard had removed on the 20 of February, 1935, from their old address in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, and that thereafter they have resided at 8588 St. Dominique street in another constituency. The investigator gave evidence on oath before the registrar to this effect, and the registrar, in the exercise of his statutory discretion, declared that a prima facie case had been made out for the removal of their names from the list of electors for poll No. 18 in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George; and, no evidence in rebuttal being forthcoming, the registrar struck the names of Mr. and Mrs. Bernard from the list of electors for poll No. 18. The chief justice, on appeal, without hearing evidence in rebuttal, ordered the names of the two Bernards restored to the voters' list for poll No. 18 in St. Lawrence-St. George.

7. Mr. Armand Dube and Mr. G. W. MacNamara, two friends, formerly resided at 222 Milton street in polling division No. 19 of the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. An investigator visited this address and was informed by the landlady that they had both removed to 3452 Laval avenue, in another electoral district. The investigator sought out these two at their new address and obtained from Mr. MacNamara a declaration in writing, signed in the presence of the investigator and another witness, that he, MacNamara, and his friend, Mr. Dube, had removed to No. 3452 Laval avenue on April 3rd, 1935, and that this new residence is in another constituency, outside the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. The same procedure was followed, and the registrar, after hearing the evidence of the investigator, and no rebuttal evidence being forthcoming, struck these two names from the list of electors for Poll No. 19 in St. Lawrence-St. George. On appeal, without hearing any evidence in rebuttal, Chief Justice Greenshields has ordered the re-entry of these two names on the list of electors for poll No. 19, in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, in which they have not resided since April 3rd, 1935.

8. Miss M. Menzies formerly resided at 3429 St. Famille street, in polling division No. 19 of the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, which is a branch of the Y.M.C.A. An investigator visited this branch of the Y.M.C.A. and was informed by Miss Robertson, the secretary of this branch, that Miss Menzies, who is a nurse, had removed from that address, and that her residence is now at the Montreal general hospital on Dorchester street east, which is outside the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. The investigator then called upon Miss Menzies, at the Montreal general hospital, and, in his presence and in the presence of another witness, Miss Menzies signed a declaration in writing that on December 1st, 1934, she had removed from the St. Famille branch of the Y.M.C.A. and taken up her residence at the Montreal general hospital, where she now resides, in another constituency outside the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. The same procedure was followed. The investigator gave evidence accordingly before the registrar who struck Miss Menzies' name from the list of voters for poll No. 19 in St. Lawrence-St. George. Without hearing further evidence Chief Justice Greenshields has ordered that Miss Menzies' name be re-entered on the list of electors for poll No. 19, in an electoral district in which she has not resided since December 1st, 1934.

Let us take another case:

Mr. DUPUIS: Are you going to read them all?

Mr. CAHAN: No, but I shall give various illustrations.

Mrs. C. Preston and her son, Austin Preston, formerly resided at No. 1426 Crescent street, in polling division No. 31 of the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. Before moving from this residence, an investigator interviewed Mrs. Preston early in April last, when she stated that she and her son were moving to Portland, Ontario. Later the same investigator ascertained from Mrs. Preston's son, Mr. R. W. Preston, who is in the employ of the Dominion Rubber Company, at Montreal, where he now works, that his mother and brother had removed to Portland, Ontario, and Mr. R. W. Preston, in the presence of the investigator and another witness, signed a declaration in writing to that effect. The same procedure was followed before the registrar.

Mr. RINFRET: Did the chief justice give separate rulings on each of those cases, or did he give only one ruling, involving all of them?

Mr. CAHAN: He gave one ruling, and placed them all back on the lists.

Mr. RINFRET: The minister is leaving the impression that separate decisions were given in each case.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, they were, but given in one writing. Then to continue with the facts of this case: The investigator gave evidence accordingly, and the registrar struck from the list of electors of poll No. 31 the names of those who had removed their residence to Portland, Ontario.

Mr. DUPUIS: We know them all by heart.

Mr. CAHAN: The chief justice, without hearing any evidence whatever, ordered the names of Mrs. Charles Preston and her son, Austin Preston, re-entered on the list of electors for poll No. 31 in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. In view of the suggestion which has been made, I am refraining from comments.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Wilson formerly resided at No. 1446 Crescent street, in polling division No. 31 of the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. An investigator visited this residence and ascertained from a Miss Mallinson that Mr. and Mrs. Wilson had removed on November 22, 1934, to another residence at 1866 Dorchester street west, which is outside the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. Thereupon Mr. and Mrs. Wilson were both interviewed by the investigator at their new residence in another electoral district, and each of them signed a declaration in writing, in the presence of the investigator and another witness, that since November 22, 1934, they had resided and now reside at 1866 Dorchester street west, which is in another constituency. The investigator gave evidence on oath accordingly before the registrar, who called for rebuttal evidence, and, none being forthcoming, the registrar struck the names of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Wilson from the list of electors for polling division No. 31. The chief justice in like manner, without hearing further evidence, ordered the names of both Mr. and Mrs. Wilson re-entered on the list of electors for polling division No. 31, in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister said "The chief justice, without hearing further evidence"; was further evidence tendered?

Mr. CAHAN: No, none. What happened was—

Mr. RALSTON: It seems to me that is a comment which reflects directly upon the judge and is not justified.

Mr. CAHAN: I am stating the facts.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is suggesting, by saying that no further evidence was heard, that the evidence was tendered and not received.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. CAHAN: No, no further evidence was tendered.

Mr. RALSTON: The minister did not say that.

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps not but I thought I was saying it.

Mr. RALSTON: He said: The chief justice, without hearing further evidence—

Mr. CAHAN: Without hearing further evidence.

Mr. RALSTON: That means notwithstanding.

Mr. CAHAN: Notwithstanding?

Mr. RINFRET: It suggested that he gave his decision without hearing the evidence.

Mr. CAHAN: No, no. What the chief justice has said is that in each of these cases the lack of qualification or lack of residence must be proved with all the particularity required in a criminal or civil case.

Mr. POWER: He has decided in each of these cases that these persons will not be disfranchised under the Franchise Act.

Mr. CAHAN: They should be disfranchised in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George anyway. This is a new electoral list. The chief justice ordered the names of both Mr. and Mrs Wilson reentered on the list of electors for polling division No. 31 in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, in which they have not resided since November 22 of last year.

There is another case. Doctor J. R. Malone, who is well known, formerly resided at No. 1436 Crescent street in polling division No. 31 in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. An investigator, upon visiting this residence, ascertained from Mrs. Berri, the landlady, that Doctor Malone had removed to Gatineau street. The investigator found Doctor Malone at his new residence, No. 5381 Gatineau street, in another electoral district, and the doctor, in the presence of the investigator and another witness, declared in writing that on October 15, 1934, he had moved from his former residence to his new residence, which is in another constituency outside the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. The investigator gave evidence on oath before the registrar, who declared that a prima facie case had been made for the removal of this name from the list of electors for poll No. 31 in St. Lawrence-St. George, and then, in the absence of rebuttal evidence, struck Doctor Malone's name from that list.

When the matter came before the chief justice no further rebuttal evidence was submitted with respect to Doctor Malone and no further evidence was heard, and the chief justice ordered Doctor Malone's name re-entered on the list of electors for polling division No. 31 in the electoral district St. Lawrence-St. George, in which he has not resided since October 15, 1934.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Did the chief justice mention Doctor Malone's name specifically in his judgment?

Mr. CAHAN: In all the cases in which appeals have been made he ordered that the names as they were before him be entered on the list.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): On the general principles of evidence.

Mr. CAHAN: Too general. Here is another case: Mr. Kingsley Davey formerly resided at No. 1481 Bishop street in polling division No. 31 of the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. An investigator, upon inquiry at this residence, ascertained from the janitor of the building that Mr. Davey had moved to 3465 Côte des Neiges road, in another electoral district. The investigator sought out Mr. Davey and obtained from him a declaration in writing, signed in his presence and in the presence of a second witness, that on November 30, 1934, he had removed to No. 3465 Côte des Neiges road, in another constituency, where he now resides. The investigator gave evidence accordingly on oath before the registrar, who said a prima facie case had been made out, called for rebuttal evidence, and, none being forthcoming, he struck Mr. Davey's name from the list. In the same manner and under the same circumstances the chief justice ordered Mr. Davey's name re-entered on the list of electors for polling division No. 31 in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George, in which he has not resided since November 30, 1934.

Miss Ruth Stericker formerly resided at No. 1535 Bishop street, in polling division No. 31 of the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. An investigator was informed by Miss Corbett at this address that Miss Stericker had removed to 3816 Oxford avenue, Notre Dame de Grâce, and subsequently he personally interviewed Miss Stericker and obtained from her a declaration in writing as to her removal and that she had not resided in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George since October 27, 1934.

I could go on at considerable length with these cases, but I wish to state this, that in all the 105 cases which were on appeal in which the question of an address came into the issue the new addresses were obtained by the investigator in every case except 16. With regard to those 16 a careful examination of nearly every house in which they could possibly reside in St. Lawrence-St. George was made, and no evidence could be obtained of any old or new address. All of these names were ordered to be re-entered on the list of electors.

Now, generally speaking, that same condition will apply to several thousand names in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, names that we are absolutely sure are not the names of persons entitled to be registered in that electoral district. Affidavits were furnished with regard to this.

Mr. POWER: Furnished to whom?

Mr. CAHAN: Affidavits were furnished to the registrar and affidavits were produced before the chief justice on behalf of the investigator who investigated, and the chief justice said he would refuse to read a single affidavit, and he did refuse to read a single affidavit. His entire point apparently was this, that, in case of death, evidence in each case must be produced before the registrar as to the fact that these people were dead such as would be brought in a civil case, the proof of a will, for instance, or, as I said without offence, in a criminal case as to the death of the person alleged to be murdered. Now that was never the intention of this act or of any other franchise act which ever passed this house. If that had been the intention there would have been means provided whereby a subpoena or summons could issue out of the registrar's court to compel witnesses to attend. If these cases are to be fought out as an ordinary suit in a court is contested, if that is to be the issue, then I must bring, from the constituency of St. Lawrence St.-George, before the twenty-one judges of the superior court 5,000 cases of persons whose names I contend should be struck out and 2,500 cases of persons will have moved into that district and whose names should go on the list. But that never was the intention.

Mr. POWER: Why not?

Mr. CAHAN: Because there is no provision to that effect.

Mr. POWER: The court has authority to issue subpoenas.

Mr. CAHAN: What court?

Mr. POWER: The court of revision.

Mr. CAHAN: Not in these cases.

Mr. POWER: Certainly it has.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly not. There is no provision for issuing subpoenas, and if there were, why should a member or candidate in St. Lawrence-St. George in order to get rid of five thousand names, of possible use to impersonators, be put to the expense of litigating in the courts five thousand cases which could not be litigated at a less expense than $200 each.

Mr. POWER: Why not pass a decent act?

Mr. CAHAN: The law is passed, and I say this without reflection that no other judge from the Atlantic to the Pacific—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Order. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CAHAN: I am going to repeat that sentence because it is no reflection at all. I say that no other judge in the course of this revision, so I am informed by the dominion franchise commissioner, has taken that same view of the law.

Mr. POWER: It has not been put before any other judge.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In what province?

Mr. CAHAN: My hon. friend is talking without knowledge.

Mr. POWER: I am talking with knowledge.

Mr. CAHAN: Under these circumstances—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Cite any other case.

Mr. POWER: Quote another case.

Mr. CAHAN: I am stating—

Mr. POWER: Quote any other case, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not going into it, but I have in mind another constituency in which there were eight thousand.

Mr. POWER: Have the cases been put before a judge?

Mr. CAHAN: Some of them have.

Mr. POWER: And has the judge given a decision?

Mr. CAHAN: The judge has followed the ordinary course.

Mr. POWER: What is the ordinary course?

Mr. CAHAN: The ordinary course is laid down, that the registrar who sits in the first case must decide from the evidence submitted as to whether a prima facie case has been made out. If he so decides and states that in his opinion a prima facie case has been made out, then he calls for rebuttal evidence.

Mr. POWER: Will the hon. gentleman state that case, and the judge and the court.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with this case in this court.

Mr. POWER: I am asking the hon. gentleman to state any other case.

Mr. CAHAN: I am not going into other cases; I am dealing now with this case.

Mr. POWER: You cannot give any other case.

Mr. CAHAN: I am dealing with this case.

Mr. POWER: Give us another.

Mr. CAHAN: I can go on with scores of cases.

Mr. POWER: Give us another case.

Mr. CAHAN: What I am saying is that the ordinary course is that the registrar, having decided that a prima facie case has been made out, calls upon others present for rebuttal evidence, gives them time to produce the evidence and, no rebuttal evidence having been adduced, he then exercises the statutory discretion which is vested in him and in no other person, and he removes that name from the list. And I say there is no judicial authority in this country who has the right to reinstate that name on the list without some affirmative proof that the person is not dead, that his residence is in the district or polling division in which the name is to be reinstated, and that the person whose name is so reinstated is a qualified elector.

Mr. POWER: There is a judicial authority, the chief justice of the province of Quebec. He is the judicial authority.

Mr. CAHAN: If you wish to discuss that, come on any public platform where I can talk freely. What I am saying is this—

Mr. CASGRAIN: Bring on the election.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: What I am saying is this. My hon. friends may make any suggestions they like; I am not saying that they are doing it, I am not saying that any Liberal committee is doing it, but in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George there are not going to be facilities for five thousand impersonations. I have known in one of my own elections one thousand men to be impersonated before twelve o'clock in the day.

Mr. POWER: It is too bad for you to have done that.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, all I can say is, look at the election expenditure returns.

Mr. POWER: That clearly shows you must have done it.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman insinuates—

Mr. POWER: I am not insinuating anything.

Mr. CAHAN: Then don't make that statement; it is one you dare not make outside this assembly. Now, the result is that in order to make the procedure clear I am proposing that the law should be amended to this effect—and I think it is a very fair provision. This bill may not be enacted into law to be of advantage to me but it will be, I trust, a law that will preserve a certain decency in election campaigns and electioneering practice in the city of Montreal. I am not saying anything about the city of Quebec; I presume they do not follow Montreal practices down there.

Mr. POWER: That is a rather nasty statement to make.

An hon. MEMBER: Have there been any objections raised outside the division of St. Lawrence-St. George?

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps not. What I propose is that a new subsection 5 be added to section 32 of the Dominion Franchise Act, reading:

(5) Upon the hearing of any such appeal from any final ruling which the registrar of electors, sitting as a court of revision, may, in the exercise of his discretion, have made, placing, retaining or removing the name of any person on or from the list of electors of any polling division in the electoral district of such registrar, the judge shall not rescind such final ruling of the registrar nor order that the name of such person shall be placed, retained or removed on or from the list of electors for any polling division of such electoral district, except evidence satisfactory to the judge has been adduced at such hearing that such person is a qualified elector whose place of residence is in the said polling division and that his name should be placed or retained on such list, or that such person is not a qualified elector whose place of residence is in said polling division and that his name should be removed from such list.

All I am asking is that any judge on appeal, before he orders the re-entry of a name objected to on the list of any polling section in any electoral district, shall have before him, adduced at such hearing, evidence satisfactory to him that such person is a qualified elector in that district.

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): We have reached a rather pretty pass in this parliament. First of all we have an act to deal with the elections in one province and now we have an act to deal with the elections in one constituency. I had almost suggested to my hon. friend that this be referred to the private bills committee; this is essentially a private bill. One of my hon. friends has just whispered to me that it might be entitled, "A bill for the relief of Charles H. Cahan." So far as I am aware, nowhere else throughout Canada has a similar situation arisen; at any rate, if it has, no one appears to have complained. It is true my hon. friend a moment ago stated—and I think perhaps, in the excitement of the moment, he stated what was not quite accurate—that some other judge had given a decision different from that of the chief justice of the Superior Court of Quebec. I asked him to cite a case and he spoke of registrars acting as a court of revision, but he did not mention the name of any other judge nor of any constituency in which a similar complaint had been made.

Mr. CAHAN: There was no cause for it.

Mr. POWER: No cause for it? Then I should like to pin my hon. friend down to that statement. When he said that no other judge, from one end of the country to the other, had rendered a similar decision, what did he mean?

Mr. CAHAN: I will tell you what I meant if you want to hear.

Mr. POWER: Yes, I do.

Mr. CAHAN: I made an inquiry of the dominion franchise commissioner as to whether other judges in Canada were taking the same attitude as that taken by Chief Justice Greenshields. He told me that he had been in communication with a number of judges with regard to the administration of the act and that no other judge had adopted the same view with regard to re-entries of names in the lists of electors.

Mr. POWER: The point I am making is this: The hon. gentleman has said that other judges have taken views different from those of Chief Justice Greenshields. No other judge has had similar cases laid before him.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. member say so?

Mr. POWER: The hon. member said so himself.

Mr. CAHAN: I did not.

Mr. POWER: I asked the hon. member to cite any case. He said that no other judge from one end of the country to the other had given a similar judgment. I said: Quote any instance in which a similar case was put before a judge, and the hon. gentleman said that the dominion franchise commissioner had talked to a judge. My hon. friend has been practising law for forty or fifty years and he knows he cannot in this house quote as a judgment a conversation someone has had with a judge outside a court. We do not have to teach the hon. gentleman law; surely he knows it.

What is the object of this bill? It is, as I understand the matter, twofold. The first object is, under the provisions of a franchise act, mind you, to disfranchise 4,000 voters who, the chief justice of Quebec said, were entitled to vote. The second object is to render valid, to legalize the proceedings of the political organization presided over by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. Those are the two main objects of this bill.

I suggested a moment ago that perhaps this bill might very properly be sent to the private bills committee. I do not wish to raise the point, but I think it is a point that could be raised that the minister is acting rather improperly in introducing in this house a bill in which he has a personal political interest. I suggest to him that with his knowledge of British constitutional practice, with his knowledge of parliamentary practice and with his long experience in parliamentary affairs, had he reflected a little bit he would perhaps have asked the Minister of Justice, who after all is the man who originally introduced the franchise act, to introduce any amending bill, instead of the Secretary of State, introducing a measure to deal with a condition which, according to him exists in his own constituency. I doubt very much whether the Minister of Justice would have come before this house with a bill dealing with only one constituency. Is every hon. member opposite going to say in the house: Such a condition exists in my constituency; I might be defeated in the next election; give me a new election act, one for me, one for the Minister of Justice, and for the chief whip, one for the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. CANTLEY: I do not need one.

Mr. POWER: Are we going to come to that in this house? Are we going to have 245 special election acts, one for each and every one of us? Is that the way we are going to carry on the business of the country? Is that the way we are going to legislate? This all comes from one thing: In 1929-30, after a good deal of labour participated in conscientiously by members on both sides of the house, an act was passed by the unanimous consent of the parliament of that day, an act which the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Maloney), speaking last year, said—I have not his exact words before me—was a good act, and he objected to any change in the 1930 act. That act was passed with the consent of every hon. member. One of its main objects was to see to it that, in future, elections were in so far as possible taken out of politics. By the act of 1930 we provided that instead of returning officers being appointed by ministers of the crown, by orders in council or by recommendations of ministers of the crown, from then on they would be appointed by a man who was appointed unanimously by this house, namely the chief electoral officer, and that the returning officers should be permanent. It is true that in certain constituencies—and I see opposite me the hon. member for Pictou—complaints were made that the chief electoral officer had not appointed the returning officer in a nonpartisan manner; but generally speaking, throughout the length and breadth of the land, the returning officers were men of high standing, high qualifications, men holding public office of some kind or another and satisfactory not only to the people but to the members of parliament themselves. However a few hon. members opposite, in order to control what they thought was the electoral machine, began to protest against the act of 1930, and because under the 1930 act the lists were made after the dissolution of parliament and after the writs had been issued so that that act took something like fifty-eight days for its operation between the time the writs were issued and the elections could take place, under the guise, mind you, of trying to shorten the election period they tore up the 1930 act and brought in two acts. How did they shorten the election period? Every hon. member knows this 1934 franchise act has been used as an excuse by hon. gentlemen opposite to remain in office ever since December, 1934, when they should have gone before the people. They know every time we have asked them to appeal to the people, they have said: Oh. we cannot; the lists are not ready; they are not printed; we must have a new revision of the lists, the very revision which my hon. friend wishes to tear up. We are told we must have a new revision to put 400,000 new voters on the lists. My hon. friend in his own constituency wants to knock off 9,000 of those 400,000. Did he say 9,000, or was it 5,000? He wants to knock off more than his proportion of the 400,000 new voters my hon. friends opposite want put on. Therefore the excuse for keeping this parliament in being, that we need to put on 400,000 new voters, falls to the ground at least so far as the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George is concerned. If he is going to knock off 9,000 and add only his proportion of the 400,000, he is going to have a minus quantity in so far as the excuse given for holding this parliament in session so long is concerned.

It was decided that we would have a new electoral list for one reason only, and that was in order to get rid of the returning officers who had been appointed impartially by a public officer, the chief electoral officer appointed by joint vote of the House of Commons. That was the sole, the real reason, and what has happened? We have got this election act. There is hardly an hon. member who will be willing to rise in his place and say that the franchise act is a good act; that the Dominion Elections Act is a good act. Both of those acts have been proved to be just the same as pieces of legislation that have been passed time and again under this government, without thought, ill conceived and impossible of administration. This act has been extremely difficult of administration. We spent—I speak subject to correction—over a million dollars during the course of the last year in the general registration. What this revision is going to cost the Lord only knows, and according to my hon. friend's own statement the lists are not complete. Not only are they not complete but they are badly made and in his riding according to his own statement they leave room for fraud, for corruption, for impersonation, and for every species of electoral trick. That is the position we have reached by endeavouring to tamper with an act which was passed with honest intent by the unanimous consent of all the members of this house.

I should like to deal for a moment with some of the suggestions made by my hon. friend the Secretary of State. He cited some forty or fifty cases perhaps out of the total of four thousand. In the large majority of those cases, to which I listened very carefully, the question involved was this: Miss Comeau, or Doctor Maloney, had moved from such an address in such a street to another constituency. My hon. friend through his agents, through these young men of whom he speaks, traced these people, made complaint to the effect that they had left their former places of residence and had moved to another constituency, and he comes to ask us to pass a law whereby those people, about whose right to vote there is no question whatsoever, who are over twenty-one years of age, British subjects living in Canada shall be deprived of their right to vote, because his investigators inquired from the janitor as to whether or not they were living in such a place and found that they were not. To that, sir, I object, and to that I think most of the members of the Liberal party will object. This act was passed as a franchise act, not as a disfranchising act. Until such time as my hon. friend can show to the house that he or his agents have made provision whereby Doctor Maloney who has moved from one constituency to another will not be deprived of his right to vote I think he has no right to ask us to pass any such legislation as this. If my hon. friend will show us that those voters will still be entitled to use their franchise in this country as Canadian citizens, then perhaps we will give some consideration to his bill. Until he does so I object, and I shall certainly vote against the second reading of the bill.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, may I in the first place say that the administration of the franchise act and all that has to do with the franchise commissioner is under the Department of the Secretary of State and not the Department of Justice. It is for that reason, I assume, that the Secretary of State has brought in the present bill. He certainly is the appropriate minister to do so. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) must be under some misapprehension as to the meaning and intent of this proposed amendment. He seems to think that it is confined in its application to a single constituency. That is entirely erroneous. If passed it will apply to every constituency in the Dominion of Canada. It is brought in to clarify something which may be doubtful in the present act. To my mind there is little doubt about it, but through judgments rendered by the chief justice of the province of Quebec the intent of the act is not being carried out in regard to certain cases which have arisen in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George in that province.

I well remember what took place in this house when the franchise act was passed, because I had the honour of conducting that bill through the house—

Mr. POWER: Why not the Secretary of State?

Mr. GUTHRIE: —and I remember quite well how definitely we decided that a registrar of electors should be appointed in each riding, in whom should be vested discretion both to add and to remove names from the voters' list upon a proper case being made out. That met with the approval of the house, and that discretion was vested in the registrar in each constituency. It was only after the committee which was discussing the bill had had several meetings that a suggestion came that there should be any appeal whatever from the ruling of the registrar. Finally the committee decided that an appeal should be provided for from the decision of the registrar to various judges in the various provinces.

Now the registrar in the first instance does not act autocratically. He has placed before him in writing the reasons why a certain name should be removed from the list, either death or removal or some other reason, and upon evidence being brought in support of that application to remove a name the registrar acts in his discretion and rules that the name shall either be taken from or retained on the list. From that ruling there is an appeal to the judge. Now, if I understood aright the statement which was made in this house to-day, in one instance or in a number of instances before one judge the view of that judge has been that unless evidence is adduced before him he has a right to set aside the discretion which we understood we had vested in the registrar in the first instance. Without evidence being tendered or heard a judge in the province of Quebec in a great number of cases has given judgment that names shall remain on the list notwithstanding that the registrar in his discretion had removed them. All I can say is that if that is the effect of the law which we passed last session it was not the intention of parliament. If the decision of that judge be correct and be valid throughout Canada then the discretion which we vested in the registrar may be swept aside in every case without any evidence.

Mr. EULER: What is the use of the appeal?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There would be no use of the registrar giving a decision. If there is doubt about the matter—it is true that only one judge as far as I am aware has made such a ruling, but if that ruling should be followed in other cases then it is necessary that this house make a declaration, as contained in this bill, that a judge shall not order names to be restored or removed without hearing evidence in the matter. That is all that is asked in this amendment. It will clear the matter up and remove doubt in the future. This does not apply to St. Lawrence-St. George riding particularly, but to every riding in the Dominion of Canada.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

There has been an attempt on the part of the hon. member for Quebec South to cast some reflections upon the Dominion Franchise Act and upon the Dominion Elections Act, which were passed last session after very serious consideration by this parliament, and with very little difference of opinion. I am not going beyond the facts when I say that they were passed practically unanimously. There were some differences in regard to details; there were some slight amendments offered which were rejected, but these acts fairly represent the consensus of opinion of this parliament. My hon. friend from Quebec South says there was no need for them. One thing I think we all agree we did need was a definite franchise act in the Dominion of Canada, and that is the act which my hon. friend the Secretary of State now seeks to amend, to explain and to clarify.

The other was in regard to a dominion elections act. Unfortunately, under the former act we were in the position that on the dissolution of parliament, or in the case of a by-election, in an ordinary constituency something like fifty days had to elapse between the issue of the writ and the polling. In Great Britain in twenty-one days parliament can be dissolved and a new parliament seated at Westminster. They have a basic list always ready. We formed the design, and I think my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in agreement with us, that a basic list would be an excellent thing in this country. Now we have a basic list and that list is open to revision once a year. Under the new election law the house can be dissolved and an election brought on in twenty-eight days. That is a tremendous advantage over the other elongated system of bringing on an election in this country.

Mr. POWER: Apart from the month and a half or two months it takes to revise the lists.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We do not need to delay an election by reason of the revision of the lists; that has never been asserted in this house by any minister of the crown as a reason for the delay of dissolution. Who has ever asserted that?

Some hon. MEMBERS: The Prime Minister.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The question is one of propriety. We could dissolve to-day and hold an election in twenty-eight or thirty days, but would it be a proper thing to do in the midst of a revision of the list? It is a question of propriety. I have heard it stated that there will be three or four hundred thousand new names added to the list. I doubt that very much. In my judgment one hundred to one hundred and fifty thousand would be the most that would be added.

Mr. POWER: I quoted the figures given from the other side.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think it would be a very great outrage to dissolve the house, if it were necessary to do so, in the middle of a revision notwithstanding that certain men would be disfranchised, but the whole question is one of propriety. There is nothing to prevent us dissolving to-day and having the election within thirty days. It was with that object in view that the basic list was established. My hon. friend from Quebec South condemns the whole system, though he was a party to its enactment and as yet it has not been tried out in an election. He is condemning it entirely in advance. I am satisfied that the act will prove to be a good, expeditious act and that it will receive the approval of both sides of the house after it has been in operation for a general election. The present amendment does not affect the election act at all; it is simply an attempt to clarify the law, and if the statements made by my hon. friend the Secretary of State are correct I think it is time we settled that disputed point in this house.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, first I desire to protest, together with my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power), against any amendment to either the election act or the franchise act in the dying hours of the session and on the eve of an election. I think everyone not directly interested in the matter will agree that on the eve of an election there always will be suspicion in the minds of the people that whatever amendment is brought in by the government is not intended to bring justice and fair play in the election but rather to devise some advantage for themselves at the last moment. This is my first objection to this bill, and this also will be my objection to the bill providing that the province of Saskatchewan will pronounce on this government in a different way from the other eight provinces of the dominion.

In my opinion this bill is even more contentious, because it deals—if not in principle at least in fact—with just one constituency in the Dominion of Canada. It is true that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), trying to throw oil on the waters said in a very dispassionate way that this would apply everywhere, but it will not be required anywhere else than in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, because nowhere else have the same circumstances appeared.

Mr. CAHAN: I should just like to tell the hon. gentleman, as I have already said, that I know of one other constituency—and I am not going into any details—where there are five thousand cases of the same kind outstanding.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not think it will help the case if it is shown that there may be two constituencies affected, but my information is that it only deals with one. And mind you, Mr. Speaker, this bill must be through within a few days or it will not apply. It is being practically rushed through in order to alter the conditions of the election in my hon. friend's constituency.

I think the Minister of Justice has made a very noble effort to try to place the Secretary of State in a somewhat better light than he placed himself. The Minister of Justice said that the operation of the act was under the direction of the Secretary of State, but he admitted that he introduced the act that was brought in last year. What does it mean when the Minister of Justice introduces an act but, when any amendment is required, it is brought in by the Secretary of State? That is a very peculiar situation. I think the Minister of Justice, who is very genial, realized that the Secretary of State had placed himself in such a disgraceful position that he had to interfere and say this was according to the routine of the departments. He introduced the act; my hon. friend the Secretary of State now seeks to amend it, and if further amendment is needed I suppose the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) will put it through.

The main objection we have to this bill, Mr. Speaker, is not that it amends an act but that it does so in the course of the operation of that act. Last year the bill was passed unanimously, which makes it even more imperative that it should not be amended by the consent of only one of the parties in this house. We all consented to the bill last year. We say very candidly that we did so in the spirit of compromise. I, together with many members on this side, do not believe in a fixed, permanent list. We rather think the old system of having the list prepared or revised at the last moment, on the eve of an election, was a better system. But we discussed it on this side, and I suppose the same thing took place on the other side, and in the spirit of compromise we agreed to accept the bill. The government gave way a little, I will admit, in providing that the list should be prepared by two enumerators, one representing each party. The lists were prepared last fall, according to the act; they were being revised this spring, also according to the act, the compromise entered into by both parties and I suppose even the third party in the corner, but at the last moment, because my hon. friend the Secretary of State thinks he is going to be bothered or annoyed personally in his own riding, he has introduced a bill to amend that act that was agreed upon by both parties. That is our main objection to the bill. If my hon. friend came here during another session and cited these cases, asking us to amend the act in regard to a future revision, then he would be on much safer ground, but when he comes here just a few days before the revision is over and asks us to amend an act that was agreed upon by compromise between both parties, I think upon reflection he will agree that unless there is a compromise again he should withdraw his bill.

I find fault with the minister because he has not given a proper picture of the conduct of the judge. He went on to cite cases in which it appeared that a Mr. So and So residing on a certain street had moved to another street. The minister said such a case would be brought before the judge; the judge would not hear the evidence, but would order those names to be restored to the list. Another person residing somewhere else died; his case was brought before the judge, and the minister added, without listening to evidence the judge ordered that that name be restored, and so on. The minister went on that way for half an hour, and he gave the impression that every individual case had been brought before the judge with the evidence annexed to it, and that the judge had refused the application.

But that is not the fact. The fact is that an appeal was entered by a party against the striking out of over 4,000 names. I am not a legal man, but I followed the case closely, and I know the question involved was one as to who would be forced to bring evidence before him. The minister admitted that, himself. He states "Here is a registrar deciding that over 4,000 names must be struck off the list; am I, as a candidate, going to be forced in every case to prove the necessary facts, and must I furnish evidence?" If I understood the case properly, that was the whole contention. The judge decided that unless evidence was produced before him he would not consent to disfranchising 4,000 electors. That is the way I understood the case.

Mr. CAHAN: An entirely erroneous understanding.

Mr. RINFRET: If the same thing had happened in St. James constituency I would have thought, had a judge decided in the same way, that he had taken a proper position. Mind you, before the compromise of last year I said there was disagreement in the act. We cannot at one and the same time have a permanent and a flexible list. If we have a list being formed and revised at certain dates it is inevitable that between a date of revision and an election date a number of electors will have moved, a number will have died,—and you cannot prevent that. With the act as it stands we will always have on the lists for every constituency, and especially in the cities, large numbers of electors who will not be at the points indicated in the lists, and who may be on the list in one division whereas they should appear on the list for another. Under the present act we cannot prevent that. That does not mean that when a judge is presented with a list of 4,000 electors he is going to say, "Well, unless every one appears before me"—and how will the dead ones appear?—"and unless each produces his own evidence I shall rule that the decision of the registrar is a proper one, and allow the disfranchisement of thousands of electors." That is the way I understand the act.

The appeal to the judge was placed in the act, I believe at the demand of hon. members on this side of the house, to protect the electors from the over-zeal and over-devotion of a registrar. Sometimes a registrar may be stirred up by the evidence prepared by electoral agents; all hon. members know that can happen. The Secretary of State has said that no other judge would have given the decision he has indicated. Well, evidently I have more confidence in that tribunal than has the minister. On the contrary I say there is not one judge on the bench who would have consented to strike off 4,000 names, or to substantiate their being stricken off by the registrar, exacting at least a certain amount of evidence in every case.

In my view the basis of the act is the proper placing of names on the list by enumerators. Enumerators from the different parties go from house to house, inscribing the names of the electors on the lists. Last year we insisted that the procedure be made as simple as possible, and that an elector who had his name placed on the list should not be asked to enter into a very complicated procedure, such as was at first contemplated. I believe we are on firm ground, too, when we say that once an elector's name has been placed on the list by an enumerator he should be protected against any further effort to withdraw his name from that list. If a man or a party has reason to ask a registrar to strike a name from the list, and if a registrar complies with the request and an appeal is made to a judge it should be up to the party who has made the representations to the registrar—that a person has moved or died—to appear before the judge and make good the charge he has made before the registrar. I ask that the right to vote be not made too complicated. I do not speak in any partisan spirit, but I speak after a close association with the electors of the city of Montreal. Each time the election act has been before this chamber it has been complicated by legal minds to a point where it has become very difficult for common people to know how to vote. That is my contention, and has been my contention for some time. I will admit, gladly, that the government has made it more simple. We must remember however that whether or not we require it from them the common people will not spend a whole year wondering whether or not their names appear on the list.

Unfortunately our election act has been changed every three or four years, with the result that electors come to us stating they do not know how to proceed to vote, and asking, "Why is it not the same as it was four years ago?" I believe we should try to have a permanent act, stick to it for a number of years and make it easy for people to understand where and how they shall vote. The contention of the Secretary of State is that when a man's vote is being challenged and a registrar decides against him he must appear before a judge and plead his own case for his right to vote. I do not believe in that, at all. I must disagree with the Secretary of State on that point. In my view it is up to the party who challenges my right to vote to make good that challenge, not only before the registrar but before the court. That is why I say the chief justice of the province of Quebec, acting on his own interpretation of the act, did rightly when he said, "At the demand of some electoral agent I am not going to disfranchise 4,000 electors in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George merely because I am asked to do so. I want to have the evidence; I want to know about these cases."

Much graver in my opinion, however, is the position we will take when the judge has rendered his decision. After all, are we going to show a disregard for the court? Are we going to say, "If the court decides against us, because we are members of the House of Commons or ministers of the crown we are going to change the law." I say that is an abominable principle. I appeal to the Prime Minister, who I believe has as fine a legal mind as any person in Canada: Do you not think it is an abominable principle to say that because a decision had not been favourable to me, a minister of the crown, I am going to introduce a bill to change the law, and force it through parliament in time to be effective in the actual revision? I object to that principle. I have great respect for the Secretary of State; I will say it is not often that I disagree with him, but in this instance I believe he has been ill advised. I do not dare censure him, because he is much older than I am, but if I were in his place I would rather try to be elected by a majority of my electors than to try to be elected by a majority of this house.

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I gave some attention to the franchise act last year when it was before this house, and although I thought that the old law needed to be changed in certain respects I believe that in so far as the making up of the lists is concerned the old act was far superior to the present one.

A few days before the election in 1930 enumerators were named, who went from house to house and inquired as to the residents in these different houses, took down the names of those who were entitled to vote, these names were put on the list, and very shortly after the elections were brought on and these lists which had been compiled a very short while before were used. The only objection to that system in the city of Montreal so far as I saw was that these lists were made up in the summertime when a large number of the residents were out of the city at the different summer resorts, but many of the electors of Montreal took the trouble to come back to the city and see that their names were properly inscribed on the lists. In my experience and in the experience of the other members for the city of Montreal, and I think even the hon. Secretary of State will bear me out in this, there were very few objections made as to the manner of bringing in the votes in the election of 1930.

But what is the situation under the present act? The situation is this, that last fall the country went to the expense of having a list prepared, and twenty-one copies of the lists for each polling subdivision in his constituency were sent to every member of this house. In my own division of Laurier-Outremont there are 225 polls, 150 in Laurier and 75 in Outremont, and twenty-one copies of these lists containing the names of the electors at 225 polls were sent to me two or three months ago. What was the result? Those lists are still wrapped up in the cellar of my house. I have not even opened the packages because I knew that this revision was coming on and that these lists would be of no avail. I quite admit that in the revision the typesetting of the original list will be used in preparing the new list but actually a new and complete list will have to be made and the twenty-one copies of the list for each of the 225 polling subdivisions in my constituency will be of no use whatever. It simply means that the country has gone to the expense of printing all these lists which will be useless.

I listened to the hon. Secretary of State with much attention. Like my friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) I have a great esteem for him. An old friendship has existed between us for a number of years, and if I do not agree with him in certain of the statements he has made it is because I think he was wrong. The Secretary of State said that he did not see why he as a candidate should be called upon to incur the expense of seeing that certain names were taken off or put on the list. Now this is a franchise act, Mr. Speaker, and the list is made for the purpose of facilitating the right of the citizens to poll their votes, and I would ask the hon. Secretary of State why should the electors be put to the expense of going before the court, as they will have to do under this amendment, and seeing that their names are retained on the list? An electoral agent, as did happen in the case of the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, might object to four thousand names remaining on the list, or he might object to four thousand new names being put on the list, and under this amendment each one of those electors would have to go before the court, be put to expense, and lose his time appearing before the court in order to see that his name was retained or put on the list. I say under this act the benefit of the doubt should be given to the elector, but that is not the case here.

I notice also that the Secretary of State in his remarks made no mention of the judgment of Chief Justice Greenshields. He did not state specifically what were the reasons for the presiding judge rendering his decision as he did. But the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) said that the chief justice would not accept the evidence as adduced before him and required further evidence. The question was not decided on its merits at all. The question was decided on an exception to the form. The chief justice did not say: "I do not know in this particular case whether Doctor Malone's name should be stricken off the list or not. All I know is that sufficient evidence has not been put before me to allow me properly to decide what ruling I should give." But this amendment reads:

> The judge shall not rescind such final ruling of the registrar nor order that the name of such person shall be placed, retained or removed on or from the list of electors for any polling division of such electoral district, except evidence satisfactory to the judge has been adduced at such hearing that such person is a qualified elector.

That I submit was absolutely the judgment of the chief justice of the province of Quebec. He said: I do not know as to the merits of the different cases, but what I do know is that you have not brought sufficient evidence before me to enable me to give a proper decision. So even according to the amendment itself it would seem that no criticism should be made of the judgment of the chief justice of the province of Quebec.

One other point which has struck me in this discussion was that the right of voting should not be too complicated. I think that same thought was expressed by my hon. friend from St. James. But under the present franchise act the right to vote is going to be too complicated. In the revision that is taking place at the present moment and in the revision that took place last fall I had some experience. I knew what transpired in these 150 polls in the Laurier division. Last fall there were 165 names added to the list, and that comprised the names of people who had moved and the names of people who had been struck off the list, and out of those 165 names over 100 were put on the list because in some cross-sections of the city a certain number, one or two blocks in one corner of the division had been overlooked. The registrar found that out and he sent the enumerators out again and they put these names on the list for they should have been put on when the basic list was being drawn up. In the present revision we have the greatest difficulty in Montreal in getting the electors to look after their own interests. They will not do it. I had a conversation here last week with an official of this house who knows something about elections, and his idea was that every facility should be given to the elector to help him have his name put on the list, that you should not count upon the elector to see that his name is put on the list, that if you do that, it will become complicated.

Under the present revision the situation in my division in Montreal is this: The people are not bothering about the revision at all. Those who have moved from one division to the other are not taking the trouble to have their votes transferred; those who have changed their places of residence in a division are not paying any attention to it. In one week—last week—only nine people went before the registrar. Here is a man who is paid a fee by the government and who sits for long hours; and as a member of parliament I have a representative before him. I go to the expense of having this man there and in the course of one week in the city of Montreal, where there are possibly thirty or forty thousand electors interested, only nine people take the trouble to appear before the registrar to see whether their names are revised. Moreover, we have public notices in the papers, and I myself at my own expense had a circular drawn up and distributed from house to house; and notwithstanding all that, as I say, only nine people in the section of my division which is being revised, went before the registrar in that week. The result is that when election day comes along all those electors who have neglected to see that their names are properly on the list are going to flood the polls. There will be such a rush of electors to the polls that it will be with the greatest difficulty that polling will take place on the day of the elections.

This law has something to commend it, but on the whole I prefer the old law in so far as it facilitated the movement of electors to the poll on polling day.

[Mr. J. A. Mercier.]

On section 1—Judge may not rescind final ruling of registrar, or add, retain or remove names, except upon certain adduced evidence at hearing.

Mr. POWER: What is the present status of these 4,000 names? Are they on the electoral list or are they off or where are they?

Mr. CAHAN: At the present time I think less than 200 cases have been heard by the registrar and have gone on appeal to the courts. In the case of others the court hearings have not yet been reached.

Mr. POWER: Do I understand the hon. member to say the hearings have not been held before the registrar?

Mr. CAHAN: Except in regard to less than 200 names.

Mr. POWER: What about the remainder?

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose they will proceed before the registrar. I have no doubt he will hear the remainder from day to day as fast as he can hear them; it will take him a long time.

Mr. POWER: I hope the hon. gentleman understands that the revision finishes on June 30 and it is now the 18th.

Mr. CAHAN: I understand that.

Mr. POWER: How does he propose that the registrar shall hear those cases if he has not already heard them, or is it only a matter of giving judgment?

Mr. CAHAN: It is not a matter of very great importance to me whether the registrar hears them all.

Mr. POWER: I thought so.

Mr. CAHAN: I have nothing to do with the hon. gentleman's thoughts, but if he keeps on thinking he may think that possibly this bill may not apply solely to the present registration and the present appeals. The member for St. Lawrence-St. George, even if he has to meet 1,000 or 2,000 impersonations in his constituency, can still be elected there by the unanimous suffrages at any rate of his own supporters. Although at my age I would like to retire, but simply because certain suggestions have been made, I intend to contest the election. Really I have not a personal interest in this bill. If I could say this without the hon. gentleman taking it as a reflection on him, I would say that to whomsoever you may attribute the fact, it is a disgrace that in a constituency such as that, 5,000 names or even 4,000 or 3,000 names of persons who, prior to April 30 last, which was the last day for objections, have forfeited their right to vote in that constituency, should be left upon the lists. I am quite prepared, if these people are to be gathered in from all over Canada, to stand my chance of getting a majority of them. Of course, the hon. gentleman knows what it means, the expense of gathering electors in from all over the country. I am not afraid of the electorate of St. Lawrence-St. George, not in the slightest degree. But in that constituency, as my hon. friend knows, there has been impersonation and fraud which is a disgrace to the city of Montreal in which that district is situated. I and the younger men who support me—at least it shows I have some friends when seventy of them will gather for the purpose of cleaning up this list—are going to stop impersonation in this city of Montreal if by any legitimate means it can be stopped. And we are going to stop it particularly in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George. This bill will be of far more use to other hon. gentlemen at a subsequent revision than it can possibly be to the revision proceeding in St. Lawrence-St. George between now and the thirtieth of this month. This bill enunciates a principle which has been recognized in all electoral franchise acts of this country for years, that if a prima facie case is made out and full opportunity given for rebuttal and no rebuttal whatever is adduced, the name goes off the list, and it should not be restored unless there is some affirmative evidence of the existence of that person and his or her qualification by residence in the electoral district. That is what this bill affirms. Whether or not it passes is immaterial to me as far as my own election is concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the registrar acts improperly and does not carry out the statutory requirements, if he puts names on the list that obviously should not be there, should it be incumbent upon the judge on appeal to insist on evidence? Should he not be free simply to say: That name obviously should never have been put on the list at all, and therefore I overrule the decision of the registrar? Is not that the function of an appeal court.

Mr. CAHAN: I presume that if it were shown that a registrar had violated the law, but that would require evidence.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that appears from the record. Under this provision the judge would be helpless, he would be unable to do a thing in the case of an incompetent or a crooked registrar.

Mr. CAHAN: That registrar is an officer of this house, and he is competent. The suggestion is that the registrar has placed a name on the list improperly. Well, there must be evidence to show that before the judge can remove the name from the list, and there must be evidence before a name is reentered on the list that the person is entitled to have it so reentered. And the only evidence required by this bill is "evidence satisfactory to the judge" adduced at such hearing.

Mr. GRAY: He is hardly a judge of appeal, he is more a judge of first instance.

Mr. CAHAN: He is a judge on appeal, he is ruling on the decision in the discretion of the judge of another court, a court established by statute of this parliament.

Mr. RINFRET: I want to stress again the point I made in the debate on second reading. I do not think my hon. friend is right, but even if he were I think this is a very improper time to amend the act. This bill if it goes through must go to the Senate, it must be sanctioned. There is the question of time. there is just the possibility that the bill may be sanctioned two or three days before the revision is over. Then the bill comes into force. What does that mean? It means that four thousand people must appear before Mr. Justice Greenshields to make good their right to remain on the list. Is that fair? I put it to the committee as I did to the house. Even if the bill be right in principle—I do not think it is—this is not the proper time to bring it in, because the intention is to have it acted upon this month. The revision will be over by the thirtieth of June, and there will not be time for that satisfactory evidence called for in the bill to be adduced before the chief justice. Would it not be much fairer to abide by the act as passed last year by both parties rather than pass an amendment which cannot be effective in the time, even if there were any merit to it.

Mr. CAHAN: I can only say we are abiding by the franchise act and its intention as we understood it when passed last year. We are making no amendment which will abrogate or alter the intention we then had. These electors, whom the hon. gentleman has mentioned, have had time since the thirtieth of April last—if any one of them wishes to show that he should be on that list he has had ample opportunity and notice to adduce evidence for that purpose before the registrar, and not one of them has ever produced a scintilla of evidence. He has also the right to go before the court and adduce affirmative evidence there, and I am not taking away that right. But the matter is far more important than that. These electors were on the list at the last revision, and it is now found in this revision that four or five thousand of them are no longer resident in the constituency. They are in other constituencies, they are applying in those other constituencies to have their names on other lists. If they wish to remove their name from one constituency to another there is a short form provided by which that removal may be effected. But what I am objecting to is names remaining on the lists in any constituency, whether in Toronto, in which I understand in one constituency there are five thousand objections, or in Montreal in which there are these objections, names which facilitate impersonation and fraud. In order to prevent impersonation and fraud this parliament at the last revision provided that the names should be entered in urban constituencies according to the numbers of the street or avenue, and these numbers had to be consecutive; or if it were in an apartment house that the number of the apartment should be given. Now what have we? In the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George I am told we have about twenty-five hundred applications from people to be placed on the new lists, and unless some such amendment is made we shall have such cases as several families, crowded on the list for one apartment, which we know can hold only one family; there will be the old family and another, and possibly a third family alleged to be occupying that one apartment when everyone knows that there are no such residents there. Whether we clean this up now or whether we clean it up at some future time there can be no objection to the principle and import of this amendment. It simply prevents persons, who moved out of the district long ago and lost their residential qualifications, from having their names on the list, to be voted not by themselves but by others who impersonate them and vote in their names fraudulently.

Mr. RINFRET: I have another argument to present to my hon. friend along the same line, having regard to the fact that this amendment is brought in too late and that the act should not be amended while it is in operation. My hon. friend seems to think all those names are going to be impersonated. I am not of that opinion at all. In every election you have on the list for your division the names of hundreds of electors who have moved since the list was prepared, and you have to look for them and tell them where they vote. It is possible that quite a number of the four thousand people should not be on the list in St. Lawrence-St. George but should be on the list in some other constituency. It is also possible—and I trust that my hon. friend will be perfectly organized in that respect—to tell these men where their vote belongs and see that they vote there. You cannot have perfect lists. I have presented the argument that the act we passed last year rather tended to bring about that situation, more so than the previous act.

Here is another point, and I wish to appeal to the minister once more before he insists on this bill passing. I say that if this amendment is passed and put into force it will leave only a few days for these four thousand people to produce satisfactory evidence that they should be on the list. Or it may be proved that they do not belong on the list and should not be there. They will be given no time at all in which to register on another list. The act provides a period of six weeks for a revision. Why? Because it does require a number of weeks, if a man's name has been taken off the list for St. Lawrence-St. George, for that man to see the other registrar in St. James or St. Mary and have his name put on this list. Even if it were true that most of these names do not belong to my hon. friend's division, by this amendment the hon. gentleman is going to disfranchise those people who have moved, because they will have no time to register anywhere else. That will be the effect of this amendment; four thousand people will be disfranchised just because they have moved.

Mr. CAHAN: The date fixed was April 30; under the provisions of the statute any objection must be lodged before April 30. The revision began on May 15. During the entire month of April any person who had taken up a new residence in any part of Canada could have applied to have his name entered on the list of the electoral district in which he then resided. That has been going on throughout April and May and on into June. I cannot speak except from information I have received, but I understand that in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George already there are over 2,500 persons who seek to have their names put on the new list. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that St. Lawrence-St. George comprises practically all the largest apartment houses as well as a great many of the smaller ones. It includes every class and condition of society, and there is a great deal of movement in that constituency. On any May Ist or October 1st a great number of people move out of St. Lawrence-St. George and a great many other people move in. This revision which is now taking place does not take off a single name of those who have moved out since May 1. April 30 was the last day for objections. A certain number of people moved out in the May movement. I cannot say where they have gone, but they have not been deprived of the franchise. Those who moved out before April 30 deprived themselves of the franchise in that electoral district as the new revision began on that date. They are applying in other districts everywhere over the city, but they have no right to vote, they have no right to be entered upon the list of electors in my constituency, or in the constituency of my hon. friend, from St. James, or the constituency of the hon. member for Cartier unless resident there. This bill is perfectly fair and equitable. It deprives no person of a vote, except a vote in a constituency in which he has no right to vote. That is all. On the other hand it does give some control during the election of this vast system of bribery and impersonation that one has to stand up against in a constituency in Montreal.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman has mentioned my name. Why is it that there is so much skullduggery and rascality in that one division of Montreal, St. Lawrence-St. George? I should like to know that, because I am the neighbour of my hon. friend and I do not complain about it nor do any of my opponents. My good friend from Mount Royal has a very large moving vote, yet no person seems to complain except my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George. I should like to know the reason for that.

Mr. RALSTON: Once more I should like to ask the Secretary of State to reconsider the matter of putting this act into force so as to affect the present revision. My hon. friend has made some case for an amendment to the act so far as the future is concerned but I say he has made no case whatever for alleging that the judgment of the learned judge was wrong in law. We often have the experience of a judge deciding contrary to our own ideas and against the particular case we have presented, but we do not come to parliament to have an act passed in order to reverse that decision. All that happened was that the learned judge announced what in his opinion was the law, and under our system of stare decisis that becomes our law. I am sure my hon. friend realizes that this is in just the same position as if there were litigation between two parties. Two parties have gone to court and a decision has been given in favour of one of them. Instead of accepting that decision, because that has become the law, the other proposes to come to parliament and have that particular decision amended and overruled. I submit that this is an instance where a hard case is going to make bad law and worse legislation; I submit that the principle is bad, and I think my hon. friend will be the first to admit it. It may be that we are justified in legislating for the future in declaring, as the Minister of Justice has said, more clearly what was the intention of parliament, but the intention of parliament is taken from the words which we put into the statute. The learned judge, a most distinguished jurist—not an experienced judge but a most distinguished judge of the province of Quebec—has said that in his opinion the statute means so and so. That opinion having been given and that decision having been reached in favour of the people whose names were on the list, which names were sought to be struck off, I submit that my hon. friend has no right to ask this parliament to overrule that decision. I submit that the decision must stand, and if my hon. friend does not think that was the intention of parliament as he had it in his mind or as the Minister of Justice had it in his, then it is perfectly competent for us to amend the statute to apply to the future in order to have that situation remedied.

I do submit to my hon. friend that in this bill, just as in any bill that is passed amending the law, there should be a provision that this is not to affect pending litigation. That provision appears, as my hon. friend from his long experience, knows far better than I do, in many measures. I submit that exactly the same principle should apply here, and that the Minister ought to add to this section a subsection providing that this section is not to affect any revision which may be in progress under the Dominion Franchise Act, at the time of the coming into force of this act.

Then the minister has pointed the moral by the cases he has cited, and he has given notice to everybody who may be affected by the act that he must show such and such a thing to the judge.

Mr. ARTHURS: What about the dead ones?

Mr. RALSTON: That will always happen; no revision is perfect. Does the hon. member suggest that we come to parliament solemnly to legislate dead persons off voters' lists? There is a perfectly competent and distinguished jurist who has decided that the law we passed does not cover that case. There is no reason why we should pass a special act to strike the names of some dead persons off the list. I suppose there are irregularities in almost every constituency; some decisions may be made by registrars or judges which may not be to the liking of a candidate or sitting member. Surely we do not come here to amend those conditions and to constitute ourselves a court of appeal from every decision of every officer who has judicial discretion under this act.

Therefore I say to the minister that having regard to the principle, and leaving aside the merits, he has stated he is perfectly willing to accept the situation as it is. Let him do it, then. Let us say the minister was unlucky in the decisions in his constituency—but that does not justify parliament in legislating or changing the law and depriving people of certain rights they had, as those rights have been laid down and determined by a judge. Therefore I move the following amendment:

That there be added to section 1 the following subsection:—

(2) This section shall not apply in respect of any revisions which may be in progress under the Dominion Franchise Act at the date of coming into force of this act.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, there are no two parties in this controversy before Mr. Justice Greenshields. Not a single elector, or alleged elector to whom objection is made has made an appeal to Mr. Justice Greenshields. The gentleman who made the appeal had no personal knowledge or acquaintance with any of these electors. He simply wrote out on a sheet of paper words indicating that he was appealing for all of them. This amendment does not take from the list the names to which I referred this afternoon. If and when the bill is enacted it will not affect any prior decision of any judge in any part of Canada. Therefore the point the hon. member has in view in connection with pending litigation, is entirely preserved. This bill would not affect a pending appeal.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes it does.

Mr. CAHAN: It does not affect any appeal which has been decided, and there are no other pending appeals.

Mr. RALSTON: It affects any appeal which has not been decided. It changes the law as it was laid down by Mr. Justice Greenshields, in connection with appeals.

Mr. CAHAN: I can tell the hon. member that at the present time there are no appeals pending.

Mr. RALSTON: Well then, there can be no objection to accepting my suggestion.

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly the bill should not apply to appeals which have been asserted at the date it is enacted. Then, there is a further point—and I am not going to get into any further controversy with the hon. member for Quebec South.

Mr. POWER: Oh, no.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. CAHAN: It would be well for parliament to declare its intention, because there are scores of constituencies throughout Canada in which judges are sitting and for some days and weeks will be sitting on appeals.

Mr. GRAY: The language in the act is quite simple. I find these words "They shall be heard and determined in such summary manner as the judge shall deem proper."

Mr. CAHAN: That deals with the "manner," but it does not say that the judge has the right to declare that the statutory discretion of a junior judge or junior court has been improperly exercised.

Mr. RALSTON: It does not say he has not the right.

Mr. CAHAN: But that is what has been assumed.

Mr. RALSTON: But it does not say he has not the right. He hears it as an appellate court, and an appellate court has the right to overrule the judgment of the lower court.

Mr. CAHAN: He has the right to overrule that judgment on any evidence which has been submitted to him only after hearing new evidence.

Mr. RALSTON: Or through lack of evidence.

Mr. GRAY: It is just an ordinary case.

Mr. CAHAN: But in this instance the names were not then on the list. On his own intuition, shall I say, he has undertaken to order that names be inserted on the list which according to the evidence may not properly be inserted upon it.

Mr. RALSTON: No, no.

Mr. CAHAN: I say that.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Where is the judgment?

Mr. CAHAN: That is the judgment.

Mr. POWER: He ordered to be reinserted names which my hon. friend's friends took off the list.

Mr. CAHAN: No, they did not. I have no friends in the matter, at all. Anyone will admit that the registrar in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George is a man of the highest possible repute in the French-Canadian race.

Mr. POWER: I am not saying anything to the contrary.

Mr. CAHAN: And there is no partisanship or prejudice in respect of his decision.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to understand the legislation before us, because it appears to me the proposed change goes entirely too far. As I understand the situation one may apply to a registrar either to add or to take off names. He makes his decision on certain evidence adduced before him. An appeal from his decision either to add or to take off names goes before a judge, who may decide the appeal in a summary manner. I believe the act states that it shall be heard and determined by a judge in such summary manner as the judge shall deem proper. The appellate court may simply read the record of what was sent up from the lower court. It is one thing to look at the record, and it is another thing to hear the evidence. This change would deny to the court of appeal the right of every court of appeal to ascertain from the record whether or not the decision of the lower court was wrong. This condition does not apply only to the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George. There may be appeals in my constituency from the registrar. I believe that there the appellate tribunal is the county court judge. There may be occasions on which the registrar has manifestly acted improperly. That is, he has given a decision either on no evidence or insufficient evidence. It should be competent for a superior or county court judge hearing an appeal simply to state that there seems to be no evidence or insufficient evidence. It should be competent for him to say "I reverse the registrar, and place it in the position where it was before the registrar acted." Under the bill he could not do that; he could not lift his finger. He could not do one thing in connection with a decision made by the registrar which was manifestly wrong, unless evidence were adduced before him.

Mr. POWER: In each single case.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, in each case. To my mind it is an objectionable piece of legislation. I do not know what the particular position is in St. Lawrence-St. George, but I say we should not have a law whereby the judge shall not rescind a final ruling of the registrar, except evidence has been adduced at the hearing before the judge. It may be negative evidence. It may be evidence that such person is not a qualified elector whose place of residence is in such a polling division. It should never be the law that evidence must be adduced at the hearing before the judge. There may be hundreds of cases where no evidence will be necessary at all, and where it will be manifest from the record, without any evidence, that the registrar was wrong.

Mr. GRAY: Would the Secretary of State please answer the hon. member for Hants-Kings? Surely he has given a reasonable interpretation of the act, and I would like the Secretary of State to give his.

Mr. CAHAN: The answer is so clear that there can be no need for me to arise to give it, but if the hon. gentleman will take his seat I will answer.

Parliament has appointed a commissioner. The commissioner under the authority of parliament has appointed registrars of courts of revision; these are the judges of that court, and parliament has ordered these judges on prima facie cases to exercise their discretion in adding or removing names, with this proviso, that when the registrar has found that a prima facie case has been made he must so declare and give opportunity to any elector or anyone in his behalf to adduce evidence to the contrary. Then the burden of proof is entirely shifted. Under the act as it is now the moment the registrar declares that a prima facie case has been made and has said, "I will adjourn to hear any evidence that may be adduced against my decision that a prima facie case has been made out," then the burden of proof is shifted to the person whose name is to be added or removed as the case may be. Now on appeal from that decision I suggest that no court has the right to interfere with a statutory discretion vested in the registrar, but the onus remains where it was when the registrar gave his decision to add or remove a name, and that onus of proof is not changed by reason of an appeal of some third party to a judge of the superior court. When the case reaches the judge of the superior court he must make his finding from the evidence adduced before him. If there is a record it can be brought before him; if there is other independent evidence it can be adduced before him. But this bill declares that the evidence so adduced must satisfy the judge as to the decision which he may give. The onus is shifted. If he decides that the name shall be reentered on the list or that it shall be removed, he cannot do so without new evidence. Evidence must be brought before him that the elector is qualified or disqualified. It does not matter whether the evidence brought up from a lower court is satisfactory or not, but there must be new evidence adduced as to the elector's qualification which satisfies the judge that that name should be reentered on the list or that that name should be removed from the list. By this bill I have left it entirely in the judgment of the judge, but his decision must be on evidence adduced at the hearing, which he declares to be satisfactory to him, otherwise he cannot override the statutory discretion of the registrar.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully to what the Secretary of State has just said, but I have understood nothing of what he has said. Will he be kind enough to make it clear? I have not understood a word of what he has said.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MONTREAL SHIP CHANNEL

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): With the unanimous consent of the house, I should like to revert to motions in order to file the interim report, interdepartmental, of the Montreal ship channel water levels board, with a summary in both English and French.

PRIVATE BILLS

CORNWALL BRIDGE COMPANY

The house resumed, from Friday, June 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stewart (Lethbridge) for the second reading of Bill No. 108, respecting the Cornwall Bridge Company.

Mr. F. T. SHAVER (Stormont): When I moved the adjournment of the debate on Friday evening last I said that it was my desire to oppose this bill, and I wish to place before the house as briefly as possible some of the reasons why I am opposed to the second reading.

This bill, respecting the Cornwall Bridge Company, is for the purpose of giving an extension of time to the company for beginning the construction of their bridge. I regret very much that the hon. gentleman who sponsored it did not indicate to the house the purpose of it nor give any idea of the proposal he is placing before us. The proposed bridge is supposed to start from a point in Glengarry county and to be erected across the St. Lawrence to St. Regis island, a road to be constructed on the island, and another bridge at the western part of the island leading to the province of Quebec. The act incorporating the Cornwall Bridge Company was passed in 1930 and was assented to on May 30 of that year. Under the terms of that act the company had two years within which to present their plans to the governor in council for approval and they had three years after that to begin construction. They made very definite promises to the people of Stormont county, to the people of the town of Cornwall and to the residents of Glengarry that immediate construction would be started in 1930. They made glowing and definite promises. It was said that hundreds of men were to be put to work immediately, large quantities of material were to be used, and a bridge across which thousands of tourists would move in an uninterrupted stream would be constructed in a short time for the benefit of the people of eastern Ontario. The company, however, waited the full limit of two years before submitting their plans, because those plans were not approved by the governor in council until May 31, 1932. Then they had three years from that time to begin construction.

Speaking as a layman without any legal knowledge whatever, it seems to me that their act is now null and void and was after May 31, 1935, because they took no steps at all to carry out the provisions of the charter and did absolutely no work. When the people of Cornwall found that no effort was being made by this company to carry out the promises they had made to the town to begin work under the charter, the business men, the board of trade and the town council, acting in co-operation with the chamber of commerce of the town of Massena in New York state took steps to have the railway bridge planked for vehicular traffic. This railway bridge across the St. Lawrence has been in existence for nearly forty years. Mr. Horovitz of Cornwall, who was then mayor of the town, was one of the very active promoters of this scheme. It was necessary that an act should be passed by the House of Commons giving the Ottawa-New York railway and its lessee the New York Central Railway Company power to lease this bridge to another company who might use it for purposes of vehicular traffic. I had the honour of sponsoring that bill in the house myself. It passed at the session of 1932 and was assented to on May 26 of that year. There was considerable opposition to that bill when it was before the senate committee and I was of the opinion, as many supporters of the bill were, that that opposition was engineered by the proponents of the Cornwall Bridge Company, who adopted a dog in the manger attitude. They did nothing to carry out the terms of the charter which they had received two years previously but they were endeavouring to prevent the planking of an existing bridge for vehicular traffic. The bill was passed in 1932 with amendments safeguarding the rights of the Canadian government, and it gave the New York Central Railway authority to lease their bridge to a toll bridge company to be used for vehicular traffic. Concurrent legislation was passed in the United States, giving authority at that end. The bridge was planked, the approaches were built and an excellent paved road was constructed on Cornwall island in 1933. Early in 1934 the bridge was opened for traffic—on May 17, 1934, to be exact. The official opening took place on June 30, 1934, when the bridge was opened by His Excellency the Governor General and the Hon. Mr. Dern, United States Secretary of War, representing the President. Others present were: Her Excellency the Countess of Bessborough, Bishop Couturier of Alexandria, Bishop Roper of Ottawa, Hon. J. A. Macdonald, representing the Prime Minister of Canada. There were also present the mayors of several American and Canadian cities and towns and many other distinguished visitors.

I have had placed on the desks of all hon. members copies of a folder showing the bridge. Now let me point out that this is an actual bridge, something in existence; it is not merely the figment of someone's imagination, the imagination of some promoter who wants to sell stock to the unsuspecting Canadian public. It is a bridge which is and has been for over a year in actual operation, and there were conveyed across it last year thousands of cars, all safely and expeditiously. The bridge is in two sections, one across the northern channel of the St. Lawrence. Then there is a very fine paved road across Cornwall island, the bridge then crossing the south channel, there being a section across the Raquette river on the American side. Every possible safety device has been installed—gates, automatic signals and guards and a telephone, so that every precaution is taken for the safety of the travelling public. These safety devices were all approved by the board of railway commissioners.

The proponents of this Cornwall Bridge Company, which is so far only a paper bridge, have used the argument that the existing bridge, which has been planked, is not wide enough for two-way traffic. That is an entire misstatement, because I myself have crossed it several times and I know that there is absolutely no difficulty for two automobiles to pass each other on the bridge. They also state that owing to the fact that it is an international bridge an accumulation of traffic piles up on the bridge while cars are passing through the customs. That also is a misstatement, because both the Canadian and the United States customs offices are built on Cornwall island, where there is plenty of room; there is adequate parking space and a sufficient number of officials to handle the traffic expeditiously.

Many hon. members of this house have crossed the bridge since it was opened last year, among them being a very distinguished member of the House of Commons in the person of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) who crossed it this spring and who, I am sure, can give evidence as to its thorough efficiency and safety. In the first year of operation, from May 17, 1934, to May 16, 1935, 60,000 vehicles, mostly passenger automobiles, crossed the bridge. This bridge is adjacent to one of the most beautiful sections of the St. Lawrence river. One of the important points in all our efforts to attract tourist traffic to Canada is in my opinion the impression which the tourist gets when he first enters this country.

I trust many hon. members have read an editorial which was published a couple of weeks ago in the Ottawa Journal and which advised the citizens of Ottawa that if they wanted to take a drive of great scenic beauty, they should go south along the Morrisburg highway to the St. Lawrence and then down to Cornwall. On the drive along number two highway are some of the most beautiful spots on the whole St. Lawrence river. You pass historic sites like the old battlefield of Crysler's Farm and the Long Sault rapids, perhaps the most spectacularly beautiful spot we have on that river. Then you pass wooded islands and see away to the south the farm homes and villages of our great sister nation. Those coming into Canada over the Cornwall bridge—and when I speak of the Cornwall bridge, I am referring to the bridge which is now in operation and across which thousands of tourists are coming—get a very fine impression of this country. Looking to the west they see a very prosperous section of the county of Stormont, and looking to the east there is spread out before them in a panorama the fine industrial town of Cornwall. They can see directly in their line of vision two or three of the largest industries in that town.

Therefore my first argument is that it would be a most ridiculous idea to build another bridge seven miles away from the present one. It would be designed entirely to attract traffic from the same section of the United States. There are of course along the St. Lawrence other places where it would be reasonable that a bridge might be built, say fifty or seventy-five miles away from the one at present in operation. In addition to that, the Cornwall bridge is a commercially feasible proposition because it was already there; it has been there for nearly forty years, being used as a railway bridge, so that it necessitated a capital expenditure of only $350,000 to plank the bridge, to build the approaches, to construct the roadway on the island, and to fit the bridge up so as to accommodate vehicular traffic. The bridge proposed in the bill now before the house, it is suggested, will require an investment of $3,250,000. We know no undertaking of this kind has ever been put into effect without the actual cost running far beyond the estimate. We will say that there is an increase of approximately 25 per cent when the bridge comes to be built, making a total cost of about $4,000,000, which would be a very moderate increase over the estimate of the company's engineers. I believe all hon. members will agree that it would be impossible in connection with such a highly speculative enterprise to sell bonds that would bring less than five per cent, and to pay five per cent on an investment of $4,000,000 would require an annual revenue of $200,000 without allowing one cent for cost of operation or any other incidental costs.

If we use the same toll rates as those in effect on the bridge which is at present in operation, the average return from an automobile crossing the proposed bridge would be in the neighbourhood of one dollar, because it will be noted that there is a special trip rate for an auto and driver of $1.25 if he makes the return trip within twenty-four hours, or an average rate for the one-way trip of sixty-two and a half cents, which brings the average rate down to the neighbourhood of one dollar. Therefore it would require an annual traffic over this bridge of 200,000 cars to pay the interest charges alone. If you increase the average rate for automobiles to $1.25, this would require 160,000 cars.

I desire to give the house some figures so that it may form an estimate as to the traffic that might be expected on this proposed bridge if it were ever built. I know there will be quoted by the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring the bill, traffic experts who give highly optimistic reports of what might be expected and who will probably give you any type of report you are looking for; but I want to quote actual figures of the cars which crossed the whole international section of the St. Lawrence in 1934. This includes all the traffic over the Cornwall bridge from May 17 to December 31, 1934, the traffic across the ferry at Aultsville, the ferry at Morrisburg, the very important ferry at Prescott which is directly opposite the city of Ogdensburg, the ferry at Brockville, the ferry at Rockport and the ferry at Gananoque. The total traffic in that section was 150,997 cars including return trip cars. Therefore if all these ferries and the Cornwall bridge were closed and if the proposed bridge had all this traffic, it would be $50,000 short of meeting its interest charges alone. I understand the promoters of this bridge themselves estimate the cost of operation at $90,000 per annum, and in addition to that there would be charges for taxes and many other incidental charges. I am sure therefore hon. gentlemen can see that from a financial standpoint this would not be a commercially feasible proposition. I think it is a well known fact that there are not very many toll bridges or tunnels that at the present time are meeting the interest charges on their bonded indebtedness, but the favourable situation of the bridge which is described in the folder, the one which has been in operation for a year, is that a very small capital expenditure was required. The bridge that is there required a capital expenditure of only $350,000 to fit it for vehicular traffic in addition to the rental which is paid to the owners of the bridge.

As I stated before, the bridge proposed in this bill is to be only seven miles east of the present Cornwall bridge. Last year the house passed a bill to give a charter for a bridge at Ivy Lea near Gananoque, and I understand there is also in effect a charter for a bridge at Brockville. At those points there would be a reasonable expectation of a bridge paying because those points are sixty or eighty miles from the present bridge, but it appears to me to be the height of absurdity for any company to expect any reasonable financial return from the building of another bridge within seven miles of one that is now being successfully operated.

The people at Cornwall and in the vicinity are well satisfied with the present bridge; it brings a large number of tourists to our section of the country and it is within a mile of the centre of the town, but the bridge proposed under this bill would divert traffic from Cornwall; it is located five miles east, and all the tourists coming into Canada on their way to Montreal and on the way back from Montreal to the United States would never see the town of Cornwall at all.

I am sure the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring the bill will tell the house that one of the greatest features in favour of the proposed bridge is the fact that it is constructed entirely in Canadian territory, but before he finishes, if he attempts to show how successful the bridge will be, he will quote not figures of local traffic flowing back and forth, but figures of traffic from the United States, showing that the bridge is designed entirely for tourist traffic. Therefore, what particular advantage is there in having it located entirely in Canada? Furthermore, there would be no particular advantage for those tourists who would enter at Hogansburg and other points along the border of Huntingdon county to cross the bridge and go down the north shore of the St. Lawrence. The great majority of them would use the very excellent roads in Quebec which are on the south shore of the St. Lawrence and would cross to the north shore at Châteauguay or by one of the bridges close to Montreal.

In my opinion there are only two purposes that can be in view in asking this extension of time. I am absolutely satisfied that the promoters have no intention of building a bridge. Is it a commercially feasible proposition? I think it would be very difficult for them to finance it. But there are two possible objects they might have in mind: first, to sell stock or bonds in what is, to say the least, a highly speculative enterprise, or, second, to use the charter for its nuisance value against the company operating the present bridge. I think it is a duty of this house so far as possible to protect the investing public. That was one point upon which the price spreads commission laid particular emphasis. I listened with careful attention to the excellent speech made the other day by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) and also the very able speech of the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), and I noticed that while they differed perhaps on some fundamental points, they were of one mind, as are other hon. members, that the Companies Act should protect the investing public as far as possible. And when any private bill is introduced I think it is just as much the duty of the house to see that the investing public is protected. When we think of the widows left with perhaps only a little life insurance to last them to the end of their days, or with which to raise a family, or old people who by a life of toil have saved a little money, we should not give to a corporation like this the opportunity to send out high pressure bond salesmen through the country in remote parts of Canada where people would have no idea of the traffic that may be expected over the river at this point, and who would paint a glittering picture of the returns to be expected. It is the duty of this house to vote against a measure of this kind that would make that sort of thing possible. I owe a duty to my constituents and I believe they are very adequately served by the bridge at present in operation, which gives excellent service and with which they are satisfied.

Therefore, to place on record my opposition to this bill I move in amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McGillis), in whose constituency the Ontario end of this proposed bridge would be situated:

That the word "now" be left out, and the words "this day six months" be added at the end of the question.

Mr. ANGUS McGILLIS (Glengarry): In seconding the resolution to give this bill the six months' hoist, I desire to make some observations.

The people of my constituency were promised in 1930, when the Cornwall Bridge Company were granted a charter, that construction would begin immediately, thereby giving employment to a large number of people. Five years have elapsed and no effort has been made by the promoters to carry out either the promises made in 1930 or the terms of their original charter. In the meantime a very satisfactory roadway for vehicular traffic has been opened over the New York Central Railway bridge at Cornwall, which has all the necessary accommodation for the travelling public, in my opinion sufficient to carry all the traffic there will be at that point for many years to come. This proposed bridge has been stressed by the promoters as an "all-Canadian bridge," but I fail to see the significance of this argument, as the promoters themselves stress its value from the standpoint of tourist traffic, which is international. During the last five years the Caughnawaga bridge has been opened, linking up a great avenue of traffic between Montreal and the south shore of the St. Lawrence. The Peace bridge at Fort Erie and the Ambassador bridge at Windsor are both international and link up large centres of population.

In conclusion, I may say that in my opinion the bridge proposed in this bill would never be a paying proposition and I have absolutely no faith in the idea that it will ever be constructed, even if given this extension of time.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): This company was incorporated by this parliament in 1930. In days past it was very popular to grant these franchises for international and interprovincial bridges. But that day is past. When the bills for the Detroit river tunnels and bridges were before this parliament I strongly opposed them in the standing committee on railways and canals. Franchises were handed out to railways and corporations all over Canada for works some of which could not by the widest stretch of imagination be said to be for the general advantage of Canada, and this bill is of that type. The bill for the Detroit river tunnel was supported by the Canadian National Railways, and as a result of the hand out policy of that time when this parliament had what they call "big eyes," we have the railway bungle in which the country now finds itself as a result of all these franchises granted so readily, and three transcontinental railways.

Following those errors a royal commission was appointed in 1917, to investigate the whole railway and bridge problem, consisting of A. H. Smith, then general manager of the New York Central Railway, W. M. Acworth, an eminent English engineer, and Sir Henry Drayton, then chairman of the board of railway commissioners. In their report they referred to bills of this description and recommended that before any franchise be given or extended to cross interprovincial or boundary streams the proposed bridges should first be reported upon as to their utility, method of construction, and rates and tolls to be charged by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. In another section they said that before any extension of such charters should be granted the proposal should be reported upon by the board of railway commissioners.

Are we going to treat that report as a scrap of paper? In 1930 when this particular bill was before the house they showed a large map. Here is a map they have now, and they use the name of Mr. Roosevelt, President of the United States, which they probably think will be of some value to them. No doubt the boards of trade of Montreal and Toronto have been circularized. Ten years ago there was a much more elaborate map of this bridge hung on the walls of the railway committee. At that time they were handing out franchises for bridges all over; there was scarcely anyone who did not know how to play "bridge." I do not know how to play it; I have seen it played in the opposition and government lobby and in this lobby, but I do not know anything about that kind of game. I am glad I do not, because you can lose money in other ways than in a bridge game. This company seem to think they have lost a lot of money; they are pleading the financial situation as a reason for holding this paper franchise over until 1937. The Lord created the wonderful natural resources of the St. Lawrence river, and for all His creatures, not for private greed and gain. Yet the powers on that river were given away to every Tom, Dick and Harry who asked for them. The Lord intended all the blessings of the river, light, power and transportation, for all His creatures and not for private individuals who have exploited that river ever since the days of The Company of One Hundred Associates.

This Cornwall company should be denied this privilege. This act was passed in the spring of 1930, under the late government, and the bridge was to be built within three years, or by 1933. Now it is 1935; they have spent little or no money and they propose to take until 1937 to commence work on the bridge. If the matter comes to a vote I will vote against any extension of this charter. This bill was initiated over in the senate. I am glad the senate have started initiating something this session, but bridge bills like this and divorce bills are about all this wonderful senate have initiated. To-day the senate is nothing but an anachronism. If this is the best and only legislation they can send over here in days like this all I can say is that the senate will be a bridge of sighs, back in the constituencies of this country. The other day I attended one of the senate committees, and I must say that I was surprised at the way they do business over there. They need a Gilbert and Sullivan to describe the way they amend our bills and bills like this and other bills that I saw being considered the other day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman should not refer to what has taken place in another chamber.

Mr. CHURCH: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I am not reflecting. No one can reflect on the senate; reflections are a bit late. This bill should not pass this parliament. If you look at the map accompanying the bill on everyone's desk here, you see a red ring drawn around the St. Lawrence river; they have thrown out the lasso and lassoed as far as Cornwall. The ring has not extended as far as Ottawa yet. We have heard of other rings in connection with Montreal, but this red ring in connection with this bridge map has missed both Ottawa and Montreal. Look at what has been done by the senate of the United States to keep bills like this out of that chamber; look at the social legislation that has been initiated by the senate of the United States and here in Canada. I am surprised to find bills like this sent over here from the other chamber. We should go over the books and eliminate every paper franchise that still exists in connection with railways, canals and bridges all through the country. No wonder we have a railway bungle on our hands. Who will say that, in view of the unrest and the difficulties in connection with transportation that we have at present, we should seek to create or preserve or extend these paper franchises in connection with the St. Lawrence river, which has been the home of private ownership and greed since the day of The Company of One Hundred Associates?

Mr. J. S. STEWART (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, owing to circumstances over which I have no control, and denying any and all responsibility, I am the foster father of this bill. As was stated by the previous speaker, this measure originated in the Senate and, I fancy, after due consideration and investigation it was passed by that honourable body and sent to this house for consideration. The proponents of the measure are most anxious that this bill should be sent to one of the standing committees of the house in order that explanations may be given as to what work has been done and what investigations have been carried out, and also as to the cost of the bridge and the revenues which may be derived from it. I am further informed that not only will it cost some millions of dollars but that it will give work to a thousand Canadians for more than 360 days. If any construction can be undertaken at this time that will give that amount of work to that number of Canadians it seems to me nothing should be put in the way of the construction of the bridge. Therefore I would respectfully ask the house to give the bill second reading and allow it to go to one of the standing committees for further investigation.

Amendment (Mr. Shaver) agreed to on division.

Motion as amended agreed to.

DOMINION HOUSING COMMISSION

PROPOSED LEGISLATION PROVIDING FOR ASSISTANCE IN THE CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES, SALARIES OF COMMISSIONERS AND STAFF AND ADVANCES

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (for the Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to establish a dominion housing commission and to assist in the construction of houses, and to provide for the salaries of the commissioners and staff, and for the payment of expenditures, and for advances for the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Mr. WILFRED HANBURY (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, there are certain observations I should like to make on the resolution. It was my privilege to serve on the special committee on housing, and therefore to be given the opportunity to gather information for the consideration of this problem. I believe I could sum up my thoughts most satisfactorily by referring to the evidence given before the special committee on housing on April 4, 1935, by Doctor W. C. Clark, Deputy Minister of the Department of Finance. I shall refer particularly to his evidence as it appears at page 357, at which point he summarizes the findings he placed before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: You do him a great honour.

Mr. HANBURY: His summary is as follows:

(1) It would not accept hasty commitments in regard to the most difficult and complicated phases of the housing problem on which other countries have been working (without too much success) for a generation or more. Nevertheless, it would provide machinery for taking the first steps towards a rational and permanent solution of the whole problem.

(2) It would make possible a substantial volume of construction which would provide a stimulant to business recovery and absorb a considerable number of the unemployed.

(3) It would make possible a large volume of construction without pressing with undue heaviness upon an already over-burdened public exchequer. For instance, a $10,000,000 appropriation by the dominion government would make possible a $50,000,000 construction program.

(4) It would provide federal funds in the junior mortgage position where private funds are not obtainable at all, or if obtainable, only at prohibitive costs.

(5) It would make use of private lending agencies instead of driving them out of business, but it would provide for a financial set-up which by the pooling of individual mortgages and the maintenance of proper margins, would make possible the securing of all the funds required on a reasonable cost basis. In other words, the individual mortgage would be liquefied and made a readily marketable credit instrument.

(6) It would provide for control in such a way as to assure the carrying out of the program on a sound and business-like basis.

I wish particularly to emphasize article No. 4 of Doctor Clark's summary:

It would provide federal funds in the junior mortgage position where private funds are not obtainable at all, or if obtainable, only at prohibitive costs.

I should like to read further from the evidence given by Doctor Clark:

It is possible that instead of the federal government coming in there on a central housing board to buy the preferred stock of these local housing corporations, you might provide for the setting up of an insurance corporation to guarantee the last twenty per cent of an eighty per cent mortgage.

And further down on the page:

... and then provide this national insurance corporation which would guarantee that last twenty per cent, then you would have a scheme which would, in effect, give you the same results as the plan I originally outlined, but possibly a little simpler.

It is through the medium of the federal government placing itself in the junior position of mortgage holders that I suggest we may best lend a stimulus in the matter of encouraging the construction of houses for immediate relief of the unemployment situation.

We had many proposals placed before us, but I believe the function of any government, as outlined in Doctor Clark's evidence, is in the first place to avoid the socialization suggested by many of the witnesses. We had suggestions to the effect that the government should go into the house construction business, and furnish all the funds therefor. We had the suggestion that the funds should be furnished at practically no cost to the people. I believe there is money in Canada which could go to provide all the housing required. In my view one of the reasons the money is not available at the present time is to be found in the legislation passed by many of the provinces. If the moratoria in the various provinces were lifted there would immediately become available money for loan purposes in connection with the construction of houses. I cannot see wherein this parliament should lend itself to placing money in the various provinces through this or any other scheme when we have no protection from the provincial moratoria now existing or to be placed in the future.

The report of the committee has recommended the establishment of a housing authority. We considered the use of the expression "housing commission," but it was the opinion held by a majority of the members of the committee that it was not a commission we wanted, but rather an authority. Interpreting the recommendations made before the committee by Doctor Clark I can see no necessity for setting in motion the ponderous machinery of another commission. If we wished to establish an insurance corporation to underwrite the junior securities of these mortgage companies I believe the Department of Finance could function in that particular, and it would not be necessary to have a commission for that purpose.

[Mr. Hanbury.]

It is true that if we are going to give consideration to slum clearance and to other problems we must have some body or authority to make a thorough investigation, because the question of slum clearance is quite involved. It will require considerable investigation and much in the way of legislation on the part of municipalities, provinces and federal authorities. So I say we shall have to have some body to investigate slum clearances. But to my mind there is no necessity for a commission; an authority under some department of government could undertake that work. If we are to accept the recommendation of Doctor Clark, or give it the consideration to which it is entitled, there is no necessity for a commission. The Department of Finance or some other department could place these insurance funds as well as any other body.

I turn again to Doctor Clark's evidence, and in particular his reference to slum clearance. At page 354 I find the following:

It would be wise to avoid any hasty commitments in regard to the most difficult and the most complicated aspects of housing; for instance, the problem of slum clearance, that problem seems to me is going to take a great deal of cooperation between provincial and municipal authorities, and dominion authorities probably. It is going to involve a good deal of legal and other considerations. It is going to involve a lot of cost. I do not think it is a problem that we ought to jump into hastily. If we did I think we would quickly be saddled with a very heavy loss, so far as that long-run problem is concerned. I would suggest that you recommend further investigation, however, by some central housing body to be set up, or by some appropriate body. I would like to have a start made on the solution of that problem, but I would not jump too far into it over night.

I read that statement to support my suggestion that if we are going to accept Doctor Clark's recommendations there is no necessity at the present time to establish another commission. If we did establish a commission, by the time they had their machinery in operation months would have passed. On the suggestion which Doctor Clark has made and which I support, I can see no reason why, through the use of existing channels such as mortgage and loan companies, the money could not be put into circulation for this purpose at an early date. I do not see why we should not consider using the established institutions. They have over a period of years developed a personnel to the point where they understand the lending business thoroughly. I think it is fair to assume that it is not our purpose here to give our money away. Rather we propose to lend money for legitimate purposes, and, Mr. Speaker, I want to accent the word "lend." We do not propose to give money away. We are going to lend money, and if we are going to lend money it must be lent on an economic and sound basis. I repeat that the existing loan and insurance companies have their personnel who have been well trained in the lending business over a period of years.

The existing loan and insurance companies have large sums of money available. If we can assist them and assist ourselves at the same time by having these provincial moratoria raised, the loan and insurance companies would have money available to lend up to fifty or sixty per cent of the total value. I think it is reasonable to assume that no member of this chamber or anyone else who is active in the interests of the people would suggest that any money should be put out to any individual or company which did not have in the first place a reasonable amount of its own to add to the amount they were borrowing. I suggest that a minimum of twenty per cent should be required of any individual or company before any amount was lent to them for construction purposes under this housing scheme. With that money available on the part of the borrower, if the existing loan and mortgage companies would add to that fifty or sixty per cent of the total amount required, then if through this insurance company which has been suggested the balance of the money, probably fifteen or twenty or even twenty-five per cent was made available, I think on that basis we would have a sound and businesslike proposition. If we require people to put up their own money I think we will have a sound, businesslike proposition. If we leave the insurance and loan companies, with the experience they have had in these matters, in charge of this affair, we need have no fear that our money will not be properly spent, and we need have little fear of politics entering in or of bureaucracy which undoubtedly will creep in if we have a commission.

There was one other point which was made before the members of the committee. We were told of the necessity of providing homes for the underpaid workers which they might rent on a basis that was not economically sound, on a basis that would not give a fair return to the investor. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, to look at that problem in a different light. I think our duty here, instead of relegating these people for all time to the position of underpaid workers, instead of expecting to have underpaid workers in Canada for all time, is to see that our workers are properly paid so that they can provide their own homes, and for that reason I think we must take into consideration the general conditions in Canada. Under present conditions even the higher paid worker is not able to provide his own home. So the question of housing is not simply a question of providing money. It is a question of general conditions, and as general conditions improve and when they do improve, as I am sure every person believes they will, housing is not going to be the serious matter it is to-day. I should be very sorry to see the government go into a general policy of socialism based on the general conditions to-day. The fact there is a large number of people in Canada who cannot provide proper housing for themselves does not in my opinion justify a policy for all time to meet these special conditions of to-day.

I come back to my point that an authority under one of the departments of government could meet this situation and could probably make the funds available much more quickly than if we attempted to establish another commission at this time. I am going to suggest to the government that they give very serious consideration to letting the Department of Finance or some other department of government try it out—not necessarily the Department of Finance, but some department. It will be only a matter of a few months before parliament will be meeting again and if in the meantime the department has not been able to meet the situation as they should have done, it will be an easy enough matter to establish a commission. At present I think we have too many commissions and I believe the general public are coming to be of the same opinion.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak at the moment but I should like to say that in committee I shall be glad to explain the points that have been raised by the hon. gentleman. I am glad to see that he is ready to support the bill as it is drafted.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Sir George Perley) I think it would have been better if the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) had raised his questions in committee, but in view of the fact that he has raised them in the manner he did I should like to say a word or two in reply.

First of all it is extremely difficult for me to follow his argument, if it was an argument at all. It was totally against the report of which he himself as a member of the committee approved.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HEAPS: That is my opinion. I was a member of that committee and I think it is most unfair for any member to extract from the report the evidence of one particular witness and then try to make it appear to the house that that evidence was the consensus of all the witnesses who appeared before that committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He did not say so.

Mr. HEAPS: I know he did not say so, and that is why I say his remarks would have come better in committee of the whole instead of on the floor of the house, and that is why I rose to reply; for if anything could be taken out of the evidence submitted to that committee it was the need for a certain type of housing in the Dominion of Canada.

Whilst the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard claimed that he was very anxious to protect the public treasury, let me say that if he had his way there could be no surer way of defeating that object. He wanted the government to be responsible for junior or second mortgages on the homes which might be built. If he knows anything about mortgages in these days he knows that second mortgages have very little value in this year 1935. But the hon. gentleman was quite prepared to suggest that private lending corporations and special interests should take the first mortgages and that the government should assume the second mortgages. If that is the way he intends to protect the public treasury of this dominion, then I feel very sorry indeed for the public treasury.

Secondly, may I point out that it was shown by every witness who appeared before the committee how great was the need of cheap money to build houses. There is no private corporation to-day which can build houses at the rate which was suggested by practically every witness who appeared before the committee. The rate suggested was three or four per cent at the outside.

Mr. ST-PERE: What will you do with the labouring men who at present own houses and cannot keep up their payments?

Mr. HEAPS: If they cannot keep them up to-day they cannot keep them up under any circumstances. There is great need to-day for houses of a type that the private corporations will not construct, and if we are to give a stimulus to industry as was suggested, the only way to do it is by providing funds out of the public treasury—yes, out of the public treasury—at a low rate of interest, and by giving to the government a first mortgage on these homes or guarantees by provincial and municipal governments.

If there is one class of artisan in this country who needs assistance it is that which consists of those engaged in the building trades. The artisans in the building trades have been mostly out of work for many years, and there is very little hope for the immediate future. The construction of houses or a housing program is part of the platform, may I hope, of the Liberal party. I do not think a question of this kind is really a party question at all. I think the only way is for the government to step in at this time when private interests have failed so lamentably during the past few years, and see that something is done to provide for the thousands of houses that are needed, and to provide work for the men who need work so much at the present time.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said that we should allow the mortgage companies and other financial institutions to lend money to those who require homes. There is nothing to prevent them from lending their money now, but the fact is that they are not lending at the present time. If they have plenty of money it is locked up somewhere in the coffers and is not available to the people who require homes. One of the main difficulties is the belief that at the present rate of interest which is required, the security is not very good. It would be at a lower rate of interest, three or four per cent. No private corporation to-day can lend money at three or four per cent, but possibly the federal government can.

There is another factor which the hon. gentleman entirely omitted, and that is the fact that many of the witnesses who appeared before the committee suggested that the government might even subsidize the building of houses exactly in the same way as the building of houses is subsidized in many parts of the world. For instance, he might have said that in Great Britain they have been building houses by the thousand, and no one has been hurt; in fact, it has been a stimulus to the whole industry of the country. It is estimated that in this country we require approximately 35,000 houses per year for the next few years on account of the lack of house building which has manifested itself in the past few years. If that is so then there is in this country need for some sort of housing committee or commission or whatever you choose to call it, and that body should proceed as quickly as possible with the work of providing these houses. Their first object should be the provision of houses, and in the second place it would be the means of creating work for artisans who require it at the present time.

I do not want to discuss the question just now because in committee we shall be able to go into it at greater length; but it is unfortunate that the name of an official of the government should be brought into the discussion. He is not an authority on housing; he may know something about finance, but so far as housing is concerned he knows little.

Mr. ST-PERE: Most of those witnesses there never knew anything about real estate.

Mr. HEAPS: If the hon. gentleman wishes to make a speech he can do so in his own good time. I will say this, that the witnesses who appeared there all had probably a lifetime of experience in the housing problem either in this country or in other parts of the world. In practically every country of the world, apart from Canada, governments have entered into large and comprehensive schemes of housing. We are probably the last nation in the world to tackle the problem and I should like to see the government proceed with this question and go into committee this evening, and by the time we get through I hope that something will have been done to relieve the housing situation in Canada, and in the second place to provide work for the thousands of mechanics who have had no employment for a number of years past.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I am inclined to think that the suggestion made by the right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) is a good one, namely, that it might be well to see the bill before we further discuss the resolution. Much will depend on the provisions of the bill as to the extent to which it may be possible for all parties to unite on the measure. What strikes me at the outset is this. The proposed resolution is one which deals with one phase of the greatest of all problems, that of providing employment. I think I am right in assuming that providing employment is one of the specific aims of the bill. Not only is it intended to assist in providing necessary housing where something should be done to effect that end, but it is hoped it will help to provide employment in a manner that, so to speak, would serve two ends—that of furnishing employment to some of those in need of work and also that of furnishing accommodation for some of those in need of proper housing. What is most essential with respect to remedying unemployment and providing employment—and I have said so from the beginning of this parliament—is that there should be, not a number of different commissions dealing with different schemes but one national commission charged with the supervision of all state effort towards the relief of unemployment. What should be done is to establish a body which will seek to coordinate and correlate the efforts of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion. Otherwise we shall have different public bodies spending public moneys in a manner that will lead to extravagance, waste and overlapping. If this resolution contemplates the establishment of a federal commission to go off on its own and undertake the building of houses on behalf of the federal government, I for one should be inclined to view it with a good deal of suspicion. If, on the other hand, the bill proposes to establish some body that will see to it that any federal moneys expended to provide employment may be expended in part in the construction of dwellings, where slum clearances are needed and proper accommodation for working people should be provided, and that this is done in accordance with a scheme which will correlate the efforts of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion, then the measure may be all to the good.

Mr. HEAPS: There is something of that kind in the report.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the bill in that respect carries out the recommendation of the report, it will serve to bring about a certain degree of unanimity in the house with respect to what it proposes. But if it is to establish another commission to enable the present administration to appoint some more officials to spend public money out of the federal treasury, without any relation to what is done by the municipalities or the provinces, then we should oppose it very strongly. However, I for one am prepared to await the introduction of the bill. I attach much importance to one word in the resolution, namely, that it is to "assist" in the construction of houses. Evidently the resolution does not contemplate the federal government going into this business as some new venture at the present time.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps I ought to have made some explanation of the resolution when I was moving it, but I thought that in the usual way we might go into committee at once and I could answer questions and make such explanations as might be necessary. As a matter of fact, although this resolution provides for the establishment of a dominion housing commission, with the consent of the house we propose not to carry out that part of it, that is to say, the intention at present is that we will proceed with this housing scheme through the Department of Finance, and we shall have an official in that department specially charged with that duty. We wish to move slowly in this matter, which is a very important one, and I am glad to know that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury), on this occasion at any rate, might well come and sit on this side of the house.

Mr. HANBURY: Next year.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This question of housing is of great social significance and national importance; I think we are all agreed on that. On that point I am at one with the three hon. gentlemen who have spoken. And here may I compliment the committee that considered this very serious problem. I have read over their report and I see that they gave a great deal of attention and consideration to all the different points. Indeed, it was a very happy circumstance, so far as I am concerned, that they were unanimous, that they passed a unanimous report, which is always a pleasant thing in the House of Commons. I hope it will be found so here.

In considering how far we should go in this matter at the present time, I want to read this paragraph from the report of the committee:

> Good housing means less expenditure on prevention of disease, less crime, greater benefits for education, less unemployability as opposed to unemployment. The elimination of bad conditions has a cash value as well as a moral value to the nation. Further, there are wider economic aspects to consider. Bold and constructive housing projects will increase employment both directly and indirectly through the activity generated. To mitigate any liabilities on the national finances the cost of unemployment would be directly reduced, tangible and intangible assets will be created, the yield of sales and income taxes will be increased by the profits of those in building and industry, as well as those who benefit from the increased spending power of wage earners employed through the undertaking.

Personally I entirely agree with that view as set forth in the report of the committee, and it is along lines of that kind that this bill which I hope to introduce before long will be based.

The object of this bill is to formulate a plan to assist in providing houses suitable particularly for the low wage earner and to keep down the cost and interest charges within his ability to pay; it is also to provide work for the unemployed. It is evident that construction of this kind would stimulate business and hasten recovery by providing employment for those trades and industries in which unemployment is most acute.

The bill which I propose to introduce recognizes and comprehends two distinct though related points of view in regard to this problem. The first of these is that the dominion may be of assistance in investigating conditions and collecting and disseminating information which may be used as the basis of formulating a constructive policy with regard to housing in Canada. This point of view visualizes the question as a long-run problem and one that will entail a vast amount of research, investigation and preparation, before any action other than purely temporary measures can be taken. It emphasizes the necessity of basing a housing program on a sound foundation of factual information in regard both to conditions in this country and to the experience of other countries. It recognizes the need for cooperation on the part of provincial and municipal authorities, particularly in regard to the institution of adequate zoning regulations designed to assure reasonable stability of property values.

The other point which I wish to stress is the obvious desirability of taking certain immediate steps of a practical nature designed to assist in solving the existing problem of unemployment. This point of view submits that it is not necessary to wait for the formulation of a comprehensive housing problem before any assistance can be given. Not only may the first steps be taken with regard to the housing problem as such, but any assistance given in this direction at the present time will be of value in stimulating business recovery and absorbing existing unemployment. I am one of those who believe a solution of the housing problem will do more good in this country than anything else I know of. There is no question that the conditions under which our people live have more to do than anything else with both their health and their mental capacity. I feel that pretty strongly.

In order to explain a little more fully what is in the bill, which is a very short one and which I am sure will be quite satisfactory to my right hon. friend, I note on page 378 of the report of the committee, paragraph 6, which reads:

> The magnitude of the task involved in any program designed to eliminate in its entirety the housing problem in Canada is fully realized and appreciated; that such a program would involve intensive, continuous application and effort over a period of years is manifest; but that the initiation of such is imperative is obvious from even the necessarily limited inquiry into prevailing housing conditions in which it has been your committee's privilege to engage.

The purpose of the bill is twofold. In the first place it is proposed that this inquiry which has been carried on by the special committee should be continued under the authority of the economic council which was set up by law during the present session. That is to say, they are to go into the matter more fully. The bill does not provide for any slum clearance, but it provides that inquiry shall be made also into that problem as well as into all other matters cognate to the question of housing. I trust the committee will drop any idea of a commission. We simply provide that a sum of money shall be made available under the control of the Minister of Finance to assist in these building operations.

Mr. GRAY: Is any sum mentioned?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is a sum mentioned. I may say for the information of the committee that the sum we propose to put at the disposal of the Minister of Finance for this purpose is $10,000,000, and the idea we have in mind is that twenty per cent of the construction costs will be provided by the government out of this fund, so that we hope the result will be a program of construction which will amount to $50,000,000 in order to start this very necessary program of housing particularly of the class required by the low paid man.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not quite get the last part of the hon. gentleman's speech; it was rather difficult to hear. Do I understand that according to the bill it is the intention of the government to provide merely twenty per cent towards the cost of construction?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The proposal is that we should provide twenty per cent towards the cost of construction. Perhaps I had better leave this point until we get into the bill because I do not want to enter at the moment into a discussion of it; I shall be glad, however, to do so at the proper time.

Mr. POULIOT: This is to give fictitious prosperity over a very short period to a few of the unemployed in the building trades. We have already had some experience in connection with public works done under a tripartite scheme, federal, provincial and municipal. It proved to be such a failure that a year afterward the government returned to direct relief. For instance, when first a sum of $20,000,000 was voted by the house for the relief of unemployment when there was practically none, one expected that sum of money would be spent on a construction program. Only a fraction of it, however, was spent for that purpose during that fiscal year. A large portion of it was spent for direct relief. It was just a preliminary at a time when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was not seriously considering the problem of unemployment except in his mind and on his lips when he was speaking to the country. He did not fully realize how disastrous his policies had been until after the return of the late Senator Robertson, then Minister of Labour, from his trip to the west. Then they decided to do something. In that year they spent $42,000,000, largely on a construction program. But what was the benefit of that to the labouring man and those in the building trades? Each one worked not more than twenty days and a fraction on the average. It was a failure, so much so that the next year the government came back with a direct relief policy, which has been maintained since, in spite of the fact that there still ring in my ears the words uttered by the Prime Minister during the special session of 1930, "Those men do not want charity, they want work." Following the failure of his work policy he turned to direct relief, and after the failure of the direct relief policy he now comes back to the works policy, forgetting for the time, in view of the coming elections, that it has been a complete failure under his own government.

This is a true picture of what has happened in this country under the administration of this government. But there is more to it. The right hon. gentleman has forgotten the most important factor in the construction business. He has forgotten that the spending power of the individual means more to the construction industry than all that any government can do, and he has started by destroying public confidence in the country since he was elected leader of his party at the Winnipeg convention in 1927. He said that things were going wrong, that the country was not on a sound financial basis, and talked about speculation and all that. We know the inside story about speculation on the fall, and some day I shall tell it to the house. But when times were good he said times were bad, and now that times are so bad he boasts they are good, but nobody believes him, and rightly so. He has underestimated the importance of the spending power of the common individual, of all those thrifty people who have money laid aside to build when times are prosperous. Some have a thousand dollars in the bank for that purpose, others have two thousand dollars, others have five thousand, but how can they spend that money when they are so uncertain about the future of this country, about their own future, and when confidence has been replaced in every home by anxiety for the morrow? Now the Prime Minister is trying to rejuvenate this country by this building policy. He is the architect, the nomad architect, who plans all sorts of things, all sorts of palliatives to make people forget that they have not the means of life, that they have not all a palatial suite in the Chateau Laurier. He says "Let us destroy slums." Another mistake he made which did not affect him was that tripartite plan of 1930, imposing the burden on the provinces and the municipalities. He forgot—naturally he was not interested in the matter—that the obligations imposed on the municipalities had to be met by the taxpayers, the owners of immovable property in the municipality. He said: "Things are bad; I will save this country; I will end unemployment." When he said that, people were under the impression that he alone was to do it. But then he imposed this heavy burden upon the provinces; he imposed a heavy burden on the municipalities. That burden on the municipalities was not merely on the shoulders of the community; it had to be met by private property owners in these municipalities, and these were unable to pay their taxes. And now, sir, what do we see? In 1931, when he came with his building program, the municipalities were already unable to meet the liabilities imposed upon them by the legislation of 1930. His great error of judgment was when he said that an expenditure of $20,000,000 by this government would result in an outlay of $75,000,000. He meant that the expenditure by the provinces and the municipalities would be more than the amount paid by the federal government, which was absurd. He said that by this government contributing $20,000,000 the provinces and municipalities would spend $55,000,000. Imagine that, sir. There should have been a great outburst of laughter when such an incredible thing was said by a so-called sensible man. In 1931 the provinces were unable to meet their obligations, and in order to enable them to pursue that silly building scheme the government had to lend money to the provinces with which to meet their own obligations. Loans were made to several provinces, why?

The CHAIRMAN: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that we are considering a housing resolution?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir, and I speak of building and construction.

The CHAIRMAN: Of houses, please.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir, and what I say is perfectly relevant because I show that the previous construction policy of the government has been entirely wrong, and I show the mistakes that have been made in the past. The Prime Minister has said that this is no time to look at the past. I hope, sir, that in your fairness you will allow me to continue to speak of the past in order that the future may not be a failure as the past has been. And I will tell you more than that, sir, that the municipalities themselves were so burdened by that policy that some of them had to pay ten, twenty, thirty, fifty per cent—

The CHAIRMAN: The municipalities have nothing whatever to do with this. Will the hon. member please discuss the resolution?

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you, sir; I am through with that point.

Now let us look at another most important point, the destruction of public confidence. The government now has a housing policy. There are few people in this country who do not live under a roof. What do they want? They want to be able to earn their livelihood; they want to be able to dress themselves decently and properly; they want to have enough fuel to heat their homes in the winter time, and they want to eat three meals a day. That is what they want. A housing scheme is an important thing, but the most important thing to do, sir, is to give work to the unemployed. The members of the government say this will relieve unemployment; I just heard the right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) make that statement. Probably that is so, but how many days on the average will they work? My remarks are strictly to the point, because the people who own immovable property in this country have been ruined by the burden of taxation imposed upon them due to the policies of this government, so they cannot build new houses. There are many fathers who had some money laid aside with which they hoped to establish their children in trades and build houses for them. Their children, who had employment in 1930, who left the old homestead for the city and found jobs, who married there and were living well until this government imposed their incredible policies, have lost their jobs now and have had to go back to their fathers in the country, not alone but with their wives and children, and the fathers, who are unable to sell their products, have to look after all those people.

The CHAIRMAN: Please stay with the housing resolution.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, sir. This is why the fathers cannot build houses to shelter their children, who were unable to pay their rent in the cities. They said, "Well, we have no money left. We cannot sell our products. We are sorry you have to live in slums and we are sorry you must come, but we cannot afford to pay high rents for you in the cities." This is strictly relevant to the housing scheme. Take the farmer's son who left the old homestead in times of prosperity, when the Liberal government was in power, and looked for a job as a mechanic. As soon as he was promised a better job by the right hon. leader of the government—I mean the government, which will not last long, thank God—he thought of better times. But, sir, all that fell down; he was set back and then he lost his job and now the father has to look after him and his family. If we build wonderful apartment houses such as they have in Vienna, in Russia, and in Germany, and the men who are supposed to live there cannot find jobs, what is the advantage in building these houses for the workingmen?

I am strongly in favour of the clearance of slums; I am in favour of a good housing scheme, but the best housing scheme we can have is one that will be looked after by the private individual who is interested in receiving full value for the money he spends, and one which gives no chance to grafters who are after contracts in order to put up cardboard houses in the cities and charge the government the prices of stone walls. That has happened before. What will happen under this scheme? We will have flat contracts, and the people will be bled.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is simply whether it is advisable to formulate a housing scheme. The bill is not now being discussed.

Mr. POULIOT: I am discussing the principle of the matter which is contained in this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: The principle of the bill is not even under discussion.

Mr. POULIOT: I was not discussing the bill. How can a labouring man pay rent of $25 a month when he does not work? What has become of the promise of the right hon. gentleman to give work to everyone? He said, "I will give you not charity but work." Where is it? He says he has fulfilled all his promises. If there are slums in the cities it is because men who had work in 1930 are unemployed now, and they cannot look after the repairs to the houses in which they live. This is the principal reason for the slums in the cities; this is why the houses are not painted as they should be, and are not looked after. This is why there are broken windows and so on.

Sir, it is a very sad thing. How will this money be paid? The right hon. member for Argenteuil mentioned—perhaps it was a slip—the sum of $10,000,000. What are we to spend that for? That $10,000,000 will be spent to feed parasites on that commission. Why have the government decided on a policy of housing before knowing the number of unemployed in each building trade in the Canadian cities and municipalities from coast to coast? The information has been given by a private member, but may I ask the right hon. member for Argenteuil how many plumbers, how many carpenters, how many bricklayers, how many joiners and how many painters in the city of Halifax will find work under this scheme? How many will be looked after? Then we come to that proud city in New Brunswick, the native province of the right hon. Prime Minister; I refer to the city of Saint John, and I would ask the same information in connection with that city. I would ask the same information in connection with every city in the nine provinces of Canada. The government did not know, until they were told by a private member, the occupations of the unemployed of this country, but surely now they must be in a position to tell this committee how many men they will look after in the building trades? Can they answer? No, sir, they cannot. Why? Because theirs is a half baked policy; that is all there is to it. It is a policy of mirage—m-i-r-a-g-e—and fake. Then they will say to the people, "Look at the skyscrapers we have built." To shelter all the unemployed who have lost their jobs since 1930 we would have to have a skyscraper as high as Jacob's ladder. What a skyscraper would be needed to shelter all the unemployed who have lost their jobs because of the policy of this government! Do hon. members think for one moment that I will take the trouble to read and to discuss the bill arising from this resolution, and to say here must be a comma and here must be a period and here must be a semicolon? I do not believe in this policy, and I make that statement once and for all. I am against all those policies, because I have had an opportunity to study much of the legislation that has been passed. It is half baked, it is useless; the country is going to the dogs and it is time to stop it.

Hon. members on this side have made this suggestion to the government: Why not publish the telephone directories of every city in Canada in the statute books, so that we may have huge books at the end of the year? The government do not want peace, order and good government, but they do want ream upon ream of paper in the statute books. With that burden on their backs they will tell the people, "Here we are, with this great legislation that will save you." Surely they will never be bold enough to tell the Canadian people that the legislation passed by this government would save them. That would not be true. "This is not the time to look to the past," states the right hon. gentleman opposite. "Let us look to the future; let us look for spiritual values; let us look for wider hope"—and still the people do not laugh. I cannot understand it. I do not know why the people take it seriously, because the government is not serious. It is election propaganda, that is all there is to it. I am strongly opposed to the policy of this government because up to now every step it has taken has been a complete failure. The past is the best guarantee for the future, and judging by its past the future of this government is rather dark.

I have said enough for the moment, but I shall have something further to say at a later time. I say most earnestly, sir, that I cannot accept policies of this kind until they are based upon facts. The government have ignored the facts purposely in order to leave us in a false paradise. It is superfluous to add that that is a great mistake. Sir, no person is a better friend of the labouring man than the one who now addresses you. He has shown it on many occasions since he has been a member of this chamber, but he refuses categorically to let the labouring man be deceived by any false hopes, and it is for that reason that upon this occasion he voices his strong objection to the resolution.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say only a few words about this resolution. The housing committee of which I was a member was appointed and during its sittings examined witnesses from all parts of Canada, from Vancouver to Halifax, following which it made its report. It is my view that we will not get anywhere if we approach the problem from the standpoint of politics. Housing is not a political question; it is a business and social problem. Owing to the scarcity of houses in the larger cities and towns of Canada we have an emergency situation, and a condition which has both social and economic sides. Carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, lathers and mechanics of all kinds in our larger cities are out of work and on the dole. England has been the pioneer in housing. She has recovered faster than any other country because she has had proper housing facilities and insurance policies. In the British budget presented this year £15,000,000 is voted for housing. Over there they have had different types of housing schemes. In this country whatever is done I hope will be done immediately. At a meeting of the city council in Toronto held a short time ago it was decided to await the action of this parliament.

The resolution proposes the establishment of a dominion housing commission, staff and officers, to be authorized to make agreements on housing with, and to vote funds to municipalities or other bodies along the lines indicated. In 1919, at a time when there was acute unemployment in Canada, this parliament voted $25,000,000 for housing, nearly all of which was paid back. Out of the moneys advanced to municipalities and agencies the government did not lose hardly a dollar. I trust any housing policy which may develop will be free from politics, and that it may have some kick in it, and that houses will be built.

At its meeting held only a short time ago the city council of Toronto proposed to take advantage of the legislation passed by the provincial legislature last session whereby municipalities might lend money to house and property owners to make improvements. Many people who own houses cannot pay their taxes, let alone do any renovating or improving. I hope that whatever is done may be done immediately so that city councils throughout Canada will know how much help they can get.

I have already referred to the provision made in 1919. It is now proposed to establish a housing commission and a housing policy whereby twenty per cent of the cost will be supplied by the government, and the balance by mortgage companies and other builders. I do not know how that would work out in the larger centres of population. I should like to see adopted a resolution such as I presented on January 23 of this year, in which it was proposed to set up a national housing, building and reconstruction policy for Canada, adapted to our circumstances, and get people back to work and off the dole. No person suggests we should go as far as England or the United States in this particular matter, but we should accept a policy adapted to our financial circumstances, one which would take the people in the larger centres off the dole, and give them money in the form of work. Undoubtedly unemployment is the greatest problem with which we are faced.

When the first meeting of the housing committee was held away back last February I pointed out that spring was coming on and nothing had been done. We are now in the early summer, and I hope that whatever is done may be done at once. I should like to see a direct vote along the lines of that of 1919, and would suggest that it be for at least $100,000,000 to be expended over a period of three or four years. During the next three or four years that money could be used for housing and assisting the municipalities to get their people off the dole. I feel sure our financial structure would stand that expenditure. If the provinces and municipalities knew what to exject I do not believe one dollar would be lost. Despite the large expenditure in 1919, a survey of the records conducted by the housing committee disclosed that hardly one dollar had then been lost. We have spent three and a half billion dollars on our railways, much of it in useless duplication and waste, and I believe we might well spend one billion dollars of that on a housing scheme which would have some beneficial effect.

Italy is another country which is going ahead in its efforts to eliminate unemployment and the dole in housing. What are they doing? They are building houses, roads, harbours, public buildings, hospitals and schools and other municipal services for to-morrow. I read a long article on Italy the other day of the building of municipal and federal institutions so as to get people off the dole and back to work. "Build for to-morrow", and I have seen the same Italian scheme supported in many other publications since.

I appreciate the work that the present government has done. A housing scheme was mentioned in the speech from the throne, and within two weeks of the opening of parliament a special committee was appointed to look into the question. It has made a very good report as far as it goes, and with most of its recommendations, seventeen of them in all, I agree, but I do not agree that it is purely a municipal and local problem. In my opinion it is very largely a social problem, and in addition to that there is an emergency in which a housing scheme could be of great help.

The report says that as soon as the depression is over 25,000 houses will be wanted. In Toronto alone pretty nearly that number will be wanted. According to a report on housing conditions in the city from which I come, and the Bruce report, nearly 60,000 people in Toronto have moved out of the rented houses into apartments, and when the depression is over they will want to move back into houses and there will be a scarcity of houses, especially the smaller type of houses for the working classes. As the great Doctor Hastings, the former medical health officer of the city of Toronto, said, housing is more related to public health than almost any other agency, and if we want to do something for the rising generation and for public health we shall have to go into housing on a very large scale in this country.

The evidence that was given before the committee was that lower mortgage and also interest rates would to a great extent help to solve the housing problem. Building contractors to-day cannot cope with the demand for houses but they have difficulty in finding the money. If we could do something to lower mortgage and other interest rates I think it would be of great assistance in house building.

This question of housing is also related to the problem of reconstruction. It is no use eliminating slums and putting up new houses on the outskirts if you have not the necessary municipal services—transportation, water supply, sewers, roads and many other municipal services—and for that reason many of the municipalities which are finding it hard to balance their budgets because of the non-payment of taxes are hoping that parliament will come to their support on housing and so help in getting people off the dole by entering upon a gigantic housing scheme all over Canada.

The committee on housing has made a very moderate report, which deals with the facts. As to the conclusions I should like to see some of them go further along the line of the 1919 housing legislation. In the city of Toronto and the county of York the people are looking to parliament to take action in this matter, and the sooner the government enters upon this housing program the better.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not wish to suggest any curtailment of the discussion but it does seem to me that perhaps we could spend the time of the committee to better advantage if we were in possession of the bill and knew something more of what the government's proposals are as outlined therein. I must say that I cannot entirely agree with the speaker who has just taken his seat (Mr. Church) because I would not like to see this housing scheme carried out after the manner of the 1919 act, which was not a great success, I think. However, as I say, I do not believe there is any great advantage in spending time upon conjectures as to what the bill may contain. I suggest that we get it before the committee as soon as we can so that the house may have an opportunity of giving this very important problem the careful attention it deserves.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Sir George Perley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 112, to assist the construction of houses.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

ADMINISTRATIVE, ADVISORY AND INVESTIGATORY FUNCTIONS—PROVISION FOR A DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS

The house resumed from Monday, June 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 86, to establish a dominion trade and industry commission—Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury)—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 28—Publication of certain reports.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, when this bill was before the house yesterday the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) requested some information with respect to the fines collected under the Weights and Measures Act. I find that for the period 1919 to 1935 a total of $4,226.50 was collected in fines.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Would the minister give the amounts by years?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; 1919-20, $2,320; 1920-21, $140; 1921-22, $65; 1922-23, $132; 1923-24, $230; 1924-25, $115; 1925-26, $160; 1926-27, $199.55; 1927-28, $115; 1928-29, $37; 1929-30, $162; 1930-31, $325; 1931-32, $105; 1932-33, $35; 1933-34, $35; 1934-35, $2,051.

When the bill was last before the house the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) made a suggestion with respect to the publication of reports under section 28. I have the following amendment to propose, that section 28 be amended by adding thereto as subsection 3 the following:

> In the case of any agreement or proposed agreement for the control and regulation of prices or production the commission shall in such manner as seems desirable make the same public and shall fix a date at least fifteen days from the date of publication aforesaid for hearing representations by any interested person whether producers, consumers or others.

I think that ought to suit the hon. member for Weyburn.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. MATTHEWS: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That means that the publication will take place before the recommendation is passed on to council for approval?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before action is taken by the commission.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With the consent of the committee I wish to revert to sections 18 and 19, with respect to "Canada standard." It has been brought to my attention that under the British standards act, or whatever the name of the imperial act is, where they set up the British standard such as is contemplated in section 18 they leave the alternative of using either the words "British standard" or the initials "B.S." It is suggested that in addition to the words "Canada standard" we should have the initials "C.S." I would therefore move that section 18 be amended by adding in the third line, after the words "Canada standard," the initials "C.S." And the same with respect to section 19. In line 18, after the words "Canada standard," there should be the initials "C.S.", and again in line 32 and in line 35 there should be the same change.

Amendments agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Could the minister give the committee any statement as to the results? I see there is quite a difference in the amount of fines levied in the last year and I should like to know what effect prosecution has had with regard to the prevention of short weights.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am informed by the director of weights and measures that it is having a very salutary effect and we are asking for more inspectors and more money to enforce the law.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that the preamble makes special mention of the passing of a resolution on the second day of February, 1934, that a select special committee of the house be appointed to inquire into and investigate the causes of the large spread between the prices received for commodities by the producer and the prices paid by the consumers. No mention is made in the preamble of a similar resolution introduced a year or two before by the hon. member for Assiniboia

(Mr. Mackenzie). It may not suit the government's purpose to include it in the preamble but as it originated the idea some mention should be made of that fact somewhere in the records of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: It is all on the records now.

Preamble agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 8, to establish an employment and social insurance commission, to provide for a national employment service, for insurance against unemployment, for aid to unemployed persons, and for other forms of social insurance and security, and for purposes related thereto.

He said: In the votes and proceedings of May 31 there was a statement in detail of the amendments. Those who have Bill No. 8 before them will observe that the amendments in section 2 are to fix the period of twenty-four hours under the definition of "day"; to add the words "of the commission," and also to state in writing the words "twenty" and "twenty-four" rather than to leave them in the form of figures. In the remaining part of section 2 the same course has been adopted by the Senate. There is nothing material there. In section 4, subsection 6, there were added the words, "and with the approval of the governor in council, real property." It was provided in the original bill that the commission might acquire real and personal property but it is provided now that they may not acquire real property except with the approval of the governor in council. In section 5, subsection 3, there were added at the end the words "during such absence or incapacity." That is with respect to the appointment by the governor in council of a temporary commissioner who should hold office only during the absence or incapacity of any commissioner. With respect to section 6 there was added a provision regarding residence within the city of Ottawa or within ten miles thereof —that is as to the commission. Section 8 is amended by adding after the word "may" in the first line "subject to the approval of the governor in council." In section 12, in the third line, after the word "and," there are added the words "to the extent the commission considers necessary." In subsection 2 of section 12 the words "render any person liable" in line 42 are struck out. In line 44 the words "three months" are changed to the words "one month," and in line 43, after the word "conviction," the words "render liable any person in default" are inserted. That phraseology was adopted in the act as a whole.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The penalty is reduced from three months to one month.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. In section 16 the whole of clause (a), subsection 1 has been struck out, and (b) becomes (a) and (c) becomes (b). The bill by section 16 provided for exemption:

> Where any employed person proves that he is either:—
> (a) in receipt of any pension or income of the annual value of $365 or upwards, which does not depend on his personal exertions; or—

That is struck out. At the end of section 17, subsection 1, dealing with contributions, there are added after the word "provided" the words "or otherwise as may be prescribed by the commission." That is to give the commission power to deal with contributions by "employers of those persons, which contributions shall be paid by means of revenue stamps as hereinafter provided or otherwise as may be prescribed by the commission."

In section 18, line 41, after the word "stamps" are inserted the words "and the devices for impressing the same." That is merely an amplification of the section. In section 19, lines 19 and 20, after the words "provisions of this act," there are inserted the words "including part II of the third schedule thereof."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the effect of that?

Mr. BENNETT: Section 19 will now read:

> Every person who being insured under this act is unemployed and in whose case the conditions laid down by this act (in this act referred to as "statutory conditions") are fulfilled, shall be entitled, subject to the provisions of this act (including part II of the third schedule thereof).

Then in line 22, just at the end of the line after the word "under" are inserted the words "part I of." The clause reads: "under the third schedule," and the senate have made it read "under part I of the third schedule."

In section 20, line 32, the word "unemployed" is struck out and after the word "days" are inserted the words "of unemployment" so that the section would read: "exclusive of any days of unemployment." That is better than the mere use of the word "unemployed." I think that is an improvement. Again in section 20, subsection 5 of the printed bill, that is the one referring to period of disqualification not to count in continuous period of unemployment unless due to disease or disablement, has been struck out, and a new subsection is added which I am bound to say is an improvement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is there any change in principle in the amendment?

Mr. BENNETT: I think not. I will read it.

(5) Any period during which a person—
(i) fails to fulfil the second or third statutory condition, or
(ii) is, under the provisions of this act, disqualified for receiving benefit, or
(iii) is, under the provisions of this act, deemed not to be unemployed, shall be excluded in the computation of continuous periods of unemployment unless that person proves that the failure to fulfil the said statutory conditions or the disqualification for receiving benefit was due to incapacity for work arising from some definite disease or bodily or mental disablement.

The general principle of it I think may be said to be maintained.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is just put into three groups, one, two and three?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. In the same section on page 12, line 13, the word "good" preceding the word "employer" has been struck out and the words "reasonable and fair" substituted therefor. I think that is a definite improvement. The term "good" as applied to an employer is not as apt a description as the term "reasonable and fair." In line 23 of the proviso the same change is made. Those are all the changes at that point.

In the last paragraphs of the last subclause of section 20, that is on page 13, line 2, after the word "shift" are inserted the words "in the occupation or," so that it reads:

On any day which is recognized as a holiday for his grade or class or shift in the occupation or at the factory, workshop or other premises at which he is employed.

The same change is made after the word "shift" in line 7, and the words "or place" in line 8 are struck out.

There are no changes in the succeeding sections 21, 22, 23 and 24. In section 25 the word "and" at the end of paragraph (c) of subsection 1 is struck out and after the word "them" in paragraph (d) of subsection 1, the word "and" is added. Paragraph (e) is then added as follows:

(e) persons who by custom of their occupation, trade or industry or pursuant to their agreement with an employer or paid, in whole or in part, by the piece or on a basis other than that of time.

That is to cover the piece goods worker.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That broadens the scope of the section.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. Then in line 30, after the words "respect to" are inserted the words "contributions and the payment thereof and with respect to," so that it reads:

With respect to contributions and the payment thereof and with respect to the receipt of benefit.

That makes it clearer. Section 28 on page 18 is amended by adding after the word "division" in the first line of the section, the words "established under section 11 of this act," so that it reads:

The commission may in each regional division established under section 11 of this act—

And so forth. Then in the fourth line of this section between the word "each" and the word "regional" is inserted the word "such," and in the next line the words "established under section 11 of this act" have been struck out. In other words, the words "established under section 11 of this act" have been given their true meaning by being removed from the second line of subsection 2.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Did the senate not make an amendment to section 27?

Mr. BENNETT: Did I not read that?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BENNETT: The proviso in lines 25 to 28 is struck out. That is a departure from the principle adopted by the house. It is one striking example of it, and there is another departure. There is no appeal now granted by reference to the exchequer court; the decision of the commission is final. It will be remembered that the question was discussed in this chamber, and after hearing the representations made to the select committee in the senate, the senate adopted the view that there should be no appeal, that the matter should be decided by the commission.

I have dealt with section 28. There is no change in section 29, or in section 30, which is a long one. In section 31 however there are some changes. In line 35 on page 21 between the words "be" and "liable" are added these words, "guilty of an offence against this act and," which of course is a very proper addition. The same addition is made in line 47 between the words "shall" and "for." In subsection 3 of section 31, after the word "shall" in the eighth line and before the word "for" are added the same words.

Then there are no changes until you get to section 34 at the top of page 24, when the same words are added in the second line after the word "shall."

In section 35 after the word "stamps" in the fourteenth line on page 24, and before the word "including," are added these words; "and all contributions, if any, paid otherwise than by means of such stamps." That is, the revenue received from the sale of stamps or payments that may be made in other forms than that, may be included in the fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): By regulation.

Mr. BENNETT: Shall be included in the fund.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But regulations will be drawn up.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. In subsection 4 of section 35 referring to investment of fund, in lines 32 and 33 on page 24 the words "or any province of Canada" are struck out. That is a change in terms from what was decided by this chamber; for it provides that the fund may be invested in obligations payable in Canadian currency of or guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada. It eliminates provincial investments.

At the top of page 25 the whole of subsection 7 of section 35 is struck out and the following new subsection is substituted:

(7) The commission may open and maintain deposit accounts with chartered banks, including the savings banks named in chapter fourteen, revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and any balance maintained in any such bank shall form part of the fund.

Then there is a new subclause 8, which reads:

"(8) No such bank, nor the Bank of Canada, shall be entitled to charge any exchange on or fee for cashing any cheque, as defined by the Special War Revenue Act, issued by the commission, and the provisions of section forty-four of that act shall not apply to such cheques."

It will be recalled that in the province of Quebec there are special forms of savings bank, notably the Montreal City and District savings bank. This amendment makes it possible for funds to be deposited in those banks. Then subclauses 8 and 9 are now numbered 9 and 10; and after the word "done" in the next to the last line in subsection 9, at the end of the eighth line the words "by it" are added, making it read; "required to be done by it under the provisions of this section."

In section 37, line 27, before the word "vacancy," the last word in the line, is added the word "casual," so that it reads "to fill a casual vacancy. In subsection 9 the first four words are struck out and the English is improved by making it read "the commission shall make available to the committee such information...."

The regulations section is not changed.

Sections 39 to 48 inclusive are not changed. But in the schedules slight changes have been made. It will be remembered that in clause (c) of the excepted employments some question arose as to saw mills. The section as it originally read was as follows, "employment in lumbering and logging." It has now been amended to read:

employment in lumbering and logging, exclusive of such saw mills, planing mills and shingle mills as are reasonably continuous in their operations.

Mr. NEILL: It does not take in lumbering; it still exempts lumbering?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Totally? It does not make the same provision as to "reasonably continuous"; that applies only to the mills.

Mr. BENNETT: I read that to mean that there is a specific exception in respect of lumbering and logging, "exclusive of such saw mills, planing mills and shingle mills as are reasonably continuous in their operations."

Mr. NEILL: But why should not the words be put in, "employment in lumbering and logging that are reasonably continuous"?

Mr. BENNETT: The draftsman in the other chamber took it that the conclusion at which the senate had arrived was that the excepted employments included lumbering and logging, but that was to be exclusive of such saw mills, planing mills and shingle mills as are reasonably continuous in their operations.

Mr. NEILL: But does the Prime Minister agree with that? Should not that "reasonably continuous" apply to logging as well as to saw mills?

Mr. BENNETT: That would put a somewhat different construction upon it from that at which they had arrived. It is in part II of the schedule, page 31 of the bill. The excepted employments are: "(c) employment in lumbering and logging."

Mr. NEILL: That is what I am objecting to. Why did they not make the same exception as to lumbering and logging as they did in the case of shingle and planing mills? If lumbering is reasonably continuous, why was it not put in that exception to the exception, as you might call it?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know why. I can only say this is the conclusion at which they did arrive.

Mr. HANBURY: Would the Prime Minister give his interpretation of that again?

Mr. BENNETT: Part II of the bill mentions the excepted employments, that is the employments to which this system does not apply. The first was employment in agriculture, horticulture and forestry; the second employment in fishing, and the third employment in lumbering and logging. But the amendment does not make that universally applicable; it provides that it shall not apply to such saw mills, planing mills and shingle mills as are reasonaby continuous in their operation.

Mr. HANBURY: But that would not include logging in British Columbia. In a large part of British Columbia logging is conducted twelve months in the year. I assume from that interpretation that that logging is excepted, but saw milling is not. I cannot understand that.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only reporting it just as it is. It will be remembered that some discussion took place in this chamber with respect to lumbering and logging and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury), as well as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) made some reference to it. Representations made in the committee resulted in its being put in this form.

The next change, however, is a departure from the principle agreed upon by this chamber. It will be recalled that when I was dealing with the bill I pointed out that banking, mortgage, loan, trust and insurance and other financial businesses were excepted from the operation of the bill. After hearing the representations made these were taken out of the excepted class and the statute applies to them. I am bound to say that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) thought this should be done originally, if I remember correctly.

Then at page 33 are added the following words:

> Employment in which persons are employed and paid for playing any game.

We are now dealing with the excepted employments. The last one is (r) and this is added as (s), so far as I can see.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does that include members of parliament?

Mr. BENNETT: Judging from what we have listened to this evening, the hon. member might conclude that.

[Mr. Neill.]

At page 33, part II, entitled "Rules as to payments and recovery of contributions paid by employers on behalf of employed persons," at the beginning of the section these words are added: "subject to section 25 of this act."

An hon. MEMBER: What is the difference?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will remember that there is a long list of persons excepted, including special classes of casual and seasonal workers, and in order to make it beyond peradventure they put in the words "subject to section 25." Had I been writing it I should have said "subject to the provisions of section 25."

Then we come to paragraphs 3 and 4 on page 34, which they have entirely rewritten, and if I may I will read them to the house because I think they have in some respects improved the expression of the intention of parliament:

> 3. Where the employed person receives any wages or other pecuniary remuneration from the employer, the amount of any contribution paid by the employer on behalf of the employed person shall, notwithstanding the provisions of any act or any contract to the contrary, be recoverable by means of deductions from the wages of that person or from any other remuneration due from the employer to that person and not otherwise: Provided that no such deduction may be made—
> (a) from any wages or remuneration other than such as are paid in respect of the period or part of the period for which the contribution is payable; or
> (b) in excess of the sum which represents the amount of the contributions for the period (if that period is longer than a week) in respect of which the wages or other remuneration are paid.

If hon. members have been following paragraph 3 in these rules as to payment I think they will agree that perhaps that puts it a little more clearly than it was in the original bill. Paragraph 4 reads as follows:

> 4. Where the employed person does not receive any wages or other pecuniary remuneration from the employer, but receives such remuneration from some other person, the amount of any contribution paid by the employer on behalf of the employed person shall (without prejudice to any other means of recovery) be recoverable summarily as a civil debt, if proceedings for the purpose are instituted within three months from the date on which the contribution was payable.

There is no substantial change, but I think it is put more clearly. Paragraph 10 on page 35 is amended to read as follows:

> Subject to section 25 of this act, for the purposes of this schedule, the expression "calendar week" means the period from twelve o'clock in the afternoon on one Sunday to twelve o'clock in the afternoon on the following Sunday.

There are no other amendments made by the senate. Of the two changes to which I have directed attention in principle the last one is important; I do not think the other is very material. The rest are textual changes intended to make clear the meaning of the act, and I believe no question should arise with respect to them.

With respect to the question raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, there is of course the question that was discussed originally here, and at the end of the discussion we left it in the form in which it was, believing that the commission might be able to deal with the matter as it should be dealt with in the light of changing conditions existing in one part of the country as compared with another part, with respect to lumbering and logging. The senate have added that this exception shall not apply where there has been a reasonably continuous operation of the mills that have to do with products derived from lumbering and logging operations. The change bringing in the banks and mortgage companies was long considered and much debated, I understand, but in the end the change was made and they are now included within the purview of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to ask a question in connection with section 10. Is it proper draftsmanship to say twelve o'clock in the afternoon? Should it not be twelve o'clock noon?

Mr. BENNETT: When I saw that I asked myself at once whether twelve o'clock in the afternoon was good, because twelve o'clock is twelve o'clock noon and it is not twelve o'clock in the afternoon until one minute later. From twelve o'clock noon to the same hour the next day I think would be more accurate, but I understand there is some authority for saying twelve o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. NEILL: Once more I should like to point out to the Prime Minister that when this matter was discussed before I think he gave the assurance that this question of the continuous nature of employment in lumbering and logging would be considered or dealt with under some other section of the act, possibly the regulations, but as the amendment reads now it will prohibit any action being taken under the regulations because it distinctly states what are to be the exemptions, and that would seem to preclude the possibility of any regulation bringing lumbering within the operations of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not care to express a definite opinion on that point, but I do not think there has been any curtailment of the powers of the commission to deal with the situation, by virtue of the changed language. Originally the language was "exclusive of the saw mill, planing mill and shingle mill industries" and in order that the question of the continuous character of their operations might be brought to the attention of the commission the senate has provided that they must be reasonably continuous in their operations, instead of treating them as industries that should be taken to be continuous. I do not think it changes the general sense of the provision as it left this house, but my opinion is no more valuable than that of the hon. gentleman in that regard.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): When this bill was before the house in the first instance I brought up the question of part time employees in the coal mines, of whom I have a considerable number in my constituency. Certain amendments have been made to section 7 to include part time employees, and I wonder just how those amendments will affect those coal miners who are employed as such for say twenty weeks in the year, and who for the rest of the time work on farms or at other occupations. Will they be included under this bill?

Mr. BENNETT: I would not care to venture a definite opinion about a matter of that sort. The language of the section I think makes it probable—I will go only that far—within the powers of the commission to deal with that matter. I would not care to anticipate an opinion and express a definite view on the point. When the hon. member for Assiniboia spoke I was just going to say that section 7 has not been changed so far as those powers are concerned. I should think the powers of the commission have not been abridged or lessened as compared to what they were when the bill left this chamber.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 106 to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Summary trials.

Mr. GRAY: Would the minister explain the reason for the change?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The amendments proposed in this bill were requested by the various children's aid societies and similar organizations throughout Canada. They are not very important amendments, but the societies are anxious that they be carried into the act.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 107 to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Irrebuttable presumption.

Mr. GRAY: This clause apparently adds at the beginning of subsection 3 the words "it shall be an irrebuttable presumption." I think the house is always loath to add sections to the criminal code or to any statute providing for an "irrebuttable presumption," unless there is very good reason for doing so.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is another amendment requested by the children's aid societies of Canada. The words we propose to add to the section now in the criminal code are as follows:

It shall be an irrebuttable presumption in any prosecution under subsection 2 of this section, that the child was in danger of being or becoming immoral, its morals injuriously affected and its home rendered an unfit place for it to be in, upon proof that the person accused did in fact, in the home of such child, participate in adultery, in sexual immorality, in habitual drunkenness or in any other form of vice.

We have to prove, first, that the act was committed, and the irrebuttable presumption is that the child was thereby affected. Then there is this saving clause:

Provided that this subsection shall not apply in the case of two persons who are not married to each other but are living together as man and wife and reputed to be man and wife, and where the child so affected is the child of the two persons so living together.

Mr. GRAY: Is this clause added because of some adverse decision?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, it arises from the complaint of children's aid societies about the section as it now stands, which is printed in the explanatory notes. That section is as follows:

In any prosecution under subsection 2 of this section, where the circumstances are such, as in the opinion of the court, to render it likely—

[Mr. Guthrie.]

And so on. That is the present section. The section would now read that in the event of immorality being proved there must be an irrebuttable presumption that the child was thereby affected.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING MINISTER OF FINANCE TO RAISE FUNDS FOR REDEMPTION OF SECURITIES

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 110, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

CORRESPONDENCE RESPECTING RETIREMENT OF DOCTOR H. M. TORY AS CHAIRMAN, TABLED

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I desire to table correspondence moved for by the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) on the 17th instant respecting the retirement of Doctor H. M. Tory as head of the national research council. I should like to say that in a letter to me dated March 7, Doctor Tory made certain representations. This letter was marked "personal," and for that reason it is not included in the file; otherwise it would be produced. I have not been able to get Doctor Tory to release the privilege as he is not in the city.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): When the resolution on which Bill No. 110, to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service, was before the committee last Monday, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) for certain information. The hon. member mentioned this again yesterday evening when the bill was being put through and suggested that the information might be given to him on the estimates, but as I have it with me now, I will send it over to him. I think that will answer the purpose.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I appreciate the courtesy of the right hon. gentleman. I think however the information should be a matter of record. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) asked one of the questions and I suggest that the information be filed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman would like it tabled as a return:

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

VANCOUVER DOCK STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the absence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), although it does not strictly involve any question of government policy. It is in reference to the regrettable disturbances that took place in Vancouver yesterday afternon. Has the Prime Minister any statement to make, in particular as to the advisability in the public interest of appointing a royal commisison under the Inquiries Act to inquire into the matter?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Anticipating the possibility of such a question being asked I got a memorandum from the Department of Labour with respect to the matter, and when I came to the building I found the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) had sent a note to me that he proposed to ask the question which he has just asked.

The information as far as I have been able to obtain it indicates that early in February of this year the Vancouver and New Westminster Waterfront Workers Association (longshoremen) notified the British Columbia Shipping Federation that they desired to reopen the agreement then existing, the main points to be considered being (1) making effective a six-hour working day, (2) union control of dispatching of longshore gangs, (3) elimination of the differential of four cents an hour between shore and ship gangs—the rates at present being respectively 81 cents and 85 cents—and (4) the establishment of a new minimum rate of 95 cents per hour in line with the rate effective in the United States Pacific coast ports. Numerous other items were involved, such as the refusal of members of this association to work with non-union labour.

An exchange of correspondence followed between the shipping federation and the longshoremen, covering a considerable period, but no apparent headway was made towards settlement of any part of these demands. Press reports intimated that the longshoremen were likely to go on strike at any time, and Mr. F. E. Harrison, the western representative of the federal Department of Labour advised both parties in writing that the conciliation services of the Department of Labour were available upon request by either or both parties, at the same time calling to their attention the requirements of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act that if a dispute could not be adjusted through negotiation these matters would first have to be dealt with by a board of conciliation and investigation.

On April 25 a mass meeting of the longshoremen in Vancouver was held and the following among other resolutions were adopted:

1. An assessment of one per cent of all longshoremen's wages would be made for one pay period to assist relief camp workers now on strike.

2. A cessation of work was agreed to on the 29th of April between the hours of three and four p.m. as a protest against relief camps.

3. No work would be performed on May 1, May day; and

4. That the resignation of Mayor G. G. McGeer be demanded.

The cessation of work took place in violation of their agreement. Following this a strike took place of what are termed booming gangs, men employed in sorting logs on the waterfront for export. This dispute did not directly affect the shipping federation of British Columbia, but the longshoremen, in violation of their agreement with the federation, refused to load these logs on the ground that it was unfair cargo. The shipping federation, however, were able to load this shipment with non-union men. Some time following this the longshoremen organized a union at Powell River. Very few of their numbers had ever been employed by the Powell River Company, and in these few instances only as temporary help, and the company refused to accede to the demands. That port was then declared unfair, and again the Vancouver longshoremen refused to load or unload ships moving to or from Powell River.

The shipping federation maintain that the agreement under which they have been operating has been violated in at least seven instances. Following this latter difficulty, the shipping federation made application under date of May 25 for the establishment of a board of conciliation and investigation. This application reached the department on May 30, a board was established the following day and both parties to the dispute were accordingly notified by telegraph. No nominations were received from either party and under date of June 5 the shipping federation telegraphed withdrawing their application and advising that the present agreement had been cancelled. Upon receipt of this telegram a wire was dispatched to the federation and also the longshoremen's association urging that all matters in dispute should be dealt with through board procedure and that in the meantime both parties should agree to adhere strictly to the terms of the present agreement. The shipping federation replied that they could not go on with this proposal, inasmuch as they had already entered into an agreement with another union. No reply whatever was received from the longshoremen's representatives. No action has yet been taken to cancel the establishment of the board.

Sympathetic strikes have been called by the Coastwise Longshoremen and Freight Handlers' Association of Vancouver, Seafarers' Industrial Union of Vancouver, and Marine Transport Union of Nanaimo. All of these groups, including Vancouver and District Waterfront Workers' Association, are affiliated with the Longshoremen and Water Transport Workers of Canada, and are said to be controlled by the Workers Unity League and that group of known extremists.

The Deputy Minister of Labour has been in communication by long distance telephone this morning with Mr. F. E. Harrison, who has been from the outset closely in touch with both parties to the dispute. Last evening there was a three hour conference with representatives of the men and the shipping federation, but in the meantime violence was resorted to, not with arms but with sticks and clubs as indicated in the press this morning. Neither the Department of Labour nor the Department of Justice is further informed with respect to the matter, except that the mayor of Vancouver has publicly stated that the matter is under control. There was a number of mounted police on the Ballantyne pier; they had been asked to remain there by the chief of police of Vancouver and by the Vancouver harbour board, as well as by the attorney general of the province of British Columbia. There is no further information that we have available at the moment. It is not contemplated in view of the facts I have recited that an inquiry should be held and in view of the statement made by the mayor of Vancouver this morning as to the forces that were organized behind this outbreak yesterday it is not thought desirable that any further action should be taken at the moment unless requested.

MONTREAL HARBOUR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): In the absence of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) I should like to ask the Prime Minister if a delegation from the harbour commissioners of Montreal has been in Ottawa to-day concerning the depth of the water in the harbour and, if so, if we can expect a declaration from the government on the matter.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I fancy the hon. member is aware of the fact that a delegation did meet the Minister of Marine and other members of the government, but the conference was protracted to such an extent that the minister is not yet in his place.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

ADMINISTRATIVE, ADVISORY AND INVESTIGATORY FUNCTIONS—PROVISION FOR A DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the third reading of Bill No. 86, to establish a dominion trade and industry commission.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (East Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words in connection with the third reading of this bill I desire to take advantage of this opportunity to express some views in connection with the manner in which the report of the price spreads committee and commission has been implemented, and also to direct the attention of the house to a few matters relating thereto which I believe should receive very careful and thoughtful consideration by the house.

May I open my references to the report by referring to one feature of it or, shall I say, a philosophy which runs through the whole of the report, to which I think all too little attention has been paid. On the second reading of the bill now before the house for third reading I made rather extended and detailed remarks with reference to this feature. At the moment I shall content myself with merely mentioning the point. It will be recalled, sir, that in the preparation of the report certain chapters were introduced leading up to the more practical features of it. I wish to quote again to-day a paragraph which I quoted previously and then, using that as a foundation, to give expression to certain views in regard to the matter. At the opening of chapter III, headed "Concentration and the Corporate System of Business" we have these words:

> The evidence before us ... has shown that a few great corporations are predominant in the industries that have been investigated; also that this power, all the more dangerous because it is impersonal, can be wielded in such a way that competition within the industry is blocked, the welfare of the producer disregarded, and the interests of the investor ignored.
> As the hearings into various forms of economic activity were carried on, it has been difficult not to be impressed by the fact that the corporate form of business, not only often gives freedom from legal liability, but also facilitates the evasion of moral responsibility for inequitable and uneconomic practices.

And one other paragraph:

> The net result of this combination of flexibility and rigidity is that unregulated competition no longer guarantees efficiency and maximum production at fair prices. Competition degenerates sometimes into economic warfare where victory may go to the strong, rather than to the efficient.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What page is that?

Mr. STEVENS: Pages 12 and 13. I read these words for the purpose of indicating that there is a new orientation of business. I enlarged on that the other day, but I am going to speak for the moment as a member of the Conservative party in this house. I was elected as a Conservative, and I take it that the very essence of the economic policy of the Conservative party is to be found in what is known as the national policy. Through all the years the Conservative party, as the representative of a large body of opinion in this country, has taken the principles of the national policy as its guide and lead in matters economic. I wish to say, sir, that in holding the views I do now, in the light of the studies revealed in this report, I am not departing one iota from the economic principles of the Conservative party. I took the trouble to look up some quotations and I am going to read them, briefly, in order to indicate and to impress upon the minds of hon. members on this side of the house—and hon. members opposite to the extent that they will do me the courtesy of listening—that when the national policy was launched in Canada in 1878 it was never contemplated that that policy would lead to the development of industry to a point where a monopoly would dominate within any particular branch of industry. It is not pertinent at this point to debate what they should have foreseen, or anything of that kind. I shall deal only with the historic facts. Sir John Macdonald, speaking in 1878, is reported at page 859 of Hansard of that year as follows:

> It should consist—

Speaking of his new policy—

> —of a judicious readjustment of the tariff which would benefit and foster the argicultural, the mining, the manufacturing, and other interests of the dominion; a judicious readjustment of the tariff will, mean, to a certain extent, an increased duty upon certain articles.

Note, Mr. Speaker, that this was a policy directed towards the development of the interests of agriculture, mining and manufacturing, as well as other interests. Then I read from a speech by Sir John Macdonald delivered at St. Catharines, in which he used these words:

> We have, however, readjusted the tariff, reducing the duties on articles of necessity and raw materials, and increasing those on what is required for home manufacturing, this being a direct encouragement to artisans and mechanics.

Here we have the second feature of this policy which was in the mind of its great framer, namely, that throughout it should protect or redound to the advantage and interest of the workers in industry.

I now turn to another quotation. In the year 1878, at a meeting in Toronto the Liberal Conservative Association of Ontario declared on this subject. This was the pronouncement by a meeting of the Conservative association:

> We are satisfied that the welfare of Canada requires the adoption of a national financial policy which, by a judicious readjustment of the tariff, will benefit and foster the agricultural, mining and manufacturing interests of the dominion.

It was not, sir, for the creation of monopolies or for the creation of powerful corporations to operate without law and with a selfish disregard for the rights of others—no, not that, but for the fostering of agriculture, mining and manufacturing.

I now turn to a quotation from a speech delivered in 1895, after the policy had been in operation. An extract from the budget speech delivered by Sir George Foster, the then Minister of Finance, is as follows:

> If there is to be a protective system at all, everybody knows it must be higher in its inception than as the years gradually pass, when industries have become established and when the industrial development of the country grows apace.

Again I point out that the framers of the national policy never contemplated the growth of great monopolies under that policy, nor in later years did the framers of the Combines Investigation Act contemplate that in spite of that act great monopolies would dominate, as the report has stated, branches of industry in which they are engaged to a degree of almost complete monopoly.

Sir, there is one other interesting quotation I should like to read, because it shows the attitude of the Liberal party of that day towards this problem. I rather welcome these words because they give an indication of the tolerant spirit shown by that great party at that time towards the policy,—making a certain reservation. This is a quotation from a speech of Alexander Mackenzie delivered in 1877:

> I have no objection to the principle of protection per se; that is, if you can make everybody wealthy without making any person poor. If that is the principle of protection, I am quite in favour of it, if the plan by which it is to be achieved can be shown.

I admit the words sound a little facetious, but I submit further that what they did disclose was the attitude of the leader of the Liberal party of that day, namely, that he had no objection to the principle of protection, if it would result in benefits to the people generally,—and of course to industry, providing it did not result in the creation of iniquities within the industrial system.

Again I say it is futile to look back, with our present knowledge and to say that those of that day should have looked to the future and should have realized that mass production would develop, that the machine age would grow, and that men would be thrown out of work by the tens of thousands through the mechanization of industry and agriculture. These conditions were not foreseen. They were not foreseen twenty years ago, even; they were not foreseen in their present magnitude until they were, in a sense, upon us. But this point stands out clearly, that the framers of the national policy, so-called, never contemplated the creation in this country of industrial groups so powerful that they could defy government as well as competition. And, sir, throughout our examinations of the past eighteen months, condensed now in the form of this report, it is clear that these great industrial organizations have developed. It does not necessarily follow that they have grown great because of efficiency. That is clearly stated in the report which is presented as a result of our examinations. On the other hand, it is therein stated—this is certainly my firm conviction and I have seen no contradiction of it by other members of the commission—that it was the power of massed capital rather than efficiency which caused or gave power to these great industries. I agree that some members of the commission would qualify that statement, in part, but my conviction is that it is far more due to the control of wealth or capital by these institutions than by their efficiency that they have gained their position of great power.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Was the hon. gentleman in Canada in the early nineties? Was he a resident of Canada in the early nineties?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what my personal history has to do with this discussion.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): A matter of curiosity.

Mr. STEVENS: If it would satisfy the hon. member I could give a brief statement, if that is what the hon. gentleman wishes to come at. As I was not born in Canada probably he questions my right to speak.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, not at all.

Mr. STEVENS: I was born in a city—no mean city—the city of Bristol, England. I came to Canada in 1887, and I could tell my hon. friend a good deal more than that about my early experiences in Canada, if it would serve any purpose. But I do not see why a man's personal life as a boy in this country has anything to do with it.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, the question was asked in all sincerity. I merely questioned as to whether the hon. member was a resident in the nineties.

Mr. STEVENS: I will set it down to my dullness in failing to see the point.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh, I see.

Mr. STEVENS: I recall perfectly well the early days of the nineties. My hon. friend's interruption prompts me to make just a few observations in regard to that. I remember when I was in the city of Peterborough as a boy. I remember when just such conditions as obtain to-day obtained only in a lesser degree.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Exactly.

Mr. STEVENS: I remember when the late George A. Cox in the city of Peterborough by foreclosing mortgages all over the country reduced hundreds of citizens to penury and want.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Agreed.

Mr. STEVENS: That has not escaped my memory, but I do not see what force there is in pursuing that discussion.

Canada grew, and it grew because capital poured into this country, and there was practically unlimited opportunity for speculation. The point I am coming to is this. In spite of the very foundations of the national policy, monopolies have grown up in this country, and in spite of the enactement of the Combines Investigation Act—and I want to say to the right hon. gentleman who holds that act in such reverence, that I am not criticizing it; I am one of those who want to see it enforced rigidly, and I want him to understand that; I am speaking in good faith—in spite of the combines act monopolies did develop in this country and great dominating factories in industry have grown.

Now I would like to read a few extracts from the speeches of the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada in his radio addresses last January, and I invite him and I invite the Conservative party in this house to give ear to what I shall now read. I do this not in any critical spirit at all because what I am about to read reflects very largely my own views. What I am about to read would in my opinion, if followed up and crystallized into law, go far to correct many of the inequities in the country. In the first radio address delivered by the Prime Minister on January 2 last these words appear:

> You would agree that free competition—

I ask hon. gentlemen to follow this:

> You would agree that free competition and the open market place, as they were known in the old days, have lost their place in the system, and that the only substitute for them, in these modern times, is government regulation and control.

I pause there to say this. Those are not the words of some irresponsible individual: they are the words of the Prime Minister of Canada, spoken by him to the people of Canada, and I believe earnestly spoken. What do they say? That the only substitute for the open market place, which has passed and gone, is government regulation and control. That is all that I have asked for. It is all that I expected. I submit that these measures to which we have been invited to give consideration do not do justice to this utterance of the Prime Minister which I have just read. I shall deal with these measures later.

I read further from the second radio address of the Prime Minister on January 4:

> The economic system must be reformed. Great social and economic changes have taken place in the life of all the nations and these have gravely disturbed the operation of the system.

That is precisely my view. Great changes have come. They have disturbed the operation of the system. I have shown that it is certainly different from what the framers of the national policy conceived. Therefore it has been my argument, and is my argument, that it is the paramount duty first of the Conservative party in this house, and I think it is the duty of the whole of parliament, to address itself first to the recognition of these matters and to their correction. The Prime Minister's radio speech goes on:

> Therefore capitalism must change to meet the changed conditions of this new world, if it is longer adequately to serve you.

Those are strong words. I have not, Mr. Speaker, gone to the extent of suggesting a complete renovation of capitalism. I am a believer in capitalism provided that capitalism is not expressed in the terms of great monopoly and the control of all its credit in the hands of a few. I am in favour of capitalism in so far as it recognizes the right of individuals to hold and control property, but I am not in favour of a system of capitalism such as was disclosed in the examination by the commission to which I have already made reference. I quote further from the Prime Minister's speech:

> If you hold the views I do, what would you require to be done? Would you demand reform? Would you demand that the government, as the only power able to effect the necessary measures of reform, act decisively and without delay?

I say yes. That is precisely what I am asking. He goes on:

> Would you petition the government to intervene?

Yes, I believe that the government, or rather I will put it this way, that parliament should intervene and set up a power that will be the referee between these great monopolies and those with whom they come into competition.

The other day, Mr. Speaker, I called the attention of the house to this fact, which I shall take the liberty to repeat now. Times have so changed, and I heard this only to-day in a convention of business men in this city, that no longer can one business man conducting a small business approach another business man representing a corporation and discuss their affairs man to man because the official representing the large corporation invariably answers, "Well, I see your point. I would like to do what you wish but orders from head office prevent me doing it. This is all I can do." Those were his orders, as I said the other day, from New York, Montreal, Chicago, or some other distant point where the head office was located.

The whole method of doing business has changed, and what opportunity, as I remarked the other day, has a small business man, and there are hundreds of thousands of them in this country, to compete with these great corporations unless there is some power in between which can hold the scales in equity between them? And that is all that I have asked. I quote further from the Prime Minister's radio address:

> Would you proclaim the urgent need of government regulation of business?

I have scarcely gone that far. I call, sir, upon parliament to set up machinery, not so much to regulate business, as to referee business. The Prime Minister's words were:

> Would you proclaim the urgent need of government regulation of business?

I am willing to go that far. These measures do not go that far. These measures will not successfully discharge that promise. I quote again:

> I think you would, if you had a proper regard for your own welfare. And of course you have, and so assuredly have I.

Now I quote from the Prime Minister's third radio address delivered on January 7 last. This has to do with the subject of concentration to which I have referred. I am not a lone voice in the wilderness on this question of concentration, Mr. Speaker. From the standpoint of the eminence of the one who uttered these words I am indeed in good company. The Prime Minister said:

> Many years ago disequilibrium in the original interrelationship of wages, costs, prices and profits began to manifest itself. This disequilibrium has been increasing.

That is precisely my view.

> As that machine grew mightier and more dominant, so competition became proportionately less effective to achieve its original purpose.

Those words find an echo in my heart.

> What we are concerned with, as practical men and humanitarians, is to devise some corrective of the disabilities which it takes no economist to discern. Whatever caused them, there is a fair and sensible cure which can be effectively applied. It is our business to apply it.

All that I am asking is that these effective, fair and sensible cures shall be applied willingly to these evils or to this distress.

There is one other quotation which I wish particularly to submit to the attention of hon. members on this side of the house. This is headed Price Spreads Commission and reads:

> At the last session of parliament, the House of Commons, upon the invitation of the government, appointed a committee to go into the whole question of these concentrations of business and price spreads and exploitations of the defenceless primary producer and the equally defenceless ultimate consumer.

I pause to repeat that this commission was appointed to go into the question of the exploitation of the defenceless primary producer. Will any one say that by the wildest stretch of imagination the bill to amend the live stock act is in any remote degree a correction of what were found to be exploitations of the defenceless producer? Is anyone bold enough to suggest that? In so far as the difficulties which face the primary producer are concerned a more anaemic piece of legislation could not have been introduced. It is because of that and because of one or two other things to which I shall refer that I find myself forced to make this declaration to-day. The next quotation I wish to make reads:

> When the report of the commission is received by the government, parliament will be invited to take action in accordance with the commission's recommendation.

I will say this for the right hon. gentleman, when he uttered those words he had no idea of what was to be in the report. Here is a definite pledge that the government will invite parliament to take action in accordance with the commission's report. I continue to quote:

> I think that to-night I need only say this to you: Should the commission find that the primary producer has been denied his rightful profits or that the consumer has had to bear the excessive profits of a dominant industry; if as a consequence of this, the primary producer or the ultimate consumer, has had his standard of living adversely affected, action will be taken to put a stop to these iniquities.

I ask: Has the primary producer been denied his rightful privileges? Is there anyone in this house this afternoon who will say that during the last four years the primary producer of Canada has not been denied his rightful privileges which should accrue from the labour and energy which he has put into his operations? Will anyone deny that? No; it cannot be denied. It is one of the travesties of the times, as has been shown in this report, that so far as farm implements are concerned, so far as his relations in the marketing of his products through the packers are concerned, so far as his relations to the canning industry are concerned, the primary producer has held the bag, to use a colloquialism. The primary producer is the one who has lost out. Have we been invited to take adequate steps to correct these iniquities? I submit that no adequate steps have been taken. I quote:

> So long as I am head of the government of this country, I will see fair play between the producer and the consumer, between industry and the public. I have no prejudices, I hope, and I play no favourites. But I could not better show my concern for industry than to rid it of those practices which unfairly affect the pocketbook of the great bulk of the people of this country and work a damning injury to industry itself.

These are noble words, but I fail to find in the measures so far submitted to parliament that degree of remedy which was indicated in these words of the Prime Minister.

Let me call the attention of the house to what we have before us. We have had an amendment to the live stock act. One can dismiss that and say that it is little more than worthless. It does propose one or two things which were recommended in the commission's report, but had it been drawn up by the great packing institutions of this country it could not have been more satisfactory to them.

The next are the amendments to the criminal code. Has there ever been a time in the history of Canada and in the history of this parliament when a measure was introduced to parliament in response to the recommendations of a commission which sat for fifteen months with such words as those used by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) when he introduced the measure and later when the discussion was finally brought to a head? The Minister of Justice said that these things were offered to parliament but it was not considered that they could be made effective because of constitutional difficulties. Whose business was it to draw them so that they would be effective? I say to the Minister of Justice that had he simply made the offences stated in that bill crimes, they would have been within the powers of parliament. I know what will happen when I say that; I shall be laughed at and ridiculed as a sort of ignorant layman who presumes to talk on constitutional matters. I submit that an impartially minded legal man could draft these measures in the light of the chapter on labour of the report so that they would be within the constitution. Subsection (a), I think it is, of section 5 may be questionable, but I submit that most of the sections could have been brought within the criminal code. How were these amendments introduced? Parliament was told first by the Minister of Justice and then by a leading legal mind of the opposition that they were so much nonsense, on the one hand, and would not be effective, on the other. Did ever legislation start out on a career of reform under conditions such as that?

What was next? We come now to the amendments to the Companies Act. The minister who introduced this legislation stated in one part of his remarks that if he were in private practice he would like nothing better than to be briefed to contest the very measures he was introducing. I ask the serious minded hon. members of this house: Did ever legislation which was supposed to give effect to the solemn words and noble sentiments contained in the three speeches from which I have quoted start on its career of reform under auspices such as that?

We come now to the most important of all, the bill which is before us for third reading. I expressed previously my views on this legislation and I shall not repeat them other than to say this: The bill is drafted and confined to the narrowest interpretation of constitutional law when the report is as clear as day that there are prevailing in this country practices and customs which the report has indicated cannot be covered by statute law but if a commission were set up that would review these matters and make declarations on them, you could build up in this country a corporate practice that would recreate the fair practice of man, that practice which passed away with the open market place. That is what the report suggested. I still suubmit, not as a lawyer, but just as an ordinary member of the house, that if that board had been set up in that spirit, was given as wide constitutional powers as possible, having placed upon it the administration of the various acts, but also being made a referee between conflicting business interests in Canada, a very great service could have been rendered.

But what is the chief weakness of this bill? It has been turned over to the tariff board. I have referred to that before. Let me repeat this: In so far as the worthy judge who presides over the tariff board is concerned, I could conceive of no man better able than he to preside over a body of this kind; but I know, every hon. member knows in his heart that that gentleman has now more to do than he can possibly do, and to place upon his shoulders the interpretation of that report through these anaemic statutes and expect results is asking for the impossible. It cannot be done and it will not be done; do not let us make any mistake about that. We may go out to the country and say that we have set up a trade and industry commission; we may go out and speak in laudatory terms of the chairman and his colleagues—and one could not speak too highly to suit me—but as surely as the sun rises to-morrow, you have handicapped that individual and that commission to such an extent that it is an impossibility for them to give effect to the reforms indicated in this report. What is the use of our deceiving ourselves? I am speaking thus because I am profoundly convinced that we dare not leave these matters in their present form without a final word of protest.

Let me now refer briefly to the Liberal view as expressed in the minority report, and I want to pay this tribute to the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) with whose economic and social views I do not find myself in harmony at all—not that I do not respect him; he knows I do. But from my long acquaintance with him I know he will take words of criticism from me not as any personal reflection on himself or his party but simply as a conflict of ideas. The Liberal minority view is expressed in these words: it refers to the distress of the workers and it assigns that distress largely, and I think I might say almost wholly, to loss of external markets. I am not going to labour that point, but I wish to place very briefly in review the answer to that which I think is so definite there is no escape from it. It is not argument; it is fact. There is not in Europe a country that in the years between 1923 and 1935 did not erect almost insuperable barriers against most of the primary products that we desire to export. Two or three years ago I placed on Hansard the record, giving the dates, of the amendments to their tariffs. This had nothing to do with Canada; I do not blame those in power during those days. No one has ever heard me charge the right hon. gentleman opposite (Mr. Mackenzie King) or his late Minister of Finance or my dear old friend who on account of ill health is so rarely in the house, the former Minister of Trade and Commerce, the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) at any time with their having lost Canadian markets, and I say to the leader of the opposition now—and he can use this on every hustings in Canada so far as I am concerned—I do not say that he was responsible for losing the markets; but I do say this: Wheat, oats, bacon, cheese, live stock, honey, flour and a lot of other things all had the duties against them in Italy, France, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Belgium and the United States raised steadily while he was in office. I appeal to the hon. member for Weyburn and in general to hon. gentlemen opposite: In the face of those facts, is it going to advantage the workers of Canada to say to them that the reason they are in their present dilemma is that this government has lost markets for Canada? It simply is not true; that is all. Do not let us go out to the country and say to the working man that restored markets are the cure. I will say this to the present government and I will say it to the leaders on the other side of the house: I will join with anyone at any time in an effort to get wider markets; but do not let us blind our eyes to the exact situation. In addition to loss of markets, there was dislocation of exchange. Is it not amazing that the night before last this house passed in a one, two, three, a bill setting aside some $64,000,000 to stabilize exchange? Why did we not wake up to that need four years ago? It is this belated recognition of problems—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friends opposite say: "Hear, hear." Not the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) who defeated me in the last election, because he has advocated stabilization, but I notice along the front benches hon. gentlemen who were very cautious about tampering with the monetary system of the country. But the point I make is this: here we are five years—well, from September, 1931, three and a half years—after Britain went off the gold standard when the question of exchange became an acute problem. After going through one year, two years, of depreciated sterling currency and disturbance of our trade with Britain in that respect; after all that, now we admit that exchange should be stabilized. It would have been infinitely better had we had the foresight to take that action at that time.

But I come back to the hon. member for Weyburn. The collapse of external markets, the closing of markets abroad, not by this government, not by the government that preceded it, but by the governments of Europe, and the dislocation of exchange, are what has caused in large measure the collapse of our trade. Let me say to the hon. member for Weyburn: Will he suggest to me that the suffering in the needle trades which is revealed in this report in such tragic form is due to loss of external markets? Will he say that? What we drew attention to in this report was the tragic fate of 30,000, 40,000 or 50,000 workers in this country in the needle trades. Let me give the house a few examples. I read from page 109 of the report:

> Characterized by economic instability and excessive competition, with "contract shops" and "home workers" alongside the usual type of manufacturer, this industry, though it includes many progressive and socially minded members, has had on the whole a doubtful record. The evidence we have taken shows that in many cases this record is only too well deserved.

Then it goes on:

> Through price and wage cutting, these small firms maintain a precarious and temporary existence for themselves at a heavy social cost. Their low wages tend to reduce the level of wages elsewhere, to impair general purchasing power, and to increase relief costs. Their uneconomicaly low prices eagerly sought, if not dictated, by mass buyers, endanger the solvency of more reputable and stable establishments and contribute to the general disorganization of the industry.

I could, if time permitted, follow with quotation after quotation indicating the tragic condition of the workers. Is that due to the loss of external markets? I hear my hon. friend say, sotto voce, yes.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend still persists. It was caused, as the report indicates, largely by mass buying, largely by the concentration in the hands of a few people of the buying, and in some instances, not so much in this industry as in other industries, the cause lay in the hands of producing concerns. Those conditions cannot be blamed on a loss of external trade. They are conditions which have grown up in Canada and are there challenging our consideration and attention. We are told that the remedy for that is amendments to the criminal code which the Minister of Justice introduced the other day with such doubtful terminology.

Now, sir, the other argument of my hon. friend in this respect is the law of supply and demand. Perhaps he would like me to cite his words to the house. He says:

> The best balance will be maintained by the free play of nature's law of supply and demand.

And again:

> If economic forces are allowed free play the marginal producer will be the first to go—

I should like my hon. friends to listen to this:

> —and the field will be left to the more efficient. In this way the industry would be put on a sounder and more economic basis than would be possible under a regulating board.

What the hon. gentleman says there is this —he will correct me if I misinterpret him. He says the best balance will be maintained by allowing nature's law of supply and demand to have full swing. Will he or anyone in this house indicate any place in the world, outside of perhaps some remote country that we scarcely ever hear of, where the law of supply and demand is functioning? Is there any place in the realm of international trade to-day where the law of supply and demand is functioning, not fully, but functioning at all?

An hon. MEMBER: Not even in the cocoanut groves in the south seas.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not functioning. In Europe every major country which is a market for Canadian products has prohibitions of one kind and another and for one reason and another; in part because of fear, of the threat of future war; in part to take up again the tasks of pre-war days in the way of agricultural production and so forth; in part growing out of the tendency that developed in post-war days of dumping goods all over the world. Great Britain did it, the United States did it, Canada did it; Czechoslovakia, Germany, France, Italy, all did it. What did you read in your papers the other night? That an organization had been formed in Germany of certain industrial groups. What for? To tax each member of the group, I think seven to ten per cent, to create a fund out of which to pay bonuses for the export of goods. That is the competition we are going to be faced with. What is Japan doing? I think my hon. friend in one of his speeches cited Japan. What is her policy? Japan's policy is for the government to control the great corporations like Mitsui and Mitsu Bishi, which work hand in glove with the government, almost as departments of the government. And how do they handle it? By their system of control of these corporations. Internally they charge a price which they fix as a reasonable price for their people, and then, out of resources thus built up, they sell the goods abroad at figures that appal the world; figures that startled Italy so much that Mussolini set up practical prohibitions against Japanese goods; figures that startled England so much that the year before last she had to take measures to deal with the matter, and compromise by giving Japan a quota in her territory; figures that have driven Canadian trade out of the West Indies, out of parts of Africa, and are threatening us in other parts of the world; figures that it is clearly demonstrated are below any possible costs of production. Such systems exist in various countries. What is the use of saying to this parliament and to the hard driven worker of this country: The solution for you, my friend, is the unrestricted play of the law of supply and demand. One might just as well talk about controlling the laws of gravity. These laws are not functioning to-day. My hon. friend cannot put his finger on any country in the world where they are.

But what is the ultimate result of his course, assuming it could be operative? He says:

> If economic forces are allowed free play, the marginal producer—

Get this.

> —the marginal producer will be the first to go.

In other words he introduces the old law, the natural law, I suppose he would call it, of the survival of the fittest.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The jungle law.

Mr. STEVENS: "The jungle law" someone suggests. Well, Mr. Speaker, is Canada to come under the jungle law? As a matter of fact we have it to-day. What I am trying to do, and what others are trying to do who argue as I have argued in this matter, is to induce parliament to recognize that two-thirds I would say, of our people to-day are suffering because certain groups are practising the jungle law. In this report we have called for a recognition of the overwhelming power of concentrated wealth, and the penalties that are suffered by the whole agricultural industry, by the workers in large measure and by the small business men and professional men of this country. That is why we are asking that parliament, as the custodian of the social rights of the people of Canada, should step in and—not regulate and interfere with private business, but stand between predatory interests and the fair operation of competitive measures between citizens of this country.

Now, sir, I want to speak very kindly but very frankly and plainly to my hon. hon. friends on this side of the house. We came into this house five years ago with a large majority. We had unlimited power so far as parliament was concerned.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You used it, too.

Mr. STEVENS: We were swept into office on a wave of distress and depression. It is of no profit now to go back and review what might have happened in the last days of the government of my right hon. friend opposite. We were honoured with the confidence of the people of this country. The question we have to ask ourselves is: Have we been true to that trust? That question calls for answer; that question is going to be answered some time within the next few months.

Let me ask this, Mr. Speaker: Have we solved our domestic problems in Canada? It may be interjected here that there were great international problems challenging the attention of the government. I question whether a country like Canada is justified in giving great external questions precedence over domestic questions; I question that frankly. What have we had externally? We had an international conference on monetary matters. I ask any hon. gentleman in this house: Did anything come out of that, other than a peculiar determination to buy a certain amount of silver? Did anything come out of that of any value to Canada? It is true that the nations of the world said twenty-five per cent gold coverage was sufficient where practice and custom had said forty per cent previously, but will anybody say that the great gold standard policy is any more effective now in bringing happiness, contentment, stability and prosperity to this country than it was five years ago, before that conference was held? Is there anyone, other than Montagu Norman of the Bank of England and a few others who still stick to it, who will say that the gold standard so-called is operating in any country in the world? I think Switzerland is the only country in which it is operating. Holland is boasting that it is operating there; it is not. France has boasted that it has maintained it; it has not. The United States has the largest quantity of gold of any country in the world, and certainly the gold standard is not in operation there. Great Britain has a stabilization fund of some six or seven hundred million pounds, but the gold standard is not operating there. Canada is the second or third largest producer of gold in the world and is in a fortunate position, but the gold standard is not operating here. We have been clinging to these old shibboleths; we have been hanging on tenaciously to stability of currency and things of that kind, and at the same time we have forgotten that there are domestic problems calling for attention and consideration and solution.

What have we done in connection with the unemployment problem? It does not follow that my hon. friends opposite can say that the whole responsibility is on the government, because after all, as I said the other day, this house represents the last stronghold of democracy and it will not do for hon. gentlemen opposite simply to cast that question across the floor of the house. I ask this house: What have we done in regard to unemployment except give relief to people in distress, and generally speaking I think that has been done generously. But, sir, as to the underlying causes of unemployment I ask you: In the last five years has this house spent, I was going to say one consecutive hour, on it, other than some desultory speeches, in an attempt to solve that problem? What have we done with regard to the high interest burden? Has that question been solved? Is it a question that Canada ought to face? Is it a domestic question? True the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and one or two others brought it before parliament and it has been discussed in a desultory sort of way, but the problem of the weight of debt and the high, usurious rates of interest in this country has never once gripped the attention of this house though it is one of the underlying domestic problems that is causing much of the distress in this country.

Well, we come to the wheat question. I cannot discuss that in detail, but I think I am at liberty to refer to it in passing. The wheat question was under consideration at an international conference held more than two years ago. Certainly no results came from that conference, except that there was an attempt to stabilize the movement of wheat in the world, which was quickly abandoned by one country, which threw the whole matter out of gear. The one thing that prevented the wheat question from becoming one of the most tragic problems this country had to face last year was the failure of nature to bring some rain in the United States and the Canadian west, and the fact that there were some grasshoppers there. These factors brought about the postponement of the wheat question, but what have we to-day? You, Mr. Speaker, and others in this house who come from the west, know that there is a likehood of a four hundred million bushel crop in western Canada and a two hundred million bushel carryover. We are setting up a wheat board, that is all very well. Let me pay this tribute to the right hon. Prime Minister: I am in hearty accord with the review of the last four and a half or five years which he gave in the house in such an able manner the other day. But, sir, what of the future? By turning over your problem to a wheat board have you solved the problem? Why, you have not approached a solution. I want to say that in my belief next winter, in all probability, we are going to be confronted with the worst problem in connection with wheat that we have ever been confronted with. I should not like that to be interpreted as a suggestion that the policy that has been followed for the last four years is wrong. There may be some things that might have been done or some things which should have been left undone, but in the main I think everything was done in the best interests of the country at the time, and the western farmers have benefited. Let me say to my hon. friends from the west, from where I come myself, that this autumn we are going to be faced with one of the most difficult problems that ever confronted this country or any government in this country. So do not let us think we have solved the wheat problem.

What about housing? A bill was introduced last night in that connection. I have not had time fully to study it but I was grievously disappointed when I found that only $10,000,000 was provided for housing. Does this house realize the situation? For four years we have been spending probably $60,000,000, $70,000,000 or a little more in construction and reconstruction. The normal expenditure over a long period of years is about $300,000,000. Not long ago I ventured the statement—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not want to interrupt the hon. member but I do not think he should refer to that question. It is before the house in another measure and is not the subject matter of this bill.

Mr. STEVENS: Very well, Mr. Speaker. I will refer briefly, then, to the sweatshops. I have already indicated the abortive nature of the amendments to the criminal code, which were introduced in this house by a minister who damned the bill in its introduction. I have already dealt with vicious trade practices.

In conclusion, sir, I want to say that this parliament—I am speaking of the parliament and not of the government—came into existence five years ago with high expectations. The people trusted it. It has been nurtured throughout largely on dissertations on constitutional law. There has not been a question of importance brought up concerning the domestic affairs of this country in connection with which we have not been confronted with the British North America Act, to such an extent that when you go throughout the country to-day as I do there is scarcely a place where people will not approach you and ask what is meant by the constant resurrection or bringing to the front of the British North America Act. I admit the force of the argument that we must not invade provincial rights; no man has ever heard me advocate that but, as I said the other day, if parliament is to be handcuffed by the British North America Act in heaven's name let us at least attempt to unravel that problem. But we have not done much in regard to it. We have been drugged into quiescence by a few ill-considered bills that were damned when they were introduced by those who introduced them.

Mr. Speaker, I speak with a good deal of regret, but I feel that we have failed to hear the rumblings in the country, the rumblings of discontent, the demands for action, the claims from the farmers, the workers, the business men, industrialists, manufacturers and professional men, all of whom are looking to parliament to find some way out of this difficulty with which we find ourselves confronted. I still believe it is possible for parliament—too late now, perhaps—but I still believe it was possible for parliament to bring some measure of justice, some measure of equity, some laws which would enable men to live one with the other in honest competition, rather than to be subjected to the domineering control of certain industries. I believe, sir, that the ideal of the Canadian people is justice, equity and fair dealing, and I believe the Canadian people will demand of hon. members, as we leave this parliament and face the country, that we answer them as to why it was in this closing session of parliament we have not done more than has been done in these three or four bills which, in my opinion, are wholly inadequate to deal with the difficulties with which we have been confronted.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in 1867 the provinces were united together under a statute known as the British North America Act. This statute constitutes the constitution of the Dominion of Canada. It contemplated a federal, not a legislative union. Under the provisions of that statute, whether we like it or not, we are bound until such time as the statute has been changed, by proper authority.

On May 30, 1919, this House of Commons set up a committee constituting of Messrs. Nicholson (Algoma), Stevens—the hon. member who has just taken his seat—Reid (Mackenzie), Douglas (Strathcona), Davis, Hocken, Sutherland, Fielding, Davidson, Nesbit, McCoig, Sinclair (Queens, P.E.I.), Devlin, Vien and Euler—> for the purpose of inquiring forthwith as to the prices charged throughout Canada for foodstuffs, clothing, fuel and other necessities of life, and as to the rates of profit made thereon by dealers and others concerned in their production, distribution and sale; also as to rentals of dwelling houses in industrial centres of Canada and rates of return of capital invested therein, with power—

And so on.

That committee held many meetings, and made two reports an interim and a final report. I shall refer to the interim report. The committee was presided over by the late George B. Nicholson, and I believe the hon. member who has just taken his seat was at times vice-chairman. The interim report reads in part as follows:

> Tuesday, June 26, 1919. The special committee appointed for the purpose of inquiring forthwith as to the prices charged throughout Canada for foodstuffs, clothing, fuel and other necessities of life, and as to the rates of profit made thereon by dealers and others concerned in their production, distribution and sale, also as to the rentals of dwelling houses in industrial centres of Canada and rates of return of capital invested therein, presented the second report of the said committee.

Then they report that they have examined numbers of witnesses.

> There has come to the attention of your committee evidence in regard to undue profits being made on certain commodities. Your committee in order to provide a means by which a recurrence of such may be prevented and that the public may be protected against unfair practices in trade recommend to the consideration of the house and the government that legislation be enacted at this session of parliament creating a tribunal with power to investigate mergers, trusts, monopolies or organizations of any kind or nature, which tend to limit facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or preventing, limiting or lessening manufacture or production, or fixing a common price, or a resale price, or a common rental, or a common cost of storage, or transportation, or enhancing the price, rental or cost of article, rental, storage or transportation or preventing or lessening competition in or substantially controlling within any particular district, or generally, production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation, insurance, or supply, or otherwise restraining or injuring commerce, or unduly enhancing the price of the necessaries of life, also with regulative power in connection with discriminations in price between different purchasers of commodities, exclusive purchase and sale arrangements, inter-corporate shareholding and interlocking directorates and unfair methods in commerce.

That report is signed by the chairman.

The third report was dated July 5, 1919, and is a comprehensive survey and review of conditions as they had existed in Canada. Those conclusions being somewhat long I shall not take the time this afternoon—indeed I am not able to—to read them at length, beyond saying that the remedy is to be found at page 12 of the report. I shall direct the attention of the house seriously to these remedies or recommendations:

26. The board of commerce. Your committee in their interim report recommended the constitution of a board of commerce, which would continue and extend the work done not only by this committee but by the various controls which the government have put into operation during the war. The publicity given to the investigations of such a board will have a steadying effect. Its powers of regulation applied to trade practices and agreements will speed reform, and large questions of policy where trade tends to combinations and restrictions may be submitted to the board for advisory action.

Cooperation was the next recommendation. Then, "specific remedies for these conditions can only be expressed in general terms." The report goes on to give further details.

What happened? On the strength of that report the then Prime Minister introduced two resolutions to this House of Commons which, in due course, were followed by two bills. Those two bills were given first reading in this house, second reading in this house and third reading in this house, were sent to the Senate and became law. At page 488, of the Journals of the House of Commons for 1919 these words are to be found:

By leave of the house Mr. Meighen obtained leave to introduce the following bills, which were read the first time, and ordered for a second reading at the next sitting of the house, viz.:—

Bill No. 166, an act to constitute a board of commerce for Canada.

Bill No. 167, an act concerning the investigation and restraint of combines, monopolies, trusts and mergers and the withholding and enhancement of the price of commodities.

I shall not follow the references in detail. It will be observed that on the recommendation of the select committee of the House of Commons, of which the hon. member who has just taken his seat was a member, so far as I can find the report was made unanimous. This is a report of a committee considered and approved by both sides of the house. The essential facts in the report may be summarized in two recommendations (1) that a board of commerce with large powers shall be created, and (2) that a statute dealing with monopolies and combines was to be enacted by this parliament.

On the strength of those recommendations Mr. Meighen, the then Prime Minister, introduced these bills to the House of Commons, and those who are desirous of reading them will find them in the statutes for that year. They are extremely comprehensive; they are extremely drastic. They attempt to do everything that has been suggested here this afternoon may be done—everything.

As I said at the threshold of my observations this country has a constitution; it is a federal union. Those two statutes in due course went before the privy council, and the privy council decided both of them were bad. Those are the facts. That constitution, not having been changed, meantime the law of this country as it affects these matters is to be found in those two cases. Therefore a government must do one of two things, it must invite parliament to pass a statute which it knows is illegal and which will be set aside at the first opportunity, or it must ensure that there will be some amendment to the constitution in order to render constitutional that which has been declared unconstitutional.

Now just let us for a moment look at it because those two cases have had a tremendous effect upon certain things that I said and that I believed in then and still believe in to-day. I have not changed my mind, but I am going to point out what these cases mean. There is the board of commerce case. I am not going to bother the House of Commons this afternoon to read the decision of the privy council with respect to that case. But there was a court set up by this parliament with all the regulatory powers that have been suggested this afternoon should be vested in some board created by this parliament. The privy council says you cannot do that thing. There was also the statute against combines and monopolies, which also was set aside. Fortunately this later statute as it was developed in more recent years was held to be intra vires by the privy council, and it is unnecessary for me to do more than to say that part of the effort made in 1919 has been accomplished by the effort that has been made successfully in the present combines act.

Those being the facts, let us look at this matter fairly. It is no good to appeal to prejudice; it is no good to inveigh in passionate terms with respect to evils, if this tribunal cannot deal with those evils. All I can say is that there are certain evils that I believed could be dealt with, and I referred to them in certain radio addresses, and I did say that I would endeavour to implement the recommendations of the price spreads commission, but I of course believed that the price spreads commission would at least recommend legislation that was intra vires of this parliament. I believed that it would at least recommend legislation that it knew could be dealt with by this parliament. I believed that it would at least take some cognizance of the report made in 1919 and of the two statutes which the Prime Minister of that day introduced to implement it and which were declared in due course to be bad, invalid, and ultra vires, and I stand by what I then said. Within the constitutional power of this parliament we have submitted to this house measures that we believe are within the competence of this parliament, subject to what I shall say presently, and which embodied the effect and purport of the decisions of the privy council with respect to the legislation on the recommendations made in 1919.

My view is that the constitution of this country must be changed. I have held that view strongly. But it is all right to say you believe in that. You must remember this in a country like ours: This is a country in which you have diverse races. You have minority rights to consider. You are not like a country where your entire population is of one race, speaking one language, and with one set of customs. You must have regard to these facts when you talk about amending the constitution. The constitution cannot be changed in a single day because some man finds that he cannot do under the present constitution what he would like to do. The constitution of Canada was arrived at as a compromise. It was arrived at after many matters had been discussed, after many negotiations and those who are familiar with the agitation that has been carried on in the maritime provinces cannot but recall that in the city of Saint John and elsewhere it has been contended that the constitution as it now stands was a departure from the understanding between the parties who negotiated the terms of the constitution.

I have endeavoured to discuss the question of amendments to the constitution on more than one occasion with representatives of the provinces. The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition called together a conference, they sat for a week discussing the question in a solemn and serious effort to arrive at a conclusion as to what steps might be taken to amend the constitution and at the end they had arrived at no definite conclusion because there are problems that you meet at the very threshold of any such discussion that make it very difficult not to create an air of suspicion with respect to rights that are prized more dearly than anything else in the world. It is so necessary that we should keep that fact in mind in dealing with a problem of this kind. I have endeavoured to point out that anyone dealing with this matter must take cognizance of what has taken place, of the effort made by parliament and of the failure of parliament to accomplish the end aimed at because of insufficiency of legislative jurisdiction.

Now let us go a step further and deal with the report that is now before the house called the price spreads report, as it relates to the legislation in this bill which is now before the house for its third reading. I suppose I must in the very nature of things make a few observations with respect to one or two matters that have been referred to.

How can it be possible for any member of this house to stand up in his place and say seriously: Why don't you pass an amendment to the criminal code and deal with these matters that way? Well, the counsel who argued the board of commerce and combines cases in 1919 urged that same argument. They are all dealt with, and in the proprietary medicine case Lord Atkin dealt with this problem. I may point out that the present chief justice of Canada speaking for the privy council in the celebrated reciprocal insurance case pointed out that it was ultra vires of this parliament to make anything it pleases a crime. The chief justice in reading the judgment of all the court pointed out—I am speaking from memory—that when parliament endeavoured to make it a crime for an insurance agent to solicit business for a non-registered company, a company that had not come within the provisions of the insurance act, that that was ultra vires of parliament and must be treated as such, and he set aside that part of the statute as being invalid because it was an interference with and an encroachment upon provincial rights, and disguising the encroachment upon that power by the assertion that a certain combination of conditions constituted a crime. Now I have to meet that fact. Whether we like it or not we have to meet it, and if I assumed with the aid of counsel that the price spreads commission was going to make recommendations within the law, I think I was perfectly right in assuming it would when I made the statement I did in January. What is more, to the limit of the power of parliament we have invited parliament to pass measures that will give redress within our competence.

To deal for a moment with criminal law, I would be the last to say that men who are trained in the law have any peculiar monopoly of judgment with respect to any particular matter, but they at least are trained to know something of the principles that govern courts in deciding cases, and it is their business at least to point out, if they happen to be in government, to those with whom they are associated, the Minister of Justice and others with whom they can discuss it, what constitutes the limitations upon our constitutional powers. It is so easy for those who do not know to assume a power which does not exist. It is so difficult at times to make the ordinary man realize a power does not exist. It is so easy for one to say: Why cannot you make that a crime? I confess that I am one of those who in my younger days believed that parliament could make anything a crime. I thought that power did exist, and when the privy council declared it did not, I had to revise my views. That is one of the things lawyers have to do, revise their views from time to time as decisions are made as to what rules shall govern in determining whether or not a particular statute is within or without the powers of parliament. Leaving criminal law for the moment I desire to deal with one other matter.

It is said, for instance, that the statutes which are now before the house fail to implement the promises that have been made with respect to what parliament would be asked to do, and particular reference has been made to the live stock industry and the live stock statute. Well, sir, there is perhaps no one single matter that engaged the attention of the Department of Justice more than that, and the difficulty of the price spreads commission lies in the fact that it did not adequately understand the extent to which existing legislation granted a remedy. That is the real trouble. For instance, on the question of the difficulties with respect to live stock I hold in my hand a memorandum submitted to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) by the Department of Agriculture, and I am going to read part of it:

"As a step toward the solution of some, at least, of the problems...." of the producers of live stock, the royal commission on price spreads recommends that a live stock board be established under appropriate jurisdiction.

It is evident that the suggested duties of such a board, as summarized in section 15 on page xxii of the report, have been outlined with but scant recognition of the extent to which many of them are now being performed by the Department of Agriculture, and without consideration of the possibility of providing for the performance of practically all of the remainder through minor amendments to existing legislation, more particularly the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

It is the considered opinion of the department that the creation of a live stock board for the purposes outlined would result in overlapping of, and confusion in respect of administrative authority, and that it would seriously retard progress which, through constructive effort over a long period of years, has been made in encouraging the production of improved live stock and in safeguarding the producer in the marketing of it. Increased momentum in the direction of the objectives defined in the commission's recommendations can, in the opinion of the department, best be attained under authority of the Natural Products Marketing Act and of the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, amended where necessary to provide for extension of this authority.

Dealing specifically with the duties of the proposed live stock board as outlined by the commission, the comment of this department is as follows:

"(a) The prompt dissemination of information to producers and the trade generally, in respect to production, marketing, stocks, and prices, both export and domestic:"

Through the markets intelligence service of the live stock branch, market information is now assembled by telegraph from all stockyards in the country, and by cable from Great Britain. This information is supplied to the daily press and to broadcasting stations. It covers:—numbers of all classes of live stock marketed in each yard, price ranges, grade by grade, movements within the dominion and on export, comparisons with previous years, comments on price tendencies, et cetera, and, in the form of weekly summaries, monthly reports and annual reviews, is available to producers and to the trade.

"(b) Administrative jurisdiction in matters connected with all phases of live stock marketing and in connection with disputes between producers, processors, et cetera:"

Under the authority of the Live Stock Products Act, the department has for years exercised administrative jurisdiction in matters connected with live stock marketing. This authority has been extended from time to time to provide for increased encouragement of, and protection to producers, and, as indicated in dealing with sections 1 to 14 in the commission's recommendations, is capable of further extension.

Section 17 (1) of the Natural Products Marketing Act provides that "The minister may, at the request of the board or upon his own initiative authorize an investigation into the cost of production, wages, prices, spread, trade practices, methods of financing, management policies, grading, transportation and other matters in relation to the production and marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of any natural or regulated product." In addition, under section 4 (b) of the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, authority is given to the governor in council to make regulations prescribing "the manner in which complaints against the operation, maintenance, or management of stockyards shall be made and investigated:"

Again, under section 4 (j) of this act, authority is given for the making of regulations prescribing "the manner in which complaints against live stock exchanges, cooperative associations, commission merchants, dealers, or members of live stock exchanges, shall be made and investigated:"

There is the power which has existed for years. Why pass another statute which will overlap the existing laws? As is known to hon. members, the difficulty lies in the lack of enforcement of the laws of Canada; it is not in connection with laws, which if slightly amended, as has been done in this case, will meet the situation to which the price spreads reports direct attention. The difficulty has been that no one has been charged with the enforcement of these laws and that is why provision is made for a director of public prosecutions in the bill now before the house for third reading. The following is the next recommendation:

"(c) Licensing and supervision of truckers, dealers and export packers; where necessary in cooperation with provincial authorities;"

Under sections 7, 8 and 10 of the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, authority is given for regulations under which commission men and dealers in live stock are now licensed. Suggestions as to how, under this authority, the basis of licensing could be modified to more closely correspond with the recommendations of the commission were made in dealing with recommendation 4. Regulations established under authority of section 4 of the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act now provide for the licensing of packers in respect to the exporting of bacon to Great Britain. The licensing of truckers, as implied in the committee's recommendation, involves cooperation with provincial authorities, and the manner in which effect could be given to this phase of the recommendation to the fullest degree was covered in dealing with recommendation 5.

"(d) Adequate inspection of all marketing stages and action to correct abuses:"

The Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act is primarily designed to provide for adequate inspection of all stages in the marketing of live stock, and to correct abuses in the system. Under the authority of the Natural Products Marketing Act, producers now have the opportunity of exercising as much influence as may be found possible to this end.

"(e) Cooperation with producers, processors and the trade generally, to ensure as far as possible a balance between production and available markets;"

This recommendation implies regulation of production which, in the case of live stock, can possibly never be accomplished except to a very minor extent. Under the authority of the Natural Products Marketing Act, producers now have the opportunity to accomplish, indirectly as much as may be advisable in this regard.

"(f) To encourage the organization of producers of live stock for regular and orderly marketing;"

Under the Natural Products Marketing Act, producers now have every opportunity to organize to promote regular and orderly marketing.

Last year we passed the Natural Products Marketing Act to deal with that very thing. Why duplicate it? Why place upon the statute book something that already exists?

"(g) Improvement of quality of all live stock;"

Three branches of the department—the live stock branch, the experimental farms branch and the health of animals branch—in cooperation with the several provincial departments of agriculture and agricultural colleges, have been for years, and are now engaged in numerous activities designed to improve the quality of live stock of all classes throughout the dominion.

Does anyone suggest that we require a new law to deal with that recommendation? Does anyone suggest that there has not been upon the statute books of this dominion and the various provinces ample legislation to deal with that? The recommendations continue:

"(h) The formation of a uniform policy on extenral marketing, with a view not only to promoting new, but also retaining and developing, existing markets;"

Government policy in relation to external trade, rather than the administrative functions of any board or department, will be involved in giving effect to this recommendation.

It is known that we have people in England for the purpose of maintaining the quality of our products under this very act and for the purpose of making our standards what they should be. The bill now before the house for third reading provides for the creation of Canada standards similar to the British standards which they have in Great Britain.

"(i) The stabilization of supplies, and the regulation of quality to each particular market;"

Under the Natural Products Marketing Act, producers now have the opportunity to go as far as may be found possible in stabilization of supplies and in regulation of quality to each particular market.

"(j) The utilization of all available means to secure fair returns to the primary producers of good stock."

The establishment of adequate grading services is implied by this recommendation. Such services, in relation to certain products, are now in effect under authority of the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act, and provision for the establishment of others may be made by minor amendments to the act, as already recommended in dealing with recommendations 7, 8 and 11. In addition to this provision, there is the possibility of developing relative grade values under the Natural Products Marketing Act.

"16. The live stock board to make a careful survey of the situation in the British market, with a view to:—

(a) Ascertaining to what extent Canadian packers and the British bacon committee operate as a mutual body; and

(b) To revise the grading of export bacon so as to insure the highest possible price for Canadian "selects" and "bacon" hogs; and

(c) To secure such a system of distribution as will satisfactorily meet the requirements of the British trade, while at the same time insuring full and adequate protection to the producer of hogs in Canada."

(a) Any survey of the situation in the British market which may be found advisable may now be made under authority of part II of the Natural Products Marketing Act.

These surveys have been going on in England both under the live stock act and the marketing act and reports are coming in week by week as to what should be done to impove conditions there.

(b) Any revision of the grading of export bacon which may be found advisable involves merely modification of regulations now established under authority of section 4 of the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

(c) The department now has plans under way to appoint representatives to Great Britain, and to other countries to which Canadian agricultural products are exported, in order that products going forward from Canada may be checked as to grade, condition and suitability for the trade for which they are intended. Such representatives, who will possess agricultural experience and training, in addition to technical qualifications for market work, will also be in a position to advise the department with regard to market requirements and possibilities as well as trade practices, and in general will endeavour to promote satisfactory trade relationships.

That report was made by the Department of Agriculture to the Minister of Justice, and upon it the minister prepared the legislation which has been introduced into this house to amend the live stock act. The amendments suggested plus the provisions which now exist under the marketing act and the live stock act and the relevant acts to which reference is made by the deputy minister provide complete provisions to deal with every recommendation made by the price spreads commission. There is not a single one which has been left out. Why should we duplicate them and put them again upon the statute book? Why talk about abortive legislation? Why attempt to belittle the efforts which have been made to give effect to the commission's report within the ambit of our power under the constitution? Why do this when every recommendation of substance is covered by existing legislation or the proposed amendments thereto? That is the question to ask and that is the question we must consider. I say frankly that the Minister of Justice was careful to take advice from eminent counsel upon that matter and also with respect to the powers that might be exercised by this parliament. In the bills that have been before the house dealing with that matter plus the bill that is now before the house for third reading, dealing with standards and the maintenance of them, every recommendation made in the pages of that report has been dealt with, the legislation being based on that assumption.

As regards industry, it will be remembered what the report of 1919 was. I have already pointed out what the decisions of the court were upon that legislation. I have not time this afternoon to read to the house the details of the legislation of 1919 that fell as being unconstitutional, but I suggest to hon. members if they will take the trouble to look at the statutes of that year, read the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines Act of that day and then read the decision of the court as to their invalidity and unconstitutionality, hon. members will realize that an honest effort was made at that time by the government of that day to place upon the statute books laws that would meet these very recommendations and that have been declared invalid. This government does not ask the house again to pass invalid statutes and create the idea that we have formed a board with powers to do so and so when the privy council said that such a board would be absolutely without power.

I go further; I wonder how many members have taken the trouble to read the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the NRA code case. I wonder if they have considered the relevancy of the reasoning in that case to ours. It must not be forgotten that the United States was a federal union an experiment long before we came into being, and frankly it was admitted that except as to the residue of powers vested in the federal union established in Canada distribution of legislative power was in the case of the Canadian union similar to that of the federal union of the United States. That was admitted on all hands in 1867. What did the opinion of Chief Justice Hughes and the shorter opinion of Mr. Justice Cardoza point out? That you could not delegate to a body set up by congress the power to make laws; that that rests with congress and with parliament and not with a body thus created; that you could not determine the question of legal ethics and give them a real sanction. But what we have done in this house is this. Once we create a body with certain powers, then ancillary to the administration of those powers, that body may pass certain regulations, always within the ambit of the powers conferred, as will enable the act to be made workable and effective. That is the law alike in the United States and in Canada. Why should we be invited to create something we know will be without power, invalid, and without the right to exercise the powers suggested? No one for a moment will say that that should be done. I know this much, that that is the position this government has taken with respect to these matters. It is easy to endeavour to arouse public opinion and to say that the government of the day has failed to discharge its duties; but if it has done all it may legally do, it lies in the judgment of no good citizen to call upon a good government to do that which is known to be illegal. That is the position. Is that not the very view which the former Minister of Trade and Commerce himself took in 1923, when he said:

This is one of the greatest problems facing economists to-day. It is cropping up everywhere. It has cropped up in the agricultural conditions committee, in the banking and commerce committee. In the consideration of any of the great problems of the day this question is the most perplexing one that arises. Yet through the medium of many of the large combinations of business in this country that evil has been, I will not say eliminated, but reduced, and the stabilization of both production and distribution has been secured. Now, why should we seek to erect that into a crime?—for that is what parliament, in effect, does, and it is the feature of the bill above all others that I object to. I believe, sir, that this bill is based upon false premises. Any given action is not a crime simply because parliament may choose so to describe it.

Those were the words of the former Minister of Trade and Commerce in 1923. He continued:

It must in itself be a criminal act. The judgment to which the right hon. Prime Minister has referred is filled with extracts from decisions of the privy council and of eminent jurists throughout the empire, not only in the case of the board of commerce, not only in the case of the Wholesale Grocers of Ontario, but in the case of Australia vs. the Adelaide Steamship Company and many others. It is set forth most clearly that merely to declare, through the criminal code, a thing to be a crime does not necessarily make it a crime—and that is what I particularly wish to emphasize to-day. The act of combination is not an offence.

That is equally true to-day as it was then, because the courts have gone further since then than they did prior to that time. They have declared in terms that may not be misunderstood that it is not open for this parliament to say that a given act is a crime merely because somebody feels it should be a crime. After all the code is not based on what one person may think should be a crime; another may think the opposite. There is a general trend of opinion with respect to that based, as has been said, generally upon the theory of the Ten Commandments that have found expression in the criminal laws of all countries. The growth of the criminal law in England, the growth of it by statute under the code as we have it in Canada are but exemplifications of that idea. But to say that any given action is a crime simply because parliament may choose so to describe it, was unsound in the opinion of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in 1919, just as it is to-day.

One step further. As regards stabilization we have not gone any further by our action of the other day than we did before. We have given power by order in council on proclamation to deal with a certain fund for the purpose of stabilization of exchange. I can only say this. Dealing with the financial problems of this country, if I had to deal with them again under the same conditions, I would deal with them as I have done. I say that to the house, and at least during four years of that time the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was a party to those policies.

One step further. There are problems connected with housing. In 1919 there were problems connected with housing. They should be more acute now than they were then; but when the Dominion of Canada makes available for certain purposes the sum that it has, it has gone just as far as it can under the present financial conditions of the country. When I hear statements made as I do frequently as to why we do not spend large sums of money, my answer is: We have not the money to spend. When I am told that I should start the printing presses to provide the money, I say: I am not prepared to do that. When the attack was made a few moments ago about interest rates, I wonder whether it is possible that there is only one man in Canada who has not read of the reductions that have been obtained in interest rates through the efforts largely made through the Department of Finance to induce the banks and other monetary institutions to pay smaller rates upon deposits until in the end we have much the lowest rate on treasury bills that have ever been known in the Dominion of Canada.

But the question is different when you have to deal with the problem of interest rates on past securities. I am not talking now about the nation's securities, for within the time that they may be funded, if they are callable, it is always open for the nation to call them and exchange them for securities at a lesser rate of interest, exercising the power given. But if there is no power, I will give the house an example of what may happen. The other evening the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) asked a question as to the funding of securities. It was answered, and within twenty-four hours there came from the High Commissioner in London a cable asking whether anything had been said about the compulsory retirement of securities at a lower rate of interest without there being any callable provision. Someone had misunderstood what had been said, and there was great anxiety in the city of London as to whether we were going to refund our obligations in that way. I merely mention that as an illustration of how acute these matters may become. I trust I shall not be misunderstood when I say that anything that smacks of repudiation of the obligations of this country, this young community cannot afford to permit. It may sound very hard, but for the Dominion of Canada solemnly to determine that it would not pay the interest on its debt except at three per cent when the bond said four per cent would be the ruin of Canada. That is all. Much more true is that with respect to private obligations, because once it gets abroad that we are prepared to enact legislation, whether it be provincial or federal, that destroys the contract made between the borrower and the lender—destroys it I say—and substitutes for it something else, that moment we have become what is familiarly knowns as "welchers." Let us face this thing like men, that is all there is about it. There is no getting away from it, we might as well be frank.

But what we did was this; we went further than many people thought we should, but not further than I thought we should; we availed ourselves of the provisions of the bankruptcy clause of section 91 and made it possible for those in dire distress to effect a compromise that would commend itself if necessary to the judgment of a court of review. Could anything go further than that and still be legal? Before we did it the Supreme Court of Canada declared that such a proposal had legal validity. Thereupon we had the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act which conferred upon those authorized the power to make settlements or compromises in the nature of bankruptcy proceedings. Every province of Canada except one has oined in cooperation to permit such debts to be the subject matter of adjudication. In one province an injunction has been obtained and proceedings stopped on the ground that it was an undue exercise of power by the parliament of Canada, and we shall withdraw the operation of the act from that province, so that there will be no question in that regard.

The student in the future who looks back upon the last few years will find that more was done to reduce the rate of interest in Canada with respect to our national obligations, and reflected also in the price of money elsewhere, than at any period of its history since confederation. The other day we were able to borrow money on treasury bills at less than two per cent. I am sorry to say that because of what happened in one particular area it has been suggested by certain institutions that the rates of interest be raised. But when we talk of the burden of interest it comes down to the question of increasing the price of primary commodities by any means within our power so that the purchasing power of money will bear some relation to the purchasing power when the obligations were created. Everyone knows that. I recall that under the will of a testatrix a great insurance company had to provide a sum of money which was to be set aside so as to produce a given revenue, with the exhaustion of the fund at a given time. The chancellor of the state of New Jersey, the question having been referred to that court, wrote a most elaborate judgment in which he pointed out that in his opinion interest rates, the price of money, would decline; and therefore a very large sum was set up for the purpose. Within three years interest rates began to climb. When I say that one of the richest shipping companies of the world was paying six per cent upon a mortgage made within the last twenty years in the city of New York I am but stating something well known to everyone. To-day the rate would be much less than that, yet that rate must be paid because it was the going rate at the time. If obligations are created without provision for the reduction of the rate with the increase in the purchasing power of money then the contract must be observed if we are to maintain the character of our people. I pointed out the other day that one of the South American republics had not paid the interest on their external debt, although there is quite a boom on in that country. I could point out that in other countries similar conditions have existed. But my point is that any attack that can be made against the administration of this country's affairs during the last few years certainly cannot be made on the question of the reduction of the rate of interest.

As far as debt is concerned, I think most of us will agree that this country is overburdened with debt.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think any man will question that. I well remember a former minister of the crown saying to me at the time of the war, Germany must pay this, for we will never be able to. I have never forgotten it, it was a very sound statement. This country has a debt, incurred directly as a result of our engaging in European hostilities, the annual interest on which is much more than the whole national debt of this country for many years after it came into being. That is a serious fact. But to state the fact is not to remedy it, to call attention to it does not cure it. Attention has been called to it in this house and will be. I believe that by 1937 someone must undertake the great problem of a Canadian conversion.

But if we are going to have a conversion there is only one way it can be done, and that is by maintaining our credit.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: If we lost our national character, which is our credit, then we shall never be able to make the conversion. The one object that this government has had in mind more than any other in dealing with our financial problems has been so to conduct our affairs that reasonable and honest men may say that we have treated our creditors as honest men do; that we have so utilized our legislative powers that it could be said that we had encouraged men to be honest and pay their debts according to their promises.

But bankruptcy intervenes, and bankruptcy is not anything new in law, we know what it is founded on, we know what it goes back to; and we did conceive the thought, after a case had been submitted to the supreme court of Canada, that we could deal with these cases in the manner in which they have been dealt with. If there is one thing more than any other that has brought relief to the Canadian farmer it has been the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Now with respect to other bills I do not propose to say more than this; that within the ambit of our powers we have offered to this parliament legislation that is within our constitutional right. The attack made upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) because he ventured to point out, as I think it was his duty to do for a reason I shall presently give, that doubt had been expressed by counsel to whom the case had been referred as to the validity of the legislation, was unfair because that was what you would expect any attorney general of Canada to do in view of past experience of this parliament. I think any man would say that was the least an attorney general of Canada could do. Why? Because the report of a commission was before the house, and I pointed out the other day that we had made up our minds within our legal rights to implement its recommendations. The minister was obviously bound in good faith to communicate to this house the fact that doubts had been expressed to him as to the validity of the bill, not for the purpose of making it abortive legislation, not for the purpose of saying it was anaemic, but for the purpose of keeping faith as an honest man with those who looked to him as Minister of Justice for guidance. Those who remember what was said about the Board of Commerce Act in 1919—look it up in the debates—will recall that doubts were expressed with respect to it, but the government proceeded with it in order that the question might be settled. So with respect to this legislation, the government submitted the legislation to the house. And when we come to the Companies Act, about which different opinions have been held for the last half century and will continue to be held, as to the best means of effecting the desired ends, the minister submitted that to the house and said: It is your bill as much as mine, let me have your suggestions, I only say that there is a provision in it which I believe if I were practising law I could have set aside. That was not any lack of good faith, it was because he wanted this house to realize that in dealing with legislation which was doubtful the house should have the benefit of the views of counsel who had been consulted for the purpose of determining whether parliament was within its rights in enacting it. It is all very well to say that people are sick of hearing about the British North America Act. We have had several illustrations of what it means when people and parliaments and legislatures do not observe its provisions. We have had the insurance references and other references which I could mention. We had the board of commerce case, the combines case, and matters of that sort.

My duty, as I conceive it, is to offer legislation to this house for enactment which the Minister of Justice, with the aid of counsel whom he has consulted, believes to be constitutional and valid. If there be a doubt then we are willing that the house should take the responsibility of enacting it if they think it desirable, but it is our duty to tell the house of that doubt. Would it be right for the Minister of Justice to conceal these facts and say to the house: Here is a valid legislative enactment that you may pass; or is it right and proper that he should say that up to a certain point there seems to be no doubt, the courts have decided that we have the power, but when it gets beyond that there is doubt and uncertainty; I merely say that these opinions have been expressed to me as I have expressed them to you.

lessness is upon us. Let there be no misunderstanding of that. Those who read history and understand its implications know that the first step towards fascism in Europe was what? The first step towards dictatorship in Europe was what? It was a prejudicial appeal to the little man; that was first. Then followed the inevitable utter disregard of constitutional limitations, the utter disregard of constitutional liberties and the utter disregard of consitutional freedom. Sir, there is a way by which this country may obtain jurisdiction for this parliament to deal with these matters. It well may be that the parliament of Canada should have greater powers than it possesses; there is a difference of opinion with respect to that matter, a very earnest difference of opinion. In these days of stress and strain some men have concluded that if we had one central parliament with county councils instead of provincial legislatures all would be well. It may be so. It may be that the readjustment of the financial position of the provinces and the municipalities may bring limitations upon the exercise of power by the provincial legislatures. That may well be, but it cannot be brought about by endeavouring to induce the people to believe that parliament may do what the courts say it may not do. I repeat that the third branch of government, the judiciary, becomes tremendously important. That is why I have said that in the ultimate analysis we always have to depend upon the conclusions and decisions of the courts. That is why in the end, if we are a law abiding people who believe in reform and not in revolution, we must proceed precept by precept, line upon line, to the end that in an orderly and legal manner we may accomplish the ends we have in mind. But it is never right, it never can be right, to induce those who do not understand to believe that a parliament has power and will not exercise it out of mere obstinacy or fear. That serves no purpose, except to induce people to believe that there is a body of legislators sitting in this house some of whom are less honest than one, and that therefore they will not do that which one would do.

Mr. POULIOT: Name them.

Mr. BENNETT: I spare the hon. gentleman's feelings; I might name him. I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that the only method by which we will ever be able in this parliament to possess the powers it is suggested we should exercise is by that change in our constitutional fabric that may be brought about by a constitutional conference. As I have pointed out, there was a constitutional conference in the years prior to 1867, a conference that was not limited to men of one party, at which they met together and discussed how they might be able to bring about the union of these provinces of British North America. If we desire to change this constitution we can do it in an orderly and proper manner, but until we have done it let us, as loyal and law abiding citizens, be bound by the courts of the country that have been set up for the purpose of deciding how far we may go and where our proud hand must be stayed.

That is the position which I submit to this house as the governing principle that has determined the actions taken by this government during the last few months in dealing with these problems. I do point out that even if we stay here for the rest of the summer we are content to enact legislation that lies within our competence. When suggestions come that are within the law, according to the advice of competent counsel, for instance, when the Companies Act is under consideration, I for one shall be glad to hear them. This very bill, the third reading of which we are now considering, was amended in one particular, for example, owing to a suggestion made by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young), who thought that wider publicity should be given. I at once said I believed that was a sound thing to do and an amendment was introduced providing that the public who may be interested might have an opportunity to be heard before any agreement as contemplated between producers should receive the sanction of the commission.

It has been said that the tariff board has not the power to undertake this task because it is busy. All I can say is that the chairman of that board has said that he feels that the board is able to undertake this task. We did not ask this house to give the tariff board authority to deal with these matters until we knew that they thought, at least, that it was within their power and their competence to do so so far as time was concerned. More than that, we cannot and will not ask this parliament to set up a body that has the power to enact laws, for that is a delegation of power that has not been made constitutional as matters now stand. This parliament must enact such legislation, and the regulations framed under it may indeed be made by any body, and the body has been set up under the act, the third reading of which is now under consideration. This act gives effect to every principle that should be given effect to within the legal competence of this parliament under the price spreads report, so called, with respect to the matters dealt with; when taken with the other statutes to which I have alluded, and with which I will not deal at length this afternoon, it will be found that every recommendation that is within our legal competence has been given effect to. I regret if the manner in which that has been done does not commend itself to the judgment of all the members of that commission, but there is no rule that provides that you must enact legislation that pleases every member of a commission. There is no rule that calls upon this parliament to enact legislation in the terms of a recommendation, unless indeed the recommendation is legal. For as sixteen years ago those recommendations were made in good faith and were found to be the basis of invalid and unconstitutional legislation, we trust that in the meantime, with sixteen years of experience with the decisions of the courts, we have avoided the pitfalls that were pointed out by the privy council.

I do submit to this house, in asking for the third reading of this bill, that in this measure we have made an earnest effort—not the last word but an earnest effort—to attain the end in view. If it happens that all these ends are not attained at one fell swoop I am always content to remember that the development of British institutions, of the very institution which we enjoy to-day, as well as of our common law, has been here a little and there a litttle, precept upon precept, line upon line, until the growth and development of common sense has found expression in legislation reflecting the will and purpose of the people.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the Prime Minister's eloquent defence of the present legislation there are many of us who recognize the hopeless inadequacy of the bill as it comes before us for third reading. We feel, too, that it is far from implementing the report of the price spreads commission. I always enjoy listening to the Prime Minister's speeches, but I have a feeling that as a great advocate he might almost as easily argue on the other side and be equally convincing. He makes use of a great many well rounded phrases and catch words which often becloud rather than clarify the issue before the house. I believe that was the case in the speech to which we have just listened.

I must say that the speaker who preceded the right hon. gentleman, the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) made a speech with much of which I very heartily concur. He gave an indictment of the existing business practices which was not in any sense answered by the Prime Minister. Indeed the Prime Minister was so busy talking about constitutional questions, difficulties and limitations that he did not really get around to a consideration of the great evils besetting the people of Canada to-day. At least in part these evils have been set forth in the report of the price spreads commission, and I do not intend to take the time to enumerate them. I believe we all realize however that we cannot long endure present conditions.

This and other bills which have been introduced by the government, professing to implement the report of the price spreads commission, do not I submit begin to touch the evils of existing practices. More than that, the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce has given an indictment of the proposed legislation which I believe maintains its strength, notwithstanding all that the Prime Minister has said. Again I do not wish to review the ground traversed by the ex-minister, but I must say that he has expressed to-day what is in the minds of a great many people in Canada, namely, that notwithstanding these constitutional and financial difficulties we cannot go on as we are for very much longer. He has expressed, too, the disappointment of large numbers of Canadian people in the legislation now before the house.

Further than that, I quite agree with what he said concerning Liberal theories. It seems to me that the Liberal position with regard to these bills has been anything but justifiable on the part of people who are—as they are—making a bid for power within the next few months. We have yet to learn what the Liberal policy is. For months, at this session of parliament, the legislative program of the Conservative party has been under criticism. I believe the Liberal party are quite right in criticizing, but we have not yet been given any alternative policy. It seems to me that position cannot be justified. In this instance the Liberals simply go back to the old theory of free competition, individual liberty, and that kind of thing at a time, as the ex-minister has pointed out, when those phrases simply do not apply and when certainly they will not solve our problem.

I believe I should not have ventured however to say anything at this stage, had not the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce taken the ground that there had been very little discussion in this house with regard to some of the most important problems with which, in his judgment, we could deal. He spoke about questions of currency, and indicated that we should have considered the stabilization of currency; in fact he indicated that we should have had it five years ago. Well, at that time the present ex-minister was a minister. I do not think we can very well overlook that fact. I suppose that according to conventions he could not reveal cabinet secrets, but if he did not agree with the government in vital matters of this kind he could and should have, resigned. He spoke about the unemployment problem and I believe left the impression that it had not been seriously considered by the house. Perhaps it was not seriously considered, but that was not the fault of any hon. members in this corner of the chamber, at least. Proposals were made to the house, and discussion was either refused by the government or our motions were definitely voted down.

On March 31, 1931, my colleague, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) moved the adjournment of the house to call the attention of the government to the distressing conditions which had arisen out of the unemployment situation. Objections were taken by the government on technical grounds. Later in the same day, upon a motion to go into supply the question was again raised, and several hon. members participated in the discussion. But, despite the growing seriousness of the situation no Conservative member or spokesman of the government thought the situation sufficiently serious to say a word respecting the unemployment problem. Where was the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce when that discussion was in progress? He might have then, as he has done recently, called attention of the whole country to the situation. I am not blaming him for his recent action. I am glad he has had the courage to take that action, but it seems to me it might very well have been taken earlier. His action having been taken at this late period I do not think he ought in any way to minimize the efforts made by others to try to bring this question to the attention of the house and country.

Again, on this very question of unemployment, on February 5, 1934, my colleague from North Winnipeg brought in a resolution stating that:

> In the opinion of this house, the government should take into immediate consideration the necessity of reducing the hours of labour of those engaged in industry, and also increase the purchasing power of the masses of our people in order that they may absorb the goods produced, thereby creating a more equitable distribution of our wealth production.

That resolution was finally accepted by the government, but I ask: What was done to implement its terms? Nothing at all. What was done by the government—and for a year after that the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member of the government—to create a more equitable distribution of our wealth production? Nothing was done at that time and I submit nothing will be done through the various bills now under consideration. As the debate proceeded I have been glancing over a list I have of some motions that were introduced from this section of the house bearing on economic problems. There is the one I have referred to on unemployment in 1931 in that same year, one on unemployment insurance, which was talked out; one on economic research, which was also talked out; one on the necessity of amending the British North America Act, which was withdrawn after discussion. The Prime Minister says that we can proceed in a constitutional way, but the necessity of constitutional change was definitely brought up in this house in the very first year after this government took office. It was recognized then that it was highly desirable that we should have constitutional change. The Minister of Justice promised that we would have a conference to deal with this very matter. It is true that there was an interprovincial conference where the matter was mentioned almost incidentally, but nothing definitely was done about it, and now after five years of inactivity along that line we are told that we have to call a constitutional conference. Surely with the Prime Minister insisting on the necessity of proceeding in a constitutional way and at the same time recognizing the seriousness of the constitutional problem, he should have called that conference five years ago. At this late stage, he suggests a constitutional conference and holds up the British North America Act as a reason for not bringing in effective remedies.

In that same year, 1931, we introduced a resolution with regard to a national central bank; a resolution dealing with banking and credit, the very matter mentioned by the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce; also a subamendment on the budget to abandon the gold standard. The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce talks about the need for stabilization and currency reform, but in this corner of the house we have been urging that, and urging it steadily, for the last five years. Again in that same year we moved a motion on the unemployment situation; also an act to amend the Bank Act. All these were moved in 1931.

In the succeeding year, 1932, when the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member of the government, we introduced a motion for a social and economic research council to study distribution, purchasing power, exchange and the unemployment question. That motion was agreed to but nothing was done. Once more we introduced a resolution on unemployment urging the reduction of the hours of labour. This as other similar resolutions was negatived by the government of which the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce was still a member. We introduced a motion on banking, currency and credit, which was talked out. I myself had the honour of introducing that year the first motion that I presented to this house on the cooperative commonwealth, our plan for dealing with the problems that face us. It was talked out. In that same year we had a subamendment to the budget calling for the nationalization of our finance, which was defeated. We had another motion on unemployment, an amendment on going into supply, which was of course negatived.

In the next year I again introduced a motion on the cooperative commonwealth and the Conservatives brought in a motion adjourning the debate, thus effectively preventing a full discussion of that question.

While I do not want to be too severe on the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, for I think we all recognize that there is more joy in the presence of the angels over one sinner that repenteth than over the ninety and nine—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Even if the repentance is qualified.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes; at the same time I do say that it is not fair of the ex-minister to speak as he did to-day, as if an earnest effort had not been made to bring these matters before the house, and as if during that period he had not been a member of the government that negatived these efforts of ours. We also brought in a motion dealing with debts and with the whole question of economic conditions.

In 1933 the hon. member for Macleod brought in one of his numerous amendments to the Interest Act. In 1934 there was a motion for the national control of credit and finance; our cooperative commonwealth motion again, and on this occasion the debate was adjourned, which killed the discussion. We also brought up the question of unemployment relief, and the resolution still stood on the order paper at the end of the session, so again we did not get the fullest discussion. We brought in a motion on the nationalization of insurance, a motion to control credit, and an amendment to distribute the abundance that we had. In 1934 there was an amendment of ours to provide a stable currency and credit system based on goods and services; and so on.

I need not mention the motions and amendments of this year, but I have mentioned some of those of preceding years just to show that during the time the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member of the cabinet we persistently urged the very reforms that he is urging to-day.

The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce advanced the idea to-day that the government should be in the position of referee. He says that he is not opposed to capitalism but simply to the evils of capitalism, and he is out to champion the small business men against unscrupulous corporations. Well, I congratulate him on having come pretty nearly to the traditional Liberal policy, because that is the position they have taken all along, that the government should be simply a policeman to see that there are no fouls on either side and that generally there is fair play, I think the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce would go further than that and say that there should be definite regulation.

The Prime Minister makes as his defence the statement that the government has done all that it legally may do, and having done so, no good citizen should criticize the government. Of course that is a begging of the whole question. No one wants to criticize if the government has done all it should do, but that is the very point at issue. The Prime Minister raises the old constitutional question. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the history of all constitutional questions is this, that what at one time was declared unconstitutional has a few years later been declared constitutional. We had an illustration of that a few days ago. The Prime Minister told us that it was not within his power to interfere with the march of the British Columbia relief camp strikers, that he could not interfere unless he was asked to do so by the provincial government, but three or four days later this government gave orders for the police to stop the marchers in Saskatchewan, and that in spite of the protests of the premier of Saskatchewan. What was unconstitutional one week became quite constitutional the next.

Going back three or four years to the days of the blank cheque, we found that under peace, order and good government, or under the special provisions introduced at that time, it was quite possible under unemployment relief legislation to assist the banks and insurance companies. They were given help by being allowed to write up their assets.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Falsify their accounts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, falsify their accounts. I do not think that is too strong a term to use. Their assets were put up to a figure higher than what they had paid for them and much higher than the market prices. If that had not been permitted, some of our insurance companies would have gone bankrupt. That was done under the unemployment relief act. It does seem to me that if the government could handle that situation in that way in the interests of big business, it could very easily, if it were in earnest, handle this other situation and protect the living standards of men, women and children, which standards have been so seriously threatened by the practices which have grown up.

The Prime Minister says we have not the money to spend, but that is the same old cry. According to a statement issued by the bureau of statistics, last year, 307 Canadians paid income taxes on incomes of more than $50,000 per year. That little statement shows the real situation. When there is so much money in the hands of some of our people that 300 of them have incomes of more than $50,000—some of these run to exceedingly high figures but we cannot tell exactly, as the Minister of Finance has said that it would not be in the public interest to divulge this information—there is no earthly reason why we cannot adopt policies which will give every man work and a decent living.

Surely there is sufficient credit in the country. I submit that if a war were declared to-morrow the money would be found with which to carry it on, in spite of the enormously heavy debts which we now have. Surely the credit of the country is sufficient to provide every man with a decent job at a decent wage. If it is not, we may as well go out of business entirely. The Prime Minister gets back to his favourite argument, that we must not destroy contracts, that we must maintain our credit and recognize our solemn obligations. I have said before on many public platforms, and I repeat, that while we may be said to have certain obligations to the bondholders of the Canadian National Railways and the government, in my judgment the obligations which we owe to the returned men, many of whom are on the verge of destitution; the obligations which we owe to the scattered pioneers of this country, many of whom are suffering dire want; the obligations which we owe to the coming generation of Canadian children, are infinitely more sacred than those which we owe to the bondholders.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Why take this whole question of contracts for granted? A contract is made on a definite set of conditions, and if those conditions alter, the contract should be altered. That is only equity. If the dollar changes in its purchasing power we will soon reach the stage where we will change the contract in accordance with the changed value of the dollar. We have been saying that from this corner of the house for a number of years, but in spite of all our protestations we find the Prime Minister coming back to his old position and refusing to think of other than nominal values, saying that we must maintain the contracts. He calls us welshers if we do not maintain those contracts. I am not to be bullied by any such words as that flung at me.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman must realize that I did not say that. I said that we would be called welshers when we did not meet our obligations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Apparently the Prime Minister associates himself very closely with that position or he would not use that argument, but I accept his correction. I say that I am not to be intimidated by any such words or by the calling of nasty names. We have to face the facts as they are in this country.

The Prime Minister then went on to speak about debts. Apparently they cannot be altered. These debts are being treated as sacred things. We all know how the war debts were contracted and that a number of people laid the foundations for their fortunes during those times. After the war the Liberals made a motion to investigate the scandals in connection with war contracts but before they had gone very far they dropped the matter. We all know that many people made their fortunes at that time and that some of them salted those fortunes away in tax free bonds. There never should have been any bonds of that type issued. Is the ill-considered action of those in authority in those days to tie up the people of this country forever? Have not nearly all the countries of the world recognized that the contracts made at that time were made under very abnormal conditions? Many of the nations have not paid what the Prime Minister undoubtedly would call their honest debts, Great Britain among them. Great Britain, while she has not formally repudiated her debts, has ceased to pay the instalments due the United States. If we made internal contracts at that time and issued bonds, are we to go on forever as hewers of wood and drawers of water to a few people, many of whom made their fortunes by doubtful methods at that time?

The Prime Minister says that we must maintain our credit.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 20, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

PRIVATE BILLS

Third report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. Stinson.

CANADIAN GRAIN BOARD

First report of the special committee on Bill No. 98, to provide for the constitution and powers of the Canadian grain board—Mr. Bennett.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina) presented the second report of the special committee on the British North America Act, as follows:

The special committee of the House of Commons, appointed to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope, begs leave to present the following as its second and final report.

Your committee has held ten sessions and has heard the opinions of a number of witnesses.

Under the instructions of the committee, telegrams were sent to the respective attorneys-general of the nine provinces in the following terms:

"The special committee of the House of Commons on the British North America Act desires to have the views of your government with respect to methods of securing amendments to said act. The resolution referred to the committee follows: 'Resolved that in the opinion of this house a special committee should be set up to study and report on the best method by which the British North America Act may be amended so that while safeguarding the existing rights of racial and religious minorities and legitimate provincial claims to autonomy, the dominion government may be given adequate power to deal effectively with urgent economic problems which are essentially national in scope.' While the committee does not object to the personal attendance of a representative of your government it was thought less costly to ask for a written submission. Copies of proceedings have been sent you. Please intimate when we may expect to receive your submission."

The following answers were received:—

Prince Edward Island—"Your wire March twenty-seventh. Government of Prince Edward Island is of opinion that dominion government should formulate its plan and policy for the purposes intended and that this should be submitted to the provincial governments and afterwards discussed at a conference of representatives of the provinces and the dominion." Signed by H. F. MacPhee, Attorney-General.

New Brunswick—"Will wire views as soon as available. Delay unavoidable." Signed by W. H. Harrison, Attorney-General. (New Brunswick views not yet received).

Nova Scotia—"Our legislature now in session and most difficult to attend to matter of this kind now in way you suggest. We feel matter should be approached by conferences between representatives of provinces and dominion where each would have the views of the other and ample time to discuss the matter." Signed by J. H. MacQuarrie, Attorney-General.

Quebec—"Your telegram received. Surely the committee cannot expect that the views of the province of Quebec will be discussed by a change of telegrams or letters. In a matter of such importance I suggest that a conference of the dominion and the provinces should be held." Signed by L. A. Taschereau, Attorney-General.

Ontario—"Province of Ontario does not desire to make any representation before your committee re British North America Act amendment as no good purpose will be served by attempting to advise dominion government at this time." Signed by A. W. Roebuck, Attorney-General.

Manitoba—"With further reference to your telegram of the 27th March, to the attorney-general and to his reply of the 5th instant, the government have now had an opportunity of giving consideration to the suggestion that it should make a written submission regarding the subject matter that is before your committee.

"The government of Manitoba is of the opinion that the subject matter referred to in the resolution is one of such importance that no written submission, setting out our views in reference to it, should be made without a conference with the other provinces and the dominion government. We would be willing to attend such a conference at any time, with a view to arriving at a definite method of procedure for making amendments to the British North America Act." Signed by John Bracken.

Saskatchewan.—"Referring to your telegram of the twenty-seventh day of March wherein you requested the government of the province to make representations either orally or by written memoranda as to the methods of procedure which this province would suggest in connection with amendments to the Canadian constitution I would say that I have been following with intense interest the proceedings of your committee. The question of what if any provision is to be made for amendment of the Canadian constitution from time to time is a question which ultimately must be decided by conferences between the governments of the provinces and the government of Canada with the possibility of a previous preliminary interprovincial conference. In view of this fact it would appear to be unwise for the provinces to be giving their views before a committee of the House of Commons. With due deference might I be permitted to suggest that the proper procedure is for your committee to pursue its present inquiry and to make a report to the House of Commons which I presume will either be accepted or amended or merely received without binding the government to accept the proposals of the committee and with this report available the provinces could then give consideration as to what attitude they desired to take and perhaps discuss the matter amongst themselves and thereafter join with the federal government in a general conference. The report of your committee would serve as the basis of discussion around which would take place the ultimate solution of this problem. We realize that the question is one of great national importance and should be decided in the welfare of Canada free of all political considerations and we are certainly prepared to do our share towards the facilitating of a solution but we feel that we must look after the interests of the province and think that the procedure I have outlined would be the proper course for us to adopt at this time." Signed by T. C. Davis, Attorney General.

Alberta.—"Re amendment B.N.A. Act. Alberta government appreciate desire of committee to have views of all provinces before it on this very vital question but considers approach to question should be through interchange of views at interprovincial conference." Signed by Mr. Lymburn.

British Columbia.—"Reference your wire twenty-seventh to attorney general requesting written submission from the government of this province to your committee it is the opinion of the government that amendment of the constitution is too important a matter to be dealt with in manner suggested. It is not thought that satisfactory conclusions can be reached either federally or provincially until a conference of the provinces and the dominion is held when full discussion may be had and matters properly debated. Other than stating that the right should be secured to amend our constitution in Canada this province respectfully declines to make submission to your committee, neither will it feel bound by any report which may be made by your committee." Signed by T. D. Pattullo.

In no case did the authorities of these provinces signify any desire to present their views to your committee, either in writing or orally.

The committee recognizes that there is a divergence of opinion with respect to the question of whether or not the British North America Act is a statutory recognition of a compact among the four original provinces of the dominion and as to the necessity or otherwise of provincial concurrence in amendments. Without expressing any opinion upon that question, the committee feel that in the present case and at the present time it is advisable in the interest of harmony and unity that there should be consultation with the provinces with respect to the adoption of a definite mode of amendment or the enactment of amending legislation which might seriously alter the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces and the dominion.

Many interesting suggestions were made. Dr. Kennedy, professor of law at Toronto university, suggested that a royal commission should be appointed to study the workings of the act, with a view to recommending a rearrangement of powers if thought necessary.

Dr. Ollivier, K.C., LL.D., joint law clerk of the House of Commons suggested that:

(a) Obsolete sections should be dropped.

(b) Certain sections should be subject to amendment without consultation of the provinces.

(c) Certain sections should be amended only with the concurrence of a majority of the provinces.

(d) Certain sections might be amended with the consent of one province only.

(e) Other sections should be amended only on consent of all the provinces.

Dr. Scott, professor of civil law at McGill university, expressed the view that as the dominion parliament represented the population of the provinces, ordinary amendments should be made upon a majority vote of both houses and amendments affecting minority rights should be approved in addition by all provincial legislatures, in order to become law.

Professor Rogers, professor of political science at Queens university, suggested that a dominion-provincial conference or a national convention might appoint a committee to draft an amended constitution to be thereafter approved by the conference or convention and subsequently by the dominion and provincial legislatures. He was of the opinion that the question of consulting the provinces was a matter of political expediency rather than one of legal right.

Doctor Arthur Beauchesne, C.M.G., K.C., clerk of the House of Commons, would have a new constitution drafted by a constituent assembly composed of delegates representing the various provinces and the dominion, made up of all classes of people. The constitution so drafted would be thereafter adopted by the dominion and the provinces, approved by the King, and the present act thereupon repealed.

The committee recognizes the urgent necessity for prompt consideration of amendments to the British North America Act with reference to a redistribution of legislative power and to clarify the field of taxation.

It is further of opinion that the conference hereafter proposed should carefully consider the adoption of a recognized yet flexible method of amendment.

In view of the fact that the several provinces did not feel it advisable to give the committee the benefit of their views with respect to the method of procedure to be followed in amending the constitution, the committee is of the opinion that before any decision upon the subject matter of the resolution is finally made, the opinions of the provinces should be obtained otherwise, if at all possible, and for that reason recommends that a dominion-provincial conference be held as early as possible in the present year to study the subject matter of the resolution. The proposed conference should have ample time in which to study every phase of the question.

In view of the above recommendation the committee expressly refrains from recommending any form of procedure for amendment so as to leave the proposed conference entirely free in its study of the question, except that the committee is definitely of the opinion that minority rights agreed upon and granted under the provisions of the British North America Act should not be interfered with.

A copy of the minutes of proceedings and evidence is submitted herewith.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. BENNETT moved the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT TOWARDS CHANGES IN CAPITAL STRUCTURE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) asked a question with respect to a letter written by me to the chairman of the board of trustees of the Canadian National Railways. Such letter was mentioned but not read. It is as follows:

Dear Mr. Fullerton:

The changes proposed in the report of the Canadian National Railways are wholly at variance with the views entertained by the government.

It seems almost incredible that the auditors should suggest that advances made by the government for capital purposes to the railway company be treated in its accounts as capital stock, that is to say, as a non-interest bearing obligation, and that advances to meet deficits be written off completely. Deficits and interest must continue to appear in the accounts of the railway company if the public of Canada are to have any appreciation as to just what they have invested in their railways and what, from time to time, their advances really are. As representing the proprietors of the undertaking, we must insist that the railway company's reports shall give a true picture of the real situation and that the annual report as issued will enable anyone perusing it to understand exactly what the Dominion of Canada has invested in its railway enterprises.

To that letter an answer was received dated May, 19, 1934.

Dear Mr. Bennett:

I have your letter of the 15th instant, and note that it seems to you incredible that the auditors should suggest that advances made by the government for capital purposes to the railway company be treated in its accounts as capital stock, and that advances to meet deficits be written off completely.

You will perhaps remember that early in January I had an interview with you in reference to the capital structure of the Canadian National Railway. At that interview I handed you a memorandum prepared by the auditors in which a recommendation was made that the government advances for deficits, aggregating $321,000,000, and that interest accruals on government advances and loans of $389,000,000 should be written out of the capital structure. It was also suggested in that memorandum that capital stock should be issued for government loans for government expenditures, representing approximately $332,000,000.

When approaching the subject of the capital structure I had in mind the findings of the Duff commission, page 30. The commission there, after pointing out that the net operating income available to pay interest of the Canadian National System for the period 1923 to 1931, inclusive, averaged $24,414,447 per annum, stated: "It is obvious that on this basis of earnings the capital liabilities would require a very drastic writing down. And while this commission is of opinion that it must be frankly recognized that a very substantial part of the money invested in the railways comprised within the Canadian National System must be regarded as lost and that its capital liabilities should be heavily written down, they do not consider that the time is opportune to deal with this important matter." The report then goes on to say that the matter should have the early attention of the board of trustees.

In order to reduce the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways to a reasonably normal basis, it would be necessary to write out all government moneys advanced for deficits and the interest on all government advances whether for deficits or for capital expenditures. It would also be necessary to place government loans for past capital expenditures upon a non-interest bearing basis. Even if this were done and the amount of the Grand Trunk capital stock and the Canadian Northern capital stock also written off, it would leave a capital figure upon which it would be impossible for the railway to pay interest for some years to come.

Of course, I recognize that the matter is entirely one for the government, and in view of your decision that the railway company's reports should give a true picture of the real situation and that the annual report as issued will enable anyone perusing it to understand exactly what the Dominion of Canada has invested in its railway enterprises, it appears to me that it would serve no useful purpose for the trustees to give any further attention to the capital structure or to the suggestions contained in the Duff report that the trustees should proceed with an attempt to adjust the capital structure.

I expect to be questioned by the committee in regard to the capital structure and the steps, if any, taken by the trustees looking to its readjustment. In such an event I will in all probability be obliged to state the attitude of the government as indicated in your letter.

I now realize that this is a closed chapter but I should not be frank if I did not state my opinion that to leave the matter as it now is is detrimental to the railway and unfair to the present management. I have reached this opinion only after much study and discussion with the officials of the railway. Some of the arguments leading up to the recommendations are set out in the attached booklet and I hope when your heavy duties permit a little leisure time you will kindly read the memorandum.

Yours truly,

C. P. Fullerton, Chairman.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Fullerton made it appear at the meeting of the committee that the proposal which was left with me by him was of the auditors, and that the trustees had never accepted that statement, or made any recommendations. In fact, they had considered the matter on several occasions, and ultimately no further action was taken because of the receipt of the letter which I sent on May 15, 1934. It will be observed I raised no objection to cutting down the capital stock as it appears in the public accounts of the company, as being the aggregate of the value of stocks representing the Grand Trunk and Canadian National, but that the investments made by the Dominion of Canada should be shown in the report, the investments only,—and I still think that is desirable. But with respect to the second point, namely, the undesirability of altering the structure at all at this time I made it clear on several occasions to this house why I thought action should not now be taken.

While I was not here, namely, on March 22, 1935, the privy council granted to Mr. Lovibond, the right of appeal. I think it might be well, in order that this matter may be clearly understood by every hon. member, that I should recite the facts as indicated by the documents filed with the privy council. A petition of right was directed to the Secretary of State for Canada asking for a fiat to issue, to take proceedings against the crown on January 17, 1929. That fiat was refused. Then Mr. Lovibond brought action, and I believe it would be well to indicate from the statement of claim just what his position was. The statement of claim was delivered on March 14, 1932, the action having been begun by a writ issued December 26, 1931. Mr. Lovibond alleged:

(1) The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada (hereinafter referred to as "the Grand Trunk") is a company incorporated in the year 1852 by special act of the legislature of the province of Canada. Down to the year 1923 it operated an important system of railway communications in Canada and the United States of America. Under its act of incorporation and amending acts, its principal office was located in London, meetings of directors and stockholders were held there, a stock register upon which transfers of the stock in question in the action were registered was kept in London, and almost, if not quite all of the capital stock of the Grand Trunk was held by persons resident in Great Britain. (See paragraphs 3, 6 and 7).

(2) At all times material to the action the issued capital stock of the Grand Trunk consisted of:

4% Guaranteed stock..	£12,500,000
First preference 5% stock.. ..	3,420,000
Second preference 5% stock..	2,530,000
Third preference 4% stock. ..	7,168,055
Common stock..	23,955,437

In addition there was outstanding debenture stock of the Grand Trunk amounting to £31,926,125, the holders of which were entitled to voting privileges at general meetings of stockholders (see paragraph 8).

(3) Your petitioner was on the 18th of January, 1923, a registered holder of £100 first preference stock, £100 second preference stock, £700 third preference stock and £1,100 common stock of the Grand Trunk. There had also been assigned to him in November, 1931, £1,200 first preference stock, £1,100 second preference stock, £1,700 third preference stock and £900 common stock of the Grand Trunk (see paragraphs 1, 25 and 28).

(4) Your petitioner has been illegally dispossessed of his stock by certain acts of the parliament of Canada, agreements and orders in council, all of which your petitioner submits to be ultra vires in whole or in material parts.

By the Grand Trunk Railway Acquisition Act, 1919, the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada was authorized to enter into an agreement with the Grand Trunk for the acquisiton by the crown of the entire capital stock of the Grand Trunk (except the four per cent guaranteed stock), the agreement to provide for the determination by a board of arbitrators of the value of such stock, subject to a specified maximum, and to be submitted for the approval of all the stockholders of the Grand Trunk, including holders of debenture stock and guaranteed stock (see paragraph 11).

(5) The draft of an agreement to carry into effect the terms of the last-mentioned act was submitted to what purported to be a general meeting of stockholders of the Grand Trunk held in London on the 19th of February, 1920. At this meeting the debenture holders and guaranteed stockholders (who were under the agreement to be assured of the full interest and capital of their holdings) were allowed to vote with the rest of the stockholders and the agreement was approved by a majority of those present in person or by proxy (see paragraph 13).

(6) By a statute of the parliament of Canada assented to on the 11th of May, 1920 (10-11 Geo. V. c. 13) the parliament purported to confirm and ratify an agreement dated 8th March, 1920, made between the Minister of Railways and Canals of Canada on behalf of the crown and the Grand Trunk. Under this agreement the crown undertook to acquire all the outstanding preference and common stock of the Grand Trunk at a value to be determined by a board of three arbitrators. New guaranteed stock was to be distributed among the holders of the preference and common stock upon the vesting in the crown or its nominees of such stock, and any stock not so transferred might be declared to be the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for the crown and upon the making of such declaration the stock not so transferred should immediately become the property of the crown and entries in the stock register be made accordingly (see paragraphs 14 and 15).

(7) On the 7th of September, 1921, two of the arbitrators (the Honourable Sir Walter Cassels and the Right Honourable Sir Thomas White) delivered a majority award finding that there was no value to the holders in the preference and common stocks of the Grand Trunk. The third arbitrator (the Honourable William Howard Taft) dissented and delivered an opinion that the value of the preference and common stocks was not less than 48,000,000 dollars (see paragraph 17).

(8) By an order in council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 19th of January, 1923, reciting that the majority of the arbitrators had decided that the preference and common stock of the Grand Trunk had no value and that the crown was not entitled to the whole of such stock and to the immediate transfer thereof without the issue of any new guaranteed stock in exchange and that the holders were not entitled to anything, it was declared that the whole of the preference and common stock of the Grand Trunk was the property of the Minister of Finance in trust for the crown and it was directed that entries should be made in the stock register and other books of the Grand Trunk accordingly (see paragraph 19).

(9) In pursuance of this order transfers to the Minister of Finance of the stock then registered in the name of your petitioner and of his assignors set out above were registered in the books of the Grand Trunk without his or their authority or consent. In the year 1931, duly executed transfers of the stock so assigned to him were presented by him both in London and Canada for registration in his name, but registration was refused. A demand by him that the register should be rectified by restoring therein his name as owner of the stock registered in his name on the 19th of January, 1923, was also refused (see paragraphs 20, 26, 27 and 28).

(10) By an indenture dated 30th January, 1923, made between Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called "the Canadian National") and the Grand Trunk it was purported to be agreed that the Canadian National and the Grand Trunk should be and were amalgamated into one company under the name of the Canadian National; that the capital stock of the amalgamated company should be one share of the face value of upwards of 180,000,000 dollars; that this share should be issued to the Minister of Finance in trust for the crown and that upon such issue the minister's holding of the capital stock of the Grand Trunk should be surrendered by him to the Canadian National for cancellation. This agreement was sanctioned by an order in council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 30th of January, 1923 (see paragraphs 21 and 22).

[Mr. Bennett.]

4. Your petitioner therefore claims in this action on behalf of himself and the stockholders he represents the following relief (paragraph 32 of the statement of claim):—

(A) A declaration that the transfers to the Minister of Finance of the stock of the Grand Trunk registered on the 18th of January, 1923, in the names of your petitioner and the other stockholders are invalid, and rectification of the register accordingly.

(B) (C) (D) (E) and (F) Declarations that the Grand Trunk Railway Acquisition Act, 1919, the resolution of the general meeting of stockholders held on the 19th of February, 1920, purporting to approve the transfer agreement, the transfer agreement dated 8th of March, 1920, the act of 1920 (10-11 Geo. V. c. 13) confirming the agreement, and the order in council dated 19th January, 1923, are and each of them is ultra vires and void.

Those were the proceedings taken many years ago against the railway company, that is the Canadian National, and also against the attorney general of Canada. Those proceedings ultimately resulted in this country in the action being dismissed on demurrer, the point being that no action could be brought except by petition of right. Then they gave notice of appeal to the privy council. Ultimately it was decided that the provisions of the act of Ontario granting an appeal to the privy council was not sufficient to enable the appeal to be taken. They then lodged their petition in the privy council to perfect their appeal there and it was heard on the 22nd of March, 1935; that is this year, and leave to appeal was granted. Therefore the case that has been pending more or less since 1921 is now before the privy council for argument, and in a public meeting of the Grand Trunk junior stockholders, an organization created to safeguard what is spoken of as the interests of the Grand Trunk shareholders, the chairman, Mr. Ormsby Gore, made statements as to the desirability of the appeal being expedited. In the hearing before the privy council when leave was granted, the application for leave being opposed, the matter was discussed at some length and their lordships urged that steps be taken to expedite the appeal. The Minister of Justice therefore took every appropriate step to ensure that the appeal would be heard as soon as possible, and it is believed that it will be heard some time next month, in the month of July, before the privy council.

That is the record of the litigation, indicating first of all the application for the fiat, down to date. I mention that because to disturb the capital stock as it now stands might in certain eventualities be a matter of some moment to the Dominion of Canada, who are the shareholders, and I desire on that ground to make it clear why I do not desire until this litigation is disposed of, any disturbance in the capital structure. But in so far as the reduction of the capital stock is concerned, when the time comes, to the figure that represents the investment I have nothing to say, but I do submit that most of us are anxious that there should appear in the report of the Canadian National Railways something that indicates what the investment of the Canadian people in the enterprise may be. I greatly regret that an effort was made to give some political meaning to what has taken place. The chairman himself said that he regarded it as the province of the government to say whether or not it thought that this should be done.

Without going into the second ground I indicated my strong conviction that the reports might be prepared in any way that was thought desirable, but the amount of the investment of the Canadian people in the enterprise should appear so that he who runs might read and know exactly what our commitments had been in that regard.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): Would the Prime Minister assure the house that a full discussion of this matter may take place if and when the chairman of the special committee moves the adoption of the report?

Mr. BENNETT: I can give no assurance of that sort.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, on the orders of the day I presume it is not possible to discuss some of the remarks that were made by the Prime Minister, but I would submit to you, sir, that under all the circumstances it would be only fair if some remarks were permitted in reply to, or in connection with, the remarks made by the Prime Minister in regard to railway recapitalization. I would like, subject to what you are prepared to rule in regard to the matter, to make one or two observations and end with a question which would perhaps put me in order. The Prime Minister has stated, at least I take it that he said this, that he opposses recapitalization—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has the right to ask a question but I think he realizes that the matter cannot be the subject of debate at this stage.

Mr. EULER: I made that comment already, Your Honour, but I say also that it does not seem fair that one side of the question should be presented and no opportunity given to present the other side. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated that it should always be possible to see from the books of the Canadian National Railways the amount of money invested in those railways, or spent upon the railways.

Mr. BENNETT: I used the word "invested."

Mr. EULER: I do not think that is the proper use of the word; we will say spent or invested. If he insists that that shall be shown on the railway books why are not the entries in the government books consistent with those in the books of the railways? Those amounts have already been absorbed into the national debt and they should appear on the books as assets owing by the Canadian National Railways. I should like to know why the two sets of books should not be consistent one with the other. There is some further information I should like to have, being a layman instead of a lawyer. The Prime Minister stated that permission had been granted to lodge an appeal in connection with the valuation of the Canadian Northern Railway and Grand Trunk Railway stocks.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. EULER: With regard to the valuation of the stocks.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. EULER: The Grand Trunk shareholders in Great Britain are not satisfied and they desire to go to the courts in order to settle their claims. Although permission has been granted they have yet to appeal, that appeal has not actually been made. If that is the case, why would that interfere with any action which the government might desire to take in connection with the recapitalization? The amount mentioned by the auditors as capable of being written off by a mere bookkeeping entry was over one billion dollars while the amount involved in the litigation by the Grand Trunk shareholders and even the Canadian Northern shareholders is less than $300,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The only reason I rose to speak to this matter was because of a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray). I did not endeavour to make a controversial argument, I endeavoured merely to state the facts. I read the letter which I had written on May 15 and the reply thereto. Rather than make a statement, I read from the proceedings before the privy council. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has entirely misunderstood the reference to the litigation. This litigation strikes at the life of the amalgamation of the Grank Trunk, it asks for a declaration that the whole statute by which we acquired the Grand Trunk is ultra vires. It goes further and asks that the action taken by the government in this country pursuant to the statute to strike the names of the shareholders in Dashwood House off the record is illegal. It is not a question of simple arbitration.

Mr. EULER: What is the point involved?

Mr. BENNETT: The whole question of the amalgamation of the Canadian National system. When my hon. friend suggests that notwithstanding that legislation we should go on with the recapitalization, I do not think he understands the true state of affairs. This country should not be in the position of having taken any action to change the status quo during the litigation, and that is why I made it clear to the house just what was the position.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is the position of the litigation at the present time?

Mr. BENNETT: The appeal is expected to be heard in July.

Mr. EULER: Is the appeal actually made?

Mr. BENNETT: The appeal is pending for argument in July. All I am asking is that there shall be nothing done upon the books to change the position so that it could be said that we had taken certain action before the completion of the appeal. I endeavoured to confine myself to a reading of the record and I regret that it should be thought that I have any objection to the capital stock of the railways being written down. That may be the right thing to do when the time comes but in the meantime I have expressed the opinion that the investments in the road should be shown upon the books that are published to the world. So far as the method of book-keeping is concerned, the government books show exactly the same amounts. When I ask the government what sums have been invested in the Canadian National Railways they produce the books and show what they have, the only difference being that the amounts are paid as interest on the national debt instead of as interest on the securities of the railways.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this government interested in the appeal?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: The attorney general of Canada was joined as a party defendant for the reasons given by Mr. Green when arguing before the privy council.

Mr. EULER: The Prime Minister has said that he gave only the facts. So far as the record is concerned, the recommendations of the auditors intended to preserve the capital amounts which have been expended on the Canadian National Railways in any shape or form and that record will always be there. Some reference to politics has been made and I should like to say that I disavow of that kind so far as the proceedings of the committee are concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: I referred merely to the records.

CANADIAN HIGH COMMISSIONER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on the orders of the day, on Thursday last an order was passed on motion of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) for certain details respecting the organization and expenses of the office of the high commissioner in London, and yesterday the member for Témiscouata asked that a precise date be fixed when this return would be tabled. The return involves a very great deal of research and it will take some considerable time to complete. The time of six days which has elapsed has been altogether insufficient.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY COMMISSION

ADMINISTRATIVE, ADVISORY AND INVESTIGATORY FUNCTIONS—PROVISION FOR A DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) for third reading of Bill No. 86, to establish a dominion trade and industry commission.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned yesterday I was discussing the defence which the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) had made of the reform program of the government. The speech of the Prime Minister seemed to indicate that financial and legal considerations were paramount, and to this point of view I decidedly object. The Prime Minister has urged that Canada must maintain her credit. He stated that we must pay back our debts and retain our credit as a matter of national honour. He said:

> Once it gets abroad that we are prepared to enact legislation, whether it be provincial or federal, that destroys the contract made between the borrower and the lender—destroys it I say—and substitutes for it something else, that moment we have become what is familiarly known as "welchers."

And again:

> If obligations are created without provision for the reduction of the rate with the increase in the purchasing power of money then the contract must be observed if we are to maintain the character of our people.

The Prime Minister as well as others recognizes that at certain times deflation may materially alter the character of a contract. I need only to refer to the statements he made before the committee on finance of the imperial conference when he clearly recognized that deflation had imposed an enormous extra burden upon the people of this country. In spite of this, he said yesterday that if we did not live up to the letter of the law, even although the dollar had changed in value, we would be in an ethically unjustifiable position. He is emphasizing the letter of the contract, the purely legal side of affairs but I submit that even from the legal aspect as well as from the standpoint of equity and ethics, when the dollar has altered as materially as it has, repayment should be made according to the purchasing power of the dollar when the contract was made. Undoubtedly the deflation has meant the transfer, as Irving Fisher told us twelve years ago, of hundreds of thousands of dollars from one set of pockets into another. It has meant that many people have been reduced to beggary while other people have been exalted to a position where they can levy tribute on the entire population of the country. If to maintain our credit means that we are to maintain an unjust relationship between creditor and debtor, then I say our credit may very well go.

Why after all from the standpoint of expediency, should we maintain our credit? I suppose it is in order that we can continue to borrow; that is to say, we should maintain our credit in order that we may be able to go more deeply into debt—a curious point of view. Canada is already carrying a sufficient load, and we ought to be able to deal with the situation as it is without regard to prospective borrowings that may sink us still deeper. But in the last sentence I read I find a phrase to which I cannot but strenuously object. We should pay these supposedly honest debts in order that we may "maintain the character of our people." Maintain the character of our people! I wonder whether those who deal so exclusively with financial and legal matters can understand the real position that confronts tens of thousands of our people to-day. I hold in my hand, for example, a voucher that was given in connection with unemployment relief by the municipality of East Kildonan. I am not blaming the government of the day directly for this, but it can readily he seen from this document what sort of treatment the problem has received. The voucher reads:

> Municipality of > East Kildonan
> Unemployment Relief Department
> Only to be accepted by merchants registered with the Unemployment Relief Department
> Special
> King George V Silver Jubilee
> Case No.....
> Date.....
> To Merchant:
> Please supply party producing for your inspection identification card corresponding to case number and signature contained herein with merchandise to the value of 20 cents.
> .....
> Relief Officer.
> .....
> Signature of Recipient.
> Signature of Merchant.

The family that received that relief points out that that 20 cents would secure one pound of round steak—that is all—and I submit that this is significant of the kind of treatment that we are giving honest Canadian citizens. And it is abominable treatment; it is nothing less than an insult, that in connection with the King George V Jubilee we should give largesse of that kind. The Prime Minister, even in the statement he made this afternoon with regard to the Grand Trunk, points out with what infinite care the law guards the rights of shareholders. What I am pleading for is that we should safeguard the rights of Canadian citizens. I am not for the wholesale repudiation of all obligations, but there are far more sacred obligations resting upon us at the present time and which to-day are being disregarded.

One other little document I hold in my hand may perhaps bring home to the house the actual situation which arises from our disregard of the rights of our people, especially our young people. Some months ago in this house I called attention to a lamentable incident in which a young boy had fallen from a freight train. He was badly injured and as his rescuers picked him up he said, "Kill me; I am no good anyhow." A few days ago I received from Saskatchewan a letter from a man who apparently is of Ukrainian or Polish extraction. He cannot write very good English, but I think his English can be understood. He says:

Dear Sir:

On February 28, 1935, I read in the Western Producer paper, you where referring about a boy who fell from a freight train in the west and begged his rescuers to kill him because he was no good to anyone;

Would ask you kindly to let me know if you know where and when that sad accident happen; why I am asking you our boy went west about a year ago to B.C. and since last June we only had one letter from him, since we don't know where abouts he is; with this capitalistic unemployment system he took the hard road to find a living, went farther west last June and we didn't hear from him since he got to B.C.

You know how parents heart broken feel about it; will you kindly write us a few words.

I was very glad to be able to tell the father that the boy to whom I had referred was not his boy. But there are two thousand such boys now in one group at Regina and tens of thousands more in the camps; and the important point is that the government program, and this particular bill which forms the major part of it, is doing nothing whatever to solve these great problems. The bad practices referred to in the price spreads committee have grown up under the existing system and under existing legislation, which I submit the bill does very little to alter. I suppose we shall have to vote for the bill; it is good as far as it goes. But it is no great help to have the administration of the Combines Investigation Act transferred to a commission; it does not solve our problem. What did the Prime Minister say a few months ago in those radio speeches which excited the interest of us all and made us almost hope that something might be done?

The old system served you well but it ended in a nuisance. Is that so or not? It ended in a condition under which there has been universal depression and unemployment and poverty in the midst of plenty.

Is there anything in this bill before us, is there anything in the whole program of legislation which the Prime Minister has so rigorously defended that will do anything really to meet that situation? Again, he gave utterance in the last of those radio addresses to this statement which I think fairly summarizes the report of the price spreads commission:

Many faults and injustices in the capitalist system—child labour, sweat shops, slave wages, crushingly long hours, inequality of benefits, low prices to primary producers, high prices to the ultimate consumer.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

One would have imagined, after the situation had been so carefully diagnosed, that we might well have expected some sort of remedy. And yet this is the kind of thing we find in the bill, section 20:

Unfair Trade Practices

20. The commission shall receive complaints respecting unfair trade practices and may investigate the same and, either before or after an investigation, if of opinion that the alleged practice constitutes an offence against a law prohibiting unfair trade practices, shall communicate the same to the attorney-general of Canada and to the director of public prosecutions or to the attorney-general of the province within which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

Does anyone think that that kind of measure solves the problem, that it comes anywhere within reach of the great outstanding evils which were outlined by the Prime Minister?

Child labour. We all know that there are infringements of the laws against child labour, but supposing this commission does investigate and refer cases to the attorney general of Quebec, does anyone think we shall get any action? None whatever. So here we sit, the dominion parliament, powerless in the face of a terrific abuse.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Someone can scoff. It is easy to do that, but I submit that to scoff ill becomes the supporter of a government pledged to reform, when we are asking that government to implement the promises made so lavishly to the people, the promises in fact on which it was elected to office.

Sweatshops. Is there anything in this bill that is likely to be really effective in preventing sweatshops, preventing people being ground down in such a way as reminds us vividly of that poem of Thomas Hood of so many years ago? In England they have corrected some of the abuses associated with the sweatshops, but these abuses are about as bad in many communities of this country as they ever were in England.

Slave wages. With wages of something like $2 a week, is there anything in this bill that is going to help much? Even if we have a minimum wage law brought in we are told that without some supplementary legislation the last state is worse than the first.

Crushingly long hours. Again we have a bill that tends to help in certain instances, but which allows such exceptions that the legislation as a whole will not prove really effective.

Inequality of benefits. Can anyone think of the unequal distribution of the wealth of this country without realizing that something is radically wrong. Only about two per cent of the people of this country are sufficiently well to do to pay federal income tax. We in this house, because of receiving our indemnity, if nothing else, are placed in the category of the wealthy two per cent. Is there anything whatever in this legislation that will alter the faulty and inequitable distribution of the wealth of this country? Nothing that I can see.

Low prices to the primary producer. This opens up the whole question of the farmers. It is all very well to have the grain board bill, I intend to vote for that measure, I think it is a move in the right direction; at the same time I do not believe it will solve the problem of the primary producer. Another session has gone and this government is about to pass out of power without having made any real attempt to solve the problem of the primary producer and of high prices to the consumer. In spite of the protestations of the government retail prices have been going up. How can the Prime Minister sit here complacently while his own charges stand unanswered? I quote again from him:

> Men whose mounting bank rolls loom larger than your happiness, corporations without soul and without virtue.

But according to the Prime Minister, although that is so the federal government of this country is unable to do anything about it because of the constitutional difficulty. Objection has been raised—even by the Prime Minister himself yesterday—to calling any infringement of "personal liberty" and "personal rights" a crime. I submit again, as I did the other day, that there is no clear subdivision between what is crime and what is not. It depends upon the conscience of the people and upon the degree of advancement in civilization that we have attained. Surely if we can make it a crime for a man to steal a loaf of bread we ought to make it a crime to defraud the public of millions of dollars. But we are not doing that, we are making no effort to do it; we shield him, we protect him by the law. He is further protected because he has money and is therefore able to appeal from court to court. If we had a government with the will to do it, it would be a simple thing to make this kind of fraud a crime and enforce the law in respect to it.

The Prime Minister waxed eloquent about the necessity of maintaining the independence of our judiciary, yet there are cases where our judges have said that it is not possible under existing circumstances for employers to pay the minimum wage. Thus the judges themselves are deliberately setting at naught the laws of this country. I say that when a judge does that I have no respect for the judge, he is a disgrace to the judiciary and ought not to be protected, although he may have an honoured position that has come down from earlier times when judges were perhaps a little more impartial than some of them are proving to be to-day. I quote the Prime Minister again:

> Behold the sad and idle multitudes throughout the world. If the system is functioning as it should why are there so many unemployed?

And the Prime Minister gave his own answer:

> The real answer is that there is something wrong with the system....

I am not going to quote further. I submit that it is obvious that the Prime Minister himself has recognized some of the fundamental evils that exist under our system. He has clearly outlined them. A few months ago he promised that we would have regulation, presumably regulation that would deal effectively with these problems, but so far in this whole program, and particularly in the bill we have before us, we have no machinery through which we may hope to overcome these evils.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): Before this bill passes I desire to make a few observations. for I think it is too important a matter to let pass without something more than is provided in the bill. The bill is intended to implement one of the recommendations of the price spreads and mass buying commission. It is one of many bills intended to fulfil that purpose. We had Bill No. 70, an amendment to the Weights and Measures Act, then we had the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Amendment Act, and the Criminal Code amendment, and following that the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, and then amendments to the Combines Investigation Act followed by amendments to the Companies Act, and now we have this bill.

I listened yesterday with a great deal of interest to the Prime Minister, and with some of the things he said I agree, but on the whole I was at a loss to understand why, with the knowledge he had of the conditions, he appointed this commission at all. He told us of a committee appointed in 1919 of which the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) was vice-chairman, and how they made certain recommendations that were implemented by legislation, and later on that legislation was declared by the privy council to be ultra vires. Then he told us that in the legislation that has been brought down we have gone as far as we can go under the constitution. He says we must proceed in a constitutional manner. If this legislation really amounts to nothing more than a trifling amendment of a few existing statutes, if that is all the government can do, and the Prime Minister knew that was all, why did he appoint this commission at such great cost to the country? This commission has cost this country hundreds of thousands of dollars; is no good to come from it? I agree entirely with what the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) said with reference to this anaemic legislation. He was one of the leading lights of that commission, and he refers to these measures as anaemic legislation.

Speaking in connection with this bill the other day the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) mentioned the tragic conditions that have grown up among us and that are challenging our attention. In any speech he has made the hon. member has never put the blame for those conditions just where, in my opinion, it belongs. In speaking along these lines some years ago I said, and I repeat to-day, that the effect of the tariff on our external trade has been largely responsible for the conditions that have arisen in this country. We hear a great deal to-day about over-production as one of the main causes of our present distressing conditions. Since we have heard and read some of the findings of this commission those of us who have little faith in the value of tariffs for the purpose of protecting industry are more than ever convinced that Canada has gone entirely too far in the matter of tariff protection to industry. After all, though that protection may be of assistance to some ten or fifteen per cent of the people of the country it is detrimental to the other eighty-five or ninety per cent, and for that reason I have no faith in the efficacy of tariffs to bring relief from the situation that now exists. We have further evidence of that in the fact that in the last few years we have had the highest tariffs ever known in this country, but during the same time we have had the most distressing conditions we have ever known. Let me repeat, then, that I am convinced that high tariffs, with their inevitable effect upon external trade, are responsible in large measure for our present troubles.

I agree entirely with what the hon. member for East Kootenay said yesterday, that the small business man must have a chance. We realize that in the last few years he has not had a chance, but what greater chance will he have under the legislation that has been brought down? It amounts to very little. The main criticism I have in connection with the commission that sat for so long and that brought in a very voluminous report is that they went entirely too far afield in their investigations. They should have been satisfied to take a few conditions that were known to exist and investigate them thoroughly. If that had been done I believe they could have found some means of alleviating some of those difficulties. I contend that the dissenting report of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) strikes at the root of the problem, not only when it deals with the effects of the tariff but also when it speaks of competition. In their report the commission deal quite extensively with the question of competition in business, and I should like to refer to one or two of their findings in order to show whether or not the lack of competition has been a real factor in bringing about the present situation. At page 61 of that report, dealing with the agricultural implement industry, they say:

> The domination of the four large companies in this industry also affords an example of the existence of what has been referred to as imperfect competition. Of the four large companies, one, International Harvester Company of Canada, Limited, is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the largest American organization in this industry, and its policy is therefore determined by the management of that organization. Massey-Harris Company, Limited, and Cockshutt Plow Company, Limited, the shares of which are both widely distributed, may also be said to be management-controlled. The fourth company, Frost and Wood Company, Limited, has for many years been virtually, and now is actually, a subsidiary of Cockshutt Plow Company, Limited. We therefore have a situation where the managements of three large companies dominate the industry in Canada. As a result of this situation competition between them is "imperfect," rather than "simple." This is shown, even in the absence of direct agreement or affiliation, by the maintenance over a long period of years of substantial similarity in prices and practices. Due to the dominant position occupied by these companies for many years and the policies which they have adopted, no cut-throat competition has occurred in this industry either before or since the depression. We have seen in other industries how competition of that nature can lead to abuses and unethical practices, and, while this industry and its employees may in this respect have been more fortunate than some others, it is probable that absence of simple competition has resulted in higher prices to farmers than would otherwise have obtained.

There is another reference to competition in another industry, from which I should like to read a short paragraph. At page 81, dealing with the textile industry, the commission say:

> One evidence of the imperfect character of the competition within this group is the fact that the larger companies fail to compete with each other in certain goods. Thus the Dominion Textile Company, Limited, does not manufacture cotton denim, while other companies are the sole producers of other important lines. This means that the wholesaler, who wishes to carry a complete line of cottons, has to buy from all the larger companies.

To me, Mr. Speaker, that is sufficient proof that lack of competition is partly responsible for the present distressed conditions in Canada, because these two industries to which I have referred are two of the highly protected industries in this country, and the report says there is little if any competition in them. They are two of the industries that are bleeding the people whom I represent in this house, probably to a greater extent than any other industries.

In view of what has been said with regard to the lack of competition I am at a loss to understand why a few days ago the leader of the C.C.F. group in this house, who spoke just before me, rather ridiculed the hon. member for Weyburn for his advocacy of what he called fair competition. Where there is unfair or what has been called imperfect competition—whatever that means—in these industries it has been shown that as a result the farmers are paying more for what they buy than they would pay if there was fair competition. As a result of the high tariff there is no competition, because the manufacturers of those goods in other countries cannot send in their goods to compete.

It is also shown in the report that the lowest wages are paid in some of the most highly protected industries. In view of that fact, and in view of the other matters revealed by the report, I do not think the bill now before the house goes far enough. I agree with the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), who was a member of the committee when it was first appointed, that it is nothing less than anaemic legislation. If ever a board was necessary to devote its whole time to trade and industry, certainly it is necessary at this time. The bill proposes to give such control to a part-time board; that is, the tariff board will devote part of its time to this work.

Near the end of the session for 1933 a bill was introduced by the Prime Minister whereby he increased by $3,000 the salary of the chairman of the tariff board, who was then receiving $12,000. As a reason the Prime Minister stated that the position held by the chairman was a very important one and must be filled by a man of outstanding ability. Therefore he contended it was necessary that the chairman be given the additional salary. Some of us opposed it at that time, and we still believe the increase was unnecessary.

My point is this. If in 1933 the position was so important that the chairman had to have an additional $3,000, then I say it is too important to take on this extra work. He has not the time, and if he has the time then I say he has been paid entirely too much—and I have no doubt he has been paid too much, for a position such as the one he occupies. A board to control trade and industry would be much more important than a tariff board. The three members on the tariff board receive a total sum of $35,000 in salaries. I contend that if we were to disband that board and appoint one consisting of seven members we could get that number of men for the same amount or less; we could get men conversant with the different angles of industry, and the chairman could remain here in the city of Ottawa. By all means however let us have a board competent to deal with these matters.

To me the findings of the committee and the legislation based thereon have been most disappointing. As long ago as November of 1932 I placed upon the order paper a resolution in these words:

> That in the opinion of this house an immediate inquiry should be made under the provisions of the Research Council Act, chapter 177, R.S.C. 1927 or by other means, into the causes underlying the wide spread between the prices of raw products and the prices of goods manufactured from such products.

At the time I introduced the resolution I presented some specific cases wherein there were wide spreads between the prices of raw and manufactured products. Upon that occasion I made special reference to wool and leather goods, and like commodities. I was supported in the resolution by two or three of my colleagues, but I should like to draw attention to the fact that although the hon. member who preceded me is very much concerned to-day about what is being done under this legislation, I did not receive his support when on February 6, 1933, I introduced the resolution to which I have referred. As I recall the circumstances, during the discussion of that resolution one of the members of the C.C.F. group to which the hon. member belongs was in the house, and part of the time two members were here. Upon that occasion they were not concerned about the resolution, but now they pretend to be very much concerned about what is going to happen. When I introduced the resolution I called the attention of hon. members to the fact that while the price of wool was only about four cents per pound, a man wishing to buy a suit of woollen underwear would have to pay for it at the rate of $3 per pound. I mentioned that while oats were selling at seven cents a bushel, oatmeal sold at five cents per pound; hides were selling at 25 cents each and shoes at from $7 to $10 per pair. To-day the Canadian people are not so much concerned about the method by which we propose to stop competition, but they do want to know how we propose to ensure them a reasonable return, and thereby bring about an equality between the amount they receive for their products and the amount they have to pay for supplies.

In the month of April I received a return from one of my constituents. This return purports to be a statement from the Saskatchewan Cooperative Creameries. This gentleman in the month of March sent 30 dozen eggs to the company's plant at Regina, and the return he received indicated that the eggs were graded in classes A, B and C. according to quality. His total receipt for the 30 dozen eggs amounted to only $1.67. In the note which he sent to me he stated that on March 11 the eggs were sold for 5½ cents a dozen, but that on April 8, the date of writing, they could not be sold for enough to pay for transportation.

After putting this country to an expense of hundreds of thousands of dollars in carrying on an investigation I believe the Prime Minister is not fair in stating, as he did yesterday, that we have gone as far as we can under the constitution. If that is so I say he should not have appointed the commission, and should have followed the suggestion I made in February of 1933, more than two years ago. This work could have been done by the research council without cost to the country, and I have no doubt that in the final analysis some means could have been found whereby to a certain extent at least we could have been relieved from the conditions which still exist.

In my view the inquiry has certainly fallen short of what was expected. What advantage will it be to my constituents if I have to tell them that one result of this expensive inquiry is that if they allow a man to work for half an hour over the allotted time they will be liable to a fine or imprisonment. Sometimes a man comes along—I have had this experience—wanting a job at any wage. If in that circumstance you have not very much work to do but consent to give him a dollar a day you will be liable to a fine or imprisonment for accepting the services of the man in question, and for giving him a home but paying him less than standard wages. That is about the only result we have had from the investigation.

[Mr. R. McKenzie.]

The Prime Minister spoke about the constitution. In view of his knowledge of the inquiry held in 1919 I contend that since February of 1933 he has had plenty of time to amend the constitution so as to make it possible to do something for these distressed people who are suffering for want of legislation along those lines. I ask the government: Why did you not do it?

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to give a silent vote on this bill. I think the government deserves the utmost credit for being the first government since confederation to endeavour to do something through the regulation of trade and commerce, for the workers of this country. This particular bill to create a federal trade board will create a new industrial magna charta for the workers of this country. The Conservative party has done itself proud in the mass buying commission. It originated with the Conservative party, and all along the Conservative party has been the friend of labour and of the consumer.

We have had this session in my opinion too much law and too little common sense. We should forget that we are lawyers and endeavour to carry out as far as possible the very important recommendations which have been made by the mass buying commission. The purpose of this bill is to give a new deal to the masses of our people and it should not be approached by quoting law cases and decisions based on separate facts, because we are faced with a completely different set of facts now, owing to changed conditions, from those facing the fathers of confederation when the British North America Act was framed.

Ten years ago, Mr. Speaker, I advocated a federal trade commission, much of what is proposed in this particular bill, No. 86. Fortunately one of the cardinal principles of the British constitution and of our own constitution, which is part and parcel of it, is that the courts are subservient to the legislature. It was a great mistake in 1867 in so framing the British North America Act that we had any provincial legislatures at all. They were created by the fathers of confederation for political and not for economic purposes. The result has been that this government, which has done more for the working people than any other government since confederation has been very much hampered in framing this relief act or new deal, by stated cases and decisions of the courts on sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act.

The British North America Act is a relic of the past, and in my opinion confederation cannot last much longer unless we grapple with the problem and find a way to solve our economic and social problems in an orderly way. The day of free competition, of the open market, and of the law of supply and demand has gone, possibly forever. Great trusts, combines and monopolies in restraint of trade have been built up on these economic principles, and the abuses in this connection have brought about widespread misery and ruin to thousands of our people. As a result the greatest question in this country to-day is parliamentary and constitutional reform, cabinet reform and senate reform, especially in view of the decisions that have been quoted in this debate by lawyers inside the house and outside the house. I believe that very little progress will be made in solving our economic and social problems until we have constitutional and parliamentary reform. When I hear the learned quotations by the lawyers in this house and the recommendations of eminent lawyers outside the house, I am reminded of the words of Burke, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue." Or, as Tennyson says in his In Memoriam:

> Our little systems have their day;
> They have their day and cease to be.
> They are but broken lights of Thee,
> And Thou, O Lord, art more than they.

No country in the world has had such little regulation of trade and commerce as Canada. Look at only one section of the British North America Act, section 91, dealing with the powers of parliament, included in which is the power to regulate trade and commerce. That field has been unexplored ever since confederation; it is a no man's land. Section 91 of the British North America Act which defines the powers of this parliament, says "for greater certainty but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated," and the second subject mentioned is "the regulation of trade and commerce." Paragraph 27 of section 91 gives this parliament power to deal with the criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters, and the last paragraph of that section gives this parliament power to deal with the following classes of subjects:

> And any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces.

But there has been no effort to see or take advantage of this exclusive power, the regulation of trade and commerce by this parliament. That field, as I say, has been unexplored; it is a no man's land. No country has so little regulation of trade and commerce as Canada, although this parliament has exclusive jurisdiction over that subject. Compare Canada with the United States and Great Britain. The United States has the Clayton Act; the anti-Sherman law, the federal trade commission; regulations by the Secretary of Commerce; newspaper identity regulation; the Interstate Commerce Commission regulation. The legislation of the parliament of England is larger than that of any other country in the world. Yet they have national boards or councils regulating transportation, coal mining, transport, agriculture, the marketing of bacon and eggs and many other products with compulsory powers and beyond even the regulation or control of any court of law. In England, so much so that the MacDonald-Baldwin government are called by some people a soviet one in parliament, we talk about too much government in business, yet the big interests themselves are clamoring for government intervention. Had it not been for the government's intervention and help I do not know what would have happened to some of them. In view of the evidence that was given before the mass buying commission the people back home are demanding that an end be put to the legalized injustices and tyrannies of modern capitalism in Canada, to the detriment of bona fide and legitimate private enterprise.

Private enterprise which brings all ranks of society together into personal contact whether in large enterprises or in small, one-man business or enterprises or in retail business—all these in Canada are in harmony with natural law. Great trusts, combines and restraints of trade are not in Canada but are mostly directed by big financiers and politicians. They in Canada are in effect an application in practice of nothing else but the communist principle. Let us not forget then the injustices and tyrannies which so-called modern capitalism has inflicted on thousands of the men, women and children and poor people of Canada.

Let us keep that objective in mind and cease talking constitutional questions about the British North America Act. The time has come to stop pussyfooting and to tackle these great organizations that are subsidized and legalized by the state and directed mostly by great financiers and politicians. I speak of those trusts and combines trusts and restraints of trade which are nothing but an application of the communist principle. The average thinking man back home in this country thinks this particular bill is the most important bill that has ever come before parliament since confederation. The common people are demanding a policy that will help pull Canada out of the mire and get our workmen off the dole. They want to see planning by all governments, federal, provincial and municipal, to put half a million workers back to work by the end of the year. The country is ripe for just such leadership; it is waiting for a sign post showing which way we are going to go. This demand comes from the Conservative element in the Canadian nation, and we as a party must go forward to greater objectives. We want a new national policy such as this board is going to create. We must build our prosperity on a new and enduring basis. As the late Lord Salisbury said, the commonest error in politics is sticking to the carcasses of dead policies. Now is the time to do something. There are in my opinion too many Woodrow Wilsons in the legislatures of this country who are too proud to fight for legislation such as this. We should have had an act like this ten or twelve years ago. The field should have been explored then, and this country would not then have been in the economic turmoil it is in to-day.

I am sorry that some of the clauses in this bill have not been written into the criminal code, particularly those which deal with sweatshops. Notwithstanding what has been said about the criminal law of this country, the law courts have never had before them this vast field of trade and commerce which is placed exclusively under the jurisdiction of this parliament by section 91 of the British North America Act. Precedents have not been built up in the courts to deal with that particular section and because lawyers both in and out of the house say that a certain thing is so, does not make it so. No court of law has said that this sweatshop legislation cannot be written into the criminal law. Similar legislation has been written into the criminal law of the United States and the mother country and it can be done here as well. We have practically no regulation of trade and commerce except in connection with our external trade. As I said in a previous debate, we have not been spending enough time on our domestic problems and perhaps too much time upon our internatonal problems. Certain infringements, along social and economic lines could be made crimes by enactments of this legislature. Certain sections of the Clayton act and the Sherman anti-trust act could be written into our criminal code.

I believe Canada wants this trade commission to be up and doing. We want a trade commission with a kick in it. This commission should be under someone like the late Mr. Justice Mabee, a previous chairman of the railway board. That learned gentleman built up a number of rules and regulations. I regret that a judge has been chosen as head of this commission because if there is one board which should be under a layman, it is this particular one. The mass buying and price spreads had two good chairmen. One of them, the other day, a very brilliant young lawyer gave an address on this question in the house. What this country needs at the present time is a great public rights lawyer; then this parliament would not have to call in corporation lawyers. I have had considerable experience and I say that once a corporation lawyer, always a corporation lawyer, especially when interpreting the British North America Act. They see things in just one way. The Toronto street railway agreement, and the British North America Act have led to more litigation and references to the law courts than any other acts in history or that have come up in recent years. I am sorry this country has not produced a great public rights lawyer like Ferdinand Pecora of Washington. He straightened out things down there and showed up the abuses of big businessmen and Wall Street; many of these men had not paid a cent in income tax. We need a similar public rights lawyer in Canada to deal with the chisellers in this country. What has happened in connection with this matter happened in 1928 when the water power versus navigation matter was before the house. The Supreme Court of Canada was asked to answer certain abstract questions in connection with water and navigation rights on the St. Lawrence river but those questions were so abstract that neither the supreme court nor the privy council could give a proper answer, and they returned them as unanswered in part owing to their not being concrete.

The enforcement of federal laws is placed upon the provincial attorneys general. Why should not this government have law officers of its own to enforce all federal statutes in connection with all our acts and trade and commerce? We know the type of enforcement of our acts which will be carried out by the provincial attorneys general in Victoria, at Queens Park or in Halifax. Our own laws should be enforced by our own law officers. All the law of this country is not contained in the British North America Act. There is a written and unwritten law, we have as well precedents usages and customs.

This government has endeavoured to do things in a new deal in spite of the obstacles raised by the British North America Act. All along the Conservative party has been the real socialistic party and the real labour party. Nearly all the useful social legislation has come from this party. This party has given protection to the workingman.

Back in 1905 we saw what great constitutional lawyers could do. The Liberal government of that day attempted to keep the people away from the boon of cheap light and power in Ontario and some of the very same type of lawyers who have been arguing on this particular matter, gave somewhat similar decisions thirty years ago against the people owning their own power plants. I saw a cartoon the other day in the great paper published by Horace Greeley. It showed two sailors who had fallen overboard from a boat in New York harbour. They had life savers around them and were looking up at the sinking ship and saying, "Yet fundamentally the ship is sound." That puts me in mind of our economic ship, we thought it was sound but we have found out that it is not sound. For over one hundred years the working classes have been striving for power and they have it to-day in Canada. The controllers of property and commercial enterprises who have for the last 100 years had the political power have been losing it. What Disraeli called the suffering millions are going to decide the coming elections. During the past five years this government has brought Canada out of the mire, we have been blessed in the gifted Prime Minister we have had. The mass voter is fickle and even the responsible voter seems to be changeable. If we are to have national economic security we must make plain the principles and policies for which this party stands in bringing forward this important bill. The average voter thinks that if the state is able to distribute poverty, it should be able to distribute wealth. I believe in fair wages and security. This government has made a brave effort to solve these problems in the price spreads and mass buying committee and commission.

Something has been said with reference to those who have been opposing this particular legislation. Mr. Charles Burton of Toronto was referred to the other day by the hon. gentleman from South Winnipeg (Mr. Kennedy) who was chairman of the mass buying committee. I do not know what type of regulations this proposed board will have and I do not know of any board, human or divine, which has ever been able to regulate some of the institutions with which the gentleman I refer to has been connected. He was out west the other day and while he hides behind the luxuries of his Arcadian Court and ribbon counter; he wants to bring forth a scheme of regimentation of youth; he would have brigadier generals, major generals, honorary colonels, captains and all that sort of thing, a sort of regimented Coxey's army for the youth of this country. It would be much better if he would get up a regiment of profiteers middlemen, chisellers and tax evaders, bondholders, income tax dodgers, security and trust company racketeers and no par value shareholders. Mr. Burton used the words as reported, "shyster politicians" in referring to our mass buying commission, members of which worked hard for the people of this country. He would be far better engaged and more at home commanding such a big interest regiment than in criticizing a parliament which is making a brave effort to do something to remedy the evils that now exist. The Conservative party, which has done so much for the farmers and the working classes, is now making a genuine effort to solve the problems that face this country, and I hope that no amendments in another place will be made to the measure now before us. Amendments are coming in every day, from this place to the bar of the house to our clerk; 104 amendments have been brought in this week from another place, the Senate virtually vetoing the votes of the direct representatives of the people in this chamber. I hope that no amendments having any such effect will be made to this bill or accepted either.

The period from 1921 to 1930 constituted the golden age of mergers, trusts, combines and so on. The Insulls, the Morgans, the Mellons, the Youngs and the Mitchells of Canada were a regimentation that rode the crest of the wave, and nothing was done to stop them or to regulate them. These gigantic mergers were captained by Canadian supermen whose big brains were supposed to be guiding Canada to a greater future. To the average Canadian these gigantic financial manipulators and utility barons, security barons and trust barons were above suspicion; under them disaster seemed almost impossible. But they are no longer the master minds of Canada. I am surprised that on this question in this house the government did not have support, from the very beginning of this session, from all parties. The Liberal party of this country represents to-day the last stand of economic Liberalism in Canada. It relies on these social measures being declared unconstitutional. It is the party that for nine years had a chance to do something along these lines, but only dilly-dallied. It is the same party which in England opposed the factory acts and free schools, and the liberation of the trade unions. To-day it concentrates its attention in Canada on the tariff and on wider markets when wider markets are not available. The Liberal party in Canada is an advocate of social reform, pensions, doles, social insurance—all these are in its platform for the higher life, but they refuse to give to this house a plan or platform to grapple with the cause and effects of the social revolution and with those economic factors which deprive men of the bread of their own production and the fruits of their own toil. I believe that free trade and the error of the Liberal party's policies have been to the detriment of agriculture and of industry in Canada. Many children are in factories to-day who should be in school, and most of the young offenders who come before our courts are underprivileged children many of them from poverty stricken homes, who from birth have never had a proper chance.

In this bill, the Conservative party, which has always been constructive, is again constructive in its effort to solve the problem. The Conservative party has to its credit reform legislation such as the eight hour day bill and legislation for a minimum wage. This party is equipped by position and temperament to bring better order into Canadian life and industry, and to check the abuses which affect the consumer and the labourer. We should remove some of the unethical business practices, and bring protection up to date, eliminate the abuses to protect consumer and labour, and prevent further burdens and artificial barriers being placed on business. The main problem to be solved in Canada is unemployment. That is the main problem because no scheme of pensions and no scheme of unemployment insurance is a substitute for work and wages and the desire of people to work. Employment is the only real agency by which the nation's wealth can be distributed. Without consumption, production is a mere waste, and work and wages for all is the main agency of distribution. This party was the founder of protection, and it should dedicate itself to solving this problem of distributism and of getting people off the dole and back to work. Agriculture has always been traditionally associated with the Conservative party. As a party we stand for the further development and preservation of the home market for agriculture. Our own markets for our own products, and our own work for our own workmen is our policy. Agriculture is the oldest of our industries from the point of view of employment. It has been content to choose order instead of anarchy, and industry can be made amenable to similar treatment.

I believe this government has made a courageous effort to do what it can. We have heard express and implied doubts about this legislation and I regret that those doubts have come from the sources from which we have heard them. Such doubts should be expressed by the law courts and not by the law officers of the crown nor by retained corporation lawyers. It sems to me that in the future the government would be well advised to consult some public ownership lawyers, public rights lawyers and lawyers who have a knowledge of labour problems; they should consult lawyers with those sympathies when drafting legislation for improving the condition of the working classes.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. McKenzie) referred to a certain resolution he brought in in 1932 or 1933, and which did not, according to him, get the support of members in this corner. I do not remember just what that resolution was, but I presume it was one asking that some investigation be made or ameliorative measures be taken to protect either the farmer or the working classes from exploitation under the present capitalist system. I am sure that the hon. member for Assiniboia did not advocate the abolition of the capitalist system under which such exploitation takes place and must take place; and if we did not support him it was because we had a better solution for the problem, namely, the abolition of the system that gives rise to all these conditions of which complaints are made.

The attitude of many members in this house reminds me of a story of a certain city council in a town where one of the streets crossed a large ravine. Many accidents were taking place in this ravine, vehicles kept running off, but the city fathers would not put up a railing. Instead they insisted on keeping an ambulance at the foot of the ravine to take care of victims. My friend from Assiniboia will not put up a railing nor abolish the danger, he is satisfied to have an ambulance at the foot to take care of the victims of the capitalist system. And I am sorry to say that he is not the only one in the house who takes that position; I am afraid the great majority do.

I do not think that any member need apologize for discussing this bill at this stage. It is an important bill, the purpose being to give effect to some of the findings of the commission on price spreads and mass buying. We are fairly well accustomed to committees and commissions in this country, but I doubt whether we ever had a commission or a committee of investigation that created such a stir or so roused the people of the country as did the findings and the evidence of this commission. The country was shocked at the evidence brought out. The press gave wide publicity to the evidence, not only in its news columns but in the way of editorial comment on the practices that were found to prevail. I believe also that the work of the commission was well done, and the report is well prepared. Although we may differ as to the conclusions reached and some of the remedies proposed, we must commend the members of the commission for the way in which they performed their work.

The commission was almost unanimous in its findings. There is of course a minority report by one of the Liberal members of the commission, but I note that even the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) agrees with some of the findings. For instance he agrees that the government should prohibit the sale of diseased meat. Possibly he made that concession in a weak moment. I am glad he went that far, but his reasons for doing so are not very convincing. After he said that, he opposed the recommendation of the other commissioners that old and thin animals should not be allowed to be sold on the market as food because he held that they were going too far, as their recommendation deprived the owners of such animals of a market, and shut off poor people from a source of food they could afford. If his argument is true of old and thin animals it is equally true of diseased animals.

But after all what did the commission find? They found enormous and far-reaching concentration of industry and finance. They found ruthless crushing of the small capitalist by the big capitalist. They found merciless exploitation of the working class in the shambles of capitalist industry. They found equally ruthless exploitation of the farmer through the control of credit, through virtual monopoly in the production of the implements he uses, and above all through control of the market in which he must dispose of his product. But it was not necessary to appoint a commission to find that out; it was apparent to anyone who made even a superficial study of the present system. I noticed that in a paper put out by the Liberal party a short time ago, in which they analyzed each member of the group in this corner of the house, I was put down as an out and out Marxian socialist. I never aspired to that high honour. I know of people who do aspire to it and I wish they did not. But if my hon. friends to my right would give a little more study to Karl Marx and less to Adam Smith and Ricardo and some others they would be on surer ground and would not have to change their position so often. Let us see what Karl Marx had to say on the concentration of industry, not this year nor last year but some sixty or sixty-five years ago. The writings of a man who could see so clearly into the future on even this one point are worthy of some consideration. Referring to the concentration of capital he said:

> It comprises a series of forcible methods,—

Such methods as were found by the price spreads commission.

> —of which we have passed in review only those that have been epoch-making as methods of the primitive accumulation of capital. The expropriation of the immediate producers was accomplished with merciless vandalism, and under the stimulus of passions the most infamous, the most sordid, the pettiest, the most meanly odious. Self-earned private property, that is based, so to say, on the fusing together of the isolated, independent labouring individual with the conditions of his labour, is supplanted by capitalistic private property, which rests on the exploitation of the nominally free labour of others, i.e. on wages-labour.
> As soon as this process of transformation has sufficiently decomposed the old society from top to bottom, as soon as the labourers are turned into proletarians, their means of labour into capital, as soon as the capitalist mode of production stands on its own feet, then the further socialization of labour and further transformation of the land and other means of production into socially exploited and, therefore, common means of production, as well as the further expropriation of private proprietors, takes a new form.

That is, labour having already been cut off from all contact with the means of life, then the small capitalist goes in his turn:

> That which is now to be expropriated is no longer the labourer working for himself, but the capitalist exploiting many labourers. This expropriation is accomplished by the action of the immanent laws of capitalistic production itself, by the centralization of capital. One capitalist always kills many. Hand in hand with this centralization, or this expropriation of many capitalists by few, develop, on an ever-extending scale, the cooperative form of the labour-process, the conscious technical application of science, the methodical cultivation of the soil, the transformation of the instruments of labour into instruments of labour only usuable in common, the economizing of all means of production by their use as the means of production of combined, socialized labour, the entanglement of all peoples in the net of the world-market, and this, the international character of the capitalistic regime.

Have we not arrived there now? Is not that what the price spreads commission found even in this new country? Then he continues:

Along with the constantly diminishing number of the magnates of capital who usurp and monopolize all advantages of this process of transformation, grows the mass of misery, oppression, slavery, degradation, exploitation;—

Is that not also what the committee found?

—but with this too grows the revolt of the working class, a class always increasing in numbers.... The monopoly of capital becomes a fetter upon the mode of production, which has sprung up and flourished along with, and under it.

Now we have just arrived at that stage, where capital has so developed and the means of further extension are closed, where there is no further opening for the investment of new capital; then the capitalistic mode of production, instead of being an incentive to production, has become a fetter on production. That is what the price spreads commission found. It does not make any difference how many laws and rules and regulations we provide for industry, industry at the present time cannot make a profit except by restricting production.

Now, as I said I have no great fault to find with the report of the price spreads and mass buying commission. I believe the commissioners did their work well. But they made the recommendations which they did because they did not understand the nature of capitalism. I will say this for the hon. member for Weyburn who brought in the minority report, that he has the courage of his convictions. He believes that if you let the law of supply and demand have free play everything will be well; that if we have what is called fair competition that is all we need. But there can be no such thing as fair competition. Competition of any kind presupposes some advantage by someone of those who are competing. If people are competing for a known objective, a limited reward, then the position of the person who gets the reward is thereby improved. Even in the animal world, where the power of organization is non-existent, the strongest and fastest have the advantage. But when you come to human society, where there is the advantage of social organization as well as other advantages, when one advantage is gained it is socially organized by the individual or group attaining it, and he or it is then better equipped for the next struggle. For that reason what the commission found, the great concentration of capital, is inevitable under the capitalist system. Everything it has found, as I have said before, has been stated from a thousand platforms in this dominion during the last forty years. It has merely cited, as it were, chapter and verse; it has said this is where the exploitation has taken place and there is where the ruthless competition has occurred; this is the company that has done this and that is the company that has done that. That is all that is new in the report. I am wondering where the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) has been all these years. He is not in his seat now, but I may say that he is intelligent and industrious, and that for the last twenty-five years he has been living under circumstances which would have made it very easy for him to acquaint himself with the development of capitalism.

In its findings the commission has drawn attention to the concentration of capital, and in presenting those findings to parliament it draws the conclusion that this great concentration of capital is bad because it interferes with the activities, if you like, of the small capitalist, who no longer can compete on equal terms with the large capitalist. But in my opinion there is a far stronger argument than that against the concentration of capital in private hands. In the Canadian Forum of October, 1933 there appeared an article by Professor E. A. Forsey of McGill university, dealing with the concentration of power in Canadian industry; that was some considerable time prior to the appointment of the price spreads and mass buying committee. He said that perhaps one hundred persons here and abroad decide what we shall eat, what we shall drink, wherewithal we shall be clothed and most of our other activities. Then he went on to show the concentration of capital in the Dominion of Canada. First, with regard to banking, he said that three out of the ten banks had seventy per cent of the banking business, which meant that the other seven divided thirty per cent. In regard to trust companies he said that at that time there were forty-seven such companies in Canada, of which the four largest did seventy-seven per cent of the business. The three largest, the Montreal Trust, the Royal Trust and the National Trust, are closely linked with the three largest banks. Then we come to loan companies, of which there were thirty-six. Of these three did eighty-two per cent of the business. They also are interlocked with the large banks. At that time there were sixty-six life insurance companies, Canadian and foreign, doing business in Canada. Of those companies three, the Sun Life, the Metropolitan Life and the Canada Life, controlled almost half the total assets. Life insurance companies are also closely connected with the banks, as are the investment trusts. In connection with transportation, the Canadian Pacific Railway is an important member of the North Atlantic conference, which dominates shipping. Two Canadian Pacific directors are directors of Canada Steamship Lines, which virtually controls Canadian lake shipping. Five Canadian Pacific directors are directors of Canadian Airways, the most important commercial aviation company in Canada. In regard to communications, the express and telegraph systems belong to the two railway systems. In eastern Canada telephones are controlled by the Bell Telephone Company through direct ownership and interlocking directorates. The directorates of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Bell Telephone Company interlock also. In regard to electric power, apart form publicly owned systems it is almost entirely in the hands of three groups, the Holt interests, the Nesbitt-Thompson-Killam interests and the International Power and Paper Company. These three are linked up with subsidiary power companies across Canada. In connection with pulp and paper there were fifteen companies listed. One, the Canadian subsidiary of International Power and Paper, is interlocked with seven of these companies. In connection with iron and steel, Ford and General Motors dominate motor manufacture in Canada and International Harvester, Massey-Harris and Cockshutt Plough hold a similar position with regard to agricultural implements. In the general steel industry, Dominion Steel and Coal, Steel of Canada and Algoma Steel control the situation. Everyone knows that nickel is a complete monopoly. In regard to copper the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, a subsidiary of the Canadian Pacific Railway, holds a leading position. Cement is the virtual monopoly of the Canada Cement Company. In connection with oil refining the Imperial Oil Company, with assets of over $242,000,000, towers over its four competitors with combined assets of only $78,000,000. Rubber is in the hands of four companies. Textiles are largely in the hands or under the control of three main groups. Flour milling is controlled by four or five companies, four of which control a large part of the bread baking industry. Meat packing is in the hands of three or four companies and tobacco is almost entirely in the hands of one company.

Those were the conditions that were public knowledge before the price spreads and mass buying committee was appointed at all. What I find wrong in this situation is not so much that these large companies eliminate competition and crush the small, individual business; it is that these large companies control the means by which the rest of the community live and by which they must obtain access to the things they need in their everyday life. Such recommendations as have been brought in by the price spreads and mass buying commission are altogether inadequate in a situation like this. Through this control a few individuals, numbering perhaps not more than one hundred, can and do levy tribute on the rest of the community, and it seems to me that during the time I have been here parliament has been mainly concerned with seeing that they were allowed to levy this tribute without let or hindrance. I am reminded of the illustration used by Thomas Carlyle:

> The widow is gathering nettles for her children's supper. A perfumed landlord, lounging delicately in Paris, has an alchemy by which he will extract from her every third nettle, and call it rent and law.

If we change the perfumed landlord in Paris to a banker, an industrialist or a bondholder in Montreal, Toronto, New York or London and change rent and law to interest and profit, we have a clear picture of what Thomas Carlyle meant, so far as Canada is concerned at the present time. By the same methods as those used in Carlyle's time we find that today some landlords, some industrialists or other exploiters of labour take the value of the third stitch, if you like to put it that way, that the girl takes in her workroom in the attic or factory, and the third or possibly more than the third part of everything the farmer produces on his land. At page 111 of the report we find this statement:

> Frank exploitation of labour's weakness has been common. Evidence has followed evidence with monotonous regularity before the commission to show that, in many cases, the welfare of the worker is almost the last consideration that enters into the minds of employers in this industry.

The commission was referring to one of the industries. So long as the labour of the individual is a commodity which is bought and sold in the public market we are bound to have the conditions described in the report. The employer buys his labour in very much the same way he would buy anything else. He buys it the same as he buys the electric current used in his plant, and he pays the labourer the value of his labouring power based on its cost of production. The employer is not concerned with what may become of the individual labourer. His chief concern is that there may be other labourers to do the work when the one now being used is worn out or has passed out of the picture. All the labourer receives for his work is, on an average, enough to maintain himself in a condition whereby as the days pass he may reproduce his labour.

At page 7 we find the commission coming to this conclusion:

> It is the fierceness of the struggle, not any unusual depravity in the men concerned, which leads to the adoption of such practices. No one business man can afford to follow the dictates of his conscience and refuse to conform.
> If he did he would be eliminated.

Here we have a responsible commission making the statement that conditions in industry in Canada are such that no individual business man may allow his conscience to interfere in the administration of his business. After all we cannot be very greatly surprised at that statement, because in years gone by have we not boasted that there was no sentiment in business, and that we could not allow sentiment to enter into it? That being so, if business must be conducted in that way why should we find fault with the individuals who carry on in the manner indicated in the report?

I maintain that the only remedy for the situation is the abolition of the system under which we live, and the taking away from a few individuals the right to control our means of life, the means by which we obtain access to the things we need. The solution offered by the commission is as follows:

> The only way out is for all the members of a trade or industry to agree to ban certain unethical practices, or for the state to force them all to agree to such abandonment.

But before the ink was dry on that statement the commissioners saw its inadequacy and added:

> Such an agreement, however, often will involve conflicting loyalties, loyalty to the particular group of producers and loyalty to society at large. If the agreement is mainly one not to compete, but rather to share the advantages of monopoly, other groups in society have nothing to gain.

I submit that that is the difficulty in all our social relationships. In a society divided against itself, as ours is to-day, there is nothing we can do which does not interfere with the economic rights or liberties of somebody. That condition must obtain as long as our society is on a class basis.

I am reminded of a statement made by Doctor Mayo, one of the famous brothers of Rochester. A few years ago he was reported as having said that cancer in the human body was caused by one of the cells of the body ceasing to cooperate with the other cells and becoming predatory in character. Whether or not this is true I am not in a position to say, but we do know that when individuals or corporations consider only their own welfare they become a cancer on the social body. That is what has happened and is happening under the present capitalistic system. No individual is to blame for it. As the commission has pointed out, the fierceness of the struggle for existence in the competitive system compels us to do the very things about which we complain.

In a consideration of legislation to deal with the conditions I find myself to a great extent in agreement with the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) I believe it was, who said that the government should go ahead and pass the legislation it believed to be necessary, even if it were a little doubtful whether such legislation was constitutional. In my view we cannot place provincial problems in one compartment and federal problems in another, and state that one section must not infringe upon the other. It is my view that the problems confronting the federal member of parliament are the same problems which confront members of provincial legislatures, and where the political complexion of federal and provincial governments is the same I do not believe there should be any difficulty about those governments getting together and arriving at a conclusion as to what amendments may be necessary to carry out that which is in the best interests of the country. Nothing can be opposed to the interests of the dominion and at the same time favour the interests of a province.

There is another reason why I believe the government should go on with this legislation, even though there may be some doubt as to its constitutionality, namely, that when we find out who is opposing the necessary legislation we will be able to put our fingers on those who favour exploitation as against cooperative effort. I am sure that even that would be so much gain.

As far as the bill itself is concerned I think that the objections that have been taken to it so far are well founded. First of all the tariff board is already too busy with its own work to have this additional burden cast upon it, and the recommendations put into effect by this bill are too important to be a secondary consideration of any board or commission. I could find many reasons for opposing the bill on the ground that it does not go far enough but I suppose like other members I shall have to content myself with half or a quarter of a loaf when we cannot get the whole of it.

EIGHT HOUR DAY

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate that this house desires to acquaint their honours that in respect to the Senate amendments to Bill No. 21, an act to provide for limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the principle of the eight hour day or of the forty-eight hour week adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of 28th June, 1919, this house agrees with amendments one to eight inclusive;

And that with respect to Senate amendment No. 9, this house moves as a consequential amendment thereto, that the words "six months" be substituted for the words "three months";

And that the clerk of the house do carry the said message to the Senate.

He said: I believe hon. members have the reprinted bill before them. As I indicated the other night to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), I asked to have this bill reprinted so that the amendments of the Senate might be clearly understood. There is an amendment to section 3, line 27 of page 2. After the word "thereof" the words "other than an undertaking in which only members of the same family are employed" are added. That is an obvious necessity. In the succeeding line, the word "and" is substituted for the word "or." In section 5, line 41 of page 2, the word "hours" is inserted after the words "limit of eight." In line 42 the word "by" is substituted for the word "with." I think the word "with" is quite correct but as the Senate has made an amendment to change it to "by," it will be all right. In line 44 the word "such" is inserted after the word "no." In section 6 line 2 of page 3, the word "any" is inserted after the words "hours in." I think that is important. In the third line the same amendment is made, inserting after the words "hours in" the word "any"—"hours in any" one day. There is no amendment to section 7. Section 8 has been amended, as will be observed, by inserting after the word "average" in line 17, which is the last word of the section, the words:

Such regulation of the hours of work shall in no case affect any rest days which may be secured by the law of Canada to the workers in such processes in compensation for the weekly rest day.

I believe that is thought to be desirable. In section 9 we have the amendment which I have just moved. It will be observed by reference to the original bill, that it was proposed that the act should come into force three months after the date on which it is assented to, and in the bill as it left this house it read:

notwithstanding anything contained in this act, continue in force for a period of one year from the thirty-first day of March, 1935, unless suspended during such period by the governor in council.

This refers to agreements made with the running trades. It gave a period of one year from March 31, 1935, to enable them to make such arrangements as would conform to the provisions of the new law. In the Senate, after much discussion, one of the senators being very closely connected with the running trades of the railways, it was finally concluded that the section should be amended by placing, for the words:

one year from the thirty-first day of March, 1935, unless suspended during such period by the governor in council.

—the words "three months from the date of the coming into force of this act," which would mean six months from the date of royal assent being given. It has been felt that this is a matter in which, as there is acute difference of opinion, it is desirable to arrive at some arrangement that will clarify the situation without doing injustice, either remotely or nearly, to any interest that might be affected; and at the conference it was suggested that if the period of time originally proposed, namely, one year, were retained, it would be satisfactory, and inasmuch as a portion of the time has now elapsed, the provision for six months instead of one year from such and such a date—March 31, 1935—will in fact provide that identical time. For the act will come into force, presumably, three months from around about the end of June. That would be July, August and September, and it would then come into force on the first of October, and with the period of six months—October, November, December, January, February and March—you arrive at the original date as fixed by this house, namely, March 31, 1936. That is the consequential amendment which I have moved and which we indicate to the Senate that we ask them to accept.

Paragraph 10 of section 10 of the bill, it will be observed, has been rewritten, from line 36 to line 47 inclusive, and turning over the page, the rest of the section, lines 1 to 20, has been rewritten. I think that possibly as the new section reads it indicates the meaning of parliament more clearly than the old section, which read:

10. (1) The governor in council may by regulation except any or all employment in any industry from the limits of hours of work fixed by this act whenever he is satisfied that,

It will now provide that:

Whenever the governor in council, after consultation as required by the convention mentioned in the preamble to this act has been had, is satisfied that the work, or any class of work, in any industrial undertaking or class of industrial undertaking is—

This is done to tie the section to the convention and make it abundantly clear that with respect to this matter reliance is placed upon the convention and upon no other provision, in order to provide for the constitutionality—if I might without apology use that word in this house—of the measure itself. Perhaps it is unnecessary for me to read the new section beyond directing attention to its provisions.

Section 11 has also been somewhat modified for paragraph (a), as it was originally framed, has been deleted and a new subclause substituted therefor. If there are any questions I shall be glad to answer them, but I think it is obvious that the meaning of the new clause in the amendment as enacted by the Senate gives clearer expression to the meaning than we did in our subclause (a):

notify by means of the posting of notices in conspicuous places in the works or other suitable place, or by such other method as may be approved by the governor in council, the hours at which work begins and ends and where work is carried on by shifts, the hours at which each shift begins and ends. These hours shall be so fixed that the duration of the work shall not exceed the limits prescribed by this act, and when so notified they shall not be changed except with such notice and in such manner as may be approved by the governor in council.

That is the general sense of the original subsection, but for clarity I think the Senate clause is to be preferred. The next amendment is to section 12 and it leaves out those provisions that necessitated regulations being communicated to the international labour office at Geneva. It is felt that the general clauses cover that matter and there should not be specific reference to it in this particular case.

In section 13 the amendment is similar to that which I mentioned yesterday. After the words "shall" in line 3 the addition of the words "be guilty of an offence against this act and" is, I think, to be preferred to the original provision. In line 5 of section 13 "and not less than twenty dollars" is left out in connection with penalties. There is a view held by many draftsmen that it is undesirable to mention a minimum fine when a judicial body or tribunal is exercising discretion, and these words are left out. There is no change as to the date on which the act comes into force—three months after the date on which it is assented to. The general effect is that the textual changes made are an improvement in the measure. The section to which I particularly direct attention is a provision that ties the section to the convention. The consequential amendment will have the effect of bringing this act into force, qua agreements with running trades, on March 31, 1936, which was the date this house thought was reasonable at the time it first enacted the legislation, and which I believe is regarded as a reasonable time by those directly interested.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have a word or two to say with regard to section 9, the one amended, and in which amendment the right hon. gentleman does not concur.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have received some requests from unemployed railway men in my constituency asking me to support the amendment made by the Senate to section 9 with regard to delay, and that this house should not insist on the delay of one year mentioned in section 9. I find, however, that what they really want is that the bill should come into force six months after the royal assent. I think that is what the right hon. gentleman is moving in his amendment, so it meets their views, and I have nothing more to add.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish there to be any misunderstanding, because it is highly important that my hon. friend should understand exactly what I said. The proposals that I have made to the house would mean that the bill would become operative as an act six months after the lapse of the three months mentioned in the last clause, that is nine months in all. It was a year; it will now be practically nine months, as part of the time has elapsed.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I only wish to put before the house the request of those people that it should come into force at least within six months after the royal assent.

Mr. McGREGOR: As I have many unemployed railway men in my riding I want to register my protest against this bill being put through at this time. The bill was brought before the Senate committee, was discussed by them for a couple of days, and recommendation made, and I protest on behalf of the unemployed railway men in my riding against this extension of time.

Motion (Mr. Bennett) agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READING

Bill No. 113 for the relief of Dora Eleanor Mathieson Campbell—Mr. Vallance.

MINIMUM WAGE

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate that this house agrees with all the Senate amendments to Bill No. 40, an act to provide for minimum wages pursuant to the convention concerning minimum wages adopted by the International Labour Organization in accordance with the provisions of part XIII of the treaty of Versailles and of the corresponding parts of the other treaties of peace, and that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That we agree to all the amendments?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. LAPOINTE: What are they?

Mr. BENNETT: They have rewritten part of the bill. If hon. gentlemen so desire I shall be glad to point out what the changes are.

The provisions of the preamble have not been changed, nor has section 1. But on pages 2, 3 and 4 it will be observed that the sections have been entirely recast, down to the end of section 8. The effect is that the section has been tied closely to the terms of the convention. The law officers of the Senate thought it advisable, and the Senate committee agreed, that the terms used in the convention should be reproduced, for the purpose of dealing with, for instance, rateable trades and matters of that sort. It will be observed on the page opposite page 2 that words that were not defined in the bill as it left the house have been defined in accordance with the terms of the convention. Some of the changes are very slight but others are quite substantial. Section 3 is recast. Section 4 permits the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister to create, and by regulation provide for the operation of, machinery with respect to minimum wages. Section 5 is recast, and in section 6 there is quite a change. You will observe particularly words to which attention might be directed as having been added:

> the trade and commerce, or the public revenue, of Canada is being injuriously affected by the absence of uniform minimum rates of wages,

That has been added by the Senate. The words that have been used in section 5 and other sections, "decent standard" have been taken out and the words "suitable standard" substituted. It seems to me that perhaps that is an improvement. Those are the essential changes that have been made, in substance, and the recasting has continued, as will be observed opposite page 4. I think I should direct the attention of the house to the last section opposite the end of page 4:

> Subsection one of section four of this act and section five of this act shall not come into force until proclaimed by the governor in council.

I think I explained when this bill was before the house originally that it does not come into force until the time limited, because the convention itself did not become operative merely by ratification—I will read the article in order that there may be no difficulty. Article 7 provides:

> This convention shall be binding only upon those members whose ratifications have been registered with the secretariat.
> It shall come into force twelve months after the date on which the ratifications of two members of the international labour organization have been registered with the secretary-general.

I pointed out that this happened, of course, before the convention was submitted to this house. The last paragraph of article 7 is the governing paragraph:

> Thereafter, this convention shall come into force for any member twelve months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

Our ratification was registered on the 25th day of April, 1935; therefore the convention does not come into force until twelve months after that date. The amendment made by the senate provides that subsection 1 of section 4 and section 5 shall not come into force until proclaimed by the governor in council, in order that the full twelve months may expire after ratification before the proclamation is made with respect to those provisions that are tied up to the convention itself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does that mean a year from now at least?

Mr. BENNETT: Substantially; April 25, 1936, to be exact. That is why it is provided that a proclamation is to be made, in order that the full year may have expired before it comes into force. That refers to section 5 as rewritten and to the provisions of subsection 1 of section 4, and in order that there may be no difficulty about it I will read that subsection:

> 4. (1) The governor in council may on the recommendation of the minister create, and by regulation provide for the operation by or under the minister of, machinery whereby minimum rates of wages can be fixed for workers employed in rateable trades.

And the act, as recast, defines rateable trades in accordance with the terms of the convention.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I desire only to say that my concurrence in these amendments does not mean that my view as to the power of this parliament to enact this legislation is altered in any way.

Mr. FACTOR: May I ask why section 12 was changed to provide that the act shall not come into force until proclamation?

Mr. BENNETT: I am always willing to accommodate hon. gentlemen, but I have just concluded stating the reason. Shortly put, the provisions of the convention under which this statute has been framed do not come into force until twelve months after the ratification has been registered at Geneva. Our ratification was registered on the 25th day of April, 1935; therefore the twelve months will not expire until the 25th day of April, 1936. It is desirable, therefore, that these sections that depend upon the convention for their validity should not come into force until proclamation, on a date subsequent to the 25th day of April, 1936.

Mr. NEILL: Do the other sections come into effect on assent?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

POST OFFICE ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 100 to amend the Post Office Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think I explained this bill when I introduced it. It contains only one clause, which provides that a contract for mail service may be renewed for more than a single term. During the past fifty years, I have been informed, it has been the custom in the Post Office Department to renew mail contracts for terms of four years. The statute in that respect provided that where a contract was in other respects satisfactory the Postmaster General might renew the contract with the same contractor for a further term not exceeding four years. Recently the auditor general brought it to the attention of the Department of Justice that the language of the statute permitted only one renewal for a term of four years. This bill is to make it clear that the renewal may be made for additional terms of four years. As I say, during the past fifty years the practice has been to treat the law as giving a right to the Postmaster General to make not one but several renewals.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—No contract for more than four years.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I just want to ask whether this applies only to an expiring contract. I mean a contract could not be renewed two years before it expired, for instance?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, the act is quite definite on that. When a contract expires, if the terms are satisfactory the Postmaster General may renew it not only for one term of four years, but after it has expired again it may be renewed for a further term of four years.

Section agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT AMENDMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 80, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

[Mr. Bennett.]

He said: In moving concurrence in these amendments, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that they are purely to make clear what the senate conceived was not as clear as it might be. In clause (a) of subsection 7 of section 88 we find the following:

> that any transfer of property on the basis of a quid pro quo is nevertheless a gift, if, in his opinion, the values of the properties passing are disproportionate one to the other.

That is, if in the mind of the taxing authority there is any apparent difference between the exchange of properties he has the right to treat the one that has an excess of value over the other as a gift, if it is disproportionate. The senate have added the words "in whole or in part," making the subsection read:

> that any transfer of property of the basis of a quid pro quo is nevertheless a gift in whole or in part—

Those would seem to be excellent words to have added. Then in clause (a) of subsection 8 of section 88 these words occur:

> Gifts or donations made by any individual the aggregate value of which in any year does not exceed $4,000.

That is, gifts may be made up to $4,000. The Senate have added these words, "and taxation shall be on the amount in excess of $4,000 only"—which, of course, is, as we unfortunate lawyers would say, an abundant precaution, because in my judgment it is involved in the reading of the subsection itself. Under those circumstances I move that the amendments be concurred in, there being added also at the end of section 17 a new section.

> 18. All actions pending at the time when this act comes into force shall be decided as if this act had not been passed.

That is to meet the contention that it might be construed as retroactive when it did not so state. It is a protection, under circumstances of that kind.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

CERTAIN OFFICERS DEEMED TO BE PERMANENT EMPLOYEES

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence, for the Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 62, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Certain officers deemed to be permanent employees.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many will be affected by the amending section?

Mr. STIRLING: There are 333 employees now. With regard to the amending bill I should like to say that when the board came into existence seventeen years ago it was not clear what the scope of the work would be, nor was there any certainty as to its duration. So far as employees were concerned it reached a peak in May of 1920 when there were 1,594. It has dwindled down to 333, as I have indicated. The board has the surveillence of 21,268 properties, but besides that it looks after the work developed under the land settlement branch of the Department of Immigration and Colonization, which was formed in 1927. That adds considerably to its work and the possible duration of such work. I remember that in 1928 and 1929 the minister of that day considered the matter and I believe was favourably disposed towards it. Indeed, a committee of the house reported in favour of this change.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is right.

Mr. STIRLING: But it slipped up, and the government considers that the time is now ripe to take action.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am in favour of the bill; I was just asking how many would be affected.

Mr. STIRLING: I have referred to 333 who would be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): How many are ex-service men?

Mr. STIRLING: Ninety-eight per cent of the male employees.

Mr. NEILL: Will this cover field instructors—I mean the officers out in the field in the different country districts?

Mr. STIRLING: The bill uses the expression "any officer, instructor, clerk, stenographer or other employee"—it covers all employees.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FAIR WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOUR

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 75, respecting fair wages and hours of labour in relation to public works and contracts.

He said: The amendments are merely to make clear that which I believe is fairly clear in the statute as it reads now. In paragraph (a) of subsection 1, section 3, after the word "shall" have been added the words "during the continuance of the work" so that the paragraph as amended would read:

(a) All persons in the employ of the contractor, subcontractor, or any other person doing or contracting to do the whole or any part of the work contemplated by the contract shall during the continuance of the work be paid fair wages.

I believe that might have been reasonably inferred, but the Senate have added the words indicated. Then, in section 8 after the word "council" they have added the words "made before the execution of the contract." The effect of that is to modify the terms of the section so that it will read:

This act shall come into force on the first day of May, 1936, but shall not apply to any contract with the government of Canada existing at the said date nor to any contracts, agreements or works thereafter made or undertaken which are by order of the governor in council made before the execution of the contract declared to be excepted from the operation of the provisions of this act.

Someone has thought it very desirable that no temptation be placed in the way of the government to make any such exception after the contract is executed, and that the exception should be provided for before the execution of the contract itself. I think perhaps that is in the public interest.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The words "made before the execution of the contract" apply to the order of the governor in council.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the order must be made before the contract has been executed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I notice that section 7 states:

The Fair Wages and Eight Hour Day Act, 1930, is repealed.

And section 8 states:

This act shall come into force on the first day of May, 1936.

Is there any hiatus?

Mr. BENNETT: I am told by the law officers that there is not.

Mr. MITCHELL: What takes its place?

Mr. BENNETT: It is repealed as a matter of law when this comes into force.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Exactly.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

RADIO BROADCASTING

PROVISIONS OF ACT OF 1932-33 REENACTED FOR NINE MONTHS

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 99, respecting radio broadcasting.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before second reading is given to the bill I should like to make a few observations on the radio situation in Canada and the circumstances which have led this government to ask parliament to reenact the provisions of the Radio Broadcasting Act of 1932 for a further period of nine months, thereby extending the life of the commission to the end of the fiscal year.

When we studied the problem we did not have to make a decision of principle, because that question was settled in 1932 when the house unanimously decided that radio broadcasting in Canada should become a public utility. The statute, it is well to bear in mind, was enacted after the report of the Aird-Frigon commission which was organized by the administration of hon. members opposite and the report of the committee headed by the Deputy Speaker, both of which recommended and advocated the public ownership of radio. I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, of any change in the attitude or views of the great majority of the members of this house or of any change in public opinion as to the principle of the public ownership of radio. The principle of public ownership was also affirmed by the special committee which reported last session when special recommendations were made to the house. If the house will permit me to quote the first recommendation of that committee, it reads as follows:

> That in view of the evidence given before this committee the government should during the recess consider the advisability of amending the act with a view to securing better broadcasting facilities throughout the dominion. In the opinion of your committee radio broadcasting could best be conducted by a general manager.

As the house can see, the report did not even touch or raise the question of principle. The only question brought to the attention of the government was about the organization and the management of this utility. I can assure this house that the government has given most careful consideration to the report made by that committee, and after careful study we came to the conclusion that as we were nearing the end of the present parliament we should not interfere with the principle or with the organization of the commission at the present time. There is no doubt that this problem of radio in Canada is a very important one, but we thought that it was not urgent enough to come and ask the house at this session for drastic legislation amending the organization of the commission.

I think that in fairness to the personnel of the commission I should bring some considerations before the house concerning the commission's achievements. I think every member of this house will agree that the commission was entrusted with a very, very difficult task, a task that was somewhat in the nature of an experiment not only in Canada but all over the continent of America. The commission has hardly been two years in office, which is indeed a very short period within which to test the value of the system. Every member of the house I think will also admit that the commission has been further handicapped by the lack of funds. Nobody could expect the commission to build a network to cover half this continent, a network as complete as they have in Great Britain, in less than three years without any capital other than its appropriation of about one million dollars a year. In those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think that the record of the Canadian radio commission has been a creditable one.

I know that the commission has been very bitterly criticized from almost all sections of the country and I am frank to admit that many of the criticisms were well founded, but I think I should add immediately that those who voiced the criticisms did not allow for the handicaps under which the commission had to operate. The complaints against our present system were listed under two headings, coverage and programs. If hon. members will give me their attention for a few minutes I shall endeavour to give them an idea of what the commission has already tried to accomplish in spite of difficulties and limitations to improve the broadcasting facilities and provide better Canadian programs.

The objective assigned to the commission by parliament was the setting up of a national network built around three or four powerful stations, and the taking over of all private stations in Canada except the small or what we call the community stations. That undertaking everybody will admit involved considerable expenditure which the commission could not afford to make under the circumstances, with the meagre credits which were placed at their disposal. The commission has nevertheless managed to establish a network of its own which comprises seven stations situated at strategic points throughout the country, namely, stations CRCV, Vancouver; CRCW, Windsor; CRCT, Toronto; CRCO, Ottawa; CRCM, Montreal; CRCK, Quebec; CRCS, Chicoutimi.

Mr. EULER: How many stations are owned by the commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The seven I have just mentioned.

Mr. EULER: Is the one in Toronto owned by the commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think so. It is operated by a company but everything is paid by the commission. The commission has completed its network through agreements made with twenty or more private stations which carry its programs all over Canada. I am told that the commission is working to-day on a program of construction which it intends to carry out with the more generous allowance which we have voted this year and which will help to increase the coverage all over Canada.

The commission has further improved broadcasting facilities by granting licences to small stations which operate in districts where there was no coverage before.

I know that some hon. members of this house have criticized the commission because of the fact that the number of private stations has increased since the commission has been in operation, but the commission had not the necessary funds to establish its own stations, and in order to give better coverage to different parts of Canada the commission thought it well to issue private licences. I might mention in that connection the new stations at Prince Albert in northern Saskatchewan, at Sudbury in northern Ontario, at Sault Ste. Marie, Hull, New Carlisle on the Gaspé coast, and Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. The commission's programs are supplied without cost to all the private stations all over Canada.

May I add that the commission has carried out so far as possible the recommendations of the special committee of last session with respect to advertising, in which connection a more liberal interpretation was given by the commission as suggested by the report of the committee. The private stations were allowed to carry advertising for as much as fifteen per cent of their time.

Mr. EULER: Did they appoint a manager as suggested by the committee?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The first recommendation of the special committee dealing with the appointment of a manager did not concern the commission but the government, and to carry it out would require an amendment to the act.

Moreover, the private stations were permitted to use electrical transcriptions until 7.30 at night and even later in some cases. The commission has also endeavoured to cooperate with the private stations and assist them in every possible way in accordance with the fifth recommendation of the special committee. I do not intend to enter into any discussion in connection with programs as that is a matter of taste and personal preference. However, I will venture to say that the commission has provided us with distinctly Canadian programs of a higher quality and wider variety than we could have expected from our private stations with their limited resources. Besides the regular news and weather forecast services we have had opera, chamber and choral music, drama, educational talks covering a wide range of subjects and introducing the leaders in all fields of Canadian activity to the whole nation, band concerts, instrumental and vocal recitals, book reviews, news comments, children's programs, dance music, sports broadcasts and so forth. I am sure the establishment of our publicly owned radio system will have a far-reaching influence upon the future of music and drama in Canada. The commission has already discovered a good many Canadian artists of whom we may be proud and we may expect that it will encourage and help our gifted young Canadians. In the past there have been many gifted Canadians. I need mention only Edward Johnson who has been recently honoured. Artists like him might have been induced to establish themselves in Canada if an opportunity had been offered by such a radio system as we have now.

Another point which I wish to stress is the importance of the national service rendered by the Canadian radio broadcasting commission, as was demonstrated by the special broadcast on May 6 on the occasion of the silver jubilee of His Majesty the King. On that occasion Canada was united from coast to coast listening to the special ceremonies and the appropriate program. I am sure the house realizes that the credit for the Canadian participation in that extraordinary broadcast is due to the Canadian radio broadcasting commission. The facilities which have been organized by the commission in the past two years made it possible for Canadian listeners to enjoy that broadcast along with the rest of the empire.

The Canadian contribution on that occasion, entitled A Retrospect of Twenty-five Years in Canada, was produced and presented by the radio commission, and it was considered to be one of the best programs of that type ever presented. It was hailed as an impressive engineering feat as well as a most remarkable presentation. I am informed by the commission that innumerable messages were received congratulating them on the excellence of the Canadian cavalcade. One of the first messages received was from Sir John Reith, general director of the British Broadcasting Corporation.

I do not want to detain the house too long but I think in fairness to the personnel of the commission I should put on record a few of the observations made by some of the newspapers of Canada. The first comment appeared in the Hamilton Spectator of May 7, 1935, and reads:

> The engineers who were in control and all who had a share in yesterday's triumph of broadcasting deserve the admiration and thanks of the millions upon millions whom they provided with so rich a feast.

The Regina Leader-Post of May 8 commented as follows:

> The lot of the Canadian radio commission has been on the whole to receive more brickbats than boquets, but Canadians generally, we think, will be inclined to let up on the brickbats for a while as a result of the jubilee broadcast on Monday....

The Halifax Herald of May 8 contained the following:

> The King's jubilee was productive of one of the most remarkable pictures of the national unit which to-day is Canada.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not know whether I am in order but at the present time the minister seems to be putting on record the opinion of certain newspapers. I remember one time when I had occasion to refer to certain editorials and extracts from newspapers commenting upon some conduct of the government, I was stopped by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and my action was finally ruled out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is quite in order as long as he reads excerpts and does not read the whole article.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I assure my hon. friend that we intend to pass the bill.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In fairness to the commission I think we should put on record the general opinion on the achievements of this commission. That is why I intend to quote three or four lines of appreciation from almost all the newspapers of Canada, but if your honour holds that I am out of order I will desist.

The Moncton Times of May 9 said:

> Great credit is due the Canadian radio commission for the wonderful broadcasts which have been enjoyed by the people of Canada during the celebration of the King's silver jubilee. The empire-wide hook-up on Monday easily surpassed any similar achievement of the Canadian radio commission.

The Regina Star of May 9 said:

> The Canadian radio commission is generally given more kicks than ha'pence. Often those who complain of its operation take no consideration of the difficulties that inevitably accompany any new enterprise. But never has it more justified its existence than in the results it achieved on Monday last. Even those who have been prominent in their complaints have been compelled to acknowledge that it accomplished the best work it has ever yet undertaken, and in the future it may be recognized as a public utility that must be preserved and allowed to develop.

Similar comments appeared in the Calgary Herald, the Niagara Falls Review, the Halifax Star, the Kingston Whig-Standard and many others.

Mr. DUFF: Any from the Toronto Telegram?

Mr. DURANLEAU: If it is the desire of the house I would be willing to quote the letters of appreciation received from outstanding citizens of Canada and the United States.

Mr. DUFF: Has the minister any from the Toronto Telegram?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the Toronto Telegram with me.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Has the minister any of the comments made by British Columbia papers on the radio broadcasting reception during the past few years?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have brought with me only the extracts from the papers I mentioned.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Only favourable ones.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If my hon. friend will look at the papers of that time—the British Columbia press—he will find an appreciation of the performance of that day. It must be observed that the jubilee broadcast was not the first occasion on which the radio commission arranged for Canada to participate in an empire broadcast. Since 1932 the commission has arranged for this country to participate in the Empire Christmas broadcast, extending to Canadian listeners the privilege of hearing His Majesty's Christmas day message. Victoria day is similarly celebrated by an empire broadcast, and this year Canada was invited by the British Broadcasting Corporation to provide an appropriate program for distribution throughout the empire. The production plan of the commission on that day was a real credit to Canadian musical and artistic talent, and is a striking example of the opportunity our national broadcasting system offers to Canadian musicians, and artists in all parts of the empire. Cooperation in such a magnificent broadcast was not provided before the Canadian radio commission came into existence. I do not think we could have achieved the same results when the radio was under private direction.

Among other fields in which the radio commission has rendered conspicuous service is the broadcasting for Canadian listeners of special events of national significance. For instance, the broadcasting of the opening ceremonies of the present session of parliament—

Mr. CASGRAIN: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —was enthusiastically received by the people of Canada.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I direct your honour's attention to standing order 41, paragraph (o) of 293, at page 96, which declares that it is forbidden to read from a written, previously prepared speech. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman's speech is a prepared written speech. It is a brief.

An hon. MEMBER: Marked on the back.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think my hon. friend—

Mr. CASGRAIN: The point of order has been stated; I should like to have the Speaker decide.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think my hon. friend will insist on his point of order. I have notes—

Mr. LAPOINTE: He is a bad boy; he may insist.

Mr. DURANLEAU: This is a very technical matter and I think I am entitled to look at my notes when necessary.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You can do better than that.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order which has been raised is, I believe, well known to the house and certainly to the minister. As the minister himself says, however, the matter under discussion is somewhat technical and I believe he is merely referring to his notes whenever that course becomes necessary, because of the technical nature of certain of his remarks.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I desire to give a list of events of national importance which have been broadcast by the radio commission and which includes the celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Saint John, New Brunswick, by the United Empire Loyalists; the arrival and reception of the Italian air armada at Shediac and Montreal; the Institute of Pacific Relations at Banff, where the speakers included delegates from Canada, Great Britain, the United States, Japan and China, who were heard on the national network; the opening of the international grain exposition at Regina; the national remembrance day ceremony on parliament hill, Ottawa; special ceremonies in celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the landing of Jacques Cartier in Canada; the funeral services at the grave of the late Sir Arthur Currie, and the funeral of King Albert of Belgium, and also the ceremony of the marriage of the Duke of Kent and Princess Marina of Greece—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Give us more weddings.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —addresses by Lord and Lady Baden Powell at the banquet of the boy scouts' association. These are only a few of the special events broadcast by the radio commission.

Mr. DUFF: No mention of the five bedtime stories.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I contend also—

Mr. McINTOSH: Five lullabies.

Mr. DURANLEAU: —that the commission has rendered valuable service by cooperating with international institutions in their educational activities and campaigns for funds.

Mr. POWER: What about funds for campaigns?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think my hon. friends opposite will try to use the broadcast system to raise campaign funds for the next election. The commission cooperated with those in charge of the King George V silver jubilee cancer fund for Canada; the Canadian Red Cross Society; the Canadian Council on Child and Family Welfare, and similar institutions. The assistance of the radio commission in arranging broadcasts on behalf of Dominion of Canada loan campaigns was also very much appreciated.

I do not like to take up too much time but I may say this in conclusion. My hon. friends will agree that there is no imperative need for a change at the present time and that the government has taken the only reasonable course of action in asking this house to prolong the life of the commission to the end of the fiscal year.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I do not intend to speak at any length in reply to what the minister has said. Some weeks ago I was one of those critics to whom he referred and I made some comment and observations on the work of the commission, none of which I have any intention of withdrawing. At that time the minister made practically no reply to those criticisms. He has done so to some extent to-night by reading very copiously from what I suppose was supplied to him. I have no fault to find with that. I am satisfied with the statement he has made to-night, that many of the criticisms which were voiced in this house were justified by the facts. I am content with that, and I trust that the disabilities will be removed and the criticisms obviated by subsequent action on the part of this government or possibly by a future government. I can speak for those on this side when I say that we have no intention of blocking the bill. There is no opportunity now, at this late period of the session, to make any particular changes, and speaking for myself and, I think, for those on this side, we have no intention of interfering with the policy of public ownership of the radio. In conclusion, I may observe, though possibly it should be brought up when the house is in committee, that I, for one, am anxious to obtain from the government an answer with regard to what has been done respecting the suppression of free speech through regulation by the commission. I should like to ask the minister now whether he has given any instructions to the commission, or has anything to say to the house, with regard to that portion of their regulations which forbid anyone criticizing existing legislation.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to answer my hon. friend when the house is in committee.

Mr. EULER: Quite all right.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current): I am not a radio fan but I do have the opportunity of listening in on the radio now and then. I am not in a position to criticize the operations of the radio commission as far as the west is concerned. However, many criticisms have been made, and the extracts the minister read from the Regina Leader-Post and the Regina Daily Star both intimate that there is considerable criticism in the west. I have a letter from which I should like to read one or two extracts, not in opposition to the bill, but in order to bring to the attention of the minister and the commission some complaints that the people of the west feel are justified. This correspondent says:

> I am therefore taking the liberty to draw your attention to the inferior class of music being broadcast over the commission's network, and I hope that when the bill again comes before parliament these matters may be brought to the attention of the members and the government.
> I think you will admit that those who are to construct the programs should themselves have some knowledge of music; in fact they should have such training as would enable them to select the best artists available to play over the network.
> This is not the case. I think you will be familiar with Mr. Mayor's qualification as a director of programs a year or two ago. He came through the west and selected those who were to play over the commission's network. As an example of his choice, he selected one Al Smith from Prince Albert to be the pianist at the Regina station. He is, as they announce, a "natural" jazz player, but is full time pianist at this station, in spite of the fact that there are pianists here who have distinguished themselves abroad, and have degrees from such recognized institutions as the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music, London, England.
> If the commission is to continue, members of parliament should insist that it be modelled after the B.B.C. system. In their system, I understand, the program director is an outstanding musician, an artist of undisputed merit, who thoroughly understands instrumental, orchestral and choral music, and is competent to judge and select the best. If this were the case in Canada it would restore confidence in the commission and inspire our artists to qualify to play over the network. As conditions are to-day, our leading Canadian artists are not encouraged to contribute to the program.
> I think the public will appreciate the continuance of the commission on a much higher musical plane, where merit and good musicianship will be the standard for the artist who plays on the commission.

The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) asked if there had been any comments from the province of British Columbia. That is what the editor of the Western Music News, published in Vancouver, said in May of this year:

> We often wonder if outstanding Canadian musicians such as Dr. Healey Willan, Dr. Ernest MacMillan, Dr. Alfred Whitehead and many others we could mention have refused to contribute to our network, or have they had the opportunity? If programs of this type are released in the east it is unfortunate that they are not made available to western listeners.

Yes, we are so tired of crooners, jazz bands, blue singers, masters of ceremony "wise-cracking" upon silly song titles. The songs, fortunately, only live for a few weeks, but the singers live on.

Then with reference to the broadcast of the Border choir of Windsor, Ontario, on Sunday evening, April 14, this Western Music News compliments the commission in these words:

We congratulate the commission and the Border choir of Windsor for this worth while choral program. We hope we will hear the choir again, and much more music of the same standard.

I am only bringing that letter and the note from the Western Music News to the attention of the minister in the hope that both he and the commission will see fit to give us the kind of program that apparently the Regina Daily Star and the Regina Leader-Post anticipate will come some time in the future.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Provisions of act of 1932-33 reenacted for nine months.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Earlier in the session when an item in the estimates under radio was being discussed, I made the suggestion that it ought to be possible to adopt some such system as we have in the old country, where political leaders who have different views are allowed to use the broadcasting facilities for the purpose of expressing their views to the people. At the time although this suggestion was supported by other hon. members, it did not seem to meet with much favour on the part of the government. Perhaps I might offer another suggestion not so radical, but which I think should commend itself to the committee. We are going to have an election campaign in a few weeks, and radio broadcasting now is part of the activities of election campaigns more than at any former time, but unless you are provided with considerable money you cannot very well use these facilities. I am told that the commission asks the same rate for political addresses as for ordinary commercial service. I do not think that is fair. It ought at least to be possible to give a lower rate for the expression of opinions of candidates and especially of the leaders during the election, not the same rates as for advertising syrup and drugs and other goods. Would it be possible that the commission be instructed to give a lower rate for the use of the radio for political addresses, at least while the campaign is on, when it is important that all the electors of Canada should be enlightened on the various public questions submitted to them? I offer this suggestion and hope it will commend itself to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): On a former occasion when radio was before the house I asked to what extent the recommendations of the committee of last year had been implemented. I understand they have not been. I think at that time the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) promised a reply at a later day. I raise the question to-day because I was impressed with the fairness and strength of his statement at that time in regard to public ownership and the necessity for maintaining the principle. Since then it has come to my attention that there is a serious trend now developing in radio broadcasting in this country, a trend that affects stations of smaller power that may be leased to private owners. I am informed that there is a tendency towards the amalgamation or at least the leasing to chain companies of more and more of these privately owned low powered stations with, consequently, the quiet, steady growth of monopolies among these low powered stations. I do know of some illustrations of joint ownership, or single ownership, of a number of these stations; for example, the stations at North Bay, Kirkland Lake and Timmins are all owned by the same company or are all under the same general management. I think that is something that should be avoided, and I strongly recommend to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine that if the regulations can be amended to protect the principle of public ownership against this danger of a growing private monopoly among the small, low powered stations, it should be done. If it cannot be done by regulation then an amendment to the act should be passed. I suggest to the government that one way of meeting the difficulty would be to have a provision in the licence prohibiting the leasing of the station by the person or company securing the licence to construct and operate the station; in other words, that the right granted in the licence should not be transferable. In that way we would maintain the individual element in the operation of the low powered stations. Otherwise there is a serious danger in the general trend at the present time towards monopoly. I hope the Prime Minister will be able to amplify the statement he made the other evening.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not make any observations this evening because I thought the Minister of Marine had covered the whole situation. I discussed the matter with him and he was prepared to make the statement I otherwise would have made as to the carrying out of the recommendations that have been made. I have nothing to add to what he has said except that while I was in England a few weeks ago I made some inquiries as to the operation of the broadcasting system there. Dealing with the question that has been raised by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) I can only point out the difficulty the commission has in cases such as he has suggested, in finding the money to pay for the wire. They must pay either the telegraph or the telephone company for the use of wire in connection with these large broadcasts.

Mr. POWER: But apart from the telephone and telegraph companies; it is the rate of the commission itself.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to say that in England that difficulty is negligible. There they have a compact population, and they told me they had seven million licences outstanding. Here to carry a broadcast across the country involves large expenditure for the use of the wire. The commission itself has no wires of any great length, it has stations, as the minister has explained, but to connect all those stations and amplify the broadcast so that it may be carried with sufficient strength and power to all parts of the country involves large expenditures. Our rates do look very high, but when you come to think that it is three thousand miles from Ottawa to Vancouver you realize why they have to be, the commission having no facilities of their own. As I say, they have to use the facilities which they lease for that purpose, and that is where the expenditure comes in.

As the minister observed, the real fact is that there is a very earnest desire on the part of the commission to provide the country with better broadcasting facilities. To do so involves the expenditure of large sums of money for a high powered station in each province; perhaps not one in each province but at least seven high powered stations. They cost a good deal of money, and the equipment connected with them also costs a good deal of money. The funds of the commission are limited entirely to their receipts from the use of their facilities and the money received in licence fees. It is much more expensive than it would appear to operate these broadcasting stations.

[Mr. E. J. Garland.]

The only thing I was going to add to what the minister has said was that I brought back with me a copy of the report made by Sir John Reith on the situation in South Africa. They have decided to nationalize their broadcasting system and to establish the requisite number of stations. I brought the report with me intending to read some of the recommendations, but I find it unnecessary to do so now in view of what has been said.

I can only add that there is a great deal of sound reason in what the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) has said, because it is quite clear that numbers of small stations owned by the same firm or individual may create a sort of monopoly that will prevent the commission itself from discharging its full functions. But the power that rests in the radio act makes it perfectly clear that all these licences are issued subject to the overriding right of expropriation. There is one thing further: In consequence of certain information that reached me I ascertained upon inquiry that all new licences have been issued subject to the condition that the state may take over the facilities and that no value attaches for good will or franchise, that it is merely the value of the physical equipment whatever that may be. That is my understanding from the answer I received to my inquiry. It makes it much simpler if there is no franchise value attached and obviously one of the difficulties to which reference has been made disappears.

I do not see how the commission, with its limited revenues and its difficulty in making ends meet, can possibly expect to provide facilities for any of us on the terms suggested by the ex-Minister of Justice. It cannot afford to do so; that is the difficulty. Of course the British Broadcasting Corporation, while it is criticized as all corporations are, has had such public support behind it because of the character of its programs that one realizes that it fills a very long felt want on those islands. But you must remember that there are seven million licences outstanding and that the state receives all but 4s. 6d. of the 10s. 6d. received for a licence, and that on the 4s. 6d. plus the advertising, the sale of their programs and their recordings they are able to make a very substantial sum of money. Broadcasting House, the building they have erected at the end of Oxford street, is a magnificent property. It contains great concert halls; they have made provision for Sunday services; they can carry on several programs at the same time, and they have installed every modern device. Notwithstanding that, from time to time they are endeavouring to improve their facilities, as this service always must be improved. Just take one thing, the question of recordings. That is a modern development. It is possible for my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Justice to make a speech on the radio at ten o'clock this morning, and at the appropriate hour this evening it can be broadcast as though it were being delivered by him at the very moment it is being heard. The perfection of these recordings is a matter now of common knowledge. The progress that has been made in connection with these matters is most marvellous. Last night the governor general designate was being heard in this country very clearly; I suppose many members of the house heard him, speaking in England. When we think of the progress that has been made it really is amazing, and I do not think we have yet reached the end. Senator Marconi tells how warm a place in his heart he has for Canada, because the first signal he transmitted across the Atlantic ocean was largely made possible by the final help that was given him by this country. I fancy the right hon. gentleman opposite has personal knowledge of the statements I am making. He told me that had it not been for the assistance he received from Canada upon that occasion it is doubtful whether or not he would have been able to complete his experiment. When we reflect that the first signal transmitted across the Atlantic ocean from Newfoundland to Poldhu in Cornwall was largely through the confidence that Canada had in his ability to do so, and when we compare that first signal with what we have to-day, I believe we have some reason for satisfaction. In these days we can transmit wireless sounds across the Atlantic ocean with great facility. I understand on the sixth of May those sounds were transmitted in such a way that every person in Canada, either at a radio station or in his own house, could hear what was taking place in England. The electrical reproduction of it in the evening made it available to those who might have found it inconvenient to listen to the program as it was originally transmitted.

All these things cost money—vast sums of money. The only complaint I have ever had to offer was that possibly there was a tendency to be unduly critical of the very difficult position in which the commissioners first found themselves when they took over the organization of this great public utility, in the face of opposition of private owners. I say, and every man must know, that many of the privately owned stations were bitter in their denunciation of the publicly owned facilities, feeling that what would have been a profitable field in the future had been taken from them. They felt that while their property had not been confiscated they were prevented from carrying out that which they believed would have been a highly profitable venture in the future. That difficulty was encountered and I believe to some extent overcome. I have not been blind to the fact however that there has been an insidious campaign going on for the purpose of endeavouring to destroy the public facility from the standpoint of public approval of its operation. Hon. gentlemen may have no idea of the extent to which it was urged upon the government that the time would come when radio would cease to be operated as a public facility and be turned over to private enterprise.

We have not felt warranted in asking parliament for any sum of money beyond that derived from licence fees. The fact is that in a country such as ours, with enormous distances and a very limited number of licences, the record of the commission is something for which we have some reason to be proud. Mr. Graves, of the British Broadcasting Corporation, who was in Ottawa a short time ago, told me he had no idea we had done so much. When he saw the great distance over which the commission had to operate; when he realized the difficulties in connection with land lines and limited appropriations, small population and small number of licences, travelling from here to Halifax he expressed very great interest in what we were doing and voiced the belief that upon his return to Great Britain he would more clearly understand our difficulties than he had hoped when he left that country. He is the gentleman responsible for what are known as empire programs of the British Broadcasting Corporation. I suppose every hon. member knows that a substantial number of people from the old country have found homes in western Canada and have taken the greatest possible interest in the empire programs broadcast by the British Broadcasting Corporation. I was told the other day by the manager that the letters he had received from western Canada with regard to the type of program transmitted across the Atlantic ocean and reaching the far western parts of Canada had interested and amazed him.

Although this is a day of small things, Mr. Chairman, I believe we have reason to congratulate ourselves upon the fact that we have retained this facility as the property of the people and that for the moment there has been no weakening on the part of those charged with the responsibility in their determination to maintain it as a publicly owned facility. Although the future may demand expenditures on a more generous scale than we have heretofore been able to provide, I am satisfied that more and more the demand for this facility will continue, and that if we pursue, shall I say, the steady course that we are following, we will in Canada develop a system of broadcasting of which the Canadian people may well in every sense be truly proud.

I repeat, this is a day of small things, and at times we are apt to compare our requirements, if that word may be used, with those which can be provided by very rich and powerful peoples. We cannot erect stations costing many hundreds of thousands of dollars. We cannot provide all the facilities some of the privately owned corporations provide, but quietly, gradually and steadily we are improving the situation. I would say to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) that one of the matters with which the commission has been most concerned has been the difficulty of securing adequate coverage in the province of British Columbia. The hon. member, who is so familiar with the coast line and the sparse population scattered throughout the northern part of British Columbia and in the interior, and who is aware that a great part of the population is to be found in the cities of Vancouver and Victoria, will realize that with the limited revenues derived from licence fees the maintenance in the sparsely settled areas of a service such as is maintained in the more thickly populated communities is almost impossible. However the commission is most anxious to erect a station at a point which will provide ample coverage for the whole of British Columbia.

In the prairies they have had many difficulties to meet, largely on account of the large number of small stations. The combination about which the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) spoke is not lacking in that country. Although I had not intended to speak, I believe I might say to my fellow Canadians that comparing our facilities with those offered in the older and richer countries I believe Canadians, with the limited amount of money at their disposal, the difficulties in connection with organizing a service of this kind, and the further difficulty sometimes brought about by the use of two languages, may well be proud. All these factors enter into broadcasting difficulties. Because of our great area we have time changes at Fort William, again at Broadview and again at Field. Then we have to make allowance for daylight saving. These are factors which do not enter into broadcasting in a country such as Great Britain, but they are factors which must nevertheless be considered. The development of a system, for instance, which makes it possible for us to hear a concert in London is not an easy procedure, because there is a difference of five hours in time. Then there are certain adjustments necessary, difficulties in atmospheric changes, and the power of appliances required to move the signal away beyond the ether and the stratosphere so that it may cross the ocean and then be gathered together and reproduced in Canada. These are processes which are almost miraculous. Radio is one of those things which one can never thoroughly understand, and something which to the average person is as near a miracle as anything we know in the world to-day.

I do hope, as the days go by, whatever government is in office may see to it that there are some sort of, shall I say, expressions of approval wherever possible of the earnest effort that is being made to secure and maintain, and that these will not be lacking on the part of those holding positions such as we hold. I trust that the tendency to criticize and condemn, which is not always without some cause, will become less and less. Approval of earnest efforts to provide the people of Canada, despite limited revenues and great physical and other difficulties, will be duly and properly appreciated.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I find myself in pretty general agreement with what the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has just said respecting the general working of the radio commission. However I must come back to this one point, which I shall raise again. I am not altogether content with the assurance that the radio commission will have power or has power now to check any monopolistic development. The fact is I want them to exercise that power. I am informed, for example, that a very strong and financially important company, the General Electric, is at the present time preparing the organization of a holding company with which it proposes to control a large chain of now privately owned stations. In the last year or two there has of course been a very rapid increase, in my opinion too rapid an increase, in the number of licences issued to small private stations. I would have preferred to see that licensing limited to a much greater degree than it has been, but we are now faced with that tendency, and if it is permitted to continue unchecked, in spite of the provision to which the Prime Minister referred, you are eventually going to have a claim based on vested rights which it would be very difficult for this house and for the members of any government to overcome. I suggest that the proper step now to take is to make a provision in the licence whereby the licensee of a privately owned station shall not have the right to sublet that station or lease it for any period of time to any other interest but must operate it personally or through his own company. In that way you would meet this difficulty and stop the monopolistic trend that is now definitely developing.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has told us more than once I think that he is going to have a powerful station erected in Vancouver. I would ask him when we may expect construction of that station to begin? Might I say to him that in the meantime as an amelioration of the conditions of which we complain he might use his influence to have the present Vancouver station put on a different channel. Where I live on the west coast of Vancouver island cannot be more than 120 miles from Vancouver, and on certain occasions we can hear station CRCV quite clearly, but it is so close to another powerful station on the American side that when that American station is operating the Vancouver station is quite inaudible. That is the trouble. It is not that we cannot hear CRCV but that it gets mixed up with this powerful station on the American side. If a powerful station were erected at Vancouver it would drown the other out, but in the meantime would the minister use his influence to get the Vancouver station put on a different wave length?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I shall be pleased to suggest to the commission that they give another channel to that station if it is possible to do so, but as my hon. friend knows, the number of channels we have at our disposal is very limited, and almost all our channels are shared with the United States. I will suggest to the commission, however, that they do their best to accommodate the people of that district.

Mr. EULER: As I intimated a few moments ago I should like the minister to give some reply to the question we raised a few weeks ago with regard to that regulation of the commission which interfered with what we call free speech. I wish the minister would give us some assurance in that regard. We were promised by the minister and by the Minister of Finance that when this bill came up some correction of that regulation would be made.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is a fact that when my estimates were up it was promised by the Minister of Finance that we would see to it that regulation 90 be amended in order to satisfy my hon. friends if possible. After that sitting of the committee I asked the law clerks of the house to draft a regulation to replace regulation No. 90, and I will read the draft in question:

> No broadcasting station may broadcast any speech, printed matter or program containing defamatory, libellous or obscure statements with regard to persons or institutions, or statements of a treasonable character or intended to promote change by unlawful means and which might lead to a breach of the peace, or any advertising matter containing false or deceptive statements.

I think that will cover the case.

Mr. EULER: It is all right.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I will see that this draft regulation is adopted by the commission and ratified by order in council.

Mr. NEILL: The minister did not reply to my inquiry as to when he expected construction of the station in Vancouver to begin.

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is very hard to say at the present time when it will be started. I know that the commission is working on a plan which includes a powerful station at Vancouver. I cannot say now when it will be started, but I hope it will be soon.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FRUIT, VEGETABLES AND HONEY

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 95 respecting fruit, vegetables and honey.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Gobeil in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: As the minister did not treat us to any great elaboration on the second reading of this bill perhaps I might give him a lead by saying a few words myself. There is nothing very formidable, I will not say very unimportant, in this bill. There are two or three quite important features but not any serious changes from the past. As the explanatory notes say, the purpose of the bill is to consolidate and merge two bills into one, and to the extent that that is being done, it will add to the convenience of administration. There is another purpose, and that is to give effect to that part of the report of the price spreads commission referred to in the explanatory note to section eight. I presume this bill will be catalogued amongst the government's more modest reform measures because it does make a reference to price spreads and does make a little change in the act as it now applies to vegetables. The explanatory notes refer to section eight as being one of the changes made in consequence of the price spreads report. Section 8 indicates that the inspection of vegetables at canning factories will now be general instead of voluntary. This is following the practice of the past where the inspection and grading of commodities has been introduced as a voluntary proposition, then after sufficient people were interested and satisfied with such inspection service, it was extended to the country as a whole. This practice was found to be generally satisfactory although this government has not always adhered to it. I think however it is a safe practice to pursue. Then I understand there is a detention clause which will be applied in the future to vegetables as well as fruit and honey as at present. Perhaps the minister would explain this bill more fully.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member has touched upon practically everything in the bill. First, the purpose is as he has stated. This bill has been drafted for the convenience of those interested in fruit, vegetables and honey. The different legislation covering these commodities has been consolidated into one bill. There is really only one recommendation made by the price spreads and mass buying commission contained in this bill and that is the extension of inspection. The experience of the past has shown that voluntary inspection meets with an increased demand.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Have the canning factories generally applied for this?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): When it was first introduced in 1931 only one plant used it but in 1934 twelve of the largest plants were using it. This shows that there was a demand.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. REID: Clause (k) reads:

"produce" means fruit or vegetables as defined herein and honey—

Will this definition cover comb honey as well as strained?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): All kinds of honey.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Powers of inspectors.

Mr. REID: Subsection (e) reads:

(e) at the expense of the producer or packer take samples of honey from any apiary or other place where honey is prepared or packed.

Does the minister not think he is placing too much power in the hands of the inspectors when he permits them to take samples from the apiaries? I would point out that a sample taken from an apiary might not agree with the honey packed in the jars. An inspector who wanted to be very officious might consider he had the right to go into any apiary to take samples.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am informed that care was used in making this provision and that it is the intention to take small samples of honey from the different apiaries for testing purposes.

Mr. REID: I can assure the minister that it cannot be taken from an apiary with any guarantee that it is the same as the honey in the jars. I think that word "apiary" will lead to a lot of trouble.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Produce intended for canning.

Mr. NEILL: According to the explanation this is a new provision but it seems to be very vague. It reads:

All produce intended for canning in any establishment shall be presented for inspection and grading as provided by the regulations.

Where is it to be presented, at the cannery or at some central point? Will an inspector be located at every cannery? I think we should know something as to what we are committing the producer to.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This inspection will take place at the most convenient point. In the majority of cases it would be on delivery at the cannery.

Mr. NEILL: That means the department will maintain an inspector there?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Sections 9 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On section 25—general.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In what section is the detention provision to be found?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Section 21.

Mr. REID: Section 22 provides that any penalty imposed shall be payable to His Majesty in the right of the Dominion of Canada. Where a provincial policeman carried out the enforcement of this provision and a fine was levied, would it go to the dominion?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The fine would be paid to the receiver general of Canada.

Mr. GERSHAW: How will the inspection be managed where there is a small canning factory located some distance from any other factory? Will there be a full time inspector employed or a part time man?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would be a part time man.

Mr. NEILL: In connection with fines, it will be noticed that section 18 provides for a fine of not less than one hundred dollars. That seems to be an excessive penalty for a small offence. The Prime Minister to-day referred to an amendment made by the Senate to a certain bill in which a minimum penalty was cut out, and it was only $25. He suggested that it was held by many people to be desirable not to have a minimum penalty, and here we have a minimum of $100 for a trivial offence. Is this in the old act? In any event that would not justify such an excessive penalty. The minister is aware that the imposition of heavy minimum penalties very often prejudices magistrates in favour of offenders; they would rather let them off than impose an unjust penalty.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. gentleman will remember that a year ago, when this bill was before the house, this very matter was discussed at great length, though I realize, of course, that this is not an answer to his argument. All these penalties are named by the Department of Justice, and $100 is not really a very large fine to be paid by those who would be concerned, if the act is to have any effect at all.

Mr. NEILL: The penalties are provided for in connection with sections 10, 11 and 12. Section 10 deals with the commission agent who has neglected to obtain a licence, and that is not a deadly offence. Section 11 provides that no dealer shall ship, buy, accept or offer to accept or otherwise deal in any produce shipped unless he has obtained a licence; and section 12 provides that no broker shall engage in negotiating shipments on consignment, sales or purchases of any produce, and so on, without having obtained a licence. These are not vicious offences; I can think of offences which are much more serious and for which the minimum is less than $100. The minister says cheerfully that $100 is not much. It depends on whose pocket it comes out of; I know people who would have to go to gaol for a trivial offence for a period not exceeding two months if they were required to pay a fine of $100. I do suggest that $100 is a drastic penalty. The minister says that the Department of Agriculture prescribed it. Yes, and I have always noticed that the Department of Agriculture more than any other department is very strong on that—imposing the most excessive penalties for the infringement of any act or regulation they are pleased to make. That department is particularly guilty in this respect. They seem to think that if a man does anything contrary to a regulation on which they have put their imprimatur he should be crucified, on the principle, I suppose, of the Turkish sultan who put a dishonest baker in his oven. But that is not the principle that applies to-day; now we try to make the penalty fit the offence. I do not believe that if the matter were left to the minister himself, who is a fairminded man, he would deny that $100 is an excessive minimum penalty for offences like these. To test the point I move that in section 18, in line 37, the words "one hundred dollars" be struck out and the words "twenty-five dollars" be substituted therefor.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The fine set out in section 18 applies to the offences dealt with in sections 10, 11 and 12, on the basis of failure to take out a licence. The taking out of a licence is the basis on which an important part of this bill rests. If the hon. gentleman will read section 19 he will see the penalties enumerated for the smaller offences he has in mind. Before the bill was brought in last year, all these sections had been given consideration for at least eighteen months and had been before the fruit growers' associations in Canada. Some of them had it in their hands for a year. They went into the matter fully and were of the opinion that, because of the importance and the necessity of the licence being insisted upon, the fine should be at least $100. The hon. gentleman would give the impression that the Department of Agriculture is particularly desirous of imposing penalties, but I may tell him that I know of no instance where a penalty had been imposed without at least three warnings. To adopt the hon. member's suggestion would mean that the bill would not be effective. It is felt that it would be more satisfactory to leave it as it is, taking care that no injustice should be done through oversight.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister then agree to add at the end of the section the provision that no such fine shall be imposed until a man has received at least three warnings? That, he says, is the basis of the bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No; I did not say that the basis of it was the giving of three warnings; I said that was the policy of the department, and it shows that the department is not anxious to impose fines. The hon. gentleman would be the first to agree that to make the change he suggests would render the bill ineffective with respect to one or two convictions.

Mr. NEILL: The language is so vague:

No commission agent shall accept or offer to accept for sale on commission ...

The licence may have expired two days before and he may have sent his money to Ottawa; it has not arrived and he is liable. And it is not a matter of his being liable for $100; he is liable for $1,000. Why $1,000? It is all very well to say that the department is not in the habit of being unjust in prosecutions. Possibly not. But why give them such extraordinary powers? Why make the penalties so exorbitant? Half the time the accused will get off, because no reasonable justice of the peace or magistrate will fine a man $100 for a trivial offence. It is the experience of all magistrates that an excessive penalty for a minor offence is always provocative of undue leniency. It is in the interests of the enforcement of the act that I suggest making the penalties reasonable. If they are reasonable there is a better chance of the act being enforced. It is not the terrible penalty that deters a man but the certainty of conviction. Make the officers do their duty and see that every infraction of the act is brought to court. That is the thing that stops it, not the idea that he can take a chance. He may be fined $1,000 or may get off altogether, but it is the certainty of conviction that counts. I suggest that $100 is too much for a mistake of that kind. I would like to go further and reduce the maximum from $1,000 to $500, but I would not press that if the minister would agree to the $100.

Mr. GARDINER: This matter was before the committee last year. I think the reason this particular penalty was inserted was to protect the producer. As I read the statute, no person can act as commission agent for these products unless he secures a licence. I do not understand that this licence will be renewable from time to time; there is no provision for that. I submit that in order to control these parties effectively and protect the producers it is necessary to licence the commission people who will be taking these goods for sale on commission, and if they have not a licence they should be subject to a substantial penalty. I see no objection to this legislation; in fact I would support it because of the protection it gives the producers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Can the minister inform us how long these fines have been in force, how many prosecutions have been entered and how many convictions obtained, and whether he has found any difficulty from the courts hesitating about convicting because of the large fines? That would help to guide us in our decision. There is no question that when a fine is unreasonable—I am not saying this is—there is difficulty in securing convictions. If the minister would give us his experience of the cases that have been brought to court it would help us.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This has been in force for one year. There have been no prosecutions, therefore no fines have been imposed to date. The licence is $25 and if the fine were reduced to $25 it might be a temptation to some to take a chance.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My recollection is that on the introduction of any new legislation like this the practice of the Department of Agriculture is to admonish and warn transgressors rather than prosecute much for the first year. Now that year is over; what will be the policy next year? The department will be disposed to be a little more severe, I imagine. If it is not, some will simply go on and on offending to see how much the minister will stand for. I am not disposed to suggest any change here. I have no doubt the officers of the department have gone into it carefully and fully and have decided that these fines seem to be workable and fair, because there is no use having laws unless they are enforced. But when it is broken through ignorance rather than deliberately there should be some consideration shown, and there usually is.

Amendment (Mr. Neill) negatived.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

The house resumed from Monday, June 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. 79, to amend the Combines Investigation Act—Mr. Gordon—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I read the bill it is largely a reenactment of the old Combines Investigation Act, except that some clauses have had to be rewritten on account of the act being placed under the trade and industry commission instead of remaining under the registrar. There is a more comprehensive definition of the word "combine" and a few changes in the phrasing, but apart from that I do not see anything particularly new.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Combine.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been pointed out that in subsection 4 on page 2, in line 8, we have used the words "dominate or control." It is suggested that it is better to have it "control." Dominate is an elastic word that may mean something or nothing. If it is the view of the committee, I move: that the words "dominate or" be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then it has been pointed out that this should not affect what we call patent rights, the rights of a patentee under a valid and existing dominion patent. I do not know that I have any views on the subject, but it seems reasonable that a valid and existing patent should not be called either a merger or a trust or a monopoly which would control that particular trade. I have been asked to bring that to the attention of the committee, and I suggest that the clause might be amended by something like the following at the end of clause 4:

> But this section shall not apply to the enjoyment of patent rights under valid and subsisting letters patent issued under the patent act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there not a distinct danger of monopoly under patents? Better leave the section as it is.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not going to urge it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

On section 9—Section 15 repealed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In repealing section 15 of the act it is necessary to submit a new section in conformity with the provisions of the section in the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act. The new section is as follows:

> 15. On the application of any person to the commission to recommend the approval of an agreement or proposed agreement for the control and regulation of prices and production pursuant to the provisions of the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act, 1935, the commission shall have authority to investigate all matters relating to such agreement or proposed agreement as in the case of any other investigation under this act, and all the provisions of this act shall mutatis mutandis apply as in the case of any other investigation under this act.

Power is provided under the trade and industry commission act to that effect, and this is to comply with that provision. I would therefore move that section 9 be amended to read as follows:

> 9. Section fifteen of this act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:

Then will follow the section I have read.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That has reference to the provision made the other day in the trade and industry commission bill to the effect that the governor in council would not give approval until after an investigation was held.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Provisions of Inquiries Act applicable.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Varcoe of the law department has just pointed out that in line 14 there are some words that should come out. The words are "including the powers which are thereby authorized to be conferred by the commission issued in the case." He says these words are entirely unnecessary, and that it will clarify the section very much to strike them out. I therefore move that they be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 13 to 26 inclusive agreed to.

On section 27—Section 41 repealed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I pointed out the other day, when we were considering the trade and industry commission bill, that the measure does not come into force until next October. The old combines act being repealed by this bill, will expire when the present session of parliament is over unless some provision is made to continue it until October. Should there not be a section put in this act which will continue the old combines act until October 1 next?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would it not be sufficient if this act did not come into force until October 1? Then it will not repeal the other act until it comes into force. I have a clause noted here as section 28, providing that the act shall not come into force until October 1, 1935.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will be all right.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that the following be added as section 28:

28. This act shall not come into force until the first day of October, 1935.

Motion agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is just one other point to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister. In the event of the validity of the act appointing a trade and industry commission being questioned and it being found that the act in any particular is ultra vires, then there would be no combines investigation act in force at all. I was going to ask the government if it had considered the advisability of inserting some clause providing that in the event of the validity of the trade and industry commission act being questioned and that measure being found invalid, the old combines act might be forthwith revived.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am afraid a clause of that kind would be considered a confession of weakness on the part of the government. I may say that in the view of the government the Dominion Trade and Industry Commission Act is constitutional; all the legal opinion we have been able to get on it has been to the effect that it is intra vires. I think under those circumstances I would risk this one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that now the government are paying more attention to the constitutional aspect of measures than formerly. Possibly this may get through.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Monday, June 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. 73, to amend the criminal code—Mr. Guthrie—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 4—Proviso.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would ask that we revert to section 4 which I believe has already been passed. This clause has to do with fraudulent advertising. It has been represented that all the mail order houses in Canada have their catalogues in print, and that they will be published in the month of July or the beginning of August. It seems that these catalogues are published in orders of a million copies or more. At the present time they are in the printers' hands and are almost completed. They have asked that a provision be added to section 4 stipulating that the section shall not come into force until the first day of January, so that in their new catalogues they may comply strictly with the letter as well as the spirit of the section. I believe the request is reasonable. There would be an enormous loss if these catalogues were to go out in their present form and a complaint were made despite the fact the section was not before the mail order houses when the catalogues were compiled.

Mr. GARDINER: Is that an admission by the mail order houses that their advertising is now fraudulent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, distinctly not. They state that in their catalogues they assert their goods are sold on guarantee, and they in turn receive a guarantee from the manufacturers of the goods they sell. This section however goes much farther than that. They are content to make good their guarantee in every instance, and as a matter of fact I know they do; they take back goods and refund money. But they do not comply with the new regulations. I move the amendment I have suggested, namely:

That the following words be added at the end of section 4:

"and provided that this section shall not come into force until the first day of January, 1936."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Penalty.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 5 was passed, but the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Hanbury) has suggested an amendment which I believe would cure a difficulty which has been experienced along the Pacific coast in the logging trade. Representations are made by the Loggers' association of British Columbia. Subsection 4 of section 431 of the criminal code states:

4. Every one who, being a dealer in second-hand goods of any kind, trades or traffics in or has in his possession for sale any boom or other chains, lines or shackles for the use of rafting, storing, fastening or towing lumber or logs and who purchases, trades or traffics in any boom or other chain, line or shackle which has upon it the trade mark duly registered or other mark or name of any person without the written consent of such person—

Is guilty of an offence. It has been held before the courts of British Columbia that initials on saw logs do not constitute a name within that section. I should have thought otherwise, but in order to overcome that difficulty a request has been received from the loggers' association through the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard for an amendment to the section to make it clear that initials are a distinguishing mark. I therefore move:

That the following be added as section 5a: That section 4 of section 431 of the criminal code be amended by striking out in lines 6 and 7 thereof the words "trade mark duly registered or other mark or name" and substituting therefor the words "mark, brand, trade mark duly registered, name or initials."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Discrimination in trade.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have an amendment to section 6, suggested by the cooperative unions of Canada who carry on a cooperative business. They say that they should be excluded from the operation of the section, and they have asked for the insertion of the following provision:

That the provisions of this subsection shall not, however, prevent a cooperative society returning to producers or consumers or a cooperative wholesale society returning to its constituent retail members the whole or any part of the net surplus made in its trading operations in proportion to the purchases made or sales of the society.

A great many of these societies operate on the principle of granting a rebate or percentage on purchases. They do not want that to be treated as a discount under the provisions of this bill. Personally I think the suggestion is reasonable, and if the committee is content I move as I have indicated.

Mr. REID: Does that apply to all cooperative organizations?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In Canada.

Mr. FACTOR: Would the minister consider the advisability of using the word "organization" instead of "society"? Other cooperative bodies might be called societies.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think this is broad enough to cover them all.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is another amendment to the same section, which has been suggested and which I think is reasonable, in regard to the words in paragraph (a) "is a party or privy to, or knowingly assists in, any transaction." It is suggested that it would be better draftsmanship if the language were as follows: "is a party or privy to, or assists in any transaction of sale which discriminates to his knowledge." That language is thought better than to say "knowingly assists in."

Amendment agreed to, on division.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 7 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment to the criminal code which has been on the order paper a long time, and I propose if it passes to consolidate it with the bill we have just gone through. I do not know just what the modus operandi is to get at that bill now.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Move it as an amendment to this one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then I move that section 1 of Bill No. 5 be inserted as section 13 of Bill No. 73 which we are now considering. Section 1 of Bill No. 5 amends section 325 of the criminal code. This is to clarify what I think was a little mistake in the amendment we made last year in regard to the number of days' racing. It will be remembered that last year we made an amendment to the criminal code which provided that instead of two race meets of seven days each, racing associations might hold one race meet of fourteen days in a single year. Theretofore they had the right to hold two meetings of seven days in each year, and last year we gave them the opportunity of holding one race meeting of fourteen days. Now we must make it clear, I understand, that it should be on consecutive days. We have done that in section 1 of Bill No. 5, and the last part of the clause, from the words "one race meeting" to the end, is new. It reads:

—in any one calendar year more than one race meeting, at which there are running races, of more than seven and not exceeding fourteen such days, or two such race meetings having an interval of at least twenty days between them of not more than seven such days each.

Section 1 of Bill No. 5 agreed to (new section 13 of Bill No. 73).

Mr. SULLIVAN: I move, Mr. Chairman, the following amendment to section 1 of Bill No. 5 which has just been adopted, and that is to add in line 15 after the word "races" the following words:

unless one be a steeplechase or hurdle race in which event there may be eight races.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The effect of the amendment will be this. The committee knows, I suppose, that under the present law seven running races are allowed per day. Some of the racing associations or jockey clubs have requested, I understand, the privilege of running one steeplechase or hurdle race—a jumping race, they call it—in addition to the seven other races they are entitled to run. If this amendment is adopted they will have the right to add one race each day to the seven now allowed, provided it is a steeplechase or a hurdle race.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is the minister in favour of that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have no opinion on it. I know nothing about hurdle racing or steeplechasing.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I do not think the amendment is inserted in its proper place in the section. Will the chairman please read it again?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Morand): That in line 15 after the word "races" there be added the following words:

unless one be a steeplechase or hurdle race, in which event there may be eight races.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think the amendment should be inserted after the word "days" in line fifteen; then add the proviso.

Mr. SULLIVAN: I am satisfied. I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 2 of Bill No. 5 agreed to (new section 14 of Bill No. 73).

[Mr. Guthrie.]

On section 3 of Bill No. 5—Six jurors in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This section was drawn in accordance with a request that was received from the Attorney General of Alberta. The province of Alberta subsequently withdrew that request and said they preferred to remain under the old territorial law which was passed before Alberta came into confederation and to keep their jury system under that law. Since then the province of Manitoba has made a request that the criminal code be amended and that Manitoba be entitled to have a jury of six as is now the case in Alberta and Saskatchewan. I am going to move that section 3 of Bill No. 5, which will be section 15, this present bill, be amended by striking out the word "Alberta" in line 6 and substituting therefor the word "Manitoba." This amendment is being made in consequence of a request received from the Attorney General of Manitoba.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is the word "Alberta" still to remain in section 2?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 4 of Bill No. 5—who shall be the jury.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The same amendment will have to be made in this section in line 11 and I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister considered the reprinting of this bill? There have been a number of amendments made.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps that is a good idea, although I do not like to delay the matter. If the committee desires, it can be reprinted.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. GUTHRIE moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before the bill passes its third reading I should like to repeat the objections I raised to sections 5 and 6. These objections as to the validity of these sections have been strengthened by the views expressed by eminent counsel.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved:

That government order 28 with regard to Bill No. 5, an act to amend the criminal code, be discharged and that the said bill be withdrawn.

Motion agreed to and bill withdrawn.

SUPPLY

MISCELLANEOUS

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

To provide for salaries and expenses of the office of the salvage officer, including L. H. Beer at $4,500, $10,622.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I want to repeat the protest I made the other day against the inclusion of the name of a person in a vote in order to escape the regulations of the civil service commission.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been that way for a long time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a bad custom.

Item agreed to.

To provide for report on cultural conditions in Canada (literature, art, drama, education, et cetera), $2,500.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Could we have an explanation of this item?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot explain it so we will have to let it stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can explain it. A report is being prepared for the Prime Minister by an eminent scholar who is making a review of cultural conditions in Canada. It is very largely in the nature of a gratuity.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have no great objection to that kind of thing, but instead of having an individual item like this, if we are to give gratuities to eminent scholars, it might very well be that we might set up some recognized method of doing it. In many countries they have means of maintaining people of literary ability—you may call their positions sinecures if you will—but as a rule there is some accepted method of giving such assistance. Personally I should like to see something of that kind done rather than have this haphazard practice continue.

Item agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When may we expect the supplementary estimates—tomorrow?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am hopeful, but it is possible that it will not be until Monday.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Friday, June 21, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 114 relating to the application of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, in the province of British Columbia.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: Mr. Speaker, the objects sought to be attained in the passing of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act are well known to the house. In a word the main object was to try to compose the debt structure of a farmer to the point where he could meet his obligations and remain upon the land as a producer.

I think it is fair to say that the act has met with a remarkably favourable reception throughout the country. I desire to pay tribute to the provincial governments for their cordial cooperation, in the main, with the Department of Finance in endeavouring to administer the act. Every province, with the exception of British Columbia—and I will refer to that province in a moment—has cooperated not only to the point of facilitating the operation of the act in every way through contact with its several officials but has made contributions in the way of reductions in fees, and no province has taken any exception to the general terms of the act in its application to provincial obligations. That statement is true as far as the province of British Columbia is concerned from the inception of the act in November until the month of May. During the month of May the board of review sat on a case concerning one Copeland, and it is fair to assume that the province did not object to the jurisdiction of the board because it was represented there by the attorney general. In the Copeland case the board of review made the following finding with regard to the claim of the province of British Columbia for arrears of taxes upon the land:

—that all interest due thereon, with penalties be written off—

I interpret that to mean that the decision was that the interest upon arrears of taxes should be written off.

—and that the amount payable be allowed and fixed at the sum of $1,408.03 (which is inclusive of the taxes assessed and payable in 1935); and that the said sum shall be payable in three equal annual instalments of $469.34, each, without interest, on the 31st day of October in the years 1936, 1937 and 1938 respectively; and the board directs that no tax enforcement proceeding shall be taken against the debtor in respect of these payments until after October 31, 1939, The debtor shall pay all current taxes payable to the province in the year 1936 and subsequent years until and including the year 1940, regularly and in accordance with the provisions of the statute in that behalf.

In May it was announced by the attorney general of that province that the province proposed to challenge the legality of the act.

The premier of the province said that it created an invasion of provincial rights, and he proposed to fight it all along the line. As a result of the finding in the case I have just indicated the province appeared before the court and asked for a declaration—

1. (a) That the defendants purporting to act as a "Board of review for the province of British Columbia" under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, being chapter 53 of the statutes of Canada, 1934, and amending acts and the rules and regulations passed thereunder, are acting without lawful authority, as the said act is ultra vires the parliament of Canada.

(b) Alternatively, that the board of review is acting without lawful authority in assuming jurisdiction under the said act to formulate proposals and to make directions by virtue of which contracts and taxation powers and rights of the crown in the right of the province of British Columbia in relation to farmer debtors are in whole or in part abrogated and set aside.

2. The plaintiff further claims an injunction to restrain the defendants from purporting to formulate proposals or to give directions or to make orders involving contracts by the crown in the right of the province of British Columbia and its farmer debtors in relation to amounts owing under such contracts to the said province and in relation to moneys due or to become due from farmer debtors to the crown in the right of the said province in respect of any form of taxes, fees, rates or duties.

An interim restraining order was granted on June 15, the motion to continue the injunction being returnable on June 27.

In coming to its decision to introduce this bill the government has had in mind the fact that since the inception of the act there have been, up to the end of May, 57,610 interviews, 10,942 proposals, and 4,602 settlements. These are formal settlements effected by the receivers. In addition there have been 1,250 settlements effected as a result of decisions of boards of review. Of that number only 58 occurred in the province of British Columbia as a result of settlements effected by the receivers and I believe only six or seven as a result of decisions by boards of review.

In an interview reported in the press of to-day, or possibly yesterday, the premier of British Columbia said that he was quite content that the act should be applicable so long as it does not apply to the province of British Columbia. In other words, he is quite content that contributions shall be made by loan companies, by trust companies, by banks, by insurance companies and by private debtors, but the province itself should be immune. It will stand on the letter of the law and it will exact its pound of flesh.

It is not for me to quarrel with the decision of the province. It is within the rights of the provincial government to take the attitude it may desire to take, but in making my statement I am stating the blunt facts. There are two things to be said. One is that we have the right to assume that the government of British Columbia speaks for the province of British Columbia, and by its attitude it has said, "We do not wish this act applicable to the province of British Columbia." But the second and more important consideration is this. While we are advised by the Department of Justice that this law is intra vires of this parliament, what a court of law might do is another matter. And inasmuch as the law has been accepted as applicable to the other eight provinces of Canada I submit that we would be derelict in our duties if we were to imperil its existence and the benefits which flow from its operation in the other eight provinces if we allowed the act to continue in British Columbia, with the results which might flow from the action which has been taken in the courts by that province. In these circumstances we have felt that we have no alternative but that of introducing this measure.

Mr. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) has departed from the customary courtesies extended on the occasion of the first reading of a bill, and has sought to make a detailed explanation which would have been more proper on second reading. I would say to the minister that he has raised some very controversial arguments. I am not here to defend or to protest against action which may be taken by the provincial government of the province of British Columbia. I am personally in favour, and have so expressed myself repeatedly, of the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the province of British Columbia. My right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, very definitely expressed himself as being in favour of the provisions of the bill when it was discussed in the house.

I must protest most emphatically however against the Minister of Finance, at this time and at this stage of debate, namely, upon the introduction of a bill which we have not yet seen, to the consideration of this house, imputing motives to any provincial government, whether it be Liberal or Conservative, I do not care which. I am certainly disposed to object to this bill; I may say frankly to the minister that I am in favour of the application of the provisions of the act to the province of British Columbia. I have spoken in favour of it, and so has the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), upon many occasions in British Columbia. For these reasons I say it is entirely unbecoming in the minister, when he seeks leave of the house to introduce the bill, to impute motives when the full facts are not in possession of the house.

Mr. RHODES: I think it is due to me that I be given the opportunity to say that if the hon. member would do me the courtesy of reading what I have said he could not take exception to a single statement I have made when introducing the bill. In doing more than stating in simple terms what the bill sought to do I was merely being courteous to the house at this stage so that hon. members might be fully aware of the motives which have caused the government to introduce the bill. I must say however that I did not impute any motives to the province of British Columbia. I confined my observations entirely to a statement of facts, and only a limited number of those facts at that, from official documents. I believe when the hon. member reads what I have said he will realize that the last thing I attempted to do or had in mind, or that the government had in mind, was to show any partisanship, because I was at pains to pay tribute to the other provinces in Canada, without regard to their political affiliations, for having cooperated so loyally with the federal government in the administration of the act. After all, the chief motive is to serve the agricultural population of Canada, and I believe we may forget the political phase of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish you had.

Mr. FRASER (Cariboo): That is all you are thinking about.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): May I ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the government to introduce this session legislation dealing with pensions for the blind?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I cannot answer that question at the moment. I was not present at council this morning but I am advised that I shall be in a position to give an answer on Monday.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Might I ask the Prime Minister whether the government would consider introducing legislation dealing with the jurisdiction of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in respect to indebtedness for school lands? If the Prime Minister is not in a position to give an answer at the moment, perhaps he might consider the question and give an answer on Monday.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I am bound to say that I was not aware of the difficulty to which the hon. gentleman refers. I shall, however, look into it. The dominion is no longer concerned about school lands, being only the trustees; the school lands are now beyond question the property of the province. But there are limitations with respect to investments, and I believe it would not be competent for us to do more than confer with the province as to what action shall be taken. I will look into the matter and be able to make a more definite statement on Monday.

CANADA-POLAND TRADE TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): In the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) I wonder if the Prime Minister could give us any information as to the present status of the negotiations looking to a trade treaty between this country and the republic of Poland.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): We did carry on negotiations with the republic of Poland and arrived at the basis of an agreement before I was ill, and it was ready for signature, but certain difficulties arose in connection with another branch of government altogether, and certain suggestions were made that one should be dependent on the other. Without going into details in any sense, which the hon. gentleman will not expect, I am afraid that as matters now stand we are not entitled to yield the point that has been suggested with respect to another matter of government altogether, and so the trade agreement will probably have to stand for the moment. That is as far as my present advices go.

NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, according to this morning's Montreal Gazette, in his convocation address at Bishop's College Chief Justice Greenshields urged the formation of a national coalition government to bring us through the depression. The chief justice was aware that he was touching upon a controversial matter and might be subject to criticism. I would like to ask, in view of the fact that there is a definite political movement towards a national coalition government today, whether it is appropriate that a judge should enter the political field and meddle with political matters.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think, Mr. Speaker, it is easy for me to say that the government is of the opinion that neither the chief justice of the superior court of Quebec nor the chief justice of Ontario should indulge in party politics, and we very much regret that any chief justice should do so. We feel quite certain that any observations that were made were not intended to be of a political character but rather were indicating the private opinion of one who at the time he spoke was occupying the position of chancellor of the university over which he presides.

Mr. JACOBS: Was he not speaking from the standpoint of the patriot rather than in a party sense?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wonder how the Prime Minister distinguishes a private statement of opinion from a public statement of opinion?

DISABLED PENSIONERS AT WINNIPEG

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker just before this sitting commenced I had a telegram from Winnipeg concerning which I telephoned my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health and I rise now to make inquiry from him with regard to the situation which apparently has developed in Winnipeg among the disabled pensioners there. Apparently the complaint is that the Department of Pensions and National Health is not complying with a regulation which these men assert has been made whereby a five-dollar allowance was to be exempted from any deduction which is to be made in connection with the relief grant. There are about 400 pensioners now camped in the grounds of Deer Lodge hospital and they threaten to stay there until the regulations are complied with. Can the minister make a statement in regard to this matter?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, the general principle that is applied in the granting of relief is that the department supplements the amount that is given to small pensioners to bring it up to the amount that is granted by the muncipalities to civilians on relief.

Some little time ago the municipal council of Winnipeg decided to allow an exemption of $5 to imperial pensioners who had come to this country since 1924. When they were estimating the amount of relief which a man might receive they said, "We will not count $5 of your pension as income." The result was that such an imperial pensioner would receive $5 more in relief. This organization sent several telegrams to the department claiming that they should also have $5 more in relief but I could not see that they were entitled to this. These exemptions were not made in connection with civilian relief and these men were telegraphed to to the effect that no decision would be given at the time as the Hyndman commission had made several recommendations with regard to relief which were under consideration. In spite of that reply a certain number went to the hospital at Deer Lodge and intimated that they intended to stay until their demands were granted. I believe about forty spent last night on the grounds under canvas.

Mr. RALSTON: Is it the intention of the department to give this matter further consideration or does the department consider it at an end?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The department is always willing to consider anything.

B. C. RELIEF CAMP STRIKERS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) if our guest marchers have arrived from the west, if they are properly housed and when will negotiations be opened?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): So far as I know they have arrived, in fact one of them telephoned me this morning to tell me that they had arrived. I have not investigated their housing but I imagine it is rather good. They told me where they were and it seemed to me to be a very respectable place. As to the meeting, I hope that we can arrange to meet them tomorrow morning but that has not been definitely decided.

VICTORIA BRIDGE TOLLS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Laprairie-Napierville): I should like to ask the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) if he has received the decision of the Canadian National Railways in connection with tolls on the Victoria bridge and, if not, is he able to tell us if a report will be made before the end of the session?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I asked the Canadian National Railways for a report on the statements made by the committee. They report that some of the statements were not correct and I have asked them to meet the committee in association with the harbour commission, which controls the other bridge at Montreal. As to when they are to meet or other details of that kind, I know nothing and I cannot give any further information at the present time.

Mr. DUPUIS: Is it not the duty of the government rather than the Canadian National Railways to decide what tolls shall be charged on the Victoria bridge?

Mr. MANION: No. It is the duty of the Canadian National Railways to decide and the government then approves or disapproves of the tolls which the railway company has decided to charge.

COMPANIES ACT, 1934, AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Friday, June 14, consideration in committee of Bill No. 85, to amend the Companies Act, 1934—Mr. Cahan—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Incorporation only for objects and powers to be actively pursued.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Does the minister think that this section makes any real alteration in the act as it is at the present time?

Mr. CAHAN: I believe the hon. gentleman could give an opinion on that just as well as I. This section was drafted to carry out the recommendations of the commission and I think it does so. In actual practice I do not think it will make very much difference with a great many companies as in any case they would operate entirely within this section. This section will restrict the activities of a company to the purposes and objects stated in the application for letters patent and in the letters patent as granted.

Mr. BOTHWELL: In making an application for letters patent is it not usual to set out all the objects which the company believes they will want to make use of? The powers granted are usually very broad and as I see it this section would restrict those powers.

Mr. CAHAN: As far as my memory goes, years ago when a company applied for letters patent they proposed very broad powers but that has not been the practice in recent years. In recent years the companies have limited their applications to certain specific objects, and then there are other implied powers incidental thereto. The real difference of opinion which arises in the courts is brought about by another issue. A company may be restricted to its objects and powers as expressed in its charter, but those dealing with the company may rely to a certain extent upon its having the particular powers which it holds itself out to have. In connection with the obligations of a company to its creditors and to those who have made contracts with it, there is a tendency in the court decisions to assume that the company as a company is responsible for the holding out by its officers of the possession of certain powers. I think the provisions of this section are very strict and that they will carry out the purposes which the commission had in mind when making the report it did with regard to this particular matter.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Am I correct in assuming that it is the minister's opinion that this section will have the effect of curtailing the operations of a company and preventing it from carrying on any business which may be conducive to the main object for which it is incorporated?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think the hon. member should assume that at all. That is a very broad issue and I certainly cannot give my adherence to any such suggestion. The powers which are conducive to the interests of a company offer a much wider field than those which are merely incidental.

Mr. RALSTON: The provision is that if a company carries on business contrary to or exceeds the powers it shall be liable to be wound up as if it had become insolvent. I point out that the Winding-up Act expressly provides that a company shall be liable to be wound up in any event in which, according to the Companies Act, it is to be dissolved; so that there is no need to provide that a company shall be wound up as if it were insolvent. All that is necessary—and it makes the procedure much more simple—is to provide that such companies shall be liable to be dissolved if they do the things enumerated, and the Winding-up Act comes in and declares that this is one of the cases in which the company may be wound up. I wonder what the draftsman had in mind when he proposed to have the company wound up as if it were insolvent. In that event a great many things would have to be done with regard to the creditors, procedure and matters of that sort which might be avoided if this section simply provided that in the events mentioned the company is liable to be dissolved.

Mr. CAHAN: The drafting is not mine the section was drafted by the officials of the Department of Justice. My own personal opinion concurs largely in the suggestion of my hon. friend, that if a company is liable to be dissolved it is liable to be dissolved under the provisions of the Winding-up Act, and under that act any company which is insolvent may be wound up. I suppose the draftsman regarded this as being an assertion in more particular language of the very position which the hon. gentleman has taken. If the hon. gentleman wishes to move such an amendment I do not think there need be much controversy.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not got it written out, but my motion would be that the words "wound up" in line 30 be struck out and the words, in lines 31 and 32 "as if it had become insolvent" be also struck out and the word "dissolved" be inserted after the words "to be" in line 30, so that the provision would read:

> such company shall be liable to be dissolved under the provisions of the Winding-up Act, and the attorney general of Canada may, upon receipt of a certificate of the Secretary of State setting forth his opinion as in this section provided, apply to a court of competent jurisdiction for an order that the company be wound up.

Mr. CAHAN: In the thirtieth line the hon. member would strike out the words "wound up" and insert in lieu thereof the word "dissolved."

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. CAHAN: And in lines 31 and 32 the words "as if it had become insolvent" would be struck out and the rest of the section would remain the same.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe it has the same effect.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Shares to be allotted for consideration fixed by board of directors.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Attention was drawn on Friday last to the continuance of no par shares and distributable surplus. I am assuming that the minister has not changed his mind in that regard. I will not press the point brought to his attention last year and this year again.

Mr. CAHAN: In all my long experience I have always found that fixing the par values at $100 or a proportion thereof enabled one to carry out the purposes of the company quite fully. That is my own experience with respect to those matters which have been brought before me in my professional capacity. I am prepared to lay on the table of the house a long list of scores of companies, among the most active in our commercial and industrial life, which have no par value shares and which are now operating. Whatever parliament may do in future revisions, at the present time to abolish no par value shares would be to compel scores of these companies to reconstruct at a time of great distress and difficulty, and I do not think the time is opportune.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Might it not be well to stop other incorporations in the future from issuing no par shares, even if the old companies were left?

Mr. CAHAN: Another parliament might be in a clearer frame of mind to consider that question. In all cases that have come before me, and there have been many in the last five years, I have not seen one in which no par value shares were used as a means of stock-watering. Under the system of accounting we now have, every statement of a company must show clearly the value of these no par value shares, and this improved accounting system is excluding water where water was brought in under previous conditions of organization. No doubt from time to time the Companies Act must be revised to meet real difficulties, to overcome real objections and to abolish evils as they creep up, but at the present time these companies are all objecting to the possibility of their organization being crippled and their effective recovery being postponed for a considerable time.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Was not that one of the promises in the reform program outlined in the radio addresses?

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly was; and what is more, I said that if the price spreads commission recommended the abolition of no par shares I would vote for it. I will vote for it to-day if there is a motion to that effect.

Mr. CAHAN: It is true as well that the price spreads commission in its wisdom did not recommend it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We were not given to understand in the radio speeches that the Prime Minister would be governed by what the price spreads commission might recommend.

Mr. BENNETT: I referred to that also.

Mr. CASGRAIN: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I beg your pardon.

Mr. CASGRAIN: In January the addresses were to the effect that so and so would be done, and among other things it was indicated that no par value shares would be done away with. May I ask the Secretary of State what he thinks personally about it. Was he of the opinion that they should be abolished?

Mr. BENNETT: I also said that the recommendations of the price spreads commission would be given effect to. I assumed, as I said the other day, that they would be within the law, and to the extent that we are advised they are we have endeavoured to give effect to them. The commission put no par value shares in the alternative. Had they suggested, as I understood the views of many of the commission were, that they should be abolished, certainly it would have been so found.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only answer is that the government has not carried out the alternative.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The commission recommended that no par value shares be abolished or that there be no distributable surplus. The government has not carried out that recommendation.

Mr. CAHAN: That is quite different. I have no wish to discuss such a very fine point as that, but under this bill there could be no distributable surplus created out of capital.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I mean.

Mr. CAHAN: By this bill there can be none.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that is the effect of the bill. That is only as it applies to capital paid in before the passing of this legislation. It is possible under this legislation for part of the capital to be carried to distributable surplus.

Mr. CAHAN: No. I think I can assure my hon. friend that the process, which has been carried on whereby from time to time directors, with the approval of a majority of the shareholders—I think it is a three-quarter majority—can set aside as distributable surplus that which has been received as capital, is abolished.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 2 commencing at line 15 on page 2 of the bill reads:

> And in fixing the amount of such consideration, the board, subject to the provisions of this part, may provide in the contract of subscription for such shares that the consideration received therefor shall be deemed to be capital, excepting a part, if any, not exceeding twenty-five per centum thereon, which shall be set aside as distributable surplus.

Mr. CAHAN: It is not then received as capital at all. Under this bill if it becomes law, it will be impossible for a company to set aside as distributable surplus anything which it has received as capital; but in the initial subscription it may make a contract with its subscriber as to what part of the consideration shall apply to capital, and that a certain percentage may apply as distributable surplus, not necessarily for dividends but for carrying on the company without impairment of its capital, because this percentage is no longer capital. I think this bill under the circumstances goes very far in the way of reform. We have abolished this practice which has been going on with regard to setting aside from time to time a certain portion of the capital of the company as distributable surplus.

In early times I believe there were certain fixed assets that were set aside as distribut-able surplus, but under the regulations which have prevailed in the department for a number of years now, nothing can be set aside as distributable surplus except it be a portion of the liquid, realizable assets. I think we have gone a long way in reform by providing that if a shareholder wishes to put up, in addition to his subscription to capital, a certain sum as distributable surplus to ensure the stability of the company, we will not prohibit him. I doubt if we could. I think that, if I am a shareholder of a company, it would be very difficult to prohibit me from making a contribution to its treasury to enable it to carry on whether the company called that contribution distributable surplus or anything else. I think the hon. gentleman will find we are going a very long way to meet the views of the commission.

Section agreed to.

On section—Consideration for any shares allotted must be adequate.

Mr. CAHAN: In reading over this clause, I think the word "less" in line 36 on page 2 should be "more." How it got in in that form I do not know. I think the clause should read:

> In no case shall any shares, whether common or preferred, or whether with or without nominal or par value, be issued and allotted as fully or partly paid up for more than what may justly be deemed to be—

I fancy in an early draft, that was drafted in another way and the word "less" was retained inadvertently. I suggest that the change I have indicated should be made.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the word should be "less."

Mr. BOTHWELL: I cannot agree with the minister. The clause reads:

> In no case shall any shares, whether common or preferred, or whether with or without nominal or par value, be issued and allotted as fully or partly paid up for less than what may justly be deemed in all the circumstances of the case adequate consideration therefor.

As it reads now, it means that the company is not able to issue shares unless they have been paid for. According to my interpretation the word should be "less" instead of "more."

Mr. CAHAN: Allow me to read the clause again because it was an hon. member who drew my attention to it. Yes, I think the hon. member is right; I was mistaken.

Mr. BOTHWELL: There is just one other question in connection with the section. It reads:

> For less than what may justly be deemed in all the circumstances of the case adequate consideration therefor in cash, property or services.

Then in section 96B, under section 15 of the bill at page 9 these words are used:

> It shall not be lawful for the directors or promoters of a company to authorize the issue and allotment of any shares of the capital stock of the company as fully paid up unless the company receives, or is to receive what may justly be deemed, in all the circumstances of the case, adequate consideration therefor in cash, property or services.

Just taking those two sections together, I am wondering whether, under section 5 when reference is made to adequate consideration in services, that may be services to be rendered as referred to in the new section 96B, because it seems to me that section 96B will have to be changed, as under the section as I read it no company is able to issue shares for services to be rendered in futurity.

Mr. BENNETT: Why not add a word to make it clear that that is for something past and not in the future?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Section 5 may be clear so far as it is concerned if we alter section 96B when we come to it, but I wanted to bring the matter to the attention of the minister now.

Mr. CAHAN: In regard to the matter to which I referred before, simply to show that I was speaking inadvertently, I was sent through a member of the house a short memorandum from the Dominion Association of Chartered Accountants as follows:

> If the proposed section (9) of this act is to remain, should not the word "less" in the third line read "more"?

As this came from such an important body, I thought there could not possibly be a mistake, but the suggestion that any change should be made has now been entirely withdrawn.

Mr. RALSTON: My difficulty with this section is what I conceive to be its absolute unworkability and the uncertainty which it is going to create among people who happen to buy shares. I may be wrong about this, but the effect of this section appears to be this. It means that if a company is incorporated under the Dominion Companies Act, and for instance I am an officer of it, I agree to serve the company for $100 a month plus ten shares, doing that because I know the company is in hard circumstances and the directors think it is a good thing to take me on because it means I have an interest in the progress of the company; in other words, if I make a success of the company my shares will be worth something. I sell my shares to someone else. Five years afterwards, the company gets into financial difficulties and is wound up. Mr. X, the man to whom I sold the shares, is put on the list of contributories of the company. He asks why? He is told that it is because of the fact that as regards those shares, although issued fully paid up, the consideration, that is Ralston's services, did not represent adequate consideration for the shares. He is told "you are liable to pay the difference between the real value of Ralston's services and the par value of the shares." I think that is the effect of this section. I think it means that no man can buy the shares of a dominion company without the fear that at some later date a liquidator may put him on the list of contributors and say to the judge, "We want you to project your mind back to the time these shares were issued, to find out if in all the circumstances adequate consideration therefor was given in cash, property or services."

I take that illustration about salary because I happen to know of a case which is all finished with now, so I can speak of it quite freely. It was the subject of considerable discussion in another city. A managing director was given certain shares in addition to his salary; he cut his salary about in two and took shares in place of part of it. That man is getting those shares to-day. This act does not apply to him, so there can be no trouble about it, but if that had happened after this act came into force it would seem that a person who might buy shares from him would face the possibility of some liquidator or creditor coming in and saying that man's services were not worth the number of shares given to him, and the holder of the shares might be required to pay the balance.

That is the situation from the point of view of the shareholder. The point of view of the adviser is just the reverse. Somebody is asked to advise whether these shares were fully paid up. They are marked paid up on their face, but that is not enough. Were they actually issued for less than what might justly be deemed, "in all the circumstances of the case, adequate consideration therefor in cash, property or services." I do not know of any legal or business adviser who can forecast the mind of a judge having to decide ten years hence what the circumstances were at the time the shares were issued. On that ground, therefore, it seems to me that the section is unworkable and dangerous. I am fully in accord with the idea of not having shares issued for fictitious considerations. As the Secretary of State knows, under the English act there was a provision whereby, if shares are issued for anything else than cash, the agreement must be filed showing exactly what was the consideration for those shares, so that anyone buying shares may know that the company did not receive cash for them but something in place of cash.

Mr. BENNETT: The prospectus will show that.

Mr. RALSTON: Quite right. Under the amendments of last year there was required to be stated in the prospectus itself what was the consideration for the shares. That is, you cannot just say so many dollars; you must specify the property or the thing for which the shares were issued.

Mr. BENNETT: Services or contemplated services.

Mr. RALSTON: Or, in my case, service for so many years as a portion of the salary, So the shareholder knows exactly the sort of consideration that was given and the extent of that consideration, and it is up to him to put a value on those services and decide whether or not they represented adequate consideration. But it seems to me to impose on what might be innocent holders, the liability of facing a law-suit to decide the question of the adequacy of the consideration at the time the shares were issued to the original allottee and it seems to me that is going to make it very inadvisable to incorporate under the Dominion Companies Act. It is not fair to the investor; I do not think it is fair to the business public, nor is it fair to the companies themselves, because in these times shares are issued for considerations other than cash, and perfectly good considerations too, which are just as valuable to the company as cash and for which people will accept shares in order that the cash position of the company may not be impaired. I suggest that the Secretary of State consider the matter further before this section passes in its present form.

Mr. CAHAN: The difficulty which the hon. gentleman has mentioned is obvious, but I think he forgets a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the early days, when I think Chief Justice Ritchie was presiding—and that decision never has been modified—in which it was held that if a company issues shares as fully paid and those shares are subsequently transferred from the first allottee to others, the third parties being without notice that the shares have not been fully paid when the certificate of the company shows that they are fully paid, are not liable either to the company or to a creditor. The first purchaser of the shares, or perhaps it is better to say the first allottee of the shares, remains liable if the shares were issued for an inadequate consideration, but the third party does not. I have had very strong representations made, in regard to this section, that we should incorporate in it a provision of the English act under which the question of the inadequacy of the consideration, if raised, must be raised within a period of two years.

Mr. BENNETT: That is by other than the allotee?

Mr. CAHAN: No, by the allottee. In 1929, after the revision of the whole matter of company law had been considered for many months by a most eminent commission in England, they inserted a new section 41 dealing with allotments made by a company in contravention of the provisions of the act. There is a provision as to the liability of any director who knowingly permits any such allotment in contravention of the act, and it proceeds:

Provided that proceedings to recover any such loss, damages, or costs shall not be commenced after the expiration of two years from the date of the allotment.

It is so difficult to ascertain, after a lapse of years just what was the value at the time. This question was also discussed by the Macmillan committee in England, and the report of that committee, dealing with company issues, states:

In that year (1928) the total amount subscribed for capital issues whether of shares or debentures of 284 companies was £117,000,000. At 31st May, 1931—

Only three years thereafter.

—the total market value of these issues as far as ascertainable was £66,000,000 showing a loss of over £50,000,000 or about forty-seven per cent. In fact the public's loss has been greater since many of these shares were no doubt sold by the promoters at a high premium. Still more striking, perhaps, seventy of the above companies have already been wound up and the capital of thirty-six others has no ascertainable value. The issues of these 106 companies during that year amounted to £20,000,000.

My own comment is that apparently their capital evaporated. That is not confined to companies that received property; it includes companies that received cash consideration for their share. I notice in a statistical report issued only a few months ago by Roger W. Babson, who is regarded as a reliable statistician in connection with United States business affairs, the following statement is made:

In this current depression we find conditions unusually similar to those existing in all previous major depressions. Failures have been exceptionally heavy; thousands of banks have been forced to close; some receiverships have taken place and many are threatening. Commodity prices reacted about 40 per cent from the 1929 high point. Bonds had the sharpest declines ever witnessed, and the values of all stocks—

That is, in the United States—

—declined from approximately ninety billions of dollars to less than sixteen billions of dollars, a drop of 83 per cent since the latter part of 1929.

That statement was called to my attention for the purpose of illustrating to me that a property might have been transferred as adequate consideration for shares in 1928, and yet owing to the depreciation in values it would be very difficult indeed in 1935 to determine, in relation to 1935 prices, whether an adequate consideration had been received for the issue of those shares. And it has been strongly impressed upon me that there should be a limit of time. We might not accept the English term of two years, but it might be three years, or four years. It has been suggested however that one who takes shares for property should be exempt unless action is taken within a reasonable term. Otherwise it is impossible to marshal the facts by way of defence to such action.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think this subject is worthy of clarification. We have section 15 of the bill which contains a proposed enactment of section 96B of the statute, and which deals with the subject of adequate consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: The new section 96B is a penalty clause.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right. It imposes a penalty upon directors, among others, for doing what is forbidden by section 5. When I say it needs clarification I do not mean that I can clarify it to any great extent, but I am speaking in the presence of some able company lawyers, and perhaps they will be able to do so. I have had very little experience with the Dominion Companies Act—practically none. In the province of Nova Scotia where I have incorporated companies we have used the old English provision whereby an agreement is filed when property is transferred to the company and shares taken in consideration of the property.

Mr. BENNETT: The adequacy of consideration does not arise.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. We never considered that the adequacy of the consideration arose, at all. No matter how insignificant the property turned in, if we had an agreement covering it, that was sufficient.

Mr. CAHAN: I am afraid the hon. member is under a misapprehension as to the effect of the agreement in case the consideration is entirely inadequate.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the light of some decisions which have been brought to my attention I think probably we did take too much for granted.

Mr. BENNETT: Nevertheless, it was quite a general practice.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. We never had any trouble incorporating companies in that way. I am not sure what the effect of the Dominion Companies Act would be. To begin with, there is no section in the Dominion Companies Act at the present time which states specifically that shares are issued subject to being paid for in full. The section which has the nearest application is section 45 of the act.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not one respecting discounts?

Mr. ILSLEY: Subsection 2 of section 45 states:

> The liability of a shareholder in respect of any share held by him in the company in respect of which he is liable as a shareholder shall be limited (a) in the case of a share with nominal or par value to the amount unpaid thereon and (b) in the case of a share without nominal or par value to the amount of the consideration for which the share was issued by the company which is unpaid thereon.

Before the passing of that section last year there was a section in the previous act which appeared positively to impose a liability upon a shareholder to pay to the liquidator—

Mr. CAHAN: What was that section?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry I cannot give the number, but the section gave a creditor the right of action. It may have been merely procedure.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so. The hon. member is dealing with the section which gave a creditor the right of personal action. If he will allow me to say so, we repealed that section, because it led to notorious inequalities. It was an old section adopted from early times from some New England statutes before we had a Winding-up Act or an Insolvency Act, and which enabled a creditor who had obtained a judgment against a company to proceed by scire facias against an individual shareholder. The result was that cases arose in Canada in which such proceedings were taken, and in which one creditor by proceeding independently got full compensation from shareholders who had not paid up, while other creditors were left without any share in that consideration and without any possibility of recovering.

After the most careful discussion with the lawyers throughout the country we came to the conclusion that that process led to such gross inequalities that it should be repealed so that under the Winding-Up Act or under the Bankruptcy Act such assets as there were should be distributed equally. Now any creditor who has a claim of $500 against a company, which is not paid, may not recover individually, but he may take necessary proceedings for the winding up of a company and the equitable distribution of its assets, or he may proceed under the insolvency and achieve the same end. That is the reason that section was repealed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Whatever the reason may be, the view has been expressed to me that the joint effect of section 45 and section 5 and that part of section 15 of the bill enacting section 96B is to do away with the rule that shares cannot be issued at a discount.

Mr. CAHAN: I differ from my hon. friend. I believe I have heard that suggestion elsewhere. Directors under our law as administered in all the English provinces, and as administered under the civil law in Quebec where they follow the English decisions, are deemed to be trustees, and are liable as such in respect of the administration of their office. I prefer that equity law which obtains in the English provinces and the civil law of Quebec as a means of enforcing the directors liability rather than any provisions in express terms such as the hon. member has suggested. There is no statutory provision under the English law, although since 1929 they have abolished this provision with regard to filing agreements disclosing the consideration received for the issues of shares. They preferred to abolish the filing of agreements under the English companies act and leave it to the courts of England to determine the trustees liabilities and obligations.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may be some difference between the English companies which are incorporated by memorandum of association and these companies which are governed by the Bonanza case.

Mr. CAHAN: Not as to the liability of shareholders.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that. I do not put my views forward with very much confidence but that suggestion has been made. Let me try to make clear what

I have in my mind. If we pass these sections it is nowhere stated in the act that the shares have to be paid for in full. Section 45 says that the liability is limited to the amount unpaid on the shares, and this says that that consideration for the shares must be adequate.

Mr. CAHAN: Up to the par value.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it stated that it would probably do away with the difficulty, but the view has been advanced by persons who have some knowledge of company law that with these two sections, with section 45 merely imposing a negative limitation on the liability—not stating that they must be paid up in full, that they cannot be issued at a discount—and this section which says that the consideration for the shares must be adequate, that is the property, cash or service consideration, then by implication it is possible to issue shares at a discount under this bill as it is drafted, and that of course is undesirable. The sections have a different object altogether. It is to prevent the issuing of shares for less than adequate consideration. I suppose—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—that the desirable thing is that if the shares are shares having a nominal or par value everything should be done to assure that the allottee of the shares shall pay for them in full, whether he pays $100 cash for a $100-share or whether he gives $100 worth of property. That is the objective we are working towards. In the case of no par value shares the value placed on the books of the no par value shares shall be deemed to be the par value of the shares, and that amount shall actually go into the company as the capital of the company. That I think is what is desired. I got in touch with Mr. Wegenast to find out what he had to say about this and he sent me this telegram which I am authorized to read:

> Re proposed section 96B would undoubtedly make more difficult to bring home responsibility for stock watering. Present law requires consideration to be not merely adequate in all circumstances but to be equivalent of par value or issue price of stock although in some cases courts have shown reluctance to go behind honest decision of directors, see authorities collected page four ninety-four of my book. Simplest statement can make is that few if any cases I know that have succeeded against directors or promoters for stock watering would have succeeded under provisions like 96B.

I asked him how he would correct it in the act and I will send over to the minister his suggestions.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. CAHAN: I have read Mr. Wegenast's book and his citations of such cases. If the hon. gentleman has any amendment to suggest, let him suggest it. Let us get down to the heart of the thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will finish what I have to say. It is suggested under 96B which we have not yet reached—

Mr. CAHAN: Would my hon. friend allow me one moment to explain? Section 96B is an entirely different section with an entirely different purport and intent from the section which we have under consideration, which is section 5. Section 5 deals with the person subscribing for shares paying adequate consideration therefor, but sections 96A, and 96B do not refer to subscribers for shares but impose penalties upon directors if they issue shares without adequate consideration. So the purposes in view are entirely different.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are both directed to the same end.

Mr. BENNETT: One is complementary to the other.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: One is an imposition of penalties on directors and the other has to do with the civil liability of the shareholders.

Mr. ILSLEY: I realize that, but the adequacy referred to in these sections should be related to the par value or the issue price of the shares. But there is nothing to relate the adequacy of the consideration to the par value or the issue price of the shares.

Mr. CAHAN: What else could it relate to?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, whatever the court thinks under all the circumstances the shares are worth. That is what it says—"what may justly be deemed in all the circumstances of the case adequate consideration therefor." My hon. friend from Shelburne-Yarmouth suggests that section 45 does it but I am saying that perhaps it does not. It merely fixes an upper limit. It does not state there is a liability to pay up to the full value at all. There should be a section of the act reading like this:

> Every shareholder shall, until the whole of the par value or the issue price as the case may be, of his shares shall have been paid up, be liable to pay to the company or to its liquidator or to the trustee in bankruptcy of its estate any amount unpaid on such shares.

That is a positive imposition of liability which does away with any implication such as I have suggested. I am going to suggest that section 96B, which is complementary, so

I do not think there can be any objection to discussing it now, be amended by adding this clause:

Nothing in this section shall have the effect of relieving any director or promoter from any liability to which he would have been subject at common law or the civil law before the passing of this section, or of preventing any suit or proceeding in respect of any such liability.

With these amendments I do not see any objection to these sections as they are drafted, but without them I suggest that they may not do their work.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member will move his amendment and it is approved, it will be adopted of course, but where I do disagree entirely with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman and with the suggestion of Mr. Wegenast is this: If we are to continue the common law liability and the civil law liability, let us do so. It proves adequate in my experience. I have certainly in connection with one railway company made scores of shareholders pay up because the consideration paid was inadequate, as my hon. friend may read in the reports of the supreme court of Nova Scotia. There is no doubt as to what the liability is if you apply the law of trusts and trustees, which applies in all the English provinces, or if you have recourse to the civil law of the province of Quebec, but why render a statute complex by attaching to it the common law or the civil law. Let us have one liability or the other. This section 5 as drawn, in the opinion of the Department of Justice which drew it, covers the recommendation and the very terms of the recommendation of the commission. I suggest that the commission of which my hon. friend was a member in making that recommendation should have studied the matter more closely and taken one alternative or the other. So far as I am personally concerned I am ready to take any alternative which this committee accepts, but we cannot accept both.

Mr. ILSLEY: The commission was not a commission of lawyers or draftsmen; it was a commission making certain recommendations which it was expected would be put into proper form by the draftsmen. The language of the recommendations was general and the language has been greatly changed. I do not say the change has been for the worse. The language used by the commission could not have been put in statutory form and it was not intended as such. I do not think it is correct for the minister to say that we should have drafted this at the time we made our report.

Mr. CAHAN: You should have decided as between statute law and common law. That is all that I am suggesting.

Mr. BENNETT: I confess that it has been a matter of concern to me to know just how to cure the difficulties to which the hon. member and other hon. members have referred. I wonder if we said something about the shares not being sold at a discount, or fixed an amount which could not be exceeded, would we not meet some of the difficulties? The English statute in the terms in which the minister has just read it represents the statute as it was finally settled at the instance of Mr. Asquith. At that time difficulties arose in England in connection with the inadequate value of properties being turned over to companies for large numbers of shares, in the days of the great promotions. This resulted in a commission being appointed under the chairmanship of Mr. Frank Crisp, an eminent solicitor who was made a baronet for his services. He prepared the statute which was put through the English house, assisted by others. I recall very vividly the discussion which took place as to how one might overcome the difficulties to which attention has been directed this afternoon. The different provincial legislatures have endeavoured to deal with this matter and I sent out and got a case which I recalled being before the supreme court. This was an Alberta case, and as the minister has said, the court had to draw a very clear distinction between those who were the original beneficiaries of the stock watering and those who acquired the shares for valuable consideration after they had been issued fully paid. That distinction has been carried through all the cases. When we get down to having a declaration of the consideration in cash or services or property I find it very difficult to accommodate my mind to the thought that those points are not so elastic as to permit of almost anything.

That is my difficulty. Should we do something in the way of deciding the discounts at which the shares should be issued, or providing that they could not be issued as fully paid up at a discount of more than so much? When I buy a share in a company I assume that one hundred cents in the dollar is being paid into the treasury, and when I discover that because of property or services which have been exchanged for shares, the shares have a value of only twenty-five cents on the dollar I find my investment rather bad. How are we going to cure this? I am curious to hear the amendment which has been suggested by Mr. Wegenast. I have been informed that when the Department of Justice were considering these sections they gave considerable thought to them and the difficulty of arriving at any single conclusion was just as great then as it has been here this afternoon. We all would like to see this done, but how are we going to do it? Is there anything in the statute as it now stands in connection with the sale of shares at a discount? I confess that this afternoon my mind is not working sufficiently to remember that.

Mr. CAHAN: If its par value represents one hundred cents on the dollar, nothing can be adequate as compensation for that share unless it is adequate to the extent of one hundred cents on the dollar. There is no doubt of that in my mind.

Mr. BENNETT: And the test of that?

Mr. CAHAN: The test of that rests with the courts. We can go on and provide, as they have provided by section 47 of the English act, that it shall be lawful for a company to issue at a discount shares in the company of a class already issued. When you are first issuing shares having par value they must represent one hundred cents on the dollar of par value although there is no express provision in the 1929 English act to that effect.

Mr. BENNETT: They overcome that by the provision in connection with the commission on sales.

Mr. CAHAN: In order to allow a company, the value of whose assets has depreciated, to secure new capital at a discount, section 47 of the English act provides that the issue of shares at a discount must be authorized by a resolution passed at a general meeting of the company and must be sanctioned by the court in practically the same way as a compromise arrangement. The resolution must specify the maximum rate of discount at which shares are to be issued. But the English act assumes that when you so provide for a discount there must be compensation paid for the shares and in respect of shares with par value, that compensation must be the par value less the rate of discount. I have heard a suggestion to that effect made from time to time and if the hon. member for Kings-Hants wishes to move that amendment we will consider it.

Mr. ILSLEY: This would not be an amendment to this section, it would be a new section. I move:

That the following section be inserted between sections 45 and 46 of the act:

45A. Every shareholder shall, until the whole of the par value or the issue price, as the case may be, of his shares shall have been paid up, be liable to pay to the company or to its liquidator or to the trustee in bankruptcy of its estate any amount unpaid on such shares.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. RALSTON: As the Prime Minister has pointed out, this section 45 is an important one and I think further consideration of the verbiage of the section would be justified. The Secretary of State has referred to the liability of a shareholder who is not an allottee.

Mr. BENNETT: A purchaser for value without notice.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not sure that the case to which he referred would apply, as apparently by this section the whole transaction is made illegal. The section reads:

In no case shall any shares, whether common or preferred, or whether with or without nominal or par value, be issued and allotted as fully or partly paid up for less than what may justly be deemed in all the circumstances of the case adequate consideration therefor—

Where a share was, contrary to this provision, wrongfully or illegally issued as fully paid up, that share might be tainted in the hands of anyone who might obtain it from then on.

Mr. BENNETT: That is just what they held in the case from Alberta.

Mr. RALSTON: That is my fear there. This brings me to the point made by the Secretary of State. It may be possible that a time limit could be imposed such as that contained in section 41 of the English act. I think that section applies to the time limit within which an allottee of shares may revoke his allotment and reject his subscription on the grounds of fraud and misrepresentation. The same idea could be made apply here so that one who bought shares could feel that the bars were up and no action could be brought. Section 157 of the English act provides a time limit; anyone who has parted with his shares for one year is not longer liable. But I realize that that does not apply to the case in point.

Mr. BENNETT: The last English act.

Mr. RALSTON: That still leaves the present holder of the shares liable, if my theory is right, that he is holding shares illegally issued. Thirdly, with regard to what my hon. friend from Hants-Kings has said, with respect to the effect of Section 45, it is true it is only in terms a section which limits liability. I do not know whether it is correct to say it, but I have always had the idea that if a person were a member of a company and the liability were not limited by statute he might be in the position of a partner and liable to the full extent of the liabilities of the company.

Mr. CAHAN: That is the law.

Mr. RALSTON: If that is the case you would not need a statute imposing liability, such as my hon. friend has suggested, because the fact that a person is a member of a company, whether his holding is to the extent of $4 or $4,000, makes him a partner and he is liable.

Mr. BENNETT: Recent authorities do not go quite so far. They pare down that theory and hold that the liability is limited by the value of the shares.

Mr. RALSTON: That may be.

Mr. BENNETT: There has been an effort to do that.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend from Hants-Kings suggests that the theory is limited to companies incorporated by memorandum of association, because they are contractual as compared with charter companies incorporated under this act. I had the idea that if it were not for the fact that the provision of the statute limits liability, the liability would be unlimited. However, my hon. friend feels that he wants to go the other way about it and put in a positive section imposing liability. Section 157 of the English act does. I am not sure that we are talking by the book, because it may be that the Winding-up Act does it.

Mr. BENNETT: The Winding-up Act defines the measure of liability but it does not make it unlimited. I am speaking from memory, but I do not think it does.

Mr. RALSTON: The English act imposes a positive liability on the shareholder, which my hon. friend says is not contained in section 45 as it stands. Coming back to section 5 again, I suggest to the Secretary of State that it would be worth while if he allowed the section to stand. May I refer however to subsection (10), which prohibits what have come to be known as management or control shares. I have received several representations with regard to this matter to the effect that there does not seem to be any point in making this subsection apply to what we know as private companies, that is, companies whose shares are not subscribed for by the public, the transfer of whose shares is restricted, and companies the number of whose shareholders is limited. I understand that there are companies owned largely by foreigners which pay some revenue to this country, composed of people who live outside Canada and who hold shares which represent the equity. They have another class of shares which control the management?

Mr. CAHAN: Would it not be sufficient to strike out, at the top of page 3, the word "the" in the first line, and to insert in place thereof "a public company," so as to read "in no case shall shares of a public company of any class"—

Mr. BENNETT: It is the public company aimed at, because of difficulties that arose in consequence of financial control, I will not say by exploiters but by houses that took properties and dealt with them for the purpose of controlling them.

Mr. RALSTON: Groups.

Mr. CAHAN: Yesterday, the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens), referring to myself, said:

> The minister who introduced this legislation stated in one part of his remarks that if he were in private practice he would like nothing better than to be briefed to contest the very measures he was introducing.

That statement is entirely inaccurate and misleading. I did make reference to one subsection, and one subsection only, this subsection 10. I said I did not regard it as adequate to prevent shareholders, by private arrangement, obtaining control of a company and so control of the management of the company. One of the things most to be desired is to obtain continuity of management, and in many public companies this is not obtained by management shares. I have never incorporated a company with management shares; but I have found several ways whereby, by consent and cooperation or by agreement on the part of a majority of the shareholders, continuity of management could be maintained. That is all I had in mind at the time.

Mr. BENNETT: That is done now by the directors retiring from year to year; they do not all retire the same year.

Mr. CAHAN: I certainly was not making reference to the whole act, as the hon. member for East Kootenay improperly stated.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the section might stand.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendment I propose comes in at this stage. The amendment would be, in form, 5 (a) to this act, and would propose section 45 (a) to the main act. I am willing to have the amendment stand.

Mr. BENNETT: They can stand together.

Section stands.

On section 6—Bylaw for consolidation, reduction, increase, etc., of share capital.

Mr. CAHAN: There is something here that should be considered. In line 12, paragraph (b), the words appear:

—consolidate all shares with par value.

And in line 15, paragraph (c), there are the words:

—consolidate all shares without par value.

I suggest that the word "all" should be changed to the word "any". My attention has been drawn by some lawyers to the fact that you could not consolidate the preferred without consolidating all the common, or consolidate the common without consolidating the preferred. My amendment, therefore, is to change the word "all" to the word "any" in line 12 and to change the word "all" to the word "any" in line 15.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Creation or conversion of preferred shares, etc., by bylaw.

Mr. CAHAN: Some of the lawyers have made certain verbal suggestions in connection with this section. They suggest that in paragraph (a), line 40, we should insert the word "the" after the word "for" and the word "of" after the word "issuing" in the same line—"for the creating and issuing of any."

Mr. BOTHWELL: In this particular section, what exactly is the object of doing away with the deferred shares?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know; I have no idea what was in the mind of the commission who recommended it. Perhaps the hon. member for Hants-Kings can inform us. Deferred shares, in practice, do not usually come into the first organization of a company, in my experience at any rate; but we have had during the past four years many compromises as between shareholders and creditors representing different interests in which deferred shares are authorized and my hon. friend knows that such compromise arrangements are permitted under the act with the approval of the court. Under the supervision of a judge of the superior court of the province in which the head office of the company is, and in considering such compromise arrangements I have frequently found provisions that some of the ordinary shareholders should become deferred shareholders in order that a more equitable arrangement might be reached. I have not seen this in our Canadian practice except as arising out of such compromises.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I have been informed that this is a very useful manner of financing a company; that is, some shareholders, particularly in mining companies, are quite willing that dividends should be deferred to them until the company is in a position to pay the deferred dividends. I am not well enough versed in the matter to be able to argue the point, and I shall leave it to others.

Mr. ILSLEY: It apparently devolves upon me to justify this recommendation. In a general way I think the members of the price spreads commission felt there should be a simplification of share issues and the placing upon the market of a number of different classes of shares was confusing to the general public and led to people buying shares of a different class from the ones they felt they were buying. That, generally speaking, was what was in the minds of the commission. I am very doubtful whether our attention was specifically directed to deferred shares; I do not think it was. There was no intention to cut out deferred shares as such, but it was felt it was desirable not to have too many classes or types of shares. That is the basis of the recommendation.

Mr. CAHAN: I would suggest that we pass the section as it stands and leave the question of deferred shares for future consideration or for another parliament because to change it now it going to lead to controversy.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister might look at section 48 again. I think he will find that to consolidate all shares with par value—

Mr. CAHAN: We have changed that.

Mr. BENNETT: But that does not convey the meaning the minister wants to convey because it takes part of the shares; my hon. friend intends that it shall take them all.

Mr. CAHAN: It reads:

Consolidate any shares with par value, whether common or preferred.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has changed it now. I think what they had in mind was properly expressed.

Mr. CAHAN: I can make it read:

Consolidate all common and/or preferred shares with par value.

And leave out "whether common or preferred." I have had under consideration the suggestions made both ways.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the last suggestion would cover the point.

Mr. CAHAN: It would read:

(b) Consolidate all common and/or preferred shares with par value—

And leave out the underlined words "whether common or preferred" and then continue:

—into shares of larger par value not exceeding the par value of $100 each.

Then in the next line:

(c) Consolidate all common and/or preferred shares without par value—

Leaving out the words "whether common or preferred."

—so that the authorized number of such common and/or preferred shares is reduced.

That will make it clearer.

Mr. BENNETT: That makes it clear beyond peradventure.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Why not use the term "of the same class"? You are dealing with shares of a particular class, common shares and preferred shares:

Consolidate shares of the same class with par value, whether common or preferred.

Mr. CAHAN: I would be willing to take it that way.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me register my solemn and uncompromising opposition to the use of the words "and/or" in a statute. I have seen this in charter parties and it is becoming more common in legal documents; I do not think it is good English.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been in recent English statutes for the first time, within I think the last five years.

Mr. RALSTON: I insist it is not Canadian English.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not want to waste too much time on this, but when I heard the minister reading it I turned it up again to refresh my memory and I think the original section covers it:

Consolidate all shares with par value of any class into shares of larger par value not exceeding the par value of $100 each.

Because we have now agreed that there shall be only two classes, namely, common and preferred therefore I think the original section covers it.

Mr. CAHAN: Then it will be:

Consolidate all shares with par value of any class into shares of larger par value not exceeding the par value of $100 each.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. RALSTON: It was not intended to consolidate common and preferred?

Mr. BENNETT: No. The recommendation is limited to a class.

Mr. CAHAN: Then it will be paragraphs (b) and (c) of the existing act as they appear on the page opposite section 6. I suggest that amendment.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The amendment now is just to use paragraphs (b) and (c) as set forth on the opposite page?

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, if my hon. friend will move that.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—Creation or conversion of preferred shares, etcetera, by by-law.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggest that in line 40 instead of the words "for creating and issuing" there be inserted the words "for the creating and issuing of." I think that makes it clearer.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 8 and 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Prospectus to be filed before issue to public.

Mr. RALSTON: Something has been called to my attention on page 7, in regard to the time limit within which notice of the exercise of the right of rescission shall be given. Subsection 3, at the top of page 7, about half way through the section, contains these words:

—provided that written notice of the exercise of such right of rescission shall have been served on the company within thirty days from the date of receipt of notice of allotment or of issuance of the securities as the case may be, or within thirty days from the date of delivery or mailing to such applicant of a copy of the prospectus filed with the Secretary of State in respect of the securities, whichever shall be the longer period.

In the first place I suggest that the words "the date of receipt of notice of allotment or of issuance of the securities" are dangerously ambiguous.

Mr. BENNETT: Which line is that?

Mr. RALSTON: That is in line 9. I think it means the date of the receipt of the notice of allotment or from the date of issuance. I do not think the word "notice" refers to the issuance, and it seems to me that it should be made clear. I believe the words "from the date" should be inserted after the word "or" and before the words "of issuance."

Mr. CAHAN: I think that clarifies it.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I submit that instead of the words "the longer period" in line 13 it should be "the shorter period" and I will tell you why. It seems to me possible that there might be no notic of allotment but simply the issuance of the security. If that is the case and a man has thirty days from the receipt of the notice of allotment or from the date of issuance, whichever shall be the longer, it seems to me that he can wait for ever for a notice of allotment and say "My thirty days is not up." In other words, no one will be able to feel that a notice of rescission can be avoided until he has actually sent notice of allotment. It seems to me it is quite sufficient if I get a notice of allotment of shares and give my notice of rescission within that time. If I get no notice of allotment, but if the shares are issued, or if a copy of the prospectus is filed and I give my notice of rescission within thirty days, that would seem quite sufficient, instead of making it possible that the right to give a notice of rescission may never be foreclosed by reason of the fact that no notice of allotment is ever received.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no objection to those amendments. I have been in the habit, as I am sure the Prime Minister has, when providing for sending a notice of allotment to make provision for the issue of the shares with it. However, I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth meets the difficulty, and I accept it.

[Mr Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: The amendment is to substitute the word "shorter" for the word "longer" in line 13 and to insert the words "from the date" after the word "or" in line 9.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—Distributable surplus.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I should like to ask the Secretary of State the reason for omitting the words in italics on the opposite page, as follows:

—and the amount per share of the consideration to be received for any such shares comprised in the offer proposed to be set aside as such distributable surplus.

Mr. CAHAN: There was a provision of the former act, which enabled the directors at any time to set aside a distributable surplus, out of part of the capital, without the unanimous consent of the shareholders. Now that whole method is abrogated and repealed, and this limited setting aside is restricted to the provisions of subsection (7) of section 12 of the act, which restricts it very much. I have limited it to what is expressly authorized in that subsection.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Then after this act goes through how is it going to be possible to arrive at the price of the no par value shares? This was one method by which the issue price of no par value shares was fixed, and I should like to know how it is going to be possible to arrive at that price now.

Mr. CAHAN: The issue price of no par value shares hitherto has been fixed at the time of the allotment and subscription, but the amount that could be set aside as distributable surplus might be fixed at any time, one, two, three or four years after that. We have abolished all that; and in drafting this section, for which I am responsible, I simply reverted to the new subsection (7) of section 12 and restricted such setting aside to that only. All this other manoeuvering goes by the board and is prohibited.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—No dividends when company insolvent.

Mr. RALSTON: I was going to ask the Secretary of State if he would consider an amendment which would restrict the effect of this section to a so called write up made within three years of the date of the declaration. The section prohibits the declaration of a dividend when the company is insolvent, and it says that in determining the solvency of the company no account shall be taken of any increase in the surplus or reserves of the company resulting merely from the write up of the values of the assets of the company I think that is a good principle, but it seems to me that write ups may have occurred long before the declaration of the dividend which is attacked, and that it would be well to insert some time limit. Since three years is not an unusual time limit under the English act I suggest that.

Mr. BENNETT: What would be the effect of that?

Mr. RALSTON: The effect would be that in determining the solvency of a company you would not be precluded from taking into consideration write ups made more than three years before the declaration of the dividend.

The clause to be added would read:

—if such writing up has been done within three years preceding the date of such declaration.

Mr. CAHAN: I think we might have a limit. I have no doubt the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth has received from various accountancy firms and associations suggestions such as I have received, namely that, in respect of companies which have had long careers, from time to time appraisements writing up assets have been made and from time to time very considerable amounts of revenue have been set aside for depreciation. The records are of such doubtful accuracy that you cannot go back through the whole history of the company and determine just what the write up has been. You write up and you write down, and it seems to me a term of three years is short.

Mr. RALSTON: I have no great preference in the matter; like the Secretary of State, I have received letters from about six different people in which my attention has been called to different sections. It seems to me there ought to be provision so that if a write up has been made at a sufficiently remote date it would be effective for the purpose of determining the solvency of a company at a later date. I believe five years would be as good as three.

Mr. BENNETT: Five years would probably be in the best interests of the shareholders themselves.

Mr. CAHAN: I should think so. And further than that, through the ordinary changes in directorships a director would not of his own knowledge know about write ups for more than five years anterior. He would have to accept the statements of the auditors.

Mr. ILSLEY: When he introduced the bill, or upon second reading—I am not sure which—I believe the minister stated that this was the law, anyway, and that no enactment was necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be, up to the addition of the words about determining the solvency of the company. That is the law, up to that point. These new words were not the law.

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe that is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is what the minister had in mind. I believe the suggestion of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth should be acted upon.

Mr. CAHAN: I suggested that with regard to the latter part it might be limited. The only question is as to what would be a reasonable limit.

Mr. RALSTON: I have asked the same question the Secretary of State has asked, namely, as to the possibility of determining when the write up had been made.

Mr. CAHAN: Would there be any objection to having a term of five years?

Mr. BENNETT: I imagine the injury aimed at arises through the appraisal companies—

Mr. RALSTON: —appraising every shingle nail and every brick.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I saw one set, showing reproduction costs less depreciation, and when they finished it the property was worth about five times what it stood at in the books of the enterprise.

Mr. RALSTON: And about five times what it cost when it was built.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I believe that is true, too, because of the difference in cost now as compared with the costs at the time of building. The only question seems to be that of deciding whether it should be three or five years, or some other time. I believe there should undoubtedly be some time limit.

Mr. RALSTON: I believe five years would be fair.

Mr. BENNETT: Because, as the minister has said, there is a continuous reduction by depreciation allowance.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. BENNETT: How would it read; we want to make the section clear.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I have it in this way:

That there be added to section 12 the following words: "if such writing up has been done within five years preceding the date of such declaration."

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is all right.

Mr. RALSTON: Would the committee prefer this wording: "unless such writing up has been done more than five years preceding"?

Mr. BENNETT: That would be better.

Mr. CAHAN: I would suggest "shall have been made" rather than "done."

Mr. RALSTON: With my suggestion it would read: "more than five years before the date of such declaration."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The suggested change would be, including the various suggestions, "unless such writing up shall have been made more than five years before the date of such declaration."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 13 and 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Statement by director of personal account.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe this section most certainly should apply only to public companies. I refer to section 96A of the act. The shareholders are limited. I was going to suggest that section 96A (1) should read: "Every director of a public company" shall do so and so. Then in subsection (2) it would read: "No director of a public company shall speculate" and so on,—because the shares of a private company are not listed on the stock exchange.

Mr. RALSTON: The same change would be made in subsection (4).

Mr. BENNETT: And in subsection (5). I should think those changes would be desirable.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, the suggestions have come from many sources. Then, if those changes are agreeable I should like to ask that similar amendments be adopted with regard to section 96B.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. RALSTON: In connection with section 96A I should like to make another suggestion. I believe there is a chance for misunderstanding or misapprehension in connection with the time of delivery of shares. In subsection (3) the word "speculate" is defined as "trading in securities in the course of successive and continuous acts; selling a security where the director does not own the security sold, or, if owning the security, does not deliver it against such sale within twenty days thereafter, or does not deliver the same within five days after such sale by depositing it in the mails or other usual channels of transportation." It seems to me that there is a question as to whether or not those two provisions are limited to five days instead of twenty days. I would suggest that the delay for depositing in the mail be the same as the delay for delivery against sale. I do not know what reason there can be for the difference. In other words, the word "five" should be changed to "twenty."

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The hon. member refers to the word "five" in line eighteen of the section?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): And suggests that it be changed to "twenty"?

Mr. CAHAN: I have no objection.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the hon. member realize what is meant?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe it means that twenty days are allowed against it, but that he shall put it in the mails within five days of the twenty. That is, there are twenty days in which to perform a transaction, but it must be mailed. If the change would make it clearer it would not be objectionable. It was not intended that the time be limited to five days.

Mr. RALSTON: The Prime Minister thinks that five days are part of the twenty days?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he has to put it in the mail. He must put it in the mail or the usual channel of transportation within five days. He must complete the sale within twenty days, and must begin the process of completion within five days by putting it in the mail or some other method of transportation. I believe that is the rule of the stock exchanges in connection with some of these matters. That is, he must put it in the mail within five days of the date of the sale, but it must be completed within twenty days. Is that not the real meaning of the section?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, I had that in mind. If he actually delivered the security, himself, he could take twenty days to do it—that is, if it were delivered by physical delivery. But if he were delivering it by mail, by express or through other channels of transportation then at least he ought to deliver it into the mail or to the express company in the five days, no matter what time it might reach its ultimate destination.

Mr. RALSTON: If I may be permitted to use a slang expression, I would say that that is pretty snappy.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I think perhaps it is. Five days would be a limited time, if a holiday or a Sunday intervened.

Mr. RALSTON: The stock has to be transferred, he has to have a new certificate and whip it into the mails, or he would be a speculator.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, give him a chance.

Mr. BENNETT: I scarcely think it means that he has to complete it; I think it means that he has to have it properly endorsed and in the mail. But even five days would be a very short space of time if the stock exchange closed on a Friday and Saturday and Sunday intervened.

Mr. RALSTON: And if Monday happened to be the King's birthday.

Mr. CAHAN: If he sells he must deliver within a reasonable time; that is the point that has to be protected.

Mr. BENNETT: You might say within a reasonable time, without undertaking to define it. You might leave out the question of the mails altogether and let him take his chances on putting it in the mail or other means of transportation.

Mr. RALSTON: Is delivery in the mail good delivery? I do not know what the rules of the stock exchange are, whether it would be regarded as good delivery. I like the alternative which the Secretary of State provided, that a man might put it in the post office and say: There, I have made my delivery.

Mr. BENNETT: I frankly think it would not be regarded as good delivery to put it in the mail. The trust companies that act as transfer agents, if my memory is correct, require someone to appear in person with the documents, and that is the reason you see so many clerks going around in the morning making deliveries. I speak subject to correction on that but my own experience is that they require someone physically to deliver them, that if I have a transfer to make I have to send it to some friend of mine who is in a business way and he sends his clerk up to the trust company to have the transfer made. Any reference to the mails might complicate it. This is a tremendously harsh section in many ways. You perhaps might say, "deliver against such sale within twenty days thereafter," and leave out the rest.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know enough about it to know whether there is any case in which you could not actually make physical delivery. It might be impossible in some cases. I think it would be as well to allow it to be dropped in the post office. You might say: Fifteen days in the mail or twenty days delivery. That would give five days to cover the time mentioned by the Secretary of State in which it is in transit to the transferee.

Mr. CAHAN: Suppose you are making delivery in London; of course, twenty days in the ordinary case would be sufficient, but one who is trying to escape this penalty might reasonably argue that if he has delivered the same to the express company or to the mail within a certain limited time, such as five or six or seven days, he would thereby be relieved of the penalty.

Mr. BENNETT: My difficulty is how you can prove what is in the envelope when you put it in the mail.

Mr. CAHAN: It is the same when you prove the contents of a registered letter in the mail. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we change the word "twenty" in line seventeen to "thirty", that a semicolon be put after the word thereafter in the same line, and that we strike out the words "or does not deliver the same within five days after such sale by depositing it in the mails or other usual channels of transportation."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Something should be done about giving publicity to this at the very earliest possible moment because there may be innocent people, directors of companies, for instance, who have no idea how stringent the provisions of this law are.

Mr. CAHAN: I have had that called to my attention especially with regard to sections dealing with accounting, and it has been suggested that we should have the usual clause for bringing this bill into force by one or more proclamations, that we might bring the whole act into force at once with the exception of certain clauses which might require sixty days' notice.

Mr. BENNETT: I would fix a date and say this section comes into force on the first day of——month in——year.

Mr. RALSTON: Could you not make the whole act come into force at some particular time, some time to get by the accounting period, say the first of September?

Mr. BENNETT: Reading this section it struck me that it is a section of extreme severity. When I first saw it and discussed it with the Secretary of State I wondered whether it was capable of being actually put into force. Looking it over since I see that it is, but there will be a lot of people who will be violating a law who think that they are violating none. I have frequently come across directors who were buying shares and thought that they were not doing wrong. This section is very severe. Perhaps we should say that the whole act will come into force at a given date, the first of July, August or September.

Mr. CAHAN: I have discussed that with a number of those interested, some of the stock exchange people, and the suggestion was that we should insert a new section at the end as to the act coming into force in whole or in part, and then we could fix a particular time for certain sections that involved drastic penalties.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the first of September for the whole act might be all right.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want to refer to section 96B which speaks of "adequate consideration in cash, property or services." Cash payments are always a tangible thing, and the same applies to property, but it is often hard to arrive at an accurate conclusion as to services. It is in that connection that most of the abuses have arisen in my section of the country, leaving mining aside altogether. I think it would not be beyond the power of this committee to establish a certain rate for services. The Secretary of State may not be aware of it, but in certain cases the services for the promotion of certain companies are obtained on a cash paid basis and also on the basis of the actual value of the property. I think the purposes of this bill will be defeated unless we find it possible to remedy that situation.

I do not think anyone in the country will quarrel with the principle of this bill as it is a step forward in the remedying of the evils of monopolies. Both the Secretary of State and the committee are aware of the single liability of promoters in stock companies. This is one of the great causes of abuse in this country. The small store-keeper, the small mill owner or the small business man who is forced into bankruptcy may lose all his assets while the man who has invested his money in a limited stock company is responsible only for the amount he has paid in. We have a double liability provision in connection with shareholders in banks and I believe it would be a step in the right direction to provide that shareholders in stock companies shall have at least a double liability. This would be one of the best means of remedying the abuses of monopolies. The small store-keeper may lose even his personal belongings while the man who has invested in the limited company is responsible only for what he has paid in.

I notice the mining companies are not included and I believe this is due to certain provincial laws, more particularly the blue sky laws of Ontario. When those laws are carried out it is practically impossible to have anything but proper promotion of companies. I should like the Secretary of State to consider a more definite description of the services to be rendered and consider also the putting into effect of a double liability in connection with shareholders.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Would it not be possible to delete the words "or is to receive" in line 44? The section would then read:

> It shall not be lawful for the directors or promoters of a company to authorize the issue and allotment of any shares of the capital stock of the company as fully paid up unless the company receives what may justly be deemed,—

Mr. CAHAN: Shares may be allotted payable ten per cent on allotment and then the rest payable on call within a certain definite time. The allotment is for full consideration and although only part payment is received there is a contract to pay upon call. The words "or is to receive" mean that the company is entitled to receive.

Mr. BOTHWELL: This section provides authorization for the issue and allotment of shares and it provides for the payment by services. According to the construction I put upon it, it means that the directors of a company could issue shares as fully paid up for services to be rendered some time in the future.

Mr. CAHAN: It was not intended that future services might be part of the consideration.

Mr. BOTHWELL: We should not make it possible for directors to issue shares for services some time in the future.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think that should be done.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That appears to me to be the interpretation of the section and I believe those words should come out. In this connection I should like to refer to the case of the Toronto Finance Corporation Limited and Cook versus Banking Service Corporation Limited, reported in 59 Ontario Law Reports, in which Mr. Justice Hodgins used these words:

> I can find no case where personal services to be rendered in future were held to be a proper consideration for the payment up of shares.

He then proceeds to quote the opinion of judges in England to the same effect and argues throughout that it would not be advisable under any circumstances to permit a company to issue shares for services to be rendered.

Mr. CAHAN: I quite agree with that.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Is that not the interpretation to be placed on this clause? It reads that way to me.

Mr. CAHAN: I might be engaged as a manager of a company at a salary of $4,000. It would be quite possible to make a collateral agreement under which I would have the right to take shares in the future by paying cash from time to time.

Mr. BOTHWELL: But the shares would be issued.

Mr. CAHAN: This section does not refer to the actual issuing of shares it refers to the authorization for such an issue. That is, you cannot pass your resolution or by-law to authorize the issue or allotment of any shares unless the company then receives or is thereafter entitled to receive the full consideration therefor. Does the hon. gentleman think that that is not positive enough?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I think we should leave out the words "or is to receive." In connection with receiving goods or services, Cairns, L. J., used these words:

> Goods might not be supplied at all, or they might be supplied of such a quality that they ought to be rejected, and the remedies against the shareholder might be unavailable, while the other shareholders had all along been paying in cash. If the agreement was ultra vires of the directors, then, since it must be taken as a whole, the question falls to the ground.

The late Sir Francis Gore-Browne in his work on companies referred to this case as establishing that an agreement to accept the supply of goods at a future time against calls is not valid, for that is to contract that future calls may be satisfied by damages for a breach of contract to supply the goods. The same reasoning will hold in connection with services, whether on the part of the promoter or manager of the company, or in whatever capacity such person may act. The services might not be satisfactory and the shareholders would simply be left to an action for damages instead of actually getting redress.

Mr. CAHAN: I am perfectly willing to leave out those words.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Then I move that these words be struck out.

Mr. RALSTON: They will never have received consideration when the authorization was given. The case will never happen where a company has actually received consideration at the time the authorization is given. Every case in which consideration will be received by the company will be after authorization, and therefore, it seems to me, the words are absolutely essential.

Mr. CAHAN: Perhaps it might read, "or shall receive."

Mr. RALSTON: With reference to the case referred to by my hon. friend, as I understand it this does not overrule that case in the slightest; it merely declares that you cannot penalize the director for authorizing something unless the company is not to receive proper consideration. The authorization may be wholly illegal so far as enforcing the contract is concerned.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Why, then, should not the directors be penalized in that case?

Mr. RALSTON: I would not penalize the directors for not having actually received consideration before authorization; I would not penalize them for not insisting on consideration before authorizing. The directors meet and say, "We authorize the issue of ten shares of stock to Jim Jones, the bookkeeper of the company, after his first six months, and we authorize the president and the secretary to issue these shares when the service is completed." After the authorization is given the services are to be performed.

Mr. BRADETTE: Under this act they are to be illegal.

Mr. RALSTON: No, because the issue would not actually take place until the services were performed. This is only the authorization, not the issue.

Mr. BRADETTE: They cannot be called paid up shares then.

Mr. RALSTON: They will be paid up shares when they are issued.

Mr. CAHAN: The directors are liable jointly and severally to make good to the company the amount by which the consideration actually received by the company for any shares so issued and allotted is found by the court, after full inquiry into the circumstances of the transaction, to be less than the amount of the consideration which the company ought to have received for such shares. As to the passing of the resolution, they shall not pass the resolution unless the company is to receive consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest that this section ought to stand with section 5 because the same term is used.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to move the amendment I read some time ago.

Mr. CAHAN: We will let it stand. Personally I think it is going too far. Let us have a statutory obligation and duty or else let us rely on the common law; but the mixing of the two obligations might lead to endless complications.

Mr. BRADETTE: What machinery will be set in motion to arrive at the value of the services rendered?

Mr. CAHAN: It is not for the Secretary of State to decide that.

Mr. BRADETTE: But the minister must know what machinery will be used.

Mr. CAHAN: The Secretary of State does not control resolutions passed by ten thousand companies of which he has no knowledge. But if complaint is made, the Secretary of State may have expert accountants examine into these matters. Hereafter the Secretary of State will be relieved to a large extent of that duty because he can at once refer it to the new board for investigation.

Section stands.

On section 16—Voting rights.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the purpose of inserting this section? It seems perfectly proper to have one share one vote, unless the bylaws prescribe otherwise. It is a new section; why?

Mr. CAHAN: It was drafted by the Department of Justice to carry out some recommendation of the commission.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. BOTHWELL: Possibly it is the outcome of some of the cases drawn to the attention of the price spreads commission. For instance, the dairy case that arose in Winnipeg was brought to the attention of the house. There a certain class of shareholders were able to overrule another class; men who had put their money into the concern had no rights at all. This provision, apparently, is inserted to give to people who invest money in a company the right to have some say in the management of it.

Mr. RALSTON: It would mean this, unless the bylaws changed it, that if there were a $50 preferred share and a $100 common share, for every $100 of preferred shares there would be two votes to one for every $100 of common stock, and the company would be controlled by people with only one-third of the total capital investment.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the real difficulty in the section, that it does not provide for shares at different par values but gives equal voting power to shares, whether of $5 or $100.

Mr. ILSLEY: The intention of the commission was to recommend that persons with equal investment should have equal voting power in the company, whatever the bylaws might say. It seems to me, therefore, that there are two things wrong with the section: it does not make provision for equal voting power for equal investment, inasmuch as it equalizes the voting power of shares which may represent unequal investments; and it makes it all subject to the provisions of the bylaws, which may nullify the whole thing.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be unfair to leave the section as it is.

Mr. RALSTON: If it is subject to the provisions of the bylaws—

Mr. BENNETT: Being subject to the provisions of the bylaws will not overcome that difficulty, because the bylaws must be in every sense consistent with the provisions of the statute.

Mr. CAHAN: Hereafter no by-law of that kind can be passed; it has to be approved by the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State has absolute control for the future; but take companies in which there has been a difference of voting power and voting power has been given to preferred shareholders and not to common, or to common and not to preferred; are we going to wipe that out by this section? As to the future the situation is pretty clear, but as to the past are we to wipe out rights now existing and by-laws passed under them? That is not my ground; that is the ground of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure that section should not be passed in its present form.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought by the introductory words you could change the voting power by by-law.

Mr. BENNETT: I did at first, but if you remember the new provisions of the law you will realize the situation.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the provisions in mind particularly. I had in mind the old section 108, I think it is, which prescribed the subjects on which by-laws might be passed. I thought you could make by-laws on any of those subjects and thereby take the shares of the particular company out from under the provisions of this section. I think we ought to consider it a little further before we pass it in its present form.

Section stands.

On section 17—Details of balance sheet.

Mr. CAHAN: At the top of page 11 in the first line where it reads "other debts owing by the company," it should be "other debts owing to the company." Then in line 9 the word "the," the next word to the end of the line, should be "their," so that the paragraph would read:

Investments and securities, if any, stating their nature.

I would suggest those changes.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: It has been suggested to me by a member who was unable to be present this afternoon that paragraph (e) on page 11 should be amended to read:

Investments and securities, if any, stating their nature and showing the market value of marketable securities and separately the book value of other securities.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is a great improvement.

Mr. CAHAN: I promised the hon. member I would bring that suggestion to the attention of the committee. He said that there was often great difficulty in ascertaining the market value and this should provide for showing the market value of marketable securities and separately the book value of other securities. I make that suggestion to the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is highly desirable, for a reason that must commend itself to the members of the committee. Some securities have no market value. That is pointed out in another part of the section. In other words, they have no ready market value; they cannot be sold, and therefore the balance sheet should show what they cost the company.

On the next page at the top where it reads:

There shall be stated under separate headings in the balance sheet of the company, so far as they are not written off—

That "of" should be "off." When those particulars have been stated in a balance sheet he who runs may read. I do not think there is any chance of anybody being misled. I think the suggestion made by the minister as to showing the book value of securities when they have no market value is desirable.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: At the top of page 12, as I said, that word "of" should be "off."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 18—Amounts paid to directors to appear in statements.

Mr. CAHAN: This section fulfils all the recommendations of the price spreads report.

Mr. BRADETTE: As regards lines 27 to 31 on page 12, with reference to the amounts paid to a managing director and so forth, those amounts should be included in the statement.

Mr. CAHAN: They fall under subsection 2.

Mr. BRADETTE: Commencing at line 27 the section reads:

Exclusive of the amounts paid to a managing director, if any, or any other director who holds any salaried employment or office in the company and who devotes substantially the whole of his time to the business of the company or its subsidiaries.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, simply to make the matter clear? We provide in the first subsection as to the amount that is paid to a director qua director but in the second subsection we have provided in line 36 that all salaries shall be shown including that of the managing director, if any, of the company, so we have that included, but the first subsection merely deals with fees of directors qua directors. As regards the officers the statement must show what all directors who are officers, receive by way of salaries, fees, et cetera, in any other capacity. I think that makes it clear.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Copies of financial statements to be sent.

Mr. CAHAN: There has been a printer's mistake. To carry out fully the purport of the report, the section should read:

In the case of a company, not being a private company (a)—

There should be that "(a)" there so as to indicate a new paragraph. Then I propose to insert another paragraph (b) at the bottom:

That any holder of debentures of the company shall be entitled to be furnished by the company on demand without charge with a copy of such balance sheet and the statements as aforesaid which have been laid before the company at the last annual meeting.

By some misadventure this last paragraph was left out.

I would suggest that in this section at line 11 after the words "be mailed" the words "together with the notice of such annual meeting" be left out. There is no objection to sending out the statement, but they should not be liable to a penalty if they do not put the two documents in the same envelope.

Amendments agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: We will hold section 20 because renumbering may have to be done.

Progress reported.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What will be the business to-night, if I may ask?

Mr. BENNETT: We will finish the divorce bills on the order paper, and I thought perhaps after that we might adjourn, because there is nothing except this bill and the other one to finish. One clause which we discussed this afternoon will take some little time to consider.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could we not take up the housing bill?

Mr. BENNETT: If it is desired.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT

The house in committee on Bill No. 11, to amend the Interest Act—Mr. Coote—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Interest on contracts and agreements restricted to seven per cent.

Mr. COOTE: Mr. Chairman, this Bill No. 11 was originally introduced early in the session and it was some time before it was reported on by the committee. Only one of the sections, which is the important one of the bill as introduced, was in the bill as finally passed by the committee and reported to the house. The bill as introduced called for a limitation on the rate of interest on all mortgages, whether now existing or to be made in the future, to four per cent, but as amended in the committee that limitation would apply only to existing mortgages, and the cut-off date has been fixed in the bill as January 1, 1935. So the bill now before the house would limit the rate of interest which might be collected on any mortgage on real estate issued prior to January, 1935, to six per cent per annum. Speaking for myself I would be quite willing to have it apply to all mortgages, but in our own province so far as I am aware there are very few new mortgages being made.

The interest rate on existing mortgages is the important question for us, and I would just like to take a few minutes to bring to the attention of the committee a few facts to show that undoubtedly there is need of legislation to deal with this question of interest rates. I will deal first with the interest rate on farm mortgages.

The cash income of all the farms in Canada for the years 1926, 1927, 1928 and 1929, before the depression years, was 4,012 million dollars, and for the years 1931, 1932, 1933 and 1934, that is the depression years, the cash income of all the farms in Canada was 1,744 million dollars, or only 43 per cent in those last four years of the income in the previous four years mentioned. In other words, there was a drop in the last four years of 2,268 million dollars in farm income or an average of over 550 million dollars for each one of those years. In the face of that drop in revenue, which amounts on the average for the four years to $3,136 per farm, I think hon. members can see the need for some legislation to relieve the farmers who are now paying rates of interest as high as seven, eight and nine per cent. This drop in income per farm of $3,136 in the last four years would have been sufficient to pay off every farmer's debt in Canada and leave about $1,000 for every farm over and above the amount of the debt.

The drop in farm revenue is, of course, due to the drop in price levels. It is not due, as some people may think, to a drop in production. I have previously put figures on Hansard to show that it is nearly all due to the drop in price levels, a factor over which the farmer himself had no control and no possibility of control.

The rate at present charged in western Canada, at least in Alberta, is generally eight per cent, although there are some mortgages at nine per cent. A case recently came before the board of review operating under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the province of Alberta of a real estate mortgage carrying a rate of interest of twenty per cent. I have that statement in a letter from one of the members of the board of review. There are also a good many private loans at ten per cent. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more for hon. members of this committee to see the need of some legislation to limit the rate of interest which can be collected on these mortgages.

The board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in Alberta have in the majority of instances been setting the rate of interest on farm mortgages by mortgage companies at seven per cent, which I think is much too high, but the chairman of the board persists in stating, I believe, that it is the duty of parliament to set a lower rate. The rate of seven per cent is mentioned in one of the sections of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. In Manitoba I believe the board in the last few weeks has been setting a maximum rate of six per cent on farm mortgages. In Quebec I am told that in some cases the rate on farm mortgages has been placed as low as four per cent by the board of review operating in that province.

The Alberta board has heard about three hundred cases to date. It has been sitting five days a week and working very hard, but it is going to take them some years to clear up all the cases that come before them unless something is done to fix by law a maximum rate of interest. I think this bill is fixing the rate quite high enough when it sets it at six per cent. If a six per cent maximum rate were established by law I believe that the majority of farmers in the province of Alberta would not need to go to the board of review. The only way to get a lower rate of interest than eight per cent in Alberta is to go before the board of review, and if the board of review establishes as a matter of practice a rate of seven per cent the mortgage companies naturally will not care to make a voluntary reduction to anything lower than seven per cent.

I want to place on Hansard for the benefit of this committee a statement in regard to the payments made by one farmer at Brant, Alberta. I mentioned this case in the banking committee, where the figures were challenged by several members. They said they could not possibly be correct. I afterwards wrote to the chairman of the banking committee and asked him to have the clerk or someone else inquire into the case. The books of the company that made the loan were examined and I have here a copy of the memorandum which was sent to the finance minister by Mr. Finlayson, the superintendent of insurance, who investigated the case. I shall not take time to put the whole of his statement on Hansard, but will simply say that the loan was made in February, 1912, for $1,500 at a rate of eight per cent. By 1928, according to this statement, the farmer had paid $3,587.28, and $708 of that amount was subsequently paid out by the company for taxes, so that the net amount which the farmer paid was $2,878.32. This was all for interest and charges, including fire insurance, $61.50; inspection fee, $37.50; solicitors' fees, $57.03. In 1933 this mortgage was foreclosed. I am quoting these figures simply for the purpose of impressing on the committee just how much money it would require from the farmers' operations to meet these charges. Over a period of twenty years he paid $2,878, and when the loan was foreclosed the amount that he still owed was approximately $1,500. If we could have had in Canada a six per cent interest rate, and the other two per cent which was charged could have been used to amortize the loan, it would have been entirely paid off and the farmer would still be in possession of his farm.

Just a word or two in regard to urban mortgages. I have had brought to my attention the case of a mortgage on a house in the city of Calgary at the rate of ten per cent, and I have a letter under my hand from a notary in one of the cities of Ontario in which he says:

> I can number mortgagors among my clients, whose total indebtedness is well over $100,000, upon which they are paying from eight per cent to ten per cent interest.
> As an alderman of the city I am pleased at the thought that our tax arrears will be paid up now that interest charges on properties are reduced.

That is from an alderman in an Ontario city. He is a little premature in thinking that the interest charges are already reduced. I had a visit a few days ago from some gentlemen representing the landlords' protective association of Montreal and they assured me that there are many real estate mortgages in that city which bear interest rates of seven and eight per cent and second mortgages bearing interest rates of nine and ten per cent. In some cases the mortgage may show upon its face only a rate of seven or eight per cent but a very heavy discount is sometimes made when the loan is granted. An alderman in one city in Canada told me that he believed in certain cases the rate actually collected was as high as twenty per cent, taking into account the discounts made when the loan was granted.

I anticipate that the question of constitutionality will be raised, that it will be stated that the Dominion of Canada has not the power to lower the rate of interest on existing obligations, but if I remember correctly, a year or two ago the attorneys general of the provinces agreed that this power rested in the dominion government. In these days when the government is passing reform measures which heretofore might have been considered as unconstitutional I do not think we would be running much risk in passing this bill. The only way in which to find out whether it is constitutional is to try it.

I anticipate also that some question will be raised as to this action affecting our credit in outside countries, particularly Great Britain. I would remind the committee that Great Britain recently notified the United States that she did not intend to make certain payments which were due about this time. I think for the last two or three years Great Britain has been making token payments. The United States itself changed the terms of the contract when they stated that a promise to pay in gold need not be honoured in the term in which it was taken, that payment in legal tender or paper currency will be sufficient to discharge the debt. I shall not labour this point; it has been discussed before.

I would remind the committee that nearly every country in the world has taken some action along the lines which I suggest in this bill. Australia, South Africa, I believe New Zealand, and many other countries have taken action to limit the rates of interest which can be collected regardless of what might be stated in the mortgages. When I offered an amendment to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act to limit the rates of interest charged on farm mortgages, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) said that the proper way to deal with that matter would be through Bill No. 11. He said:

> My hon. friend speaks for the farmer who is not going to come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. That farmer will get such protection as this house may decide to accord him when it deals with Bill No. 11, which covers all mortgages.

According to that statement this will be the only occasion upon which we will have an opportunity to deal with this very important question.

There is a crying need for this bill; I would not have introduced it had I not felt there was such a need. The fall in price levels which I mentioned earlier in my remarks is something over which the farmer had no control. He had no reason to anticipate such a fall and he entered into his obligations in good faith. In the great majority of cases the farmers are doing their best to discharge their obligations. The company or individual collecting eight or nine per cent in interest charges is receiving a purchasing power far in excess of what was anticipated. It would be nothing less than justice to reduce the rate of interest to six per cent; even at that rate the majority of mortgages would secure in purchasing power just as much as they did ten years ago when the mortgages were made. For this and many other reasons I hope that the committee will see fit to accept this bill. I know it is near the end of the session but I introduced the bill early in the session but for some weeks I could not get the banking committee to meet.

Mr. BENNETT: I move that the committee rise. In doing so I have only to point out—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Is this motion debatable?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): This kills the bill, of course.

Motion agreed to: yeas, 35; nays, 18.

Mr. SPENCER: I was paired with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Stewart). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. NEILL: I was paired with the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

EVIDENCE IN APPEAL TO JUDGE FROM RULING OF REGISTRAR OF ELECTORS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 18, consideration in committee of Bill No. 109, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act—

Mr. CAHAN—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Judge may not rescind final ruling of registrar.

Mr. CAHAN: With regard to the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston), I would remind the house that this bill is simply a declaratory act; it declares the intention of the house with respect to the meaning and intent of the subsection referred to. This bill was introduced at the suggestion of the Dominion franchise commissioner and was approved by him. He did not approve of it because it related to the electoral list in the electoral district which I have the honour to represent, but, unless the bill is carried into effect, he fears that as a result a very considerable number of appeals throughout Canada will be taken to the judges having jurisdiction in the several constiuencies. This bill is in entire accord with his understanding of the meaning and intent of the sections now proposed to be amended. The bill is entirely consistent and conforms with the instructions he has given to each registrar of electors throughout the dominion. From one end of the country to the other, in respect of each electoral district, the registrars have acted in accordance with his instructions in carrying out the real intent and purpose of the act as expressed in this bill. Therefore, if utter confusion is to be avoided, he thinks the house should make this declaration.

Perhaps the other day I referred at too great length to what had occurred in my own constituency, but I do say here that so far as the registrar acted in that electoral district he acted under the specific instructions of the dominion franchise commissioner, who is the sole person under the act entitled to give him instructions. It is not necessary for me to add that so far as the commissioner gave his instructions under section 7 of the existing act he did so without consulting me as the minister to whom he reports; and, so far as the registrar in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George carried out those instructions, he carried them out without communication with me directly or indirectly, because I have had no personal communication with him from the day he was appointed up to the present time—and he was appointed, as all registrars were appointed, many months ago. The government therefore is of opinion under the circumstances that to avoid confusion throughout the whole country it cannot accept the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have listened with great care to the remarks made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan); I also listened to the debate that took place in this house some days ago regarding this bill, and as well to the statements made by the hon. member who has taken his seat, with reference to the fact that this is only a declaratory bill. The house will remember that when the bill was introduced the hon. gentleman, in introducing it, discussed a judgment of Mr. Justice Greenshields, who gave a decision in this matter. We have heard differences of opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman with respect to the contents of that judgment in relation to the provisions and the regulations under the act. In justice to the judge who rendered judgment in this matter and who cannot defend himself, who gave judgment in accordance with the provisions of the law; and in view of the high office he occupies in the country at the present time and the fact that before he went to the bench he was one of the most eminent jurists of our province and one of the leading legal lights of the country, being still considered one of the best judges on our judiciary, I think it is only fair for me to say a few words with reference to the grounds on which the learned judge based his judgment and the considerations which he indicated in coming to his conclusion. I think it is only proper that I should discuss the matter from that point of view in order to find out whether we are justified now in proceeding with this bill which the hon. gentleman has introduced.

I have in my hand what purports to be a copy of the judgment rendered on the 4th day of June in the city of Montreal in this very matter:

Province of Quebec.
District of Montreal.
Superior Court
Under The Dominion Franchise Act
Electoral Division St. Lawrence and St. George

Daniel McKeegan
Appellant and Rudolph Bernard
Registrar & Revising Officer
and
W. K. Prowse
Objector

This is an appeal from the ruling or order of the registrar under section 32 of the Dominion Franchise Act. That section provides, in part, as follows:

I will leave out section 32, which refers to the right of appeal and is contained in the act. The judgment proceeds:

On the 22nd of May, 1935, the registrar and revising officer, Mr. Rudolph Bernard, struck from the official list of electors the names of two hundred persons appearing on the regular official list of voters for the electoral division of St. Lawrence and St. George, and particularly on polls Nos. 17, 18, 19 and 31. These names all appeared in the notice of appeal entered by Daniel McKeegan, a duly qualified elector of the electoral division of St. Lawrence and St. George.

The names of these electors were so struck from the official list of voters upon an objection made to them by one, W. R. Prowse.

With the exception of the statement concerning a few of the two hundred, the unique and sole objection was, that they had removed from the electoral division, or at least, the poll in which their names were entered.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

It may be here stated, that after the notice of appeal was served on the registrar, the objector, Prowse, desisted from his objection, and purported to desist from the order given by the registrar striking the names of twenty-three out of the two hundred. The registrar decided that notwithstanding the withdrawal of the objection by the objector, and the declaration of his willingness to desist from the order striking the electors' names, he was unable to replace their names on the list. The appeal with respect to these twenty-three must be maintained, and acte is granted of the objector's declaration that he withdraws his objection, and the order goes to the registrar, to place these names on the voters' list as they appeared before the order of striking, and in the respective polls in which they appeared.

With respect to the remaining one hundred and seventy-seven, I now proceed to consider their appeals.

The names objected to all appeared on the official voters' list before the registrar or revising officer. Each one is entitled to exercise the franchise and is entitled to vote, unless and until it is affirmatively shown, either that he never possessed that right, or that he has forfeited the right. In other words, the presumption of law is, that each one of these electors is properly and legally on the list of voters, and in consequence, is entitled to exercise his franchise. The rule of law is expressed in the Roman maxim: "Omnia prae-sum-unter rite et solleniter esse acta."

The objector seeks to destroy the right of these electors to exercise the franchise, on the ground that they have lost their right by reason of a change of residence or domicile. Section 28 of the act deals with the proceedings before the revision court:

I will not put on the record this section, which is the procedure of the registrar and the revisal courts. The judge then goes on:

I propose to deal with these appeals in the light of and under the provisions of this section, and I observe, firstly, that the registrar must deal with each objection separately, and he must deal with the merits of the objection as disclosed by the examination under oath of the objector, and the person against whom the objection is made, always provided, I take it, that both are present. I next observe that the person against whom an objection is made, and who has received a notice under section 21, is not bound to attend, and his failure to attend does not relieve the objector from substantiating the existence of the fact upon which his objection is based. Moreover, the presumption in favour of the person against whom the objection is made is recognized in the statute. Such elector is under no obligation to adduce proof that his name is properly on the list. Again, it must be observed, and even emphasized, that the objector must offer proof substantiating a prima facie case by evidence, which, in the absence of rebuttal, is considered by the registrar sufficient to establish the fact, not a presumption, but the actual fact, that the person objected to is improperly on the list.

I now deal with the proceedings before the registrar, on the twenty-second of May, as disclosed before me. In the first place Prowse was the objector in all the two hundred cases. From his own testimony it appears that he did not know, personally, one of the two hundred against whom he made an objection. In the second place, he never saw one of these electors against whom he made these objections. What he did appears by his testimony. He went to the residence, as shown on the official voters' list. In some cases he found a vacant house, or a house into which he could not obtain entrance. How long that house had been vacant he has no idea. He therefore asked somebody for information, and somebody, whom he had never seen before, and whom he does not know, informed him, that the house was vacant: that the former tenant had moved away. This statement covers a comparatively few of the names objected to. In the great majority of the names the objector Prowse, found someone in the house. Again, he did not know that person, but asked that person if the elector lived there, and was told by that person, no, and Prowse testified to what he had heard before the registrar. He was never asked for the name of his informant, and if he had, he could not have given the name. At the hearing of the appeal I expressed the opinion, that this in itself was not prima facie evidence sufficient to establish the fact that the name of the person objected to was, to use the words of the statute, improperly on the list. In other words, it was not prima facie evidence that the elector objected to was no longer a resident within the limits of the polling division in which his name appeared. But the registrar says that registered letters sent by him to each of the persons whose names are objected to, were returned and were not delivered. Why, he does not know, and no one, so far as the record shows, can tell it.

In addition to this, a lady by the name of Ruth Clark obtained information from someone that an elector, whose name appears on poll No. 17 no longer resided at a certain number. How she discovered that is not disclosed. But she concludes by the statement, that she is credibly informed and verily believes, that the elector is no longer a qualified elector.

These affidavits I may state at once, the registrar admits, he never read. They never should have been read by him, and, as a matter of fact, they are not part of the proof made before the registrar. The registrar did state that he had read one perhaps of the two hundred, but he does admit that his ruling was not based upon these affidavits. The section of the act does not contemplate the making of proof before the registrar by ex parte affidavits. The act is silent on the matter of the use of affidavits. The act contemplates proof being made before the registrar by witnesses. Says the act:

"The registrar shall deal with each objection separately disclosed by examination on oath of the person making the objection, the person against whom the objection is made and the witnesses present on their respective behalf." It does not contemplate the production of affidavits purporting to support or substantiate the statement of fact made by the objector without any opportunity of the signers of the affidavit to be cross-examined as to their truth by the person against whom they are sought to be used.

I conclude that the registrar had not a scintilla of legal proof to make even a prima facie case, much less to establish the fact that any of these two hundred electors were improperly on the list and should be struck therefrom.

It was urged that one or two of the two hundred was dead. Fortunately for the dead person, there is no proof of death, and so far as the registrar is concerned and the proof made he is alive. I maintain the appeal in all the two hundred cases, and I order and direct the registrar to replace their names upon the official voters' list at the different polls in the electoral division of St. Lawrence and St. George as they appeared before being struck therefrom.

R. A. E. Greenshields,
J.C.S.

We have before the committee at the present time the fact upon which is based the act and the amendment to the act that we are now considering. Mr. Justice Greenshields based his decision upon the sections of the act just quoted and upon the evidence that was adduced before him. When I heard the other day the hon. member who is sponsoring the bill state that no evidence was made before Mr. Justice Greenshields, as regards the kind of statements signed before witnesses that he was talking about as evidence, there is no proof that such statements were submitted to Mr. Justice Greenshields. He had to revise the decision of the registrar in this case. If we look at the evidence that was given at a certain time before Mr. Justice Greenshields, we find that he decided this case on its very merits; and also by the evidence that was adduced before the registrar, in some instances by questions that were put, and by the way he directed the evidence to be given, the proof is there that he acted within the meaning of the act and in order to try as far as possible to give justice to all parties concerned.

For instance, at page 42 of the examination of Mr. Bernard, the registrar, the court asks this question:

Q. I suppose he did not tell you from whom he had obtained the information?

The answer is:

From somebody, some neighbour. In the case where the house was vacant, or the tenement was vacant, from the neighbour, and sometimes from the janitor.

By the court:

Q. In other words, all the information or assistance you got from Mr. Doyle—

Mr. Doyle was supposed to be a witness produced to corroborate what Mr. Prowse had stated.

—was, from what somebody told him, and he offered you what somebody told him, is that it?

A. Yes, sir, in most cases.

By the court:

Q. And it is true of Prowse, and it is true of Doyle?

A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. Mann:

Who was representing the interests of the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill.

Q. Let us see how true it is of Doyle. Is it not a fact that in many cases Doyle got the information direct from the person whose name was on the voters' list? Was not that evidence produced before you?

A. It is possible. I don't remember offhand.

By the court:

Q. Tell me now of one where that is true, and I will maintain your striking—tell me one elector who told Doyle that he had moved. Can you remember one of the two hundred?

A. I cannot at the present.

Mr. CAHAN: Who is making these answers?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Mr. Bernard. I have before me the whole evidence. I would not like to weary the committee by putting into the record all the answers that were given by the witnesses that were produced before the registrar. Mr. Bernard and Mr. Prowse were the two witnesses who appear to have been cross-examined at length by counsel on both sides. I intend to place before the committee more particularly the part of the evidence which shows exactly what kind of evidence Mr. Justice Greenshields wanted to have, and which I think he was entitled in law and in equity to have before he could strike these names from the list. He inquired from the registrar if such evidence had been adduced and presented, and the registrar admitted that it had not. It is also shown in the proceedings that the registrar stated that in some cases the letter that was sent by registered mail was returned, but the judge stated that this was not prima facie proof that the person was not there. Everyone knows that a registered letter can be sent to an address, and if it is not signed for by the person receiving it at that house no one can say that the person duly received the letter. I remember a recent case dealt with by the court of king's bench in the province of Quebec, in which I happened to be representing certain interested parties. It was the case of O'Shea and Michel, decided April 30, 1935. That case was decided on that very point; a registered letter had been sent but direct proof had not been produced that a receipt had been signed showing that the letter had been received by him, and the case was lost on that very ground. Apparently there is a method provided by the Post Office Department—and the Postmaster General might correct me if I am wrong—by which you may secure a proper certificate that a registered letter reached the person for whom it was intended. You pay an extra amount of some twenty or twenty-five cents and the person who receives the letter is bound to acknowledge receipt under his own signature. In these cases the only fact that appeared to have been proved was that registered letters had been sent, but the letters had been returned.

The other day the hon. gentleman stated that the registrar had been very diligent and had been very observant of the law in doing what had been done in putting into force the franchise act. I have no fault to find with this gentleman in the discharge of his duties. I happen to know Mr. Bernard very well; he is a member of the legal profession. I should like to place on record, however, a letter issued by the franchise commissioner, Colonel John Thompson, with reference to this matter, in which he gave to persons who were inquiring from him the following information:

May 21, 1935.

Thomas G. Ireland, Esq.,
Treasurer,
Liberal Association of St. Lawrence & St. George, 252 Dorchester West,
Montreal Que.

Dear Sir:

Receipt is herewith acknowledged of your communication of the eighteenth instant, the contents of which have been carefully noted, and I quite concur in your observations.

The word "removal" in the statute does not mean the removal from one polling division to another in the same electoral district. "Removal" means removal from one electoral district to another.

While any person, during the month of April, might object to any and all persons on the list of an electoral district, nevertheless the objector must prove to the satisfaction of the registrar that the person or persons objected to have removed from the electoral district in which they are registered, to another electoral district.

The mere fact a person has left the dwelling in which he was originally registered does not in itself warrant the deletion of his name from the list of electors for that electoral district. The objector, as stated above, must prove that the person objected to has left the electoral district.

If an elector has moved from one polling division to another in the same electoral district, the proper procedure is to delete his name from the list of the polling division wherein he did reside and add it to the list he is presently residing.

Then the last paragraph:

The failure of the person objected to to appear at the court of revision in response to the registered notice of objection is not in itself sufficient to shift the onus for proving his entitlement on the person objected to.

Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) John Thompson,
Dominion Franchise Commissioner.

So here we have a document emanating from the dominion franchise commissioner, who is in charge of the act that was passed last year, giving information as to the manner in which these proceedings should be carried out. That information, it seems to me, is not quite consistent with the objections that have been taken by those supporting the bill now under consideration, who have taken exception to the rulings handed down by Mr. Justice Greenshields in the superior court of the province of Quebec.

During the course of the debate the other day the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring this bill stated that Mr. Bernard had done his best to administer the law fairly and within the provisions of the act. I do not know if my information is correct; I give it subject to correction, but I hold in my hand a copy of the instructions issued by the franchise commissioner, and at page 86 I find the following:

Grounds for Disqualification Which May be Set Out in the Affidavit

(1) "Is dead."

(2) "Is not qualified because he (or she) has not attained the full age of twenty-one years."

(3) "Is not qualified because he (or she) is not a British subject by birth or naturalization."

(4) "Is not qualified because he (or she) has not resided in Canada during the last twelve months."

(5) "Is not qualified because he (or she) was not resident in this electoral district on the" (naming the day three months prior to the sittings of the revising officer).

(6) "Is disqualified from voting because he (or she) is" (naming the class of disqualified persons to which the person objected to belongs, as e.g. "a judge appointed by the government of Canada," "an Indian resident on an Indian reservation who did not serve in the naval, military or air forces of Canada in the year 1914-1918," or as the case may be: see section 4 of the Dominion Franchise Act).

(7) "Has to my knowledge, been included in the preliminary list of electors prepared for polling division No. , in which he (or she) resides."

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentleman must see that this whole form refers to section 17, schedule A, rule 19. Section 17 does not apply to urban lists at all; it refers to rural lists, as the hon. gentleman will see by looking at page 62, which contains these various rules. My hon. friend is dealing now with an entirely different situation, concerning rural constituencies.

Mr. CASGRAIN: My hon. friend may be right, but my information is that after this revision was commenced it was suggested to the franchise commissioner that a new set of forms should be printed in which this extra clause should appear:

That the person has removed from and is no longer a resident of the electoral division.

Under that clause objection could be taken to practically all the names in the list for the electoral division. Another complaint that has been made with regard to the revision of these lists is this: A protest was filed in the case of one H. Dixon, 1441 Drummond street, poll 35, list 89, to the effect that Mr. Dixon had moved away from the above address. Objection was made because proof was offered that he was still living at the Y.M.C.A., where the hearings were being held. Consequently protest was refused. Then we have Mr. F. L. Delaney, poll 35, list 89; James Ogilvy, poll 35, list 201; J. W. Powell, poll 35, list 213; David Scott, poll 35, list 237; L. Villeneuve, poll 35, list 263, all of whom lived at 1441 Drummond street. It was found by the registrar that all these people were still living at this address, in spite of the fact that protests had been issued claiming they were not qualified to vote, due to the fact that they had moved from this division. The people representing the interests of those who wanted these names to remain on the list had great difficulty in having the names placed thereon. Finally the registrar maintained them. The same applies to Alexander Pigeon—

Mr. CAHAN: That was proper, after rebuttal evidence had been put in before the registrar to show that these people were living at the Y.M.C.A. It was perfectly proper that they should not be struck off, and they were not struck off.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They were all struck off before.

Mr. CAHAN: No, they were not.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They were objected to.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, but that is not striking them off.

Mr. CASGRAIN: They had to be reinstated.

Mr. CAHAN: No; they were objected to, and on the preliminary evidence the registrar held that a prima facie case had been made out. But subsequently, before they were struck off, rebuttal evidence was brought in to show that those people were in the electoral district, although some of them were not at the same addresses as those at which they had been registered.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The same applies to C. A. Singer, W. V. Smith and F. Spanger. We have in these circumstances a most unusual case. A law was passed last year to which reference was made when discussion of this bill first took place. Apparently the law passed last year was a compromise by all parties in the house, and showed a desire to have a franchise act suitable for the accommodation of all parties. Persons who were placed on the lists in the urban district to which reference has been made were, as happened in other urban divisions, placed on those lists with the consent of two enumerators, one from each of the official parties.

Mr. CAHAN: That was many months ago.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, I grant you that. Those people had a right to be there until it was proved officially, legally, in a proper form and a proper manner—

Mr. CAHAN: A prima facie case was made out.

Mr. CASGRAIN: You must make a prima facie case with legal evidence. The minister is an eminent lawyer of the province of Quebec; he is widely known and I have great respect for him. I respect him as a politician, as a lawyer, as a member of the bar and, I would say, as a statesman. I know that he must know what kind of evidence should be presented. The minister knows that if he had been the judge he would not have admitted certain kinds of evidence which indicated that someone had told so and so that so and so had happened.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not so in this instance.

Mr. CASGRAIN: He would not have done it.

Mr. CAHAN: I believe I should correct the hon. member in some of his statements. There were not two hundred cases before Mr. Justice Greenshields, as the hon. member has said; I am afraid he is dealing in general terms. In connection with the question of removal there were only 105 cases. Before the registrar in respect of each of those 105 cases the new addresses were ascertained. Statements were taken from these people to the effect that they had removed, and the new addresses were ascertained as being outside the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George. That was the condition with all except 16, which could not be ascertained.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That may all be true. However, I have read to the committee the whole of the judgment of Mr. Justice Greenshields. His judgment is based upon the evidence I have before me.

Mr. CAHAN: No, it is not.

Mr. CASGRAIN: If the minister and the committee wish me to do so I will read it, but there are 68 pages and I should not like to weary the house. However I must say that the judgment of Mr. Justice Greenshields is based upon one fact. When he questioned the registrar Bernard he said, "Name me one case where a person who has removed has told you so, and I will strike that man from the list—and any evidence similar to that which you may have. But I cannot take the evidence which you have collected to disfranchise that man, when you state that some elector or some person has told you certain things." Certain affidavits which were supposed to have been tendered were produced but were not used by the registrar. The statement is made in the evidence that they were not read, and that the judgment was given solely on the fact that someone had testified that he had gone to an address and had not found a person, or that the house was empty.

Mr. CAHAN: Just a minute. I should like to reply to that. As I have indicated in the cases I read, that is not so. I could have read more of them. The declarations were signed by the persons objected to in the presence of two witneses, one of whom was the investigator. Those declarations in each case were to the effect that a certain person had moved from a certain address in a certain polling division in St. Lawrence-St. George to another address in an entirely different electoral district. Those changes of address were shown in respect of 105 cases in which changes of address were considered. In all these cases, with the exception of 16, they could not be found anywhere, in that or any other district.

I am not entering into a detailed discussion of the point, but I must add that Mr. Justice Greenshields called before him the judge of the registrar's court a subpoena was issued, for which there was no authority; it was issued illegally. The registrar was brought to court suddenly, without papers and without being asked to bring papers. This registrar, having dealt with a great many cases, was asked to state what he remembered respecting each. That was not the proper way to secure evidence of what had taken place. The evidence with regard to what had taken place was available from Prowse, and others, who were prepared to go before the judge and give the same evidence as that they had given before the registrar. But the chief justice did not ask them for their evidence in particular cases. He did not refer to the facts, to which reference has been made, relating to the vice consul of France. He did not refer to case after case in which Prowse had sought out the new electors at new addresses. However I am not going into that, because it was not in the discretion of Chief Justice Greenshields to decide what should constitute prima facie proof. As soon as the registrar decided that in his opinion a prima facie case had been made out and called upon the other side for rebuttal, and no rebuttal being produced, then the registrar was entitled to say that a prima facie case had been made out, and thereafter on any appeal only rebuttal evidence could be received before the judge, in this case Chief Justice Greenshields. But not one scintilla of rebuttal evidence was produced either before the registrar or before Chief Justice Greenshields.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am most surprised at the attitude the minister takes. He had there to represent him one of the most eminent lawyers of the city of Montreal.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not represented in any way, shape or form.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I stand corrected. If he was not representing the minister he was representing the people who wished to have names struck from the list. If it was so, as my hon. friend states, that a subpoena had been issued to the registrar to compel his appearance before the court, these people would have objected. They would have pleaded before the judge that it was not fair to proceed with the examination without having all the documents before Mr. Justice Greenshields. I hold in my hand the procès verbal, and the evidence that was given by all the witnesses that appeared before Mr. Justice Greenshields, duly certified by E. W. Bush, official court reporter.

Mr. CAHAN: My learned friend has that report of the evidence, but there is not one scintilla of evidence in that by way of rebuttal to show that a single person of the 103 resided still in the electoral district of St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is not the point. The point is this. If this registrar was called before the judge as the hon. gentleman states, surely there was somebody there to represent his interests and to protest and to ask for an adjournment of the case, which the judge would have granted. He would have said: Bring all your papers with you next time. But that was not done. There is nothing to prove that that was done, and I am willing to leave this document before the house for hon. gentlemen to read it for themselves. They proceeded with the case as it was before the court. The judge asked the registrar if he had kept records, and he said: "No, I could not keep records because there were too many people coming before me. I remember a Mr. Prowse came in and a Mr. Doyle," and they said exactly what is stated there, that they had their information from some janitor or next-door neighbour. The registrar also said that he had the evidence of a returned registered letter, and that was all.

Mr. CAHAN: He says also that he had statements from him concerning some of the new addresses of those who had moved out of the constituency who had been interviewed by him.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The only thing that appears in the evidence is that certain affidavits were sought to be produced before the judge, but the lawyers on the other side, Mr. Merrill and Mr. Cook, objected to the production of these documents, and the registrar himself said that he never read these affidavits.

Mr. CAHAN: He took oral evidence instead.

Mr. CASGRAIN: And as to all the documents that my hon. friend referred to the other day in his speech, those documents that purported to be signed by one person before two witnesses, the registrar does not mention one word as to his having received them. He just says in his evidence that he had two witnesses, Prowse and Doyle, come to him and testify as I have already stated, but he does not state that they produced written documents signed before witnesses as mentioned by the Secretary of State on Tuesday last. He said that about fifteen or twenty persons had signed documents. But no lawyer produced that evidence before the judge.

Mr. CAHAN: Why should he?

Mr. CASGRAIN: It has not been produced. Now section 32 of the Dominion Franchise Act, which is sought to be amended by this bill, provides this regarding appeals made before a judge:

> Such appeals shall be heard at such time and place as the judge may fix. They shall be heard and determined in such summary manner as the judge shall deem proper.

What else could Mr. Justice Greenshields say when the registrar was brought before him? He asked him what kind of evidence he had upon which to strike certain names from the list. He asked the registrar if he had documents and records before him, and the registrar said that he did not keep any. He said that he remembered that two persons objected to certain names being on the list, but he does not remember the rest. He remembers that letters were returned. But he does not say one word about the documents which the Secretary of State placed on record on Tuesday last. When affidavits were shown to him he said that he remembered there was a question of affidavits but he did not look at them at all, and regarding the production of these affidavits there is not a scintilla of proof warranting the registrar or any official issuing affidavits in the proceedings according to the franchise act that was enacted into law last session.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have this most unfortunate situation to-day. The franchise act has been administered by the franchise commissioner, who is highly qualified to administer the act and for whom everybody in this house and in the country has nothing but praise. But it develops that in only one constituency, the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George, there was apparently some trouble in the revision of the list, because we have heard of no trouble at all in any other part of Canada. It may be that my learned friend is very cautious and his men want to make very sure that he will be re-elected next time, and the people there who look after the whole matter for him worked so hard that they thought they would have a case against everybody on the list who they thought would vote against the hon. member, to see that they were not on the list.

Mr. CAHAN: That is an unfair insinuation and it is absolutely untrue.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I did not say the hon. member himself did it. I said that those who were looking after his election were doing so much work for him that they did not want the fruits of their work thrown away, and they were mad when they were not able to get what they wanted. We are not sitting here in this House of Commons, Mr. Chairman, as a court of review over any judgment that has been given in accordance with the provisions of any act passed by this parliament. We decided rightly or wrongly that the chief justice of any province should be the sole arbiter and sole judge of any difficulty that might arise in any proceedings before the registrar regarding the striking off or putting on of names. But to-day we have this most unfortunate situation. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George says that there are four thousand objections in his constituency and that at the present time only two hundred of them have been dealt with. Twenty-three were not in doubt and the rest, 177, had to be dealt with by the judge. At the present time there are many other cases in this very constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George that depend on the decision that is to be rendered by this parliament by this bill if it becomes law.

I was very much struck the other day by the observations that were made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when dealing with conditions which affect the judiciary in our country. The very next day after the Secretary of State had introduced this bill, he received this condemnation at the hands of his leader. The Prime Minister, speaking in this house on June 19, 1935, as reported on page 3810 of Hansard, was saying that we should respect the judgments of the privy council, and that therefore we could not go too far in this new order and with these new reforms that the government was bringing in. These were his words:

> That is why I have said that in the ultimate analysis we always have to depend upon the conclusions and decisions of the courts. That is why in the end, if we are a law abiding people who believe in reform and not in revolution, we must proceed precept by precept, line upon line, to the end that in an orderly and legal manner we may accomplish the ends we have in mind.

Here we have a condemnation by the leader of the government of the proceedings of the Secretary of State in introducing his bill, which strikes at the very root of our judicial institutions. Again, speaking in this house on June 20, 1935, the Prime Minister said, as reported at pages 3820 and 3821 of Hansard—he was referring to the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways:

> I desire on that ground to make it clear why I do not desire until this litigation is disposed of any disturbance in the capital structure.

He was referring to the capital structure of the Canadian National Railways and he wanted us to refrain from doing anything while the litigation was before the privy council. Certain matters have been dealt with in accordance with the legislation enacted last year and because Chief Justice Greenshields has decided contrary to the wishes of friends of the hon. gentleman we are being asked to remedy this supposed grievance. I think if we did that we would be going beyond the powers of this parliament; we would be undermining our institutions and our judiciary. We would be going against the courts for which the right hon. gentleman who leads the government has so much respect. I think the hon. gentleman should have remembered that when a judgment is rendered there is always forty-eight hours in which to criticize or, if I may use the expression, damn the judge. He should have let it go at that; he should have remained quiet and taken his licking in good humour. That is the only way in which the hon. gentleman should have acted.

When one has a following in a riding it is very difficult not to yield to their demands and requests. Should this bill pass, the hands of the judge would be tied and he would not be able to render a decision as the law now provides it should be rendered. If this bill is passed the general effect will be that the chief justice will be deprived of the right to comment upon the evidence which the registrar has accepted as sufficient. If this bill becomes law we may have every reason to expect that after June 29 the registrar will again adopt his old practice and will strike off the names of a large number of electors upon grounds which the chief justice has already declared to be insufficient. This action will be taken without any possible means of redress by the electors concerned.

This bill is obviously designed to meet a case which has arisen in the particular riding represented by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. In this riding the names objected to number 4,000 while the total number of electors is about 24,000. If the hon. gentleman and his friends have their way, one-sixth of the electors in this constituency will be disqualified from voting. I think in this case we would do well to follow the example set by the right hon. gentleman in his speeches of June 19 and 20 when he said that it would be better to abide by the conclusions and decisions of the court. He said that we should leave the matter at that because that was the only way in which we could obtain and accomplish what we had in mind in an ordinary and legal manner.

I think the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) should be accepted, as it makes it clear that the legislation sponsored by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George would not affect the present cases which are awaiting the decision of Chief Justice Greenshields.

Amendment (Mr. Ralston) negatived on division.

MARKETING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 117, to amend the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to make four amendments to the Natural Products Marketing Act. The first amendment is to change the definition of the expression "natural product" so that it will include pulp and paper, and other forest products. The second amendment is to provide for a system of providing loans to local boards in their early stage of operation before funds are available. The third is to make provision for the equalization of returns between two or more closely related products, and the fourth has to do with expediting proof of origin of a product.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SECOND NARROWS BRIDGE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (for the Minister of Marine) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 118, respecting the bridge across the Second Narrows of Burrard inlet in the province of British Columbia.

He said: I am asking for leave to introduce the bill, on behalf of the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau). This bill has to do with certain legal difficulties which arose in connection with the original bridge, and it is desirable to relieve those responsible for the new structure from certain obligations which, apparently, might attach.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

B.C. RELIEF CAMP STRIKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister advise the house of any recent developments in connection with the marchers from Regina?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last a committee of the government met eight representatives of the so-called marchers at Regina. The spokesman was one Arthur H. Evans. The other seven admitted that they were not born in Canada. Evans was the only Canadian-born of the eight. He himself has a criminal record. He was apprehended in 1922 at Drumheller for gambling and was dismissed, as Arthur H. Evans. On January 16, 1923, at Drumheller, he was charged with forgery. His bail of $500 was estreated, the warrant having been issued at Calgary. In January 16, 1924, he was tried at Calgary for fraudulent conversion, which I may say under the criminal code is theft, and he was sentenced to three years in Saskatchewan penitentiary as Arthur H. Evans, No. 1042. On March 18, 1925, he was released on ticket of leave. On September 15, 1933, at Vernon, B.C., he was sentenced to one year in the provincial gaol.

The delegation made certain demands upon the government which I think beyond question it was realized were incapable of being granted by any government in whole at least. It was apparent from what Mr. Evans said that he represented what he called the Unity League and various other organizations the purpose of which was to destroy constituted authority. The government has given a very great deal of anxious thought to the situation that has thus been created. It is a situation in which propaganda which is not confined to Canada is being carried on by well organized forces. The ends they have in mind are well known and they do not hesitate to express them, and their last threat was to call upon those whom they control to resist to the full any effort to maintain law and order.

The government realizes that a number of younger men of no evil disposition who have been taken from these camps and induced to believe that they were the victims of hardship and of wrong on the part of the government of the country have been misled. I endeavoured to point out to this delegation that the appeal to human sympathy is still very strong in a country such as this, and that these men more than any others knew that they were taking men who were inexperienced and young and exploiting them for the purpose of advancing their sinister purposes.

It is well perhaps for me to state to this house, in order that there may be no misapprehension, that the camps to which reference has been made have won the warm support and approval of those who have inspected them, including people well able to arrive at conclusions how single, homeless, unemployed men might be cared for, and some of the most distinguished social workers from other countries have expressed warm approval of the action that has been taken.

I endeavoured to explain to the delegation that these camps were in no sense regarded as permanent camps; that they were temporary institutions created to supply shelter, clothing and food to single homeless, unemployed men. They were not under discipline, and the only restraint imposed on them was that of good conduct. They were not compelled to work, but work was provided for them, and they were paid a very small sum, not as charity, but to enable them if they so desired to purchase small comforts. They received twenty cents per day. The amount paid in the province of Manitoba I think by the provincial authorities to the men in their camps is ten cents.

The Department of National Defence provided the administration—the administration of the commissariat and the supervision and the general administration connected with the maintenance of the camps. I myself have visited two of these camps unannounced, and I venture to say, as I said to the delegation on Saturday, that many, many Canadians who are living to-day on farms and others living in cities and towns are not nearly so well provided for as those who are living in these camps. Listening to the appeals made to them, the men left the camps. One of the representatives of the second group who admitted that his business was to agitate and to organize the forces of these men, and who had formerly been a resident of Glasgow, was a very well spoken man, and he had no hesitancy in stating what his purpose was.

We therefore made it quite clear that so far as the government was concerned it accepted its responsibility and that the challenge to organized society which these gentlemen had made would be met, and we asked as I now do that all good citizens in this country who believe in the maintenance of law and order shall use their influence and their power and their authority to that end.

The government is not unmindful of the difficulties that have arisen by reason of these men having moved as far east as they have. The eight who met me gave their residence as Vancouver but I take it that they meant that was the last place at which they had been. I think that was quite clear when they explained that they were not born in Canada and some of them had been here but a limited length of time. I endeavoured to explain to them what must be known to all the house, that to trespass upon railway property in large numbers, taking possession of cars and trains and moving eastward, endangered in the numbers that were gathered together not only human life, the carriage of the mails and the transportation of freight but the property of the railway companies. It was apparent that at the camp at Dundurn not far from Saskatoon, there had been a measurable amount —I shall endeavour to be very low in my estimation—of, shall I say comfort and satisfaction enjoyed by those who were at that camp. They had shown no disposition to leave the camp but when these agitators had finished with them they marched down and joined the others at Regina. Apparently word had been sent ahead to other men because a considerable number left other camps in Alberta, augmenting those from British Columbia by several hundreds. That being so, we explained to them as reasonably as we could that the challenge to government involved in that conduct would be met and that the organized forces to maintain society would endeavour to preserve law and public safety and human life and the property of the public utilities which I have mentioned.

The government also realizes that the numbers at Regina will have to be dealt with. I told the delegation that the men would be permitted to return to their camps assuming that that meant, as they understood, that the agitators would neither want to go nor would go back to the camps. The government realized that something should be done in the way of making immediate provision for these men who were congregated at Regina. We suggested that we would establish under the auspices of Mr. Burgess, who represents the Department of Labour, a temporary camp at some point in the vicinity of Regina where the strike marchers may go if they so desire and where they will receive necessary food and shelter until their final destination is determined. Under the arrangement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) with a committee of the strike leaders at Regina last week, the marchers will continue to be fed at the expense of the government until Wednesday forenoon of this week; after that, the marchers will be permitted to go into the temporary camp which will be established on Wednesday next, where food and shelter will be afforded. The government further desires that it be clearly known that consideration will be given to the wishes of the marchers who enter the temporary camp and who desire to return to the camps from whence they came or to other camps of a similar kind in western Canada. The cases of individuals who have homes to which they may go in other parts of Canada will be considered on the basis of assistance in transportation to enable them to reach their homes.

I desire to make known in the clearest terms I am capable of uttering that this movement in Canada is neither national nor continental, it is international. I regret to make that statement. I should like to quote a cable which I received from Paris, as follows:

> We sharply protest police terror against striking seamen dockers in Vancouver. Demand withdrawal police from strike area and assurance of right to strike.
> International of Seamen and Harbourworkers.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) is familiar with the conditions which exist in that city and the mayor of Vancouver has declared the purposes of those in charge of this breach of the law. I was somewhat surprised to receive that cable from Paris but in view of what has happened in other parts of this continent in connection with these matters I do not know that I should have been surprised.

I desire to inform this House of Commons and I hope the country, that the government is fully seized of the seriousness of the situation and it believes as firmly as it is possible to believe that the present movement of these marchers upon Ottawa in defiance of the law is in reality an organized effort on the part of the various communists organizations throughout Canada to effect the overthrow of constituted authority in defiance of the laws of the land. The government is determined to maintain law and order by all the means within its power and calls upon all law abiding citizens to assist to that end. Definite instructions have been given to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Regina to assist the officials of both railways in preventing further trespasses upon railway property or upon railway trains and the marchers have been notified that they will not be permitted to continue their eastward journey by the unlawful use of railway transportation.

Mr. MacINNIS: Owing to the admitted seriousness of this situation, I wonder if the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) would set aside a time in which this matter could be discussed in the house before adjournment takes place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: I would prefer an answer from the Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not think that would serve any useful purpose at the moment, but I shall give it consideration.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1935-36

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1936, was presented by Right Hon. Sir George Perley (for the Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Could the right hon. gentlemen inform the house if the estimates which he has just brought down will conclude those that will be presented to the house at this session or will there be still further supplementaries?

Sir. GEORGE PERLEY: As far as I know there will be no further estimates.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the third reading of Bill No. 109, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

SUPPLY BILL

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1936, the sum of $141,145,120.83 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Sir George Perley thereupon moved for leave to introduce bill No. 116, founded on the resolution.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I had in mind to say to my right hon. friend a moment ago that we have no desire on this side of the house to delay the proceedings, but I do not think we ought to allow the government to get away with all the main estimates of the session until we have some definite understanding as to the time the session is to conclude. Perhaps my right hon. friend will let the bill stand at this stage and possibly before another sitting we can have an understanding as to further measures that will have to be considered before parliament prorogues.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Perhaps my right hon. friend will allow the bill to be read the first time, and then it can stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That will be all right.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

COMPANIES ACT, 1934, AMENDMENT

The house resumed from Friday, June 21, consideration in committee of bill No. 85, to amend the Companies Act, 1934—Mr. Cahan—Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 5—Consideration for any shares allotted must be adequate.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): We have had considerable discussion with regard to section 5 of the bill and I am going to suggest that the section be amended by striking out subsection 9 and substituting the following therefor:

(9) Shares in the capital stock of the company having a nominal or par value shall not be issued as fully paid except for a consideration payable in cash to the total nominal amount of the shares so issued or for a consideration payable in property or services which in all the circumstances of the transaction may justly be deemed adequate consideration therefor:

Then the latter part of the clause remains as it is now:

Provided that this subsection shall not apply to any mining company..

And so on.

Mr. BOTHWELL: What effect will that have on the no par value shares? In the old subsection 9 which is being repealed reference is made to shares, whether common or preferred, or whether with or without nominal or par value. This new amendment simply deals with shares having par value. What effect has it on the no par value shares?

Mr. CAHAN: This does not apply to no par value shares because under the act as it now stands no par value shares are issued for a consideration to be fixed by the board of directors. There is a difference between no par value and par value shares; par value shares must be paid up in cash or the equivalent. All the no par value share gives is a pro rata interest in the property of the company.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Personally, I think it is an improvement.

Mr. RALSTON: I think this amendment would put a premium on the issuing of no par value shares; that is to say, no par value shares can be issued for such consideration as the directors may think fit, whereas the par value shares will have to be issued for such consideration as in all the circumstances of the transaction may justly be deemed an adequate consideration therefor. The trouble with that section, as was pointed out when the bill was up the other day, is that it leaves it to someone in the future to project his mind back and determine what was adequate consideration in all the circumstances at the time the shares were issued. In the interests of shareholders there ought to be some certainty about this matter. As I pointed out the other day, those who buy shares should not be left in the position of having it as a possibility that they may be put on a list of contributories two or three years hence on the ground that it was then possible to establish that the consideration was not adequate. The directors have to take come responsibility with regard to this matter. It is proposed by section 96B to bring that responsibility home to the directors by providing that any director is to be liable for the difference between the amount of the nominal value of the shares and the true amount which the property or service represents. This amendment should provide for an express resolution by the directors to the effect that they have determined in all the circumstances of the transaction that the property or service which it is proposed to transfer to the company in consideration of the issue of shares is a justly adequate consideration therefor. That means that the directors must go on record; they have before them those words and they must put them in the resolution: "A justly adequate consideration" for the shares which are being issued. Then section 96 would apply thus: in case of any shares issued where such a resolution has not been passed, or if it is proved that as a matter of fact the director knew the consideration was inadequate or that he failed to take reasonable steps to ascertain whether the consideration so received by the company was in fact adequate, he is liable for the deficiency between the actual value of the property and the nominal value of the shares which are to be issued. I do not see how we can go further than that without injecting a great deal of uncertainty and the possibility of a good deal of hardship in connection with the issue of shares. I am going to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) if he will accept an amendment which I have just drawn up to the one which he has suggested so that subsection 9 will read:

Shares in the capital stock of the company having a nominal or par value shall not be issued as fully paid except for a consideration payable in cash to the total nominal amount of the shares so issued, or for a consideration payable in property or services which the directors may determine by express resolution to be in all the circumstances of the transaction a justly adequate consideration therefor.

And then go on with proviso with regard to mining companies as is provided in the amendment the Secretary of State has just read. Otherwise we shall have a totally different state of affairs as regards no par value shares from that regarding par value shares. After all we have to put the responsibility on the directors, and section 96B puts a very stringent penalty upon the director who does not do his duty with regard to inquiring as to the adequacy of the consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: If I understand the amendment suggested, it would mean that when shares are issued under these circumstances for property as fully paid, those to whom the shares are allotted or the transferees of such allottees would not be liable even if the consideration were inadequate, but that the directors personally would be liable under the proposed section 96B. Is that the view of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. RALSTON: That would be the effect.

Mr. CAHAN: There was on Friday last a quotation by the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) from Mr. Wegenast in which I concurred. He quoted Mr. Wegenast as saying:

> Present law requires consideration to be not merely adequate in all circumstances but to be equivalent of par value or issue price of stock although in some cases courts have shown reluctance to go behind honest decision of directors.

I think that is the present law. If that is an issue to be discussed, I can show from quotations from the 1934 act that that is the present law. On the other hand I am not surprised that courts have been reluctant to go behind the honest decision of the directors. We cannot require of directors any more than that they shall make adequate inquiry and then give an honest decision. I think that is the present law, but so far as I am concerned, if we are to consider amending section 96B so as to make directors liable to the limit, I do not object to the change as proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston).

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry not to be able to agree with the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth. I think the section would be whittled down far too much by amending it in the way proposed by him. It seems to me that there is no hardship in requiring a subscriber for shares to pay for them in either cash or property or services, and I would have no objection, so far as that point is concerned, to the section as proposed by the Secretary of State. I would be afraid if we went any further we would not be making any reform whatever; in fact, we would be going backwards. Certainly if the law is as stated by Mr. Wegenast and by the Secretary of State, the section drafted by the Secretary of State merely states with almost exactitude the law as it exists at the present time, and I do not think we would make it easier than it is at present for persons to get shares without paying for them.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the hon. member for Hants-Kings is wrong in suggesting that we are going backwards. Where we are going forward and making a very long step forward is in section 96B; it never existed before and, as I understand the matter, is not the law to-day. If you come to the stage where you could prove the directors were actually guilty of fraud, then there might be some common law remedy by the company against the director. But now what I am suggesting is putting par value shares on exactly the same basis as no par value shares, namely, that the consideration shall be such as is solemnly, honestly, to use the word used by the Secretary of State, determined by the director as being an adequate and just consideration under all the circumstances. Then we come to section 96B which is a sweeping reform, which provides that any director who fails to take reasonable steps to ascertain the adequacy of the consideration; that is, even if he had an honest belief in the adequacy of the consideration, if it is proved that he did not take steps to check up that belief, he is going to be liable for the deficiency between the consideration received and the nominal value of the shares. That is a pretty stiff penalty to put on directors, and anybody who wished to make a step forward in that direction and wanted to make blue sky laws would have no apology to make for that particular section. But in subsection 9 under section 5 we place par value and no par value shares on the same basis as regards consideration in so far as the allottee is concerned. If he gets a certificate with the words "paid up" on the face of it as a receipt from the directors saying that they have determined that that is the consideration which he hands to them as a just and adequate consideration under all the circumstances, it does not seem to me that he ought to have to face a liquidator two or three years afterward in order to make up that consideration. Everyone knows how absolutely impossible it is to take a pencil and figure out exactly the dollar value of some of the considerations put into a company. As long as it is honest and adequate according to their judgment, after reasonable inquiry has been made as to its adequacy, it seems to me we should not go further.

Mr. BENNETT: I am in the position of agreeing with the hon. gentleman. I think if we are to enact this section it is an abundant precaution to provide that the public shall be protected by resolution passed by the directors. The provision that the minister has made that action shall be taken in any event within three years to protect the situation to which attention was directed the other day by the hon. member seems to me most reasonable. But I believe it is in the public interest to have that on the record, that the directors pledge their judgment and the exercise of their discretion that the services or property received for the shares were just and adequate and warranted the issue of fully paid up shares to the extent mentioned. Then when you apply section 96 as amended by the minister I think you will have as complete a case as you ever get in the world. I think it is a strengthening of the position, may I say to the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley), because then anyone who inquires will have a resolution of these men that the consideration is in their judgment just and adequate. If there is fraud I think there is no doubt about their liability. Now a statutory liability will be imposed upon them within the three years, being the limitation suggested by the minister. I believe this is a strengthening of the law.

Mr. CAHAN: If the house will consent, I withdraw the amendment I proposed, so that the vote may be on the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The amendment to the amendment reads:

> Shares in the capital stock of the company having a nominal or par value shall not be issued as fully paid except for a consideration payable in cash to the total nominal amount of the shares so issued, or for a consideration payable in property or services which the directors may determine by express resolution to be in all the circumstances of the transaction a justly adequate consideration therefor.

Mr. BENNETT: I think you had better say "just and adequate."

Mr. BOTHWELL: If I understand the remarks of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) he wishes to have not only this section but 96B amended so that stock in the hands of transferees cannot at any time be affected. I am opposed to this amendment. The wording of that is that the directors simply have to pass a resolution that in their opinion the consideration is just and adequate. For the exploiting promoter—and I understand it is being done now—the provisional directors of the company are clerks in the office of some firm of solicitors. What would prevent a company such as that having the first permanent directors consist of the same provisional directors, and at a later time transfer to the actual people who are promoting the company?

Mr. CAHAN: If I may interrupt, that may no longer take place under this act, and no longer does take place under it. It is no longer permissible to file a statement in lieu of prospectus; if shares are put out to the public they must be put out with a prospectus and with all the particularity required by the prospectus. We have got beyond the stage, which the hon. gentleman suggests, in the 1934 act.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is wrong also in his assumption in regard to the change in 96B. The only change I would suggest in that is—I presume it is intended to exempt mining companies; I do not care whether that is done or not—that a director be liable if this resolution has not been passed, as well as being liable if he has failed to make proper inquiry as to the adequacy of the consideration, or has knowledge that the consideration is inadequate.

Mr. CAHAN: We shall consider that in a moment.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to point out also that it is not simply passing an opinion, but a solemn determination by the directors.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): I understand the hon. gentleman agrees to change the words—

Mr. CAHAN: No, he moves the whole as a new amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: The proviso about mining companies should certainly come out if that amendment goes in, should it not?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not particular about mining companies. I regard mining companies as no more speculative than most other companies. But that is the express recommendation of the price spreads commission, of which the hon. gentleman was a member.

Mr. ILSLEY: But we are making all sorts of amendments in sections here, we are a hundred miles away from the price spreads commission.

Mr. CAHAN: No, we are getting nearer to it. I am perfectly willing, and if the hon. gentleman wishes, I think there will be no objection to strike out all the words of the proviso:

> Provided that this subsection shall not apply to any mining company ...

Then the directors will have to make this solemn affirmation and be responsible if it is not—

Mr. RALSTON: A true statement.

Mr. CAHAN: —a fair statement. We will strike out all the words after the word "services."

Mr. BRADETTE: The minister is aware of the blue sky laws, that are very drastic as far as mining propositions are concerned. This law is likely to conflict with mining. In Ontario we have the blue sky law, very drastic.

Mr. CAHAN: But they apply to all these companies, and I am not infringing on provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. BRADETTE: I believe originally it was better than it is now.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no conflict with any blue sky law. My amendment does not make it easier for directors of mining companies, it makes it harder.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no conflict.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Amendment carried without the proviso.

Mr. BENNETT: Did you change the words "just and adequate"?

Mr. CAHAN: Now coming to the other section, I suggest and move, that section 96B be amended as shown in section 96B of section 15 of the bill, by striking out the first subsection, that is the one that remains. I think we have passed the other subsections, because we dealt with the word "speculate" and with the restriction to public companies. I suggest that we strike out subsection (1) of 96B and substitute the following therefor:

(1) The directors of a public company shall not authorize the issue and allotment as fully paid of shares in the capital stock of the company having a nominal or par value, except for a consideration payable in cash to the total nominal amount of the shares so issued, or for such consideration payable in property or services as the directors may determine by express resolution to be in all the circumstances of the transaction a just and adequate consideration therefor.

Then this amendment will correspond with the previous amendment. It should read "such services as may be deemed just and adequate," so as to correspond with the former amendment. Then, I also move to strike out the words "of promoter."

Mr. BOTHWELL: That word appears in subsection (2) of section 96B?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, in subsection (2). I am moving to strike out the word "promoter" because it does not apply in that subsection at all. We make the directors responsible.

Then, another suggestion made the other evening was to add to subsection (3) the following words—

And no such suit shall be commenced after the expiration of three years from the date of allotting such shares.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the amendments carry?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like someone to explain what directors will be liable for, if the section passes as amended. Are they liable for not passing the resolution for which provision is made in section 5?

Mr. CAHAN: I am simply amending the first subsection. But if they comply with that subsection, then if you will turn to page 10 of the bill you will find that they are liable "at the suit of any director, shareholder or creditor of the company, to make good to the company the amount by which the consideration actually received by the company for any shares so issued and allotted as aforesaid, is found by the court, after full inquiry into the circumstances of the transaction, to be less than the amount of the consideration which the company ought to have received for such shares." So in the case of the par value shares the liability is for the difference, because now that amount is the full amount of the par value shares issued.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the case of cash. But in the case of property or services there is no obligation to get the full equivalent, if the amendment proposed is carried.

Mr. CAHAN: We provided for that in our amendment to section 5 of the bill when we stated that they must receive the just and adequate equivalent. We provide in this instance that if they do not receive the just and adequate consideration they are liable for the difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not think so. I would think that by law all they are obliged to receive is what they say, by resolution, is a just and adequate consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg the hon. member's pardon. I do not wish to be petulent, but I must direct his attention to the top of page 10 of the bill, where he will find these words:

Every director of a public company who is a party to authorizing the issue and allotment of any shares of the capital stock of the company as fully paid up shall be liable, jointly and severally with his co-directors, at the suit of any director, shareholder or creditor of the company, to make good to the company the amount by which the consideration actually received by the company for any shares so issued and allotted as aforesaid is found by the court—

Not by the directors—

—after full inquiry into the circumstances of the transaction, to be less than the amount of the consideration which the company ought to have received for such shares.

Then it goes on to impose conditions as to knowledge, and that sort of thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I have been saying. Where is the obligation? There is no absolute obligation anywhere.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg the hon. member's pardon.

Mr. ILSLEY: Where is the obligation to insist upon getting the full value?

Mr. CAHAN: The obligation is contained in section 5 of the bill, which we have just passed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand that.

Mr. CAHAN: We have rendered it unlawful to issue shares for any consideration other than that which is just and adequate. Then, in the clause now before us, the penalty clause which I have just read, we say that if it is found by the court to be inadequate then each and every director is responsible for paying the difference to the company.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. If it were as the Secretary of State has explained, it would be all right, but section 5 has been amended. At first, section 5 was as the Secretary of State has now indicated. That is to say, what the court considered just and adequate consideration must be received for the shares. But by the amendment it is changed.

Mr. CAHAN: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: So that the court does not have the say; the directors have the say.

Mr. CAHAN: The directors in the first place, in issuing the shares, have by express terms in a resolution declared that they deemed it inadequate.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: That is what they must do, as a preliminary.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Mr. CAHAN: But if that which they declare to be adequate is found subsequently by the court to be inadequate then the directors are liable, under this section, which is a penalty clause, and must pay to the company the difference so ascertained by the court.

Mr. ILSLEY: I submit your section does not say that. It does not say it in those words, and does not make that implication.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it does.

Mr. ILSLEY: In effect it states, "if it is found to be less than the amount of consideration which the company ought to have received for such shares"; and the amount which the company ought to have received for such shares is the amount fixed in the resolution by the directors. That is all.

Mr. RALSTON: I submit, further, that the Secretary of State should include in the section a penalty to be imposed upon the directors if the resolution has not been passed. In other words they should be liable for the deficiency (a) if the resolution has not been passed, or (b) if they had knowledge of the inadequacy of the consideration, or (c) if they failed to take reasonable steps to ascertain whether or not consideration is inadequate. Therefore, in line 9 after the word "shares" I would have the section read:

If the resolution refered to in subsection (9) of section 12 of this act has not been passed, or if it is proved, as to any such first mentioned director, that such director (a) had knowledge of the inadequacy of the consideration so received by the company; or

(b) failed to take reasonable steps to ascertain whether the consideration so received by the company was in fact adequate consideration.

Mr. CAHAN: Do you make a new subsection out of it?

Mr. RALSTON: I move it as an amendment to be inserted in subsection (2) of section 96B. It is "and which provides an additional contingency upon which directors are liable."

Mr. CAHAN: Where would the amendment be inserted?

Mr. RALSTON: After the word "shares" in line 9 of the bill.

Mr. CAHAN: It simply imposes the same liability, in case the directors' declaration has not been made on the issue of the shares.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no objection to that.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Before the section is carried I should like to express my view on the amendment to section 5 taken in conjunction with the amendment to this section. I think the words "ought to have received" relate back only to the resolution that is spoken of in section 5, and if these amendments that are proposed go through with the amendment to section 5 that has been carried, I do not believe there is any penalty at all on the directors whether just and adequate consideration for the shares is given or not. The words "ought to have received" relate back to the resolution, and there is no penalty at all whether the consideration is just and adequate or not.

Mr. CAHAN: I can remedy that in a moment. There is no doubt that we both desire the same thing. If you strike out the words in line 8 on page 10, "amount of the" and substitute therefor the words "just and adequate" so that it will read, "to be less than the just and adequate consideration which the company ought to have received for such shares," I think that would meet the objection. What does my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) think? We all have the same intent, if we can only select the words to give expression to it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: As I understand it, subsection 1 of the bill as printed is being amended by the Secretary of State in the amendment he read, but the latter words of that subsection are being suggested to meet the change which has been made in section 5. I pencilled an amendment to subsection 1 just to use exactly the same words as are used in section 5.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no objection to that. I thought that it passed. We are simply using the same phrase exactly in all three cases.

Mr. RALSTON: Does the Secretary of State intend subsection 2 to apply to a private company?

Mr. CAHAN: No. We agreed, as I understood it, at the last sitting of the committee, that line 42 in 96B should apply, to "directors of a public company"—

Mr. RALSTON: That is to be changed all through the section?

Mr. CAHAN: All through the section. Wherever the word "company" is found in the section the word "public" should precede it. I think we all agreed to that.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the amendments carry?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Mr. Chairman, is it the amendment to subsection 1 that you are now putting?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): The amendments to one, two and three.

Mr. RALSTON: Put them separately.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Smith, Cumberland): Shall the amendment to section 1, clause 96B, carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: The amendment to subsection 2 strikes out the word "promoter" and adds the word "public" before "company" wherever it appears.

Mr. RALSTON: And strikes out the words "amount of the" consideration in line 8 on page 10, and substitutes the words "just and adequate"?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: We have struck out the words, "or promoter" and we also agreed to add to subsection 3 "and no such suit shall be commenced after the expiration of three years from the date of the allotment of such shares."

Mr. RALSTON: The consent of the Secretary of State is required when the suit is by a director or shareholder but not when the suit is by a creditor.

Mr. CAHAN: What we had in mind was this. We are going to have a board to which these investigations and inquiries will be submitted, and as between shareholders and suits between directors inter se, there shall be an inquiry and the Secretary of State will simply express the judgment given by the board of inquiry. But as to a creditor, if he wishes to begin suit, he must begin suit at least within three years after the transaction.

Mr. RALSTON: It seem to me it leaves the opportunity for blackmail.

Mr. CAHAN: I know, but that is the whole difficulty.

Mr. RALSTON: If you worded it so that an action brought by a creditor must have the consent of the Secretary of State, then you would have some dignified proceedings. But to permit creditors to run around and threaten actions against directors if they are not paid leaves the door open, I should think, to very grave abuses.

Mr. CAHAN: Will my hon. friend look at it again, for we all have the same object in view I am sure. Suppose that in line 24 after the words "in whole or in part" we place a semicolon, and then the word which I suggest "and no such suit shall be commenced after the expiration of three years from the date of the allotment of such shares"; that will apply to the entire second subsection.

Mr. RALSTON: I agree.

Mr. CAHAN: That is what is intended.

Mr. RALSTON: I still think that the word "creditor" should be put in with director and shareholder. I think the simplest way would be to strike out the words "by any director or shareholder of the company" in line 18.

Mr. CAHAN: I am quite content. We have the same object in view.

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about fairness. A director or shareholder may not bring any action without the consent of the Secretary of State but it is the creditor who is most likely to bring an action to annoy a director and say "If you don't pay me this, I will drag you into court."

Mr. CAHAN: Insert the word "creditor" after the word "any" in line 18. Then strike out the words "and no such suit shall be commenced by any creditor of the company until an execution," and so on. Then he has no right to bring his suit.

Mr. RALSTON: A company is defunct and a creditor says, "I will bring an action against you, you had better pay me."

Mr. CAHAN: He cannot until he has exhausted the company's resources.

Mr. RALSTON: If an inquiry by the Secretary of State as to whether there has been honest administration of the company is necessary in the case of a shareholder or director it is equally necessary in the case of a creditor.

Mr. CAHAN: We have provided for that now.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I fail to see why a creditor or shareholder should have to make application to the Secretary of State before taking such action. If the directors of a company were acting fraudulently or were issuing stock for an unjust or inadequate consideration, surely the shareholder or the creditor should have the opportunity of taking action in order to get justice? I thought the section was weak enough without the addition of the word "creditor."

Mr. RALSTON: So far as I know this is the strongest section which has been passed in any parliament or legislature. I understood that the price spreads commission had recommended the setting up of a commission and one would think that before any action was taken there would be an inquiry by the commission. If the commission found that they should come within the act, they would have to take their medicine.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I moved an amendment to this section.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought the hon. member just suggested one.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was content to let it stand for the time being but I want it dealt with now. My amendment added a subsection to this section to preserve the present common law rights. The Secretary of State said that he thought my amendment would create some confusion but I do not see the force of that or any other objection he has taken.

Mr. CAHAN: The common or civil law rights remain. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that the statutory liability stands according to the terms of the statute but a statutory liability does not wipe out a common law or civil law liability. In the criminal code we impose statutory liabilities but except where there are express terms to that effect they do not wipe out the common law liability.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a section in the criminal code which expressly makes that provision.

Mr. CAHAN: Unless it is so stated. If my hon. friend has had much experience in criminal work he will know that with respect to many crimes you may present your indictment under the statute or under the common law. I would prefer to leave out my hon. friend's amendment because it would only complicate the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: The criminal code contains a section which states that common law rights are not affected except in so far as the matter is dealt with by the act. A common law crime remains a common law crime. We are codifying the law of the liability of directors and I think that is the first point that will be raised. I think it will be found that we are dealing with a matter upon which there is some case law. There is a three-year limitation put into force by this section and it will cut down the rights against directors unless there is a saving clause inserted at the end. I do not see the force of my hon. friend's objection that this subsection will complicate matters. I disagree also with the statement of the Secretary of State that this subsection is useless.

Mr. RALSTON: Up to the present those who have issued shares wrongfully are exposed to action on the part of the liquidator. That is one front on which they are liable to fire. We are now proposing that they be exposed to fire from three other fronts, that is, from directors, shareholders or creditors. If that is what we propose to do, we certainly have done it. They are now open to fire from four different fronts and the hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Ilsley) is suggesting that we preserve the line of fire from the liquidator as well as the line of fire from the shareholders, directors and creditors. I do not think there can be any objection to this amendment. I think we are all agreed that it is not intended that the liquidator should be deprived of his right to bring an action against the directors or against anyone who may be involved in the issue of shares for an illusory consideration.

Mr. HACKETT: That is provided under the Bankruptcy Act.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. RALSTON: I suggest that the Secretary of State make doubly sure by accepting this amendment.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it would complicate matters. Section 53 of the Winding-up Act reads:

53. Every shareholder or member of the company or his representative shall be liable to contribute the amount unpaid on his shares of the capital, or on his liability to the company, or to its members or creditors, as the case maybe, under the act, charter or instrument of incorporation of the company, or otherwise.

(2) The amount which he is liable to contribute shall be deemed an asset of the company, and a debt due to the company, payable as directed or appointed under this act.

When a company goes into liquidation there is another provision provided by section 70 of the Bankruptcy Act which reads:

70. Every shareholder or member of a corporation or his representative shall be liable to contribute the amount unpaid on his shares of the capital or on his liability to the corporation or to its members or creditors, as the case may be, under the act, charter or instrument of incorporation of the company or otherwise.

2. The amount which the contributory is liable to contribute shall be deemed an asset of the corporation and a debt payable to the trustee forthwith upon the making of a receiving order against the corporation or on the execution by the corporation of an authorized assignment.

3. If a shareholder has transferred his shares under circumstances which do not, by law, free him from liability in respect thereof, or if he is by law liable to the corporation or to its members or creditors, as the case may be, to an amount beyond the amount unpaid on his shares, he shall be deemed a member of the corporation for the purposes of this act and shall be liable to contribute as aforesaid to the extent of his liability to the corporation or its members or creditors independently of this act.

4. The amount which he is so liable to contribute shall be deemed an asset and a debt as aforesaid.

My point is that we deal with the statutory liability of the directors or the shareholders by the terms of the Companies Act, 1934, as we are now amending it. We do not go on to determine the liability to the trustee or to the liquidator; and we never have dealt with such liability in any company legislation, except in the Winding-up Act and in the Bankruptcy Act. I suggest that this proposed amendment complicates the situation unnecessarily. After all, we have an express statutory provision with regard to liability in the Winding-up Act, we have another express statutory provision under the Bankruptcy Act, and I think it is unwise to complicate matters with an amendment to the Companies Act such as that proposed by my hon. friend.

Mr. ILSLEY: Upon looking at the sections read by the Secretary of State I would think that they applied to the liability of contributories, to shareholders who owed the company.

Mr. CAHAN: The directors also.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no doubt about it; there cannot be any doubt about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest that we vote on the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. CAHAN: I have another suggestion to make. Since this bill was first printed there have been a number of changes in the numbering of the sections without a corresponding change in section 20. I suggest that in subsection 2 of section 20 the word "four" should be made "three" and that "eleven" and "twelve" should be struck out. We are now dealing with the application of this bill to companies incorporated before the 1934 act, and in order to carry out that intention properly I think the "four" should be changed to "three" and the "eleven" and "twelve" should be struck out. It is quite clear that section 11 on page 8 should not apply to companies incorporated before 1934, nor do I think that section 12 should apply to such companies.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The meaning then will be that companies incorporated prior to the act of 1934 are still able to carry on regardless of these sections.

Mr. CAHAN: Sections 11 and 12, yes.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is to say, sections 2, 3, 5, 6, 7 and 16 will remain. In future operations of companies incorporated prior to 1934 these sections will not apply.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Would not that permit existing companies to do the things that we are trying to prevent new companies from doing? We are strengthening the act with the intention of compelling companies incorporated since 1934 to receive a just and adequate consideration for stock issued. If we except these sections with respect to existing companies then such companies, with regard to new stock issues, will be able to do the things we are trying to guard against.

Mr. CAHAN: Take 96A and 96B, for instance; they will apply to all companies, whether incorporated before 1934 or since. I have no objection if the hon. gentleman thinks that section 5 should apply to the old companies.

Mr. BOTHWELL: If the "five" is struck out of this subsection it would meet my objection. I do not see why that section should not apply to future issues by present companies.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no objection, except that we have always made provision that in the enactment of substantial amendments they should not apply to incorporations under previous acts. However, I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member. I move that the subsection be so amended. In other words, "four" will be changed to "three" and the "five" will be struck out with the "eleven" and the "twelve."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg to move the following as a new section:

21. This act shall come into force in whole or in part upon dates to be fixed by one or more proclamations of the governor in council.

It would be unfair in regard to new accounting provisions not to give some weeks notice, because some companies are making annual returns already in accordance with previous accounting provisions and they should have thirty or sixty days to enable them to bring these new provisions into effect.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION HOUSING ACT

PROVISION FOR LOANS BY GOVERNMENT AND LENDING INSTITUTIONS UP TO EIGHTY PER CENT OF COST OF CONSTRUCTION

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 112, to assist the construction of houses.

He said: The plan covered by this bill is for the purpose of giving encouragement and assistance in the building of new houses, particularly of the kind suitable for the use of those who do not receive large wages. In my opinion nothing could be more helpful during these difficult times. It will provide homes for many of our good citizens who are not in a position to do this for themselves without assistance. This will put them and their families in more sanitary and healthy surroundings and so make for their comfort and ability to earn a living. Further it must not be forgotten that the building of a large number of homes will give work to men in the building trades who are suffering more than any others from present conditions, and indirectly it will give business to many other industries which provide the materials of various kinds used in the erection of these houses.

During this session we had the special committee on housing under the chairmanship of the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) which carefully considered all sides of this question and made a report on April 16. I wish to congratulate the chairman and the committee on their careful work and the excellent report that they made. I hope every member of this house will find an opportunity of reading it. The bill to which I am now asking the house to give a second reading is for the purpose of making a beginning toward solving the very important problem of bringing about healthier housing conditions throughout Canada. The committee recommended the establishment of a housing authority to control the administration and any funds that might be provided for this purpose. This suggestion was given most careful consideration by the government, but we think it advisable, for the present at least, to have the Department of Finance administer and control this expenditure and, as I stated when we were in committee on the resolution, it is proposed to appoint someone on the staff of that department to do that work under the Finance minister.

As hon. members will see by the bill, the intention is to arrange eighty per cent of the cost by way of loan—sixty per cent from approved lending institutions and another twenty per cent from the government out of the money provided for in this bill. No definite rate of interest is specified, but it is intended to keep this down as much as possible in order to encourage the construction of these much needed houses. In this way we would be able to put this plan into force without very much expense, and later on it can be further considered in the light of any experience that may be gained.

As will be seen, the bill provides by section 3 for further investigation of the various questions contained in the housing commission's report. It is proposed that the economic council shall make an investigation about these various matters and among others, (c) as to plans or proposals that have been adopted elsewhere than in Canada to improve housing conditions and the results that have been achieved; (d) upon the necessity for and as to the feasibility of undertaking clearance and redevelopment of overcrowded areas in any city or town; in other words an investigation into the question of slum areas and what action may be taken to improve them, and (e) as to the factors that enter into the cost of construction of houses and as to the feasibility by any means of securing economies and increased efficiency in such construction.

The intention is that the economic council which will be formed under an act passed this session, will make a report on these various matters, and when that is made it will of course be laid on the table of the house for consideration. I commend this bill to hon. members as a beginning to help cure conditions as they exist.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the house in a discussion of this bill; I do not think that would be advisable in view of its terms, but there are certain parts of it to which I would like to refer and to which I wish to take special exception. This bill is calculated to encourage housing for wage earners, particularly the lower paid ones, and I see in it no provision for anything except new construction. The provision now in the bill for new construction, unless it is remedied, prevents the possibility of utilizing what might be the most advantageous assistance by way of housing that could be given. Under the terms of the bill submitted to the house, unless there is new construction there does not seem to be any provision for doing what I think is most necessary.

According to the evidence that was brought before the committee there were in the rural sections of Canada in 1931; 21,116 one-family households of owners and 7,261 one-family households of tenants consisting of two or more persons occupying only one room and 753 households of two or more families occupying one room only. In urban Canada there were only 11,975 households of one family of two or more persons in a single room, and only 94 households of two or more families in a single room.

Mr. STANLEY: 1931.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The report of the committee as printed looks as if it were the 1921 census to which reference was made. Probably my hon. friend is right, that that is an error in printing and it should be 1931. I do not think anyone in the house can realize that such a condition exists throughout the rural sections of this country. What that means to the morals, the health and the comfort of these people, it is almost impossible to realize. From this it would look as if in certain of our rural sections conditions are as bad as in the slum areas of the cities. We have in rural Canada to-day—and it is unfortunate that this is true—on the outskirts of the cities thousands of small farms with houses that can be purchased for about the price the committee was considering for an ordinary residence for a low salaried worker. I am sure members particularly from Ontario will bear me out in saying that in that province a number of one-hundred acre farms with houses, barns, gardens and sometimes orchards on them have been sold within the last few years under pressure for less than three thousand dollars. The point I want to urge upon my hon. friend who is in charge of this bill and the government in particular is that encouragement and assistance should be given toward endeavouring to induce the financing for families who are now in the cities or about to be moved off the land, of those low priced farms, small plots, with reasonably adequate housing facilities already constructed upon them. If the bill is left as it is, that cannot be done, because if I read it correctly it provides for new construction only.

After all I do not suppose this proposal would have been considered at the present time except in view of the necessity of unemployment relief. It is part of a plan, or should be fitted into some plan, for the relief of unemployment. I submit that there is no other way in which many who are on relief in the cities, who are accustomed to rural life, and who would be willing under reasonable circumstances to go back on the land if they could get money at such a low rate that they would be able to finance can so well be aided to re-establish themselves. They would then be taken out of the bread lines in the cities, be placed in the country under fairly happy conditions, where they would be able to raise a considerable part of the necessaries of life, and their morale instead of being weakened would be strengthened. If this were done the various municipalities and the federal and provincial governments would be relieved in large measure of the tremendous burden now imposed upon them for relief. They would not be entirely relieved, but the burden would be substantially reduced.

Perhaps I might trouble the house by referring for a moment to what has been done in the past, both in Canada and in other countries. I fancy my hon. friend who is in charge of this bill has read a considerable portion of the evidence given before the housing committee. It shows the very bad results which followed the scheme adopted under the Ontario housing act of 1919. In the city of Ottawa I think the loss already amounts to something around $352,000. In the city of London, with which I am more familiar, the loss has been quite substantial. These losses have occurred—and this cannot be impressed too strongly on the house—from the fact that some organization was undertaking to build houses for people who were making no contribution towards the cost. The houses were being supervised, and very badly supervised in the cases I have mentioned, by people who were not expecting to reside in them, who did not have a financial interest in them. To be successful any plan must be adapted to meet the natural desire of people to get a home of their own. That element was absent in those cases and therefore the plan did not succeed, the prospective occupants were making no investment themselves. I suppose some of them could not make an investment; for them there will have to be some different plan adopted, perhaps a low rental plan. I think that with the possible exception of Winnipeg perhaps, Toronto has made the greatest success of any city in Canada in the housing business. The plan adopted there was that 85 per cent of the bonds of the housing company, was guaranteed by the council for the construction of these houses. The housing commission paid interest on the money they raised at the rate of six per cent from the year 1923 to 1931. There were a couple of years then that they did not pay interest, and I understand that last year it was again on a fairly paying basis. That is being done by an organization consisting of people interested in the work, doing it as a matter of public service without pay, apart from the manager who is devoting his whole time to it.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Of course one cannot say that what will work well in one country will work equally well in another, where climatic and other conditions are different, but I think that the experience of Great Britain in recent years is the best example that this country can follow at the present time. Therefore I should like to refer the committee to a report which can be found in the December number of the Magazine Digest at page 11. I should like to read a couple of paragraphs:

> Great Britain is now building houses at the rate of a thousand a day, and four-fifths are built by private enterprise without assistance of any kind from the government or from any town or city council. The building of houses on this vast scale has been one of the most important reasons why trade has improved in England.

I am giving you the article as it appears here. That may or may not be entirely accurate; it is the opinion of H. N. Casson, the editor of Efficiency magazine of London.

> The British brickyards are working overtime. They cannot supply the demand. Bricks are being imported from Belgium.

Then it gives the terms on which the houses are sold. It states:

> A typical house which I visited—a $3,125 house—was semi-detached, had a living room and dining room each 13 feet long, three bedrooms, large tiled kitchen, tiled bathroom, separate lavatory, a radio set, electric clock, gas cooker and gas boiler. It had space for a garage. This house had been sold for a deposit of $125 and instalments of $4.37 a week. It is only twelve miles from the centre of London.
> Britain is rapidly becoming a nation of home owners. Almost all the new houses are being built in the suburbs. Every house has its little garden. Any working man who can save $150 can have his own home.

He points out that a vital point to remember about this greatest of all house-building booms in Great Britain is that it is due entirely to private enterprise and has come about since the government decided to let housing alone. That is probably too strong a statement to be entirely applicable to this country, but it does show the advantage of having a matter of this kind financed by the people who are directly interested.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the hon. member tell us who is financing these houses?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, I intended to read the set-up as it is given here. Perhaps I can come to that now. First let me refer, without reading it in full, to what happened under the general housing scheme in Great Britain originally, when the government were in charge.

> Immediately after the war the government took over the control of the whole matter of housing and building materials.

They did so in the first year after the war, and in that year not a thousand houses were built in the whole of Great Britain. It says —and I think this answers the hon. member:

> Britain has solved the housing problem by cooperation between the speculative builders and the building societies. The builders design and construct the houses. They engage staffs of salesmen; they advertise in the daily press. The building societies take over the contract, pay cash to the builders and allow the house buyers to pay on the instalment system.

Hon. members will see from the report presented by the housing committee that what has been done in England has to a large extent been accomplished through the encouragement of housing companies. A British building society is a combination of savings bank and mortgage trust. It offers four per cent or five per cent for money. It lends money to house buyers on mortgages and, what seems to me very remarkable, they lend nine-tenths of the price and receive no subsidy or state help. Then the article goes on to outline the success building companies in Great Britain have had. Of the 1,013 building societies which have carried on business in Great Britain only one failure has been reported.

Special reference is made to the Halifax Building Society in Great Britain which now overtops all the others. The article states:

> It has assets of $463,000,000. It has 180,000 borrowers. Its income last year was $166,200,000, and its net profit was $2,184,000. It has been the largest building society in the world for twenty years.

Sir Enoch Hill is the man credited with developing the Halifax Building Society. This man started out in a very modest way at an age when no factory in Canada would have been permitted to engage his services. As a boy eight years of age he worked in a silk spinning factory, and when thirty-seven years of age he became manager of this gigantic corporation. To-day he is looked upon as perhaps the greatest authority in Great Britain on building societies and housing problems. He has visited Canada and the United States and is widely consulted on matters of this kind. The article contains this further statement:

> The general tendency at present in Great Britain is toward less restriction and regulation. The swing is toward more liberty and private enterprise.

In this country I believe in order to be successful the greatest possible liberty and encouragement must be given to private enterprise, if the project is to be a success.

As I stated earlier I do not intend to labour the discussion. In view of what has been done in the old country I believe that many of the people on the outskirts of our large cities engaged in industries could be housed under circumstances advantageous to themselves, the municipalities and the country as a whole. In recent years there have been tremendous drops in construction business. In 1929 the total amount spent in construction in Canada—and this figure is not limited to housing—was $580,000,000. In 1934 the value of construction was only $126,000,000. These figures were given in evidence by representatives of construction trades called before the committee.

Mr. W. L. Sommerville, chairman of the housing committee of the national construction council was called before the committee of this house, and at page 100 of the evidence he states, in effect, that due to the curtailment of purchasing power of the primary producers special consideration should be given by the proposed national housing authority to means of financing farm building improvements, if funds are to be borrowed extensively for rural housing or rehabilitation. A great many people seem to be under the impression that this is a particularly advantageous time to commence construction on a large scale. Perhaps it is more advantageous than it would have been at the peak, but I should like to give to the house evidence indicating the change in material and labour prices. Having done so I believe hon. members will find that the advantage is not as great as they would have expected. At page 91 of the evidence Mr. J. Clark Reilly, an authority in the construction business makes reference to the 1926 material prices, placing them at the index figure of 100. Working from that figure he indicates that at the end of 1934 the figure was 82, against a peak in 1920 of 144. In connection with labour rates he has taken the figure 100 for the year 1913, giving a figure of 147 for 1934 as against 171 for 1926. It would appear that with care this should be a fairly advantageous time for purposes of construction. I have already referred to the congestion in rural communities. Of course we realize that there is great congestion in many of our larger cities, but I very much doubt whether or not the public realize just what congestion exists in the rural sections.

Directing my observations more particularly to the bill may I state that I am sure hon. members will appreciate what the sponsor of the bill has said respecting the work of the committee. It was a real privilege to sit with the other members under the chairmanship of the hon. member who acted as chairman, and I believe much valuable information was obtained. The evidence is on record, and I do not intend to discuss it at length. I have the greatest respect, for the sponsor of the bill, but I must observe that an examination of what took place before the committee would indicate that the time which elapsed between April 16, the date of presentation of the report and June 18, the date the resolution was moved in the house has not produced the kind of a bill which a matter of so great importance deserves.

Let us sum up what is contained in the bill. First of all we have the title, the first clause stating:

This act may be cited as the Dominion Housing Act, 1935.

That would not require a great deal of consideration. Then we come to the second clause, the interpretation clause of the bill. Paragraph (a) defines the expression "approved lending institution," and states that an "approved lending institution" means a lending institution approved by the governor in council. Then paragraph (e) defines "lending institution" as follows:

(e) "lending institution" means a loan, insurance or other company authorized to lend money on the security of real or immovable property.

It occurs to me that had not the person in charge of drafting the bill been anxious to provide filling for the skeleton, he could have said that an "approved lending institution" meant a "loan, insurance or other company approved by the governor in council and authorized to lend money." Then we have a definition of the term "house," and in it I find nothing new. I think almost any abridged dictionary would give a more exhaustive definition of "house" than we have in this bill. The definition in the bill reads:

"House" means a building intended exclusively for human habitation comprising one or more self-contained dwelling places.

Really that must have been a strain on the man whose ingenuity devised the definition.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Then cost of construction is defined, and, Mr. Speaker, you will be interested to know that:

"Cost of construction" includes, as well as the actual expenditure for building, the cost of the land, legal expenses connected with any loan and any other expense necessary to complete the house.

Then housing scheme is defined:

"Housing scheme" means a scheme for the construction of houses and their occupation by tenants or purchasers.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but this would really be better in committee, would it not?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I think I would like to go through with this because there is a principle, or lack of principle, involved in the whole bill, and what I am saying has a definite bearing on that.

Then section 3 tells what information can be collected by the economic council. It is similar, if I recollect aright, to part 4 of the act respecting unemployment insurance. This just enables certain data to be collected.

Then we come to the loaning provision, and I think this is something which the government should consider very carefully, and particularly whoever is in charge of the bill at this and subsequent stages. It has been decided that the government will advance, along with an approved lending institution, 80 per cent of the cost of whatever is constructed—60 per cent by the lending institution and 20 per cent by the government. That makes 80 per cent, and the other 20 per cent must come from some other source. I am not quarrelling with the proportions at all, but I want to point out that under another section of the bill the losses sustained as a result of this housing scheme are to be fixed in the future by a contract made under regulations drawn up by the minister and approved by the governor in council.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, the minister in charge of the bill is defined as the Minister of Finance. I think what this house is particularly interested in at the present time is this, and I do not want to discourage this project at all because we surely have reached the time when something along sound lines must be done; I think the house will be more interested in knowing the proportion of the loss that is to be borne by this government than in knowing the proportions in which this government and the lending institutions advance moneys for the various structures under the scheme. That is the view I have taken after reading the bill carefully. There is nothing further I have to suggest at the present time, but there are some amendments I would like to suggest when the bill is in committee.

Mr. G. D. STANLEY (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer a few observations in regard to this bill. First I feel that one should set down the basic understanding of what housing is. The discussion so far might lead one to suppose that it is a matter of construction mechanics, but we were given to understand in the special study of this matter which the committee made that housing as it is defined is a much larger problem than simply the construction of homes. It is a social question. It is very broad in its scope, and one might undertake to say that it includes preventive measures, for instance. It cannot be separated from the general consideration of town planning, and when one speaks of measures for housing one must consider it from that standpoint. Preventive measures certainly belong to it; for instance, the prevention of disease, the prevention of crime, the prevention of delinquency, the prevention of fire, and the consideration of the question must also include such very important things as transportation, parks and all these other matters which are included in the broader and more inclusive consideration of housing. Hence it is borne home to us that in entering upon a housing scheme now, we must do it with the understanding that it is a continuing problem, that we are simply making a start with some phases of it, and it is so important that the foundation of the policy which will direct the nation in its housing undertakings should be laid properly, carefully and well.

Various important points might be urged, but the first thing that occurs to me is that the committee after taking evidence and hearing reports from a large number of experts thoroughly conversant with the housing question brought in a report inclusive and much broader than a report covering simply the question of construction mechanics. The committee endeavoured to go into the whole question of housing or town planning, if you will, and the committee brought in a favourable report.

The next important point that occurs to me is that the government has accepted the principle. European countries, including Great Britain, have already established housing policies and have entered into the whole matter of housing in a very large way. The United States and Canada have not done so heretofore, but now the committee has reported favourably on the establishment of a national policy in Canada in connection with housing. The government itself has accepted the principle and therefore it is acknowledged that if this bill becomes legislation the nation itself accepts the housing obligation. I think that is an important point to urge. No matter how far we go at the present time, so long as we have established the principle and accepted the state obligation, we have at least started on the proper basis and have made a safe and sound beginning.

Then the government gives us this measure. It is an implementing measure. It may not go as far as some of us might wish it to go. I know it does not go as far as my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and some others would like it to go. The main thing is that as a start it is implementing the recommendations of the committee which accepted this principle and by so doing it implies a state obligation in connection with housing. The velocity of its progress is a detail. How far we go this year, how far we will go next year or the years after is for the next parliament or parliaments to decide. Our duty today is to make a start and see that that start is made on the proper basis.

When the bill was introduced there was some discussion in connection with the use of the word "commission." Hon. members who were members of the committee realized that in order to bring in a unanimous report it was necessary to compromise, to give and take in one way and another. The result was what I consider to be a very excellent report. The word used in the first clause of the recommendation was "authority" while the resolution upon which this bill is founded used the word "commissioner." At the moment I am not particularly interested in whether the authority is a specific commission as long as we establish the basis upon which a start will be made. We must delegate to a specific authority the duty of establishing a national policy on housing. It was borne home to those of us who were on the committee that in order to make a success of any housing undertaking it would be necessary to delegate the administration of the policy to those who were trained in that particular kind of work. This work cannot be undertaken by busy officials attached to, say, the Department of Finance, it must be delegated to persons who are expert in this work and who are prepared to investigate, study, report and advise upon the whole question of housing. Consequently, the commission or whatever authority may be appointed must be competent to handle the problem of housing in its broadest sense.

A certain amount of investigating was done by the lay members of the special committee but the details should be considered by those trained in this kind of work. As one interested in the problem of housing and in the policy which the government has enunciated in this regard, I am insistent that those who undertake to investigate, study, report and advise upon this problem shall be properly trained for the work. Whether they are attached to a particular department or to a commission is not as important as the proper study and investigation of the problem before the policy is launched.

The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) has been discussing some of the problems of construction but I shall not endeavour to go into them at any great length. One important point brought up at the committee was the diminishing supply of proper homes in our cities and towns and also in the rural districts. The statistical department gave figures to show how this demand was being met, and other similar evidence was given by witnesses who appeared before the committee. It was shown that the normal demand for new homes amounted to 27,500 each year but because of the deficiency which had occurred during the past five years, it would be necessary to construct 82,000 homes to catch up with the normal demand at the end of 1935. It will be seen how far we have fallen behind. Another problem to be considered is that of employment. We were told that in 1926 only six or seven per cent of mechanics employed in the construction trade were not employed; by 1929 the unemployed had increased to eight or nine per cent, but by 1934 they had increased to seventy-two per cent. These figures give one an idea of how far building has been falling behind. A report of the Bank of Nova Scotia was submitted to the committee and it showed that in 1928 there was spent upon the building of homes a total of $104,000,000, whereas in 1933 this had fallen to $26,000,000 or $27,000,000. If we are to maintain a healthy home and family condition in our country we must meet this increased demand for new homes.

The various classifications which were given to us in evidence, which hon. members no doubt have read, may be summarized as follows: Take the homes for the low wage earners. The experts from Toronto, Montreal and other places emphasized the fact that men earning say $50 a month cannot afford to pay more than one-fifth of that wage in rent. The evidence also showed that in order to give the typical family, that is to say, a man and wife and three children—mixed sexes—proper accommodation, the amenities of life and a reasonable standard of comfort, it would need a rental of say $17 or $18 a month. Now if the low wage earner can afford to pay only $12 a month there is a gap of $5 or $6 a month which must be provided in some way, and if that class of homeseeker is to be assisted in securing homes which would answer the requirements of a proper housing scheme, then the policy laid down must take into account that gap which the low wage earner, as conditions are at the present time, cannot himself supply. We come to the next group, those who in the evidence were described as the white collar class, men earning $1,200 or $1,250 a year. They may provide a larger proportion than one-fifth of their wages, perhaps up to one-third. But what came home to us was the fact that that class must be able to secure money at very low rates of interest, rates below that which may be provided by private funds. Then we have the higher class, those whose income is such that they can very well afford to finance for themselves. And we have the rural homes, which is another consideration.

A policy must include all these. You will notice that I am not dealing with the question of slum clearance, which is another and greater problem. When the investigation is being made, and when a policy is being established, these various classifications must be considered; and more than that—this is an important point which I think the authority or the commission or the officials must take into serious consideration—steps must be taken to encourage a building program undertaken by private citizens apart from money that is financed by the government. Then apart altogether from money towards the interest only on which the government will assist, steps should be taken to encourage a building program among the lower classifications for these assisted programs would reflexly encourage and stimulate a building program among those who can finance themselves.

So that in that way, by a commission undertaking a national program and a policy which will establish housing, you gradually but ultimately arrive at the position emphasized by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott), where the persons and organizations doing the housing may undertake their own financing to a large extent. The financing of a housing scheme in Canada is entirely different from the problem they have in the old country. In the old country time has created confidence in the associations or building societies, and the bonds which they float are highly considered; so that one of the best witnesses we had before the committee emphasized the fact that the bonds of the building societies in Germany are more to be desired than government bonds themselves, and as trust funds they are sought and used in that country. Surely that will not apply to Canada. But as time goes on the hope is in a program undertaken and administered by experts, and by those who have a thorough comprehension of the housing scheme. As time passes the confidence of the public in the housing undertaking will be aroused stimulated and confirmed.

In the committee we had evidence from those who had funds to loan that they had $75,000,000 to-day which they wished to place if they could be convinced that the securtiy was sufficient. When you have loan companies and organizations coming before the committee and saying that they have $75,000,000 which they wish to loan, you have a very splendid beginning at any rate; and all they need—so they said—is sufficient confidence in the undertaking, that their security will be assured. I mention that to bear out the contention that the housing commission or committee or authority, whichever word you like to use, undertaking to develop a housing policy in this country—

Mr. HEAPS: What interest do these private corporations want?

Mr. STANLEY: That enters into another problem altogether.

Mr. HEAPS: It is vital at this stage; it is vital to the hon. gentleman's own argument.

Mr. STANLEY: Apart altogether from the specific rate of interest which they are charging, the hon. gentleman knows—and it was urged very decidedly before the commission—that a building program on the part of those who can afford to carry it out with private means, those who can afford to pay the rates of interest charged by the loan companies to-day, those who will finance for themselves, will relieve to a degree the demand for houses in the lower grades. And as the housing is undertaken in each classification higher up, the housing condition improves among those who can afford to pay only smaller sums in interest or rent.

Passing on to the next question of employment, I want to urge the point that as house-building employment is undertaken, it becomes a leaven which permeates through the community by way of the money that is paid to labour in wages. Incidentally may I say that it was given in evidence before the committee that from eighty to eighty-two per cent of money spent on construction actually went into the pockets of the labourers and that money in turn went into every branch of industry and business in the community. Therefore housing construction is the best type of employment undertaking. I am not saying anything against employment, because employment is very important, but after all it is only incidental to the whole problem of housing and it should be considered in that light. Give all the employment that is possible; consider this question from the viewpoint of giving as much employment to labour as is possible, but the main point is first to get the housing policy basically sound and right, sane and proper, so that it will be a success, and the labour will come incidentally to the housing undertaking.

On pages 9 and 10 of the report there is a very good summary of what housing means in a social way. I have said that it is a social problem. It will be found in the Toronto report that infant mortality in that city as a whole was 63·4 per thousand whereas in the Moss Park area it was 121·2. As regards the question of juvenile delinquency, it was also found to be very much more prevalent in the poor housing districts. As to crime, a survey was made of 547 houses; 315 were reported as below the minimum standard and out of those 315, 100 had been "convicted" for various kinds of crimes.

Evidence was brought forward with regard to the city of Cleveland and I shall give these figures just to show the relationship of housing to the social problems of the day. Twenty-two per cent of all the murders committed in Cleveland were found in the slum district which contained two and a half per cent of the population; 6·8 per cent of boy delinquency and 12½ per cent of tuberculosis deaths occurred in this area. On the question of fire protection, in Cleveland as a whole the cost was $3.12 per capita whereas in the slum area it was $18.72. Those figures give us a summary of the importance of proper housing in regard to the social problems of the day. Not only then is it a humanitarian undertaking, but it is good business for the country, the provinces, the municipalities, and the citizens in their private organizations and as taxpayers to undertake proper housing throughout the country, because it remedies these various social conditions of which I have spoken, improves the value of the property generally and the standing of the community, and saves life, property and morale.

I shall not deal at length with the slum clearance question which was considered at some length before the committee. The advantages of ridding a city or community of a slum are of course obvious. From Montreal and Toronto we had two elaborate reports, one showing that in Montreal it required at least $14,000,000 to fulfil the undertaking which they had recommended. The committee from Toronto recommended that at least $12,000,000 should be spent in the undertaking there. One of the witnesses—and others followed him—urged that slum clearance would be a problem this year, next year and for many years to come, and that an undertaking that would give homes to those who could finance them entirely or partly would assist in overcoming some of the slum difficulties. This was the point which one expert urged: When you start in on a housing scheme, do not start on slum clearance first or you invite defeat; start in with that plan which can be handled by the finances which are immediately available; make a success of your start and then develop the work from year to year and from time to time.

The main thought to my mind is that the principle has been accepted; that the obligation has been assumed and that the government now undertakes to implement to this extent the principle and national policy of housing.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): With the broad general principles enunciated by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) I think I might find myself in agreement, but I do not propose to discuss the bill in any other way than in its specific terms. The minister who introduced the bill I think had in mind two or three chief purposes: one was, as he stated, to make it possible for men who earn small wages to acquire their own houses; the second was to make up the deficiency in the supply of houses in the country, and the third and not unimportant one, was to provide employment. To my mind—and I shall be very frank in what I say—I believe the bill will fail in every one of these purposes. I say that from a study of the financial arrangements proposed by the bill. They are as follows: that the investment company, the loaning company, shall supply sixty per cent of the cost of the house, which I take it includes also the cost of the land; that the government will supply twenty per cent, and the man who is to own the house will supply the final twenty per cent. I am told that in the report of the committee it was suggested that the cost of an average house such as contemplated by this bill would be about $2,700. If the owner, the small wage earner, has to find twenty per cent of that he would have to have at least $500 or $600. I leave it to the house whether in their opinion, under conditions as they are to-day in the towns and cities, any large proportion of low wage earners are in possession of that sum.

Mr. STANLEY: He would get it from the local building society.

Mr. EULER: The local building society, I take it, is providing the first sixty per cent. I think the plan is utterly impracticable so far as the low wage earner is concerned, he will not have enough money to avail himself of its provisions. The second feature which I think is absolutely fatal to the success of the measure is that the building society or loan company will not consent to share its security with the government. It is supposed to advance sixty per cent of the cost of the undertaking. In my own province, and I suppose it applies in others, loan companies may not loan more than sixty per cent of the value of the property on first mortgage. They are prohibited by law, and this government cannot interfere with that in the case of any loan company holding a provincial charter. This bill proposes that the loan companies shall supply sixty per cent of the cost. Ordinarily, the loaning company has one hundred per cent of value as security for the loans. This bill proposes that the advance of twenty per cent made by the government shall entitle the government to share in that first mortgage, thereby reducing the security held by the investment company. I say with considerable confidence that there is not an insurance company or a loan company that will advance money to the extent of sixty per cent of the value of the property unless it has the full one hundred per cent of value behind it as security. Therefore I say the bill is utterly impracticable. The money will not be advanced for those two reasons.

The hon. member for East Calgary advanced another argument, and the minister presenting the bill mentioned it also, that this bill is a start, it enunciates the principle that governments are taking some of the responsibility for housing. In reply I say that no start at all would be better than a bad start. I heard some legislation described here the other day by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) as anaemic. I certainly would describe this bill as anaemic to the degree that it will be still born. I believe that the government will have to advance practically no money under this scheme. I am not opposing any well considered policy of housing, I think we may have to come to that, but I would like to see something practical introduced rather than that the public should be misled,—I do not say intentionally—into thinking that something is being given them when it really amounts to nothing at all.

As it is almost six o'clock I would close with this comment: we have had during the last session and others a good deal of legislation enacted for the benefit of the farming community. I have no objection to that, they need all the help they can get, but they have received considerable by way of the wheat bonus, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the purchase of wheat by the government and now the grain board bill. I am not offhand making any particular criticism of them, although I do not know where we are coming out with this sort of thing, but I say that the forgotten man to-day is in the cities and towns. We are trying to make some little provision for the low wage earner so that he may own his house, but what is to become of the man who now nominally owns his house but who has practically no equity left in it? Nothing has been done for the man in the cities or towns who is out of work and can no longer pay interest and taxes and is losing his house. I would recommend that the government pay a little attention to that phase of the question.

I say again that the bill is absolutely innocuous, it will do no good and it may do harm by destroying the belief that the government meant anything at all in the way of providing for housing. If the government want to make this bill practicable I might make a suggestion. The loaning companies, as I say, will not allow anyone to share in their security. But if the government would agree to accept a second mortgage for their twenty per cent and leave intact the security that the loaning company expects for its sixty per cent something might be done. But I am quite certain that with the bill as it stands there will be no success and the government will not be under the necessity of advancing a dollar of the $10,000,000 that it proposes to provide under this bill.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that when the minister introduced the bill I happened to be out of the house. I should have liked very much to hear a comprehensive explanation of the actual meaning of the bill. However we did have some observations from the minister when the resolution was introduced. This afternoon there has been considerable discussion, but of the hon. members who spoke only the hon. member who was speaking at six o'clock dealt with the actual bill. Many beautiful phrases were used when hon. members referred to the importance of adequate consideration of the housing situation and pointed out what adequate housing means to the nation. I intend, however, to deal more specifically with the bill, because I believe it is from the bill we must have guidance in our consideration of the intention of the government.

First of all we must realize that on February 18 the government appointed a committee to consider a national housing policy. After sitting for some weeks and hearing the evidence of many witnesses the committee came to what was practically a unanimous decision concerning a housing policy for the dominion. Some hon. members who preceded me have referred to the failure of a housing scheme in the year 1920. It is true that when after the war Canada undertook the expenditure of $25,000,000 to improve housing conditions in certain parts of the country the scheme was not entirely a success. It would appear that in the cities of Ottawa and London, Ontario, the scheme was unsuccessful and resulted in losses to those municipalities. On the other hand in the city of Winnipeg, where there were more houses built than in both the other cities, the scheme was a success. There may have been two reasons why the scheme of 1920 did not succeed. I believe one was that there was not a proper supervision of the funds provided by the federal government. Had there been proper supervision by federal, provincial and local authorities I do not believe the schemes in Ottawa and London would have failed. Secondly, the houses were built when building costs were at the peak, and in a few years equities in the houses constructed disappeared; in fact they were worth less after two or three years than they were at the time they were built. Perhaps there may be several reasons why the housing scheme brought forward immediately after the war did not succeed. I hold the view, however, that if we have suffered financial losses as a result of our experience after the war, at least we have gained through those experiences, and they should stand us in good stead to-day.

The committee met and tried to formulate a national housing policy. There is no point in any hon. member rising in his place and attempting to apologize for the bill the government has placed before us, as the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) did this afternoon. He said that this was a start which may mean something in the sweet by and by. I am getting tired of gestures which do not mean anything. I want to see something concrete, and if there is one place where concrete action could have been taken to meet the present situation, certainly it is in connection with the housing problem.

Considering the bill in committee we had two objectives in mind, the first being to provide homes for low paid wage earners, and the second to create employment for people engaged in the building trades, thereby giving a stimulus to industry in general. If we are to accept this bill as a measure reflecting the recommendations of the committee, then I say it is of very little practical value.

It was shown in committee that for a number of years we have fallen behind in the matter of housing to the extent of 25,000 houses per year. If at this time we proceeded to build 50,000 homes across the dominion we still could not catch up to the actual housing shortage. Now, what does the bill say? The whole crux of the bill is contained in paragraph (b) of subsection 2. section 4, which states:

> The advance made by the minister shall not exceed 20 per cent of the cost of construction of the house or its appraised value, whichever is the lesser, and the interest payable to His Majesty in respect of the advance shall be at a rate to be fixed by the terms of the contract.

In other words the government is prepared to advance twenty per cent of the cost of construction of houses in urban centres. In committee we considered the question of rehabilitation, but in the bill we find not one word about rehabilitation either in urban or in rural centres. I cannot find any relationship between the bill before us and the recommendations made by the committee; there is about as much in common between them as there is between pig and pig iron. I am more than disappointed in it.

It has been argued this afternoon, and the argument will no doubt be repeated, that the twenty per cent advance will give a stimulus to building. Yet throughout the whole report the claim is made that the only thing which can give a stimulus to building in Canada and employment to the people in the building industries is government financing at a very low interest rate. That is practically the basis of the report. If the government is going to advance twenty per cent of the funds at a rate which is not stated in the bill, and the private mortgage companies are to provide money at a rate of five and a half or six per cent, how will it be possible to construct low priced homes for low paid wage earners? It will be quite impossible.

During his observations the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Elliott) read from a United States magazine an article indicating what had been done in Great Britain in respect to housing. I do not know why he should have quoted from a United States digest when the report of the committee, which he signed, clearly stated what had been done in Great Britain. For the benefit of hon. members may I quote from the report that part which indicates what has been accomplished in Great Britain. The report says on page 7:

> The number of houses built in England and Wales since 1919 is 2,335,122. Of these, 1,184,600 were built with subsidy. The national and local governments have contributed in subsidies £178,270,000 ($891,350,000). In addition to this they are pledged to £16,000,000 ($80,000,000) per year for many years to come. They have also invested in recoverable loans £337,000,000 ($1,685,000,000).

That is what the government of Great Britain has done in the way of capital expenditures. What do we intend to do here? We are practically the last country in the world which is attempting as a nation to deal with the housing problem. The United States has a national policy in regard to housing, and in Great Britain they have had one since the war. Every European country has some national housing policy in operation. But when we in this house bring in a bill to deal with a problem of this kind, national in its scope, we deal with it in such a picayune fashion that, as the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) said, there will probably be no houses built under the scheme. For my own part, Mr. Speaker, after reading the provisions of this bill so far as housing is concerned I would prefer the government should withdraw the measure rather than have it go through in its present form. If the government have any intention of assisting in the building of houses I suggest that they eliminate that section of the bill which deals with the government providing the funds on a twenty per cent basis. I am going to suggest to the government what the members of the committee felt almost unanimously, that if $10,000,000 is to be provided in this bill for housing purposes, the whole of that $10,000,000 should be made available for housing purposes at a rate not to exceed three per cent. The government might well make that contribution if the money costs them more than that, although I do not suggest that it should; but if the government would provide money at three per cent to the authorities who are in a position to proceed with the housing scheme, we might get houses built in the Dominion of Canada. I would cut out entirely the private corporations. If as provided in this bill, you are going to make them the sole medium through which houses can be built, then the very purpose for which the committee was formed and the very object of its report will be defeated and the scheme itself will be of little practical value. Under the 1920 housing act funds were provided by the government at a rate which was approximately two per cent below the rate available to private borrowers. The situation to-day is even more acute than it was then; for we have a greater need of houses and a greater need of employment.

I should like to go a little further. If our provincial governments or our municipalities submitted to the economic council as provided for in this act, schemes that merited the council's approval, then these other public bodies should have the right to proceed with a municipal or any other housing scheme which they thought desirable. The municipalities or provincial governments could assume responsibility for the repayment of the funds; or if the government were not satisfied with making the municipality or the province responsible for the bonds being issued, it could take, as additional security, a first mortgage on the houses built; and I do not know what better security you could have than the houses in which the people live. Under this bill the government will probably have, as security, only a second mortgage, which I do not think has any real value. From my knowledge of the housing problem I suggest that if the government are going to make a twenty per cent contribution of loans under a housing scheme, and it is to be a junior obligation against the houses built, in a very short time the government will have to bear a huge loss. The position of the government would be immeasurably stronger if instead of providing twenty per cent of the loan it provided eighty-five or ninety per cent, because then it could take as its security a first mortgage on the home as against only the twenty per cent security which it will have under this scheme and which I believe ultimately will be of no value whatever.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is a great disappointment. I know that in the city of Winnipeg many of the building trades have been looking forward to a comprehensive housing scheme which would provide employment there for quite a considerable time. It has been estimated that approximately one-half of the cost of the construction of a house goes into labour, and if such is the case we can understand how valuable a proper housing scheme would be at the present time in relieving the unemployment situation.

I do not want to quote too much from the committee's report, but at page 16 it deals with the providing of homes at low rentals for low paid wage earners. Under this scheme such a thing becomes almost impossible. It cannot be done, for two reasons. It provides for no scheme of setting up houses on a rental basis, and if the private corporations are to be the only bodies to lend the money and be responsible for the erection of the houses, nothing can be done for the low paid wage earner. We were informed that in Great Britain the rate of interest was in many cases as low as three per cent; and not only that, but many instances were given of the quantity of vast subsidies for the erection of houses in order that the working people of Great Britain might have homes on a low rental basis. We are doing nothing of that kind in this country. What we are attempting to do, and what may be the effect of this bill, assuming a few houses are built under the scheme proposed, is to have a twenty per cent loan provided by the government, and perhaps some well-to-do individual may avail himself of a certain amount of low rate interest money to build a house which otherwise might not be built; but that will in no shape or form deal with the acute problem of housing. The acute problem of housing is left entirely untouched by this measure.

I am anxious to see houses constructed in the Dominion of Canada, and judging by the few remarks which the minister made on the resolution when it was introduced in this house on January 18, he feels the same way; for he spoke feelingly of the need of building homes for the great masses of our people. But if he had given careful consideration to the committee's report and to this bill as at present drafted I am sure he would realize how far the bill is from the recommendations of the housing committee. It was pointed out this afternoon that in the city of Winnipeg, where under the old housing scheme

720 homes were built—I am speaking from memory but I believe that is the correct figure—a profit on that housing scheme has been shown in each year since 1920. Over $2,000,000 was loaned by the city of Winnipeg and with operating costs of one per cent they were able to show a profit on the housing commission of about $12,000 to $14,000 per year. So successful was the city in carrying out the scheme that the gentleman who appeared before the committee to represent the mortgage companies congratulated the city on the efficient manner in which it had handled the situation. He admitted that the loan companies could not do in their private capacity what the city had done in its public capacity. Under the provisions of the bill now before us the city of Winnipeg, which has shown what could be done in this regard, would be unable to get one cent. It could obtain about twenty per cent of the funds necessary at a certain rate of interest, but where could it get the rest? Is there any reason why a city or other corporation prepared to proceed with a proper housing scheme under the supervision of federal or provincial authorities should not be able from the federal exchequer to obtain one hundred per cent of the funds needed? Ten million dollars is being provided by this bill and a municipality which was prepared to carry out a proper housing scheme should be able to obtain the necessary funds. According to the bill as it is at present all they can do is to accept sixty per cent of the funds necessary from a private corporation and the other forty per cent would have to be found somewhere else.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If a city set up a company for the purpose of doing this work it would come within the terms of this bill.

Mr. HEAPS: But the city cannot obtain more than twenty per cent of the costs of construction.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The city could lend sixty per cent through a loan company.

Mr. HEAPS: That is the weakness of the bill; the city would have to lend sixty per cent while the individual would have to borrow another twenty per cent. After that the government would come along with its twenty per cent. I am suggesting that the government do what it did in 1920: provide the entire cost of construction and take as security either municipal or provincial bonds, or perhaps mortgages on the houses. If that were done we could accomplish something but if we are to proceed on this basis of twenty, sixty and twenty we will never get anywhere. As was suggested by the hon. member for North Waterloo just before the recess, there will be no houses built.

I am anxious to see something accomplished. I want to see the government do something tangible in providing homes and employment. I cannot agree with the statement of the minister who introduced this bill that it is going to provide homes for the low wage earner. As I understand the bill, that cannot be done. I ask the government to do exactly what it did fourteen or fifteen years ago and provide all the funds at a rate of interest not more than three per cent. I want to see the $10,000,000 provided for in this bill expended in as efficient a manner as it is possible to expend money. I am prepared to vest in the commission or other body to be designated a certain amount of control to see that these houses are built in a proper manner. Under the bill as it is at present there will be no worthwhile supervision of this work. The government is to lend the money to individuals and no one knows what will happen to those individuals once the money has been received. This seems to be going contrary to all the precepts of parliamentary government. We are being asked to vote money and then we lose complete control over the money voted. It is to be handed over to private corporations to spend and we will not know what becomes of it. I am always a little dubious when money is to be spent by private corporations because I am always afraid there will be losses. That has been our experience in the past. I ask the minister to eliminate from the bill the reference to the twenty per cent advance by the government. We should vote $10,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out a national housing scheme under the supervision of those who are capable of undertaking such a scheme. I do not care whether this supervision is by a private body in conjunction with public bodies, or just what it is, as long as there is proper supervision by the government.

As the bill now stands I am afraid it will be a disappointment to the people who expected that many houses would be built. The people will find that this money will cost them just as much as they had to pay private corporations last year or even many years ago, and the men who are looking for work will be disappointed. As a member representing a constituency in which there are thousands of building artisans out of work I ask the government to constitute a proper housing commission to go ahead with the construction of houses so that our people may be housed decently and provided with work.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (West Lambton): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the special committee on housing I desire to say a few words with respect to the bill which has been presented by the government. First of all I want to express my thanks to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong), the chairman of this committee, for the excellent manner in which he conducted the examination of the witnesses and for the courteous way in which he received the suggestions of hon. members and others. I believe I can safely say that this question, a new one as far as this house is concerned, was approached in an absolutely non-political manner. A unanimous report was brought in which is another tribute to the manner in which the chairman conducted the proceedings of the committee. But to say, as the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) has said, that this bill is a distinct disappointment to hon. members of the committee, is putting it mildly. The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley), who at the moment is occupying the chair, expressed it well this afternoon when he stated that the foundation should be laid carefully and well. I must agree with the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) when he says that if this foundation cannot be laid carefully and well it would be better not to launch upon this housing program.

A housing program is not a new thing as far as the British empire is concerned. During the course of its history Great Britain has brought in some 212 reports on this matter. The first bill in connection with housing was introduced in 1838. While this is not a new subject for Great Britain, it is as far as Canada is concerned. Our reference was made, I think, largely in the hope that in trying to find a solution for the housing problem in this dominion we should at the same time be finding at least a partial solution for the unemployment problem. Read the reference and you will see that we were to consider and report upon the inauguration of a national policy of house building, to include construction, reconstruction and repair of urban and rural dwelling houses in order to provide employment throughout Canada and also to provide such dwelling houses as might be necessary upon such terms and conditions as might best meet the needs and requirements of the people.

As the hon. member for East Calgary pointed out this afternoon, we found when we got down to the question that there was a great deal more to be considered than the matter of housing; there was more to be considered than the question of how many men we could reinstate in employment. The question touched the whole heart of the problem of our social life in Canada; it touched the health and the welfare of the people; it touched juvenile delinquency and crime generally throughout the dominion. And the report deals extensively with this whole problem. We held many meetings and examined numerous witnesses, and I think it is safe to say that almost every witness had a different solution for the problem. I should not have been surprised, in fact I should have commended the government, if instead of bringing in this bill they had merely adopted the principle of the need of a national housing policy and then said, "We have not enough information upon which this country can enter upon a housing scheme, and therefore we will leave the question in the hands of the economic council which we have created during the present session in order that they may investigate the whole subject, as provided in section 3 of this bill." I think that if the government had gone as far as that, every one of us would have said that was exactly what they should do, especially at this time—in the dying days of a dying government. At such a time they should not attempt to launch upon a housing scheme, because nearly every witness warned us against premature housing legislation. Instead of that we have what I may describe—and I say this with all due respect to the right hon. gentleman who has introduced the bill—as the last round of shadow boxing on the part of this government. No other expression will describe it. I agree with the hon. member for North Winnipeg in this, that this bill does not fill the needs of the people nor does it begin to meet the suggestions of the committee which brought in this report.

In the first place, the committee realized that housing is primarily a direct responsibility of the individual, working in cooperation with the municipalities, the provinces, and, lastly, the dominion. This is not a new suggestion. My right hon. leader, in suggesting a national unemployment council in the very first session of the present parliament, proposed that there should be brought into being a body such as that to correlate and coordinate the activities of the municipalities, the provinces and the dominion, and in my opinion, had such a council been instituted, we should have had a national housing scheme on a much larger scale than this, a scheme which would be much more effective, coordinating these various bodies. Instead of that my hon. friends opposite have waited until the dying days of the session before bringing in a measure which is of rather doubtful validity to begin with—because here once more we find in section 5 a qualification with which we are now familiar: in line 16 we have the words "subject to the jurisdiction of parliament." Where have we heard these words before? In nearly every bill which this government has brought down in the latter part of this session we find the same thing, "subject to the jurisdiction of parliament." This afternoon the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) a man with years of experience in company law and parliamentary jurisprudence, came into the house saying, in connection with the Companies Act, "We will put a semicolon here; we will add a few words there; we will put a period here; we will lead pencil something here." And so on. Can you imagine the type of legislation which is going out from this parliament at this session? Were we sent to parliament to legislate simply because this or that measure appears to be politically expedient, or were we sent to legislate in the interests of the people and to enact into law measures that will stand the test of time?

Had we set up a national unemployment council to cooperate with individuals and with the municipalities and provinces, there would have been no need to state in section 5, "subject to the jurisdiction of parliament." There would have been cooperation and there would therefore have been no need to insert this question mark in the way it is here expressed.

Mr. GEARY: Are not those words a mere qualification of "lending institutions"?

Mr. GRAY: They may be a qualification of lending institutions, but when I tell the hon. gentleman that of the large lending companies of this dominion only two have a federal charter—the Canada Permanent and the Huron & Erie—the great bulk of the companies possessing provincial charters, he will realize that they cannot possibly be affected by the section. So that to put in a clause such as this is merely misleading and farcical; it is a part of the shadow boxing I have mentioned.

As the right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) rightly said, the object of the committee was to attempt to erect houses for the benefit of the low wage earners. I am glad he made that statement; it shows that he has given some attention to the report. He realizes that the main object of the committee, and the object in getting the evidence adduced before that committee, was to see whether we could not establish better housing for low wage earners. Unfortunately he overlooked the fact that in discussing this whole subject matter we found according to the preponderance of evidence that the so called low wage earners might be regarded as those receiving an annual income of from $550 to $1,250. We found, as appears at page 18 of the report, that in order to build an ordinary dwelling, with moderate comforts for a man, his wife and family, in the unit type of housing, the cost would be around $2,500 per house; and under the Bruce report, in Toronto, it was estimated that the same type of house would be about $2,700. The evidence showed what a house of that description would involve. We found from the evidence that a wage earner earning from $550 to $1,250 could not possibly be expected to pay more than from $10 to $15 a month rent. Let us put it at the maximum of $15 and we shall find what it costs annually to carry a house costing $2,700, as confirmed by the national construction council:

Taxes on land and buildings	$ 55 00
Management	15 00

I think these figures are very conservative; I believe the committee found them so.

Insurance	$ 4 00
Maintenance	40 00
Amortization over fifty years	16 95
Interest on $2,700 at four per cent.	108 00
Total	$238 95

I doubt very much whether the money can be had at four per cent. In twelve months at $15 a month there will be received by way of rental $180, so that it will be observed that there is an annual deficit of some $58.95 without any return or suggestion of return to the investor. Do you think for a minute that we are going to get the lending companies to launch into a scheme of this kind?

When one takes the evidence from beginning to end, one can almost feel that this bill was based upon the fears of the lending institutions that the government might start an insurance company of one kind or another, and therefore they came in with a scheme such as this: We will advance sixty per cent; you advance twenty per cent and people will start building houses. But let us take the evidence of Mr. D'Arcy Leonard, who is a reputable solicitor and secretary of the Dominion Mortgage Investment Association, which includes not only the large loan corporations but the insurance companies of Canada. He was questioned in connection with this matter by Mr. Cauchon, head of the town planning commission of the city of Ottawa. This is from Mr. Leonard's evidence as found on page 351 of the proceedings of the special committee on housing:

By Mr. Cauchon:

Q. I would like to ask Mr. Leonard a question, because I think that needs to be cleared up. It has been repeatedly stated here that the class of housing which this committee advisedly has in view, is housing for the low wage earners where they cannot pay an economic rent, and there is need of assistance in that class of housing; does it or does it not interfere in any way with the class of housing to which loan companies make advances, say houses that rent at $15 a month rental, average—$10 or $15, perhaps as high as $18?

A. Well, we certainly could not loan on a house on a basis that would enable it to rent at $12 or $15 a month.

Later on he was asked:

Q. Where would you say was the medium line as to cost?

A. I think that our class of construction, as I know it, particularly in Toronto, we started loaning on a house that cost about $3,500 up.

If this bill is to go forward as one for new construction only, I think—and I speak with some knowledge—even a man who is able to put up forty per cent of the cost will have difficulty in getting the lending companies to lend him the amount required, although they will admit, as the hon. member for East Calgary said this afternoon, their walls are bulging with perhaps some $75,000,000 to lend. There is perhaps a reason for that. We realize under the existing conditions with provincial moratoria, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and other acts of that nature, the lending companies are loath to put out money. But for this government to pretend they are launching a housing scheme, to lead the people to believe they are implementing the promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) in his seventh radio address on January 24, 1935, that he was going to tackle the housing problem, is simply, as the hon. member for North Winnipeg stated, leading astray the workmen, those who would like to build.

Again—and this is my final word in connection with this matter—the government in my opinion have missed the main recommendation of the committee. The committee recommended to the government that its first consideration should be in respect to rehabilitation and repairs at present needed. The hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand), the chairman himself—in fact all the members of the committee—were struck with the fact that the first consideration was the rehabilitation of houses. We cannot attempt to launch into a state aided project at the expense of those who already have built their homes and who cannot make needed repairs because of lack of assistance. Your committee therefore felt that those who had staked perhaps their all, who during the depression had made sacrifice after sacrifice, were the ones who should first be given consideration by the government in a national housing scheme. Does the government make any suggestion that it is to consider rehabilitation or repairs? No. I repeat that this scheme is launched by reason of the fear of the lending companies that unless they come forward with some suggestion, the government will introduce state aid legislation that will materially affect such companies. The government grasped at a chance to bring forward legislation of this kind, legislation which I think the hon. member who has introduced this bill will admit, cannot, when seriously considered, produce the results that the government hoped, and I know sincerely, it would produce.

The government should not press this bill as it now stands. Let the economic council engage in further investigation; let it look if you will into the question of slum clearance, which the committee found to be a complicated and perhaps costly experiment. We realized in the meetings which we held that we did not have sufficient evidence even to make a recommendation in that regard to the government. Let the economic council go into the matter further. It is not possible that any great assistance can be given to the construction trades in the next few months under this bill, leaving as it does, as someone has already pointed out, so much to the lending companies which from one end of Canada to the other have almost unanimously refused to lend. Let the council later on bring in a comprehensive report in order that the house may give proper and due consideration to this most important problem.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Do I understand that he is opposed to this bill?

Mr. GRAY: What I tried to make clear is that I am heartily in accord with the suggestion that in principle we are adopting a national housing program, and if the government will bring in that particular type of legislation and bring in clause 3 of the recommendations, leaving for further investigation this whole matter which we as a committee did not have time to investigate fully; if the government will do that and then, as I say, bring in a bill based upon the recommendations of that economic council, I have no doubt the members on this side will support it.

Mr. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (East Hamilton): I have listened with considerable attention to the hon. member who introduced the bill and those who have spoken since. Coming from what is predominantly a working class constituency, in which there is a large measure of unemployment in the building trades, having regard to the report of the medical health officer placing before the municipal authorities the need for slum clearance in my community, I feel that I should state my opinion on this important problem.

The bill is predicated upon two things: the desire of the government, arising out of the speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) last January, to meet the tremendous unemployment situation in the building trades, and the report of the commission under the chairmanship of the lieutenant-governor of Ontario on slum conditions in Toronto and the reports from Montreal and other large centres indicating the necessity of a building program to do away with the intolerable housing conditions existing in the larger urban centres. On top of that you have figures from those who have gone into the question showing that as a result of the stagnation of the building trades in the last five years a building program is necessary to meet the inevitable need for housing, because our young people still get married notwithstanding that we are passing through a severe depression. In a biological sense one tries to recognize the parents through the children, and if there is not some similarity awkward questions are asked. In connection with this bill I think it is fair to say that the reputed father is the report of the housing commission, but I do not think we could recognize the parent from the bill that is now before the house.

There is ample precedent for a sound building policy. In the provision of housing for the people of Vienna, Austria has achieved something in the midst of a tremendous depression which in the opinion of those who have made a close study of housing problems is an example worthy of emulation by the rest of the civilized world. Then you have the advances made by Great Britain, Belgium, Germany, and in a smaller degree Holland and even Mexico. I am well aware that any policy adopted in this country must breathe the spirit of the Canadian people and reflect their viewpoint, but notwithstanding that we have ample precedent in the recommendations of the international labour office to the world economic conference that was attended by the Prime Minister in, I think, 1932. I have always maintained that one cannot have freedom without ownership. I believe the most contented nation is that nation whose policies permit its people to live in their own castle or under their own roof. I remember discussing that matter once with a high American official representing his government in the Saar, and he said that, largely through the instrumentality of the international commission there setting in motion policies of rehousing in the most radical section, by the time that that policy was in active operation and those people lived in the houses they had completely changed their political outlook. This in his opinion proved the soundness of a proper plan of housing for the people, entirely apart from the health point of view.

There are two problems involved: first, that of providing housing for people of low incomes who can do nothing but rent, and second, that of providing housing for people who still think that the best way to keep a roof over their heads is to own their own home. I have been through that experience myself. I am a comparatively young man—I may not look it, but I am—and I know something from my own experience in that regard, when I was first married and lived in a little frame cottage built on posts, and the thrill I got out of it. There are two needs staring us in the face, as enunciated in the reports of the various commissions; the need for provision of housing for people who find it necessary to rent, and the need for cheap money for those who desire to own their own homes. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) said that of the many witnesses who appeared before the committee, none seemed to have a solution. In my judgment the solution of the housing problem in this country depends on cheap money. The borrowing policies of the various governments in Canada up to two or three years ago have shown lack of vision in the enormous interest rates they paid to the lenders of money. That policy automatically froze up the building industry of this country. With this government paying five per cent and more, and some provincial governments as high as eight per cent and municipalities in proportion, no sound building policy could be carried on by any government or any private concern. When a working man pays seven per cent on the first mortgage on a house he is licked before he starts. Seven per cent is an economic impossibility for the average working man trying to own his own home. A helper of mine once bought a little cottage on the repayment plan under which the man who sold it paid the taxes and so on, and I think the interest rate was eight per cent. He paid $18 a month. We sat down and figured how long it would take him to own the place provided he paid every month, and found it would take one hundred and twenty-three years. When the man bought it he did not go into the financial aspect.

Another important matter is the question of second mortgages and the discount on them. On a second mortgage for $1,000, a man gets $600 to $750 and pays seven per cent interest on the one thousand dollars, so that he may be paying between thirty and forty per cent on the second mortgage in an effort to own a home. That is a common occurrence. Buyers of second mortgages are now suffering for their sins. Second mortgages have been practically wiped out in this depression. In a housing policy I believe it essential that people be given an opportunity to purchase their homes on the understanding that they have the right of repayment almost at any time; where necessary it should be spread over long periods, possibly in some cases over terms of twenty-five years. I do not believe the losses would be very great. Despite the enormous amount of business done by automobile companies we learn that their losses are only about one-half of one per cent, and I believe it is safe to say that the loss in connection with a housing scheme might be less.

Frankly I am disappointed in the bill; I do not believe there will be one house built under its provisions. In the first place, a first mortgage of eighty per cent is unsound. No person ever heard of lending eighty per cent of the money in that way—and I am speaking, of course, of a private undertaking. Governments might do it, but certainly I do not know of any private company which would lend eighty per cent on a first mortgage, having regard to the dips and cycles of trade, the cost of lending money, and so on. In view of the necessity for housing I believe the government would have done well to take more time in analysing the situation, and that it should have launched a vigorous and courageous policy in an effort to meet the obvious shortage of housing and to eliminate slums in some of our cities. It may be argued, and perhaps wtih some weight, that the bill was drawn up quickly. I believe it is fair to say, however, that for some time members of the government have had in their minds the setting in motion of a policy of this kind. But the present bill will not even scratch the surface of a solution of the problems of slum clearance, housing, and the providing of work for the building mechanics of Canada.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss those phases of the bill which so far seem to have attracted most attention. One section of the bill appears to have escaped attention thus far; I refer to section 3, which provides for investigation by the economic council of Canada.

Mr. GRAY: I discussed that feature of the bill.

Mr. HACKETT: Distinguished as were members of the committee, and valiantly as they worked, I do not think any person would contend, least of all members of the committee, that in the few sittings held they could outline or lay the basis of a definite scheme. I believe that as preliminary legislation the bill is well advised; it affords opportunity for further study and for an examination of all the factors which should be considered before defining a vast national housing scheme. It may very well be that there is some opportunity for immediate construction. But the point to which I wish to address myself for a few moments is not how we are going to build, not how we are going to finance that building but where we are going to build. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) and other hon. members have spoken as if of necessity construction must take place in the urban centres. If one examines figures now available concerning unemployment he will see that unemployment is found almost exclusively in the larger centres of population, and while a vast program of construction might furnish temporary employment for those unemployed craftsmen susceptible of absorption into the building trades, there is no guarantee of perpetual work in those centres in which homes may be erected. It may well be that by providing homes for large sections of the population in places where there is no permanent work we would be perpetuating unemployment. As the hon. member who spoke last (Mr. Mitchell) was addressing the house I reviewed rapidly figures which I believe have been made available to every hon. member, and which show the number of people on relief in various centres of the dominion. I turn to Hamilton: I admit that a proportion of the unemployed in that city might be absorbed into the building trades, but I believe it is a fact that to no inconsiderable extent unemployment in that city is a result of stagnation in the manufacturing industries which depend for their activity upon foreign markets. I shall say only a word about Hamilton, because I prefer to speak about Montreal, with which I am more familiar. At the moment it is difficult to see how we are going to regain those markets so long as the commodities we offer are being produced in large quantities by nearly every country. If we restrict to the cities a great proportion of a building program I fail to see how we can make such a program beneficial to the whole people.

For instance, I find that in Hamilton 2,495 labourers, 269 machinists, 141 mechanics, 132 moulders, 152 steel workers and 177 in miscellaneous trades are on the dole. I point this out only to indicate that it is a short-sighted policy which assumes that even after we have built homes for them there is going to be work in that city for these people. I suggest that a wiser plan would be to construct homes outside the cities for those who have recently left the land so that they might find themselves in an environment where at least they could provide for themselves.

I have before me a document prepared by the Department of Social Research of McGill university and which, I believe, was given to all hon. members when the mayors visited the city of Ottawa. This document discloses that in greater Montreal, with a population of 1,149,900, there were 213,263 on relief, and that $6,049,100 was expended by government last year for their maintenance. It furthermore shows that since 1930, $175,794,000 has been spent in providing for people who are out of work. I suggest, as I have frequently done in the last three or four years, that the only permanent and effective cure for unemployment is to remove from the cities a very substantial element that has recently found its way into the cities and to put them where they can provide for themselves. It is beside the question to cite the example of Great Britain, which is a highly industrialized and densely populated country, with a very small area. The last speaker made some reference to Austria. Austria now has a very restricted territory with a capital city whose population, if my memory serves me well, constitutes nearly half the population of the entire country. The housing problem of such a country cannot be compared with our problem and should not be referred to by people who are seeking the benefit of useful experience acquired elsewhere.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a building program is an excellent thing but it is folly to assume that this building should be carried on in its entirety in the cities. We talk about slum clearance; I suggest that it is much better to take people away from these sordid conditions, away from unemployment, and put them into organized communities outside the cities, and build them homes where they will cost less than they do in the cities, and where on a few acres of ground these people can at least provide for themselves the essentials of fuel, raiment and food. It is not necessary that these people should engage in farming on a large scale, but it is essential that they be free from the corroding inactivity and the many temptations which result from herding unemployed men in large cities. I therefore hope that whatever may be done, no definite program will be undertaken until a thorough canvass has been made of the whole situation, and that it be made a part of a definite plan to reestablish equilibrium in the country.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I assume that the principle of the bill now before us is a national housing scheme or program for Canada. I recognize, of course, that so far as carrying that program into effect is concerned the provisions of the bill are very inadequate, but so far as that principle has been adopted I think it is all to the good.

This legislation is very much like a great deal of the legislation of this session; it is far more acceptable in its tendencies than it is from the point of view of anticipated practical results. There can be little doubt that there is a great need for the building of many houses in Canada. The previous speaker (Mr. Hackett) was wondering where they were going to be built, in the cities or in the country, but the answer is that they will have to be built both in urban and in rural districts, wherever they are needed. But that many houses are required no one doubts; neither does anyone doubt that there is an abundance of building material in Canada to supply all the houses that are needed. In addition to that, there is any amount of skilled labour now idle, men who are anxious to get the opportunity of building houses for the people of Canada. So we come down to the same old question which has stood in the way of this government and previous governments on every occasion, that of getting the money to do the job that needs to be done. The very fact that the government have taken this baby step in the great task of building for the people of Canada homes that are required is sufficient proof that the need is there, but the fact that they have provided only a meagre $10,000,000 with which to do it indicates the belief of the government that this country is too poor financially to do the job.

I am interested in this bill not in order to provide employment; I think it would be a foolish policy to build houses just to give people jobs. If the houses are going to be built they should be built because they are required, and, sir, if they are required then I suggest that there is not any monetary policy that should prevent them from being built. I want to state in connection with this bill a principle which is not new to this house, although it is not accepted by this house, a principle which has been enunciated from this corner of the house from year to year. It is this: if there is a human need for certain services, and if it is physically possible to produce those services, then it is always financially possible and financially advisable to provide those services.

I am going to take exception to this bill, not as I have said against its principle, because with its principle I am in agreement; but I take exception in the first place to the meagre amount that is provided for the great task with which the bill presumes to deal. As the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) has just said, I doubt whether any houses will be built under the provisions of this measure; but even if the act be taken advantage of, the amount of money provided will be far short of what is actually needed for the building of houses in Canada to-day. Then on more important grounds, I take exception to the manner in which the money is provided. Everyone recognizes that capitalism has fallen down in the building of houses just as it has in almost every other undertaking of human service in Canada. Just as the grain trade fell down in the marketing of grain, so have the private builders and contractors failed to provide houses for the people. The manner in which this bill provides for assistance where the capitalistic system has fallen down is on an entirely capitalistic basis. It proposes to borrow money from the money mongers for the purpose of building houses for the people of Canada, houses which must be paid for at a certain rate of interest. Under prevailing conditions these houses will never be paid for under the rates of interest to be charged.

I want to suggest that instead of a meagre $10,000,000 the government advance $300,000,000. This advance can be made from the national credit. If the undertaking is good enough for the money lenders, it is good enough for the government. The assets will be just as safe for government investment as they would be for the investments of private corporations. The amount of money which I have suggested will not create inflation as there is far too little money in circulation at the present time. It would simply provide a little stimulus to business by putting that much more money into circulation. This bill suggests merely a shot in the arm for the capitalistic system; it creates only ten grains of pep, not enough even to raise the arm or furnish a single kick. I doubt if this amount will bring about the construction of any houses, whereas $300,000,000 provided out of the national credit and devoted to the building of houses would make a considerable difference.

The question will be asked: How are these homes to be paid for by the people who will live in them? I suggest that the whole thing should be carried out under an amortization plan by which the occupants of the houses would pay an annual sum based upon the deterioration of the houses so that when the asset was wiped out the government would have in its coffers every penny which had been expended. This would not provide for a single copper by way of interest to anyone. At the moment I am not advocating that all public services should be carried on in this way, although I think they should be; but this is a very necessary service. The people need homes and the government should provide them. Whatever is physically possible is financially possible, and everything necessary should be done for the comforts of the people. I ask the right hon. gentleman who is in charge of this bill to indicate what is wrong, either from a financial or economic point of view, with the suggestion I have made. I do not think any hon. member, either on the government side or on this side of the house, will say that the financing of a national housing scheme can be justified on any other basis than the one I have suggested. I hope the government will alter this bill accordingly.

Mr. A. D. GANONG (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker in dealing with this matter we must consider two closely related problems. The 1931 census shows that for the last three years the population of Canada has been growing at the rate of 27,000 families of 4·68 persons per year. As families are growing smaller, the probabilities are that the increase in the number of families is even greater. The need for houses is even greater than is shown by the increase in the number of families. Last year there were 26,000 fires in residential properties and many houses must have been totally destroyed. Other houses are torn down for sanitary reasons or to make room for other buildings. We would probably need at least 35,000 new houses each year, but according to the records, only 10,000 houses per year have been built in Canada during the last three years. At the present time we need at least 25,000 housing units. It is only a matter of arithmetic to arrive at the conclusion that unless something is done to encourage housing within the next two years we will be faced with a housing crisis.

With all due respect to the minister who has introduced this bill, I must say that it makes no provision for housing the low paid worker. However, for the $10,000,000 provided by the bill we will be able to get $50,000,000 worth of new houses. I believe the government are trying to build the most houses in the best way with the least money and in that way they are taking a step towards the solving of the housing problem. The reference to the committee contained the phrase, "and the burden to be imposed upon the treasury of Canada." Should this scheme work out—and I shall take up that point in a few minutes—we will be investing $10,000,000 for which we will get $50,000,000 worth of new houses. These houses will be built as a mass production proposition; the rates of interest will probably be lower than ordinary commercial rates, and the houses should rent easier than houses built under ordinary conditions. For these reasons the $10,000,000 should be particularly secure. It is estimated in England that for every $1,000 expended in new housing, $250 is saved in relief expenditures. If that same formula applies to this country, this investment of $10,000,000 will save us over $10,000,000 in relief expenditures by the municipal, provincial and dominion governments. I believe that this bill will provide the houses which are needed at a price lower than could be provided by any other method. The bill is only what its title states, an act to assist the construction of houses; it is in no way an act to take care of the housing of the low paid worker.

The second problem which we must face is the distressful conditions under which many of our people are forced to live. A survey of the city of Winnipeg showed that in four districts there were 1,300 families each of which was living, cooking and sleeping in one room, many of them attic rooms. In all our cities similar conditions prevail and something should be done to take care of these people. In this regard we have an entirely different problem and a much more difficult one than they had in Great Britain. In England they build a great many houses; under the Addison scheme they built 176,000 houses. To show how much study this subject requires, it is estimated that with the same amount of money—the Addison scheme was instituted in 1919—they could build to-day 1,000,000 houses and rent at half the rate at which the Addison houses were rented. In England they can build what they call a standard house, that is a house for the low wage earner, which will provide sleeping rooms for the parents and for the children of both sexes, separate, and a living room kitchen, for $1,760. According to the report made by the Montreal board of trade, which is the best we have in Canada on housing, it would cost $3,500 to build a similar house in this country, a house that would give equal living conditions. We have a great handicap in our climate. In England that house with interest at three and a quarter per cent amortized at one-half per cent for sixty years can rent at $11.05 per month. In Canada, for a house that would give equal accommodation and an equal standard of living, with the money at three and a half per cent, which is probably cheaper than it could possibly be obtained, and amortized for sixty years at three-quarters per cent, the rental would be $28.73 per month.

The ordinary workman can pay only one-fifth of his income in rent; otherwise he has to take away from his food or clothing or from something else which will interfere with his health. You can readily see the problem we are up against in this country when we come to take care of the low wage earner. In England they have given outright over $800,000,000 and they are pledged to $80,000,000 for the next twenty or thirty years; and in addition to that they have invested almost $2,000,000,000 on which they will get interest. In this country the cost would be so tremendous that it should never be undertaken without a great deal of study. The present bill tends to take care of the housing problem—the crisis we shall have to face within the next two or three years. We must remember that this country is growing faster to-day than it has done at any other time. We are holding our birth rate, something we have never done before. The immigration that came in used to make this a stepping stone to the United States and we lost a great many of our own people. The bill takes care of this problem to some extent from the standpoint of what is going to be done for the low wage earner; under section 3 the economic council of Canada is to study the question.

As chairman of the committee I met a good many persons who might be called town planning and housing cranks. I worked with them for two months and at the end of that time was converted. I think that rather than cranks they are torch bearers to something that is coming. This housing problem must be faced. We cannot continue to allow thousands of families in this country to live in one room under unsanitary conditions as they are and have been for the last few years. It is a tremendous problem and we should not touch it without a great deal of study.

This bill does so to a small extent. As I say, my association with these men convinced me that something should be done and done at once. When the resolution was first brought in it was moved as:

> expedient to bring in a measure to establish a dominion housing commission and to assist in the construction of houses.

I was rather disappointed when the minister changed this resolution. I might frankly say that I know the majority of the committee are not in favour of the commission, but the problem is so great, it has so many different implications, that I do not believe, unless under this economic council a special committee is appointed, that we shall ever have a solution of the problem. I do feel however that the present bill does go part of the way in solving it.

The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) said that the mortgage companies would not be willing to advance an eighty per cent mortgage. We had the representatives of the mortgage companies before our committee and they said that there was a great deal of money available at 5½ per cent. Further, they were very anxious to lend it. Section 5, under which the minister and the lending institutions jointly take the mortgage, is no doubt there for some special reason. This I do not know, but I should be inclined to think, and it will undoubtedly be discussed in committee, that the mortgage companies would be willing to do it.

The hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) spoke of building for the ordinary workman. In the city the workman has to move from time to time to the place where his work is, and from the evidence given before the committee it does not seem wise for the ordinary unskilled workman to own his own home. It is far better for him to have some security, whereby he will have ready money in the event of his having to move, than for him to tie himself up with a house.

I should like to say a word about the work of the committee. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) referred to the chairman. This report is not the chairman's report. We had one of the best committees that could be picked from this house. They worked well together; a stranger, if he were in the committee at any time, could not tell which side of the house any one of the members belonged to. There was an honest endeavour to ascertain the facts and to find some solution, and I think if the members will read and study the report, considering the time we had, the evidence we could get and the very limited information at our disposal, they will realize that it is an excellent report.

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario): I shall not detain the house very long, but I have two or three observations to make which it seems to me have escaped the attention of the house. I disagree with the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) as to the parentage of this bill. Apparently it is another piece of legislation borrowed from a foreign country, and this time borrowed from the United States. It resembles very strangely the wording of the Federal Housing Administration Act of 1934, in which, it will be recalled, the administrator was authorized and empowered to ensure banks, trust companies, finance companies, mortgage companies, building and loan companies and other companies against losses which they might sustain as a result of loans and advances of credit for the purpose of financing alterations, repairs and improvements upon real property to the extent of twenty per cent. That being the situation, it seems to me that we engage in rather idle speculations as to what this bill may do, as to the results of it, when we can put our hands on evidence in the United States as to what similar legislation has actually done.

This year the League of Nations made a survey of the effect of building operations so far as social conditions and the relief of unemployment were concerned, and the United States made a report to the league. This I call to the attention of the house because I cannot help but think our bill will meet the same difficulties. The United States government says in its report:

> Experience has unfortunately shown that many of the private housing projects submitted were conceived rather as means of utilizing unsuccessful land subdivisions controlled by the applicants than as means of meeting a definite need for low cost housing.

The report is there. It seems to me that the government should give us that report in detail. I shall not detain the house by reading it, but I would like to point out another difficulty, and that is that the United States government found land values were so high in the very places where houses were needed that the scheme was impracticable. These are two things that apparently our government has not considered or made provision against.

We all believe that people should have houses. I agree with the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Ganong) that it is unfortunate if a man has not his own house, but this bill is not designed to give houses to people that do not have them. If we are spending federal money for that purpose, surely we should spend it on the basis of need, not on the basis of whether the thing is good business or not. We were told by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley) this afternoon that there are some $75,000,000 available for loans for house building. That money is not lent simply because in the minds of those who lend money for that purpose it is not good business. Therefore this is not a business proposition. Since we are granting federal money, the expenditure should be based on need. The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) this afternoon pointed out that a man had to have $500 or $600 before he could take advantage of this legislation. I do not know whether any members of parliament are going to take advantage of it, but I would consider that very few of them were in a position to do so. Any man who has $500 or $600 can in my opinion make an arrangement to secure a house without government assistance.

If the money is not granted on the basis of need; if it is not invested as good business; if, as has been pointed out, even the federal treasury is limited in the resources which it possesses, then it seems to me that the money should be conserved for purposes which the individual cannot attain for himself. I am going to make the suggestion that we should have a building program and that the government should assist it, but not so far as houses are concerned. I believe there is something far more important. We have in this country large village populations that are absolutely without waterworks and without sanitary conveniences. We have adjoining all of our industrial cities, what shall I call them?—shack towns. The hon. member for East Calgary, who is now in the chair, referred to this bill as a social measure, as having social consequences. He referred to the danger of fire. He referred to the needs of the people. Now, these people are not in a position to look after their own collective needs; the municipalities in which they live are not in that position, and I would strongly suggest that if this government is to take action, if it is to assist building, then it should assist in the provision of the collective needs which the individual cannot provide for himself. After it has discharged its collective function, if there is any money left over, it might very well turn to private house building.

As I have said, I am always interested in what the hon. member for Charlotte has to say, but I do not read the British experience so far as unemployment is concerned in the same light. From the publication of the League of Nations to which I have just referred, I should like to quote—and this is a very recent publication—the experience as set down by the British government. Let me call the hon. member's attention to the concluding paragraph:

> Experience in recent years in this country has shown that the stimulation of special works selected primarily in respect of their employment providing capacity has an effect on the employment position which is small relative to the heavy expenditure incurred, and the works, when completed, leave burdens on national and local finances which impede the recovery of normal activity.

This is the paragraph to which I would call special attention:

> His Majesty's government have on a number of occasions stated their view that the expansion of normal activity will most surely and rapidly be brought about by the creation of confidence by steady policy——in particular, financial confidence by a balanced budget, the lowering of rates of interest with resultant cheap and plentiful capital, and in so far as government action is possible, by the creation of facilities for and the removal of hindrances to trade.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I was not a member of the special committee on housing, but I desire to make a few remarks, and, like the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Moore, Ontario), I might make a suggestion. This bill is designed to assist the small wage earners, particularly in our cities and towns, who are unable to provide homes for themselves. The purpose is a very laudable one. But in our towns and villages to-day you can buy houses for fifty per cent of what it would cost to build them. Why? Because people are fast losing their equity in their homes and will sell them even at a sacrifice price while they can get a little out of them for themselves. In many cases the buildings are getting out of repair; taxes are an important factor, and that situation is not being helped by such measures as are proposed in this bill and some others that have been brought before this house. Therefore I say that some consideration must be given to the man who is to-day holding on to his property, struggling to save it, keeping his taxes paid and his interest, if he has any, and other charges.

I was interested in reading the report of the committee, and I noticed in it one clause which suggested that something be done in regard to repairs. This bill provides that loans are to be made for the purpose of constructing houses. Paragraph (b) of subsection 2 of section 4 provides that not exceeding twenty per cent of the cost may be advanced by the government, the expectation being that sixty per cent will be advanced by lending institutions, the applicant himself making up the remaining twenty per cent. That simply means, as has been said, that there will be no money advanced, because the mortgage companies will not lend sixty per cent of the appraised value with only eighty per cent security behind it. At present you cannot get them to lend fifty per cent with one hundred per cent of the value of the property behind it.

I am sorry that this bill does not contain anything to carry out the suggestion made by the committee in regard to repairs. In the part of the country from which I come there are plenty of houses, but unfortunately they are getting very much out of repair. If the government could devise some scheme under which small loans could be made to the owners of property for the purposes of repairs, at a low rate of interest or at no interest—because we are giving out enormous sums of money without interest, such as the million dollars for the tunnel in Toronto—an immense impetus would be given to business. To-day if a building goes out of repair it is allowed to remain so; if a door is off the hinges they do not buy new hinges and repair it. We read in the papers of houses being burnt simply because the chimney was out of repair. The people cannot afford to make these repairs. In my community the trades hardest hit by unemployment are carpenters, masons and painters, and the businesses suffering most are hardware and lumber. If a small part of this money were set aside for small loans for repairs at a very low rate of interest, the painting and repairing which would be done would give a great deal of employment to those who need it in the building trades and would also help the hardware business and the lumber industry, which are in sore need.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I was not a member of the housing committee but I took a good deal of interest in its deliberations and report. I am thoroughly in accord with the principle of a housing scheme; I am only sorry that the scheme that has been brought down by the government does not meet the situation at all. The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Stanley), who is now acting Speaker, said this afternoon that in this bill the government were implementing a housing scheme, and I quite agree with him. But I am afraid that there is very little in the bill to help the low wage earner, and I contend that the first principle of this bill should be something to assist the wage earner, especially the low wage earner, in building and owning a house for himself and his family. Apparently there is conflict among members on the government side in regard to the provisions of this bill, because we had it from the acting Prime Minister (Sir George Perley) this afternoon that the bill was primarily for the assistance of the low wage earner, and we heard from the chairman of the committee (Mr. Ganong) that it was the intention of the committee and in its report it had in view the giving of assistance to the low wage earner in building a house. But if I heard aright the remarks of the chairman of the committee —and if I am wrong I shall be glad to be corrected—I understood him to say he did not agree with the minister who introduced the bill; that it offered very little by way of assistance to the low wage earner. Am I right in that?

Mr. GANONG: What I tried to say was that the bill is exactly as is stated on the face of it. It is an act to assist the construction of houses, but that does not necessarily mean houses for low wage earners.

Mr. SANDERSON: Then I still think what I have in mind is correct, namely, that the bill offers no relief to the low wage earner who may wish to build a home.

I consider this one of the most important measures of social legislation the government has brought down this session. If it were a measure so framed as to help the working people of Canada its effect would be far reaching. But the bill before us gives no relief to the unemployed; it gives no relief to the employed man working at low wages and very little relief to any person receiving a salary and desiring assistance in the building of a house. The purpose behind a bill such as this should first of all be that of giving some measure of relief to the unemployed. I have no desire to be critical of the government, but it does appear to me that this bill came in on crutches, so far as the possibility of its helping that for which it was designed is concerned. There is nothing in the bill which would help the common people, the workers or the labourers desiring to build houses. The right hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) stated when introducing the bill that the government was introducing a measure to help the poor man. Well, if the right hon. gentleman thinks this bill will help the low wage earner or the poor man, I am afraid he knows very little about the problems the poor people of Canada are facing. Again I say I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am heartily in support of and in sympathy with any measure brought down by this or any other government to give relief to the poor people of Canada facing the housing problem. It appears to me that if the government wanted to give assistance through a housing scheme it should have brought the legislation down earlier in the session, and not in the dying days of a dying parliament, when there is not very much life left in the government—and there will be very much less life left in it after they have appealed to the people. Had they brought the legislation down in 1930, 1931 or 1932, it might have been of some use. They have forgotten that the great majority of Canadian working people have found it very difficult even to keep roofs over their heads. Not only that, but the government have forgotten that the ordinary wage earner has not been able to get enough work to earn the money to pay rent. They have forgotten that in certain parts of Canada today there are more vacant houses than there have ever been in our history. Yet the government come in at this late hour of the session with a half-baked scheme—because that is what it is —to build houses for people who cannot afford to build their own.

Let us turn to some of the provisions indicating the assistance the borrower would get under the scheme. If he can get a loan company to put up sixty per cent of the amount he wishes to borrow, a borrower will have against him a mortgage to the extent of eighty per cent of the value of his property.

I doubt very much, however, whether any loan or insurance companies in Canada would advance much money under the bill as it now stands. From what I know of the history of insurance companies I do not believe they would lend much money under a measure containing the restrictions which are found in the measure before us. Within the last two weeks representations were made to a committee by the life insurance companies to the effect that they did not want any reduction in the rate of interest on money they had loaned to their policyholders. I do not intend to discuss that point, but I must say that if the life insurance companies have money to lend to their own policyholders, the best asset they have, not very much money would come out of their vaults to be advanced as loans under this measure.

The borrower is handicapped before he starts. He must arrange with either a loan company or an insurance company for a loan up to sixty per cent of the value of the land and building. Then the government will come in and lend twenty per cent, placing him in the position of starting out with a mortgage of eighty per cent. If he has it, he puts up the balance. How many wage earners in Canada, men receiving $550, $1,200, $1,250 or $1,500 a year, can put up twenty per cent of the amount they want to borrow? Very few. They have not that much money because they have not been able to earn it. I can readily understand that if some scheme were worked out under which a large number of houses could be built, mechanics, carpenters, bricklayers, plasterers, plumbers and labourers of other kinds would receive a great deal of work. That is one of the best features of the bill. But that work will not be given, because the restrictions are such that people wanting to borrow money will not find it available.

I suggest that the government withdraw this bill, give the matter further consideration and place before us a bill upon which we could be unanimous. I do not believe there is an hon. member who is not in full accord and sympathy with and anxious to support a housing scheme that is a housing scheme. But a bill of this kind is nothing more than a pretence, nothing more than a sham. If the bill passes and becomes law, while I will not go as far as my hon. friend from East Hamilton and say that not one house will be built under it, I predict that the number built will be very few. What we want is an act that will help the situation and assist in the building of houses, but the government have missed the point in every way.

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I desire to occupy just a few minutes of the time of the house to take part in the discussion of this bill to assist in the construction of houses. I have not had the opportunity this afternoon of listening to all the speakers who have participated in the debate, but so far as the importance of the subject is concerned I think there is no question about it. As a matter of fact when the government took upon itself the duty of appointing a special committee of the house to investigate housing conditions in Canada, that in itself was proof that the government was at least taking an interest in a new problem, a problem in which a great deal of interest has been taken in the republic across the border, in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe. As their housing problems have developed and as they have approached them and to some extent solved them, interest in the problem has spread to Canada, and the fact that the government appointed a committee of the house to investigate housing conditions in this dominion was a forward step, a step in the right direction. We may say that it is a small beginning, but after all, small beginnings sometimes bring forth large results. As I was a member of that committee I thought I would make a few remarks on the bill and also on the work of the committee.

The committee held quite a number of meetings and considerable evidence was adduced. I think it was the general opinion of the committee, of the chairman, whom I was pleased to hear speak this afternoon, and of every member of the committee, that we did not have time enough to investigate this problem in all its ramifications. The feeling of every member of the committee was that the investigation as far as that special committee of the house was concerned had just started, that its work was by no means consummated, that a great deal of ground had not been touched at all, that there was a great deal of investigation still to be undertaken which should be dealt with by a standing or special committee of this house on some future occasion. That means what? It means that although it was a hopeful sign that the government appointed the committee, as it is also a hopeful sign that hon. members of the house are taking a great deal of interest in the question, yet we do not thoroughly know all the ground that ought to be known, and I do not think any person can successfully argue against that position. A few years ago the house was investigating the question of insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity, and when the investigation had been completed and the report of the committee accepted by the house we found that the provinces lagged behind. We passed on the report to the provinces and the provinces took no interest in the question. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this report of the housing committee ought to be passed on to every provincial government in Canada; their reactions to it ought to be got, and after that the dominion government will know better where it stands in respect to the question. Combined action as far as possible is very desirable.

There is no question about the importance of the problem. I believe we all recognize that. But so far as the municipalities and the provinces are concerned, and even the dominion government itself in a large way, we do not know much about just what ought to be done or precisely what is required to be done. The government has simply made a start on the problem of housing. That is all. The amount involved does not amount to much. I agree with the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) and the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) and some other speakers that from the standpoint of the ten million dollars involved the bill does not go very far, and therefore if we test the sincerity of the government and its objective by the amount of money it intends to vote to make a start on this thing, there is no doubt that the conclusion is discouraging. It is no wonder that some hon. members who have spoken have taken the ground that the government should have given the question more consideration, should have come forward with perhaps a more constructive and encouraging bill and should have started, as it were, on larger ground to build an edifice so far as housing is concerned that would have been a credit and honour to the dominion. I believe the government could have done much better than it has done in the introduction of this bill.

The discussion that I have heard in the house so far has largely been concerned with urban housing, with the building of houses for the low paid wage earner in the metropolitan centres of Canada, in the industrial centres which have been built up largely by protection in Canada. It is admitted that their housing conditions are poor and that the time has come for constructive action, and the tendency of the argument during this debate has been that this bill applies in the main to the large industrial centres and to the low paid industrial workers. But as a member representing a great rural riding in western Canada I am not going to take that point of view. I am going to take a larger view. There is certainly room for the expenditure of money on housing in Winnipeg, in Vancouver, in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, in Halifax and other centres, but I am bound to say that if that is the conception the government has of housing, its housing program will not amount to much as far as solving the housing problem in this country is concerned. We must take a larger view, and that larger view takes in the housing accommodation of the hundreds of thousands of farmers in the western provinces, in Alberta, in Saskatchewan, in Manitoba—that is in the great middle west. The housing accommodation of these poor farmers who have been up against high protection for the last thirty or forty years, paying very dearly for everything they have to buy and getting very little for what they have to sell, is deplorable. They cannot build houses, and so numbers of them are living in shacks, many of them in hovels. If this housing program does not touch these people at all, then as Bright says: We have yet to learn the art of government, yet to learn how by legislating to bring happiness and joy into the homes of the poor people whether in the rural areas or the cities and towns. But the bill does not say very much about improving the housing coanditions in the rural areas, and since I come from a great rural area that is fast developing, I maintain that these rural areas ought to be included in this housing program and ought to be put on a parity at least with the industrial centres of this dominion. If this were the intention of the government I believe there would be a larger amount mentioned in the bill; there is no doubt about it.

This problem should be investigated thoroughly and that is going to take time. The question arises as to what body will do this investigating. I believe the members of the committee were of the opinion that a special housing committee would be established for this purpose, but I notice that the bill provides that the economic council, commonly known as the "brain trust," is to be entrusted with the investigation of this important problem. This brain trust is made up of heads of departments of government residing in Ottawa, and if these departmental heads are to undertake the complete investigation of this matter they will have to change themselves into a perambulating body. They will have to go out into the west and through the rural areas to see how the people are living and why they cannot build better homes. If they do they will conclude that economic and industrial conditions are against these people, that they make it impossible for them to improve their living conditions. The very foundation of this housing problem is the reconstruction of our economic and industrial life and until we take some action in that respect I am afraid the government will never come forward with sufficient money to make housing conditions in the rural and urban areas what they ought to be. I again stress the importance of getting all the available facts. It may be necessary to enlarge the membership of the economic council or to establish a real housing body to investigate this problem in all its details. In that way a report which means something more truly national can be obtained and the government of Canada, backed by the required public opinion developed from year to year, can—with the cooperation of provinces, municipalities and various lending and building corporations—put into effect a housing program eminently worth while.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the speeches made by hon. members on both sides of the house in connection with this very important question. I think my hon. friends opposite are entitled to considerable sympathy because of the position in which they find themselves with regard to this bill. They take the position that there is nothing in it but at the same time they are prepared to support it. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. McIntosh) says in one breath that we are doing nothing and in the next breath that it does not amount to much. According to his argument we are doing what he wishes us to do—nothing. Look at the position in which the Liberal party finds itself.

Mr. SANDERSON: What about the position in which the government finds itself?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We have been criticized to-night by several hon. members on the other side.

Mr. McINTOSH: I admitted that you had made a start.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I take it that the hon. member is prepared to support the bill. Why did not hon. gentlemen opposite bring this in several years ago? This government has had the courage to bring in such a bill and we must be given credit for that. Although my hon. friends opposite were in power for years they never thought of bringing in a bill of this kind.

Mr. GRAY: Everybody had a house then.

Mr. McINTOSH: There were good times.

Mr. SANDERSON: The times were prosperous then.

Mr. EULER: Is this not really the bill of the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Church)? He introduced a resolution in this connection.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. member for East Toronto raised the question.

Mr. EULER: And not the government.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: A committee was appointed but we have implemented the recommendations of that committee with legislation, and our action has been criticized on the other side. There is not an hon. member who has said he will not support the bill.

Mr. GRAY: It has been criticized on your side.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I stated that at any rate we were making a beginning in tackling this problem. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) has said that we ought to investigate this matter further before doing anything, but that is provided for in the bill. We are doing all that he wishes us to do and we are making a beginning with a scheme to provide new houses in this country.

Mr. EULER: It will not provide any.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) says that the insurance and loan companies will not lend any money under this scheme, but I may say to him that private conversations have been held between officials of the government and representatives of some of these companies and they would show the hon. gentleman to be entirely mistaken in his opinion.

Mr. EULER: I shall be very much surprised if any houses are built.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so, but that will not be the first time the hon. gentleman has been surprised.

Mr. McINTOSH: Not at this government; there is a surprise every day.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) stated that the city of Winnipeg or any other city could not take advantage of this scheme. It would be quite simple after eighty per cent had been provided by other sources for a municipality to make arrangements for the other twenty per cent in order to take advantage of the bill. The hon. member for West Lambton suggests that the bill is of doubtful validity, but I do not think he was in earnest when he made that statement. Apparently he was trying to tie it up to the arguments made by the opposition in connection with other bills which we have brought down this session. In order to fortify his argument he quoted the words, "subject to the jurisdiction of parliament" which appear in the bill, but that was hardly fair. Those words were put in to show that we gave authority to any company under the jurisdiction of parliament to lend a larger amount of money than it previously had authority to do.

Mr. GRAY: I pointed out that there were only two under federal jurisdiction.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so, but it was necessary that those words should appear in the bill. We would not attempt to give authority to any provincial company such as we would give to a company under the jurisdiction of parliament.

Mr. EULER: You could not anyway.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so, but the hon. gentleman is hardly fair in commenting on those words and suggesting that the bill is of doubtful validity. I am sure he does not think that for one minute. After the house rose this afternoon I was rather interested in looking over a copy of Punch.

Mr. EULER: This is a joke, is it?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I listened to so much serious talk this afternoon that I thought I would enjoy something of that nature.

Mr. ELLIOTT: That is not where the hon. member got the bill, is it?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I propose to give the bill a little punch from this side.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It can stand it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: A lot of the criticism to-night has been on the ground that we were not going far enough and that this matter should have further consideration. We are going to give the problem further consideration but we hope we are starting a scheme which will be very beneficial. We are making a start and we hope that the matter will be given further consideration by the economic council and also by parliament when it resumes its sittings. I noticed the other day that there was a long discussion in the British house with regard to housing, Mr. Geoffrey Shakespeare being in charge of the bill. He detailed the achievements of his department, which included a large rehousing scheme. Mr. Greenwood, who had brought in the first housing scheme, was there at the time and expressed the view that the old bill was a far better one. When I come back twenty years from now and see my hon. friend from West Middlesex here in the house, with a new housing scheme going a great deal further, and when I listen to him, I shall probably say, as this gentleman did, "I think the bill we brought in years ago was a far better one." This is not a simple question and must be considerd quietly and slowly. As the years go by progress will be made in the direction of better housing facilities in this country.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Smith (Cumberland) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HEAPS: In introducing the bill the minister gave certain information. In view of what he has said I think the committee is entitled to more information than he gave a few minutes ago. He referred to certain conversations with several of the mortgage companies, who were prepared to lend money under the existing terms. I had that impression from the minister, but if I am wrong I want to be corrected.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What I intended to say and hope I did say was that there had been conversations between representatives of some of the insurance and loan companies and officials of the department with regard to the possibility of making arrangements under this bill as it reads. But there has not yet been any definite arrangement.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like the minister to give some idea of those conversations, because the impression has been given the house, and I am under that impression, that the ordinary lending companies will not be prepared to lend money under the bill unless the government gives some assistance. I would therefore ask the minister to give whatever information he can in that regard.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is all the information I have; no record was taken of the conversations.

Mr. HEAPS: Under a section which we shall reach later, and which is the crux of the bill so far as the government is concerned, it is suggested that the government will lend twenty per cent of the value of houses. Will the minister give us an idea as to the terms under which that twenty per cent will be lent?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Does the hon. member mean the rate of interest?

Mr. HEAPS: I mean the whole question; there is more than the rate of interest to be considered. What losses is the government prepared to accept, and what will be the rate of interest?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This matter is left with the Minister of Finance to make an arrangement afterwards with respect to agreements with the loan companies or trust companies and the method by which the whole plan will be carried out. We have no definite suggestions to make at the present time, but every care will be taken by the government and the Minister of Finance to see that the conditions are made as favourable as possible and the rate of interest will be kept as low as it can be.

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. HEAPS: That is not an illuminating answer; it is not satisfactory. However, I will discuss the question when we come to the appropriate section. We are now discussing section 1, which declares this to be the Dominion Housing Act. There are certain features which I would ask the minister to explain: first, the relationship between the bill itself and the recommendations made by the committee that considered this question of housing. In the report submitted by the committee certain recommendations were made with respect to rehabilitation in both rural and urban centres. In this bill I believe there is no provision for the problem of rehabilitation in rural or urban centres. That question has been totally eliminated.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The committee made many recommendations, and we have been told by several speakers to-day that we have not enough information on which to base a bill. We have been told that we should wait. My hon. friends opposite—several of them—though they did not go so far as to say that they would not vote for the bill, practically said that it ought to be withdrawn pending further information. This bill goes as far as the government feels it can go at the present time in carrying out the recommendations of the committee. If the hon. gentleman will read section 3 he will see that the economic council is to be asked to go into all these problems further and make a report as soon as possible. But there is nothing in the bill with respect to rehabilitation, though the question will be given consideration by the economic council when they are going into the various problems connected with housing.

Mr. HEAPS: That is, of course, one way of partially shelving the problem. In this house we have a faculty which is known as speaking in a political sense, and when members of a political party requested that this matter be shelved or that further consideration be given it, I do not know whether they were serious, because in the same breath they asked for a more comprehensive measure than is contained in this bill. I have not suggested that this problem should be shelved; I have asked that the government proceed with a comprehensive scheme of housing wherever practicable. I have in mind my own city of Winnipeg where for quite a long time the city council has had a committee working on a scheme of housing, and they are ready to proceed with it if it can be financed on a basis of low interest. Under the terms of the bill as it is now before the committee, I am afraid the city of Winnipeg could not proceed with a housing scheme copies of which have at different times been submitted to the present government. I am very anxious, for two reasons, to see Winnipeg proceed with a housing scheme: first of all, because of the necessity of a certain number of low rental houses or cheaper houses, and second, for the purpose of in some way providing employment for members of the building trades who for years have been out of employment. In spite of what the right hon. gentleman stated to the house a few moments ago, Winnipeg will not be able to proceed with a housing scheme, because, according to the terms of the bill, that city, even though it is a municipal body, could obtain only twenty per cent from the federal government and the balance of the money would have to be obtained from other sources. If that city went to a loan company, we are informed that those loan companies cannot lend funds at less than five and a half or six per cent. I think the right hon. gentleman must know as well as other members of the committee do, that there can be no successful scheme of housing in Canada at the present time on a six per cent basis; it cannot be done.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: We are hoping that it will be possible to arrange that the average rate for a loan of this kind will be as low as five per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: Will the minister state how he arrives at that basis of five per cent?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I must ask the committee to bear with me; I am not making any definite statement as to what is to be done, because it will have to be worked out first by the Minister of Finance. But I would say this to the hon. gentleman: What we are hoping is that if we can manage to get money from the insurance or loan companies at five and a half per cent or perhaps less, the money advanced by the dominion will be at a rate that will make the average rate about five per cent; that is what we are hoping to do. I am of course unable to go into these figures definitely this evening.

Mr. HEAPS: As has been pointed out to-night, any housing scheme in order to be successful must be based upon a low interest rate, and unless we can get the rates down to as low as even three per cent, there is no possibility of any housing scheme being a success. According to what the right hon. gentleman has stated, the loan companies will lend money at five and a half per cent and the government will lend money at four per cent, so that sixty per cent of the funds will be provided on a basis of five and a half per cent and twenty per cent on a basis of four per cent.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman is working out a plan on a basis which he does not understand and on which I am unable to give him definite figures. The companies may be able to lend money at a lower rate. I must ask him not to expect me to put on record this evening definite figures with regard to this matter. I am piloting this bill through for the Minister of Finance and I am trying to give the hon. gentleman all the information I can. I can assure him that if the city of Winnipeg wishes to proceed with a scheme such as he has outlined, the Minister of Finance will be very glad to talk the matter over and see if some arrangements cannot be made regarding it.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not see why Winnipeg as a municipal body should have to go to a private loan company to obtain its funds. If it is good business for a private loan company to lend the city of Winnipeg money at five per cent, there is no reason in the world why the same security should not be equally good to the government so that the city could get its money at cost from the government. That is where my objection comes in.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman must remember that this government has advanced a great deal of money to the Manitoba government for the city of Winnipeg. We have a plan under contemplation now in regard to the sewage of Winnipeg whereby we would advance further sums of money through the Manitoba government to that city. The resources of the dominion government are not unlimited, and the idea that we have in mind is to get as large a number of houses built in this country as we can without leaning too heavily on the federal exchequer.

Mr. HEAPS: A couple of years ago the government undertook a system of federal works across the dominion and issued $40,000,000 worth of new currency to finance them. I think at that time it was stated from some source—if I am wrong I am subject to correction—the government were entitled to issue new currency to the extent of $100,000,000, of which an amount of $40,000,000 has been issued. If that is so and if the government are still in a position where they can issue $60,000,000 in new currency against the present gold coverage, is there any reason why that extra money could not be issued and a proper scheme of housing financed from such a new issue?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, I think I would prefer not to get into a discussion about currency or matters of that kind this evening.

Mr. HEAPS: It is very vital to this bill. I do not like to press the question too hard; I claim to know very little about the currency question, and it is only because this statement was made in the house, I believe by one of the responsible ministers, that the government were entitled to issue all this new currency and only a small proportion of it had been issued, that I ask the question. If it were entitled to issue the balance, then the municipal and provincial authorities would not have to lean very heavily on the resources of the federal government because the resources are there. The government might as well use the resources they have at hand, and they could use them for no better purpose than to finance a federal housing scheme.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. COOTE: Would the minister explain what sort of lending institutions are contemplated under this bill?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Paragraph (e) reads:

"Lending institution" means a loan, insurance or other company authorized to lend money on the security of real or immovable property.

Mr. COOTE: Has the government discussed this matter with the companies in question? Has it reason to believe companies now in existence will enter into this scheme and make loans for the construction of houses contemplated under this measure, or does the government anticipate that some new type of company will be set up to operate under this bill?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have already explained to the hon. member for North Winnipeg that there have been private conversations between representatives of some of the existing loan companies and officials of the Department of Finance in regard to this question. We certainly expect that it will be possible to make suitable arrangements with them under this bill.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. SPENCER: Have the insurance and loan companies been consulted with regard to the bill, and are they satisfied with its terms?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I believe the companies were not consulted beforehand regarding this bill. The bill was prepared by the government. But there have been private conversations in regard to the carrying out of the terms laid down for these loans, and we anticipate that it will be possible to finance the scheme under this plan.

Mr. MITCHELL: Did these loan companies make any representations to the government in anticipation of this legislation?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As far as I know they did not approach the government regarding the matter, but Mr. Leonard, a representative of the companies, appeared before the housing committee.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then the government is not sure that the loan companies are going to cooperate at all?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Well, I have stated three times—

Mr. MITCHELL: I may be a little dense. I asked whether they had made any representations to the government; the minister said, no. I imagine this was not drawn out of a clear sky; there must have been some understanding.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understood the hon. member to ask whether they had made any representations in regard to this legislation before it was prepared. I said that as far as I know they did not, but since the bill was prepared there have been conversations between representatives of the insurance and loan companies and officials of the Department of Finance in regard to carrying out this clause of the bill relating to provision of the money, and we have every reason to believe that housing can be financed in this way.

Mr. MITCHELL: The government must have taken a big chance in drawing a bill up in anticipation, not knowing whether the people it is intended to benefit are going to cooperate with them. When a bill is being drawn it is generally understood that interested parties make representations to the government, and I imagine the government generally gets some assurance, particularly with a bill of this kind, that the people concerned are going to adopt the policy contemplated; if not, the whole thing falls to the ground.

Mr. HEAPS: Subsection (e) of clause 2 defines a lending institution, and states that it means a loan, insurance or other company authorized to lend money on the security of real or immovable property. Is it the intention to confine it to the lending institutions named in this subsection?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Any company authorized to lend money on the security of real estate. This will be real estate.

Mr. HEAPS: Suppose a municipality wishes to build under a housing scheme and does not go to a loan company for its funds but obtains money from some other source at a lower rate, would they come under the terms of this bill?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If a municipality wished to go into business of that kind they would probably incorporate a company for the purpose.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not quite hear what the minister said. What I am trying to find out is this: suppose a municipality, say the city of Ottawa, wanted to go into a housing scheme, and were able to obtain the necessary sixty per cent from sources which would give better terms than a lending institution—for instance, it might issue its own bonds at four per cent. Is the city able to go to the government for the twenty per cent or would it be contravening the terms of the bill if they went outside of the loan companies to obtain those funds?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is no power to deal directly with municipalities under this bill. If the hon. gentleman has any suggestion to make I shall be glad to listen to it.

Mr. HEAPS: If the city of Ottawa wished to go into a housing scheme and wanted to take advantage of the twenty per cent provided by the government under this bill, would the municipality be compelled to go to a lending institution as defined in this bill for sixty per cent of the money?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The municipality could incorporate a company the bonds of which they would guarantee, and provide the sixty per cent through that company.

Mr. HEAPS: But suppose the municipality wanted to do it as a municipality and to obtain the sixty per cent by the issue of bonds. What I am trying to find out is whether in that case the government would provide the twenty per cent as in the case of ordinary loan companies, or is the municipality compelled to go to a loan company?

92582—250½

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have answered that there is no power under this bill to deal directly with the municipality.

Mr. HEAPS: Should not a municipality be on an equality with these private corporations? I think it is most unfair that a municipality which might wish to go into a building scheme as a municipal enterprise should be practically barred from the benefit of the bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The ordinary and usual way is for a municipality to form a corporation for such a purpose and to guarantee its bonds. In that way the city accomplishes all the purposes the hon. gentleman has in mind.

Mr. PECK: I want to bring that same question up when we come to consider clause 4.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Fourth report of the select standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Stinson.

PENSION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I would like if possible to get the resolution standing on the order paper in my name advanced into committee to-day. The bill founded on the resolution is very short and it has the single purpose of extending for one year the appointment of a judge as acting chairman of the commission.

Mr. SPEAKER: with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to extend for one year the provisions of the act to amend the Pension Act, chapter 58 of the statutes of 1934, respecting the appointment of a judge as acting chairman of the commission.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, as you are aware the Pension Act was amended at the last session of parliament to provide that if the chairmanship of the board of pension commissioners became vacant it would be possible to appoint a judge of the superior court of any province of Canada to occupy that position for a period not exceeding one year. That year is up on August 1 next, and the government would like if possible to have the present holder of that office, Mr. Justice Taylor, continue for another year if it can be arranged without trouble to the court to which he belongs in Manitoba. That is the sole intent of the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I would like to support the resolution of the minister and I would take this opportunity of saying that I think Mr. Justice Taylor has rendered very wonderful service during the past year.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Sutherland thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 119, to amend the Pension Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

HOURS OF LABOUR

INQUIRY OF MINISTRY CONCERNING ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN DELEGATION AT INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, I see a dispatch from Geneva in the American press to the effect that the forty-hour week principle has been voted by the international labour conference by a majority of six, and that the delegates of the governments of Great Britain and the British dominions, with the exception of the Irish Free State, abstained from voting. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not this is so, and if so whether they have taken that stand under the instructions of the government.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I explained a few days ago in answer, I believe, to a question of the hon. member himself that we did instruct our delegates that we had now proceeded to give effect to the convention ratified some time ago, registration of which ratification had taken place at the time, and that we thought it undesirable at the moment to take any part in the further discussion of lessening hours of labour in view of the position that had been taken with respect to the existing convention. That is, if the position which we took is sound in connection with the convention itself and it is intended, as was suggested during the progress of the debate, that it might be determined judicially, it was desirable that we should abstain from voting until such time as an opportunity had been afforded to enable that matter to be determined.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is an admission that we are not sure.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is hardly correct. The hon. member is a lawyer; it is hardly to be said that because a case is litigated both sides are certain.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Very well.

DOMINION HOUSING ACT

PROVISION FOR LOANS BY GOVERNMENT AND LENDING INSTITUTIONS UP TO EIGHTY PER CENT OF COST OF CONSTRUCTION

The house resumed from Monday, June 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 112, to assist the construction of houses—Sir George Perley (for the Minister of Finance)—Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, last night just prior to adjournment the right hon. gentleman in charge of the bill, at least to my way of thinking, was unable to give a satisfactory answer to certain questions I put to him in connection with what is looked upon in the bill as a lending institution. I have certain objections to this clause. I object to it because it puts elected bodies, provincial and municipal, in a position inferior to that held by financial institutions. According to this bill if they wish to take advantage of the funds the government is providing and which, in my estimation are very meagre, then these publicly elected bodies will ultimately be compelled to go to lending institutions before proceeding with a housing scheme.

Last night the right hon. gentleman could not satisfy my questions in this connection. I feel that our city councils and municipal and provincial governments under the terms of the bill before us will be compelled to go to these lending institutions before they will be able to receive the funds provided by the federal government. I wonder if the minister has considered that aspect of the matter, and if he is prepared to modify the attitude of the government concerning that particular clause of the bill?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have nothing to add to what I said last night.

Mr. NEILL: Would not the objections of the hon. member for North Winnipeg be met if subsection 1 of section 4 were amended to read as follows:

(1) The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into a contract with an approved lending institution or local authority.

I have added the words "or local authority." Under section 2, which is now under discussion, "local authority" is defined as "any province, municipality, society, association or corporation" and so on. I believe that would meet the objection of the hon. member. The local authority would then have the same opportunity to lend money as is now afforded under subsection (e) of section 2.

Mr. COOTE: I believe the suggestion offered by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is a very sensible one, and I cannot understand why "local authority" under paragraph (f) is meant to include a province or municipality unless it is intended that under this measure a municipality might have the same rights as a mortgage or loan company. I believe the minister might very well take that point into consideration.

While on my feet I should like to put another question to the minister. I find that paragraph (d) of section 2 is as follows:

(d) "Housing scheme" means a scheme for the construction of houses and their occupation by tenants or purchasers.

Will that limit the scheme to the construction of new houses? In other words, under the measure will rehabilitation of present buildings be possible?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I regret to say that there is no provision in this bill for rehabilitation.

Mr. COOTE: No provision for rehabilitation? Then I should like to suggest to the government that before the bill is passed a section be inserted to make such rehabilitation possible. I believe a great deal of employment could be given through rehabilitation, and if such work were permitted under this section the other provisions in the bill are wide enough to allow it to be done. I hope the bill as finally passed will not shut out the rehabilitation of present dwellings. That is one thing that is very necessary and which should be made possible, if we are to pass this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe there is logic in the point raised by the hon. members for Comox-Alberni and North Winnipeg. I think it is fair to say that one of the major driving forces behind the bill was the report of the Lieutenant Governor of Ontario respecting slum conditions in Toronto and also the report on the contemplated policy of the civic government of Montreal in connection with slum clearance in that metropolitan centre. Considering the ability of the municipal organizations to borrow money at rates even lower than private companies can, I feel that every opportunity should be given them to avail themselves of this bill in the elimination of slum conditions in the urban centres of Canada. The insertion of the words "or local authority" would at least convey to the municipalities the idea that this bill was intended to meet the very pressing problem that confronts them at the moment in connection with slum clearance.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Section 3 of the bill provides that the economic council shall go into all these matters most carefully; there are five different subsections. Among other questions the problem of slum clearance is indicated. I agree with the hon. gentleman that this is one of the most important questions involved in the housing scheme, but I would point out that my hon. friends opposite last night argued very strongly against our proceeding with the bill at all until the economic council had reported under section 3. We propose to have this question thoroughly investigated right away by the economic council, and in the meantime we have brought forward this moderate plan for giving assistance in the building of new houses. That is why we have not set up any authority to deal with this plan but are leaving it to the Minister of Finance to make arrangements with the loan and insurance companies to carry it out.

Mr. MITCHELL: Notwithstanding the fact that I criticized the bill, I do not agree with some members who have said that it should not be gone on with, because in my judgment the most important thing about it is the establishment of a principle, the recognition of responsibility on the part of the federal government in matters of this kind. I still think, however, that the government would be well advised to leave the thing open so as to permit the municipalities to take advantage of the same opportunities as the private loan companies are given under the bill. It would be a distinct advance in view of the fact that they can raise money so much more cheaply. When a working man pays seven per cent on a first mortgage he is licked before he starts. I submit that an opportunity should be given the municipalities. Further, I believe that the best kind of government with respect to legislation of this description is the government that is closest to the people. I would rather see the municipalities undertake such work than have it done by a government at long distance, because as a rule things are watched more closely in the municipality than they are when they are supervised by a government so many miles away.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is the hon. gentleman suggesting that the municipalities should borrow money to put into effect a scheme of this kind, instead of the provision we have made for getting it from the loan companies?

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely. Take the city of Montreal or Toronto: where in the judgment of the municipal council they think that the only way to eliminate slums is by their own initiative, they should not be denied the right of the assistance which this bill offers. They would undertake the work on their own initiative, because the private loan companies will not do it themselves. If we are to wait until the private loan companies eliminate slums in this country we shall wait a very long time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: This bill is not intended primarily to take care of the slum question; I have explained that several times. We wish to have further reports from the economic council before taking up the question of slum areas. But as regards the municipalities going into this building program themselves, what I said last night I still feel, and that is that very few municipalities are in a position to borrow the money necessary to take the place of what we are getting from the loan companies. And if one of them did, all that is necessary for them to do is to form a company for that purpose, which they will control and provide with funds. It is quite simple.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would point out to the minister that practically all the municipalities are prevented from incorporating companies for purposes of that kind, except by special act of the provincial legislature. They cannot do what my right hon. friend suggests.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am not sure that that is not a wise provision. We had a case in Ottawa, and I believe elsewhere, where they started a building program which turned out disastrously.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes. But what my right hon. friend said, if I understood him correctly, was that the municipalities would have a housing company formed.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

Mr. ELLIOTT: But there is no authority under the municipal act in Ontario to do anything like that. The only way it could be done would be by means of a private act.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Quite so.

Mr. HEAPS: There is involved in this question a principle which I hope the right hon. gentleman in charge of the bill appreciates. I do not want to see any of our public-elected bodies in a subservient position in relation to financial institutions, and that is what this bill does. It means that the municipalities and even the provincial bodies, which are solvent in their own right, cannot proceed with a housing scheme under this bill unless they first of all go to the loaning corporations designated in the bill before us. That is what I object to. When we are speaking of the supremacy of parliament and when we are talking about the power of financial institutions, I think it is a most unfortunate time to emphasize such a principle in a bill of this kind. The right hon. gentleman has said that if the bill is allowed to go through as it is the economic council will at some future time investigate the question of slum clearance, and the question of the power which the municipal bodies should have. Assuming that the council did suggest such a thing, as the bill stands now the municipal bodies could not do anything because the act would have to be amended before the elected bodies, either provincial or municipal, could take advantage of the very small percentage which the government is providing. It is true, as the minister is pointing out, that at present our municipalities are not in a position to go into the open market and obtain funds. Assuming that they want to go into the housing scheme, they would have to go to the loan or mortgage companies and obtain the money at 5½ per cent. We are forcing our municipalities to pay 5½ per cent, whereas under more favourable conditions they might go into the open market and get it at 4 per cent. The very basis of any successful housing scheme in any municipality in Canada is that of low interest charges, and unless a municipality or any other body is able to secure funds at a low rate of interest, much below five or five and a half per cent which this bill would compel them to pay, I cannot conceive of any successful housing scheme ever being evolved out of the bill that is now before parliament. That is why I am so anxious in regard to the matter; I wish to see this bill made a success; I do not want to see a bill which is a failure before it goes through the house, and that in my opinion is what this bill is likely to be. It is going to have very little effect upon building in this country.

On the other hand it is quite possible there may be a few houses built under it; there may be a wealthy or fairly wealthy individual who may want to build a $20,000 home. If he wants to do that there is nothing that I know of in this bill that would prevent him from obtaining twenty per cent from the government toward the construction of that home. He could obtain from the federal government $4,000 at four per cent and he might be able to put up $16,000 in cash out of his own pocket. But the poor man who is trying to buy a home on the basis of a low rate of interest is completely barred so long as we have the high interest charges which this bill will foist upon the people of this country, assuming that any houses are built under this scheme.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The hon. gentleman should not assume any case like the one he has cited, that an expensive house would be built under this scheme; there is not the slightest intention of anything of that kind being done. The matter is of course left to the discretion of the Minister of Finance, but the purpose of the bill is to assist the building of smaller houses.

Mr. NEILL: I am sorry the minister has rejected the proposal put forward by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) but as he has done so, I wish to deal with another aspect of the matter. The minister told us a few minutes ago that this bill did not propose to deal with slums. He also told us that it did not propose to deal with repairs. If he goes on explaining much more, we shall need a microscope to see what is left in the bill. He told us last night that the committee had brought in a report and that the government had implemented the recommendations by legislation. I cannot agree with that claim, and I rather agreed with the hon. member for North Winnipeg last night when he said that the relationship of the legislation to the report was no more close than that between pig and pig iron. I thought that was rather plainly and wittily expressed.

During the progress of the price spreads legislation, so to speak, through the house, we were told repeatedly that while legislation was introduced that appeared to be of somewhat doubtful constitutionality, this was done with the deliberate design and intention of complying as far as possible with the recommendations of the commission and that it verged upon the unconstitutional in order to do so; that was the object and determination. This is a case where there is no constitutionality involved, and therefore, if anywhere, we would expect to see the legislation conform very closely to the recommendations, and that is exactly what it has not done in three material points which I shall mention. One is the question which I shall touch on in a moment as regards repairs; the committee were very insistent on that; that was one of their vital recommendations. The second was the question of interest, the necessity of having a low rate of interest. This bill entirely ignores and makes no provision for that. The third was a recommendation by the committee that special attention should be shown in regard to selective tenancy.

This report is a very able one, prepared by able men. Looking at the names, I find them with few exceptions able, outstanding men in this house and they have brought down a unanimous report. In the resolution under which they were acting I find these words:

> To include the construction, reconstruction and repair of urban and rural dwelling houses.

Therefore the very foundation upon which the committee went to work was to have in mind the repair of buildings as well as the construction of new ones. We find a little later on that they devoted under a whole heading special attention to this rehabilitation, in other words to repairs. What did they say? They said:

> More living units could be obtained more rapidly by repairing existing houses up to reasonable standards than by any other means.

That of course is quite obvious. They also said:

> And had the merit of making available a large mass of work, general in nature, and more or less equitably distributed throughout the country.

They stated further:

> Funds made available will provide a larger number of standard living units than if confined to new construction alone.

In this legislation all that has gone by the board. We find them later pointing out that there had to be a very precise line drawn. If there was any plan costing above $3,500, it was only going to make it a little easier for men able to pay the difference between the cost and loan on a building to finance cheaply, but efforts had to be concentrated upon providing buildings by repair or construction for the low wage earners. The committee were very strong on that point. We find them a little further on making two alternative proposals to the government, neither of which the government has apparently heeded. One was that the government would advance eighty-five per cent of the necessary funds at five per cent or less; the other was that it would advance twenty-five per cent at a cost of not more than three and a half per cent and that this would meet the situation. The government has apparently paid no heed to that. The committee point out very emphatically and more than once that it is important to keep rents as low as possible and that there is nothing that can do more to keep down costs than a low rate of interest. They point out:

> The lower the rent the larger the number who can afford to pay it.

And so on. As regards selective tenancy, they said:

> There is no justification for allowing those who can afford economic rents—

That is rents based on houses put up in the ordinary way.

> —to be housed at less cost to themselves in subsidized houses at the expense of the public purse. Selective tendancy, based on the ability to pay, is essential.

That is in their report, and we know what "essential" means.

Then they submit seventeen points which they say require emphasis, and the eighth one reads:

> Selective tenancy of government-aided housing should be based on total family income and ability to pay economic rent.

The eleventh one reads:

> A major item in the financing of houses is interest charges. There is, therefore, a close and vital relationship between interest charges and economic rents.

Is that to be found in this legislation? There is no mention of any suggestion of what the interest charges should be. Then the committee boiled their recommendations down to four points, and the second one is:

> That said authority be authorized to negotiate agreements ... with a view to promoting construction, reconstruction and repairs of such buildings—

Then the third one is:

> That as its first consideration—

Mark this!

> —the said authority be urged to take action in respect to repairs (rehabilitation), presently needed.

There is this one other point I would like to mention that appears not to have been brought up by hon. members who have been criticising this section of the bill. The whole benefit of the legislation will be nullified to a large extent if we are going to confine it to the building of houses and to the selling of them. That is to say, this scheme will help to build a house which is to be purchased by a working man. The average worker of the lower grade of income has not to-day $500 to put down as a deposit. He hasn't got a hundred dollars. Unless you can do something to help him his condition is going to be made worse, for he is going to be forced out of the more or less slum-like condition in which he is now into another slum where it will be more congested and therefore worse, because the slum he is now living in will be taken away and there will be a nice house built for $3,500 which is quite out of reach of his purse. It will go to the white collar worker with an income of $1,200 to $1,800, who will take advantage of the cheaper rate and move into this house, which will be cheaper than that for which he is now paying an economic rent. He will be the man who gets the benefit, not the man for whom it was primarily designed. No provision has been made in the bill so far as I can see for a system of tenancy. The hon. member for North Winnipeg, I think, glimpsed the idea when he suggested that the municipality should be allowed to put up the sixty per cent, then they would have control and could see that the benefit went to the class of people it is desirable to help, the low wage earner living on the verge of slumdom. When the house is built, which apparently may be done by a speculator, aided by a loan from the lending institution, and twenty per cent from the government, is there any obligation on him under this bill to rent that house at a rent in conformity with the assistance he has received from the government in order that the poor man shall get cheap rent? I cannot see it. The speculator, or private citizen, call him that if it sounds better, is going to be induced by a government loan at a low rate of interest—at least we hope it will be a low rate, there is no evidence of it—to build these houses, but there is no obligation expressed or implied that he shall rent them at a low rent. He may charge as much as the traffic will bear, and if there is competition for that class of house, as we know there is, for you can easily rent a house at a low rent when you cannot rent houses of higher value; he is liable to get the same rent as now and there is nothing to compel him to do anything else. I say the bill should be framed with a view to provide a ready and cheap form of tenancy, a selected tenancy is the term used in the report, so that the need of the people for whose benefit it is designed can be supplied, and through some guarantee to the municipality or the local authority or in some way there will be an obligation on the man who builds the house to rent it at a reasonable rent. I should like to hear from the minister on that.

[Mr. Neill.]

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I think the hon. gentleman overlooks the fact that this is a bill for one purpose at the present time. That purpose is to help the building of houses, and also to give work to the trades which perhaps need it most now, those having to do with building of all kinds. The purpose is two-fold. Under section 3 it provides for further investigation and report by the economic council—

Mr. NEILL: That is putting the cart before the horse.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Not at all. My feeling is that we are doing very well to bring in a bill to provide for housing, something that has been discussed for many years, but this government has had the courage to do it. And at the same time it is designed to give work. If a proposal for slum clearance is brought up another year and I am here I shall be very glad to give assistance to any reasonable plan for that purpose also. In spite of the argument of the hon. gentleman last night, who stated that we ought not to go on with this bill at all without more information, the government say: We will do this now and we will have an investigation as well. Then another year we shall be in a position to consider the matter more fully.

Mr. EULER: I would gather from what the minister said that the chief purpose of the bill is to provide that further investigation may be made. Surely that is a rather barren result to come from the deliberations of the committee.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I do not think I said anything of the kind.

Mr. EULER: That is the inference I drew. I want to refer again to what I said yesterday because the minister made a reply to a certain representation I made yesterday. I criticized the bill as being almost useless from a practical point of view because of its financial set up. First a lending company is to provide sixty per cent of the capital, the government providing twenty per cent and the owner the final twenty per cent. The government is joined with the lending company in the mortgage which is to be given for the eighty per cent advanced by those two bodies. I criticized the bill from that point of view. If this bill is intended to make it possible for the small wage earner to own his own house I say it is impracticable in the first place because of the fact that the small wage earner will not have ordinarily the $500 or $600 which it is necessary for him to provide. Anyone who knows the situation in the towns and cities of this country after four or five years of depression will admit that there are very few men earning small wages who will be able to provide the $500 or $600 necessary to start under the scheme at all. I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is needlessly concerned when he expresses the fear that well-to-do men are going to take the advantage of this legislation. Even they will not be able to take advantage of it because in their case it involves getting sixty per cent from the lending companies, which are then to join in a mortgage with the government on an eighty per cent loan. I said yesterday, and I reiterate to-day and I would like a further reply from the minister, that no lending company in this country will lend money to the extent of eighty per cent, which is what it amounts to. It is entirely contrary to their principles. The minister stated yesterday that he had had some interviews with lending companies. The hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Gray) said that there are only two lending companies with federal charters. I do not know as to that, but my right hon. friend may have information to-day more definite than he had yesterday as to there being lending companies willing to put up sixty per cent and have their security lowered by the government coming in on that security for their twenty per cent. The chairman of the committee said yesterday, as reported at page 3931 of Hansard, referring to what I had said in regard to that:

> The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) said that the mortgage companies would not be willing to advance an eighty per cent mortgage. We had the representatives of the mortgage companies before our committee, and they said that there was a great deal of money available at five and a half per cent. Further, they were very anxious to lend it. Section 5, under which the minister and the lending institutions jointly take the mortgage, is no doubt there for some special reason. This I do not know, but I should be inclined to think, and it will undoubtedly be discussed in committee, that the mortgage companies would be willing to do it.

Some of my objection to the bill as being useless would be removed if the minister could assure the committee that the mortgage companies which he interviewed or which interviewed him gave him any specific undertaking that they were willing to lend money under the conditions outlined in this bill. I said yesterday I would be very much surprised, and the minister replied that I have been surprised at other times, which is true, but I wish the minister would tell us specifically if these companies are willing to advance sixty per cent of the cost of the house together with the land and then share their mortgage with the government which has advanced twenty per cent making the mortgage up to eighty per cent. It means then that the mortgage company has a very poor security relatively speaking, because out of the eighty per cent the government puts up twenty per cent, which is twenty-five per cent of the total advance. In case of depreciation in value the margin of security would be very small indeed.

Then, as I said at the outset of my remarks to-day, practically the only merit the bill has is that it provides for further investigation. There was one other point, and this was advanced yesterday by one hon. member as well as by the minister; this provides a start and establishes the principle that it is the duty of the government to interest itself in housing. I do not think it has even that merit, and my hon. friend from East Hamilton said the same thing, because I think in 1919 this government established the principle that it should be interested in housing. I think it was in that year that the government loaned something like $23,000,000 to the provinces, and the provinces then advanced that money to others for the construction of houses. I think I am right also when I say that, with the exception of the money loaned to the province of Ontario, that money was never paid back to the government, at least not in full. I am informed, though I am open to correction—and I should like the minister to say something with regard to this—that of the $23,000,000 odd advanced by this government to the provinces for the purpose of promoting housing, only about $10,000,000 was ever returned. I should like to ask the minister what prospect there is that the provinces will ever return the balance owing on this account.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am informed that the money is coming in gradually, though I am unable to give my hon. friend any figures in that regard. I think I said yesterday that this would not be the first time my hon. friend had been surprised, and I was very glad that he was not quite so positive to-day as he was yesterday.

Mr. EULER: Just as positive.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Not quite. I have two telegrams that came in this morning which I should like to read. The first is signed by Mr. T. Bradshaw of the North American Life Insurance Company. It reads:

[Mr. Euler.]

For some time have not been important loaners on house property but now looking forward to proposed housing legislation to stimulate legitimate residential construction and will be prepared to loan considerable mortgage money on suitable house properties on basis of sixty per cent sound valuation at current rates now approximating five and half.

Mr. EULER: Is that all there is to it?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is that telegram.

Mr. EULER: If I may say so there is absolutely nothing in that telegram that would indicate that the insurance company is willing to loan its money on the basis of a joint mortgage with the government. That is the point.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The telegram is sent on the basis of this bill. The next telegram is signed by Mr. W. H. Sommerville, of the Mutual Life of Canada. It reads:

We see no reason why the housing act should not be successful. In any event the hearty cooperation and support of our company in its operation may be expected.

Mr. EULER: That is not definite at all.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Of course if the hon. gentleman questions telegrams of that kind I have nothing further to say, but I should like to read an extract from a memorandum by Mr. T. D'Arcy Leonard, solicitor for the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association and secretary of the Ontario Mortgage Companies' Association, which was handed to Mr. Clark some days ago:

We believe that the soundest housing scheme would be one that would enable the existing mortgage lending institutions to lend up to eighty per cent on approved new houses, in approved locations, to be built for home owners.... If approved, a loan up to an amount of eighty per cent of the value of the property would be made by a lending institution, of which sixty per cent would be supplied by the institution and twenty per cent by the government. The government's contribution would be in the form of a cheque handled by the lending institution so that the borrower would have only the one organization to deal with himself.

If that is not an expression of opinion that the proposed bill is workable and that the loan companies will join together to help make it successful, then I do not understand what it is.

Mr. EULER: Is the last telegram from a loan company?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That was a memorandum from Mr. T. D'Arcy Leonard, solicitor for the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association.

Mr. HEAPS: What is the date of that memorandum?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is no date on it, but it was handed to Mr. Clark two or three weeks ago. I suppose the hon. gentleman will tell me now that all this is in bad faith, but I do not think that is quite fair.

Mr. HEAPS: That was prepared before the bill was drafted.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to delay the committee, but not one of the telegrams read by the minister specifically commits any company to loan money on the basis of the terms of this bill.

Mr. COOTE: I should like to say a few words in connection with this bill; perhaps they relate a little more to section 4 but since section 2 is the interpretation section it has a certain bearing on all the other sections of the bill. I have several objections to this bill. I may say that I have been interested in the question of government action in connection with housing in Canada for some years and in 1932, during the debate on the unemployment relief bill, I suggested the formation of a housing commission in order to get under way a project for the construction of houses in Canada.

My first objection to the bill is that sixty per cent of the funds will have to be advanced by one of the lending companies and, as the bill is drafted, it seems that this refers in effect to existing mortgage, insurance and loan companies. So it does seem to me that the effect of the bill is to continue to load all housing in Canada with an interest charge of five and a half or six per cent. I should like hon. members to consider carefully the interest burden that is attached to any house carrying that rate of interest. Even on a house costing $3,000—and it seems to me that is the smallest amount for which a habitable house can be built to-day—a rate of five and a half per cent per annum means an interest charge of $13.75 per month before you include other charges for depreciation, upkeep, taxes or anything else. That seems to me too high; it seems definitely to make the type of houses that would be possible under this act available only to people with incomes of perhaps more than $1,200 per year.

Then it is quite evident that under this scheme only those who can advance twenty per cent of the purchase price will be able to secure any advantage. I think it is clear from the telegrams that were read by the right hon. gentleman that we cannot expect any lower rate than five and a half per cent, and I want to say again that an interest charge of $13.75 per month for any house makes this thing prohibitive to the class of people who need houses so badly.

Mr. JACOBS: Where do you find the interest rate in the bill?

Mr. COOTE: It is not in the bill, but the minister has indicated through the telegrams he has read that the companies are willing to loan money at five and a half per cent. It seems to me rather strange that the companies should say they have money to loan at that rate when I was told only recently that if we limited them to six per cent on mortgages some of the companies would be forced into bankruptcy. I take it for granted that some of those companies intend to take advantage of this opportunity to loan money at five and a half per cent. If we go ahead with this scheme of course I hope they will make this money available, but I should like to register still another objection to the bill.

This measure does not make any provision for the rehabilitation of existing houses that need repairs and improvements. I think that is one thing that is very badly needed, perhaps most needed; it is the thing that should be done first under any housing scheme. I noted carefully what the minister in charge of the bill said with regard to the investigation to be carried on by the economic council, and the fact that we want that investigation. That is quite true; I agree very largely with what the minister said, but after this investigation has been carried out we do not want to find that they were hampered in their efforts by a bill with too narrow provisions. I think this bill is a mistake in that it does not make possible provision for any rehabilitation scheme.

Then this does not seem to provide for the construction of houses in rural areas but I will wait till we get to one of the later sections of the bill before I commit myself definitely on that point.

May I point out to the committee that what is most needed in Canada is houses for people who cannot afford to pay $12.50 monthly for rent. I happened to be in the housing committee one day and heard evidence to the effect that practically one-third of the population of the island of Montreal had family income of from $1,250 down to $550, and that approximately one-third of the population of the island of Montreal have to live on a family income of less than $750. That is the class of people that housing is particularly needed for. I was told yesterday that one gentleman in Montreal who has interested himself in this class of people has interviewed the Canadian National railway authorities and has secured from them the use, or I might say the gift, of a lot of old railway coaches and freight cars which the Canadian National Railways would be dismantling because they are going to build new equipment. He has also secured a piece of property and is getting the railway company to lay a spur line to it and is running a lot of these old coaches out to that district and expects to have enough coaches to house three thousand people. That gentleman is to be commended for that work because these people are being forced out of their homes and out of their rooms in Montreal. I was told by another gentleman from Montreal who interviewed me last week, that there is nowhere for them to go. This man before referred to is doing splendid work but I think where a housing scheme ought to start is to provide housing for people in Canada who cannot afford, on their income to-day, to pay economic rent.

Under this housing scheme the government is to advance only twenty per cent of the cost of the houses. I would suggest to the government that they might very well advance sixty or eighty per cent, and at a low rate of interest, and then we could build houses that could be rented to these people for not much more than half the rental necessary under the present contemplated set-up.

Perhaps I will be asked where can we find the money to do it? We have in Canada a machine for the creation of money, and we could very well afford to set aside—this would suit me—$100,000,000 as a start until this scheme is in operation.

May I point out to the committee just what has happened in Canada in regard to the amount of money that the government or the government agency has under issue. The Bank of Canada's last statement shows that they have a note issue outstanding of approximately $75,000,000 and they have deposit liabilities of $183,000,000, which is largely the deposits of the chartered banks. Their total deposit liabilities are $259,000,000. The gold reserve of the Bank of Canada is $106,000,000, with gold valued at $20.67 per ounce, but now it is agreed that gold is worth $35 per ounce, so at that valuation the present gold reserve held by the Bank of Canada is worth $180,000,000. The Bank of Canada Act provides for a reserve of 25 per cent against notes and deposit liabilities, and on that basis the present gold reserve of $180,000,000 is sufficient for a total liability of note issue and deposit liabilities of $720,000,000.

[Mr. Coote.]

At the present time, as I say, the deposit liabilities of the Bank of Canada together with the note issue amounts to $259,000,000. So that there is a margin for the bank to work on of $460,000,000. Surely with that wide margin the central bank might safely issue another $100,000,000 for the financing of a housing program, and that I think would be quite within the canons of sound finance. The margin that would still be left to the Bank of Canada would be almost two to one.

I would like hon. members to compare the present issue of notes in Canada with what it was in 1920. I take these figures from the Canada Year Book for 1933. On June 30, 1919, the issue of dominion notes outstanding was $300,000,000, and the amount of bank notes outstanding was $228,000,000, or a total of $528,000,000. The issue of Bank of Canada notes at the present time is $75,000,000, and of the notes of the chartered banks $120,000,000, or $195,000,000. I suppose there is still $10,000,000 of dominion notes outstanding, but taking them all together it is not half what it was in the year 1920. I assume that somebody will say that the deposits of the chartered banks in the central bank are equivalent to a holding of dominion notes. For the sake of argument I will grant that. The deposits of the chartered banks are $165,000,000, and adding that to the $75,000,000 of notes issued and outstanding, makes a total of $240,000,000 issued. As I said before, with the gold reserve of the Bank of Canada at approximately $180,000,000 there you have the basis for an issue of $720,000,000 including deposits. I cannot see but what it would be the most sensible thing in the world to issue $100,000,000 and to make it available for any housing project which the economic council might recommend, and that it be advanced at a rate of interest not more than two per cent I would say, to build homes for the classes of people in Canada that are most in need of them. I do not want to labour this point.

I just want to say again that what I have suggested here is quite within what I think might be called the orthodox ideas of money, that we must have a 25 per cent reserve for our notes and deposit liabilities of the central bank. It would only be making use of the right of issue of a little over 50 per cent of what is possible under the Bank of Canada Act and I really cannot see what objection there can be to it.

Before I sit down I would like to say again that we are badly in need of some assistance in securing adequate homes in the rural areas, and if this bill does not make provision for that I hope that such provision will be made in the bill before it passes this committee, even though the scheme is not availed of until the projects have been approved by the economic council. But once approved I would like this bill to be wide enough for such schemes as are approved of to be carried out.

I would also like to be sure that there is available money for this project at a rate less than 5½ per cent. I agree with what was said by my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mitchell) last night, that the man who starts off to pay for a house with money costing 6 or 7 per cent is defeated before he starts. We have seen thousands of cases during the last five years of people who have lost their homes because there was an interest rate of six or seven or eight per cent which had to be carried in the man's payments, and with the low level of wages which the masses of the people are getting to-day and the low prices our farmers are getting for their products they cannot stand these high interest rates. If this scheme is to be started in only a small way, let us at least start it in a sound way. I am not so much concerned about it being started in a big way as I am that it be started in a sound way. I know it is stated that the interest rate under this scheme will be 5½ per cent, but by the time the purchaser pays the various charges, inspection fees, and cost of drawing papers the rate is not likely to be under six per cent, and I think six per cent is too high a rate. I do not think it is economically possible for people to carry it. I believe that those who have studied economics extending over the last few hundred years agree with Thomas Woodlock that nature in the long run will allow for a very low rate of interest if indeed she will allow for the payment of any. Let us not begin a housing scheme on an unsound basis. The basis of this scheme is the interest rate; I say the interest rate at six per cent is too high, and the scheme will not amount to very much if it is built on that foundation.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister deal specifically with the point raised by the hon. member for North Waterloo and myself, namely, that apparently this bill contemplates only those people who wish to buy houses. We have urged that the great need of the low wage earner to-day is not to have cheap houses which they cannot afford to buy, but to have cheap tenancy. Has the minister any proposal in mind which he intends to add to the bill, or does he find anything in the bill to permit a poor man, one who cannot afford to buy a house, to obtain cheap rent? The poor man, the casual labourer who moves around does not wish to tie himself down to a certain town or part of a town. He wishes to be in a position to move and, above all things, must have cheap tenancy.

I see nothing in the bill to prevent a speculator building a row of houses by the aid of cheap government money. Is there anything to compel that speculator to rent his houses to poor people at a price in proportion to the benefit he receives from the government? I can see nothing in the bill to prevent him holding us for as high rentals as the traffic will stand. I should like the minister to develop those points.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Paragraph (d) of the interpretation clause states that "housing scheme" means a scheme for the construction of houses and their occupation by tenants or purchasers. That covers the first point raised by the hon. member. The workman desiring to move about will be able to rent these houses.

Mr. NEILL: Paragraph (d) deals with the definition of the term "housing scheme," and has to do with possible action under section 3, in connection with which we are not legislating at this time.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It contains the expression "by tenants or purchasers." That means that these houses will be available for tenants or purchasers.

Mr. EULER: Where does it say that?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Apart altogether from the point raised by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) respecting the monetary policy involved in the financing of a scheme of this kind, may I say that this government is perhaps as responsible as any other body for the present lack of housing throughout the country. I would direct the attention of the minister and the committee to the fact that extraordinarily high tariff duties, especially dumping duties, have resulted in such high costs to those who construct houses that they cannot continue to do so. I have in my hand a comparison in costs of plumbing fixtures necessary in construction. A bath 4 feet 6 inches in length would cost $31.50 in Vancouver and only $11.45 in Seattle,—precisely the same specifications. A 5-foot bath costing $24.30 in Vancouver would cost only $13.45 in Seattle. The next size would cost $32.30 in Vancouver and only $16.45 in Seattle. A recess bath would cost $45.30 in Vancouver and only $27.95 in Seattle; the next larger size would cost $55.10 in Vancouver and only $31.25 in Seattle.

I set out these illustrations simply to indicate that there is an extraordinary discrimination against Canadian contractors building houses, or those wishing to pay for the building of them. That discrimination arises through the high tariff duties and especially the high dumping rates assessed against the trade. I have in my hand a letter from one of the big concerns in Vancouver, the Sanitary and Heating Association of British Columbia, complaining about this condition. They point out that while they might be able to meet the 35 per cent duty and freight charges for equal quality products, they cannot compete in the face of present dumping duties. There appears to be no competition in the supply of these goods; the manufacture of plumbing fixtures would seem to be in the hands of what is virtually a monopoly. Certainly the control in the west is in the hands of two concerns. There is no doubt about the measure of price fixation which must ensue, and no doubt that they take the fullest advantage of the duties and the dump. This means an added cost in plumbing fixtures to the extent of 30 per cent to 50 per cent, and in some cases as high as 70 per cent. Obviously if the government were interested in the building of houses, as one of its first acts it would have undertaken to modify the rates of duty on these goods which enter into the construction.

While under section 3 of the bill the economic council is advised to study practices which enter into the construction of houses, I contend that the minister and the government already know sufficient—possibly I should say that the facts are already sufficiently known—to have justified them long ago in taking this step towards reducing the cost of house construction.

Mr. McGIBBON: I should like to endorse the observations of the hon. member for Macleod to the effect that it is very important that the scheme be properly started. I know of no industry which would absorb more of the unemployed than would the building trades. The one great essential exists, namely, a market in the cities, towns and villages for houses. In considering a matter of this kind I believe it essential that the government should consider the type of construction. I believe these houses should be designed by architects; ventilation should be properly attended to and in the cities and towns where electricity is available they should be properly wired. I believe it would be to the advantage of a scheme of this kind if the houses were standardized; certainly that factor would cheapen them and standardization could be effected with a view to increasing efficiency and utility.

Not long ago I read an article written by Alfred Sloan vice-president of General Motors, in which he pointed out that properly designed houses could be erected in two days, including electric wiring, refrigeration, ventilation and the like. By standardization and through what might be described as high pressure practices they could be cheapened so as to be brought within the reach of nearly every labouring man. Houses built in that way would add to the health of Canadians, a factor which is to-day worthy of serious consideration. If the scheme were carried out properly it could be extended to the point where the labouring man in a town or city or the farmer in the country might have an up-to-date house equipped in every particular.

I do not know of anything which would have a greater effect in absorbing the unemployed than would a project of this kind. Canada has paid out about $180,000,000 for relief. How much better it would have been if that money and the moneys paid by the provinces and municipalities could have been turned into a channel of this kind. I am pressing upon the government the importance of having this scheme properly started. These houses should be properly drafted by competent architects, and ventilation, refrigeration and everything of that kind looked after. I think it would add greatly to the health of the country, which is becoming a problem, involving so much expense to the provinces and the municipalities that they cannot keep going. We have here a scheme which practically has no limit, because there is no limit to the market for houses. It only becomes a matter of getting the houses cheap enough so that those desiring them can purchase them. I hope the government has given the situation that study which its seriousness deserves because it is one that will not end this year or next year but will increase from year to year as the efficiency is demonstrated and the necessity grows.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Duties.

Mr. STEVENS: Under section 3 there should come more properly a discussion much of which has been going on and to which I have listened with some interest. I want to make one or two observations and perhaps the right hon. gentlemen in charge of the bill can clarify what at present is not clear to me. The question has been raised as to provision for that class of person who is unable to put up any money at all for the initial payment, and one must recognize that housing is more vitally needed by that class than by any other in the community. That is basic and should be the gravamen of any discussion on this matter. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to section 4 in discussing the section now before us, because the two must be read together. I will not trespass too far on the rules, however. Section 3 provides that the economic council shall study, investigate, report and advise, when required to do so, into certain things, among which we find the following in paragraph (b):

upon a proposal for a housing scheme in any urban or rural locality, submitted by a local authority, and particularly as to the necessity for and feasibility of establishing a housing scheme in any locality for the construction of houses, with the assistance of the state, to be leased to low wage earners.

I read that in conjunction with a clause in section 2, the interpretation clause to which the right hon. gentleman has already called attention. Paragraph (d) of section 2 reads:

"Housing scheme" means a scheme for the construction of houses and their occupation by tenants or purchasers.

Now I apprehend that the right hon. gentleman means to say, in his utterances, that by virtue of these two subsections provision is made in this bill for housing for those who are unable to provide any initial payment, and that this shall be on a tenancy basis. If that is so, then I submit that section 4 is faulty or weak in its construction, because section 4 is the operative section of the bill, and it provides the power and the only power in the bill for the Minister of Finance or the government to make payments or to do anything that is effective. I will read from section 4:

The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into a contract with an approved lending institution to join with such institution in the making of loans to assist in the building of houses under conditions hereinafter mentioned.

Then in the subsections following I notice it limits to specific things that power of entering into agreement. I submit to the right hon. gentleman that in the subsequent subsections of section 4 there is no power given to do what it is suggested might be done under section 3 or in accordance with the interpretation clause—that is, to loan money for a housing scheme intended to be built on a tenancy basis. If the right hon. gentleman will note that point I will proceed with one or two other observations, so that I may not interrupt him unduly.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am only too glad to have the hon. gentleman make suggestions looking to the improvement of the wording of the bill. When I referred to tenants, in connection with subsection (d) of section 2, I referred to the fact that there might be put under this scheme houses which would not be owned by the people who occupied them; that is to say, they might be erected by a company or association and rented to tenants. That was the idea. With regard to the other question of providing houses for people who are not able themselves to pay anything, this is supposed to be covered by the provision with respect to further investigation, under (b) of section 3. It is not the intention of this bill, as I understand it, to provide houses for people if they cannot contribute something towards their construction; but it is the intention to have the economic council go into all these matters most carefully and make a report as soon as possible. The question which the hon. gentleman raises, with regard to houses for people who cannot provide any of the money themselves, is one which the council will have to consider carefully; and if section 3 is not broad enough in its terms, so far as investigation by the council is concerned, I shall be glad to consider suggestions for its improvement.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not referring to section 3; I am calling the right hon. gentleman's attention to the inadequacy of section 4. In section 3 we infer—and I submit that is as far as we go—that it is possible that a scheme may be suggested by the economic council which would provide for low rental tenancy habitations. That is suggested, and my point is that the bill does not give corresponding power to the government to do what it suggests in section 3 might be done. I therefore suggest that before section 4 passes there should be added thereto a subsection positively authorizing the government to accept a scheme such as might arise under (b) of section 3. That is in so far as the bill is now drafted.

There is another point I wish to raise. I refer to the situation throughout Canada in many cities, but certainly in the larger cities such as Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg, Hamilton, Windsor and any of the other industrial centres. I think there is no one who has visited these places but will agree that there is very grave necessity—and I cannot emphasize that too strongly—for the establishment of sanitary housing on a low rental basis for what might be termed the working class. Furthermore I doubt if there are any cities that do not have on their hands properties that have come back to them under tax sales, what are known in the west as tax sale properties, which might form the basis of a municipal housing scheme. This is nothing new; it is something that has been in operation very extensively in Great Britain. In some United States cities it is now being canvassed very carefully, and I think in some cities it is actually in operation where the municipalities have taken advantage of this property that is now non-tax producing, backed up on their hands, very often well situated, and upon which very suitable, comfortable and cheap forms of housing could be erected in a modern way. I think we must recognize the fact that the construction of houses in Canada as well as in the United States is woefully behind the times; it is oldfashioned, obsolete. We know from some of the great world exhibitions, for instance, that there is a modern type of construction with conveniences that can be erected at very moderate cost permitting of a rental much below what is normal to-day. So I think we should review the situation from that standpoint and anticipate in this bill a new era in type of construction. We should provide in this bill that the government will have power to enter upon such a scheme, because without any doubt the economic council, if it does its duty at all, will present to the government a scheme of that character. But this bill does not provide for the government carrying out the scheme should such a one be submitted.

Another point I would like to submit is this: in the ordinary method followed in loaning for construction purposes in Canada, the costs of making the loan, the appraisal, the transfer fee, the mortgage charge, the insurance and all those charges usually make initial fees that are entirely disproportionate to the services rendered. That I think is to-day so commonly an abuse—and I use that term "abuse" advisedly—that it ought to be guarded against in this bill. This measure provides simply that the government, the minister in this case or the loaning authority, as it is indicated, shall cooperate with existing private institutions and carries into whatever scheme is adopted, wherever it is adopted, all of those oldfashioned and I believe obsolete abuses which to-day characterize the loaning of money. That feature ought to be eliminated from any scheme into which the Canadian taxpayers' money enters. I believe section 4 should be so redrafted that we would guard against such abuses being again perpetrated.

There is another point to which I should like to draw attention, and for the moment it escapes my mind what is the accepted ratio of rentals to salaries, but if I am in error in what I say I shall be very glad if some hon. member would set me right. I believe it is an accepted principle in economics that no one should be asked to pay more than twenty-five per cent of his earnings for rental; I think that is correct.

Mr. HOWARD: Twenty per cent is better, but twenty-five per cent maximum.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Twenty to twenty-five per cent.

Mr. STEVENS: As a matter of fact I venture the statement that many of the working class are to-day paying at a rate of about thirty per cent or more, or they overcome that impossible handicap by doubling up. There is not in Canada a city where you will not find in one habitation whose cubic content is suitable only for one family, two and even three families. Why? Because of the economic stress. They cannot afford to pay the thirty, thirty-five or forty per cent as the case may be, so in order to live at all, two or three families will get together and live in one habitation. I was in Montreal not long ago, and I imagine the committee may have had this data before them where it was said that an investigation had disclosed a very serious unsanitary condition because of this doubling or trebling up of families in one apartment or house as the case may be. That is a very serious matter; to my mind it is fundamental; it strikes at the very root of this whole problem of housing. The danger that I see in this bill is that the powers given to the minister or the government permit the carrying of these abuses into any new scheme instead of in a mandatory manner making such abuses impossible in connection with any scheme which is adopted.

There is another point already mentioned by several hon. gentlemen. Leaving for the moment the question of tenancy, we come to a class that may have a small amount of money in hand. A sum of $400, $500, $600 or $700 is something that it would be very difficult for many to find. On the other hand, if a person has $500 to $1,000 to invest in a home, there is not much that we need to worry about in connection with such a class, but the persons that I am concerned about are, first, the working class in the congested areas of Canada and, second, the other class referred to by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), namely, the rural class. I would like to say just one or two words in regard to that. I do not know what a survey of Canada would disclose, but there have been some very excellent surveys made of the United States, and the condition of the average rural home in that country is I think an appalling story largely because of the costliness of sanitary arrangements, lack of proper lighting facilities and the general costliness of construction. I believe we should aim in this bill, as I have already indicated, at providing, first, for the low rental class in industrial centres and, second, a typical, comfortable, sanitary home for those in rural and agricultural districts, so as to make possible decent living conditions in this country. I do not think any survey has been made of Canada, but I recall the survey carried on in some parts of the United States in the last two years and the fact that so few houses have even a bath is simply appalling.

Mr. COOTE: Five per cent in the rural districts of Canada.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. We need to be seized not only with the seriousness of this situation but its disgrace to us as a civilized people, and the absolute necessity of laying the foundation for a new era in low cost sanitary housing in this country.

The last point to which I wish to refer is interest. I do not think this parliament will discharge its duty if we pass a housing bill that contemplates a rate of interest of five and a half per cent, which with charges will be more than six per cent, I think at least six and a half. That rate is altogether too high. I am not concerned about well-to-do people who want a nice home, they can borrow money and pay five and a half or six per cent and take care of themselves. But for those who have low wages or insufficient returns in the price of their produce—and they outnumber the others five to one—a rate of five and a half or six per cent is too high. This bill ought to provide for a rate of interest close to the rate at which it is possible for the government of Canada to borrow money, that is a basic rate of three to three and a half per cent. Therefore I draw the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact while subsection (b) of section 3 permits the economic council to look into these things and report, I submit that section 4, the operative section, is inadequate to permit of a reasonably effective measure being put into operation.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: My impression is that the hon. gentleman was not here yesterday evening when we were discussing this question. I simply tell him that there were many here who argued that we should not have any bill at all just now for the provision of housing, but simply go on with further investigation. The government, however, thought that they would make a start at any rate in providing housing under this scheme. The hon. gentleman has said quite rightly that there is no provision in section 4 for the government to take further action on the report made by the economic council under section 3. The idea was that this investigation by the economic council would take some time and would necessitate rather minute inquiry into many phases of this question. They would have to work out something as to cooperative arrangements between municipal, provincial and dominion authorities, and consider other questions such as slum areas and the provision of houses for people who cannot afford to put up any money to help build for themselves. There was no intention under section 4 that there should be provision for the government to implement the suggestions made by the economic council. The idea we had was that probably before the economic council really made a complete report there would be another session of parliament, and this matter would then be taken up for further consideration and implemented with further legislation. I am just as anxious about providing accommodation for low wage earners as the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) can possibly be. I think we are taking a step in the direction of doing something about housing which has never been done by this parliament before, and it certainly is not the intention to stop here. But as information is provided and we can see our way to go further it certainly is the intention of the members of this government as I understand to try to do so.

With regard to interest and charges, the hon. gentleman will find that subsection (g) of section 4 gives the minister authority in making his agreement to impose such other conditions as will safeguard the interest of His Majesty. Our idea is that this will be administered under the Department of Finance. The Minister of Finance will give consideration to all such questions and it certainly would be the aim that the charges incidental to a scheme of this kind should be as low as possible.

Mr. STEVENS: Could the right hon. gentleman indicate from the telegrams and the memoranda he read a moment ago what rate of interest is contemplated by the companies who have expressed a willingness to cooperate?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I explained yesterday evening that the rate they suggested is five and a half per cent, and the rate at which we expect the government will put up their twenty per cent will be three and a half per cent, which would give an average of five per cent. Whether it will be possible to get the companies' rate below five and a half per cent, I cannot say, but my hon. friend can rest assured that every effort will be made to carry out this scheme as economically as possible.

Mr. STEVENS: The five per cent in that case would be on the whole eighty per cent loaned?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Yes, certainly, an average of five per cent.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In answer to a query by the hon. member for East Kootenay may I say that the committee had evidence from Mr. Cudmore of the statistical department, and yesterday I put on Hansard at page 3911 the figures showing the conditions in rural and urban sections. I am sure it will be a great surprise to hon. members, as it was to me, to know that there are nearly double as many one-family households living in one room in the rural parts of Canada as there are in the urban sections. The figures given to the committee in the evidence, which is available to every hon. member, were 21,116 one-family households of owners, and 7,261 one-family households of tenants, while in urban sections there were 11,975 households of one family of two or more persons in a single room, and only 94 households of two or more families in a single room. The conditions disclosed by the representative of the statistical department as reported in the last census show the great necessity for something being done in the rural sections. Conditions were worse there than in the urban sections. That is one reason why I think it is a great mistake to limit the operation of this bill to new construction and not allow advances to be made for repairs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Following what has taken place in other countries—I do not intend to repeat what I said yesterday in that regard—the greatest relief that can be given to the unemployed in various sections of Canada today can be given by furnishing little farm plots out in the country, away from the congested areas, where land is not expensive and where buildings now in existence could be repaired. But under this bill that cannot be done. I call the attention of the committee to subsection (a) of section 4:

> A loan shall be made only for the purpose of assisting the construction of a house ...

So that absolutely settles the question of whether the loan can be made for any other purpose. As I understood the telegram that came from Mr. Bradshaw, it stated that his company was willing to advance sixty per cent. That is very different from advancing three-quarters of eighty per cent, and that is the percentage provided.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I see the point made by the hon. gentleman, but may I say that when Mr. Bradshaw sent the telegram he was fully conversant with the terms of this bill, and I take it that he sent the telegram to show his willingness to cooperate in an attempt to carry out the provisions of the bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would read that telegram again.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I sent it to Hansard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There is no question about it; the terms of the telegram were that the company would advance sixty per cent. If Mr. Bradshaw was conversant with the terms of the bill, that telegram meant that his company do not intend to advance more than sixty per cent; at least that was how it sounded to me.

Mr. HEAPS: It would be entirely a first mortgage, and the twenty per cent advanced by the government would be a second mortgage.

Mr. ELLIOTT: From the telegram stating that they were willing to advance sixty per cent—

Mr. GRAY: That would have to be a first mortgage loan.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Yes, he evidently calculated that he was going to get the first sixty per cent, and I want to point out that this is a very different thing from getting a share of an eighty per cent loan, as was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for North Waterloo and others.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I must repeat that I think Mr. Bradshaw understood the terms of this bill perfectly. I do not think he would have sent the telegram at all if he had not been willing to carry out the terms of the bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I do not intend to labour the point, but Mr. Bradshaw is not a stupid man by any means. He is a financier, and I think probably it was because he is a financier that he sent the telegram stating that he would advance sixty per cent. If he will advance sixty per cent he will advance a higher percentage than most of the companies in the business have been advancing for several years past; there is no doubt about that.

Apparently we are discussing sections 3 and 4 together; I think perhaps it is advisable to do so. I believe the government should consider very seriously this question: If we are right in understanding that loan companies are willing to advance three-quarters of an eighty per cent mortgage, this bill should provide for the proportion of the loss, if any, that they should bear. Let us look at the position in which the government will be put. They advance twenty per cent, and under this bill they may be liable for eighty per cent or ninety-nine per cent of the loss if they make a contract of that kind. The minister in charge, with the approval of the governor in council, has power to enter into an agreement with the lending institution with regard to the proportion in which the loss is to be borne. I wonder if my right hon. friend who is piloting this bill through the house has had from any of these financial institutions any indication of the proportion of the loss they are willing to bear. If he has had any such intimation, it should be in this bill. If they are willing to set the figure at twenty per cent of the loss—and I think that is a fair proportion—it should be in the bill. If they would be satisfied with thirty-three and a third per cent, then the bill should say that the loss borne by the government shall in no case be more than thirty-three and a third per cent. The minister owes it to this house before we give him and the government carte blanche to enter into agreements—if any are made in pursuance of this bill—by which the dominion treasury may be called upon to bear a much greater proportion of the loss than its proportion of the advance, to see that these clauses are so amended as to make that clear. I do not really insist on limiting it to twenty per cent, but I say it is not fair to the people whom the members of this house represent that we should give authority to a minister to render the taxpayers of this country liable for that great proportion. There should be some limit fixed.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Advances.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to make a few observations in connection with this section, which sets out the conditions under which an advance shall be made by the government to start small house construction. After reading over these conditions I do not see anything provided to safeguard the wages to be paid the workers engaged in the construction of houses that may be built as a result of this bill, unless that safeguard is contained in the words "sound standards" in subsection (a). I believe if that phrase does not deal with the situation another clause should be added that will protect the wages to be paid those engaged in all the trades concerned with these works. I had occasion this morning to discuss with a delegation here from Toronto a matter in connection with bill 86. I will not refer to bill 86 now, but in the discussion it came out that in connection with a good many houses being erected in Toronto to-day—and I presume in other cities throughout Canada—contractors and builders are taking advantage of the fact that many of their workmen are on relief. One member of the delegation stated that in connection with a building on which I understood he was doing some work in order to obtain a job a mechanic first had to present his relief card. I am not associated with building, so I do not know whether or not that is so and I am only repeating what was told me. That gentleman said further that in applying for a position a workman would stipulate that he would take less than $12 a week for what work he was to do on the building, and that as long as he received less than $12 a week he would at the same time receive the ordinary relief in his community.

If that is the situation I think some steps ought to be taken to see to it that the plumbers, steamfitters, carpenters, bricklayers, masons, painters, tinsmiths and all the others engaged in the work covered by this bill, work that will be started through the fact that the government proposes generously to assist in the construction of houses, should receive fair wages.

I am in hearty accord with the bill and I want to compliment the government as strongly as I can on introducing it because it my opinion it will provide an immense amount of work throughout Canada. But I am concerned that any chiselling that may now be going on against labour because of men being on relief should not be permitted by those who construct buildings under this program. Very few of our workers want to take relief if they can get the sound wages to which they are entitled.

I have listened to the discussion of other phases of the bill and I wish to endorse what has been said about interest rates. I have had a great deal to do with workmen in my time; I have had to work with many, many thousands of them, and I do not see, Mr. Chairman, how a workman can pay 5½ or 6 per cent on a house of this class. I am not enough of a financier to know how cheaply money can be obtained, but inasmuch as these houses are apparently to be occupied or leased by the low paid worker I commend to the government consideration of every angle of the interest question so that whoever rents or purchases one of these houses may have the advantage of the lowest possible interest rate.

The farmer is now able to get money through this government at 5 per cent, and I am in accord with that, but if the farmer is able to get money at 5 per cent through this government, surely the average low paid worker in the cities should not be asked to pay a higher rate than the farmers pay. The bill I notice does not specify the rate. I have heard the rate mentioned as 5½ per cent, but if the rental or selling price of these houses can be based on a lower rate than 5½ per cent I would say by all means get the rate as low as possible.

Another hon. member has said something about repairs. That is something which I wish this bill covered. There is a large amount of property in this country to-day which is being destroyed for lack of ability on the part of the owners to pay for the necessary repairs. Takes eaves troughing. Half of the houses—perhaps that may be an arbitrary number; it may be 25 per cent—at least a great many properties that I know have holes in the eaves troughing through which the rain is running down and ruining the woodwork and projections of the houses, and if anything could be done in this bill to provide assistance for making repairs to houses I am sure it would result in many thousands of men being employed in that work, and at the same time it would safeguard a considerable portion of the national wealth of the country, for after all property is an important part of the national wealth of the country, and if it is allowed to run down and become ruined because the owner cannot repair it the national wealth is lowered to that extent.

Another thought came to me from something that was said by the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), and with which I am in hearty accord, and that is that we should see to it that provision is made for the fullest possible equipment of these low priced houses with conveniences. I have had something to do with manufacturing large quantities of equipment in my time, and I know that an order for $100,000 or a quarter of a million dollars' worth of equipment can be sold at a much lower unit price than only a few hundred dollars' worth, and I wondered if there could not be some means provided whereby a city or community undertaking a large scheme of slum clearance, which apparently is covered by this bill, for the purpose of rebuilding on that site better houses, could secure the equipment at a lower price by buying in large quantities. I believe that can be done. I believe that in a scheme of this kind the necessary equipment for the houses can be purchased in large quantities at a lower price than the average man realizes.

The scheme itself if it is carried out to the fullest extent would provide approximately $50,000,000 worth of house construction. The government puts up $10,000,000; that is 20 per cent of the total, and if $50,000,000 worth of this class of building can be started it will mean the employment of a great number of mechanics throughout this country. That is something, Mr. Chairman, that has to be done. The average workman does not want relief; he wants work; he wants to own his home and he wants fair conditions to live under. Our workmen in Canada are as good as the best workmen of any country in the world, and having regard to the very trying conditions that this country in common with all others is going through I for one want to speak in the highest terms of the great mass of our Canadian workers for the patience with which they are enduring hardship and privation, and I hope that this bill will rapidly pass through the house and that the most vigorous measures possible will be taken to encourage the actual commencement of the work.

There is one other point. As I looked through the bill I was not sure whether the figures of 20 and 60 per cent cover the land as well as the building. If the land is covered it would reduce the amount available for the building. If they do not cover the land I presume that before any money will be advanced the land will be considered to be free land or land that has been paid for.

Before taking my seat I again want to compliment the government on this scheme and I hope that a start will soon be made on the construction of houses which will provide much labour for the ordinary workman.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I just want to say a word in reply to my hon. friend. Paragraph (b) of subsection 2 provides that the land is included in the cost. As far as investigation by the economic council is concerned regarding slum areas and the construction of houses for low wage earners, my hon. friend may be very certain that the economic council will give all these questions very careful consideration.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Will my right hon. friend give a statement as to the proportions that are likely to be agreed upon?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry that that question has not been settled at all. That is a question that comes under the Minister of Finance, and I am sure that my hon. friend will be willing to trust him to make these agreements as carefully as it is possible for anybody to do. I have not been present at all the discussions regarding these various matters and am not as conversant with them as I might be, but the hon. member must know very well that the Minister of Finance will take every precaution to guard the treasury and to make agreements as reasonable as possible in connection with the building of these houses.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The members of parliament should take the precaution.

Mr. HEAPS: I am glad one hon. member has had the courage to get up and congratulate the government on this bill. It would seem that he thought the bill was all right—that is, if we do not consider the fact that he wanted provision for low interest rates, rehabilitation and repairs. But if the hon. member can find anything in this bill which will give the rural sections what he wants them to have and provides rehabilitation for houses in the cities he certainly finds something in it which no other hon. member up to this time has been able to find.

The right hon. gentleman who sponsors the bill has stated that it provides for action which has not been taken previously by parliament, and that is makes provision for recognition of the right of parliament to do something in connection with housing. I do not believe the right hon. gentleman is quite correct in his statement because in 1919 an act was passed as a result of which $23,000,000 was appropriated by the federal government for loans to the provinces to built houses. I would a thousand times rather have an act similar to that of 1919 than the one now before us. The 1919 legislation provided for control and supervision, a point to which I attach a great deal of importance. I believe that procedure would be preferable and that we would make more headway under a comprehensive federal housing scheme than we will make under the measure before us.

Within the last few minutes I have been reading some of the statements made upon the introduction of the bill by the right hon. gentleman, and I should like to quote one or two of them. At page 3776 of Hansard the right hon. gentleman is reported as follows:

> The object of this bill is to formulate a plan to assist in providing houses suitable particularly for the low wage earner and to keep down the cost and interest charges within his ability to pay; it is also to provide work for the unemployed. It is evident that construction of this kind would stimulate business and hasten recovery by providing employment for those trades and industries in which unemployment is most acute.

It might provide employment for a few thousand people who would benefit. Later on the right hon. member states:

> The other point which I wish to stress is the obvious desirability of taking certain immediate steps of a practical nature designed to assist in solving the existing problem of unemployment.

Forsooth, this bill is one of the measures which the government is bringing before parliament to solve the problem of unemployment. When I listened to the observations made a week ago by the right hon. gentleman I was under the impression that a worth while bill would be introduced. I certainly did not expect to see one such as that we now have before us, one which hon. members from all parts of the house have criticized. In my experience as an hon. member I have never known as cool a reception of a government bill as that given to the one now under consideration.

The importance of interest rates in the matter of home construction is evidenced by observations made in the report of the housing committee. I do not believe the committee can attach too much importance to the rate of interest, because unless we have a low rate of interest I say no successful housing scheme can be inaugurated in Canada. At page 20 of the report of the housing committee I find this:

> The British MacMillan report claims that in reference to British conditions "a fall from six per cent to four and a half per cent in the rate of interest on loans against houses is nearly as good as a fall of twenty-five per cent in the cost of production."

It is for reasons such as these that I attach so much importance to the question of cheap money for the construction of homes, a provision which does not appear in the measure before us.

I suggest that before section 4 is passed the minister ought to state specifically and without qualification the position of government security as compared with that of private lending corporations. We do not know. He states only this, that at some time in the future by an agreement with the loan companies the Minister of Finance will safeguard the interests of the federal treasury. I say there is only one way the government can safeguard the interests of the treasury, namely, by putting the 20 per cent provided by the government at a much lower rate of interest than that received by the private corporations on a basis at least equal to that of the advance by private corporations. Will the minister tell the committee whether the 20 per cent advanced by the government at a rate of three and a half per cent, as he has indicated, will have the same standing, so far as security is concerned, as the money to be provided by private corporations?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have already pointed out that as I understand it, that is to be the arrangement. The agreements made by the Minister of Finance will give every care and consideration to this point. The hon. member for West Middlesex asked a question about terms which at the present time I am unable to answer. I assure him however that the Minister of Finance will take every care to see that agreements are made in proper form.

Last night the hon. member for North Winnipeg ond other hon. members suggested that the words "or local authority" as defined in paragraph (f) of section 2 should be inserted in section 4 at various points, so that the minister would be in a position to make arrangements with them as well as with lending institutions. After giving the matter careful consideration I see no reason why we should not accept the suggestion. By accepting it we find that the words "or local authority" should be inserted after the word "institution" in the third line of subsection (1) and again after the word "institution" in the same line. Then, the same words should be added after the word "institution" in the fourth line of paragraph (a) of subsection (2) and after the words "lending institution" in paragraph (c). Then, the words "or local authority" would be added before the word "jointly" in paragraph (e), and the same words would be added after the word "institution" in the second line of paragraph (f). They would be added again in paragraph (g) at the end of the second line. In this way we would bring the clause into line with the suggestions made. The Solicitor General will move these amendments.

Mr. DUPRE: I so move.

Mr. ELLIOTT: As I read the bill no individual may loan money under it, no matter how much money he may have or the terms upon which he may be willing to make advances. If an individual is willing to lend money on terms as favourable as those offered by lending institutions why should he not be allowed to do so, when it is being extended to local authorities?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Theoretically there is no reason why that should not be done, but as a matter of fact it would involve arrangements being made throughout the country. After all, my experience has been that there are very few individuals who care to loan money on that basis.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I submit they should have an opportunity.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Theoretically I could see no objection to it.

Mr. GRAY: In view of the fact that the lending company and His Majesty will be joint mortgagees on all these loans, will the minister tell us whether or not the provincial moratorium and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act will apply to the loans when made?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understand that the provincial moratorium would not affect mortgages taken in that way.

Mr. GRAY: The provincial moratorium will not apply to these mortgages simply because His Majesty has a portion of the loan; is that the argument? Or will it apply to sixty per cent of the loan and not to the twenty per cent which His Majesty loans? In what proportion will it apply? This house has passed what is known as the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, for which the government takes a lot of credit, and I think we should know whether it is to apply, or whether it will apply in certain provinces only, or just where we stand when the loans are made. It is important that the committee should know what position the lending companies and His Majesty as joint mortgagee will be in respectively, because I cannot see how in law you can separate the one from the other once you sign the mortgage. I should like the minister to explain fully.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I understand that the provincial moratorium would not apply.

Mr. GRAY: Would the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That act is for farmers.

Mr. GRAY: Well, often houses are built on farms, and I am not being facetious when I say that. I presume that if this act applies in the way the minister hopes it will be applied there will be rural as well as urban houses. It is intended to include all, and I should like to know whether the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act will apply to these loans.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am very sorry but I have never considered that question.

Mr. GRAY: The Solicitor General is here and he might assist in the legal phases of the bill.

Mr. DUPRE: I could not answer offhand any more than the right hon. gentleman can.

Mr. GRAY: Will the minister let the section stand until we get an opinion from the law officers of the crown?

Mr. STEVENS: I welcome the amendment which the right hon. gentleman has made to section 4, but before that section is finally carried—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is the amendment carried?

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is not carried yet.

Mr. STEVENS: Before the amendment passes I might direct attention to one other point already referred to, and that is subsection (f) of section 4. It is the question raised by my hon. friend from West Middlesex. It provides that any loss sustained in respect of any loan shall be borne by His Majesty and the lending institution, or local institution, as amended, in such proportions as are fixed by the terms of the contract. It will be noted that section 5 authorizes the lending institutions to disregard the limitations of their charter. For instance, a mortgage company may be limited by statute or by its charter to, say, forty per cent. Some of them do in practice refuse to go beyond forty per cent, but as a matter of fact they may be limited by their charter to that percentage, let us say by way of illustration. This section waives that limitation, and the lending company will therefore be permitted to loan up to sixty per cent. The question I want to submit is this. Will not the government, when they come to make the contract with the lending institution, be faced with this argument, that inasmuch as their charter limits them to forty per cent, and this bill authorizes the waiving of that limitation, they can claim that the government in its contract with them should agree to bear a larger proportion of the loss than is represented by sixty to forty? That is a very real and practical problem that will probably arise, and it strikes me that in passing this bill, which is really more or less an enabling bill for lending institutions, we should definitely limit or delimit or define the loss of the parties respectively. That could easily be done by amending the bill to this effect, that any loss sustained shall be borne by His Majesty and the lending institution, or the local institution, in the proportions that they have advanced—or words to that effect. I submit to the right hon. gentleman that such an amendment would greatly improve the bill.

Amendment (Mr. Dupré) agreed to on division.

Mr. NEILL: Seeing that the minister has adopted that amendment suggested by myself some two hours ago, perhaps he will be equally complaisant with one I am now about to propose. I move to amend subsection 2 (a) of section 4, line 32, by inserting after the word "construction" the words "or repairs to." It includes the principle of repairs.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The question of repairs has been raised by several members and it is one which requires the most careful consideration. The administration of such an amendment as my hon. friend suggests would present a problem of great magnitude. How, for instance, should we arrange for repairs to my hon. friend's house in Alberni, to a house in the back end of Argenteuil, to a house in Nova Scotia, and so on. These are all small amounts and the question has to be carefully considered by itself. It is an important matter that ought to be gone into and I hope that the economic council will consider it and make some suggestion. The administration of such a provision would be very difficult indeed and we are not prepared at the present time to insert it in this bill.

Mr. NEILL: That is what the committee recommended.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the right hon. gentleman mind giving consideration to the suggestion I made?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry, but I hope the hon member will not press an amendment of that kind. As I understand the matter, arrangements in regard to the division of any losses will have to be made by the Minister of Finance who will have the administration of this legislation, and the proportion will of course depend somewhat upon the circumstances. Let us suppose for the sake of argument that the property is worth only seventy per cent when eighty per cent has been loaned. According to my hon. friend's suggestion, as I understand it, the government would bear one-quarter of the loss. I am not at all sure that any fixed proportion ought to be mentioned in this bill because I think the proportions that the government and the company ought to bear will depend a good deal on how big the loss is; in other words, all that has to be taken into consideration in making the agreement. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) and the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) tell us that we cannot get any money at all under this bill; that no loans will be made. What we are anxious to do is to show that they are mistaken; that we shall be able to get some.

Mr. EULER: I wish the government luck.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The suggestion of the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) would tie the matter up in such a way as to make it more difficult for the Minister of Finance to make arrangements with the insurance and loan companies. I submit for his consideration that it would be better to leave this in the hands of the Minister of Finance as provided for in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to say just this. According to my interpretation of the bill, it is quite possible that the government will be called upon to bear all the loss. I am simply registering a protest against the indefiniteness of the allocation of loss, which I think is a grave mistake, and inasmuch as it is a joint arrangement between the government and the loaning company, the loss should be defined whatever the definition of loss is.

Mr. EULER: I entirely agree with that. My criticism that no money would be lent by the loaning companies was on the assumption that if there were any loss, that loss would be proportionate to the amounts lent by the government and by the companies. If this clause gives to the government the right to assume the entire loss and to relieve the lending company of any loss that might occur, I have no doubt loans will be forthcoming, but nobody in his right mind would assume that the government is going to lend twenty per cent, share in a first mortgage and then assume the whole loss.

Mr. STEVENS: It amounts to a guarantee of the whole thing.

Mr. EULER: Of course if the government is willing to do that sort of thing some loans might be available, but it never occurred to me that the government would consider the idea of insuring the loaning company against loss.

Mr. STEVENS: The government can do that under this bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: That is rather an extreme view.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The minister can clear up the whole matter if he will state whether the government is taking a first mortgage or second mortgage security or whether it is a joint arrangement by both in the first mortgage.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have already explained that it is a joint mortgage covering the two items.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill).

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I am sorry, but as I have explained to the committee I do not think this is a feasible amendment so far as this bill is concerned and I find myself unable to accept it.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 15; nays, 23.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Now that this bill is definitely not one for the low wage earner, might I be permitted to suggest to the minister another amendment to paragraph (d) of subsection 2 of section 4? It reads:

The rate of interest to be charged the borrower in respect of any loan shall be subject to approval by the minister.

That is all to the good, but I also think in keeping with the speeches made by hon. members here to-day, there should be inserted after the word "interest" the words "and other charges." The hon. member for East Kootenay and the hon. member for Macleod pointed out what I know to be a fact—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the hon. member will permit me, I think that is covered in paragraph (g).

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): No, it is not. Paragraph (g) reads:

Such other conditions as are stipulated in the contract between the minister and the lending institution.

I am quite sure that a moment's consideration by the minister will convince him that this in no way is included in the bill.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I have no objection to that insertion. I consider it is covered by paragraph (g), but if it is going to make the matter any plainer by stating:

The rate of interest and other charges to be charged the borrower—

I have no objection to that.

Amendment (Mr. Garland, Bow River) agreed to.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: There is another amendment I have at the end of paragraph (c) where it is suggested that these words be added:

Provided that the governor in council may in any class of cases fix the percentage at less than the sixty per cent aforesaid.

That is to say, we feel there may be some cases in which it may not be necessary to get the sixty per cent and the government should have the power to take a less amount in certain cases.

Mr. DUPRE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: My attention has been called to the fact that the word "mortgage" hardly covers the legal situation in Quebec, and that therefore paragraph (e) of subsection 2 of section 4 should be amended by inserting after the word "mortgage" in the fourth line the words "or hypothec."

Mr. DUPRE: I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is the minister prepared to state to the members of the committee the names of the lending institutions that have been approved?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No lending institutions have yet been approved. No action has been taken under this bill. It would hardly be fair to parliament to set to work to approve of lending institutions before the bill passed. That has not been done.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Have any of the lending institutions that might be approved subsequently been consulted; if so what are their names?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Several of these gentlemen appeared before the committee and gave their opinions very fully, as set forth in the report. I explained that there have been some private conversations between some representatives of the companies and officials of the department in regard to this bill since it has been brought in to the house. I read telegrams from two of them this afternoon, which the hon. gentleman will find in Hansard, also an extract from a memorandum given by Mr. T. D'Arcy Leonard, solicitor for the Dominion Mortgage and Investment Association.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Loans by lending institutions.

Mr. EULER: This section carries what seems to me a rather peculiar provision, I would like to ask the minister whether I clearly understand it. It says:

5. Notwithstanding any restriction on its power to lend money, contained in any other statute or law, any lending institution subject to the jurisdiction of parliament, may lend on the security of a first mortgage given in favour of the minister and the lending institution jointly pursuant to the provisions of this act, an amount equal to eighty per cent of the cost of construction ...

But also in the same clause it says it may lend jointly with the government, I presume eighty per cent. Does that mean that the lending institution may lend eighty per cent, and is it then the presumption that the government lends the other twenty per cent?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: No. I have an amendment here, changing the words "equal to" to "up to." I think that makes it plainer. The idea is that as the company holds a share of the first mortgage up to eighty per cent, as far as corporations subject to the jurisdiction of parliament are concerned we are giving them authority to do that although their charter may limit them to sixty per cent.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I have not made myself clear. Can the lending company lend the eighty per cent and the government the other twenty per cent, is that the intention?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Not at all.

Mr. EULER: Or is the eighty per cent intended to be sixty per cent by the lending institution and twenty per cent by the government?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Certainly, sixty per cent by the lending institution and twenty per cent by the government.

Mr. EULER: The clause distinctly states that the lending institution may lend up to eighty per cent. If it does, then the government must lend the other twenty per cent, because they are joined in the mortgage.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: If the hon. gentleman can suggest any better wording I am prepared to consider it, but the fact is that if the company takes a part of an eighty per cent mortgage they have got to be given authority to lend up to eighty per cent, or else they cannot join in at all, because they only get a share of an eighty per cent mortgage.

Mr. EULER: Then it does as a matter of fact empower the company to lend up to eighty per cent if it is foolish enough or desires to do so.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Legally I suppose that is correct.

Mr. EULER: The intention is not that they shall lend eighty per cent and the government twenty per cent?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: The intention is to regularize this provision, that they lend sixty per cent and the government twenty per cent.

In this clause also, after the word "mortgage" in the fourth line should be inserted the words "or hypothec" the same as in the other.

Mr. DUPRE: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DUPRE: I also move:

That section 5 be amended by striking out the words "equal to" in the sixth line and substituting the words "up to."

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 6 to 8 inclusive agreed to.

SECOND NARROWS BRIDGE

Right Hon. SIR GEORGE PERLEY (for the Minister of Marine) moved the second reading of Bill No. 118, respecting the bridge across the Second Narrows of Burrard inlet in the province of British Columbia.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Bridge declared to be a lawful work not interfering with navigation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask the right hon. gentleman if the substance of this bill has been communicated to the parties interested in North Vancouver and Vancouver city?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: As I understand it this bill has been brought in at the suggestion and request of the people out there who are interested, but if my hon. friend has any doubt about it I will let it stand. I am sorry I am unable to answer the question definitely, but from the discussion yesterday I understood that this bill was suggested or asked for by the people interested.

Section agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MORTGAGE CREDITS FOR FISHERMEN

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure for the purpose of establishing a system of long term mortgage credit for fishermen, under the administration of the Canadian Farm Loan Board, and to authorize the government of Canada to provide initial capital in an amount not exceeding three hundred thousand dollars, and to subscribe an amount of five per cent of the capital stock as loans are made; to purchase fishermen's long term loan bonds in an amount not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars; and to guarantee the principal and interest of such bonds to an amount not exceeding one million dollars.

Mr. DUFF: Explain.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Speaker, the question of providing facilities for granting loans to fishermen is one which has given the government a considerable amount of concern for some time, not only because of the representations which have been made to it by fishermen's associations, by members of this house and by the public which is interested, but also because the majority report of the royal commission on price spreads draws it to the attention of the government and asks that it should receive early and favourable consideration.

At this stage I suggest that we consider the purpose of the resolution; the details as to how the loans are to be granted may be dealt with when we have the bill before us. The resolution suggests that it is expedient to bring in a measure for the purpose of establishing a system of long term mortgage credits for fishermen, and the government considers that the best way to administer this measure is that it be put into the hands of the Canadian Farm Loan Board for that purpose. At one time it was thought that it might be well merely to pass an amendment to the Canadian Farm Loan Act, but on consideration it was found that the wording of the clauses so frequently tied that measure up entirely to farmers and agricultural land that it was decided to introduce a separate bill and in that bill to provide that these mortgage credits should be placed under the administration of the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

Financial provision would necessarily have to be made for the funds from which the loans could be made, and the government suggests starting that fund by a contribution of $300,000 in very much the same way that the Canadian Farm Loan Board was started. Further it undertakes to subscribe to the long term bonds which will be issued to an amount not exceeding $500,000 and to accept contingent liability besides that in the form of a guarantee for $1,000,000 of bonds.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we can proceed to the committee stage it will be easier for hon. members to follow the terms of the bill when we have it before us.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Mr. NEILL: Will the rates and other conditions as to the term of the loan and so on be practically the same as under the Canadian Farm Loan Board Act?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, it is along the line of the Canadian Farm Loan Board Act. When we have the bill before us I think the hon. member will see that it is similar in its terms.

Mr. DUFF: May I ask if the bill is to be introduced this evening?

Mr. STIRLING: That is the intention.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stirling thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 120, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of long term mortgage credits for fishermen.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 70, to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, subclause 5 of the Senate amendment was sent back to the Senate. The Senate had proposed an amendment to subclause 5 in which this house did not concur and the Senate was so notified. Now they have suggested a substitute amendment which is really a compromise and will be satisfactory to the officials of the department. It will be found on page 608 of the votes and proceedings of Friday last.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Read the amendment, please.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It reads:

(5) In any proceedings under this act in respect of an alleged deficiency of weight or measure of any prepackaged goods the court shall, subject to the provisions of the next following subsection, disregard any inconsiderable variation in the weight or measure of any single trade, but for the purposes of the next following subsection the court shall have regard to the proved average weight or measure of a reasonable number of other articles of the same kind, if any,

(a) sold or delivered by the defendant within any period of time not exceeding one week, or

(6) When a deficiency appears from the proved average weight or measure as mentioned in the next preceding subsection the court shall, all other elements of the offence being established, convict in respect of the actual deficiency in the weight or measure of any single article or articles which is one or more of those which contribute to or produce such proved average weight or measure and all prepackaged articles of the same kind as that sold or delivered which are found in the possession of the defendant within forty-eight hours after the sale or delivery shall be deemed to have been in the possession of the defendant on the same occasion as that of the sale or delivery, and to have been then and so in his possession for the purpose of sale or delivery, unless he proves the contrary to the satisfaction of the court.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

MARKETING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. 117, to amend the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the first amendment is for the purpose of extending the scope of the definition "natural product" to include such articles as are wholly or partly manufactured or derived from a product of the forest. The second amendment is to make provision for the dominion marketing board to lend money to organizations after they have been set up to finance them until the means to raise funds provided in their scheme has become effective.

Mr. YOUNG: Does that mean financing for the purpose of paying for the commodity?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No. The next section of the bill, section 4, is new. It provides:

(9) Notwithstanding any provision of this act, any scheme of regulation may provide solely for equalization to any extent, as between the producers, of the returns received from the sale of the regulated product.

Mr. YOUNG: Does that refer to pooling?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No. It has reference to a scheme upon which a good deal of work has been done. I have the dairy industry in mind. To a certain extent it could refer to pooling, but that is taken care of in another way. If for any cause one product of the dairy industry—for instance, butter, whole milk, evaporated products, or cheese—got out of line with the world market price and the producers in another branch of the industry switched their product to the branch receiving the higher market price, the result would be that the quantities would be so increased that the price would be reduced to the world market basis. Under such circumstances the fund set up for these purposes would be used to equalize the price on the product of the other branch of the industry to prevent such development.

[Sir George Perley.]

The last amendment states that:

(1) Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction—

And so on. The amendment puts the onus on the person who has the product for sale or is disposing of such product within the regulated area. The responsibility is placed upon him to show proof as to whether or not the product originated in or outside of the regulated area.

Mr. NEILL: Could the minister explain the term "determination"?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Possibly it would be better to do so in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Payments authorized.

Mr. YOUNG: I should like an explanation of this section.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In connection with a scheme placed before the dominion marketing board and passed by the governor in council one of the features would be a small levy charged for operating expenses of the board. However until the scheme had been in operation for some time no such fund would be set up, so this is to provide money to finance the board's expenses.

Mr. YOUNG: The local board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, operation of local boards. This section has been put in to eliminate any doubt which may have existed in the act. It is not a fund established for purchasing or selling any product.

Mr. YOUNG: What expenses are local boards likely to incur?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will these loans be returned?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is the intention that the loans shall be returned. In an initial operation it may be that there would be office and travelling expenses.

Mr. YOUNG: Organization expenses?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. YOUNG: Propaganda?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Just setting up shop, as it were.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Equalization of returns.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is meant by the expression "equalization to any extent as between the producers"?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe the explanation I gave before covered the point. I discussed a possible condition in the dairy industry. If the price of a dairy product, due to any cause, became out of line with the world market price and the producers in another branch of dairying transferred their product to that part receiving the greater price, the quantities would be increased and the world market price would be reduced. The fund set up would equalize returns for the product going into the other branch of the industry.

Mr. YOUNG: In the event of the price of butter declining does the minister contemplate the board having power to order certain farmers to stop making butter and to turn their milk into cheese?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No; it does not mean that at all. If the dairy industry decided that it was in their interests as a whole, a fund could be set up through a levy on the producers themselves to be used to assist the whole milk producers, if that product were lower in price than other commodities in the industry, so that it would be to their advantage to continue producing the product rather than switching to the manufacture of another article which would force it on the world market and lower the price. A great deal of work has been done in this connection and agreement reached so far as the dairy industry is concerned, but there is still considerable work to be done.

Mr. YOUNG: That would mean the regulation of production.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No; it has nothing to do with the regulation or restriction of production.

Mr. YOUNG: If the farmers producing butter found that the price was not satisfactory and determined of their own volition to turn their milk into cheese, this provides that they shall be bonused not to do so.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, but they are not interfered with. They could go ahead and send their product to be manufactured into cheese.

Mr. YOUNG: But this contemplates putting a levy on all dairy farmers—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Equalizing.

Mr. YOUNG: —and using the money to bonus one class of dairy farmers to turn their milk into a certain product.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): If they themselves so desire.

Mr. NEILL: This is somewhat after the Patterson scheme in Australia.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Somewhat.

Mr. YOUNG: They can put their milk into that product or not, as they choose, but they have no choice in regard to paying the levy.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not if they agree that it is to their advantage.

Mr. YOUNG: Will no one have to pay if he decides not to?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They will, if the majority decide that it is to their advantage.

Mr. BERTRAND: This would mean that a certain levy would be made on milk producers and this levy would be set aside as a fund to be returned to the producers of cheese, supposing that to be the product affected. The minister says that this will be done provided the producers ask for it. This levy will be made and will be returned in some way to the producers of cheese or butter—let us say cheese for the moment. Take a certain district where a number of producers are in favour of such a scheme, others being opposed to it. Suppose the farmers were shipping milk to the dairies in the cities; would they be compelled to pay the levy, and how would they be made to do so? Would the levy be paid through the dairies, who would reduce their rates to the farmers, or would the dairies pay the money into the fund, or how would it be managed?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would depend entirely on the provision of the scheme.

Mr. BERTRAND: Is any such scheme under way?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No such scheme has been approved, but a good deal of work has been done by the milk federation organization and also by the national dairy council. This scheme was also put before the dairy industry in Ontario, and during the past few months they have been bringing it before their cheese patrons, with the assistance of the provincial government.

Mr. BERTRAND: Would the stabilization fund be returned to all producers of a certain commodity, or would it apply only to exports of that commodity?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would depend entirely on the scheme, whether it was decided to assist all producers or only the product for export. If it were decided to take the product off the market, all producers would benefit equally, just as if they were paid individually.

Mr. BERTRAND: I have asked these questions for this reason. Certain propaganda is going around in our district at the present time—I refer to the Ottawa valley. The farmers are saying that they are going to be bonused so much through a levy that will be made on their products and so much on the cheese they will export, and I am at a loss to know how it will be controlled. How will it be known that a certain quantity coming from a particular district is for export or local consumption?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The export shipments would determine that, but I do not get the point of the question. Before any such scheme would be considered by the marketing board its purpose would have to be set out very definitely, and every opportunity would have to be given the producers themselves to declare on it. Moreover, the details would have to be made clear. I am not in a position, however, to say what will be done until a specific scheme is put before the board on myself.

Mr. BERTRAND: Suppose this scheme were put into force, would it affect all the producers of cheese, for example, and all producers in one province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would depend entirely on the scheme.

Mr. BERTRAND: That is not quite satisfactory. The producers of cheese practically all operate under the same conditions. Take the manufacture of cheddar cheese, for instance; the producers practically all have the same conditions to contend with in any one province. Would the scheme affect the whole of one province or only a certain area? If the scheme is to apply only to a certain area we can readily see how the others will be affected.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I can only say that until the scheme is submitted no definite information can be given. There might be a dozen different schemes which hon. gentlemen here might have in mind, and until a specific scheme is submitted I do not see how I can give any further answer. I regret that I cannot.

Mr. YOUNG: Perhaps we can understand this better by taking a concrete case. Suppose the farmers supplying fluid milk to Ottawa are not satisfied with the returns; then, if I understand this scheme, they can come together and agree that if ten per cent of their number cease shipping fluid milk into Ottawa and turn their milk into cheese they can get that scheme approved and make a levy on all the farmers supplying fluid milk to Ottawa, on all those making butter and cheese, in order to bonus that ten per cent to make cheese instead of selling milk in fluid form.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would be a very limited application of the scheme. Personally, I do not see how a scheme of that kind would ever be submitted, because it would have a tendency to increase the number of farmers who would be shipping whole milk to Ottawa, so that they would affect the market in the hope that they likewise would be subsidized if they went into cheese. My own impression is that such a scheme could not be carried out unless it took in the whole of the dominion. The basis of the scheme is that the whole dairy industry in Canada outside the local farmers themselves would have to be taken into this before it could be made effective.

Mr. YOUNG: Let us carry the case one step further and say that all the farmers in Canada who are selling fluid milk in the cities are not satisfied with the price they are getting; then they shall be permitted to levy a tax on all the dairy farmers, those who sell fluid milk, those who make butter and those who make cheese, in order to bonus a portion of those who now sell fluid milk so that they will make cheese instead.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The whole milk producers themselves would not submit such a scheme because they would have no authority —that is the basis of the marketing act—to make a levy on any person outside themselves.

Mr. YOUNG: If the scheme is approved, they can.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme could not be approved because they could make a levy only on those agreeing to it or those that are taken into the scheme a majority of whom vote for it.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister take a concrete case and show what would happen and how they would bring it about?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member for Weyburn is asking a very far-reaching question.

Mr. YOUNG: It is a far-reaching bill.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, it is far-reaching, but the hon. member will be fair enough to admit that I could not be expected here to outline in detail a scheme for the whole dairy industry of the dominion. That would be done by the producers themselves, and in fact they are working on it through their organizations. But what I endeavoured to tell the hon. gentleman was this, that if all those engaged in the distribution and sale of fluid milk to the cities throughout the whole dominion agreed amongst themselves that, because they were not getting a sufficient price for their milk, they would make a levy on all those sending it to the cities and would use that fund to subsidize a certain number of those supplying whole milk to the cities to go into the manufacture of cheese or butter, that would induce others to send whole milk to the cities as well, and any such scheme to be effective should have the support of practically the whole dairy industry of Canada.

Mr. BROWN: Does the minister not think it would be time enough to introduce a bill of this kind when he can give us some definite scheme showing how this would be brought about?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The scheme that is being considered at the present time—and perhaps that is what the hon. member has in mind—is of this nature: the fact that the creameries or those who are engaged in the production of butter get a price for their product that is above the world price and very considerably above it throughout the year because we are on an export basis for only a short period, has the effect that those farmers who have been sending their milk to the cheese factories have had a tendency to turn from sending their milk there to sending it to the creameries. Coincident with that the whole milk farmers who send their whole or fluid milk to the cities have also been getting a price out of line with that which the farmers get who send their milk to the cheese factories. The result was that many farmers who had not before considered sending their milk to the cities commenced doing so, the effect being that the price of the whole milk going into the cities was very much broken. The government of Ontario found it necessary to set up a milk board to see if in some way they could not regulate the fluid milk that was going into the city markets, and similarly the government of Quebec carried on a very extensive investigation into the sale of fluid milk in the large cities of that province because many more people were wanting to avail themselves of that market owing to the comparatively low price of cheese in comparison with that of fluid milk. Those engaged in the dairy industry realized that if that condition of affairs were to continue, it would be impossible for any provincial board to enforce legislation that would prevent a farmer across the line fence from taking advantage of the same market that his neighbour was taking advantage of.

Similarly, in connection with butter, if great numbers of farmers were to send large quantities of whole milk to the creameries instead of to the cheese factories, the result would be that the increase in the production of butter would be such that we would be on the export market for butter. The effect would be, that the price of butter would come to the world level. Cheese would then have a premium over butter, and the result would be that the farmers would switch back to sending their milk to the cheese factories. The export of cheese would again commence with this obstacle facing it, however, that the market which they had established and enjoyed had been lost and perhaps their facilities disappeared because of what had been done. This is the problem which the whole dairy industry throughout the dominion has been grappling with for the past number of years. At one time, I think it was some three years ago, if we take the creamery industry alone, all but two of the large creameries agreed that they would make a levy among themselves to take care of the surplus because it was a very small one.

The reason this bill is before us now and not waiting until a scheme has been submitted to the board or until it is felt a scheme should go into effect is, that the farmers themselves, those who send their milk to the creameries and those who sell their whole milk to the cities, have got together and have held a large number of meetings throughout the country. But the difficulty is this, not to regulate the market as to cheese, but to equalize the whole dairy industry. That is why this amendment is being introduced; it is to deal with such a scheme as that, and I am taking the dairy industry as an illustration.

Mr. DUFF: How does it affect the consumer?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The minister has used dairying as an illustration. I would infer from that that any commodity, most of which is consumed in the domestic market and a very small part of which goes into export, could be brought under this legislation. I wonder whether the Justice department has had anything to do with the drafting of this bill, because for the life of me I could not make anything out of it; and after hearing the minister's explanation I am not sure that I know very much more. The way this bill is drafted, it seems to be a fearful tangle. It may apply to many commodities but none are mentioned in this bill. From the reply which the minister gave to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), it appears to be equivalent to what was and I believe is still called the Patterson plan in Australia; that is a levy was put on all the butter made in that country for the purpose of taking care of the loss on the export. They applied that to Canada and Canada did not like it, with the result that we imposed a dumping duty and kept Australian butter out of this country. Is my hon. friend not afraid that if he starts any monkeying like this with any other countries importing butter, they will object just as we did and put a dumping duty against ours? I do not believe the minister is satisfied with the way in which he is launching out on this new venture for Canada. It is a mighty uncertain sea that he is launching on; I do not see where he is going to land and I do not think he does himself. Surely further words can be used that will better express what he has in mind so that others besides himself and his staff will understand. For my part I did not and do not know yet as this section is drafted, what it means. If the Justice department understands what it means, if it is working out a Patterson plan to apply to anything of which we only have a small export surplus, it should say so rather than leave us to guess what it is to apply to. Could it be made a little plainer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This was drafted by the Justice department. It was felt that any person could understand it. I do not see how we could make it any simpler.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is too simple for me.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): One point the hon. member has made is that one of the conditions would be to remove something from the domestic market and thus get into difficulties in the export market. It might be that there would be no export, that it would be simply to encourage in the domestic market one of the allied products that could be consumed locally.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is there any relation between this and the million dollar stabilization fund provided in the supplementary estimates for cheese, I think it is?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A scheme could be brought in under that, but I think the hon. member will agree that it will be more satisfactory to leave the item in the estimates.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But is there any relation between the two?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There might be. For example while a scheme was being contemplated the fund in the supplementary estimates could be used, not by the board, but to equalize the market while that was being done. No one realizes better than the hon. member what a large undertaking it is, but those engaged in it are hopeful of success and have met with very fine support from one end of the country to the other. They have been working on it for months.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Is this from Mr. Fraser of the national dairy council?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, the Justice department and our own officials.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not a farmer but perhaps I might clarify the situation. Was this principle not in effect in British Columbia for a short time, under the Fraser Valley Products Marketing Act, passed during 1928 or 1927, until it was declared ultra vires?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): They had a pooling plan but not a scheme such as this. As a matter of fact the Fraser Valley is operating under the marketing act at the present time.

Mr. MacINNIS: Was this principle accepted?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It was accepted by them.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think this is what they wanted.

Mr. YOUNG: I have the figures before me of the prices paid certain farmers in certain districts. Those supplying milk to the city got $1.50 per one hundred pounds, while those who did not send it to the city but to the cheese factory got 61 cents. Will the minister tell us how he is to equalize that under the scheme?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Equalization to any extent depends on the scheme submitted by the producers themselves. It is the producers who submit the scheme. It will be examined by the dominion marketing board; if they think any changes desirable they will recommend them to the producers for their consideration, and when the scheme meets with the approval of the dominion marketing board and the producers who submit it, it will be placed before all the producers and explained and they will vote on it.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it contemplated that the farmers who sell their milk in fluid form, those who send it to a cheese factory, and those who send it to the creamery or to the drying plant shall be got together from all over the dominion and agree on how the market shall be apportioned between the various groups?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, there will be no apportioning of the market. What has been done for the past six or eight months is getting in touch with farmers sending their cream to the creameries or their milk to the cheese factories or the cities, and this is one of the difficulties they have run into. There will be no apportionment so far as the number of farmers who will send their milk or cream to the different outlets is concerned, but they will themselves work out what assistance shall be given to one branch to equalize it with the others so that the market will not be slipping from one to the other and breaking the whole market.

Mr. YOUNG: If it should appear that farmers sending their milk to the cheese factories are more prosperous than the others, does this scheme contemplate taxing those farmers along with the others in order to induce more farmers to go into that particular branch?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That would depend on whether or not the farmers who were more prosperous felt that their prosperity would be endangered if some steps were not taken. They themselves would be prepared to take steps to equalize in order to keep further products from coming in and competing with themselves.

Mr. YOUNG: Those in the less profitable branch are going to be taxed to invite other people to come into their business, if I understand this scheme.

Mr. POULIOT: I suggest to the minister the initiation of propaganda to prevent any more hard cheese being manufactured—only soft cheese. It would be good for the farmers to cease producing butter if this legislation is passed, and having no butter to butter their bread they should have soft cheese to take its place, if this legislation is as good as the minister says it is. I have been listening to him very carefully since I came in about fifteen minutes ago, and I understood nothing at all of what he said. Moreover the hon. gentleman did not seem to understand himself what he was explaining. What is the use of marketing schemes when there is no sale? The prices of butter and cheese are low because the farmers have no market; everyone knows that. Here we are changing a definition, a definition which is not a definition, because the laws are always well drafted in the Department of Agriculture as in other departments. It is a description; here it is: "Natural product" includes animals, "meats"—well, that is part of an animal—"eggs"—they are the product of an animal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: A bird.

Mr. POULIOT: Well they are produced by an animal with two legs, two wings and feathers. Then, "wool"—wool has to be clipped from an animal—"dairy products, grains, seeds, fruit and fruit products." That is not very clear. Wine is a fruit product. Then:

> —vegetables and vegetable products, maple products, honey, tobacco, lumber and such other natural products of agriculture and of the forest, sea, lake or river and such article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product, and such article wholly or partly manufactured or derived from a product of the forest as may be designated by the governor in council.

That drafting is absurd. I have often complained about the wrong way legislation is drafted. It includes everything and includes nothing. You find in that the land and the sea, and the sky is the limit. It is a constellation of products. They try to include everything in a few words in order to be able to tell the farmer: We are the saviours of this country. If you are living now you owe it to us. We have control over hens, and their products—I mean eggs—and the sheep and their products—I mean wool—and everything on the land. We have control over all those things through the farm loan board. They loan the money and they have chattel mortgages on everything belonging to the farmers. It is state control of the farm industry by this government in that way; they have destroyed the credit of the farmers and now they have to loan them money.

There is something else I want to say about this legislation, which I call cocasse, a word for which there is no English equivalent. How many marketing schemes are there throughout this country in connection with animals? According to what the minister has stated, there are very few if any. In connection with meats I think there is one scheme, no more. If the minister says there are more I will go upstairs and check Hansard of the other day, when he said there were very few schemes. In Ontario we have the tobacco and apple schemes. The minister said the fruit and jam schemes were in force throughout Canada. There must be something else to sustain the hard working consumer of farm products; even an unemployed man cannot exist on jam and fruit only. That is a hard diet. Sometimes it is prescribed by doctors, but that diet does not include the fruits grown in Canada; that diet contains oranges, which are not grown under the supervision of the Minister of Agriculture. Everyone is "jammed" by this legislation. Eggs are still mentioned in this definition, although the minister knows very well that the prairie provinces voted down a scheme in connection with eggs. But this act does not apply to eggs only; hens and roosters come under it as well.

There is no scheme for wool. What about dairy products? The minister is trying to do something to increase the production of cheese, which will have the effect of decreasing the production of butter, so he will go from Scylla to Charybdis. There is more than that, sir. I find it most absurd, and I take the liberty of telling you so. What will be the price of butter if a scheme is put into force in connection with that product? Is the minister able to tell the committee what will be the exact price of butter the day the scheme comes into force and what will be the prices one month and two months later? During the campaign the Prime Minister said, "You will sell your butter for sixty cents a pound as soon as I come into power." Is the minister bold enough to repeat what the Prime Minister said? No, sir; if he does he will be laughed at. This is an awful mess; that is all there is to it.

Now, sir, we come to grain, and I hope I will get some information in this regard. Then there is seed, in connection with which there is no marketing scheme. So far as grain is concerned we have only the mysterious wheat board, but that is entirely different. It is something Special; it is in a class by itself and no one knows much about it. The minister has said that schemes in connection with fruit and fruit products are in force in all the provinces, and the other day the Minister of Agriculture said that in the good old province of Ontario there was a scheme in force with regard to apples. Then we come to vegetables and vegetable products. There is a scheme in operation in connection with potatoes. That is in eastern Canada; the western provinces do not care for a scheme for marketing potatoes. I wonder if that scheme has been successful in the east up to the present. I know the farmers complained that they were not able to sell their products for a very long time. There is no scheme in force in connection with maple products, or in connection with honey. In Ontario there is a scheme in operation in connection with flue cured tobacco, and here I have something special to say. While the Ottawa agreements were being discussed in this house the Prime Minister said "You must increase your production." One member from Essex county—it was not you, sir, thank God—said that with the Ottawa agrements the farmers would increase their production of tobacco. What happened? The farmers bought large areas of land for the cultivation of tobacco and they sold more tobacco to England. Then the market became jammed; there was enough tobacco in England to supply the demand for many years. That is why prices have fallen. That is why we have seen the advertisements inserted in all the newspapers by the Imperial Tobacco Company recommending a reduction in the tobacco acreage. When the Ottawa agreements were being discussed the password and motto of the government was "increase production." Now if the hon. gentleman is ready to give a subsidy to those who have cheese factories I will not object, because I cannot object to the government giving anything to the farmers who are in distress. If on the other hand he recommends that they increase their production when there is no sale it will be a great mistake on his part. The policy with regard to tobacco, as with regard to other farm and natural products, has been a complete failure.

Now we come to lumber. Everyone knows that after the tariff was increased by this government the United States government imposed a duty of $3 per thousand feet on sawn lumber. That was a measure of retaliation that killed the lumber trade in Canada. Now the government say they will market the lumber. The only way that can be done is by coming to an agreement with the United States in order to have the duty of $3 removed, which will help clear the yards which are still full of sawn lumber which has not been sold to the United States. Then the bill says:

—and such article wholly or partly manufactured or derived from a product of the forest—

Now we are coming to the pulp industry. The arrangement which was come to through the intervention of the federal government last winter was a failure. Then we come to the products of the sea. That includes whales and whale hot dogs. I can see the minister in charge of a lunch counter selling whale hot dogs.

Mr. MITCHELL: This bill does not control bologna.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not quite catch the remark. If the hon. gentleman said bologna I never heard of it before.

Natural product also includes "the product of lake or river and such article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured." What astounds me, Mr. Chairman, is the thickness of the legislation which has been passed by this government. The trouble with it is that it is just as thick as fog; no one can see clearly through it. Not only that, but if you have read the morning paper, sir, you must have seen an interview given by a very distinguished New Zealander saying that the trouble in these times is too much legislation. The individuality of a man exists no more. Men are told through the legislation enacted by this government to lean on the government all the time. The government is too light a crutch to support the people of this country and they fall down. We have too much of this kind of legislation.

I wish to take this opportunity to make a formal protest against all the legislation which has been enacted by this government since 1930. I am against every bit of it. Even if my name does not appear in the votes and proceedings as voting against it, I am against it, and if I had been in the house the other day when the price spreads legislation was submitted I would have voted with my hon. friend from Weyburn (Mr. Young) against it. I am against it through and through because it is insipid and stupid. It is just a bluff to deceive the people that the government are going to do this and that. But the government will not be judged by the future; they will be judged by their record. I am just back from my constituency where the farmers are in distress. They say: "We have never suffered as much as we are suffering now. What is the matter in Ottawa? Has the Prime Minister tender feet? Is he unwilling to have the general election and give us a chance to express our views on the insanity of the legislation passed since 1930?" The farmers gave me that message to give to the house. I cannot give it to the house at the moment because the house is not sitting, but I take this first opportunity to rise and give the message to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Chairman, I would gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that he is slightly opposed at least to some of the legislation passed by the present government during the last four or five years. Practically everything that he has said has been aside from this section. I would however make just one remark, and it is this. The test of whether this legislation is sound and of whether there was a need felt for it is the action taken by the producers themselves, and in criticizing the legislation my hon. friend can only be understood as criticizing those who have availed themselves of it as doing an unsound thing. The act will not have been in force for a year until next August, and as everyone knows, when you set up new legislation such as this it takes some time to get it under way. Yet in spite of that, there have been producers from one end of Canada to the other who believed that there was in this legislation something that they needed, especially under conditions such as prevail at the present time. The result has been that without any inducement on the part of government officials or the government itself we already have in operation fourteen schemes throughout the dominion, and the annual value of the products handled by these schemes at a conservative estimate is over $43,000,000. I think perhaps that is the best answer that I can give, that the producers from one end of the dominion to the other have felt that under present conditions there is in this legislation an instrument which they can use to stabilize their products and get the most out of them at the present time.

The hon. member also spoke of the poultry scheme in western Canada. I repeat what I stated here some three or four weeks ago that so far as Alberta and Saskatchewan are concerned the scheme carried over 60 votes out of every 100. The big objection to it came in the neighbourhood of cities, particularly in Manitoba but also in Saskatchewan and Alberta. We felt that that did not mean that they were against the marketing act but that there was a considerable proportion of the producers, quite a long way from a majority of them, who were against some of the features of that particular scheme, and while they opposed it they are in favour of other schemes under the act. I did not intend to speak at this length, Mr. Chairman, because the observations of the hon. member were entirely aside from the section.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to say only one thing in reply to the minister. I do not criticize those producers who have accepted marketing schemes, the eastern Canada marketing scheme for potatoes, for instance. The farmers there are in distress. They cannot receive anything even for the potatoes they have in their cellars. They told me that in Riviere du Loup, and very good farmers they were from the neighbouring parishes. It was a case of complete isolation for them. They could not sell their product, and of course if this helps them to get the potatoes out of their cellars they will be satisfied because the scheme cost them nothing. But the circumstances surrounding this legislation must always be considered. The potato trade has reached rock bottom. It could not be worse. The price received by the producers is not enough to pay even for the bags, and they have to insist that the bags be returned. Sometimes they make a loss on their shipments. Conditions were so bad that they accepted the potato marketing scheme, on the ground that conditions could not be any worse than they were. The minister suggests that the farmers who have accepted the eastern Canada potato marketing scheme are in the same position they occupied some years ago when they were receiving a reasonable price for their product. Then they were free to judge whether such legislation was worth anything or not, but now they are not free at all because they must get rid of their product. And, sir, it is most dangerous because if the farmers get nothing for their product they will have no incentive to continue to produce and we may come near to a famine.

The minister mentions meats. I want to say to him that on account of the policies of this government it costs a farmer several dollars to raise a young steer. The minister knows it. He knows personally about conditions in western Canada, but he does not know personally about conditions in eastern Quebec. A very industrious farmer in eastern Quebec, a man who was a medallist told me one day that the raising of young cattle meant a loss to him of $8. How can our farmers continue to feed the Canadian people at a loss like that? They get nothing for their potatoes; they get nothing for their butter. Cheese is now being subsidized. We are going along in that way, waiting for better times. Every one is very much afraid of the future, and if the farmer stops producing we will face two dangers. Either he will stop producing because of the low prices he receives, or there will be an increase in production if the giving of bonuses is not well controlled. That procedure must be followed with tact.

Then there are other matters about which one could complain. In eastern Canada we have many farmers who take pride in their stock and who have tried to obtain all available information by reading the publications issued by the department of which the minister is the head. They follow scrupulously the recommendations contained in those publications. What happened? As a matter of economy the number of inspectors and propagandists of the Department of Agriculture who were helping the farmers has been greatly reduced. Protests have been received by me from an association of farmers in my constituency. I forwarded their protest to the department, but the only answer I got was an acknowledgment from the minister's secretary. The number of propagandists is still infinitely smaller than it was in 1930 when the minister took charge of this department. These farmers in eastern Canada who are artists in their trade—and there are some in western Canada as well—wanted to have the propagandists on the job to give advice in the event of something going wrong with a growing animal. These men sent out by the department were in a position to give information about feeding and caring for stock. We find however that most of them have been taken from that work; the government have stated that this is an economy measure. The information I have from people who were taking advantage of the advice offered by these propagandists is that the money spent on their salaries was spent in a most useful way. To-day money is wasted on marketing schemes, but when only a few days ago I asked the minister to make a comparison between months when this act has been in force and corresponding months of the previous year, he said he had not the information at hand. If he did not have it at hand he did not have it at all, and if he has not that information certainly he cannot tell us that the act has been beneficial. That is a very easy thing to understand, sir. He has not the information. Here is the cure; no one has tried it; it may poison you or it may cure you. It is like le baume des montagnes vertes: Si ça ne vous fait pas de bien, ça ne vous fait pas de mal. Experiments—experiments on a very large scale; experiments with the Canadian people; experiments with the unemployed; experiments with the farmers; experiments with farm products—they are experimenting all the time. I am surprised to find the Canadian people alive after all these experiments with an axe— the "axe" of wrong legislation. I hope the minister will be careful and that he will no longer suggest I am criticizing my constituents. I have never done so, because I am proud of them. I have no lesson to receive from the minister. I could meet him on any platform in eastern or western Canada and defend any stand I have taken in this chamber. Each stand I have taken has been logical and has not been as a result of prejudice. I have not made decisions after hasty consideration. My position has been taken thoughtfully first because I have considered all the facts and secondly because I was expressing the thought of my own constituents who know as much as the minister does about farming, if not more.

Mr. YOUNG: The minister has said something about making a levy to create a fund. Will he tell us how the levy is to be collected?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is set out in the scheme; it might be collected in different ways.

Mr. YOUNG: It appears to me that a levy on every person engaged in a given industry would require a considerable staff for purposes of collections. Has the minister any idea how many people would be required or what machinery would be necessary to make collections?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In any scheme in which a levy has been collected I do not think any staff has been required. Collections are made through centres.

Mr. YOUNG: In connection with schemes now in effect levies are made on the goods as they are sold. But this is a scheme to levy on all branches of an industry, no matter how the products are disposed of. A special tax collecting system will be set up.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The method of making the levy would be indicated in the scheme and the necessary staff will be set up, if any is required. But collecting a levy even in the dairy industry would not require a very great staff because it could be collected through the centres where milk is marketed or processed.

Mr. YOUNG: Once a levy is made and the fund set up I do not think the minister said it was to be kept in reserve to be used when required. Is it contemplated that this levy shall go on forever?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That depends upon the scheme submitted by the producers. All these points are dependent upon the scheme submitted by the producers.

Mr. YOUNG: Is it contemplated that a scheme may be imposed, as was done in connection with the potato scheme, without first having a vote of the producers?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the questions he asks the hon. member works from the supposition that the marketing board has contemplated the setting up of schemes. All the schemes in effect up to the present time have been contemplated not in the minds of the marketing board but in the minds of the producers themselves. I would not be in a position to say what was contemplated until a scheme had been submitted to the board.

Mr. YOUNG: Some schemes now in operation originated in the minds of some of the producers, and were put into effect before all the producers had had an opportunity to express their wishes. Could the same thing happen in the present instance?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Provision is made for all of them to express their wishes. Unless the dominion marketing board feels in view of all the circumstances the number requesting the scheme is sufficiently representative, a poll would be held or provision made for holding a poll later on. Where a poll was not held the dominion marketing board was satisfied that the wish had been expressed by a sufficiently representative number of persons. In some of these schemes, however, due to the harvesting of crops or because crops were about to be harvested, the urge was such that exception was made. That was done only after the board was satisfied that the desire of the majority of producers had been expressed.

Mr. YOUNG: I am afraid that those who would urge such a scheme as this would persuade the marketing board that the urgency is great enough to put a scheme into effect without taking a vote of those concerned. In that event the actual producers would wake up some morning to find themselves involved in a scheme in connection with which they had had no say.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member is unfair in his statements. I have one scheme in mind, the tree fruit scheme of British Columbia, which had been in operation for a season before a vote was taken. After that season of operation at least ninety-four per cent of the producers voted in favour of it. The last time we were discussing the Natural Products Marketing Act, when the estimates were before the committee, I indicated that in Nova Scotia the scheme was supported by a very great majority. The board is particularly careful, in connection with schemes such as this, to satisfy itself that they have the support of a sufficiently representative number of producers practically to voice the unanimous feeling of the producers themselves. If there is any doubt a poll will be held before any scheme is put into effect.

Mr. YOUNG: What power will the board have to enforce the collection of a levy it makes, supposing some producer does not want to pay?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is power in the act; it is a collectable debt due the crown.

Mr. BERTRAND: The minister said a moment ago that the producers would have a chance to express their wishes. What opportunity will be given them, and how will they express their wishes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In certain schemes it might be through organizations where there is a complete sign-up of those in the organization. In other schemes, because of the limited number, a register is taken of all producers and they are asked to sign the petition. In other instances, like the poultry scheme in western Canada, a vote has been taken. There, although a large majority were in favour of it, the board, because of its feeling that in connection with such a scheme, and to have it work out satisfactorily, there should be a very large majority—and as I say a majority was polled in two provinces —turned down the scheme.

Mr. BERTRAND: I am very much interested in the minister's declaration that in some instances they will sign up. Will the minister satisfy himself with respect to a certain list of producers who have signed up, having that list transmitted to his department, indicating that these people want to have the scheme?

Mr WEIR (Melfort): The board will satisfy itself as to whether or not the list is representative. In some instances men have been sent out to make a thorough check-up where there has been any doubt. The board is convinced that a scheme such as this should not be put into effect unless it is thoroughly satisfied that the scheme is in accordance with the wishes of the producers.

Mr. BERTRAND: At present there is a certain move in our district and recently I have met several directors of cheese factories. I was not aware that this scheme was under way but I am now finding out exactly what the situation is. I was told that the patrons of cheese factories were asked to sign a petition to the government requesting a bonus, and when I inquired as to what they had done they replied, "Oh, we all voted for the bonus." If this is to be the request to the department, if these farmers are under the impression that they are asking for a bonus when as a matter of fact what they will get is a levy, then I can assure the minister that this is not expressing the wishes of the farmers. This statement is the result of a personal contact I have had with the producers themselves, who so informed me.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What the hon. member has in mind, I think, is this. In Ontario the patrons of cheese factories held a number of meetings at which a scheme was put forward, not by any of the officials of the department nor by any officials of the dominion marketing board, but a scheme in which the provincial Department of Agriculture was particularly interested to the extent of advancing $10,000 to some of their officials to put the matter before the cheese patrons in that province; and the information received by the dominion marketing board after investigation would lead them to believe that this scheme was very substantially supported. We are informed that they thoroughly understood it. So far as the dominion department or the dominion marketing board is concerned, however, no part whatever was taken in the presentation of that scheme.

Mr. BERTRAND: I do not mean to say that the Minister of Agriculture, through his department or through any of his officials, has been spreading any such propaganda, but I did say that propaganda of the kind has been carried on. I am not prepared to say who is responsible for it, but I will find out over the week-end. At any rate, I will ask the minister to make sure that he does not inaugurate any scheme on petitions signed under conditions such as I have mentioned.

Mr. BROWN: May I ask the minister to be a little more definite in his statements as to the genesis of this bill. Did it have its origin in his mind or does it come from the officers of the department, or has it come forward from the representatives of producers' organizations? If that is so, what organizations have made representations in favour of the move? Let us have more information regarding the origin of it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Or did it come over the ether waves?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It would be impossible to give an absolute answer to the hon. member. These amendments for the most part are the result of representations made by the producer organizations themselves. Some of them wished to have a scheme accepted and found that there was a difficulty under the act as it stood, and so they wished to have certain amendments. Others who had acts in operation desired to have certain matters clarified, and one of the sections was introduced for that purpose. Another had reference to schemes that had been under way in the hope that they could be financed until sufficient funds could be raised, but they got into difficulties which handicapped their successful operation. That is why the submissions were made to the dominion marketing board that loans should be provided, as the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) so tersely put it, to set the house in order until funds came in to assist them.

Mr. BROWN: What organizations have made representations in this connection?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Some of the fourteen boards already set up, the national dairy council, the federation of milk producers and the whole milk association in Ontario and Quebec, who have been working on the dairy scheme, and also the tree fruit scheme in British Columbia. In addition to the fourteen schemes already in operation there are applications from twenty-six other organizations to take advantage of the provisions of the act, and in some of their schemes, when submitted to the board, it was found that certain changes had to be made.

Mr. MILLS: In western Ontario we have in operation what is known as the bean scheme. It has been considered to be operating to the detriment of the bean producers and I would ask the minister whether those producers will be consulted before being forced to market the 1935 crop under the marketing act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There is provision for a vote by the bean producers.

Mr. POULIOT: I wish to make a correction. Possibly I made a slip and used the word "useful" instead of "useless," but my humble view is that this legislation is useless, and the general opinion will be in accordance with this statement. We hear about the wish of the farmers with regard to these schemes. The universal and unanimous wish of the Canadian people is not to vote for this or that scheme but to have a general election as soon as possible.

Mr. MILLS: I want to know whether these bean producers are going to be or want to be consulted under the marketing act. When these men came back and announced that they were going to sell the farmers' beans, beans were selling at the elevators at $1.58 for three-pound pickers. The marketing board set their price at $1.50 for one-pound pickers. It would not have been so bad if they could have sold their beans, but this curtailed the sales. Bean sales went down immediately and the bean producers in my county are in my opinion not satisfied with the bean scheme. What I want to know is whether the bean producers are going to be asked whether they want the 1935 crop sold under the marketing act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I feel I answered the hon. gentleman's question before when I stated that there was provision for a vote if a vote was desired. The hon. member said that beans were bringing $1.50 a bushel. At what time was that? Was it at the time this scheme was set up or some years before?

Mr. MILLS: They were paying $1.58 at the elevators at Rodney when this scheme came into force, and the price was set at $1.50 for one-pound pickers at that time. The bean marketing board continued for about a month and failed to make sales. They threw up their hands and allowed the elevators to sell their own beans. All the marketing board is doing to-day is collecting a royalty of two cents on every bushel of beans sold by the farmers.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is spilling the beans.

Mr. MILLS: I would like to know whether these bean growers are going to be consulted as to whether this has to continue.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There will have to be a change of government.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. gentleman is mistaken in thinking the bean producers are selling their beans under the control of the marketing act. They are not; they never have been.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): In justice at least to those within this chamber and outside of it, who, as I have stated on previous occasions, are engaged in the production of natural products in this country, the minister should let us know exactly what he has in mind as to what can be done under this bill. In order not to delay the committee, I should like to couple with that question a request to the minister, if I am in order, to break down the item of $1,000,000 which I presume is to be voted under the Natural Products Marketing Act. I do not wish to be misunderstood by the minister. My first question is: What does he believe can be attained under the extension or expansion or development of the Natural Products Marketing Act under Bill No. 117; and, second, will he kindly break down for the committee the item of $1,000,000 that we are now asked to vote under the same act? If I get a definite reply to those two questions, we may be able to proceed.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I would call the attention of the committee to the fact that we are not discussing the Natural Products Marketing Act as a whole; we are now discussing the amendment in section 4 of this bill.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I thank the minister for his explanation. The fact is that it is just as clear as mud. We are discussing section 4 of Bill 117. Let us read the section:

> Section 4 of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—
> "(9) Notwithstanding any provision of this act, any scheme of regulation may provide solely for equalization to any extent, as between the producers, of the returns received from the sale of the regulated product."

I am very sorry that the minister did not reply to my question, which gave him far more scope than it is my intention to give him at the present time. Will he kindly explain to the committee if this bill empowers the levying of, what shall I call it?—a tax upon the producers of a regulated product in order that the proceeds from that tax or levy may be distributed to equalize the price over all that branch of the productive industry, if it is cheese or whatever it may be? That is my direct question now.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It is the purpose of this amendment to give power to the producers themselves to do so, but not to levy on one producer to give to a producer who has not paid a levy.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): We have had this question over and over again. The minister states that it is to give power to a local board—and if I am wrong perhaps he will correct me—to levy a tax on all the producers in a certain industry. Am I right?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It depends on the scheme they submit.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): It gives power to levy a tax on the producers under a scheme in order that the proceeds from the levy should be distributed among the members coming under the scheme to equalize the price. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): "To any extent," yes. There is no thought in this of fixing a price for the whole industry; there is no price fixing in it, but it is to stabilize the different branches of the industry if the producers themselves so desire.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): It seems to me that the minister confounds the issue. If there is no intention of setting a price, there certainly is an intention of equalizing the price.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is correct.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Therefore the producing members of an industry are going to be taxed so much per pound or bushel or yard or whatever it may be in order to distribute the amount collected under that tax to equalize the price over the industry. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The producers have that power in this clause.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The minister says that the producers have that power. Let me make this statement again. When it comes down to the producers having the power, it is not a question of the producers; it will at any time in any industry, except those confined to an isolated territory, be a fact that only a small proportion of the actual producers in that industry will set the price because only a small proportion will vote. Those behind these plots—I like that word because it conveys more than anything else—and to use a phrase that the minister is quite familiar with, the supermen behind these plots, are the ones who first formulate the plot and, second, through ill-advised or inconclusive voting, carry an industry into it. Now it is impossible, whether it be in regard to cheese, milk, butter, apples, or vegetables, in any part of this country outside of definite areas devoted to isolated production such as tobacco, to get a majority of an industry in a position where they can vote. I should like that to be understood, because at the present time under the Natural Products Marketing Act a vote is being taken to elect a member to the export board for 1935, to take the place of a previously appointed member who was an official in a department of the provincial government. The growers or distributors or those engaged in the apple industry had no vote as to whether or not they would accept an export scheme, but after a board has set up this scheme they say: "Now, gentlemen, we want to be good to you; we want you to see the ponies run, give you a chance for your money; so we are giving you a ballot." And they tell them on nicely printed paper what they are to do, sending three sheets with this ballot so that they will not make any mistake. They have the democratic privilege of voting to elect a member of a board in the formation of which they had no voice. Are we to continue taking away from the people of Canada the right to conduct their own business? That is what this bill is—a further restriction, of the right of the producers of Canada to conduct their own business. I am desperately in earnest about this thing, from the standpoint of the producer as well as from the standpoint of the Canadian citizen. I plead with the minister to realize what he is doing, because I do not think he does. He is placing in the hands of appointed boards under his department, without the approval of the industry—because it cannot be got—the right to administer, to direct, to control the activities of the Canadian people in regard to over fifty-five per cent of their total production. I am pleading here and I will plead on the hustings when I get a chance: the minister is divorcing from parliament and the responsible government of this country the control of over fifty-five per cent of our natural products. By section 5 he is placing in the hands of a selected board, not an elected board, the right to fine and imprison people if they do not comply with the regulations made by the board. My plea at this time is not a criticism of a piece of legislation, but the announcement of a principle. That is what we are fighting for, and I ask the committee to consider these things before they put through such legislation as this. I repeat that it cannot be done.

An hon. MEMBER: It will be done.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If it is, it can be done only by force, by fine and imprisonment.

Mr. JACOBS: The big stick.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): You can do it only in that way, by taking from the Canadian people the rights our fathers fought for and which we intend to cherish, and placing them in the hands of selected boards not subject to the control of parliament. So far as we are concerned in this country a fascist state is being not only thought of but created by the present government. In the dire necessity in which they find themselves they are willing to sacrifice the Canadian people to remain in office if they can. It is going too far. I say to the minister, consider this: Never mind whether you are elected or not, or whether I am; that is not the question. The question is what policy we are going to follow. This amendment is another stab in the back for democracy among the Canadian people. And the minister goes a step further. In the supplementary estimates he asks this house to vote a million dollars; what for? To continue the methods used in attempting to put over the poultry scheme in the west, to continue paying everyone directly or indirectly, from members of parliament to street corner orators, to try to convince people that they should do things that the minister or people he picks up politically or otherwise think they should do. I say it is an insult to this House of Commons and this committee to ask for a vote of a million dollars to have people tell me how to run my business who do not know as much about it as I know myself. The Minister of Agriculture asks for another million dollars to be spent in the asinine way he spent $50,000 in the western provinces, in a wild endeavour by ill-advised people to get more eggs out of hens. What a demonstration in the last dying gasp of this government! We are asked to vote a million dollars under an extension and expansion of the marketing act to destroy democracy and individual and collective liberalism in Canada. I say it is the duty of members of this committee, whether they sit to the right or the left of Mr. Speaker, to stand in their places and vote against the expenditure of money in that way. It is wrong in principle, it is wrong under our constitution, it is wrong in practice and impossible of enforcement. I plead with the minister to consider where he and his ill-advised advisers are carrying the people of this dominion.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): What the hon. member has said is far from being a denunciation of the government; he has equally condemned hon. members on the other side. His rhetorical references to the power to impose a penalty through the courts applies just as much to legislation concerning agriculture passed in this house during the time hon.

members opposite were in power as to that passed by the present government. The same clauses, practically word for word, were in other bills introduced and in force when hon. members opposite were in power. His statements as to the asinine way in which certain things are being done I think are best answered by himself in his use of words such as these. It is in keeping with his statements in the house two or three weeks ago when he worked himself up to quite a heat and said that he did not think the gentleman who is chairman of the marketing board, and on whom we had to use some persuasion to get to take the job, had ever earned $10,000 in one year in his life. I did not wish to comment on this at that time; I thought the hon. member was speaking with more enthusiasm than he realized, but I think he will be fair enough to-night to apologize to that gentleman whom he was attacking in his absence, trying to give the impression throughout the country that he was getting something beyond what he had ever received before. Practically all the hon. member has said is about taking away the rights of democracy and Liberalism and so forth, but as far as the clauses to which the hon. gentleman referred are concerned, similar clauses are found in similar legislation passed during the time hon. gentlemen opposite were in office. No power is taken from parliament, any more than power was taken away in the past.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Just to enlarge on the remarks of the minister, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that he has endeavoured to draw a parallel between two things that are entirely different. I do not think any hon. member of this house fails to recognize the necessity of rules and regulations in connection with weights and measures, grades, qualities and so on. I am quite sure that my colleagues on this side of the house agree that you must sell a pound for a pound, a barrel for a barrel and a bushel for a bushel. As I have said on previous occasions, I do not think any one will argue that you should be allowed to sell a cull apple for a good apple or that you should be permitted to put good apples on the face of a barrel and culls in the middle. I think every hon. member of this house is in favour of cooperation and assistance in every practical and possible way in the proper regulation and distribution of natural products. But, sir, that is not what is being done in this case. Under the weights and measures act, the fruit and honey act, and so on, regulations are framed stating that a standard is a standard, that a dollar is one hundred cents, that a barrel of apples is three bushels, that a case of apples is either 176 pounds or a bushel, or whatever it may be, that a No. 1 apple is a No. 1 apple, and that No. 1 butter means No. 1 butter. If I try to give you a counterfeit dollar bill of course there are laws in this country which will land me in the police court and eventually the penitentiary.

That is not what is being done in this case, however. We are not regulating; we are not setting standards at all. We are trying to coerce the producers of this country, by persuasion and with the expenditure of public funds, to do what is in the minds of men who may think they are supermen or who may think they know more than the others know. I say again, as I said before, that we tried to stop bootlegging in liquor in Ontario, and we failed. If you cannot stop bootlegging in liquor how are you going to stop bootlegging in cheese or potatoes? I plead with the government to consider what they are trying to do. I think they are being badly advised by gentlemen from one end of this dominion to the other. But the parallel drawn by the minister was by no means correct when he compared what is being done now to what is done under the criminal code or the other acts I have mentioned. There is no parallel. By this bill you are attempting to bring the natural producers under schemes that cannot be enforced, and let me say to the minister that if he could enforce them it would be the worst thing in the world for the basic producers of Canada. This idea has been tried out from Brazil to the Malay straits, and it has been found that you cannot force the buyer to pay a price that is higher than the market justifies. You cannot do that by all the agreements and plots and bills that any minister or any government can bring in. I think it is a wrong principle to ask this house to vote public funds to turn over to selected representatives on various boards to spend as they see fit, without having them under the jurisdiction of this house. That is what is being done, and that is what I am trying to point out. The minister's explanation was wide of the mark and his parallel was not correct.

Now I want to refer to another statement made by the minister in asking me to apologize. I have no apology to make to anybody.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I must correct the hon. gentleman. I did not ask him to apologize; I felt that it would be of no use to do so. I suggested that he should, but he has given his answer.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am glad the minister was able to see that it would be of no use to ask me to apologize, because I have no apologies to offer to anyone. What I said the other night I will repeat, because I believe it and the operation of certain schemes proves it. So do not think you are getting any apology out of me.

Mr. POULIOT: Referring to Hansard of May 31, in which a list of marketing schemes appears, I should like to take this opportunity of putting those schemes in order by parts of the country in order to show how many schemes are in force throughout Canada and in each part of it. That will be most useful for anyone who wants to study the accomplishments of the Department of Agriculture in the last five years and especially in the last few months.

According to the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture on May 31, in the Dominion of Canada there are only two dominion marketing schemes, the one in connection with fruit exports, dated September 8, 1934, and the other in connection with jam exports, dated April 10, 1935. Those are the only schemes which have dominion application; if I am wrong in that statement I will ask the hon. gentleman to correct me in due course. In British Columbia there are apparently six schemes, but if you analyze them you find that there really are not as many as six. First there is the red cedar shingle export marketing scheme dated October 16, 1934. Next is the tree fruit marketing scheme dated August 28, 1934. Next is the dried salt herring and dried salt salmon marketing scheme, dated October 22, 1934. Then there is the lower mainland milk marketing scheme dated January 1, 1935, which apparently is in force in only a portion of British Columbia. In addition there are two vegetable marketing schemes; first there is the interior vegetable marketing scheme dated March 4, 1935, and then there is the coast vegetable marketing scheme of the same date. The minister takes that one scheme and cuts it into two.

There are no schemes in the other western provinces, while in Ontario there are apparently four. First there is the flue cured tobacco marketing scheme dated October 26, 1934. Then there is the western Ontario bean marketing scheme dated February 1, 1935. Then, in addition to the dominion fruit export scheme, there is also a scheme known as the dominion apple marketing scheme, which apparently applies only to Ontario. Since the apple is a good Canadian fruit, I do not see the necessity for a dominion apple marketing scheme, especially for the province of Ontario when there is a fruit marketing scheme for the whole of Canada. In Ontario there are only two marketing schemes, for tobacco and beans. Eastern Canada has a potato marketing scheme, and that is all there is to it. There is very little in it, but what I am afraid of is that matters might get worse through more schemes coming into force.

May I point out one other thing. This kind of legislation is nefarious. Why? For several reasons, but especially for this reason: The federal Department of Agriculture was created in order to improve trade between the provinces. In every province there is a department of agriculture to look after the interests of the farmers of the province.

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. gentleman please discuss section 4?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, I will discuss it right away and to the point. May I tell you, sir, that the principle of the bill may be discussed on every section of it? The section of a bill does not make it a different bill; it is the same bill.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman has already been quoting from a debate which took place this session, which under the rules is not permitted.

Mr. POULIOT: I will take the trouble to read the whole section and explain my point, Mr. Chairman. I am sure you will understand it and fully agree with me that I am in order. Section 4 reads:

Failure to comply with orders—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must be quoting from another bill. We are on section 4 of Bill No. 117.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh yes, dealing with the equalization of returns, but my error is of no importance because the bill itself is all wrong. I will read section 4 to show you how relevant my remarks were, and whether we are discussing section 4 or section 5 is immaterial because the whole bill relates to natural products. Section 4 reads:

4. Section four of the said act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:—

"(9) Notwithstanding any provision of this act, any scheme of regulation may provide solely for equalization to any extent, as between the producers, of the returns received from the sale of the regulated product."

You see, Mr. Chairman, that it refers to other provisions of this act, and therefore I can complain of any exceptions. It is provided by this section that any scheme of regulation may provide for equalization as between the producers of the returns received from the sale of the regulated product.

What is the regulated product? It is the product mentioned in section 1 of this bill. Therefore it is perfectly in order and perfectly pertinent for me to discuss that matter, sir, and you are fair enough not to deny that right to me. What I complain of in this section relating to equalization is that it is worded in such a way that no one can understand it. The whole bill is wrong from beginning to end; it is wrong with regard to all the natural products mentioned in section 1 of the bill. I submit that I am in order in discussing the sale of the regulated product on this or any other section of the bill, because they all refer to natural products; it cannot be anything else. I might complain of section 4 because instead of there being an equalization of returns there will be under this legislation a decrease of returns to the farmer who raises any one of the products mentioned in section 1 of this bill. I am strongly opposed to that. The minister is interfering with trade between the provinces. The government has killed the farmer's external trade, and now it proposes to kill his internal trade. I am strongly opposed to that, and particularly because it is done in a misleading way. It is done under the guise of helping the farmer, leading him to think that he will get some benefits from this legislation when he will get none at all.

Mr. MULOCK: Nothing but taxes.

Mr. POULIOT: Coming back to the point I was making a moment ago, trade between all the provinces was the main and only reason why the fathers of confederation decided that there should be a federal department of agriculture, in spite of the fact that there was to be a provincial department of agriculture in every one of the provinces then existing or to be created. Every province has now a department of agriculture to look after the interests of the farmers of the province in a parochial way, but the federal Department of Agriculture has in its charge the interests of the farmers of the whole country. The farmers of Nova Scotia have to look to the Minister of Agriculture for the possibility of marketing their products in the other provinces, and the same with the farmers of every other province of Canada. But as my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Mulock) interjects, all the farmers get out of this is taxes. The government is showing them the way. It is leading them to ruin in their domestic trade in natural products.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Last year when I asked the minister for information respecting the decrease in the home consumption of farm products I got no satisfactory reply except this one, which I have already repeated in this house and which I shall repeat again if the session lasts much longer. It was that the Prime Minister was too busy listening to Russia and to Litvinoff to look after such things as our trade. That was the answer given by the Minister of Agriculture when I was speaking of this very same thing last year. If the Prime Minister is too busy to look after the home consumption of farm products because he is too much occupied in drawing inspiration from the communists of Russia and other parts of Europe—

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: You may stop me from speaking, Mr. Chairman, but I have told the truth and I shall not further insist upon it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): May I ask if it is the intention under section 4 and the preceding section to use part of the amount of money that is being voted for this equalization scheme or is the money for equalization to come solely out of the tolls collected from the producer?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The provision of this section is that if the producers submit a scheme on the basis of equalization of a regulated product, the whole fund shall be obtained under the Natural Products Marketing Act from the tolls that they collect; or it might be introduced under clause 9 of the act, and in that connection money would be supplied by the government.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I would like to have this clear: Under clause 4 and preceding clauses is it not possible to use the money asked in this vote?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Which vote does the hon. member mean?

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Any vote. Is it not possible to use public moneys —I will refer to "public moneys" because I do not want to have any misunderstanding— to be distributed under the sections of the Natural Products Marketing Act and Bill No. 117—two different schemes—not only to assist the schemes, as has been set out in the bill and as has been done, but to hold for equalization purposes? Is that possible; is it provided for?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Money that is collected. The only way public money could be used would be through a combination with section 9.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I should like to have a definite reply on the point because it seems vital in principle. I will see if I can put the question in clear language so that there can be no misunderstanding. Under sections 3 and 4 of Bill No. 117, amending the Natural Products Marketing Act, we find first that section 3 refers to the use to which public moneys may be put, and section 4 seems to cover—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe I can set the hon. member's mind at rest. I think he has been under a misapprehension. The money referred to in section 3 is not money for purchase or sale of goods but is simply a loan or advance to a local board to carry on until funds are collected, and it is to be repaid by the board. It is just for the operation of the machinery of the local board.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I should like to repeat my question because I want to be clear on the point. I understand from what the minister has said that the only power given under section 3 is that of lending public funds to a board until such time as they collect from their members or producers the tolls for repayment. Is that correct?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Is it proposed that they re-collect the moneys that were advanced to promote schemes such as the poultry scheme of the western provinces?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, that is a different thing altogether.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): It is a different thing; I quite agree that it is a different thing. But it is the expenditure of public funds for the promotion of schemes—not to be repaid—and granted for assistance. We had that out on the discussion of the $500,000 item. The next point is that you will start in the banking business and will help to finance these farmers until they get started. In other words you will advance the money as a government, or a department, or a bank—you will advance money under the local boards or organizations in order to facilitate and assist the development of schemes along the lines I mentioned before; is that right?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No; no money will be advanced under section 3 for the promotion or organization of schemes. That is already provided for. But there has been no provision by which money could be obtained by a board until it got under way.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am back to my original point. For the sake of argument, after a tomato board gets under way and before the producers under the scheme have begun to reap the benefits of the scheme—in other words until they have begun to receive funds from the sale of their product which, under the scheme, would of course according to the minister be greatly increased—the government is going to act as a banker to advance money to the local board until such time as their own revenues come in. Is that right?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): My next question is this: It is clearly set out that the government undertakes to become banker for these local boards set up under the Natural Products Marketing Act, until such time as they collect from their own producers the toll per bushel or per acre or whatever it is set by the local board under the authority of the federal board. Until the funds come in the government is the banker. That is, they anticipate that they are going to receive a price or be able to sell the product and that the funds will come in. If they do not come in it will be the old story. The next question I wish to have answered is this: Is the government taking power under this bill to use public moneys for the equalization of the price of a natural product under any scheme, local or otherwise?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): It might be so used, yes—by using section 9.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): This committee is to understand that we are taking one more step towards national socialism, or fascism, whichever you call it; we are going to take public moneys received from a sugar tax or some other tax and use it to equalize the price of cheese, hogs or something else. That is the way I understand the minister's answer. That, I believe, is the answer he intended to give and the answer justified by the bill. It brings us to this point: In Ontario, for instance, we are under a tomato scheme. We are going to can tomatoes under a local board. Canners will pay the price of the local board and if it is sanctioned by the federal board we will use public moneys or public taxes to equalize the price of tomatoes in a certain area. But, sir, what happens in British Columbia or Quebec? They say, "We have no local scheme or local board, and we are going to sell our tomatoes to the canning factories at twenty-five cents a bushel." The price is stabilized at thirty cents in Northumberland county, or some other point in Ontario, and the government has power to use the taxpayers' money to equalize the price of tomatoes under a local marketing scheme in Ontario. Our far-seeing brothers across the Quebec border—I have seen it more than once; I have been through it, and it has cost me plenty of money—say, "Let these bright fellows in Ontario set up a local board; let them establish a price; let them go to the Minister of Agriculture and let him go to his federal marketing board. He will undoubtedly get the advice developed in an academic mind that the proper thing to do is to use public funds and equalize the price in Ontario." What happens to our bright boys in Quebec? They say, "No, we will sell our tomatoes to the canning factories at twenty-five cents, on the open market. We will do as we like on the open market." The canner can get tomatoes in the province of Quebec for less money than he can under a controlled scheme in Ontario, and the result is that the Ontario farmer loses the Montreal and Quebec markets. His French-Canadian brother is wise enough to keep his head out, of these asinine schemes. That is what happens. This is all new to the Minister of Railways and Canals, who is smiling at me. If it had cost him as much as it has cost me he would be weeping, not smiling.

I am telling you what happens. Let me repeat that if we attempt to do this we will disorganize production in Canada; we will not assist the producers, and we will complicate not only external but internal trade. I give the minister ample credit for having taken his advice from other than intimate officials of the department, but I must say to him that if he continues with these schemes he will disorganize not only internal production but internal distribution and will set up ultra-provincialism within the country. He is making a mistake, and I am pleading with him for that reason.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell him about potatoes.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The minister knows all about potatoes; I told him two weeks ago that we dumped our potatoes because no one could force anyone else to buy something that he did not want. And that is what has happened in connection with more than one industry I am associated with. You cannot do certain things and you should not attempt to do them, and this committee should not be asked to vote the money of the Canadian taxpayers to do the impossible. That is my point. They should not be asked to do it because it is wrong. We should not be asked to vote public money in order to dislocate internal production and distribution and to set up ultra-nationalism in this country. If you attempt to do anything of the kind you will find someone a leap ahead of you. You cannot defy the law of supply and demand—and it is not laissez-faire. You must remember that this is not England where consumption predominates; we are in Canada where production predominates and we must have markets following the natural trend of trade, where individual brains are pitted against the brains of others. I repeat, it is not a policy of laissez-faire but the unswerving law of supply and demand, the survival of the fittest in business, if you like. We must follow that law in order to get rid of our production internally and externally. Once more I plead with the minister not to take public funds to do something that is impossible.

Mr. MILLS: In our country the only way the producers of beans have of marketing their product is through the elevator. Can the elevator do business as it has always done, disregarding the bean board at Chatham, which is doing nothing to sell beans? Must the people continue to send two cents per bushel of the producers' money for nothing? Can they ignore the bean board?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The producers are as free to sell individually as they have always been in the past.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 5—Failure to comply with orders or determinations or regulations.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I must register a protest against this section. I said last year, when the Natural Products Marketing Act was under discussion, all that I had to say as to the objections I have against the principle of the legislation, but section 5 of this bill makes still stronger the compulsory features of the legislation to which we object. What I object to more especially is section 14, which is being amended by section 5 of this bill, which is a departure from the ordinary principle that a man is presumed innocent of any offence until he is proved guilty. This is a new feature altogether. Let me quote the provision:

(2) In any prosecution under this act or under any regulation it shall not be necessary for the prosecuting authority to prove that the product in respect of which the prosecution is instituted was produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates, and if the accused person pleads or alleges that the product was not produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates, the burden of proof thereof shall be upon the accused person.

What have we come to in this country under this legislation? First of all, farmers may be compulsorily brought under a scheme. The minister says that is only if they want it, but he explains that by saying that it is if the majority wants it, or if the dominion marketing board comes to the conclusion, without a vote, that there is a sufficient majority in favour of the scheme. In that event all the others who are not in favour of the scheme are compulsorily brought under it. Secondly, those who have not voted for it and who are brought under it by compulsion must obey the orders or even the determinations of the dominion board or of the local board or any regulation of the governor in council, and if they do not they will be fined $25 or $500 or go to gaol for three months, or they may be both fined and gaoled. And they are presumed guilty under this bill unless they prove that they are not.

Mr. CASGRAIN: As in Russia.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend says, as in Russia, and he is right. These schemes of regimentation can be successful only under a dictatorship. That is the experience. Russia would never have been able to achieve even the small degree of success which she has with her quinquennial plan if she had not the Ogpu, that famous military police. And the same in Germany and Italy. It is the military arm that makes possible the regimentation of the German and Italian farmers under a bureaucratic system of control. But I claim that the Canadian farmers will not submit to it. It is against our mentality. An hon. member says, not in Quebec. Yes; I defy the government to force the Quebec farmers to come under such compulsion. It is against our traditions; it is against the mentality of our people and it cannot be forced. And why pass such bills, which are permanent? In the United States where they have enacted all sorts of laws during the last two years they have had at least the saving clause in all the preambles to the NRA legislation that it was only for the period of emergency that then existed, so much so that the NRA was enacted only for two years. It had to be extended this year for a few months, and everyone knows that President Roosevelt had difficulty in getting that extension. But these acts which this parliament has enacted have not the saving clause that they are to remain in force only during the depression, to meet an emergency; they are permanent. We are putting on the statutes of this country laws which are repugnant to the mentality of the Canadian people, and I agree with one hon. gentleman who spoke to-night, that we have had too many such laws during the last two or three years. I think the main work of the next parliament will be to repeal most of the legislation which has been enacted this year and last. I pray that my hon. friend will not insist on this subsection 2 which will force a man, because he is accused of having disobeyed an order of a local board, mind you, to bring witnesses and incur expense for the purpose of proving that he is not guilty. This should not happen in any civilized country; we should not have such legislation in Canada. I still believe those schemes of bureaucratic regimentation will not be successful in this country. Canadians will remain personalities, individuals; they will not become tools in a machine organized and controlled by some bureaucrat in Ottawa. So far as I am concerned I am going to vote against this section of this bill, and if it remains there, I will vote against this whole bill on third reading.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have listened with great interest to the eloquent and heated remarks of the hon. member for Quebec East, his whole argument being based on one thing, and that is that the onus of proof rests on the individual accused. I take it that that is a fair summing up of the argument of the hon. member.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Part of it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): But perhaps the hon. member's memory is not just as good as it might be when he states that the introduction of such a section as this is the introduction of legislation such as they have in Russia, introducing sovietism into the dominion; and he particularly made an appeal to the people of his own province of Quebec in saying that they would not for an instant stand for such legislation.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I did not appeal; I made a statement.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I did not interrupt the hon. gentleman while he was speaking. He said that this legislation is altogether out of line with the mentality of the people of this country. Yet I have before me a number of acts, one of them passed in 1928 when I believe the hon. member for Quebec East was Minister of Justice in the former government. Surely at that time he would not have been responsible for voting for and perhaps responsible for his department sanctioning clauses that are practically exactly similar to this one.

An hon. MEMBER: Practically exactly similar!

Mr. CASGRAIN: Read them.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I appreciate very much the courtesy hon. members are extending to me in return for the courtesy I showed to the hon. member for Quebec East. They seem to be afraid something is going to be said that they do not wish to be said, but it is going to be said.

Mr. DUFF: Say it.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That is what I am endeavouring to do. The hon. member for Quebec East was Minister of Justice in 1928 when there was passed in this house a number of acts placing the responsibility or onus of proof upon the person who was accused of breaking the law. I read from the Fertilizers Act, amendments and regulations published by the instructions of the Minister of Agriculture in 1928. I will read in detail both the offences and penalties and also the particular section as it is parallel with the one which we have in this bill, and the one to which the hon. member for Quebec East has taken such very eloquent exception. This is from page 9, section 15 of the Fertilizers Act:

Offences and Penalties

15. Subject to the provisions of the next following section, any person who violates any of the provisions of this act, or of any regulation for which no other penalty is prescribed by this act, shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $100 for the first offence, and, for a second offence, to a fine of not less than $100 and not exceeding $200, and for every subsequent offence to a fine of not less than $200 and not exceeding $500, and in default of payment of any such fine to imprisonment for a term not exceeding thirty days.

16. Any person accused of selling, offering, exposing or holding in his possession for sale any fertilizer which does not comply with the requirements of this act or of any regulation hereunder, who proves that the fertilizer respecting which action is taken was bought by him directly within one year from a manufacturer or merchant domiciled in Canada, that if contained in a package said package was not opened, and whether contained in a package or not that the state of the fertilizer was not altered while it was in his possession, and that he had no reason to believe that the said fertilizer did not comply with the provisions of this act, shall, upon disclosing the name and address of the person from whom the fertilizer was purchased, the place where it was purchased and the date of the sale, be liable upon conviction for the costs of the prosecution only, and a prosecution may be brought against such last named person for violating the provisions of this act or any regulation within six months from the date of such disclosure and not later.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. GRAY: The minister will have to read a better act than that.

Mr. CASGRAIN: It does not say that the burden of proof is on the individual.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I utterly fail to see any parallel between the act the minister has just read and the bill now before the committee. In the first place may I just point out what has been alluded to by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), that this is part of an act that imposes penalties for offences that were not known or heard of at the time the act was passed. The minister and every other member of this committee will remember very well the protest that was made by members on this side of the house against placing in the hands of a board power to make a new criminal code. That is what was done. The government did not make the code quite strong enough, and they now propose to tack on to one of the most vicious portions of the act a clause which states that everybody accused is presumed to be guilty until he proves himself innocent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, it does not.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What else does it say?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Read it.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have read it; it is before the committee, and it is one of the most iniquitous clauses that was ever put into any act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It does not say that anyone is presumed to be guilty.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What does it say? It says:

If the accused person pleads or alleges that the product was not produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates, the burden of proof thereof shall be upon the accused person.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That does not say that he is guilty.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Does the Minister of Justice agree with that himself?

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are many precedents for it in legislation passed by this house and some of it passed within the last two weeks.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The minister agrees with it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is a reasonable clause.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): He endorses it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: How many times do I have to say so?

Mr. ELLIOTT: I will say to the hon. member for Northumberland that he should not ask anyone, let alone the Minister of Justice, to say more than once that he is in favour of a measure like this. When a man charged with the administration of justice to the extent the Minister of Justice is, says even once that he is in favour of a measure of this kind being imposed upon the farming community, the producers of this country, that should be enough. He argues that when I suggest that the man is presumed to be guilty until he proves his innocence, that is not a fair statement. I say that it is the only fair interpretation of this section, and I think I can convince the committee that it is. The first part of this subsection 2 reads:

> In any prosecution under this act or under any regulation it shall not be necessary for the prosecuting authority to prove that the product in respect of which the prosecution is instituted was produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates.

That is part of the charge. It deals with things produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates. To prove that should be the beginning of the crown's case. What is going to become of respect for law in this country if this kind of legislation becomes common? Under the marketing act there is power in these boards to create criminal offences, not offences for which the penalty is a fine of $10 for the first offence and $20 for the second, but a fine of $25 and not more than $500, or imprisonment for three months, or both fine and imprisonment.

Mr. HOWARD: Is this in Russia?

Mr. ELLIOTT: No; to be fair to Russia I do not think you could get anyone to put through such legislation as that in Russia now. That is proposed here. I know that when it is called to the attention of the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Agriculture and hon. gentlemen sitting behind them representing farmers who are going to be charged under this act—

An hon. MEMBER: Crucified!

Mr. ELLIOTT: —this section will be withdrawn. If a man is charged under this section he has to go into the box and prove that the product was not produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates. If he were charged with murder he would not have to go into the box until a case had been made out against him, and if there was any fair and reasonable doubt, the judge would dismiss the charge or withdraw it from the jury. Nobody knows that better than the Minister of Justice. But here is a charge of having done something with regard to one of the natural products of Canada, food, that is in his hands, and the onus is cast upon him to disprove the charge, not upon the crown to make out its case. It really is one of the most heinous pieces of tyrannical legislation I ever heard of. If the minister will not withdraw it, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff):

> That all the words in section 5 after line 15 be struck out.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This section as I read it is drawn upon the principle found in many statutes of this parliament. It is idle for the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) or the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) to speak of it as something monstrous. It merely places on the man who has certain goods in his possession the burden of proving where they came from.

Mr. DUFF: Does he not own the goods if he has them in his possession?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Possession of stolen goods is sufficient to convict a thief.

Mr. DUFF: That is different. That is cheap.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mere possession of stolen goods is sufficient.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, I am not going to argue if I cannot be heard.

Mr. ELLIOTT: When a man is accused of having stolen goods in his possession does the minister suggest that the onus is on him to prove that they are not stolen goods?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The onus is on him to give an explanation, or he can be convicted on evidence that he is in possession of stolen goods.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It has to be proved first that they are stolen.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, but the possession is enough. In this case possession without explanation is what has to be established. If the man cannot explain where the goods came from he may be liable under this section.

An hon. MEMBER: He grew them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How do we do in cases under the excise and customs acts—

Mr. MULOCK: Or the Ontario Temperance Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —in which the burden of proof is on the individual every time? That is legislation by this parliament. What did we do the other day in connection with the Juvenile Delinquents Act? We put the burden on the person charged with immorality, and made it an irrebuttable presumption that they could not disprove. You will find it in the criminal code and other statutes. It is only a reasonable method for the enforcement of the act. If in the opinion of the house this act should be passed this is a most reasonable provision for its enforcement, not an iniquity or monstrosity at all. You will find similar provisions in statute after statute in this country.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot believe that the Minister of Justice would compare the provision of the criminal code which he has quoted with this legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Look at the liquor act, then.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, or the stolen goods or the immorality that my hon. friend has spoken about. Since when has production, work, become a mortal sin or a crime? Because a man has in his possession an article which he has produced with his own hands, by the sweat of his brow, he has to prove that that article has not been produced within the district where that scheme is in force or he is guilty of a crime. It is absurd. First, he may not know that he has committed any offence. We are adding this to the legislation:

> Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of the local board ...

[Mr. Elliott.]

—is guilty of an offence which may lead to his being sent to gaol for three months. How does he know, even if this has been published in the Canada Gazette or by public notice or in any other way, which is not being done under the act? But this man who does not know, because he has produced something in contravention of an order of a local board under whose authority he comes by compulsion, will have to prove that he is not guilty he is presumed to be guilty, and if he does not bring witnesses to prove that he is not he may be landed in gaol for three months. If the Minister of Justice thinks that is good legislation I cannot agree with him.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is just as good as the section in the Fertilizers Act which provided that anyone who had in his possession fertilizer which did not come up to the standard laid down by the act should be penalized. Possession was enough. But the provision was made that he could excuse himself by showing that he had bought it from a reputable firm and had it in an unopened package.

Mr. HOWARD: That was to prevent fraud.

Mr. GUTHRIE: So is this.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): We have the spectacle to-night in this House of Commons of the Minister of Justice placing the farmers of this country in exactly the same class with some of the criminals—

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Wait a moment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to interrupt, because I never said anything of the kind. I am not going to be continually interrupted and having language I did not use placed in my mouth. I resent that.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Very well; I will use other language.

Mr. STANLEY: Tell the truth.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): If you listen for a moment you will hear it. The minister is going to class the honest producers of foodstuffs of this country with those who break the laws, such as the criminal code to which he referred to a few moments ago. These people are not criminals, but you are going to make them criminals.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I did not say they were criminals.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I am saying they are not.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I say so too.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): The act is drafted to provide for criminals and criminal offences. Under this bill, not for breaking the criminal code, not for breaking a moral law, not even for breaking a civil law but for going contrary to some regulation of a local board, which may be unknown to the producers, a producer of a food product will have the onus placed on him of defending himself against a charge. Let me say to the Minister of Justice that if he thinks the farmers of the Dominion of Canada—not only the farmers of the province of Quebec—will like this legislation, within the next six weeks or two months he will find out most emphatically, by their ballots, that they are sick of the whole thing.

Mr. YOUNG: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the local board is subject to fine and imprisonment.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, that is not correct of subsection 2.

Mr. YOUNG: The section reads:

> Every person who fails to comply with any order or determination of the board or of a local board or any regulation of the governor in council shall be guilty of an offence and punishable on summary conviction with a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars and not more than five hundred dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding three months, or to both fine and imprisonment.

Under the amendments we are considering to-night one of the powers of the local board is that of levying a tax on the producers. If a man fails to pay that tax he can be sent to gaol. We give our city councils power to levy taxes on the people. If the people cannot or do not pay those taxes their property can be seized, but there is no power given the city councils to send them to gaol. Our provincial governments have power to levy taxes. If people fail to pay them or cannot pay them they cannot be sent to gaol. Here, however, we are giving a local board a power which we deny to our municipal or provincial governments, the power to send men to gaol if they do not pay levies.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): A levy is a collectable debt; my understanding is that there is no provision for sending a man to gaol in default of payment.

Mr. YOUNG: This section distinctly says there is.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The specific case mentioned by the hon. member for Weyburn was that of a levy, and I do not believe there is any power here to place a man in gaol if he does not pay a debt or a levy.

Mr. GRAY: You can levy under the regulations.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The levies are made by the dominion marketing board only, so it would not be a regulation of the local board.

Mr. YOUNG: The section says, "any order or determination of the board or of a local board."

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The levy is fixed by the dominion marketing board; it is not a regulation of the local board. Hon. members forget that these provisions are for the use of the producers themselves, so that the will of the majority may be enforced. Here is a very good example: Hon. members on both sides of the house have declared themselves in favour of orderly marketing. To have orderly or controlled marketing there must be some means of enforcing control, and the purpose of this section is to give this power to the producers themselves if they desire to use it.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I should like to ask the minister a question arising out of the statement he has just made. The dominion export board came into being and received its authority under the Natural Products Marketing Act. I should like to ask the minister if within the last two months a telegram was sent from a certain office under the export board to a certain man in a certain town in the province of Nova Scotia—and I will name the town if the minister desires—stating that if he did not pay the levy on his export apples he would be fined? And did that telegram include a threat as to what would follow after the fine? Would the minister mind answering that question?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not that information.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Better look it up.

Mr. YOUNG: Will the minister explain the meaning of the word b-o-a-r-d in the second line of section 14?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): That means the dominion board.

Mr. YOUNG: Then what does "local board" mean?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The producers' board.

Mr. YOUNG: Then according to this section any person who fails to comply with any regulation of the dominion board or of a local board is liable to fine or imprisonment, and one of those regulations or determinations might be and will be the payment of a levy. In the light of that fact and according to these words in this section, how does the minister say these people cannot be sent to gaol for failing to pay such a levy?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The dominion board collects the levy through the local board.

Mr. YOUNG: But what I want to know is how the minister can claim that a man will not be sent to gaol for not paying the levy with this provision in the act.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): My information is that the dominion board sets up a levy to be collected from the producers to carry out the provisions of their scheme; it is a debt, and a man may not be imprisoned for failure to pay that debt. In the statement he made the hon. member for Northumberland implied that this threat was contained in the latter part of a telegram that was sent to a certain individual in Nova Scotia. I have not that information at hand, but I doubt if that is a correct statement.

Mr. DUFF: Will the minister produce the information?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, I shall be glad to.

Amendment (Mr. Elliott) negatived: yeas, 15; nays, 24.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have received a wire from a local organization of the blind in British Columbia in connection with the grant of $50,000 in the supplementary estimates. They ask if this grant is to be regarded as separate from or a substitute for the enactment of legislation at this session.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): This is a special grant and has no reference to any other grant or vote. It is designed to assist the organization in liquidating the very heavy overdraft which they have at present.

Mr. NEILL: I should like to inquire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) if it is the intention to bring down legislation at this session to provide pensions for the blind.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I promised that I would make a statement when I had an opportunity to prepare it, but that opportunity has not presented itself as yet. I hope to be able to make this statement to-morrow.

BURIAL OF SOLDIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): I desire to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Is there any foundation in fact for a statement attributed to a Regina speaker by the Regina Leader Post of June 15, 1935, that five dollars was deducted from the pay of Canadian soldiers killed in action overseas in the great war to pay for the blanket in which they were buried?

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Minister of National Defence): This story has been told before and has been denied on frequent occasions. The hon. member for Regina told me that he proposed to give me yet another opportunity for denying it. No such regulation was ever passed that I am aware of, and careful investigation of the records shows no foundation whatever for so heartless a story.

RADIO INTERFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Does the Minister of Marine anticipate that he will be able this session, either by legislation or by regulation, to make changes giving power to inspectors to enforce the prevention of radio interference?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The change suggested by the hon. gentleman would have to be made by legislation, and I am sorry to say we do not intend to propose any legislation to that effect this session.

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOTT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): The Ottawa Morning Journal contains an erroneous article with reference to the section of country from which I come. I wish to take this opportunity, on a question of privilege, to refute that article. I have not the paper before me—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot raise a question of privilege with regard to an article in a newspaper, relating to the matter he has referred to.

Mr. GOTT: I wish to correct the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to say that the hon. member is not in order. The house would be busy listening to corrections of articles in newspapers if the hon. member could correct articles of this nature in this manner.

Mr. GOTT: Am I not permitted to correct an erroneous statement in regard to the section of country from which I come?

MARKETING ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 117, to amend the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): moved in amendment seconded by Mr. Lapointe:

That Bill 117 an act to amend the Natural Products Marketing Act 1934 be not now read a third time but that it be recommitted to a committee of the whole house with instructions that the said committee have power to amend the said bill by striking out from section 5 thereof all the words after line 15 on page 2 thereof being the following:

(2) In any prosecution under this act or under any regulation it shall not be necessary for the prosecuting authority to prove that the product in respect of which the prosecution is instituted was produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates, and if the accused person pleads or alleges that the product was not produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates, the burden of proof thereof shall be upon the accused person.

He said: This question was debated at some length last evening and it is not my intention now to take up the time of the house repeating what was said then. I simply wish to move this motion, seconded by my hon. friend, the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe).

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe there has been a good deal of misunderstanding with reference to this subsection. The purpose of the subsection is very simple. In any regulated area where there is a regulated product—for example, the British Columbia tree fruit scheme operating in that province—the board passes certain regulations, one of which sets out that there shall be a small levy with respect to all fruit marketed; and the board, in the carrying out of its duties, makes this levy on all the regulated products marketed within that area. But if any individual in the area, dealer or otherwise, wishes to bring in a product from outside the area and to claim exemption from the application of these regulations, then in claiming this exemption he has to give proof that he has brought in the article from outside.

After careful investigation it is felt that the matter cannot be dealt with in any other way, because if this were not done and twenty per cent of individual farmers or dealers in the district simply stated that they would not pay or conform to the regulations, the board would have first to prove that the product was produced within the area, and in that event the whole act would fall down in that regard.

The reason for putting in this subsection is simply this, that those who wish to claim exemption from any of the orders or regulations within the area must give proof that the article is from outside, and an invoice would be the simple way of showing from where the article was shipped. In this respect this subsection is identical with the Fertilizer Act passed in 1928. If officials of the Department of Agriculture, in their work of inspecting the fertilizers that are offered for sale, find a dealer in possession of a fertilizer that is not up to standard or that is other than advertised, they proceed against that dealer, even though he may be guiltless of the offence, unless he submits proof as to the person from whom he purchased it and the fact that the sacks had not been opened or the material altered until the time of inspection.

That, I believe, is sound legislation, because otherwise the inspectors of the department, in trying to enforce the act, would be put in the impossible position of adducing proof themselves that the dealer had not been at fault. It has worked out well, and it is felt that there will be no hardship on any person. There is no crime involved. It is simply an exemption from the regulations or orders of the board. I believe practically every act of a similar nature that has been passed contains a similar clause.

An hon. MEMBER: Not the same.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): In the Fertilizers Act the principle is exactly the same as it is in the bill before us. Those who have given every consideration to this matter feel that if this subsection, providing that the man claiming exemption must, in order to get exemption, give proof that the product was produced within that part of Canada to which the scheme relates, is not included in the bill, it would be almost impossible to administer the scheme, because then the proof would be on the board as to the product of every farmer within the regulated area. I therefore feel it would be a serious mistake to wipe out this subsection which is felt by those administering the act to be so essential while working no hardship on any person whatever.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The explanations given by the minister do not at all clarify the situation as to the advisability of this amendment. He says that those who claim exemption from criminal prosecution should bring forward the evidence that they are so exempt; he claims also that if this amendment is not inserted in the bill the officers of the department who want to prosecute—

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Not the officers of the department, the local board administering the scheme.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He claims also that the local board or anybody that wants to prosecute under the provisions of this legislation shall have to show that the man who is prosecuted is not guilty. Neither of those positions is right. The man has simply to be left alone, and if officers of the department or members of the local board institute criminal proceedings against any Canadian citizen, they should bring forward the evidence that that citizen is guilty of an offence and not place upon him the burden of showing that he is not guilty.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Elliott) which was negatived on the following division:

FARMERS' CREDITORS ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 114, relating to the application of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, in the province of British Columbia.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): When the Minister of Finance introduced this bill the other day I had occasion to make certain observations. This afternoon I desire very briefly to suggest why this measure should not be supported. I wish shortly to traverse the attitude of all parties with respect to this legislation when it was introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) a year ago. First I quote from the Prime Minister as reported at page 3640 of Hansard of June 4, 1934:

> That is perhaps as far as we can go, because there is some grave constitutional doubt as to the right of the federal parliament to interfere with contracts solely within the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures, under the head of property and civil rights. But as I have indicated we believe we have power to legislate.

My right hon. leader on that occasion, while supporting the legislation, also indicated that there might be doubt as to jurisdiction. He said, as reported on page 3641:

> I should say, however—and I base this comment in part on what the Prime Minister himself has said—that I hope the legislation introduced will not be of a character to raise false expectations in the minds of those whose interests it is intended to serve. I am afraid there may be obstacles as to jurisdiction; in fact the Prime Minister has himself hinted at that. Those obstacles may be formidable. It would be unfortunate indeed if by virtue of a measure now to be introduced farmers receive the impression that they are likely to obtain substantial relief, only to discover a little later on that, for reasons over which this parliament has no control, hopes have been raised which are false and cannot ultimately be realized. If there is any criticism of the measure on that score I hope the government, and particularly those in whose interests the measure is being introduced, will not feel that such criticism is directed against the objects of the measure but rather that it is in the nature of an effort to avert any disappointment which might serve to make the last state worst than the first and which might be prevented if matters are gone into carefully at the present time.

The act was, as I say, passed with the unanimous support of all members of this house. In fact when we discussed the measure in committee of the whole some very useful and constructive suggestions were offered from this side of the house.

The act was applied to the province of British Columbia on November 1, 1934, and as stated by the Minister of Finance when the bill was introduced, there have been effected fifty-eight settlements in that province. An action was instituted by the attorney general of British Columbia late in May, challenging the right of these boards of review to effect settlements between the province and its debtors. I might read the endorsement on the back of the writ, which I believe is returnable to-morrow, June 27:

> 1. A declaration:
> (a) That the defendants purporting to act as a board of review for the province of British Columbia under the provisions of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, being chapter 53 of the statutes of Canada, 1934, and amending acts and the rules and regulations passed thereunder, are acting without lawful authority, as the said act is ultra vires the parliament of Canada.
> (b) Alternatively, that the board of review is acting without lawful authority in assuming jurisdiction under the said act to formulate proposals and to make directions by virtue of which contracts and taxation powers and rights of the crown in the right of the province of British Columbia in relation to farmer debtors are in whole or in part abrogated and set aside.
> 2. The plaintiff further claims an injunction to restrain the defendants from purporting to formulate proposals or to give directions or to make orders involving contracts by the crown in the right of the province of British Columbia and its farmer debtors in relation to amounts owing under such contracts to the said province and in relation to moneys due or to become due from farmer debtors to the crown in the right of the said province in respect of any form of taxes, fees, rates or duties.

I rather gathered from the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) the other day that there had been a lack of cooperation on the part of the provincial authorities with the boards of review and the officials administering this act in the province of British Columbia. I should like to place on the record an official letter from Mr. E. S. Davidson, senior official receiver for the province, which was written to the attorney general of British Columbia on May 28, 1935, only about three weeks ago:

I called at your office to express the appreciation of the chief administrator of our act for the cooperation you had extended following the visit of Mr. W. R. Kinsman, K.C., in January last, by granting free publication in the British Columbia Gazette of notices, dispensing with law stamps on filings and fees in land registry matters, as well as the use of provincial buildings throughout the province for the holding of statutory meetings.

Further, Mr. Speaker, as briefly as possible I should like to refer to the affidavit in the action pending sworn to by the deputy attorney general of the province. He says:

2. That on the 12th of April, 1935, the Honourable T. D. Pattullo, premier of the province of British Columbia, wrote to the Honourable Edgar N. Rhodes, Minister of Finance for the Dominion of Canada, advising the said Minister of Finance that the government of the province of British Columbia took the position that the "Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act" did not give any jurisdiction to the federal government to interfere in provincial crown contracts.

3. That by a letter dated the 8th day of May, 1935, the Honourable Mr. Rhodes replied to the Honourable Mr. Pattullo in part as follows:

"I note that you have been advised by the law officers of the crown they take the position that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act does not give any jurisdiction to a commissioner to interfere with contracts relative to the sale of provincial crown lands.

"I presume your officers intend to assume that the board of review under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act cannot alter, in any way, the terms of a contract entered into by the crown in the right of the province. I may say quite frankly that we assert the right, under the act, to deal with all contracts, including provincial contracts, but I trust that it will not be necessary to have any legal difficulty in this regard for I am certain that you are as anxious as anyone that there be a rearrangement, readjustment and recasting of agreements in default, on a fair and equitable basis. There can be very real cooperation in respect of agreements where the crown, in the right of the province, is concerned."

Then Mr. Pattullo replied on the 16th May, 1935, in part as follows:

We have thousands of such contracts throughout the province and from time to time adjustments have been made in accordance with conditions. We certainly cannot admit that any outside authority has the right to make adjustments in these contracts. This is a straight invasion of our territorial rights under the guise of the "Bankruptcy Act," and if admitted simply means that we are not free agents in the disposition of our crown lands.

Then there is a reference in the affidavit to the Copeland case which was cited by the minister the other day. Reference is also made in the affidavit to two other pending cases which so far, I think, are only in the nature of proposals, one that of John Hargreaves of Springfield in the county of Cariboo and the other that of William Smith of Vanderhoof, British Columbia. Now I wish to read paragraph 11:

11. That in my opinion the board is likely to formulate a proposal in the Hargreaves and Smith cases similar in purport to that of the Copeland case hereinbefore referred to.

12. That such interference and abrogation of provincial crown rights of taxation in the levying and the collection of land taxes, water rates and grazing fees—

In one case there is also involved indirectly the question of school taxation.

—and in the interference with contracts in relation to the sale and management of its crown lands will result in the non-payment of taxes and moneys owing to the crown by farmer debtors, many of whom have submitted proposals of similar import to those above referred to, to official receivers and to the defendants—

I further understand, Mr. Speaker, that since this disagreement arose a compromise offer was sent by those representing the dominion government to the city of Victoria, suggesting some concurrent action with regard to these difficulties. I wish to read now the reply of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), given the other day when the question of school taxes was raised in relation to this very act. It will be found at page 3863 of Hansard:

I am bound to say that I was not aware of the difficulty to which the hon. gentleman refers. I shall, however, look into it. The dominion is no longer concerned about school lands, being only the trustees; the school lands are now beyond question the property of the province. But there are limitations with respect to investments, and I believe it would not be competent for us to do more than confer with the province—

I want to emphasize those words.

—it would not be competent for us to do more than confer with the province as to what action shall be taken. I will look into the matter and be able to make a more definite statement on Monday.

Mr. BENNETT: May I direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that I was not dealing with school taxes; I was dealing with school lands, trust lands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I gladly accept the correction of the right hon. gentleman but I suggest that the same principle applies to these objections which have been taken by the province of British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to interrupt, but I should like to tell the hon. gentleman, in order that he may not misunderstand what I said, that it will be recalled that in the transfer of the resources to the provinces there was a special provision with respect to these lands. What I was trying to convey to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) was that I did not carry it in my mind but that it was a very special provision and the lands were charged with the trust upon the effect of which I was not expressing an opinion.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I gladly accept the explanation of the Prime Minister but the point I am emphasizing is the idea of conferring, which was mentioned by the Prime Minister the other day.

Now let us come to this most extraordinary bill, one of the weirdest concoctions ever dished up in this house by a bewildered government. It says:

> On and after the 1st day of July, 1935, the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, shall cease to be in force in the province of British Columbia except in the case of a proposal approved by the court or confirmed by the board of review before the aforesaid first day of July, and in the case of any such proposal the said Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, shall continue to be in force as if this act had not been enacted.

If I read the provisions of this proposed legislation aright it means that in regard to the fifty-eight settlements already effected, the legislation endorsed by this house last year is to be effective. That is, this parliament is going to say by this bill that the legislation now protested and contested, rightly or wrongly, by the province of British Columbia is still to be in effect in regard to those very cases which caused the dissension, but it is not going to be in effect with respect to any cases that may arise after the first day of July. So all these settlements may be rendered invalid if the provincial authorities of British Columbia choose to proceed with their litigation. If the province of British Columbia happens to win the dispute all these settlements may be declared invalid. Further than that the whole act will be declared ultra vires, because that is one of the declarations asked for in the endorsement on the writ, and though that would be only a declaration by the Supreme Court of British Columbia it would be very dangerous indeed to the whole existence of this legislation to which this parliament agreed a year ago. So this very legislation, which is introduced in a most peculiar fashion, which is sectional legislation, must have the inevitable result of threatening the validity of the statute right across the Dominion of Canada. I suggest that anyone who supports this bill, regardless of the dispute that may exist as between the provincial and federal jurisdiction, is helping to render invalid the operation of this act throughout the whole of the dominion. I suggest to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that the government adopt the suggestion made by the Prime Minister the other day and enter into a conference, not only with the province of British Columbia but with every single province of the dominion, because there have been rumours of disputes in other provinces as well. I think this bill should be amended at the present session, not by the measure we have before us now but to provide that when any dispute arises between a board of review acting under the jurisdiction of the legislation of last year, and any provincial authority, there shall be a conference between the agent or representative of the provincial government in each case, and that settlement or terms be arrived at. I think that is the only way this legislation can be made effective. That is the only way it can really be made effective.

I am opposing second reading of the bill. I am afraid it is introduced in a spirit of petty, political pique against the government of a province. I am not defending that government; as a lawyer I believe the legal position they have taken is sound. But as one who supported the legislation last year, and as the legislation proposed is imperilling the future existence of the act I still appeal to the Minister of Finance to have the bill withdrawn and to have a real amendment passed which will render effective the legislation of last year and the intent of parliament.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made some reference to my observations of last year when this bill was before the house. If he would take the trouble to peruse what was said he would find that I did point out that the Supreme Court of Canada followed the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council in Leroux and the Royal Bank, and that that decision on the reference made in the preceding year on the Companies Creditors Arrangement Act was the foundation upon which we came to this house. We would have come to the house before with the legislation but until we had a decision from the Supreme Court of Canada as to the validity of the Companies Creditors Arrangement Act we did not feel that we should do so. The grave constitutional doubt had been resolved in our favour. The discussion was lengthy and took place over a considerable time. I did point out that the Supreme Court of Canada had followed the decision in the Leroux case, which was the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council, as warranting the conclusion at which that court had arrived.

I recall many qualified practitioners were of the opinion that the Companies Creditors Arrangement Act was not within our competence, but after the decision of the judicial committee in the Leroux case, and its adoption, it was binding upon our courts and the validity of our statute was upheld. The position in this matter is simple, and I ask the hon. member, as a member of the legal profession, if he has any complaint to make with respect to this line of argument. First, there have been fifty-eight cases disposed of. The province attorned to the jurisdiction in that regard and raised no question as to the adequacy of the terms of the decision of the board of review, or whatever the case may be. At least that is the information which the Minister of Finance has, as was intimated to the house the other day.

I put this case to the house—a simple one: The government is anxious that all the provvinces should have boards of review deal with creditors' liabilities or farmers' liabilities to them as well as to all the other creditors. Although some of the provinces feel that there might be still some question, they have uniformly taken the view that it is desirable that this board of review, which is a judicial board, presided over in every case by a justice of the supreme court of a province—and that was the reason we provided for a justice in the act of last year—should deal also with questions that arise between the province and its creditors, in whatever way they might arise. In all the provinces this worked out satisfactorily; they have not complained. They have been glad to expedite and to assist in this arrangement. But in British Columbia they have launched a lawsuit and have asked that this act be declared ultra vires. The dominion government has not appeared in the lawsuit and does not propose to appear. All they are going to do is to stand by and let the court make an injunction perpetual as against—that is the effect; an interim injunction perpetual—and this statute merely conforms to that act. The temporary injunction having been issued, to-morrow application will be made to have it made perpetual. The dominion government will not appear, and it must be made perpetual so far as we are concerned.

Mr. GRAY: Why do we need this act?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

Mr. BENNETT: Because we are giving effect legislatively to what the court has done judicially.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Suppose it is ultra vires; what effect would it have?

Mr. BENNETT: Not the slightest, because the other provinces have indicated they have no complaint to make, and that they are very glad to see this matter dealt with in this way. So far as this legislation is concerned it is to give effect by parliament to what the courts will to-morrow decide if the injunction is made perpetual at the instance of the province of British Columbia. That is all there is to it. It is a very ordinary and proper course to follow, when the province asked that it be done. It would be bad policy for the dominion to enter into a long and costly litigation in this matter. If the province of British Columbia states, "This is a statute beyond your legislative competence," we are not going to argue with them. They do not want it in that province, and the attorney general has launched his litigation. He has obtained an interim injunction which he proposes to make permanent, and by legislation we are giving effect to his wishes in that regard.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Has that decision any validity in other provinces?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not at all.

Mr. EULER: If this bill were not passed would not the situation be exactly the same?

Mr. BENNETT: No, it would leave it open to further contest with respect to individual cases, and it is to avoid any possible misunderstanding on the part of those who have sought the advantage of the act that we are making it perfectly clear that parliament is respecting the wish of the provincial government and leaving the act non-operative within that province.

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to discuss the legal or constitutional phase of the matter, but had I so intended, in view of the observations of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) it would now be unnecessary. I should like however to say a word in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). Within my recollection as an hon. member of this house I have never known of any measure which has met with such uniform approval and unanimity of opinion as the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. In fact it will be recalled that last year encomiums were so embarrassing that several days elapsed before we could have second reading of the bill. That situation is well known. As is evidenced by the large number of settlements—5,852 in number—made up to the end of May it would appear that the act has operated extremely well.

The hon. member has said that this is sectional legislation. It is, but why? It is sectional because a sectional attitude has been taken by one of the nine provinces. The act has been accepted by the remaining eight provinces; they have given cordial co-operation and the result is apparent to all. I assure my hon. friend in all solemnity and seriousness that the political complexion of the government of British Columbia has had no bearing whatsoever upon the attitude taken by this government in bringing the bill before the house. It would have been presented if the political complexion of the provincial government had been Conservative, Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, or otherwise. It was brought down in no sense of political pique but as a matter of great regret, because it was the one spot upon the escutcheon, if I may use that term in the operation of the act.

The only place in which the act has been challenged is British Columbia, and as I pointed out the other day the government of that province has taken steps to resist the act; it does not wish the act to be operative in British Columbia. But, coming to the second point: would we be wise to imperil the operation of the act throughout Canada by standing aside and allowing the province of British Columbia to challenge its constitutionality in the courts? I think upon reflection the hon. member will realize that in describing the bill he rather embroidered his language. It would have been very simple to bring in a bill to withdraw the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in the province of British Columbia. What we are seeking to do is to preserve their rights to those who have effected settlements. There are some 58 cases where settlements were effected, as I recall—I may be wrong in this respect—without reference to the province. In other words, the rights of the province are not involved but assuming that they have been involved in any of these cases, the settlements have been accepted and it was only in connection with the Copeland case that British Columbia intervened and resisted the application of the act. Stripped to the bare essentials the attitude of the British Columbia government means that they are prepared to allow private individuals, trust companies, banks, mortgage companies, loan companies and the dominion itself to make contributions in effecting settlements for the benefit of farmers in need while they themselves refuse to cooperate.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are doing it in another way.

Mr. RHODES: Conferences were held by the officers of my department with every province and we had the cooperation of British Columbia up to a point. Either the province of British Columbia is prepared to make its contribution or it is not, and no further conference is required. I say to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and the house that this bill has not been introduced in a spirit of pique or because of a desire on the part of the government to raise a sectional issue; it was brought forward with very great regret with a view to preserving the value of the act to the other eight provinces where it is acceptable and desirable.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time on division, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Operation of act in B.C. to cease on 1st July, 1935.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Just one word more in response to the remarks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes). The question is not whether the province is prepared to make a contribution; it is whether provincial authority, that of British Columbia or any other province, is to have its jurisdiction with regard to land taxes, water rates and in some cases school taxes affected by the mandatory order of a board of review. That is the clear issue, and not as the minister stated it.

Mr. RHODES: If we withdraw the operation of the act in British Columbia they cannot raise any constitutional question. We are not trying to impose upon them what the premier of that province has said we are trying to impose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The government is taking a most extraordinary course. The obvious course would be to try to keep the benefits of this legislation in British Columbia. The minister is not only withdrawing this legislation from British Columbia but he is imperilling its operation in the other provinces. The minister has said that a decision of the Supreme Court of British Columbia that this act is ultra vires will have no effect upon the other provinces, but I submit that it will have a tremendous effect. Although an edict of the Supreme Court of British Columbia does not govern in the other provinces, once a province has made such a declaration the other eight provincial governments will be invited to test the validity of this federal statute. Once the Supreme Court of British Columbia has given a decision, any private creditor who is dissatisfied will be encouraged to launch a proceeding in any other province.

Mr. GRAY: This legislation affects the whole nine provinces of the dominion. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) was introducing this bill a few days ago he stated that while the law officers of the crown did not have any doubt as to the validity of this act, they did not feel like testing the act before the courts. This act is either good or bad. It has been placed upon the statute book by this government, and instead of running away from the issue the dominion parliament should place its powers behind the act and be represented not only at the hearing to be held to-morrow but before every court in which the validity of the act may be tested. The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated this afternoon that we are not going to defend our own legislation; we are going to permit an interim injunction to be made permanent. I could not follow the reasons which he gave for this action, and I doubt if any other hon. member could. If this interim injunction is allowed to be made permanent without opposition it is bound to bring about the result suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie). I ask the Minister of Finance to reflect further upon this matter. I think he should ask that the hearing to-morrow be adjourned in order that the dominion government may be represented, and I am sure if he does, the request will be granted. This legislation has been passed for the equal benefit of all the nine provinces.

Mr. REID: I am very sorry that the government have seen fit to introduce this legislation. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was supported by every hon. member of the house and the government is now denying to the farmers of British Columbia the rights given under the act to the farmers of the other provinces. Apparently the government has decided not to enter into any conference or to modify the act in any way; they have decided to withdraw it entirely. If that absurdity were carried to its logical conclusion, the province of British Columbia should now perhaps endeavour to obtain an injunction against the dominion government to prevent the province from being denied the benefits of this act. Further, the province of British Columbia will be called upon to pay a part of the cost of administration of this act in other provinces as well as a proportion of the losses which are bound to occur, and yet the benefits of the act to the farmers are being withdrawn. I ask the minister if it would not have been possible to make some change or amendment in the act in connection with agreements for the purchase of land or taxation or in connection with contracts entered into between individuals and the provincial government or dyking commissioners. The minister this afternoon, if I rightly understood him, said that the province of British Columbia was not prepared to assume its proper share of the cost but was willing to stand aside and see bondholders and others taking a loss which would accrue when the farmers received an adjustment under the act. I would point out that there are other phases which in my opinion are responsible for a heavier load, and that has been touched upon by the minister. Let me cite an instance in my own municipality. We have a dyking area with a bonded indebtedness of $100,000. A tax levy is made every year in that area to take care of the interest and sinking fund, and that tax is spread over those in the area. Certain farmers in that district appealed to the receiver general and I understand that two cases were to go to the board of review. Would it have been fair to allow the rest of the farmers to assume a load of debt which would have been thrown upon them, through certain farmers being given an adjustment? There are some farmers who owe from $300 to $500 in taxes, and the dyking commission did not compel them to pay the taxes, but in one or two instances they appealed to the receiver and as well to the board of review. If an adjustment had been made with respect to these taxes owed by the farmers, the rest of the debt would have had to be borne by the other farmers within that area. We endeavoured, when the act was under discussion, to direct the attention of the minister to that aspect of the matter but little attention was paid to it. So far as British Columbia is concerned, it was not a matter of cutting off taxes; the point is that certain people had entered into an agreement with respect to dyking and water taxes, something on which bonded indebtedness is raised. It was not a case of redress being given by the provincial government, but the fact is that a heavier load would have been placed on the farmers of that dyking area. The government has been high-handed in going ahead with this bill. Would it not have been possible to make some adjustment in the act to take care of the matter under dispute without withdrawing the whole act?

Mr. RHODES: We must bear in mind that of the total number of settlements effected in Canada up to the end of May, 5,852, there were 4,602 effected by compromise and agreement, and only 1,250 as the result of decisions of the boards of review. I do not think that any better evidence could be given of the fact that the spirit of the act has been carried out than to cite these figures. The whole underlying motive of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was compromise, conciliation and amicable adjustment, and it has worked out in that manner. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Reid) wants to know whether there could not have been some other amendment to the act. I do not think so, but I will say this. If the government of British Columbia had made representations to us calling on us to make some special concession which ought to have been made in view of certain conditions in that province, they would have been considered. But what are the circumstances? We had some communication with British Columbia as with the other provinces, and up to the point where this injunction was brought, coming as it did like a bolt from the blue, we had no idea that the intention of British Columbia was to challenge the act in this arbitrary manner. It has been suggested that our action is high-handed. Well then, the government of British Columbia must assume the entire responsibility. All we do is to say, "If you are going to challenge the act we will not force it on you; we withdraw it from the province and allow it to operate in the other eight provinces."

Mr. GRAY: Why not defend the act?

Mr. RHODES: That is a question of opinion. My hon. friend, inadvertently I am sure, made two mistakes. He said that the officers of the Department of Justice had said they had no doubt that the act was constitutional.

Mr. GRAY: I was quoting what the hon. member had said.

Mr. RHODES: Just a moment until I finish my sentence please. He said that the Department of Justice had said they had no doubt as to its constitutionality. As a matter of fact, what the department did was to give an opinion. They said that in their opinion the act was within the competence of parliament, in other words, that it was intra vires.

Mr. GRAY: That is all I said.

Mr. RHODES: Now the second statement, as regards doubt, arose in connection with the statement I made on the introduction of the bill, namely, that while there was this opinion of the Department of Justice, what the courts might say might be entirely different, and that it would be unwise to imperil the act by action on the part of the province of British Columbia when it was accepted in the other eight provinces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The minister said he never heard a suggestion with regard to adjustment. Was not the government in receipt of a telegram from a gentleman acting in a legal capacity for the province of British Columbia to the effect that he and the attorney general of British Columbia had forwarded to the government a suggested adjustment? May I read the following telegram to the Minister of Finance. The federal government's legal adviser in Victoria and the attorney general——had made a tentative arrangement concerning the operation of the act in this province prior to announcement in house by Hon. Mr. Bennett subject to confirmation by this and federal governments. Arrangement suggested was that first board of review would not interfere with provincial right to levy and collect taxation. Second, we would have official of this government delegated to act as liaison officer with board in respect to adjustment of crown contracts, board agreeing to accept reasonable suggestion of our official as to necessity for compromise or not.

I suggest that that tentative agreement between the attorney general of British Columbia and the gentleman who was acting in a legal capacity either for the board in British Columbia or for this government was telegraphed to this government before the bill was introduced, and when the Minister of Finance gets up and says that there was no attempt at amicable adjustment, I submit that the facts as I have stated them are contrary to his assertion. I do think that if that offer was made by the attorney general, collaborating with the minister's own representatives in British Columbia, the government should have given it the fullest consideration before introducing in this house a bill such as the one we have before us.

Mr. RHODES: The committee will bear with me when I say that for a period of days I was confined to my house—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not blaming you.

Mr. RHODES: —and for that reason I was not familiar with the day to day letters and telegrams which passed. But as at present advised, I know that the chief official receiver, Mr. Davidson, had frequent conferences with the attorney general of British Columbia and also with the Minister of Lands and Municipal Affairs, Mr. Wells Gray, so that there was no question of lack of complete cooperation so far as the officials of the department, in relation to the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, were concerned. There may be some correspondence of which I have no knowledge, but so far as I am personally concerned I may say that the action of British Columbia came like a bolt from the blue. There was no intimation of which I am aware at the moment on the part of the province that it intended to resist the act up to that point.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not going to try to apportion the blame between British Columbia and the government here; possibly there is some blame on both sides. But whoever is to blame, there is no doubt that if this legislation passes, certain farmers in British Columbia for whose benefit the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was passed will suffer. They will feel the effect of this action. I am going to suggest to the Minister of Finance that in order to give the government of British Columbia some time to consider the matter, an amendment might be made to this measure that it would not come into effect until a certain date. That need not be far distant, and this would give the provincial government an opportunity to approach the federal government and would show that the federal government was quite ready to be approached. Would the Minister of Finance take that suggestion into consideration?

Mr. RHODES: I hope the hon. member for Vancouver South will realize that we cannot accept any sugegstion as to blame in this matter. We have taken precisely the same course in trying to cooperate with British Columbia as we have with regard to the other eight provinces, and no question has been raised by them. I may point out to him that although the act was proclaimed in British Columbia on November 1 last and was in operation there, it was only in May of this year that this action on the part of British Columbia was taken. I have said before that we brought in this bill with reluctance and regret. If the British Columbia government want to take action, why, we shall not proceed with this bill but if they persist in the course they are pursuing, we have no alternative, and inasmuch as the chances are that this bill would not pass the Senate for a day or so, I may say to my hon. friend that if there is any indication of a change of attitude on the part of British Columbia showing that they are prepared to cooperate with us, I should be very happy, when the bill reaches the Senate, to have them insert in it an amendment to have the act come into force only on proclamation. I think that will meet with my hon. friend's views.

Mr. JACOBS: I am glad to have this statement from the Minister of Finance that there is still a possibility at the eleventh hour of having this legislation postponed. I was a member of the house who had something to do with the introduction of the Bankruptcy Act in 1919—and my hon. friend will remember that it was introduced by a private member, myself, in that year; it was afterwards adopted by the government and put through I think in 1920, when the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) was Solicitor General and had the bill in charge—I do not like to see the legislation begun at that time truncated as it would appear to be by the proposed measure. We have in Canada nine provinces with the act applying generally to them all. I do not understand why through a piece of pique, this action should be taken. Of course my hon. friend shakes his head but the fact remains that while British Columbia may have gone about this matter in an undiplomatic way it is proposed to remove from that province the benefit of this legislation. There is no doubt there is benefit attached to it, otherwise it would never have gone through and the Minister of Finance would not have received all those encomiums which he said he had received.

Mr. RHODES: I did not receive any.

Mr. JACOBS: Well, the department received them.

Mr. RHODES: No, the legislation.

Mr. JACOBS: Well, that is an abstract thing, to receive encomiums. The Minister of Finance I think with all modesty claims that encomiums were received and that he was the minister at the head of the encomium department. It does seem to me—and I should be the last person to mention this—that a little Christian charity should be shown by the department, and it is too bad that I should be the person to rise in my place and tell the minister what is and what is not Christian charity. There is no doubt that the department at Ottawa, when they ascertained that British Columbia questioned the right of Ottawa to institute this legislation so far as it concerned the province particularly, that is the province as against its own individual citizens, did feel a certain amount of pique. I think I would feel a little pique myself, but to hurry through legislation in the dying days of the session, to make the provincial authorities realize the enormity of their offence, is not quite in keeping with the character of the Minister of Finance. I have known him for many years; he is a pleasant gentleman and he looks at all angles of a question before he takes action. But from the statements made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), it would appear that there is a certain amount of bad blood between the dominion Department of Justice and the Department of the Attorney General of British Columbia. It seems foolish that these two sober departments should act in such a childish way.

The proposition was put forward by the hon. member for Vancouver South claiming indirectly that the British Columbia authorities acted rather hastily. This is a way they have of acting out west. We act more soberly in the east. With this hint before parliament and before the Minister of Finance, I should say that the government would be well advised in going a little more slowly. This is perhaps the last time the present government will appear in the role of being able to pass legislation, and I suggest they ought to go out mildly and calmly, showing that after all there was no feeling against any province in regard to such legislation. I feel I ought not to inject myself into this debate because it would appear to be a private fight between British Columbia and the dominion government; but inasmuch as this legislation applies to the whole of Canada, I think the government ought to treat British Columbia as a sort of wayward child and give it an opportunity to come together with the Department of Justice in order to see if this matter cannot be adjusted, because after all we should show to the whole of Canada that while we are acting firmly at the same time we are actuated by a judicial and kindly spirit. That can be brought about if the suggestion that has been made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre and myself is adopted. This is not a case where harsh measures ought to be resorted to. Such legislation will not be looked upon with favour by the other provinces, because indirectly every person in Canada is interested in it. It may just happen that people in Montreal or Quebec or Halifax will find that the passing of this bill removing from British Columbia the privileges under the act, will affect them. We cannot tell how it is going to affect people outside, and for the good of the whole country I would urge and implore, if I may use that word, my hon. friend, who as I said before has always acted most judiciously, to let the legislation be held up for a little while to see if we cannot get into touch with the officials of British Columbia, adjust the matter and thus put an end to a tempest in a teapot.

Mr. RHODES: I hasten to assure my hon. friend and the committee that when I spoke of the encomiums with which this legislation had been received I had reference to the passage of the bill in the house last year. Under those circumstances it can by no means be suggested as casting even any reflected glory upon myself.

Mr. JACOBS: You deserve it.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend has suggested, as he always does, that there should be some Christian charity shown in this matter.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes: "where there are no men be thou a man."

Mr. RHODES: I might suggest—and I do this in no spirit of pique, or because of any quarrel or bad blood between the federal government and the province of British Columbia —that they might show some Christian charity to the distressed farmers in their province.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are doing it.

Mr. RHODES: That is, be prepared to make a contribution the same as companies and individuals are doing. If they were prepared to exercise this Christian charity, this bill would never have been necessary. My hon. friends have said that if this bill is put through it will not be viewed very kindly in the other provinces. But I put this to him: what would the other provinces say if we permitted one province to withdraw itself from the provisions of an act? A man in the province of Quebec could have a settlement calling for a contribution from that province, but in British Columbia the provincial government says: No, we will make no contribution. I say if this bill were not passed and that condition did obtain, the other provinces would have every right to complain. So that the position is just the reverse of that suggested. I assure my hon. friend and the committee that this bill was not introduced through pique or because of bad blood, but because we had to cope with a situation which was the creation of the government of British Columbia. I speak for the government when I say that we should be delighted if the circumstances were altered so that we should not need to proceed with this bill. The best evidence of that is the reply I gave to the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. MacInnis) when I said that if there was any intimation of a changed attitude on the part of the government of British Columbia I should be very happy to suggest to the Senate that an amendment be added making the bill operative only on proclamation, and of course the bill would never be proclaimed unless the circumstances were such as to call for it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I again object to some of the remarks of the Minister of Finance. In the first place this bill is an admission by the government that they are afraid or choose not to defend their own legislation. Whatever the decision may be in British Columbia, it is an open intimation to the Dominion of Canada that this government is not prepared to defend its own legislation in court. Then the minister says that they are still prepared to cooperate. I read a telegram which proves conclusively that an offer of conciliation and cooperation came to this government before this bill was introduced. Repudiating that offer of conciliation and cooperation, and bringing this bill into the house, is going to destroy the act not only in British Columbia but in my opinion all over the dominion.

Mr. BARBER: I regret very much that it has been necessary to take action to withdraw this legislation from the province of British Columbia. I have received during the last few months many letters from farmers in that province who have been successful in making compromises and putting themselves in a position to go back on the land and make good. The last speaker referred to a telegram. I wish to quote part of a telegram which the premier of British Columbia, I believe, forwarded a few days ago to the Prime Minister:

> I think the dominion government is taking a very imprudent course and say now that if the dominion government will confine the operation of the act in British Columbia as between persons and not undertake to interfere with provincial contracts and provincial rights to levy and collect our own taxation there will be no opposition from this government.

[Mr. Rhodes.]

That is the condition that they want to provide in this legislation. But as the minister pointed out, if that concession is given to the province of British Columbia it would necessarily have to be given to every province throughout Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why not? That is a reasonable position.

Mr. BARBER: The premier of British Columbia does not object in connection with a debt or a mortgage between a farmer and a citizen or between a farmer and a merchant or some trust company, but the province must not be a party to the debt. May I point out that the province of British Columbia is somewhat different in its organization from other provinces, in that we are not municipally organized to the extent that other provinces are. A large portion of the province is not municipally organized, and the province deals directly with the citizens or residents in those districts, collecting the taxes and looking after improvements and so forth. The particular case which apparently brought this to a head was referred to by the minister as concerning one Copeland. It will be noted from the telegram of Mr. Pattullo that as long as this legislation does not undertake to interfere with provincial contracts and provincial rights to levy and collect their own taxation the province is content. In this particular case the board of review found that all interest due, with penalties, should be written off; the interest on arrears of taxes was to be written off and the farmer placed in a position to be able to continue operation of his farm and put in a position to pay his taxes to the provincial government and to meet all his other obligations. This was settled, and I think hon. members will find on Hansard the manner in which it was settled. The taxes were fixed at a lump sum of $1,408.03, which was inclusive of the taxes assessed and payable in 1935, and the settlement provided:

> That the said sum shall be payable in three equal annual instalments of $469.34 each, without interest, on the 31st day of October in the years 1936, 1937 and 1938 respectively; and the board directs that no tax enforcement proceeding shall be taken against the debtor in respect of these payments until after October 31, 1939. The debtor shall pay all current taxes payable to the province in the year 1936 and subsequent years until and including the year 1940, regularly and in accordance with the provisions of the statute on that behalf.

So that it is quite clear that in this particular case they were not interfering with taxes, but advised that the interest and penalty should be remitted. Now the soldier settlement board come under this relief act; a federal board, they take their loss along with others according to the decision of the board of review. But the provincial government object to coming in. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) complained bitterly, and some others also, that there should have been conferences. Well, I know that the officials of the department kept in touch all along with the attorney general and other officials of the government in British Columbia. In fact on one occasion when some little objection was raised they agreed that the attorney general should have representation on the board of review. And he had a representative on the board and he took part in the proceedings. There have been conferences, I think everything has been done to bring about a settlement.

Now there are other cases, there are cases in my own district, and this was brought to my mind by the hon. member for New Westminster when he said something about a dyking area. In my district we have a dyking area known as the Sumas dyking scheme. The reclamation of that area was carried out by a Liberal government in our province some years ago. The great difficulty in connection with that area is that the farmers are unable to meet the tremendous tax that they are asked to pay in connection with the dyking charge. This goes back to the years when this work was first undertaken. Under their land settlement board the government at that time estimated the cost of the reclamation scheme at $1,800,000, and it was on that basis certain taxation was to be levied per acre for maintenance and interest charges. Unfortunately, however, when the work was completed the total cost amounted to over $4,000,000, and the tax is so heavy that the farmers cannot meet their obligations. So the province must take a loss; it has taken several losses already but it will have to take further loss.

I was interested in several cases that were submitted to the board of review just when the provincial government took this action; I believe those cases are standing at the present time. In the Sumas area some sixty-four farmers made application for adjustments, not only concerning the provincial government but the soldier settlement board, loan companies and private citizens. It would be greatly to the interest of the provincial government if some adjustments were made in order to permit these farmers to remain on the land and meet their taxes. Now that the government of British Columbia refuses to participate or to make any concessions whatever, it will be impossible to keep these farmers on the land in that district unless the province undertakes some adjustment on its own behalf.

As I have said, the act has worked out very well in British Columbia. I had a letter handed to me the other day concerning this man Copeland. In the settlement made in that case it will be noted from what the minister has said that the board of review did not interfere very much with the provincial government. It appears that Mr. Copeland had as his representative before the board Mr. T. G. Norris, a barrister, of Kelowna, and he wrote the following letter to Mr. Norris:

Dear Mr. Norris:

I have just received word from Mr. Merryfield, secretary of the board of review in Vancouver, setting out the proposal of the board of review in my case, and I must say that I am more than pleased with their proposal. They have, beyond doubt, made it possible for me to carry on and make good. I have received nothing but kindness from all parties in connection with the federal government, naming Mr. J. R. Mitchell, Alex Ogston, Esq., Mr. Merryfield and also the members of the board of review.

I want to again thank you, Mr. Norris, for being the means of starting me out right in the first place. You have undoubtedly been the means of placing me in the happy position I am in to-day.

I hope to be in Kelowna before many days, and I will drop in to see you and have a chat about things in general.

Yours very sincerely,
(Signed) R. A. Copeland.

This man has been put in a position which will enable him to carry on and meet his obligations, and he is a happy man to-day. I could read dozens of letters I have received from people in my own district as well as in other sections of the province, speaking very highly of what has been done for them. But, as I have pointed out, if the province of British Columbia will not permit any matter concerning provincial obligations to be brought before a board of review, even if they have a representative on that board, I do not think the act can work in that province. We all regret it. There may be some political tinge to it, but I am not going to deal with that matter at this time. I still hope that the province of British Columbia, through the attorney general, will reconsider its stand. I believe the government have been very fair in inviting the attorney general's department of British Columbia to have a representative sit in with the board of review when dealing with these cases and adjudicating these matters.

Mr. EULER: I hesitate to interpose in this debate, as I admit that I know very little about the operations of this act, but I rise to ask the minister a question and possibly to make a suggestion. I take it that if this bill passes the province of British Columbia, with its distressed farmers, will be placed entirely outside the operation of the act and the benefits which may be obtained under it. Is there not a possibility that the action which has been taken by British Columbia might fail? If that action fails, would not the federal government be able to apply the act in that province? If that is the case, if we pass this bill now and later British Columbia fails in its action, by this step the government will make it impossible for the distressed farmers of that province to obtain any assistance. I am wondering whether it would not be wiser to postpone passing this bill until we know the decision of the court in the action that has been taken by the province of British Columbia.

Mr. RHODES: It is quite true that if the court gave a decision holding that the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was intra vires of this parliament, it would be binding upon the province of British Columbia and the act would be applicable there. What we point out, however, is that while the opinion of the Department of Justice is that the act is intra vires, it is quite possible that a court may take another point of view. I do not profess to be capable of expressing an opinion worth anything on that point; I would defer to the legal talent in the committee in that respect, but we could not afford to imperil the operation of this act throughout Canada by reason of an action that has been taken in one province. It must be borne in mind that practically only one per cent of the settlements made in Canada have been made in the province of British Columbia. In other words, if the same proportion were borne out, we would allow one person to determine the legality of an action bearing upon ninety-nine others.

Mr. EULER: If the Supreme Court of British Columbia should declare against the federal government, would that affect the other provinces?

Mr. RHODES: I am advised that it would not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Not in a legal sense, but this bill means that the Minister of Justice is extending an invitation to the courts of British Columbia to hold unconstitutional the bill we passed last year, because he is not defending the action.

[Mr. Barber.]

Mr. JACOBS: What will happen if tomorrow another province raises the same question? Will another punitive bill be introduced? Either the law is good or it is not good. My hon. friend says we cannot imperil the operation of this act in the other provinces. For the life of me I cannot see how the hon. gentleman can prevent similar action with regard to every other province in Canada under the jurisdiction of this act if the same situation should arise.

Mr. RHODES: I think the obvious answer to the point raised by my hon. friend from Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) is this: The other eight provinces have accepted the act; they have cooperated cordially and have made no objection to the jurisdiction of the act. They have accepted settlements of boards of review which have had the effect of reducing payments coming to provincial governments and provincial boards, so that question cannot arise.

Mr. JACOBS: My hon. friend must know that it is given to any private individual in a province to attack the legality of any act.

Mr. RHODES: I assumed that my hon. friend was speaking of the action of a provincial government. I might say also that no private individual has attacked the act in any province, so far as I am aware.

Mr. EULER: Would the government not find itself in a most awkward position so far as the farmers of British Columbia are concerned if that province should fail in its action against the government in the case to be decided to-morrow? If it fails the province is placed outside the pale; the benefits of the act can no longer be applied to British Columbia.

Mr. RHODES: I think the hon. member will not accuse me of discourtesy when I say to him that this government cannot assume the responsibility. The action of the province of British Columbia, through its government, is the cause of this legislation.

Mr. EULER: This government owes a duty to British Columbia outside of the government of that province.

Mr. RHODES: We should be derelict in our duty if because of the act of the province of British Columbia this federal act should be declared ultra vires and its benefits denied to Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It probably will be declared ultra vires, because it is not being defended and we are therefore expressing no confidence in the legislation which we passed last year.

Section agreed to on division.

Bill reported.

MORTGAGE CREDITS FOR FISHERMEN

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 120, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of long term mortgage credit for fishermen.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I would point out that the bill was brought before us only three-quarters of an hour ago, and that it affects the province of British Columbia. For the last hour we have been engaged in the discussion of a bill vitally affecting that province. Four hon. members from British Columbia have spoken to it, and necessarily our attention was concentrated on the bill then under discussion. This is a complicated bill of seventeen sections, and I submit it is not fair to ask for second reading until we have had an opportunity to consider it. I suggest that it be allowed to stand until to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF: Mr. Speaker, I join the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) in asking the minister to be good enough to allow the bill to stand over until to-morrow. To-day I endeavoured to obtain a copy of the bill. I sent to the distribution office at ten o'clock this morning; I went down myself at eleven o'clock, and I sent down again at twelve o'clock, one o'clock, two o'clock and at a quarter to three. Still I could not get a copy of it. Only half an hour ago were the bills made available and placed on the table. I respectfully submit that the bill should stand until to-morrow.

Mr. STIRLING: Under the circumstances I believe it would be preferable to allow the bill to stand over.

Motion stands.

SUPPLY

CREDIT AND FINANCE—AMENDMENT OF MR. SPEAKMAN TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I take advantage of this opportunity, perhaps the last during the lifetime of this parliament, to present to the house for its consideration and I hope action, what I conceive to be a problem of first magnitude. While it is not of recent origin, it is a fundamental problem and of increasing urgency. To-day in Canada and throughout the world there is a growing realization of the fact that the whole is greater than the part, or, in other words, using it in its present application, that the state or society as a whole is greater and of more importance than any individual or group of individuals within the state and forming part of that society. This conviction has been expressing itself in past years in Canada, as elsewhere, in legislation designed to bring about an increasing degree of control and regulation by the state of individuals and groups of individuals, whenever the activity of such individuals is apparently detrimental to the public weal.

Mr. YOUNG: You mean the regulation of the whole by the part?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: At the present time I am not referring to any special legislation, but rather to the tendency which has manifested itself in Canada and throughout the world. As to the adequacy of the expression I shall not speak at this time. To my mind this process is inevitable in view of modern conditions. There are certain principles, the first of which being accepted the second or third must inevitably follow in logical sequence. In this country, I believe with the common consent of all classes of society and supported by all bodies of opinion in this chamber, the state has undertaken the obligation of providing relief for its unemployed; in other words, the state—and I speak of it in all its branches, federal, provincial and municipal—has undertaken to provide purchasing power for those unable to earn it for themselves through the ordinary processes of industry and business. After all, is not unemployment the human wastage or human loss in industry and business, using those terms in their widest and most general sense? And is not that loss influenced at least in a measure by the general policies followed by industry and business? I think there is no hon. member of the house who, if called upon to underwrite the losses of any business, would not insist upon at least a degree of effective voice in the policies of that business which policies might materially increase or decrease, or indeed wholly obviate, the possible loss. I believe this principle applies to the state in exactly the same way as it applies to the individual man or woman going into business or underwriting a loss. The state has agreed to underwrite this human loss, and I believe it follows in inevitable sequence that the state in growing measure, so long at least as the condition continues must have a controlling or regulating voice in the policies of business and industry. As I have said, the first of these principles has been accepted with practical unanimity and is supported by what I shall describe as the three bodies of public opinion represented in this chamber. The second step has long been advocated by the group in this corner, is now accepted in principle at least by the government in power, and in some degree, though perhaps reluctantly, by the official opposition, as is quite obvious from the support given various measures. But there is in my opinion a third step which, the first two being taken, must follow as inevitably and logically as the second. It is extremely doubtful whether those two obligations can be undertaken and these policies discharged within the confines of what we term to-day our financial system. In other words, the increased obligations on the part of the state consequent upon relief policies, the limitations placed upon business and industry in connection with the setting up of minimum rates of pay, the shortening of hours, the reduction of profits, the putting into force of more humane conditions, must inevitably lead to an increased cost of doing business. It is doubtful whether the state can continue to make these expenditures, whether business and industry can continue to function under these limitations within the narrow confines of what is somewhat ironically termed sound finance and sound money.

Another question naturally arises. What I think is accepted as one of the greatest difficulties encountered by the federal state in dealing with this matter is the question of jurisdiction and constitutional authority in bringing about that control and in passing the necessary regulations. This house has laboured earnestly with this problem. The committee which was appointed went into the matter very deeply but it was confronted with the obstacle of constitutional limitation of power. What was apparently overlooked was what is under modern conditions the most effective form of control and what is under our constitution the unchallenged right of this parliament—the power to deal with such a situation by means of the control which the state may exercise over finance. I shall not deal further with this question, as it is my purpose to be brief; but I think that is something which is recognized by all hon. members as being effective, both constitutionally and practically.

[Mr. Speakman.]

We come now to another point, the dead weight of interest bearing debt, both private and public, which rests upon the country and upon the people. I shall not dwell too long upon this somewhat unpleasant subject, as it has been discussed in detail on former occasions and probably will be discussed on subsequent occasions. Suffice it to say that there is no man in public life within my knowledge who has ventured to suggest any manner by which this debt might be discharged or its steady increase checked within the narrow limits of what is called sound finance. No individual, no corporation, no state, can continue indefinitely on a policy of increased borrowings without repayment or prospect of repayment without facing inevitable bankruptcy. This government has recognized that difficulty and endeavoured to meet or alleviate the situation. An effort, successful in a measure, has been made to reduce the carrying costs of debt, particularly of public debt, through refunding at lower rates, through legislative enactments to provide for lower carrying charges, and other means. The government has endeavoured to meet the problem by making legislative provision for the partial repudiation of various forms of obligations, as is evidenced by our Bankruptcy Act and the other acts which provide for the voluntary or compulsory composition of debts. I am not criticizing that form of legislation; I have supported it in the past and shall continue to support it in the future. I consider it a necessary palliative measure under present circumstances, but I do not think any hon. member will suggest that a policy of repudiation or partial repudiation is sound in principle or will realize its full intent in the end. That is not a sound way to deal with the situation. Many in this country now believe that the time has come when we should stop giving our whole attention to the treatment of symptoms and attempt the eradication of underlying causes. I shall not make further reference to the question of debt, as it has been discussed in this house on many occasions. So long as the system itself is founded upon and is inseparable from the use of interest bearing credit and the constant increase in interest bearing debt there is no method of repudiation or partial repudiation, no method of decreasing the carrying costs which will strike at the root of the trouble and remove the cause. So long as that policy continues I give it as my opinion that that will be the effect. This is not merely an opinion of yesterday; it is an opinion which I have reluctantly formed over the course of years. I think it is unnecessary for me to say to this house that I am not inherently a radical.

I have not the type of mind that jumps to something new simply because it is new. I follow a thing, rightly or wrongly, if in my opinion and according to my concept of logic I am driven to that conclusion by the consideration which I give the matter. I am not saying that my logic will be inviolable or that my conclusions will be right, but I urge them only after some process of thought Every reform is inseparable from an emotion almost religious in its fervour, and while it is true that a few great reforms have been accomplished without that stimulus, it is also true that in dealing with business and economic matters no permanent success has been achieved unless in addition to that emotional stimulus there has been a background and foundation of practical common sense.

I do not believe that this condition can be permanently cured so long as the financial credit of the country and the provision of purchasing power is looked upon as a profit making industry, to be held or withheld by groups of individuals for their own private gain, particularly when this essential of modern life is falling more and more under monopolistic control.

There is a third phase which is known to every hon. member and which must appeal alike to his reason and his humanity I refer to the condition which has been referred to so often in the terms of the hackneyed phrase, poverty in the midst of plenty. A tremendous disparity exists to-day between our capacity to produce real wealth and the extent to which we have been able to make effective use of that capacity. I doubt if there is an hon. member in this house, a thinking man in Canada, who has not been bending his mind and thoughts in the direction of how this can be accomplished; how we may bring about a condition that would make available for actual human use within this country, to the average man and woman, that real wealth which we can produce in such abundance. That is the problem. I suggest that there is no country in the world in which a higher standard of living could or should be secured to the individual than in Canada. Canada has often been referred to as one of the last great undeveloped areas, and I am certain of this, that there is no country in the world which in proportion to the scanty population which this country is called upon to support has a greater fund of natural wealth and resource for that population to draw upon. Not only that, but, again a truism, we have within the country in our mines and rivers an actual and potential power which will assist us in making available this natural wealth. I suppose there are countries richer than our own; the United States possibly is richer in the extent and variety of its resources. But it is called upon to support over ten times our population, and when we make a comparison with Great Britain or the countries of Europe it becomes absolutely ludicrous. Let me say again that there is no country in the world better fitted by nature, by natural resources within its boundaries, by its available power, to provide a high standard of living for all its citizens than is Canada. And it is a reason why we should bend our energies towards making that wealth available. I am reminded of a cartoon I once saw, of a man crouching on a storehouse of treasure, starving and shivering and calling on providence to satisfy his needs by some miraculous process.

May I go a little further. We have here then all these resources, and a population which is scanty, it is true, but I may safely say second to none in the world in its intelligence, industry and desire to work and produce that which it requires. There is no population in the world that is less desirous or less willing to live upon doles and relief and charity than the Canadian population, take it as a whole from one end of Canada to the other. French-speaking and English-speaking people, and people from other countries who came here impelled by a desire, by the labour of their own hands and the application of their own intelligence and industry, not only to make a home but to secure a decent standard of living by their own energy and exertion—these are the people of Canada, and they are still anxious to carry out that intention.

Having all these qualities and factors in this country, there must be, I say, some fundamental cause, there must be some fundamental weakness in a system which permits conditions such as we find them in Canada at the present time. There is another point in connection with that very question. We speak of the power available; we speak of the mechanical appliances at our disposal; and we are beginning to realize more and more that those very mechanical appliances which will make possible so high a standard of living are to-day, and under present conditions, not increasing but reducing that standard and making it increasingly difficult for men and women not only to find employment but actually to maintain themselves in decency and comfort.

The world we are entering upon, the world we are living in, is a world in which inevitably, more and more, the human element, human energy, will become a constantly diminishing factor in the production of real wealth. And that means that the opportunity for human earnings in the now accepted sense will become a smaller and smaller ratio to the mass and value of the wealth produced; and we cannot blind our eyes, we cannot close our understanding to that problem which is known to-day as technological unemployment. I am not one of those who believe that, all things being well, work could not be found even under modern conditions. I have only to take a glance at the homes throughout Canada, I have only to look at conditions as I find them, to be assured that if the people of Canada had the money with which to pay for modern improvements and comforts and decency in the remodelling and rebuilding of houses, not by tens of thousands but by hundreds of thousands, and to provide themselves with all those things which they now desire, which we could supply and which they wish to enjoy, so far as production is concerned, we could find work for men even in this mechanized age. We could find work for every ablebodied man in the country and find it for years to come. But whenever it is suggested, whenever a plan is put forward by individuals, groups or governments that this wealth should be made available to the people, we are confronted with the one question—Where will you find the money? And we find ourselves balked and frustrated by a financial system which, however inadequate in its inception, is no longer adequate to meet modern conditions or requirements.

May I in conclusion offer one more thought. There are two ways, as far as I can see, by which goods may be distributed and consumed. There may be others but there are only two that I see as the two obvious methods. One is what is known as the strictly communistic method, that is, where the state itself owns all property, where the state itself owns all production and where every citizen in the state may draw on that store, without money or price, according to his needs or desires. That is one method. Now notice, I am not advocating either method; I am laying down alternatives. The other method is by the provision of sufficient purchasing power in the hands of those who desire to use the goods that are produced, to enable them to buy and pay for and enjoy those goods. I might suggest this—and I am suggesting it for the consideration of those to whom the terms socialism, communism and so on, are a bugbear in the night and a nightmare to frighten them in their dreams. Let me suggest to such people that if they want to avoid that alternative there is only one thing for them to do, and that is to make it possible for the people to secure the necessary purchasing power which will enable them to supply their needs; because I doubt whether we can long continue in this country or in the world with conditions as we find them, and as they will be in increasing measure, where the majority of the people are debarred throughout their lives from security, potential security in the obtaining of those things which are accumulating before their very eyes and which they require and demand.

We cannot sit down and watch that drift, and so I suggest that the very best way of avoiding an overturn of all those things we hold dear on both sides, all those democratic principles which have been so strongly and eloquently advocated, all those constitutional prerogatives which are dwelt on so frequently —the only way to avoid the submergence of all these things is to deal with the question from another angle and make it possible for the people to live on a high standard of comfort without going to the other extreme.

There is one other thought, and with that I will conclude. This factor at least should be considered in dealing with this subject. Philosophically speaking, apart from natural resources, this is the factor in production which counts—human energy, human intelligence, human foresight, human industry applied to the use of natural resources. All of these others, the machinery developed, power and all the various factors we use are in effect a combination of these two agencies —natural resources and human energy in one form or another. I think it is taken for granted that those now engaged in industry should share in production. And when I speak of industry I mean industry in all its manifold forms. I have found that the agriculturist is at least industrious and competent enough to be termed an industrialist in that sense. Those engaged in industry and production in all forms, those who give their energy, their industry and intelligence to development and production, are entitled to a share of the division of its proceeds, and I am including, of course, those who supply capital for development. For after all capital is the crystallization, to some degree at any rate, of human energy and natural resources combined.

But there is another factor which is not always given consideration. I think it will be conceded that the contribution made by the present generation is not the only human factor which is introduced into this question. None of these various improvements would be possible to-day, none of that wonderful machinery, that marvellous utilization of power which we witness would now be available had it depended solely upon the inventive genius, intelligence and industry of those now living and enjoying their benefits. There is what is termed the cumulative heritage. The term has been misused many times, but it simply means that for the last hundred years back, and far beyond that, men have been working and striving and inventing and solving one problem after another; and upon the foundation of that intelligence, that skill and that inventive genius, gradually step by step, not at one fell stroke, there has been erected the structure which we now see. And behind that, beneath it and making it possible, rests the labour of all those who have gone before us, generation after generation. There is not a man living to-day, there is not a group or aggregation of individuals living to-day who can claim a monopolistic right to that heritage as being its sole beneficiaries. The beneficiaries of that heritage, as of our heritage of constitutional freedom and our democratic institutions, is and must be society as a whole, because society as a whole, generation after generation, has made that contribution and laid that foundation. And that means, if rightly interpreted, that not only are those now engaged in industry entitled to some share of the social heritage but that all society is entitled in virtue of the fact that they are beneficiaries and legatees.

I am merely suggesting that in dealing with this financial question, in dealing with the manner in which currency should be issued and credit used, we might well ask whether that should not be a factor to be considered, whether what is termed monetization, that is making in actual concrete monetary form the basis of our wealth, should not be considered and whether the people who are the legatees of that heritage should not be given some share of that monetized value. I shall not go into that argument; I shall bring that forward presently in an amendment which I propose to move.

Because this is neither the time nor the place, nor am I competent to go into the technique of how these things should be done, I am merely going to offer a suggestion to the house for its consideration. Whenever anyone in this house or outside suggests that some new principle of finance should be adopted, the cry at once comes: How are you going to effect that in a practical, technical way; give us the details; give us the method. That is impossible. I might return the challenge by asking this: Is there any man in this house or in this country to-day—and if there is, I have never met and never heard of him—who can tell us how our system is functioning to-day or how we are going to come out under our present system? Is there anyone who can tell us how we are going to pay our debts, distribute our goods, under this system? Surely we have a right to challenge them as regards the practical application of a system they adhere to just as they have a right to challenge us as to the details of a principle we suggest. I have advocated this principle in different parts of Canada and I believe it is sound. I believe the greatest obstacle to financial reform is the multitude of schools of finance which have arisen, the quarrelling, the warfare which exists between one and another, the fact that this school and the other school, the Gerry McGeers, the Douglasites, the Aberhartites, and other "ites" too numerous to mention are quarrelling one with another as the best means to bring financial reform into effect. They are always quarrelling with each other and hating each other worse than they hate their common enemy, each one more anxious to effect the downfall of the other than to bring about a remedy. I am going to make this suggestion. When the average man buys a piece of machinery, let us say a motor car because we are all familiar with that, I venture to say that there is not one man in a hundred thousand who thoroughly understands all the technical science which lies behind the manufacture and functioning of that car. It is not necessary that he should. He asks two questions. I am not speaking now of the ladies because they will also take into account the beauty, grace and so forth. But two questions are asked: Will it perform the functions for which it is required and will it stand up under those operations? I have suggested elsewhere and I suggest to the house that all of those who believe that in finance lies at least the crux of our situation should forget all this quarrelling over details which they are not competent either to understand or to solve, and simply ask the same questions, make the same demands as are made upon manufacturers of machinery, upon this parliament which under our constitution is given the obligation and responsibility of providing purchasing power and medium of exchange. We may delegate those functions to the banks; we may pass them over to individuals or corporations, but in doing so we cannot divest ourselves either of the function or of the responsibility. I am merely suggesting then that they should make that effective demand upon parliament: Give us a system which will enable us to pay our debts, to buy goods, to carry on the operations which a financial system is supposed to facilitate as regards all the interchange and consumption of the wealth which we can produce.

I will admit at once that parliament is not competent to say just how that will be done, but parliament can do as every manufacturer must do, summon the few technicians in that particular science in the world to-day and set before them that problem with a plainly defined objective. The people then could judge this parliament as they judge any manufacturer, by the way in which the system which is provided for them functions. That is the only way in which they can judge, and, may I say, the only sane manner of judging any system. Does it function? Does it deliver the goods? I am suggesting that this line of thought should be followed. As I say, I have no intention of going into the details of how this should be done; I am not competent to set them before the house, and I am not insulting parliament when I say that it is not competent to understand them as I am not competent to explain them. Members of parliament have listened to technicians and have gone away holding their heads because they were unable to understand the multitude of complexities; so I am not going to discuss the details even were I competent to do so.

In order to crystallize the thought which I have in mind, I propose to move an amendment upon going into supply. I regret that under the rules of the house I am obliged to move it in this way knowing under the usual procedure it must be considered as a vote of want of confidence. But the conditions, the circumstances, the time made it impossible for me to find another opportunity. So I should like to move it as a substantive motion. When I could have moved it as a private member I waited until I saw whether parliament itself through the program before us was taking any step towards meeting this objective, towards solving this problem. It has not done it. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by Mr. Irvine:

That all the words after "that" in the motion be stricken out, and the following be added as a substitute therefor:

Whereas: The rapid growth of public and private debt, which must inevitably continue under our present financial system if public services are to be maintained and extended and production carried on, together with the increasing disparity between the real wealth of this country and the purchasing power which would make this wealth available for common use, render it imperative that a reorganization of our financial system should be undertaken as the logical first step in any reconstruction program; and

Whereas: No measure or policy has been as yet enacted or proposed by either major party in this house by way of dealing in an effective manner with the foregoing situation; and

[Mr. Speakman.]

Whereas: The issue and control of finance in all its phases is the constitutional prerogative of federal authority, and the provision of a satisfactory system of finance is the undoubted responsibility of the dominion parliament;

Therefore be it resolved: That this parliament resume its direct control over the public credit of Canada with a view to:—

Reorganizing the financial system of this country on the basis of our ability to produce and deliver goods and services: financing all public works and construction at cost, repayment to be made at the rate of the annual deterioration of the asset so created; and Instituting such system of management and control as will best maintain an equitable level of purchasing power and prices, thus avoiding the alternate evils of inflation and deflation.

And further be it resolved: That this parliament recognize the right of every citizen to a share in that accumulated social heritage by means of which modern production has become so efficient, and is of the opinion that the social credit based upon this heritage should be drawn upon to the extent necessary and advisable in the increase and maintenance of the standards of living in this country, and that this may be done through the payment of annual dividends to:

All Canadians who are sixty years of age or over; those who are physically or mentally incapacitated: and those who would be entitled thereto under the terms of an effective system of national insurance against unemployment or crop failure, or a national system of mothers' and orphans' allowance, or of widows' pension.

Amendment negatived.

B.C. RELIEF CAMPS

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, there is a matter to which I wish to draw the attention of the house, a matter which I and some of us in this corner have attempted to bring to the attention of the house for some time. I refer to the men from the unemployment relief camps in British Columbia and the position in which they now find themselves.

On May 22, we tried to get an adjournment of the house in order to discuss this matter, which we considered of very serious importance to the people of the country. We were denied the opportunity at that time. And again on June 13 we tried without success to discuss it. Since that time certain developments have taken place, and there is every possibility that further serious developments will take place in the very near future. Therefore I think this house should have some understanding of the conditions with which these men from the camps are confronted. In order to give that understanding I am going to give a very brief history of the camps.

The statement has been made in this house on numerous occasions that these camps are merely a temporary expedient to take care of a passing condition. But let us not overlook this fact that some of the men in those camps have been there for almost four years. The camps were opened, as far as the province of British Columbia is concerned, in September, 1931. They continued for some time under the provincial government, and then in 1932 were put under a commission appointed by the federal government but nominated by the government of British Columbia. In June, 1933, the camps were put under the Department of National Defence and have so remained ever since. While we glibly say that this is a temporary situation, there is no one in this house or in this country who can tell these men when, if ever, they can leave those camps. That is what I would like hon. members of this house to understand, and I should like to put this question to them: If it were your son in the camp or on the march to Ottawa now, what attitude would you take in the circumstances? Before I am finished I hope to show that the men in these camps are just as good as the sons of members of this house.

For some time there was no great dissatisfaction or trouble in the camps. That is quite understandable, because I suppose at that time the men themselves felt that they were there only temporarily, that in a few months things would brighten up again, that business would resume its normal activity and that then they would have an opportunity once more of taking part in the business life of the country. They had every reason to feel that way. Were not all the business men of the country telling us that soon we would be back to normal? Almost every evening when you picked up your daily paper you saw an interview with some authority who said that business was improving. Time and time again even the Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada told us that we were on the up grade and that soon we would be out of our difficulties. But as time went on the men remained in the camps; they saw no break in the economic depression and they began to get restless. In December of last year many of the men left the camps in British Columbia and went to the city of Vancouver. I mentioned this in the house previously; I mention it again now just in passing. Representatives of every political party took a share in trying to settle the difficulty at that time, and the men went back to the camps on the understanding given by the provincial government that there would be an investigation into the conditions complained of. No investigation was held. We then took up the matter here in the house on going into supply and after some agitation, but not before the men had determined to leave the camps again, a royal commission was appointed to look into camp conditions. The last strike in the British Columbia camps took place on April 4, and if I remember correctly the commission was appointed on March 30.

Some little time ago the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Stirling) read from the report and made certain comments on it, but I do not believe he touched the important points of the report. I refer to the psychological factors in connection with camp conditions. The minister told us what the commission found and the submissions made by the commission in regard thereto. May I just say that while personally I was not dissatisfied with the commission or with its report, and while I believe the gentlemen who were appointed were quite competent to carry out the work assigned to them, I should like to point out to the government that in the appointment of this commission they did the same thing they have done in connection with every commission they have appointed since coming into office. There was no labour man or any one remotely connected with labour on that commission although the men in the camps belong primarily to the working class.

With regard to the conditions complained of, the commissioners mentioned the food, the water supply, sanitary conditions and so on. In the main they found these fairly satisfactory, though they did recommend certain improvements. In my opinion, however, one of the most important paragraphs in the report is headed "Mental Attitude." It reads:

> Apart from any alleged causes of physical discomfort, poor food or living conditions, a clearly defined and openly expressed mental attitude in respect to the camps on the part of the men has developed during the years of their maintenance, and is the outstanding cause of unrest and dissatisfaction.

I should like hon. members of the house to take note of that; this mental attitude is the outstanding cause of unrest and dissatisfaction. What gives rise to this mental attitude? The commissioners stated that the absence of a wage was of first importance. That is the heading of the next paragraph, in which they say:

> Camp life, generally speaking, is not a normal condition under which men desire to live. Men are attracted to mining, logging and construction camps because of a wage paid for labour. It was pointed out by the men that usually there is some goal at the end of a period of employment, and men put up with the discomforts and lack of social contacts associated with camp life because, in due course, there will be a substantial pay cheque, and a way open to some other form of living. It was contended that in the case of relief camps the absence of a wage rendered a future opportunity of leaving the camps with any considerable amount of money impossible, and that, as the months passed by, the men drifted into either an attitude of hopeles indifference or of studied rebellion.

That is the situation with which we are confronted at this time; the men have no other alternative than to fall into one of those two categories; they must either give up hope of ever getting out of camp and improving their position or become rebellious against the conditions which keep them there and against the government which seemingly will not make a move to improve conditions. I could quote a great deal more from the report along the same line, which the Minister of National Defence did not quote, but I do not desire to take up the time of the house to any very great extent. Here is another point, however, to which I should like to direct attention. The heading of the paragraph is "Young Men." The commissioners say:

A considerable percentage of the men are young, many of them under twenty-one years of age.

How would members of this house like to have their sons of twenty-one years of age or less penned up in these camps under these conditions?

Their education has been interrupted, their training in various mechanical trades has been terminated, or their progress in office or mercantile work has ceased. In many cases these youths have left comfortable homes, or homes now on city or government relief in order that the burden at home might be lightened. Under ordinary circumstances many of these young men would not go at any time to these camps.

Note these words:

They naturally grow rebellious over the apparent hopelessness of their position, and the loss of years in which they might be fitting themselves for higher positions in life.

The next paragraph is headed "Forgotten Men." It says:

A growing conviction seems to have entered the minds of most of the men that they are a forgotten group. The isolation of many of the camps renders it impossible for men to keep in touch personally with former employment or with new work opening up.

It is true that the provincial labour bureau does seek to bring men in camps to the attention of employers, and that the department will furnish transportation to men going to bona fide positions, yet the employment of men from the relief camps is so rare that a fixed idea prevails among the men that they are deemed unsuitable for employment, and shunned by those seeking workmen.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

And again, under the heading, "Isolation of camps":

The projects on which work is being carried on, and in the vicinity of which camps are located, are, in many instances, in very isolated places. Some camps are located where mountains rise on all sides, and there is not even sufficient level ground for any form of sports. Owing to the lack of transportation is it impossible for the men to reach any nearby community, or to participate in any form of social or community life. The absence of all social contacts and the lack of any change of environment cannot fail to produce a sense of isolation and loneliness, with a consequent depressing mental attitude.

This, gentlemen, is a state of affairs to which every hon. member should give the greatest thought. Is it any wonder that the men have left the camps? Is it any wonder that they do not want to go back? Is there any man here who, under such circumstances, would want to go back to the camps? Despite that fact, when they come here to the seat of government, at the invitation of the government, to discuss their grievances their representatives are insulted. If we want a reasonable settlement of this matter surely that is not the way in which we ought to treat it. If we realize the gravity of the situation we ought to try to meet the men with a certain degree of sympathy, in any case.

There is one other quotation which I should like to make. I ask hon. members to pay attention to this, and to bear in mind that this is the report of a royal commission headed by a gentleman who was chief justice of the province of British Columbia:

The chief ground for discontent and unrest was the absence of an adequate wage for workers in the camps. We remark on this point, that it should be remembered the policy of paying wages was not contemplated when the camps were organized.

The grave fear that morale and incentive gradually disappear with the continuance of these camps.

The difficulty of men in relief camps, owing to isolation, keeping in touch with the labour market with a view to possible employment.

I should like to draw to your attention—

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 27, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE

First report of select standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Harris.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SASKATCHEWAN NATURAL RESOURCES COMMISSION

Mr. VALLANCE:

1. Was George McDonald, C.A., a member of the firm of Clarkson, McDonald, Currie and Company while he was a member of the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Commission?
2. Was the firm of Clarkson, McDonald, Currie and Company acting as auditors for any department of the government during the period in which George C. McDonald, C.A., was a member of the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Commission, and, if so, what moneys, if any, were paid by the government to the said firm during that period?
3. Is the firm of Clarkson, McDonald, Currie and Company, of Montreal, associated with the firm of Clarkson, McDonald, Currie and Company of Toronto?

Mr. CAHAN:

1. No information.
2. No.
3. No information.

DUTIES ON JAPANESE GOODS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On May 20 my right hon. leader asked a question of the Prime Minister with reference to trade between Japan and Canada. At that time the right hon. gentleman gave a detailed reply. Has he further information to lay before the house now with respect to the negotiations that have transpired?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It is probable that before we rise I may make a more extensive statement, but in the meantime discussions have taken place between the Japanese authorities and the Canadian authorities, and the minister at Tokyo has presented the position of Canada as clearly as it can possibly be placed. I sometimes think that some of our friends on this side of the Pacific fail to realize that during a period of forty years the dominion parliament, under all administrations, has taken positions at the instance of British Columbia which at the moment have been somewhat embarrassing.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the house is to sit on Monday, the first of July?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): It was our intention to sit unless the house intimated its desire that we should not do so, but as I have explained we are entirely in the hands of the house. I was going to speak about the matter later in the day, but if it is the desire of the house that we should sit we will do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Has the Prime Minister considered the possibility of sitting on Saturday?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. We have considered the question of sitting on Saturday, but in view of the fact that the evidence being given before the special committee has not been concluded I wondered whether it would be advancing matters very much by sitting on Saturday. That is the only consideration that has prevented me from giving notice to sit on Saturday. If it is thought that any useful purpose could be served by giving notice, I could give notice to-day or to-morrow; but it does not seem to me that we should make greater progress, especially in view of the fact that the other chamber has a very substantial volume of business to dispose of before they conclude with the bills now before them. That is my advice.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I agree that if the committee is not through, it would not be advisable to have a sitting on Saturday.

When the Prime Minister referred a moment ago to the relations with Japan, in the concluding part of his remarks he spoke of the attitude of all administrations toward Japan and said that he was afraid it had created an embarrassing situation. I do not wish to speak for his administration. With regard to previous administrations, I may say that our attitude when in office was, I think, distinctly of a character to preserve very harmonious relations with the orient, both Japan and China.

Mr. BENNETT: I may be out of order, but if the right hon. gentleman will read what I said he will find that it had reference to the attitude which this parliament and preceding parliaments had taken at the instance of British Columbia with respect to various matters in connection with Japan. I need hardly mention franchise matters and questions of that sort which have caused and do cause some embarrassments which have occurred under any governments that I have any knowledge of.

RECIPROCITY NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman about the progress of negotiations with the United States on trade matters. Is there anything further to report at this date?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I said that if negotiations resulted in any conclusions being arrived at, I would communicate them to the house. Negotiations are still continuing; that is as far as I can go.

PENSIONS FOR THE BLIND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Is the Prime Minister prepared this afternoon to give a statement to the house in respect to the intention of the government regarding pensions for the blind?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If I omit from the statement I am making anything which should be said, I shall give it at a later date, but I have been in the committee until late and in council from two till three, and I can only say this, that so far as dealing with the blind by a special act by which the dominion would undertake the paying of pensions is concerned, it is concluded that no such action be taken this session by this parliament. I do not know that I need amplify that statement beyond saying that as a number of the provinces have not taken advantage of the Old Age Pensions Act, to provide that payments might be made to a given category of persons by those provinces that had adopted the provisions of the Old Age Pensions Act, would be to make an invidious distinction against which very strong opposition has manifested itself. On the other hand to set up machinery to deal with payment of pensions to the blind in every province by the federal government would also involve something that the government at this session is not prepared to do.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ACT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 114, relating to the application of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, in the province of British Columbia.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not want to detain the house. I think the objections which some of us on this side have to this bill were very carefully stated in committee yesterday afternoon. I merely desire to say that I am entirely opposed to this legislation for several reasons. In the first place it is distinctly and viciously sectional in nature. It is an absolute and inevitable corollary of the other bill which appeared on the order paper during the present session and which sought to give a special electoral system to one province. It is a companion bill to that moved by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) the other day, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act in respect to certain situations which arose in one constituency, that of St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. CAHAN: That is not true.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am also opposed to it because the government's failure to defend their own legislation is an open admission on their part that it is ultra vires. In the next place not only does it remove from British Columbia the benefit of this legislation which we all supported last year, but regardless of what the Prime Minister said yesterday, if there is to-day a declaration by the Supreme Court of British Columbia that this legislation is ultra vires of the federal parliament, this will absolutely imperil the existence and validity of this legislation in every province.

Further, legislation which excludes or seeks to exclude any one province from the scope of the pact of confederation, or legislation which seeks to give special effect in only one province to certain terms of this parliament, is vicious in principle. In my humble judgment this will only tend to emphasize and accentuate that feeling of restlessness and anxiety which at the present time prevails in our province with respect to the pact of confederation itself. Therefore, I move the following amendment:

That on the motion that Bill No. 114 be read a third time now, the word "now" be struck out and the words "this day six months" be added at the end of the question.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I am going to make merely this observation, that if any province in this confederation speaking for the people of that province, desires to launch litigation in the form of that which was launched before a single judge to obtain an interim injunction, I conceive it to be the duty of a federal government endeavouring to do what the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is doing, to permit that province to have its way. To do otherwise is to cast some doubt upon our own action which I believe is quite sound and is supported by law.

On the other question as to whether it would interfere with the harmonious relations between the provinces and the federal power, that is presumably a matter which the provinces are thinking of. But if one reads the record as to the assistance that has been given to British Columbia during the last few years to enable it to discharge its obligations and as to the burden that is cast upon this government by reason of the advantageous terms that were granted to the western provinces, notably in Manitoba, which became the measure of obligation for both Alberta and Saskatchewan and which resulted in the dominion making an interim advance of $750,000 per annum to supplement the subsidy payments received by British Columbia, I think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre will realize that any further statement is beside the mark. There has been a most earnest desire, in face of the situation that has developed in the western provinces, to assist them in every possible way in the discharge of their obligations. In fact, to such an extent is that true that in many quarters it is believed the assistance should not have gone as far as it has, but we have endeavoured to preserve the financial integrity of all the four western provinces. I am not now going to traverse that situation.

When we were dealing with the application of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, it was made applicable of course to every part of Canada, east and west and north and south. The question of the relationship between the crown in the right of the dominion and the crown in the right of the province was one which by understanding and agreement in the other provinces was acted upon in a sense that they were willing to share a part of the loss sustained by others in the adjustments that were being made. It was not a mandatory power of the federal government in respect to taxation that was being invoked, because we have always recognized the autonomous position of the various provinces. What we have said is that if it is threatened that the crown in the right of the provinces would not deal with a board of review, exercising powers exercised in all the provinces and dealing with creditors of all kinds, with respect to its claims, the desirable thing, of course, is not to endeavour to proceed with it at all for to proceed with it at all would at once invite the suggestion that invidious distinctions were being made between British Columbia and the other eight provinces, as the other eight provinces were sharing the losses with other creditors and making their sacrifice, if you call it such, in taking less than one hundred cents on the dollar on debts due to them by debtors, whether taxes or otherwise. The province of Ontario through its constituted authority has been willing to have such matters dealt with by the board of review; Alberta, the neighbouring province to British Columbia, has been willing that their claims shall be dealt with in that way. Where debts were due to the crown in the right of the province, without in any sense admitting that it had attorned to the jurisdiction in the sense of admitting that the parliament of Canada had a paramount right so to legislate, the other provinces were willing to accept and have accepted the arrangements so made by the board of review. They believed that if the act were to be effective in respect to ordinary creditors, loan companies, banks and private individuals who were compelled under it to accept a much less percentage for their interest than provided in the documents, in many instances compromising at fifteen, twenty or twenty-five per cent reduction, then obviously the province, as a creditor desirous of helping its own citizens to deal with complex and difficult problems in connection with farmers, created many years ago must not rely solely in its strict legal right as the crown with the priorities that attach thereto, and having so expressed their willingness and acted accordingly, if one province says it will not do so and its attorney general launches an action to say that the power of the crown in the right of the province shall not in any sense be interfered with in the sense of making any compromise, voluntary or otherwise, then, of course the duty of the federal power is not to create invidious distinctions between the provinces but to withdraw and leave it for the province itself to make such adjustment with its own citizens as it thinks desirable. We availed ourselves of the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act after the Supreme Court of Canada, as I explained yesterday on a stated case following the decision of the privy council, had concluded we had the right to make certain arrangements without going through bankruptcy proceedings, to enable farmers to secure the benefits which were secured to companies' creditors, preferred and otherwise, as indicated in the stated case. In order that they might receive these benefits we passed this statute; that is that farmers might have the benefit of bankruptcy without going through the bankruptcy court. The crown in British Columbia having taken the view that it has taken, it is not for us to quarrel with them, they are nearer the spot, they are on the ground, they know the views of their fellow citizens. If their citizens desire that they should not have the benefit of this legislation unless the crown itself shall also compromise with them—because if a loan company in eastern Canada or a private lender or a bank with its branch in Vancouver is compelled to settle its claim with its debtor at sixty cents on the dollar, but the crown with its claim says: We must have one hundred cents on the dollar, and is insistent in that regard, then, of course, you have destroyed any possibility of there being a settlement. And as any possibility of settlements being destroyed would result in the act being nugatory, it is felt that the act should not be applicable to that province. That is the position. None other. There is no desire in any sense to lessen the operation of the act from one end of Canada to the other, but to prevent the act, the effect of which is being destroyed by the action taken in British Columbia, remaining there as a standing menace to its successful operation in other provinces which have acted upon the assumption that it is desirable that the crown should compromise as well as other creditors.

The Supreme Court of British Columbia, presuming the injunction is made permanent, will not have decided the matter for the rest of Canada. If the injunction is made permanent without a defence, it is the judgment of a single judge sitting in an undefended action, which never has been regarded as being a precedent in any country, in any court, not even in the courts in the province itself in which such a decision is given.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If the doctrine laid down by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is to be accepted I am afraid it may create countless difficulties and involve this country in many troubles. The province is challenging the validity of federal legislation; is doing so before a single judge as the Prime Minister says. But all litigation in our country starts before a single judge, and then goes to higher courts. If because a province acts in that way the federal parliament will legislate that province out of the operation of a federal act, where will that course end? Would the same principle apply to the various pieces of legislation enacted during the course of the present session? I know provinces which claim that our bills passed this session on hours of labour and minimum wages and even unemployment insurance are not intra vires of this parliament. If any one of them starts litigation to have the courts decide on that matter will this parliament exclude that province from the operation of the act? What about taxation? If any province claims that a certain tax which is imposed by this parliament is ultra vires of the power of this parliament, will that province be excluded from the operations of that act and be exempt from taxation? Well either the present government of British Columbia is right in this matter or it is wrong. If it is right, whatever we do here, whether we exclude it and let the act apply in the rest of Canada, the legislation is invalid and not binding upon any Canadian citizen. If it is wrong why should the citizens of that province be excluded from the advantages, if there are any, of this legislation? The Prime Minister talks about the autonomy of the provinces; yes, but the central government also is autonomous within the limits of its jurisdiction. Our confederation charter has created a distribution of power, within the limit of its jurisdiction the central government is autonomous and its legislation operates directly on the individuals in all provinces, without the help or medium of the local governments. I claim the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) is quite right when he says that this is sectional legislation. If we are to take this course in this matter why not in all other matters? I well remember some legislation of this parliament to which the whole population of the province from which I come were opposed, but nobody thought of excluding that province from the operation of that legislation. It is a bad principle, it is a vicious precedent, it does not make for national unity, but for national disruption. Therefore I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I was not impressed by the argument advanced this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). This measure is purely of a punitive nature; that can be gathered from the remarks let drop by the Prime Minister this afternoon. I fear that this long session, which has lasted for more than six months, has frayed the nerves of this house. Legislation of this kind is not usually brought in during the early part of a session, it is the result of too much application to the work of the session during this long period.

I did not find an answer made by the Prime Minister to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie), who said—and I was very much impressed by his statement—that this was a piece of sectional legislation. As you know, Mr. Speaker, sectional legislation already applies to the province of British Columbia. Who can say that next year, should this government be in power—which God fobid—this sort of legislation will not be applied to the province of Quebec? I well remember when the legislation with regard to bankruptcy was first mooted. It was brought about through the efforts of the Canadian Bar Association, of which at one time the Prime Minister was president and of which he is now honorary president. The first efforts were in the way of attempting to obtain uniform legislation with regard to bankruptcy for the whole of Canada. We have that right under the British North America Act; in fact the parliament of Canada has the exclusive right to legislate with respect to bankruptcy. If the province of British Columbia is to be deprived of the opportunity of sharing in that legislation, what is it to do? I cannot believe that the Prime Minister has carefully thought out the matter, because as a rule he knows his law perhaps as well as any man in the Dominion of Canada. How is it possible for the people of British Columbia to obtain the advantages of such legislation if the parliament of Canada declares that it is going to give its sanction to the putting through of legislation of this kind? That province becomes practically a step-child; nothing can be done for it.

There is a wider question, however, creating a condition whereby one province is, I might say, publicly spanked by this parliament as a warning to others not to indulge in the same way of treating dominion legislation? What is going to happen? I remember that in 1915 and 1916 we were trying to obtain the goodwill of the province of Quebec in the matter of bankruptcy legislation. We had all kinds of meetings; we had conferences; we had hospitality extended by the present Prime Minister and others, in order that the people of the province of Quebec and elswhere might see the sweet reasonableness of our proposed bankruptcy act. We pointed out to the people of Quebec that this was not an encroachment on the rights of the province, that we did not intend to interfere in any way with their civil law, but that it was a matter of dominion application and that it was something for the benefit of the whole country. I well remember how the pundits of the bar of the province of Quebec, Sir Lomer Gouin, Mr. Taschereau and others, looked with a great deal of suspicion on any efforts to bring about this sort of uniformity. They felt that it was the thin end of the wedge and that in due time the whole province of Quebec would be placed under the jurisdiction of the common law. We made them believe, and they did believe as was the fact, that there was no such intention at all.

Now, however, as my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) said yesterday, we have a thunderbolt from the blue. In its boldness British Columbia has presumed to declare that in certain parts of the act we have proceeded illegally, and that the province of British Columbia has certain rights which it wishes the court to declare and decide. Surely it cannot be an offence to ask the courts of this country to declare what is or what is not illegal; this is the first time I have heard a statement of that kind made in this house. They have the right to appear before the courts and plead their case, and if it should be found that we have proceeded illegally certain measures can be taken. This bill never should have been brought into the house; the matter is now sub judice, but notwithstanding that the Prime Minister and the government declare that hereafter, when a province refuses to conform as it is claimed it should, it will be placed in the same position. I cannot believe that the government is in its real senses in putting a measure of this kind on the statute books. Perhaps the rule of those whom the gods would destroy they first make mad applies here.

An hon. MEMBER: It is an act of madness.

Mr. JACOBS: It is an act, anyway, with which we do not agree. This morning, when I considered the position in which we have been placed in regard to this question, I thought of the famous nursery rhyme, which might be paraphrased in this way:

Eight little provinces all in a row,
One would not do as it was told, so it had to go.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nine provinces.

Mr. QUINN: Did they have to tell you there were nine provinces of Canada?

Mr. JACOBS: I think I did know there were nine, but when this bill passes there will be only eight. When this act passes—and I feel that it will pass, because I have no illusions that anything I may say will interfere with the passage of the measure—we will be reduced to the position of the children in the nursery rhyme. This is something that has never been heard of before. What is going to happen, for instance, if to-morrow the province of Quebec declares that it agrees with the province of British Columbia? Are we going to disqualify the province of Quebec? I do not think we will do that; I hardly think even the Prime Minister is quite so bold as to want to place the province of Quebec in the some category as the province of British Columbia, though it does happen just now to have a government which does not see eye to eye, on the surface at least, with the federal government.

Mr. DUPUIS: It might happen to New Brunswick to-morrow.

Mr. JACOBS: I hope it will happen to-day. Surely the Prime Minister does not wish to undo the work he has done so effectively during the last eighteen or twenty years in connection with the Canadian Bar Association. We were formed especially for this purpose of bringing about uniformity and non-sectional legislation throughout the Dominion of Canada, but by this very act the Prime Minister is undoing the splendid, constructive work for which he has been given credit by the bar association for all these years. I entreat the Prime Minister to give a little further thought to this matter. Perhaps it might go over until Monday, if we are going to sit that day. Monday is Dominion day, the anniversary of the day when all the provinces were brought together, and I do not really think the Prime Minister can put through a piece of legislation like this at a time when we are about to celebrate the great natal day of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. J. C. ELLIOTT (West Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I come from one of the other provinces but I agree heartily with the amendment moved by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre. I would point out to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that he was hardly doing justice to the house in his manner of introducing his objection to this amendment. He referred to the litigation being launched in the way in which it was launched. Does he mean by that that when a province desires to object to the constitutionality of any legislation it can only do so in a certain manner? Is he stating that if a writ is launched as this writ was launched, this house will not tolerate it?

I should like to point out what the effect will be upon the other provinces if this bill goes through. The Prime Minister said that if it is undefended, if no litigation arises from it, it will not have the same effect throughout the west of Canada that it would have had had it been fought out. From his experience he must know that exactly the opposite result would occur. Suppose someone in Ontario objects to submitting to an order of the board. They will say that a writ was issued by the province of British Columbia questioning the validity of this legislation and that the dominion government did not even defend the action with the result that a judgment was given against the validity of the legislation. The effectiveness of this legislation throughout the rest of Canada will be largely gone. During the stress and strain through which this country is going there is no time for friction between the dominion government and the government of a province that happens to be represented by another political party.

An hon. MEMBER: What was it started for?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Some hon. member asks: What was it started for? It was started as an exercise of the rights which everyone has before the courts of this country. The remark of the hon. gentleman was perhaps the best argument that could be given in favour of this amendment. It indicates the attitude of the government.

Mr. COTNAM: How about Hepburn's action?

Mr. ELLIOTT: Another hon. member has exactly the same viewpoint. He feels that unless the province falls down and worships everything done by this government it should be put out of the confederation. To ask why this action should have been started is about the most senseless question I have ever heard.

Mr. BENNETT: The Ontario government would not even let them go to the courts.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We should not consider this as a family quarrel. If this litigant has not started this legislation with the meekness and humility due from a province to the dominion, perhaps it will change the endorsement on the writ to more polite terms. I submit we should agree with the suggestion that this matter should not be pressed at the present time. Perhaps it will be a little cooler next week and a Sunday will have intervened. It is possible that those who are now taking this very severe view may revise their idea and not ask that this legislation be proceeded with at the present time.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is largely but not solely a legal matter and there are other aspects which should be considered. Personally I should like to see the constitutionality of this legislation upheld. I am almost inclined to think that British Columbia is getting what is coming to her but I cannot see that this is a proper way to handle this matter. Either this legislation is intra vires or it is not and it seems to me that the courts should decide the matter. If the courts have the authority as the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has said so frequently they should have, I cannot see why this matter should not go to them to be decided. By means of an injunction British Columbia will not be receiving the benefits of this act and there is no need for haste with regard to the matter. The Prime Minister has stated, if I understand him aright, that the action of the courts might leave some doubt as to the constitutionality of the legislation but I am rather inclined to think that to settle the matter in this way will leave considerable doubt as to the constitutionality of the legislation as it affects all the provinces. Such action may affect this and other acts, not merely in British Columbia but throughout the whole of Canada. It must be remembered that British Columbia has taken this action only because she wished to safeguard her provincial rights in certain cases and if this legislation is proceeded with by this government it will undoubtedly penalize the farmers of British Columbia who might need the benefits of the act. Under these circumstances I do not think it is fair to press the matter at the present time.

Hon. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I spoke briefly on this matter yesterday but after listening to the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Rhodes) I have not been able to alter my opinion. It seems to me that this bill can do no good and it may do considerable harm. If the province succeeds to-day in its action then it will be excluded from the operations of the act and this bill will be unnecessary. If the province fails in its action, the legislation passed last year will apply and should this bill be passed we would be placed in the position of depriving the farmers of British Columbia of a share in the benefits of that legislation. I do not want to misquote him, but I understood the Prime Minister to say that the government of British Columbia having taken the action which it has, must be responsible for depriving the people of the benefits of the act. Surely this government and this parliament have some responsibility to the farmers of that province. Because the province has taken a wrongful step is no reason why the farmers of that province should be punished by not being allowed the benefits of the act. It seems to me that if the action on the part of the province succeeds—and this is my reason for making my statement now—you do not need this bill, and if it does not succeed you do not want this bill because you do harm to the province of British Columbia or to the individual farmers of that province.

DOMINION FRANCHISE ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 109, to amend the Dominion Franchise Act.

He said: The amendment made by the Senate will be found in the votes and proceedings of this day. For the word "except" they substitute the word "unless," so that in the seventeenth line it will now read, "unless evidence satisfactory to the judge has been adduced."

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can the Secretary of State give us an idea of the legal difference?

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. CASGRAIN: On division.

Motion agreed to on division; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

MORTGAGE CREDITS FOR FISHERMEN

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Acting Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of Bill No. 120, for the purpose of establishing in Canada a system of long term mortgage credit for fishermen.

Mr. WILLIAM DUFF (Antigonish-Guysborough): A few days ago the Minister of National Defence, who also happens to be acting Minister of Fisheries, placed on the order paper a resolution upon which this bill, No. 120, is founded. After reading the resolution not only once, but several times, and after consulting with several hon. members regarding it, I came to the conclusion that it was not very clear. It reads:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure for the purpose of establishing a system of long term mortgage credit for fishermen, under the administration of the Canadian farm loan board, and to authorize the government of Canada to provide initial capital in an amount not exceeding three hundred thousand dollars,—

If the resolution had stopped there and if the amount instead of being $300,000 had been very much larger, it would have been fairly satisfactory; but it goes on to say:

—and to subscribe an amount of five per cent of the capital stock as loans are made—

Whether the capital stock is to be $300,000 or a larger amount, the resolution is not very clear, but if the government is going to subscribe five per cent on only $300,000, that will mean that all it will subscribe will be the small sum of $15,000.

The Minister of National Defence is not satisfied to stop there. The resolution continues:

—to purchase fishermen's long term loan bonds in an amount not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars; and to guarantee the principal and interest of such bonds to an amount not exceeding one million dollars.

In other words, the government or the Canadian farm loan board can purchase $500,000 worth of fishermen's long term loan bonds, and whether out of this $500,000 or another million dollars, the government can also guarantee the interest and principal of such bonds to be an amount not exceeding $1,000,000. If we take this resolution at its very best; if we give it the greatest amount of longitude and latitude, the most that we can make out of it is that the government is arranging through no less an organization than the Canadian farm loan board for loans to fishermen. It seems to me that some other method or means should have been adopted than to give to the Canadian farm loan board the matter of dealing with this very important question. The farmer should hoe his own row and the fisherman should plough the billowy main. Instead of this, Bill No. 120 coming under the farm loan board should as a courtesy at least to the great fishing industry of this country come under a special commission or board or be dealt with by the fishery organization in the government even if that organization is not as complete as it might be.

Bill No. 120 is based on this resolution and carries out some of the matters referred to in it. As I said a moment ago, under this bill this matter is to be dealt with by the Canadian farm loan board under the Canadian Farm Loan Act. If hon. members will look at this bill and compare it with the Canadian Farm Loan Act, they will find that this bill is copied almost word for word from the Farm Loan Act. The only practical difference I can see, with a few exceptions, is that the word "fisherman" is substituted for the word "farmer" in a few cases.

What are the provisions of this bill? I am going to refer first to the amount involved or the amount which may be loaned under this measure to the fishermen of this country. Before I proceed with that, may I be permitted to say that in my opinion the fishing industry has at the present time greater possibilities than any other natural industry in this country. It is an industry which with a little encouragement with regard to administration, loaning of moneys, or obtaining markets has tremendous potentialities. This house voted $90,000,000 toward the farm loan board and loans to farmers, to which I am not objecting; the other day it was estimated that it would cost $10,000,000 for a housing scheme; last year we voted $40,000,000 for public works, a special amount in addition to the regular estimates, both main and supplementary and this year we have voted another $30,000,000 for public works, so that in two years we have voted about $80,000,000 for that purpose; yet the Minister of National Defence introduces this resolution and bill whereby the great fishing industry—and although I am giving the legislation the widest interpretation, I cannot make the amount larger—is entitled to the paltry sum of $1,800,000. That is almost an insult to the great fishing industry of this country.

Last year there were some 65,506 fishermen engaged in this industry, this number being distributed as to provinces as follows:

Province:	Number of fishermen
British Columbia	11,066
Quebec	13,627
New Brunswick	12,289
Nova Scotia	17,133
Prince Edward Island	3,194
Manitoba	2,822
Saskatchewan	614
Alberta	743
Ontario	3,984
Yukon	34

It is true that in the last two or three years, due to certain conditions which I need not elaborate at this particular moment, the fishing industry has fallen off much more than it should. But I remember in 1930 the Prime Minister spoke in Halifax, and I want to refer to the statement he made then because of the small amount which this resolution and bill calls for. In his address in that city he promised that "he would throw the whole financial power of the state behind the fishing industry." Now, after five years, in the dying days of this parliament and after parliament has been sitting almost six months this year, the government has come down with this bill. I might refer to it as a six-month's conception bill, whereby they are only going to arrange for the fishermen to borrow $1,800,000.

The Prime Minister also said he would throw the whole financial power of the state behind the fishing industry. He said:

I must not lightly make statements that I am not prepared to the last syllable to carry into effect.

Well, how is he carrying into effect the statement he made in Halifax that he would throw the whole financial power of the country behind this great industry? Here is what has happened in the last five years:

Value of Fisheries of Canada

1929	$53,518,000
1930	47,804,000
1931	30,517,000
1932	25,957,000
1933	27,558,000

So, in spite of the promises that the Prime Minister made to the fishermen of this country, whether on the Atlantic, the great lakes or the Pacific, the falling off in value of fisheries in those five years is almost fifty per cent. Therefore I say the Prime Minister has not carried out his promise. But to-day, when this parliament is almost over and the government realize that they must go to the country and face the electors in a few weeks, the Minister of National Defence comes down with this sop legislation in an endeavour, I presume, to get the votes of the fishermen. But let me say to him and to this government that the fishermen of this country are not going to be fooled by this legislation.

I cannot deal with all the sections, it would take too long, so I am only going to deal with one. Clause 6 says:

Loans made under the authority of this act shall be subject to the following conditions:—
(a) loans shall be made only on the security of first mortgages on fisherman's lands—

I call attention to that.

—not exceeding fifty per cent of the actual value of such lands and the buildings thereon as appraised by the board.

Now that certainly is a great handout to the fisherman of Canada. He is going to be compelled to give security on his land, if he has any. Then we go further:

Provided that no one person and no two or more persons having joint or several ownership of the land to be mortgaged shall have by way of loan in the aggregate at any one time more than one thousand dollars.

Is not that wonderful legislation for our fishermen? Is not the government generous? They are going to give the fisherman not more than one thousand dollars to build a vessel, a boat or buy gear or do something else in connection with his business, but, they say, before we give you that thousand dollars you must mortgage any land you have, and if you have not any land you cannot get the thousand dollars to help you prosecute this industry, to start you young men who are coming along, aged nineteen, twenty, twenty-five. You must go out first and get a house and land. The result will be that this bill is absolutely worthless. I say to the Minister of National Defence that this bill as far as the fishing industry is concerned is a sham, a mockery, it is useless, because I am very doubtful if ten per cent of the fishermen, the sixty-six thousand men in that industry, in their present condition, would mortgage their real estate if it were possible so to do. And there are thousands of men in the fishing business who have no real estate. We know that the fishing game is a young man's game. It is true the old men have to go fishing with their sons and the young boys, nevertheless if we are ever going to put this industry on a proper plane it must be carried on by young men. Young men have no real estate, own no land, but the Minister of National Defence comes along and says: We will lend you one thousand dollars if you will give us two thousand dollars security on your real estate. Let us assume for a moment that they have real estate, what is going to happen? Take the deep sea fishing industry. For many years we have had in Nova Scotia a cooperative scheme. These fishing vessels and boats are built under such a scheme. There are sixty-four shares in one of these vessels. The vessels are about 150 tons gross and when built and ready for fishing carry some twenty men. To-day a vessel of this description with auxiliary power will cost about $32,000. In the past the scheme has been that some young man who wants to get on in life goes around among his friends and neighbours and asks for subscriptions for one or more shares in the vessel. Suppose that under this scheme thirty-two men decide to build a fishing schooner costing $32,000. Assume that they all have real estate; the Canadian farm loan board would take thirty-two mortgages on thirty-two pieces of land, thirty-two real estate properties, in order to help build a $32,000 vessel. The thing is ridiculous. I say that under this act the government will never spend any money, because nobody will be able to take advantage of it. And the same thing applies to smaller vessels. If men want to build boats or get gear to carry on the industry they will be unable to take advantage of this act for two reasons; because a lot of the younger men have no real estate, and those who have, if it is clear of mortgage, need to keep it clear in order to maintain their credit, to carry on their business and to look after their families.

There is only one way to handle this matter. Even if it were a good bill nothing could be done under it in the next two or three months. If the government had been sincere in this legislation they should have introduced it last January or February, when parliament opened, for everyone knows that the fishing season starts at that time. Whether in Nova Scotia or British Columbia or on the great lakes, getting new boats built, repairing nets or traps or gear, is done during the winter season so that they are ready when the ice goes out on the great lakes or the season starts in the maritimes or British Columbia. So this legislation even if it were good would be absolutely useless as far as 1935 is concerned. I say that the proper thing to do is to withdraw this bill. It is not in the best interests of the fisheries, it is legislation under which not one dollar can be borrowed as far as this year is concerned. Instead of legislation copied almost word for word from the Canadian Farm Loan Act, when the election is over and a new government is elected and a new Department of Fisheries is constituted that department should settle down and consult with practical men and find out what is in the best interests of the fisheries. I should like to know who suggested legislation such as this. I have no hesitation in saying that my friend the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short)) was not consulted, because he is a practical man, he knows what should be done in the interests of the fisheries, and we all regret that he is not going to run in this election. He has given the best years of his life to the fishing industry and for a number of years has sat in this parliament and given it the benefit of his counsel as far as fishing is concerned. We all hope he will be translated to a higher sphere and that the public will not lose the benefit of his services.

[Mr. Duff.]

We hear a great deal of talk these days about guarantees or bonuses on wheat and other things; we hear whisperings about setting a minimum price on wheat. If this government is sincere in its desire to help the fishermen I should like to ask the minister why this bill does not contain a clause giving a bonus to fishermen or setting a minimum price for fish. Let me tell my hon. friend that in France to-day the fishermen receive from the federal government forty francs per quintal, or the equivalent of $3 in Canadian funds, in order to help the fishermen and increase the number of those who go down to the sea in ships. That is what the French government has done, but all the acting Minister of Fisheries gives us is a bill copied from the farm loan bill, substituting the word "fishermen" for the word "farmer."

It may be said that we have not taken advantage of our opportunities in this house to bring forward suggestions. Let me say that four months ago in the select standing committee on marine and fisheries I gave notice of the following resolution:

Whereas the fisheries of Canada are in a very unsatisfactory condition due to the depression and other causes;

And whereas for a number of years the fishermen of Canada have not been able to make sufficient money from their avocation to properly look after their families and keep their boats and fishing gear in a satisfactory condition;

And whereas the fishing industry is capable of great development if some encouragement is given this primary industry of Canada;

Therefore be it resolved that this select standing committee on marine and fisheries memorialize the government and House of Commons of Canada to bring down and enact legislation whereby a sum up to and not exceeding ten million dollars will be loaned to the said fishermen and fishing industry, under proper regulations, for the purpose of providing money to build boats and vessels, purchase gear, et cetera, erect bait and cold storage plants, provide a bounty to ship builders to build fishing vessels, and a bounty or bonus of so much per one hundred pounds on fish caught by the fishermen as well as for any and all other purposes which may be deemed in the interests of this great industry.

I hope hon. members will not think me boastful or egotistical if I say that in a small and modest way during the time I have been in this parliament I have endeavoured to advocate certain things in the interests of this great industry. I may be asked why, after giving notice of this resolution, I did not ask the select standing committee to consider it. There were several reasons. One was that shortly after I gave the notice we had the long adjournment of five weeks. Then, after giving the matter further consideration, I felt that if I brought up this resolution in committee and had it discussed there, being a member of the opposition, perhaps the government, from their own political standpoint, might not want me to get any credit for it. So, being a fairly good politician, I decided that discretion was the better part of valour, and I considered that by filing the notice with the committee I had done enough to bring the matter to the attention of the government. And in all modesty, sir, I suggest that the bill now before us insufficient as it is, has been brought in at the last moment because of the action I took suggesting that $10,000,000 be voted by this parliament for the fishermen.

I say $10,000,000 is a small amount to spend in order to help the fishing industry of this country. As I have said, there are 65,000 fishermen in Canada. Under this legislation, making the very best of it, all we can hope for is that the government, through the farm loan board and other people, will arrange to loan the fishermen $1,800,000. That is only $1,000 each for 1,800 fishermen. It may be argued that not more than 1,800 fishermen could or would take advantage of this act even if it were not drafted as it is. I have some knowledge of the matter, and I am sorry to say that the fishing industry is in such a state, due to the depression, to the falling off of markets and to the prices received for fish in the last few years, that these fishermen are in dire need of assistance from this government or some other source. Therefore I say that even if this legislation was of such a type that the fishermen could take advantage of it, $1,800,000 is not nearly enough to be of any benefit to this great industry which is scattered from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that the minister should withdraw this legislation; he should not proceed with it because, as I said a moment ago, it will be of no value because the amount is too small and because the fishermen will not be able to take advantage of it due to the clause which provides that they must give first mortgages on their land. Let me say to the minister that if he is determined to go on with this legislation, section 6 should be removed. The only right way to loan money to fishermen is on the goods or chattels which they buy with the money loaned to them. Let the government take chattel mortgages if they loan fishermen $1,000 or $5,000.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): And have them carry insurance.

Mr. DUFF: I am coming to that. First I say $1,000 is a ridiculously small amount. How many schooners of one hundred tons can be built for that sum? How many schooners of even twenty tons can be built for $1,000? There should be no specific amount stated in this bill. Whether the amount loaned is $5,000, $10,000 or $20,000, my suggestion is that the government should insert a clause providing that they will loan up to seventy-five per cent of the value of the boat and gear, take a chattel mortgage or bill of sale, register the security and then take out marine insurance up to the amount advanced. That is the only sensible and sane way to do it.

Mr. ERNST: Would the hon. member permit one question for the sake of information? Where would he draw the line that is, what about the small boats which cannot be insured?

Mr. DUFF: I am afraid my hon. friend is mistaken; small boats can be insured. Every boat can be insured; under an amendment passed several years ago—perhaps my hon. friend does not know this—you can register a boat from one ton up. I remember we changed it from five tons to one ton. Even if they were not registered I say there would be no difficulty in having the boats insured, not only in regard to marine insurance but also in regard to fire and accident insurance. I say to the minister that this is the only sensible way to proceed if he is sincere in his desire to help the fishermen of this country. I hope he will give me credit for being serious in this matter and for desiring to help the fishermen just as much as he does, because together with other hon. members I have advocated this for the last number of years and have been vitally interested in the industry for 40 years in a business capacity. I say the only way to help the fishermen is to drop clause 6, draft a business like clause and not put such a low limit on the amount that may be borrowed. Loan the fisherman 75 per cent of the value of his boats, his gear or other equipment and take a chattel mortgage to ensure repayment. That is the only sensible way to do it because as this bill now is it will prove absolutely useless as not ten per cent of the fishermen could give lands and real estate as securities. As I said before, it would be absolutely ridiculous to have ten, fifteen or twenty people give mortgages on ten, fifteen or twenty different pieces of land in order to secure a loan to build a boat.

This bill has been introduced at this late date when no benefits can be provided for the fishermen. The construction of new boats will not be started until November or December and we will have to have an election by that time. I do not intend to discuss politics but in my opinion it will be necessary to hold a fall session after the elections and when parliament reassembles at that time the minister, whoever he is, can bring in a bill to provide relief for the fishing industry. We are voting all kinds of money in the supplementary estimates and only a paltry $1,800,000 is being arranged for the fishermen of this country. In addition to what was voted in the main estimates, we are being asked to vote $1,651,000 in the supplementaries for national defence. We are being asked to vote $145,000 for naval services and $1,302,900 for aviation. These large sums are to be voted for other purposes but only $1,800,000 is to be arranged for the fishermen and then they must give bonds, mortgages and go through all sorts of manoeuvres to get their money. An additional amount of $200,000 is to be provided for the tariff board when we understood that that board was going to do this extra work for nothing; a million dollars is to be voted for the administration of the Natural Products Marketing Act in addition to what was voted in the main estimates, and yet the 65,000 fishermen will have to be content with a paltry $1,800,000. Another $100,000 is being voted for national research but it would be better to give this money to the fishermen and let them do some research work on the Grand Banks, Quero and LaHave. Considerable sums are to be voted for other purposes but the fishermen must be satisfied with this camouflaged legislation which will prove absolutely useless.

When this bill becomes law it is to be administered by the Canada farm loan board. I have nothing against the gentlemen who compose this board; they may be fully conversant with agriculture, horticulture and all the rest of the cultures, but they are not fishermen. We have Major Barnett from Saskatchewan who will be carrying out the provisions of this monstrosity which I hold in my hand. Then we have another gentleman, Mr. MacLean. No doubt he knows his business and possesses excellent qualifications but I do not think this board should deal with the granting of loans to fishermen. There is also a Mr. Duquette of Montreal, but I do not know this gentleman. It may be said that this board will be a central board in Ottawa but it will be in control of these operations. The work will be done by the provincial representatives of the board. A gentleman was appointed in Halifax, whom I shall not name, as provincial representative of the board. This gentleman does not know a kyak from a mackerel, yet he will be the chief man in Nova Scotia to decide whether or not fishermen are to receive loans for the purchase of boats, gear and other things. This whole thing is ridiculous and I ask the Minister of National Defence to withdraw this bill. The bill cannot be effective at this time and there will be plenty of time in the fall to introduce a new bill. This bill does not mean $1,800,000, and no one knows what it really does mean. It may mean only $500,000. I warn my hon. friends opposite that they will not gain one vote by introducing such foolish legislation. The fishermen are sensible and they cannot be fooled as easily as some people think. As this bill is at present it will prove to be absolutely futile and I ask the government to withdraw it without having it go to second reading or becoming law.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I intend to consider this bill more particularly from the angle of its effect upon the fishing industry of the province from which I come. I cannot go as far as the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Duff) in his wholesale condemnation of the bill. I shall vote for the second reading but I am impelled to do so more by a consideration of the name of the bill and what I hope it implies than by anything in the bill itself. The bill is called the Canadian Fisherman's Loan Act. It may be asserted that that title enacts the principle of assistance to fishermen but I am afraid that that is not so. It only makes an assertion, it only affirms a principle and the details of the bill fall short of carrying out the hopes which might be raised by a consideration of the title.

Despite the fact that I intend to vote for the second reading I should like to point out certain features which seem to weaken the usefulness of the bill in the hope that the minister will take them into consideration. The acting minister comes from the same province as I do and we in British Columbia have high hopes of the interest which he will take in fishing matters. This is the first time that an hon. member from the Pacific coast has occupied that position. The first point to which I would direct attention is the definition of a fisherman. The bill states:

> "Fisherman" means a person whose principal occupation consists in fishing;

That is all right but the definition of fishing is as follows:

> "Fishing" means the taking and processing of fish of all kinds for commercial purposes.

If the taking and processing of fish is to be considered as one occupation, it may apply to the man on the Atlantic coast who catches the fish and salts, cures or dries them but it would eliminate a large body of the salmon fishermen in British Columbia who take no part in the processing of the fish. They merely catch the fish, they merely take them out of the water to sell.

Mr. ERNST: Is the member making the point that persons borrowing must both take and process?

Mr. NEILL: Yes; my point is that taking and processing are combined together, so a man to qualify would need to be employed in both. If that is the meaning it will cut out our people in British Columbia. If the word "and" is to be translated "or" that is equally undesirable because it will then—

Mr. STIRLING: And/or is meant.

Mr. NEILL: Even then "or" would not do because if the processing of fish qualifies a man to borrow that would let in a cannery owner and the casual labourer working in a reduction plant. It should be confined to the man who gets the fish out of the water. That would be sufficient. You do not need to say anything about processing, but if in addition he does process it, that is so much to the good. The man in Nova Scotia will not be cut out if he processes, but you do not want to leave out the British Columbia man because he does not process.

Paragraph (f) of section 2 defines "fisherman's land." I admit that this is copied out of the farm loan act. The definition here is:

"Fisherman's land" means land under occupation or owned by a fisherman.

For the love of Mike if a man goes and squats on a piece of land or rents it, can he go and mortgage that property? That is too absurd to need pressing home. It should be limited to lands owned by fishermen, but instead of that it says lands owned or occupied by a fisherman. A fisherman may rent land or may squat on government property. He may get permission from the owner to put up a shack on the foreshore, and the owner might come along two or three years later and find that the land had been mortgaged during that period. That needs re-defining. Under section 3 the board may lend on the security of a first mortgage on fisherman's lands as defined in the interpretation clause, so the definition will need to be changed.

Dealing with section 3 the board can only loan money on first mortgages on fisherman's land alone. As the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough has said, that is wholly undesirable. It takes away a great deal of the proposed usefulness of the act. I have here a wire which has just been received by the member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson) from the Canadian Halibut Fishing Vessel Owners' Association. It reads:

Through the press we learn that a fisherman to participate in the proposed loan must own property. If so this would bar ninety per cent of our fishermen here. We think his boat and gear should be security. Please endeavour to have bill changed accordingly.

There is no question that that is so. If you are going to confine it to the little piece of land which the fisherman owns, large numbers of them do not own any, at least in my district, where they live in rented houses, or in a boat on the shorefront, then in the language of this telegram, which was quite unsolicited, a substantial proportion, although I hardly think it would be as bad as 90 per cent, would be eliminated from the bill altogether. The loans should certainly be made on the gear as well. I know that chattel mortgages are not very desirable, but there is a clause in the act which says that the board can loan only 50 per cent of the value, and the period should be shorter than in the farm loan act, where it is twenty-five years, because a fisherman's gear and even the boats and engines wear out much quicker than that. Unless you are going to let the gear form at least a substantial portion of the security you might as well forget the act altogether. That is one of the very worst things in it.

Then we find under section 6 that the loan they can get is limited to $1,000. That is not enough; it is not half enough; it is not 20 per cent enough. Some small trawling boats will cost $1,200 to $1,500 but when you get up to a seine boat it costs $25,000, and that is more than the value of many an ordinary farm. Yet a farmer can get a loan of $5,000 and up to 66 per cent of the value of his land, while these fishermen can get a loan of only $1,000, and not more than 50 per cent of the value of their land only, while the farmer can have a land and chattel mortgage as well.

Mr. ERNST: May I ask if the seine boats are as a rule owned by single individuals?

Mr. NEILL: To quite a considerable extent and to an increasing extent. Originally they were owned entirely by the cannery companies.

Mr. ERNST: I do not think the hon. member got the purport of my question. Are they owned by one person or are they owned through a number of shares?

Mr. NEILL: Both ways. Sometimes it is a company, sometimes a small partnership, and very often it is one man. They are generally operated by a partnership on shares, but some are owned by one or two individuals.

I was saying that a loan of $1,000 is not enough. What is the use of offering a man $1,000 to equip a seine boat that is worth $25,000, and if as I said before, you are going to expect him to offer real estate as security the whole act is useless to him. I am dealing very shortly with these things because I do not want to detain the house.

Under paragraph (c) of section 6 it is provided:

> Loans under this act shall be made only to fishermen actually engaged in or shortly to become engaged in fishing.

I may not get the support of my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough in this, but I am very strongly of the opinion that this should be limited to actual fishermen, to men who have been actively engaged in fishing within the last two years. We do not want to start a whole lot of amateur fishermen. There are men who think it is a fine thing to go fishing, that it is a fine, easy, life, just as there are people in the cities and towns who think that raising chickens or ducks, or something of that kind, is an easy life, and they find out very bitterly to their loss later on that it is not. We do not want to encourage that class of people to go into fishing. There are men who like to go fishing in the summer when the weather is good, but we do not want to encourage any more people to engage in fishing for a living. There are too many already. The complaint of the fishermen is in many places that there are too many fishermen for the catch allowed, so much so that the government, recognizing it, sometimes cuts down fishing to four or three days a week because there are too many fishermen. The fishermen are of the same opinion. They complain that they did not make a living out of the last season, and the fisheries officials come forward with ridiculous figures showing that the catch five years ago was so much and that in a later period it was so much more, and therefore they say that the fishermen must be doing very well. But the explanation is that a larger number of men are now fishing. I say that we do not want to increase the number of fishermen. We want to take care of the men who are there now. If a man by accident, wreck, or fire loses his gear, and that often happens, if he is a practical fisherman and fishing is the only thing he knows, he should be encouraged to get a loan so that he can buy the gear to go on with his business. The young fellow just starting up follows in his father's footsteps and inherits his gear in all probability, so he probably does not very much need a loan for a new start such as is indicated in the bill. I do think it would be a good thing to have this limited to practical fishermen only.

There is this other point. Section 16 says that the board shall have power to provide for:

> (b) the charges to be made against borrowers for the expenses of appraisal, determination of title and recording.

Under the farm loan act there is a flat charge of $10 whether the man gets his loan or not. That is too much, especially when the loan is restricted as it is in this case to $1,000 for the fisherman as against $5,000 for the farmer. It should at the most be $5, especially in cases where the applicant gets no loan. It is quite a considerable tax to pay $10 on a small loan. That is the interest at 5 per cent on a loan of $100 for two years, and where the fisherman is refused the loan it is a hardship for a struggling man to have to pay $10 in order to be told that he cannot get a loan.

There is one other point. This act will lose much of its usefulness if it is not made open, so to speak, to any association of fishermen. I have in mind a cooperative company of fishermen organized on the very best progressive lines, and it has been most successful even in these hard times. These fishermen started with practically nothing but their own boats and they have built up on the west coast a trolling industry in a cooperative way which is a standing credit to them. They have a large number of their own boats and run their own stores, but they have not been able to get to the point where they can buy their own packers, which would very much facilitate their operations. They need some place to go to where they can borrow, on the security of the packer, fifty per cent of the cost. That cannot be done under this act because it must be done by the individual, and the individual can borrow only $1,000 anyhow and only on land. I do not suppose that all these men put together, between 150 and 250, have $5,000 worth of real estate, but they have ten times that amount in the shape of gear which they would be very glad to put up. I make that suggestion to the minister. If these corrections are made, then the act will fulfil the purpose designed in the title and will be a good act which one can gladly welcome. But if it is not to be amended in these ways then it is only a gesture. An expression which we have so often heard in this house in the last few weeks is, "Well, anyhow, it is a step in the right direction, and we have established a principle." I am tired of being invited to vote for gestures and principles. A legislative enactment is not the place to look for principles and policies. You define those in the planks of your platform or in your speeches outside or in the house; but bills are supposed to enact into practical legislation the results of policy, and I am not a bit satisfied when I am told that though there is not much in a bill there is a principle. We do not want principle alone; we want action. Too much legislation has been passed in this house lately in connection with which we have had dangled before us this or that principle. We are told, "Anyhow, the principle is stated." Yes, the principle is stated but it is not carried out. I do not want to hear general platitudes; I do not want to be told that such and such is desirable; I want to see it carried into practical effect. It cannot be denied, and I am not trying to deny it, that this bill is a step in the right direction. But we want to go further. Our fishermen in British Columbia are hard-headed and practical men who know the difference between a gold brick and something valuable. If the bill can be taken advantage of, all right; if not, what is the use of it? They will no doubt endorse any party that brings down something practical, and I beg the government, not so much to put teeth into the bill as to put some practicability into it, so that it can be taken advantage of by the various people interested. Otherwise I do not hold myself compelled to vote for it on the third reading. We have been challenged again and again with regard to some of these bills; a minister will say, "I challenge hon. members opposite to vote against this bill." Well, I am prepared to accept that challenge and to go back and tell the people I represent just why I vote against any bill. I would go back and say, "I voted against it because I was fed up with gold bricks." I hope that this bill will be amended so as to make it of real benefit to the fishermen, and if it is no one will endorse it more heartily than I or the people I represent.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (East Toronto): This bill will do a good deal, with the protective clauses in it, to put a withering industry on a better basis. I am glad to see the principle of this legislation also extended to the fishermen to the head of the lakes, because after all most of the protection given to the fisheries has been largely for the maritimes and the coastal trade. But there is another feature of the industry, and that is the trade on the great lakes. Unfortunately it has been overlooked for years in the legislation passed by the dominion parliament. This legislation is a necessity; an emergency exists, and this legislation is intended to meet that situation. The price spreads commission revealed, in connection with this industry, a state of affairs which was not creditable either to parliament or to the people of Canada, from the point of view of labour and the consumer.

An examination of the bill will show that it proposes the establishment of a board. The commission recommended a fishermen's board, and in the interpretation clause the principle of a board, namely the Canadian Farm Loan Act is adopted. The board is to be the Canadian Farm Loan Board, established by the Canadian Farm Loan Act in 1927. There is a long list of definitions which are interpreted. The main provision of the bill is section 3, giving the constitution and the powers of the board. The board will have power to issue and sell bonds to be known as Canadian fisherman's loan bonds and to make long term loans to fishermen on the security of first mortgages on fishermen's lands. The board may also hold real estate which has been mortgaged or otherwise secured to it. It can invest its funds in debentures, bonds, stocks or other securities; and as to the capital requirements, it is provided that the government may subscribe to an initial capital not exceeding $300,000. Section 5 deals with the limit of outstanding bonds, the rate of interest, time limit, redemption and so on, and in section 6 certain conditions for loans are laid down. Loans are to be made only on the security of first mortgages on lands not exceeding fifty per cent of their actual value. As to the use of the proceeds, they may be used to purchase boats or vessels, lines, hooks, trawls, nets, anchors, bait, traps and other equipment. Part of the loan may be used to discharge liabilities already accumulated, or for any other purpose which in the judgment of the board is deemed necessary for the operation of the industry as a commercial undertaking. In connection with repayment, the board has wide powers.

The interest is not to exceed eight per cent. It seems to me that is a very high rate of interest to-day, though I admit that so far as this industry is concerned, with the difficulty of getting loans, the overhead charges might be high. But eight per cent is a very high rate of interest.

Section 4 of the bill is the most vital provision ever enacted in this country. I commend the undertaking, speaking as a protectionist of the protectionists, because we want protection for all the people all the time and not for some of the people some of the time. There is provision here that the board may loan money to the mortgagor or other person —to do what? If the fishermen shall fail or neglect to pay any lawful rates, taxes or assessments under the law of the province concerned, then the board may pay them.

I am glad to see that the fisherman is coming into his day. He has eaten the sour grapes of free trade long enough and his teeth are on edge. He wants protection, something away from free trade. He was led to believe by free trade leaders in the maritime provinces and on the Pacific coast that the only hope and joy of this industry was in a system of free trade as proposed for many years in this house by Liberals, Liberal Progressives and Progressive Liberals. The time has come when there is an emergency in this industry so that the poor fisherman has, like the grain men, the coal, steel and iron men in the maritimes, to come to parliament for assistance. At last the fishermen are getting away from the principle of free trade to that of advanced protection.

I have dealt already with the principle of the bill. I am not objecting to advanced protection for agriculture, for the farmer, for the fisherman. A farm board has been set up for the protection of the farmer, the same board that is set up under this fisherman's loan act to do something for the fishing industry. Now in connection with fishing we have the same element of protection. I want to speak a word to-day about the cities on the great lakes and the people engaged in industry there in Ontario and Quebec. Forty-six per cent of our people are industrial workers, and the principle of this legislation should apply to them also. The time is not far distant in this country when we shall have to set up for the industrial workers a board similar to those set up under this fisherman's loan act and the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act so that the retail storekeeper, the individual worker, and those engaged in industries will have some means of protection. A retail grocer who fails and whose little shop is gone or an industrial worker who gets out of work or is only on part time should be dealt with in the same manner as the poor fisherman or farmer; he should be able to secure similar protection. There is no reason why forty-six per cent of the people who are engaged in industry should not have the same form of protection as is given under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, the fisherman's loan act and so on. There should be created for these people a similar board to establish long term mortgage credits even up to twenty-five years for the small retail grocer or the small industrial worker who is out of work or may be on part time as many of them are. Sooner or later we shall have to extend this very wise and commendable feature of this legislation. I would like to see some kind of board set up for the industries to which I have referred and some credit established either through banks, insurance companies, loan companies, mortgage companies or through parliament or partly through one and partly the other, for the protection and relief of the small industrial worker and the small storekeeper on the same basis as these other acts I have mentioned. We should have protection not only for the fishermen and for the farmers but for everyone; we want a system of protection that will take care of all the people. Those small industrial people who have lost their all by foreclosure or unemployment or high taxes are in the same plight as are the fishermen and the farmers, and the principle of this bill should be extended to them.

Speaking for an industrial province, I say that the industrial workers of this country are no longer going to stand for handing out protection to some and not to others. Under the provisions of this bill we are paying through the new fisheries board, taxes, mortgages, lien notes, security to the bank, hypothecation of the plant and equipment of the fishermen. The same principle of protection should be extended either through parliament or the banks or a board similar to the farm loan board to the industrial workers so that they will have a fair show under protection as we have it to-day to hold and retain their properties and their equities and their small business ventures.

I commend the government for bringing down this legislation. It is too bad that there was not an inquiry by the price spreads commission into industry, along those lines for the industrial worker in the way I have indicated. I wrote one of the members of the price spreads commission, but the commission was too busy to take up the matter. Ontario and Quebec pay eighty-two per cent of the cash taxes of the dominion and forty-six per cent of Canada are industrial workers, but the latter have no protection at all along the lines of saving their business, their homes or properties by long term loans. When such a man in the city cannot pay his taxes, he cannot go to a board. The fisherman can; the agricultural worker can; the farmer can, but the poor industrial worker has nobody to go to. In the city from which I come some of these men are paying forty per cent interest on second mortgages to shark loan companies incorporated by this parliament and the same thing is true of the high charges on chattel mortgages. In view of the case made for the fishermen before the price spreads commission, the day is soon coming in Canada when we shall have to set up a board for the industrial workers who have been driven to the wall, who are losing their property, who are being foreclosed on the first mortgage and then the second mortgage or foreclosed for nonpayment of taxes. I may say to the government that the principle underlying this bill will have to be extended to those who pay the taxes in the industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and a board under the regulation of trade and commerce with wide federal powers established for their needs and protection. With protection as a principle for all instead of as a privilege for some, I commend this wise bill.

Hon. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): I do not wish to engage the time of the house for more than a moment, but I should like to call to the attention of the minister that probably we have heard less of the fishing industry in Ontario in the great lakes district simply because the fishing industry in this province is under the jurisdiction of the Ontario government. The hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) have suggested some amendments to the bill as it applies to the Atlantic and Pacific coast fisheries. If aid is to be given by the state to the fishermen on the great lakes, I should like to suggest to the minister that his bill does not really cover the present needs of the situation. Most of the fishermen on the great lakes do not own any great quantity of commercial land, they are in much the same position as that indicated by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Their shanties may be on government land or they may have leased property. In many cases their commercial buildings are on government docks, so that the value of commercial property which they could offer by way of security to the minister for an advance is negligible. Most of the commercial fishermen on the great lakes sell their fish fresh; their commodity is delivered to the market probably more rapidly than is the fish of the maritime provinces or of the Pacific coast. The greatest need of the fishermen on the great lakes is when disaster overtakes them, when by an act of God several gangs of nets are lost in one of the storms which are so frequent on the great lakes.

I should like to point out to the minister that the fisherman who has some security can secure from the bank a loan to pay cash for his gear, and in that case he is really not in need of much governmental assistance. Those who are not so favourably situated could be greatly assisted by a government loan, but that loan would really be for the purchase of new gear, new gangs of nets, new engines for boats and repairs to existing vessels. I think the bill should be so worded in so far as the great lakes are concerned that the loans should be made on gear and equipment for the reason that while the fisherman may own residential property for his home, he does not as a rule own much commercial property.

The second point in connection with these loans is the matter of the amount. I think the limiting of the amount to $1,000 rather destroys the effectiveness of the legislation. One does not gather together very much gear for seine fishing for $1,000. Four or five gangs of nets cost much more than $1,000; it is not much of a hull to weather the storms of the great lakes that you can buy for that amount. I suggest to the minister that if he has good inspection, and loans be made only to the amount of fifty per cent on gear, he could well afford to increase the amount to some much higher figure.

Then I am against long term loans on fishing equipment. The rate of depreciation on it is probably more rapid than on any other sort of industrial equipment. Boats wear out very quickly, nets rot very quickly. Practically all the gear used by fishermen has to be replaced every few years. If a loan is made to a fisherman I would suggest that it be for a short term or even repayable in instalments over the period in which he would normally redeem his securities were they given to a bank or loan company. I think I voice the opinion of all members who are familiar with the fishing industry in Georgian bay and lake Huron and lake Superior when I say that we could be of great assistance to those fishermen by providing cash advances to restore gear or to purchase new gear. But I do not think they want such loans for twenty-five years, or even five years. All they would ask would be loans repayable in instalments every three or six months out of their earnings from the gear purchased with the proceeds of the loan. Another point, raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, I think is deserving of consideration, namely, that it is not the course of wisdom to encourage too many young men to go into the fishing business. Those now fishing the great lakes I think are producing the quantity of fish that can reasonably be sold in the Canadian and American markets. To make long term loans for which the security might quickly disappear and for which the borrower would hold no great feeling of responsibility would only induce much severer competition with those already in the industry. So in framing the act, so far as the great lakes are concerned, I think loans should be restricted to restoring gear and equipment for those already engaged in the industry and helping those who have been in the industry recently but who have been forced out by economic circumstances or storms—I know of several cases—to reestablish themselves in the industry; and that loans on gear should be for short terms, within the time in which the security may be worn out and be of no value.

Those are the only observations I wish to make. I agree with the principle of assisting this great basic industry. I am not familiar with the situation on the Atlantic or the Pacific coast but I am familiar with it in Ontario on the great lakes, which produce many million dollars' worth of fresh fish.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): To the principle of the bill, that is, assistance to fishermen by providing them with credit loans, I do not think any hon. member would take exception. But there are sections in the bill with which I cannot agree. Much has been said by speakers preceding me as to long term loans, especially on land. I doubt if one per cent of the smaller fishermen, that is those having gill net boats, own their houses outright. When one considers that fishermen of that class are in the majority in British Columbia, one must conclude that this bill will not provide much assistance for them. In British Columbia there were 196 boats of ten tons and over with a valuation of $2,120,000, but when we come to the smaller boats, the gill net boats, there were 5,461 valued at over $3,000,000. Then there are numbers of men who still use sail or rowboats. I was a little surprised to learn the number using sail boats, not having enough money to put engines in them. There were still 2,393 using that type of small boat. So in all we have close to 8,000 small boat fishermen, and I say that out of that total perhaps not over one per cent own outright the houses they live in. By this bill the man who does own his home may be provided with a loan up to one thousand dollars spread over twenty-five years. During that time his engine or boat will have passed away, but still the mortgage will run on his home. I support the contention of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) that the benefits of the act should be confined to fishermen. Reading some sections of the bill one would think it is confined to those entirely occupied in fishing, that is those who go out on the river or sea and catch fish. Section 6 (b) says:

[Mr. Malcolm.]

> The proceeds of such loan shall be used for the following purposes and no other:
> (1) To purchase boats or vessels, or shares or part interests in boats or vessels for use in the fisheries.
>
> (2) To purchase equipment for such fishing boats or vessels including therein the purchase of gasoline, crude oil or other engines.
>
> (3) To purchase lines, hooks, trawls, nets, anchors, bait, traps, and any other equipment or apparatus for use in fishing.
> (4) To discharge liabilities already accumulated.

I interpret that to mean that the loans will be made only to those solely engaged in fishing, that is to those who go down to the sea or river in ships. But if you turn to the interpretation section you find that:

> "Fisherman" means a person whose principal occupation consists in fishing.
> "Fishing" means the taking and processing of fish ...

I take strong exception to making loans to firms for the processing of fish. This bill, I understand, is designed to help those who go down to the sea in ships, real fishermen. Certainly in my opinion clause (c) of section 2 is contrary to section 6.

Another point is that under the Canadian Farm Loan Act men have been appointed, by reason, I presume, not only of their business knowledge but their knowledge of farms as well. Under this bill, while it is true that the Minister of Fisheries will be in charge, the bill, after it passes the house, will be under the jurisdiction of the Canadian farm loan board. With all deference to the men who have been appointed I do not think they are fully competent to handle the affairs of the fishermen. I suppose the farm loan board will consider that they only have to value the land and that if a fisherman comes within the provisions of the act he will be granted a loan, but there is more to it than that. I would suggest to the minister that some official of the fisheries department should have some say in regard to these loans. I for one would deprecate it very much indeed if loans were made under this act in order to further the large interests or to enable men to combine and go into seine fishing. I know a loan is limited to $1,000, but in the matter of seines, twelve men or more could get together and obtain loans of $1,000 each, thereby entering into competition with the smaller fishermen.

I agree also with other hon. members who have stated that this bill comes a little late in the session. I do not see how the fishermen can take advantage of it this year, even if loans are expedited, because fishing is pretty well under way on the Pacific coast at present.

I am not going to take up much more of the time of the house at the moment; I shall withhold further remarks until we are in committee, but I believe many of us will have to differ with some of the provisions of the bill in its present form.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in connection with this bill, which purports to establish in Canada in system of long term mortgage credits for fishermen. With the principle of the bill I entirely agree but, as the last speaker stated, this is very late in the session to bring down a measure of this kind. Knowing the plight of the fishermen, as the government have known it for a good many years, and in view of the resolution I introduced a few years ago in this connection, if the government had been sincere they should have brought before parliament legislation much more comprehensive and much easier of application than the present bill. The aim of the measure is good; it is designed to relieve and help the fishermen. With that I am quite in accord and I would not oppose the bill, but there are many features of the measure which I think will result in it not becoming operative this year. In the part of the country from which I come the fishermen are very poor; they are perhaps next to the poorest fishermen in the country, and I am afraid they will not be in a position to take advantage of this legislation, with their little plots of ground, their small properties, their small boats and the gear at their disposal.

There is another feature to which I should like to refer. The interest rate to be charged is not mentioned in this bill. I think in one paragraph it is stated that the interest rate will be that which it is found necessary to charge in accordance with the bonds issued by the board. I doubt very much if any man would undertake to make an agreement with the government or with a private individual without knowing in advance the rate of interest that would be charged.

Mr. ERNST: That would be stated in the agreement.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, but it is not very encouraging. In another paragraph the bill states that in default of payment of interest or taxes the board has the right to make such payment and to impose interest of eight per cent. I think that interest is too high. We are to give the government power to go into the loan shaving business, because a rate of eight per cent is not exacted even by the banks. So we are not giving the fishermen much more relief than they have already. I should like to refer also to section 11, which provides:

> In the event of legislation being passed by the legislature of any province after loans have been made available in that province which, in the opinion of the board, would prejudicially affect the security of existing or future loans, the board, by notice to be published in the Canada Gazette, may cease to make further loans in that province.

I doubt very much if the fishermen of the province from which I come will derive any benefit from this bill if that clause remains. Recently a move has been made by the provincial government of Quebec, which administers the fisheries of that province, by which the government advances money to the fishermen on the basis of the number of feet of keel in a vessel, in order to help the fishermen secure new vessels, and also in connection with new gear to be used in their work. If the provincial government provides for reimbursement by the fishermen in a way that does not commend itself to the board, this measure will not be operative in our province. In that case it will be sectional in its nature, and that might be one ground for opposing it.

When the bill is in committee I may have some further remarks to make, but I repeat that this is tardy legislation. If the government think they are going to place a feather in their cap and say they have done something for the fishermen I am afraid they are greatly mistaken. The public generally and especially the fishermen know that for the last four years I, as a member of this house, have advocated that the government should do something to improve the condition of the fishermen in the province of Quebec, on the Atlantic seaboard and particularly on the north shore of the St. Lawrence river, but the government have done nothing. This is what might be called a deathbed repentance. This bill appears to give something but in reality it gives nothing; it offers something but it will not give anything, at least for some considerable time. So I think the fishermen will know what to do when the election comes along. They will vote for the people who have always advocated assistance to the fisheries; they will support those who have always given them assistance, as it has been given by the provincial government of Quebec.

Mr. MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Is it intended to submit this bill to the fisheries committee or to the committee of the whole?

Mr. STIRLING: To the committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Morand in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. REID: I am going to appeal to the minister again with regard to subsection (e) of section 2, which states:

(e) "Fishing" means the taking and processing of fish of all kinds for commercial purposes.

Section 6 sets out the purposes for which loans may be made; it provides that loans may be made only to fishermen, but here we have the word "processing." I should like the minister to make a statement in this regard.

Mr. ERNST: If the suggestion of the hon. member were adopted quite a number of fishermen in eastern Canada would be excluded from the operations of the act. They not only catch or take the fish; they also process them. You could not say their major occupation was fishing unless you include processing.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I notice that the definition of "board" is as follows:

"Board" is, includes, and means the Canadian farm loan board, established by the Canadian Farm Loan Act, chapter sixty-six of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, and amendments thereto;

It has been stated that the Canadian farm loan board have many requisitions before them at the present time and there is also the matter of loans and arrangements to be made under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. In view of the work before this board, will they be in position to deal with this legislation? Are we not placing another burden upon the shoulders of the board and will this board as it is at present constituted be in position to understand the problems facing the fishermen in various parts of the country? There might be different conditions facing the fishermen in that part of the country from which the minister who is piloting this bill comes; other conditions may face the fishermen in the district from which the hon. member from Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) comes, while other conditions are faced by the fishermen in Quebec. The members of this board may be fully conversant with questions concerning farms and lands but I doubt if they have full knowledge of fishing problems.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not think the hon. member has taken section 10 into account. That section provides for the appointment of a local loan advisory board and the chief executive officer of the province who would be appointed by the farm loan board would be assisted by the advisory board. In all probability the members of that board would have particular knowledge of fisheries. In connection with the work before the Canadian farm loan board, I believe the hon. member is confused between the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and the Canadian Farm Loan Act. I am not aware that the Canadian farm loan board has so much work before it that it cannot take on the administration of this bill.

Mr. REID: Clause (f) reads:

"Fisherman's land" means land under occupation or owned by a fisherman.

I should like an explanation of that definition.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not think that definition should be held to too rigidly. There may be instances where the fisherman occupies land owned by his wife or some other relative.

Mr. REID: Could a loan be made on the land if it was in his wife's name?

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, yes, the loan would be made against the land. We must remember that the board which will administer this bill will use reasonable common sense such as we ourselves would use if we were to administer this legislation.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The minister referred to section 10 which deals with the local loan advisory boards. Section 10 reads:

The board may appoint for any province or for any two or more provinces in which the board is authorized to make loans, a local loan advisory board of not more than three members. The chief executive officer appointed by the board for such province or provinces shall, ex officio, be a member of such local loan advisory board and the chairman thereof.

How are the members of these boards to be appointed? Who is going to recommend their appointment? Will they be political appointees? We have a peculiar condition in Quebec where the Magdalen islands are under the jurisdiction of the Atlantic coast; the Gaspé coast is under the jurisdiction of the fisheries department at Quebec, and there is also the north shore of the St. Lawrence river. I should like to know if one official will be appointed for the north shore and another for the Gaspé coast? Most of the fishing is done in these two districts where the conditions are somewhat similar although not exactly the same. What qualifications must this man have? Will there be one man for each district or will there be a man appointed in Quebec city or Montreal? Will this man be connected with a cooperative selling agency or will he be a man conversant with the real situation facing the fishermen?

Mr. STIRLING: Could we not wait until section 10 is reached?

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. NEILL: I cannot agree with the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Ernst) when he says that the leaving out of the words "and processing of" in clause (e) will mean that no one will be able to obtain a loan. That would just eliminate those whose sole occupation is the processing of fish. The way it is now a hardship is being placed upon the man in British Columbia who takes no part in the processing of the fish he catches. This should be limited to the taking of fish out of the water and then it would not hurt those who take out the fish and process them as well. This would eliminate the man working in a cannery or a reduction plant or the owner of such a plant. I do not suppose the government intends to include these, or if they do they should say so. I think the minister should give further consideration to this clause.

Mr. STIRLING: It seems to me that "and" is the correct way of expressing this. The hon. member who has just spoken does not want to include those who process the fish but I understand that in other parts of Canada that is desirable. When the hon. member was speaking on the second reading he referred to this matter and stated that it would include the canneries but it does not seem likely that a large canning establishment would want to make use of the small sum of money which would be available.

Mr. NEILL: If the minister states that it is part of the government policy to lend money to people who process fish, I have no more to say. If it is the intention of the government to make loans to some casual labourer who works a few days shovelling coal or looking after the oil in a reduction plant, to some Indian woman or anyone else engaged in the processing of fish, we have not so understood it.

92582—256½

Mr. REID: If you look at section 6 you will find that loans can be made only for certain specified purposes and those purposes do not include the processing of fish. Loans are made for the purpose of purchasing boats, equipment and so on.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Powers of board.

Mr. NEILL: I do not suppose there is any use moving an amendment when the minister says he is not going to accept it. The temper of the committee this afternoon was certainly in the direction of asking the minister if he would allow loans to be made also on the security of gear.

Mr. ERNST: Clause 3 deals only with bonds issued by the board.

Mr. NEILL: It says that the board may:

(b) make long term loans to fishermen on the security of first mortgages on fisherman's lands.

Mr. ERNST: That is correct.

Mr. NEILL: I accept the hon. member's apology. The minister has not so far as I know expressed the opinion of himself or of his department or of the government on the representations made this afternoon in the direction of including the security of gear as well as land. I would like to hear whether he has determined to exclude gear.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, when the government decided that it would be desirable to proceed along this line it was met with the difficulty which I presume has stood in the way of preceding governments in this matter: What should the security be? It has decided that it is prepared to go the distance of accepting as security land occupied or owned by the fishermen, but to introduce loans made on gear or on boats is to introduce loans made on something which may be destroyed and which in any event has a comparatively short life. The government therefore, after careful consideration, has decided in this measure to proceed so far as to offer loans to fishermen on the basis of their land.

Mr. NEILL: That means that ninety per cent of the would-be applicants will be cut out.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Conditions for loans.

Mr. NEILL: What about the representations that have been made this afternoon that the amount loaned should be more than $1,000 in view of the fact that farmers with no more security can get $5,000?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Are we clearly to understand under clause 6 that there are really needy fishermen who need this assistance who are going to be excluded because they have no land to give as security for a mortgage? I may say to this committee that when I entered this house first in 1925 I was the first man from the province of Nova Scotia to advocate long term loans for fishermen. There was an act at that time which had been passed by a previous government extending long term loans to farmers, and I very strongly advocated then that loans be extended to fishermen both on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, and I think I was supported in that contention by some other members from the province of Nova Scotia. I did not visualize at that time that we would have before any parliament this bill as it is now before this house. I am of the honest opinion that this bill will not help at least eighty per cent of the shore fishermen of my province, if section 6 be not amended.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Nor in Quebec.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: The men who have capital and can carry on the fishing industry by themselves do not want to go into debt through long term loans or any other kind of loan. The man we want to help in Nova Scotia is the man who has practically nothing except the determination to follow a humble but honest calling. If section 6 is going to remain in this bill, then I say it is not very much of a bill. I am certainly in favour of the principle of extending long term loans to fishermen, and I am in favour of the principle of this bill, although it does not even say how long the loan is going to be for, but the bill should certainly be so framed that it will bring aid to those who need aid in the province of Nova Scotia and on the Pacific seaboard as well. So far as Nova Scotia is concerned, I still maintain the position I took before in this house, that more than long term loans, we want to see that the Nova Scotia fisherman has the right to live and that his prices are not dictated by monopolist control such as we have in the province of Nova Scotia. If a resolution that I placed on the order paper had been supported by this house the shore fishermen of Nova Scotia would have been much better off under it than they will be under this particular bill.

I may also say that we want to encourage as much as we can all those fishermen in Nova Scotia who join their cooperative unions. I wish to say frankly that our position in Nova Scotia is this: If the fishermen who to-day are suffering from economic thraldom are going to be relieved we must break monopoly and give the fishermen a chance to live and encourage their cooperative unions. To my mind section 6 nullifies the full effect of the bill. I am sorry to have to say that.

Section stands.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

EIGHT HOUR DAY

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE WITH RESPECT TO SENATE AMENDMENTS TO BILL NO. 21

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate do not concur in the amendment made by the House of Commons to the ninth amendment made by the Senate to the Bill No. 21, an act to provide for limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the principle of the eight hour day or of the forty-eight hour week adopted by the General Conference of the International Labour Organization of the League of Nations in accordance with the labour part of the Treaty of Versailles of the 28th June, 1919, for the following reasons:

That the Senate sees no sufficient reason why with relation to the class of labour referred to in the said amendment, the bill may not go into effect at the time stipulated in the Senate amendment.

And further,—That the Senate direct the attention of the House of Commons to the 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th and 14th amendments to the said bill to which amendments no reference is made in the message from that house.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate has passed the Bill No. 62, an act to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, with an amendment, which is as follows:—

1. Page 1, lines 9 and 10. For the words "at the date of the coming into force of this amending act," substitute the words "on the first day of July, 1935."

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Auditor General's Office—
Contingencies — further amount required, $35,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Can the minister give an explanation?

Mr. RHODES: The auditor general requires this sum for the additional work imposed upon the department in connection with the enlarged duty which has been necessitated in respect of relief expenditures.

Item agreed to.

Secretary of State—
Contingencies — further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the reason for this vote?

Mr. CAHAN: Of this amount $20,000 is required in connection with the commission appointed under Mr. Justice Parker to inquire into the performing rights matter, and $5,000 is required for additional clerical assistance, chiefly in the patent and copyright offices, owing to an increased amount of work and also to the fact that there has been more illness among the employees during the present year, for whom we have had to substitute temporary employees. The additional sum for these offices will simply cover temporary work.

Item agreed to.

Legislation

The Senate

Salaries and contingent expenses—further amount required, $6,000.

To provide an amount in lieu of residence for the Speaker of the Senate—further amount required, $1,000.

To provide for the payment of the full sessional indemnity for the session of 1935 to members of the Senate for days lost through absence due to public business, by illness, or on account of death. Payment to be made as the treasury board may direct, $24,260—Total, $31,260.

Mr. POULIOT: Before this item carries, may I say that, following the suggestion of the opposition the government has saved over $108,000 by delaying appointments of senators. This is one of the very few instances in which the government has not been wrong, because it has followed the recommendation of the opposition.

Item agreed to.

House of Commons

Contingencies — further amount required, $10,000.

To provide an amount for the Speaker of the House of Commons in lieu of residence—further amount required, $1,000.

To provide for the full sessional indemnity to members of the House of Commons—days lost through absence caused by illness, official public business, or on account of death during the present session—notwithstanding anything to the contrary in chapter 147 of the revised statutes, 1927, an act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, or any amendment thereto. Payments to be made as the treasury board may direct, $18,000—Total, $29,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This item includes an amount for the Speaker of the House of Commons in lieu of residence—further amount required—$1,000. I have no objection to the item, but it gives to the Speaker the same allowance he had before, and my only objection is that the same thing is not done for the Deputy Speaker, who also had an allowance. If the Speaker is granted his former allowance in lieu of residence, I see no reason in the world why the Deputy Speaker should not have the same privilege.

Mr. RHODES: This was an oversight due to the circumstance that the vote was prepared in precisely the same form in which it was received. When the oversight was brought to my attention I began to prepare an amendment; in fact, I was in the act of writing it when the hon. gentleman rose. I therefore move that the resolution be amended by adding, after the word "required," in the first line thereof, the words:

including an allowance of $500 for the Deputy Speaker in lieu of apartments—further amount required.

Mr. DUFF: Can the minister tell us how much was voted in the main estimates for the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker?

Mr. RHODES: I cannot say offhand, but this item merely restores to the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker and to the Speaker of the Senate the amount of allowance which they have hitherto enjoyed in lieu of residence.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Library of Parliament—
Books for the general library, including binding—further amount required, $2,000.

Mr. POULIOT: A suggestion has been made by members of the opposition that the library of parliament be made fireproof, and the same suggestion has been made with regard to the library of the supreme court. It met with the approval of the Minister of Justice, who was supposed to convey the message to the government. What has been decided in that respect? Did the Minister of Justice convey that message?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will as soon as I get time.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Live stock, including assistance to fairs and exhibitions—further amount required, $40,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would like under this item to have a word or two with the Minister of Agriculture regarding a certain live stock matter. I would appreciate it if the hon. gentleman would come a little nearer so that I could hear his answers because I have some things to say to him, of course in a kindly spirit. It is generally understood, commonly reported, and known around parliament hill as well as outside parliament hill that the purchase of a certain shipment of Percheron brood mares was facilitated by one minister of the government, and half of them were retained at Halifax by my good friend the Minister of Agriculture through his inspectional staff. First I would ask the minister whether he knows anything about this shipment of Percheron brood mares to Australia, and whether his officers detained half of them at Halifax because of their age and general unfitness to go forward. When my hon. friend answers that, I shall proceed further. I am not under the illusion that my hon. friend is blameworthy in this matter, rather the opposite; I merely want to get the facts correctly from him.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): There was a shipment of pure bred Percheron brood mares that went from this country to Australia. My understanding is that either the trade commissioner of Australia got into touch with the trade commissioner from Canada, or our trade commissioner in Australia got in touch with the head of his own department, with the information that there was a demand for Percheron pure bred mares in Australia. My understanding is that the Department of Trade and Commerce communicated with the Canadian Percheron Asociation, and between them, although I do not know the details of the affair—it was not brought to my attention until the shipment was selected—a shipment was selected to be sent to Australia. The department having been led to believe that this shipment in its entirety would not be a credit to the Percheron breed of Canada, two inspectors from the Department of Agriculture were sent to inspect the shipment at Halifax, and three of the animals were pronounced unfit in the estimation of those officials to be truly representative of the best type of Percheron brood mare in Canada to go to Australia.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand the minister knew nothing about this shipment until it arrived at Halifax. What would interest us all is to know why these animals went to Halifax on their way to Australia when some of them were purchased in Ontario and some in Alberta. It was giving them a long joy ride to their destination to go to Halifax—not that I have anything against our Atlantic ports or anything like that; but generally shippers take the shortest, most direct route; they are not fond of paying excess carriage.

My first assumption was that one minister in this case, the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) the ex-minister now, facilitated in some way through the Percheron breeders' association or otherwise the purchase of six brood mares for Australia, and the Minister of Agriculture, learning of this apparently for the first time, had his inspectors examine them at Halifax and retained three of them as unfit to send to Australia as typical of the quality of the animals of our Percheron breeders' association, a conclusion which has proven to be correct. This is not the first time this kind of monkeying between two departments, one nosing into the other's business, has occurred during the last year and a half under the administration of the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, against whom I have nothing to say except that when a gentleman is preaching business ethics and the control of industry, he should first get himself under control. Here we have a record and it is not the first one; we all remember the story about the Yorkshire geldings the ex-minister was responsible for in a bulletin that went around the world, something that will be news in our libraries in hundreds of years from now when research readers will be wondering what kind of political geldings had control of our destinies in Canada at this time. We know about the Richelieu Shipping Corporation. The ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce was nosing very prominently into that by bonusing those two worthless boats to the tune of $6,500 apiece. I am delighted to learn the government have seen at last their moral obligation in the matter by correcting the ex-minister's blunders and making it right to the farmers who had lost the proceeds of their cattle through the control of industry by the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce trying to control the business of another department. That is business ethics personified. We have other instances to which I might refer, but that is sufficient for the moment. This is what I would like to ask the minister, because I want to get the information from him rather than give it myself: I have before me a return tabled by the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) in reply to a number of questions I asked about this matter. Apparently I did not put them in quite proper form, thus giving whatever minister is responsible for this return an opportunity of getting by and not giving anything like the information the Minister of Agriculture has given to-night. Had my hon. friend anything to do with getting up this return to the questions I put on the order paper about a month ago, which return was tabled recently by the Secretary of State?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not the questions in front of me, but as the hon. member knows, if in the questions the information is to be received from a particular department and they concern more than one department, that information is sent by each department to the Secretary of State who compiles all the answers. Not having the questions in front of me, I cannot say whether any of them pertain to the Department of Agriculture, but so far as I recollect all that my department had to do with the matter was that the health of animals branch would necessarily have to inspect this stock before it was shipped and the other inspectors, as I stated before, passed their opinion upon the shipment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The health of animals branch has nothing to do with the general type or conformation of an animal or anything of that nature; it has to do with the health and freedom from disease of the animal, so that their inspection as to type, conformation, and so on, would be quite worthless. I am sure the inspection carried out at Halifax would be by the regular inspectors of the live stock branch, the proper ones under the circumstances. I think I have revealed the fact that the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce has been committing another great ministerial faux pas.

Mr. SPOTTON: It sounds good, but what does it mean?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is no wonder to me that he was excluded from cabinet circles when this kind of thing was going on. If it were the only instance, it might be overlooked, but I have mentioned two or three and I could mention more. These three critters did not get to Australia; they were a discredit to Canada, and I think I should incidentally give credit to the Minister of Agriculture for being alert enough to waylay them at Halifax before they got that joy ride round the world to reach Australia. May be the minister would tell us why the shipment went to Australia via Halifax. Was this some more of the skilful management of industry by the ex-Minister of Trade and Commerce, or what was it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am sorry, but I cannot give any reason why the shipment went by Halifax, my department not having anything to do with it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Then it will do no harm to tell the minister that it was reported that due to a lot of bungling in the purchase of these animals in Alberta or elsewhere, they missed the boat via Vancouver and to make the best of a bad job the mares were sent around the world the other way by Halifax.

Mr. POULIOT: Does this item include salaries for agricultural propagandists who have been laid off since 1930? Is it the intention of the government to reinstate them in their job?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): This vote is not for that purpose.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret it. It is a great mistake on the part of the government to have laid off these men who have great knowledge of the agricultural problems and who were helping the farmers all the time. Numerous protests have been sent to the minister without any satisfactory reply; what was received was just an acknowledgment from his secretary. Petition after petition has been sent to him from the farmers of my riding asking to have these men reinstated.

The minister gives the farmers what they do not ask for; he gives them schemes, but they do not want schemes, they want help from these experts. One of the greatest blunders he has made since he has been head of the department was to lay off these able men.

Item agreed to.

Experimental farms — further amount required, $19,800.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I should like to ask the minister whether consideration has been given to the representations from boards of trade and farmers' institutes and public bodies throughout northern and central British Columbia, as well as from myself, as to assistance to experimental farms and model farms in that locality.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Full consideration has been given to these representations. A great change has taken place in the agricultural situation in the district to which the hon. member refers, chiefly on account of changes in the industrial operations there. Mining was carried on for years in that locality and for a time was very profitable and large sums were paid in wages which were spent freely for products of the farms. Not only that, railway operations which at one time were active were completed. The farmers there had the advantage of a local market for their products. In addition, lumbering operations in the area have been to a certain extent suspended, and their benefit to the agricultural population has been lessened thereby. All this has made it difficult for the farmers in the locality to market their products profitably. But there is one thing which they have done and for which they deserve great credit, in conjunction with the officials of the provincial department of agriculture as well as of the federal department; they have discovered that they can grow particularly fine timothy in the area, and as the freight is very little, it can be shipped long distances at small cost. A great deal of attention is being given to assisting the farmers in that connection. It is hoped that large illustration stations other than those already established will be set up as model farms. In connection with that the department have entered into a contract with the provincial government to use their property at Tranquille, which will also serve as a source of information to the ranchers in that part of central and northern British Columbia. I can assure the hon. member that every consideration has been given to those requests.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): That means that there is no further assistance to be given to that part of the country this year, either in the main estimates or in the supplementaries?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The hon. member has misunderstood me. We are giving assistance in the way I have stated, and a survey is being made for the purpose of selecting illustration stations, which serve the purpose of model farms the hon. member has suggested. It is not proposed to set up a large experimental farm in that locality at the present time, but by using these large illustration stations it is believed that we can make available to the farmers in that district information as to the most efficient way for them to produce what will be to their greatest advantage. I appreciate the fact that the hon. member has brought this to my attention on a number of occasions.

Mr. DUPUIS: Could the minister give, by provinces, the details as to experimental farms, the number of illustration farms and the amount required for the whole year for these purposes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I am sorry I have not that information with me. The greater part of it was given when the main estimates were under discussion. I shall be glad, however, to supply the information to the hon. member.

Mr. DUPUIS: I thought it had not been given. How many large experimental farms are there in the province of Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I cannot give the names of the farmers who have illustration farms. The larger experimental farms in Quebec are at Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, at Cap Rouge, Farnham, L'Assomption, and Lennoxville. Those are all I can recollect, but I think that is all.

Mr. DUPUIS: The minister cannot state the number of illustration farms in the province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No, I cannot, but I shall be glad to send the information to the hon. member.

Mr. BRADETTE: Again I want to make an appeal under this item, as I did last year, for the experimental farm at Kapuskasing. Last year $500,000 was voted for the public works program, and only $1,200 was spent for new buildings at that farm. I do not think the minister has ever visited that farm—I suppose he has been too busy but if he had he would have seen for himself that the living quarters of the men working there are a disgrace not only to the government but to that section of the country. The minister promised me faithfully last year that out of the public works vote a certain amount would be given for that purpose, but only $1,200 was so spent. The working men at the Kapuskasing experimental farm are at present living in tar paper shacks built in 1914 to lodge the prisoners of war. Those shacks have not been renovated in any way. They are not fit for cattle to live in. I should be possible for the Department of Agriculture to spend at least a little money for that purpose. We have been very patient. The minister is well aware of the wonderful work being acomplished by that experimental farm, which is looking after the agricultural needs of northern Ontario and southwestern Quebec. It is giving service to nearly 200,000 people, and it covers an area of nearly eighty-five per cent of the province of Ontario.

The minister no doubt realizes that there is no grain barn in Kapuskasing. I am speaking from personal knowledge; I visit that farm every year. Last year five thousand bushels of oats were practically lost on account of rain; they had to thresh the grain as soon as it came out of the field for want of a grain barn in which to store it. The minister will realize that an expenditure of only $1,200 on the buildings on that farm was simply ridiculous. I am very much in earnest in this appeal. When I was sitting on the government side I made similar efforts to get more money and I am glad to say I did get some more. We are not jealous in our section; we are glad that the government found it possible in the past to bonus the wheat growers of the west to the extent of several million dollars. Under the new marketing act northern Ontario will derive no benefit whatsoever, and the same applies to other legislation such as the farm loan act; we do not receive any benefit whatsoever from it. For the last five years I have been asking the government to spend the money absolutely needed for the administration of that farm. Surely the minister is fully seized of the necessities of the case. Kapuskasing is a rallying point for the rural classes in our section; people come there from hundreds of miles about; in some cases they travel five hundred miles in order to get there and see what is going on. The Kapuskasing farm is doing wonderful work in pushing back the frontier of this country. There is a great demand for pedigreed stock, for seed grain, for literature and so on, and with the limited funds that have been available this farm has been unable to comply with more than one-fifth of the requests that have been made each year.

There is another point to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister. Some of the men working on that farm have had their wages cut by twenty-nine per cent for the last five years. Three years ago ten per cent was taken from their wages; only five per cent was given back this year. In some cases an injustice is being done these workingmen; as I say, some of them are receiving twenty-nine per cent less than they were getting five years ago. The minister knows that the cost of living in northern Ontario is higher than it is in this part of the country. I am sure the minister will realize that I am sincere in regard to this matter, and I am appealing to him to see if he cannot find it possible, either under this item or under the public works program, to see that the workingmen at the Kapuskasing experimental farm are provided with decent living quarters.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I regret that it has not been possible for me to visit the Kapuskasing farm; it is one of the few I have not visited. I fully appreciate that it is one of the most valuable farms in the entire system from the point of service, and I believe it has been very actively supported by the farmers of that community. If conditions are as the hon. member has stated—and I have no doubt that his statements are correct—provision will be made under the public works vote for better accommodation for the labourers and those engaged at the farm. I shall be glad to take into serious consideration and to submit to the officials of the department the recommendation of my hon. friend in this connection.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): I should like a little information from the minister; I do not feel that he has given me the answer to which I am entitled. If he has not the information with him, perhaps at another time he will tell me how much money has been spent in that seven hundred miles between the Alberta boundary and Prince Rupert along the line of the Canadian National railway to assist the agricultural population by way of experimental plots; the places where that money has been spent; what was spent in 1934 and what it is intended to spend in 1935.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I have not that information with me, but I shall be glad to send it to the hon. member.

Item agreed to.

Cold storage warehouses—further amount required, $150,000.

Mr. YOUNG: I should like a little information in connection with this item.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Grants are given under the Cold Storage Act to assist cooperative organizations, in particular, when they feel that it is to their advantage to erect cold storage plants in certain localities for the preservation of agricultural products. During the past two years we have included in the general estimates only the amounts for which commitments actually had been made. It was felt that it would be unsatisfactory to estimate what might be required in addition for further work because up to that time few applications had been received. Therefore the rest of the vote was held over as long as possible in order to have as many applications as possible received and inspections made of the properties concerned. In that connection we believe that $150,000 will cover all the approved applications to date and leave a small balance over for applications known to be in the course of preparations in different parts of the country. The basis of the grant is this: After the property has been inspected, after the location has been found suitable and after the values have been found to be correct, under the Cold Storage Act a grant may be made up to thirty per cent of the total value of the building and equipment. Of that grant fifteen per cent is given in the first year; seven per cent in the second year and then I think four per cent, two per cent, and two per cent.

Mr. YOUNG: Is any of this money available for grants to individual farmers or producers for cold storage purposes?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No.

Mr. YOUNG: Is there a policy of making grants to individuals?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): No. This is under the Cold Storage Act, a separate act that is administered by the dairy branch of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. DUPUIS: Has the associated cooperative of Quebec received a grant?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I could not say. I may tell the hon. gentleman, however, that the application must be received and passed upon before any work is done, and very generous consideration is given by the department. Where we feel it is at all warranted we are anxious to give every possible assistance under this act.

[Mr. R. Weir.]

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the minister inform me, whenever it is convenient for him to do so, what amount if any has been granted the associated cooperative of Quebec?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. TAYLOR: I should like to ask the minister if the application of the Norfolk Fruit Growers' Association is being considered under this item.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I believe that is one of the applications that has been considered. If the application has been in for a length of time sufficient to enable the officials of the department to report on it, those making the application will have been advised. As I have said already, however, generous consideration is given all such applications, particularly those from fruit districts.

Item agreed to.

PENSIONS AND NATIONAL HEALTH

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Canadian Pension Commission—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health to explain this increase.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It is felt by the chairman of the commission and myself that better service might be given the pensioners and those who desire pensions if occasionally they might be examined by other doctors. Often after a doctor has examined an applicant three times he has a tendency to look at the man in the same way every time, and this is to obviate that possibility to a certain extent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will these be private doctors outside the department?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: No, these are the permanent men.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Militia Services—

Engineer services and works—further amount required, $400,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I wish to direct the attention of the committee to the huge share of these supplementary estimates devoted to military purposes. First we have this item of $400,000 for engineer services and works, further amount required; the next item is general stores, further amount required, $600,000. This is all in addition to what was voted in the main estimates, which was supposed to meet the requirements of the Department of National Defence. The next item is for non-permanent active militia, further amount required, $386,000; the next item is for permanent force, further amount required, $265,000. Those sums make a total of $1,651,000 for militia services. If you add to that the $145,000 for naval services and the $1,302,900 for aviation, you reach the enormous amount of $3,098,900 for militia, naval defence and aviation. If you add to that the other items which are voted to other departments, such as the $400,000 for a barracks in the good old city of Calgary which is so ably represented in this house, you reach the huge total of $4,500,000. That is almost one-third of the total amount to be voted in these supplementary estimates, a larger amount than that being voted for public works and much larger than the amounts provided for any other service of government. I desire to protest against this huge expenditure for military purposes, and I wish the minister would give the committee the reasons why such amounts are required at the present time.

Mr. STIRLING: In a general way these supplementary votes are necessary because of the dilapidation which has taken place during the past few years. For the last three or four years necessary economies have been affected and expenditures have been curtailed and we are endeavouring to restore the properties of the department, both physical and human, to the condition in which they were before. Under the engineering vote, $50,000 is required for the repair of buildings which have been allowed to deteriorate to a certain extent. If these buildings are not restored we shall have to spend a great deal more later on. The second item is $70,000 for construction work on the citadel in Quebec. I was interested in seeing the work which has been done in restoring the citadel. As the frost comes out each spring the masonry walls are in great danger of sliding down on to the streets of Quebec, and I am surprised that a major accident has not occurred already.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Is not that work on walls being carried on by the unemployed in the relief camp at the citadel?

Mr. STIRLING: A certain amount of work has been done in that way, but if these walls are to be prevented from falling into the streets the work will have to be done more quickly in order to complete it before next winter. The largest item in this engineering vote is to provide for the purchase of land at Rockcliffe in order to carry out the arrangements which have been arrived at by the federal district commission, the Department of Justice acting for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and the Department of National Defence. This scheme in connection with the Rockcliffe airport has taken some little time to consummate. The federal district commission has been most anxious to improve the entry into Ottawa from Montreal, and through the acquisition of certain pieces of land, through a give and take by all the parties mentioned, a suitable arrangement has been arrived at under which certain high land to the south of the Rockcliffe air field passes into the possession of the Department of National Defence. For some time this department has been desirious of removing certain high trees which were a menace at least to emergency landings, and they will now have control over any buildings which may be built on this land. The commission gets its new roadway as well as other pieces of land which in due course will probably be sold, and the money derived from the sale of these lands by the district commission will be a first charge against this expenditure. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police will be able to round out a piece of property close to their barracks which hitherto they have had to borrow from the Department of National Defence. They will get an area very well suited to their purposes and the Department of National Defence will retain control over building to be erected so that the landing facilities of the Rockcliffe field will not be jeopardized.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Do the three items referred to by the minister make up the total of $400,000?

Mr. STIRLING: That amount is made up by the $50,900 I mentioned for the repairs of buildings. I gave the figures roughly. There is $69,693 for the Quebec citadel. There is $12,500 being provided for the arsenal program, to which I shall refer later. This covers the removal of the dominion arsenal from Quebec to a point of greater safety at Valcartier. The transfer of the survey section to a new building at Rockcliffe will cost $9,150. The completion of the married men's quarters in St. Johns, Quebec, will cost $24,100. There are small travelling and freight allowances amounting to $1,250. The purchase of property at Rockcliffe, to which I have alluded, will cost $150,000. There is $9,000 being provided for the extension of a sea wall at the Charlottetown rifle range. A concrete sea wall was erected to prevent erosion but it was not carried quite far enough along the western end and the sea has been encroaching behind the existing wall. It is desirable that the wall should be protected. The replacement of an extremely aged heating system in the drill hall at Charlottetown will cost $5,550. The general renovation of the gun emplacements at the Sandwich battery at Halifax will cost $8,000. Provision is being made for a vote of $45,000 for the rebuilding of the wooden part of the armoury at Fredericton. This is a permanent construction with the exception of one end which is wood, and it is no longer money well spent to continue to repair this portion. As these premises are badly needed it is intended to tear down the wooden structure and replace it with a permanent structure. The construction of a concrete retaining wall and the erection of a competitors' hut and other repairs at the Truro rifle range will cost $2,000. The paving of Cogswell street and North Park street in front of the military properties in Halifax will cost $3,000. Then, there is provision for installation of mechanical stokers at Toronto; construction of an addition to provide a miniature rifle range at Kingston armoury; installation of water supply and electric current at Cedar Springs.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I am very sorry that the minister has not chosen to take into consideration the representations which I made on the main estimates when the ex-Minister of National Defence was in charge of the department, in regard to the extension of the armoury at Rimouski which was requested by the officer commanding the regiment and recommended by the officer commanding the district and the adjutant general. The ex-Minister of National Defence left me with the impression that this demand for an extension which is so urgently needed would perhaps receive recognition when the supplementary estimates were brought down. I am sorry that an item has not been included in the list of works mentioned, and I am sure the fact that it has not been included will cause bitter disappointment to the officers and non-commissioned officers of that regiment.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): This afternoon I participated in a discussion respecting a certain province within this confederation, and in my humble opinion that legislation which we voted on this afternoon was introduced because of the economic depression. To-night I have before me certain telegrams received from one of the eastern provinces, one of the maritimes, the province of New Brunswick, and from these, Mr. Chairman, I understand that there has been a military and political defeat in that province. What I am particularly concerned about at this time, and I rather had it in my mind this afternoon when the vote with respect to another province was being taken, is what might happen if we were confronted with a military emergency as well as an economic emergency. In an economic emergency one particular province has been excluded by the vote this afternoon from the operation of a federal act, and with that vote as a precedent, if we were confronted with a military emergency and conscription was applied in Canada, I wonder if the minister would vote to exclude one particular province from a federal act on conscription. I should like to ask on this vote if there is any intention to exclude the province of New Brunswick on account of the overwhelming defeat that has been inflicted upon the Conservative party in that province within the last few hours.

Mr. STIRLING: The answer is no.

Mr. McPHEE: I would like to suggest in regard to this vote that I support the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser), because I have just returned from the province of New Brunswick to-day—

Mr. SPOTTON: Oh, that is the reason!

Mr. McPHEE: —and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) is still down there. I was wondering if in the case of a war the Minister of Trade and Commerce could come back to Ottawa and the parliament of Canada.

Mr. COTNAM: How clever!

Mr. McPHEE: The province of Ontario boasts of its quintuplets, the Dionnes; Saskatchewan followed suit with five quintuplets of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation on June 19, 1934; the Prime Minister had quintuplet radio addresses last January, and now New Brunswick, I see by telegrams I have in my hand, has followed with a set of quintuplets—five Tories. The premier of the province and all the members of his cabinet have gone down to defeat. I would say to my hon. friend who is piloting this item through the committee that the people of this country and their representatives on this side of the house might very well say to him and his colleagues as Cromwell said: Get ye gone; give ye place to better men.

Mr. COTNAM: A case of inflation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to join with the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) in protesting against this very large increase in military expenditures. As he said, these three items alone constitute another $3,000,000. When we have asked that something more be done for the men who are now unemployed, we are told by the government that they have no money. There is trouble to-day, as we all know, in the city of Regina over the question of the trekkers. The trouble arose because of the unsatisfactory conditions in the camps in British Columbia. I think it is apparent to all that not only in British Columbia but everywhere else where the present system is in vogue there is a very great deal of dissatisfaction over the placing of these men in camps and giving them only twenty cents a day. A good deal of the work that is being done in the preparation of landing fields is being done by these men at twenty cents a day, which is all that is paid even for work requiring skilled labour. I do not intend to go into that matter again at this time because it has been gone into again and again, but I do urge that when we are told that we cannot make any more adequate provision for our unemployed because there is no money, that is an absolute sham when in these estimates we can vote $3,000,000 for military purposes.

Mr. DURANLEAU: For works.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some of it is for works, but why not works that will serve the needs of the people? We are living to-day in a period when there is no immediate danger of our being dragged into a great war.

Mr. COTNAM: How do you know?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As I said once before, if we were going to go into a world war the provision we have now would not take us very far in such a matter as that. The Department of National Defence says that they have no immediate program that contemplates our being dragged into a war in the international field. When the main estimates were under consideration the minister said that one of the reasons for such military expenditures was that we must maintain law and order in this country, and I fancy that that is one of the very real reasons why we are having such a huge additional expenditure on military forces in this country. If you want public works, build schools instead of arsenals; if you want public works, build homes instead of barracks. There is another way of providing public works than that which is being proposed to the committee here.

One cannot but feel that there is a very great discrepancy between the amounts that are being contributed to solve outstanding unemployment problems to-day and these amounts which are being voted for military purposes. I say that any government that will come down with supplementary estimates for military purposes to the extent of $3,000,000 have no right whatever to say that they cannot afford to pay unemployed men more than twenty cents a day—none whatever. Further than that, if we were paying them more than twenty cents a day, if we were paying them the wages which they quite reasonably ask that they should be paid, we would not have the need of expending money on military forces within this country. We have within the last few days seen a considerable increase in the mounted police force, and I was told by someone to-day that several unemployed firemen around the city of Ottawa are now going around in mounted police uniforms. As this gentleman said, it is an ill wind that blows nobody good. While we are increasing our mounted police, while the soldiers are standing by, ready if necessary to meet contingencies in western Canada arising because of this trouble with the trekkers—I do not want to be accused of encouraging disorder; I do not want to be accused of urging anyone to take action that will be opposed to law and order, but I do say—

Mr. COTNAM: Pour on a little gasoline.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —that if there is disorder at the present time it is the result of policies which for years have been carried out with regard to these unemployed men. The Minister of National Defence is, in a curious way, at the head of the department that deals with these unemployed men. That is the reason I have for taking the matter up at the present time; the two are closely related. If the present policy of giving men only twenty cents a day and putting them in camps is persisted in, the minister will also be expected to call out the forces if necessary.

Now I think that the Minister of National Defence has the reputation in this house of being fair; I have always so regarded him. I regret that his throat is in such bad condition, because I do not want to put him in the position of having to answer a number of questions; but, reading the report of the commission that studied the situation in British Columbia, I think the hon. gentleman was hardly fair when he made his statement regarding that report. The papers throughout the country heralded his words, but he gave a very small part of what the report contained. It seems to me that we should have had the whole report; for within even the narrow limits within which the commission worked there was found much that was very unsatisfactory indeed. And remember, these projects are closely connected with the matters we are considering in this vote. Take the question of food supply. It was said that the food was fairly satisfactory, but the commission said they had to make an exception of milk and meat, surely two very important items in the food supply. They said that the meat was not up to specification and that this formed a just cause of complaint. That was the report of the commission. With regard to cleanliness, they said that on the whole the camps were not in bad condition, and that, I believe, is true so far as Rockcliffe is concerned, of which mention has been made to-night. They did say, however, that in Point Grey rats had become a menace more particularly in the bunkhouses. Let me read from the report:

As to Point Grey camp (200), the men properly complained as to the unsanitary condition of the latrines and cess pools; also want of cleanliness in the washhouse and showers. We found that these were disgraceful —crude, unsightly and dirty. The wash basins were worn and chipped, and should have been discarded. All these essentials should be renovated, if not completely replaced.

They pointed to some of these little irritating things. For instance, there is the matter of tobacco. I do not happen to be a tobacco user myself, so that I cannot appreciate the difficulties in this regard as much as some others in the house can. But the commission stated that the men had to wait until they had been in the camp a sufficient length of time to cover the cost of a package of tobacco, at 1·45 cents per day. You can understand how these little irritations would cause dissatisfaction among the men. But much more important than that is the finding of the commission that——camp life, generally speaking, is not the normal condition under which men desire to live.

And again that——many men who are forced by circumstances to go to relief camps are utterly unfitted for either the type of life involved or the work expected to be done. Many have been trained in various trades or professions and find themselves utterly unsuited to the manner of life in the camps as to the tasks given them to do.

Then came the very difficult question of workmen's compensation, which is not provided for under the provincial laws but which at best comes in the form of a gratuity from the federal government.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member try to keep a little more closely to the item. At present he is a long way from it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I submit that this is very closely related to the item under discussion. The Department of National Defence has charge of these camps, one of the expenditures the minister mentioned being in connection with Rockcliffe camp, while others referred to the citadel of Quebec, both works being carried on with the class of labour I am discussing. And further than that, the reason for a large military establishment, as admitted by the minister, under the main estimates, was that the government might be able to maintain law and order. I am therefore not very far from the question under discussion.

To return, while the commission admitted that their power was limited and that they could not discuss the policy of the government, they did point out that the chief cause of discontent and unrest was the absence of an adequate wage for workers in the camps; and they expressed grave fear that morale and incentive would gradually disappear with the continuance of these camps. They pointed to the difficulty of the men in the camps, owing to isolation, keeping in touch with the labour market with a view to possible employment. And so on with other deficiencies in existing arrangements.

We now face a critical condition in the west arising out of a certain policy which has been carried on by the government for a considerable time. I frankly admit that as far as I can ascertain the men in control of the trekkers are communists or belong to one of the subsidiary communist organizations. But I urge that that fact should not blind us to the real evils that have been existing in the camps and which have caused the men so readily to listen to communist advice. That is the point. Personally, I do not think it is fair that the Prime Minister should centre attention upon the consideration that they were led largely by communists. That does not touch the main point at issue. And further than that, if there is necessity for calling out the mounted police or the troops within the next few hours, as the papers tell us there may be, that trouble will arise primarily because of the failure of the government to deal adequately with the problem in its earlier stages. That is important, and I do not see how you can get away from it in a discussion of this kind.

There are a number of points at issue. The Prime Minister said that these men would not be allowed to trespass, but the fact is that they were allowed to trespass all the way from Vancouver to Regina, and at that particular point the axe comes down. Who is responsible for permitting the trespass for a thousand miles or more? Why should they be stopped at that particular point? I do not think one can blame the men at this stage for wanting to do what they were permitted to do a little earlier. Again, the Prime Minister said that he could not interfere in British Columbia without the request of the provincial authorities, and yet he did interfere a few days later over the head of the premier of Saskatchewan. That is not consistent action. That is not the worst of it. It means that now there is danger of a clash in which lives may be sacrificed because of the bungling of the government in the earlier stage of the march. They will have to assume responsibility for trouble that may arise. Worst of all, when the delegates of the men get here what are they given? All we can say is, "Go back to your camps"—that is, go back to conditions which the commission itself described as not being satisfactory. They must go back to the conditions which led them in the first place to leave the camps.

I wish the house could get some idea of how the men really feel in these camps. I do not know whether the chairman thinks I am going too far afield, but let me again remind the committee that these are projects such as the Rockcliffe camp in which the men are required to carry forward under the twenty cents a day scheme.

There recently came into my hands a little pamphlet published by a man whom I know out in British Columbia. It consists of a diary of one of these men, and I think it might be entitled Idle Thoughts of an Idle Fellow. It describes just how these men feel with regard to being put into these projects:

> Hear that a meeting is to be held in one of the bunkhouses about the coming strike. Lots of the boys who have been here for some time, have come to the conclusion they had better make a change before it is too late. When you stay in one of these camps too long you get to feel lost, lost, lost. To really understand what I mean, you would have to come and live in one for a year. There are men in here who have worked all their lives and are no better off than I am to-day. Capable men in many fields of work, just going to hell because they have no real jobs—how intriguing! What an incentive to prepare in a manner to be able to give your country the best that is in you.

That is a very human way of putting the situation. Are we to put Canadians into uniform to shoot down men who think that way? That is the real question that comes before us.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Tories will.

Mr. COTNAM: That is politics.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, over there. I am not worrying about that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He has been helping you.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not talking politics to-night.

Mr. COTNAM: The hon. member is capitalizing on this.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think anyone can accuse me of capitalizing on this. These men in practice have no votes, because this house refused to put polling booths into the camps, so that the men have no votes. That settles that charge. These camp workers are deprived of the voting privilege, and let me point out that that is one recourse they might have had; they might at least have used the voting method of securing redress or improving their conditions. Of that they have been deprived. Is it any wonder that some of them are led to take direct action? Somebody suggests that one is playing politics. The first intimation I had of being asked to cooperate in a matter of this kind came from one of the communists and it was written on a letter head entitled Communist Federal Election Committee. As everybody knows, the communists are actively opposing us in connection with this election, so that when I am speaking of these matters I am not speaking in any way for the communist party; I desire that to be clearly understood. I had a communication a little bit later from the secretary of the National Unemployment Council of Canada asking for cooperation regarding their trek. This is the reply I gave:

> When your organization last visited Ottawa and two of you came to interview me re my addressing a meeting of your group, I explained to you at some length that the policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation was not to cooperate with communist-dominated organizations of which we regarded the National Unemployment Council of Canada as one. Our policy has not changed.
> With regard to the attitude of the British Columbia provincial council—may I say that your information is entirely erroneous.

That reference to the British Columbia provincial council was this, that our Co-operative Commonwealth Federation people in British Columbia did cooperate with the strikers in so far as they attempted to give them a good hearing and to see if possible that the evils under which they suffer might be redressed. But they soon found that the communist groups, to use the common phrase, double crossed them. I had a letter from our secretary regarding the matter. This may be of interest to the committee as giving an idea of the situation:

The Canadian Commonwealth Federation has extended the utmost support, morally and financially, to your committee. No attempt has been made to dictate or interfere with your policy and tactics. The desire, as frequently expressed, has been simply to help the strikers in every way possible, with all the resources at our disposal, and only in a manner satisfactory to the strikers.

The action taken in a meeting of the strikers indicates that the cooperation and support of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is unwelcome, and is therefore repudiated by the strikers. It has also been indicated that prominent leaders of the strikers are more interested in capitalizing the situation to the disadvantage of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation than to the advantage of the strikers and the winning of the strike.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has given concrete evidence of support for the strikers and their demands and is prepared to continue that support, if acceptable, but finds it impossible to proceed with plans now under consideration, in the face of repudiation by those whom this support has been tendered.

They were thus forced in British Columbia definitely to repudiate cooperation before the trek eastward started at all. I confess that those of us who are trying to represent labour find ourselves in a difficult situation. We have had a great deal of sympathy with the men in these camps.

The CHAIRMAN: Surely the hon. member is going too far altogether in making a speech on this.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let him continue.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will not go much further along this line. This whole digression came because of an interjection by an hon. member opposite. I say that our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group have tried to express sympathy with the men in the camps. We have raised this question again and again in the house. We did it on the national defence estimates. The difficulty is that as soon as we make any move along this line there are those, like one of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who accuse us of sympathizing with communist methods.

I want to return to the description of what these men in the national defence camps feel. This is from the diary from which I was quoting:

Here is a summary of the system under which these camps operate: We are not allowed to call meetings, but still they are called. We talk revolution and all its attending evils (?) without being hindered. We go on strike whenever the mood strikes our fancy. Are evicted. Go to town and get relief until we are reinstated, then back to some other camp.

That is the way in which things have been going on for some time. Again:

But it is not only the conditions of these camps that make us get up and howl for something to be done about our state. It is really the fact that we are getting no place in the plan of life—we are truly a lost legion of youth—rotting away for want of being offered a sane outlet for our energies. Something to do and something for that doing.

Surely that is a legitimate ambition for every young Canadian—something to do and something in return for doing it. I would remind the committee that most of the men are young. The average age is about twenty-three, just boys. If it were not that I am getting my indemnity, I fancy one or two of my boys would be out in these camps because there is practically nothing for boys to do when they get out of school or university. This is the situation we find ourselves in. These camp boys are not hoodlums; they are not criminals; they are simply boys out of a job; and we are refusing in any large way to adopt any policy that will give them a job. We content ourselves with preparing, if they persist in their march eastward, to send out troops to shoot them down. That way of treating them is surely not worthy of the Canadian people. This man later on writes again:

The bank that we are working on is so hard that we couldn't do anything to it even if we wished. Machines have been made so man could do things on a large scale, and here we are playing around with picks and shovels. Here we are, the youth of a young nation—we either stay here or else are forced to bum around the country begging or stealing.

A great and lasting force has risen from this oppression—the seed is planted—the germination has been more successful even than hoped for. The authorities are beginning to worry over the fact that the youth of the land are leaning to communism. What did the fools think we would do? Take it lying down?

And again on April 3:

The day is nearing! This grand and glorious walkout will tell when all the boys land in the city of Vancouver. We have learned that we can't get anywhere by simply striking and holding the strike within the bounds of the camps. We must wake the public to action—show them proof of our pitiable state. Hundreds will darken the tops of the box cars as they wheel towards the big city. "On to Vancouver" is the slogan. Will Vancouver turn us down? Many are the men who have been sent from the.....area to the big house on the hill at Essondale. One of the boys went nuts there this winter and had two guards over him till the snow was off the trail. Such is the result of living as we have to under unnatural conditions. What I could show the public if I only had a camera!

I must thank the chairman and members of the committee for their courtesy in permitting me to read these extracts from this boy's diary. What I want to impress upon the committee is that these boys are ordinary Canadian boys, caught by the depression, unable to continue their schooling, unable to find a job; the state itself not providing any very material help but simply hustling them off into the country in remote camps where they may be less likely to cause trouble. Is that the way to deal with good Canadian boys? I do not wonder that they want to call the attention of the nation to their pitiable condition. And how have we received them? I do not think I can speak too strongly of the despicable way in which the Prime Minister received those men the other day. I regret that their leader was a man with a criminal record; that of course discounts him. I regret that they are under the leadership of communists, and undoubtely communists have their affiliations—

Mr. DUPUIS: May I ask a question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Just a moment.

Mr. DUPUIS: Just a question, if the hon. member will allow me. What would the hon. member have done if he had been the prime minister?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, it is very difficult to say. My colleague suggests, wait until I become prime minister.

Mr. COTNAM: That is an evasive answer.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say the first thing was to receive them with the courtesy due to any delegation that comes to the prime minister of this country.

Mr. POULIOT: Hand them cigars.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The fact that one of those men had a criminal record was held to the forefront not only in the interview but all across the country as discounting the entire group.

Mr. GRAY: He represented the men.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He may have been chosen to represent them, but if the men did not choose any better representatives than some in this house, you can understand the difficulty.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I take exception to the hon. gentleman connecting any hon. member of this chamber with the leader of that group. If I understood the hon. member correctly he drew a parallel between the leader of that group, who admitted he had a criminal record, and hon. members of this House of Commons. I ask the hon. member to retract that inference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no inference at all.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): It is beneath the dignity of any hon. member of this house to make any such inference.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no such inference.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): It was a plain statement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am afraid the hon. gentleman is a bit exhilarated over the victory in New Brunswick.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I don't have to get exhilarated as far as you are concerned. I ask that the hon. member withdraw the inference he made.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no inference to withdraw.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Well, repeat the statement.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I will repeat it as nearly as I can remember. The question was asked with regard to this man representing the camp workers. I tried to suggest that they had no opportunity of knowing of his criminal record; he was selected simply because he was more active than the rest My suggestion was that they had no very good method of choosing their representative and in fact did not do much better than was done in the choosing of members of this house.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): Mr. Chairman, in accepting the anaemic explanation of the hon. member may I say that if he thinks he can stand there with a smug grin on his face after making an inference comparing the leader of that group—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): —a man with a criminal record—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Wait a minute.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): I have the floor.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Chairman, I have the floor.

Mr. FRASER (Northumberland): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I still insist that the hon. member withdraw that inference. Where do you think you are, in a dock strikers' meeting?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There is no point of order, I think. The question was asked, "What should have been done?" The men made much more reasonable requests than might have been imagined. When they suggested fifty cents an hour they were probably stating the maximum amount, but I notice fifty cents an hour is being seriously considered in Ontario in connection with relief work. Fifty cents an hour for a six hour day and five day week after all amounts to only sixty dollars a month. That is not so very much more than is being spent now per man under this present scheme. And if we did pay these men sixty dollars a month it would take an enormous number of men to exhaust the sum of three million dollars that we are asked to vote to-night. That is the reason that I brought this matter up under this vote. In the supplementary estimates three million dollars can be appropriated for military affairs, but we cannot pay sixty dollars a month to men who are giving or are prepared to give good service in this country.

Then, further, the men asked for workmen's compensation.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is provincial.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Although that is a provincial matter, the report of the commissioners points out that it constitutes one of the difficulties. Some definite arrangement ought to be arrived at regarding it. At the present time it is a mere gratuity. The relief workers are working side by side with men who have the right to compensation, which they have not. It is a legitimate grievance.

The third point was the recognition of camp committees. Complaints would be heard at any time, the Prime Minister said. But the men asked that they should be represented by their committee. A case was brought to my attention only this afternoon, and I give full credit to the minister for very kindly and promptly taking it up. A man was discharged from a nearby camp. He came to me in the lobby a few hours ago and said he was quite guiltless of the crime charged, that no proof whatever was adduced; he was simply told to get out, and he felt quite confident that that would mean that he could not get back to any other relief camp. It is to prevent abuses of that kind that we seek to have some change in the regulations.

Mr. COTNAM: You do not know the case yet; you are only giving one side.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am giving the side that has been omitted.

Mr. COTNAM: The side that suits you.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then, they ask for separation of the camps from control of the Department of National Defence. I think that is a legitimate request; we in this corner have been urging it for years. We do not think unemployed men should be put under the control of the National Defence department. Why should they? The officers over them may be kindly men, but they are not accustomed to the problems which these young men face. Army discipline should not apply in these camps; the training and discipline of army officers does not particularly qualify them to deal with this class of men.

Then, social insurance; that was immediately rejected. I suppose that meant non-contributory unemployment insurance. We in this corner have advocated that for some time. They ask also for guarantee of the relief camp workers' right to vote. That strikes deep at the very foundation of our Canadian citizenship. We have, in practice, disfranchised this whole group of men. They feel that they have no way of expressing themselves at the polls, and so they have taken direct action. Is it to be wondered at?

The Prime Minister says that law and order should be maintained. For years I have stood out for the peaceful settlement of international affairs and also for the peaceful settlement of affairs in our own country.

Mr. COTNAM: Like the Winnipeg strike.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Winnipeg strike is too big a matter to enter upon at this time. That is a silly interjection; it has nothing to do with my position. So far as I am concerned I have nothing whatever to be ashamed of in connection with the Winnipeg strike. If the hon. gentleman cares to read the issue of the Winnipeg Tribune just arrived—a Conservative paper—he will find that in the leading editorial, notwithstanding the Winnipeg strike and all that, I am commended for having taken the stand that I am taking these days regarding this matter. I do not see why in this house we cannot discuss any question on its merits without some member interjecting entirely irrelevant things into the discussion.

Mr. ROWE: What about the merits of the item?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I have already explained that this is closely connected with these camps to which to-night we are asked to give an additional grant. Further than that, the only reason that I can see—and the minister has given no very good reason—for extending the military forces of this country is to be able, as the Prime Minister says, to maintain law and order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I want to maintain law and order just as much as anyone who says "hear, hear," but what kind of law and order? It is law and order under which there can be, as there has been in the past, exploitation of the poor with no opportunity for the poor to better their condition? Is that the kind of law and order we want in this country? Is it law and order under which we will have something very like a military dictatorship while tens of thousands of our young boys are prevented from living a normal life, herded into these camps, some of them kept there for four long years, without any opportunity of advancing their education and without any hope of getting any further on in life? Before it is too late I ask the government to reconsider its entire position and, in all fairness, not to let the whole burden of blame fall on a few people at the present time who perhaps have taken unwise steps but who have been incited to do so because of the bad conditions that have prevailed for the last four years. Again I protest against the increase in this item for military expenditures.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, while I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has wandered pretty far from the item under discussion, I am very glad that he has had the opportunity of discussing this item as he has discussed it. I am glad the opportunity has been afforded him of stating, as clearly as he has stated to-night, that the present strike marchers' movement from the west towards Ottawa is essentially a communistic movement, led by communistic influence and communistic organizations.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Under control of them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think probably the organizations to which he refers are those we know as the unemployed association in Toronto, the Workers' Unity League, the Workers' Defence League, the Young Communist League and a number of others the names of which I cannot remember for the moment. There was a time when they openly called themselves communists, but in the province of Ontario the communist society or association was pronounced an unlawful association by the highest courts in the province, and that judgment still stands. So when these communistic leaders reached Ottawa a week or ten days ago they were openly members of an unlawful association.

Altogether apart from that, however, the whole movement eastward has been in defiance, and in rather open defiance, of the law of the land. From information that comes to me—and it comes once a week—I have not a doubt but that the disruption of the camps, of which my hon. friend has spoken to-night, was the result of communistic propaganda. It is the result of the efforts of the Bucks, the Boychuks, the Ewens, the Popovichs and the rest of them. I have known of it for some time; there have been no overt acts in regard to which I could start legal proceedings, but it has culminated in this so called marchers' strike, and the leaders of that striking party are outstanding communists. So I am glad my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre has made the matter clear in his speech to-night.

Now the hon. member asks why the strike marchers were not stopped before they reached Regina. This move was organized in the city of Vancouver without notice to anybody; a thousand of them—between eight hundred and one thousand, to be more accurate—boarded Canadian Pacific railway trains one night. There was no force there to stop them. They went eastward through the province of British Columbia, and it was suggested that they should be stopped in British Columbia. There was no force to stop them. They came eastward again to Calgary, and they practically worked their will on that city. They established pickets around the employment bureau; they demanded rights, food, sustenance, and said if they did not get their demands they would help themselves. We had no force there to stop them; we had not taken any steps through the mounted police or the militia. They came eastward again to Regina. At that point both railway companies complained and said they were entirely unable to cope with the difficulty. By this time the number had swollen to some 1,500, recently increased to over 2,000, I believe. The railway constabulary could not cope with the situation. Both railways applied to the government. Both railways applied to the provincial government at Regina without any result. We thought it was our duty to maintain law and order and to prevent unlawful travel upon the railways of Canada by those strikers in contravention of the clear provision of the Railway Act under which both our railways operate.

When these representations were made to the government the government asked the mounted police to assist in preserving order and in preserving the safety of railway traffic not only for passengers but for employers and for trekkers as well, and to see that railway property was not further trespassed upon. We had to place sufficient of the mounted police at Regina to see that the law would be regarded, and they are there yet. The delegation came to Ottawa, as my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre has described, and the demands they made were the demands he has discussed this evening. Following their return to Regina they have announced that they are going to persevere in their effort to reach Ottawa, whether by rail or by highway travel I do not know. At the request of the railways, however, and in the interests of the citizens of Regina and of Canada in general, the mounted police have been instructed to see that the law is maintained and that these men do not come eastward in breach of the law.

As the Prime Minister announced in this house a day or two ago, a camp has been established where they will be fed, housed and cared for in every reasonable way until a final disposition is made of their case in regard to where they will go ultimately. They can go back to the camps whence they came, or there will be no objection to their going to other camps. Those marchers who have homes and desire to return there will be assisted. These things have been made public to the marchers in Regina. A number of them are ready to go to the camp but they are not permitted to do so by the communist leaders. Their baggage has been seized and they cannot get their kits. The office opened for the purpose of arranging to put these men in the camp has been picketed by the communist leaders and their men. That is the situation which obtained in Regina at four o'clock this afternoon. The law will be maintained and the marchers have been notified to that effect. Accommodation is offered to them; they will be fed and housed in the excellent camp established. If they do not go to that camp and persist in breaking the law I am afraid they must take the consequences.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to ask the minister what circumstances have arisen since the time at which the main estimates were presented to parliament to necessitate the large increases which have been made in these items. As has been pointed out, these additional sums asked for amount to $1,651,000 for militia services; $145,000 for naval services and $1,302,900 for aviation; a total of over $3,000,000 is being asked for in addition to the amounts voted in the main estimates presented to this house some four months ago. Those main estimates showed considerable increases over the appropriations of the previous year and at that time we were told by the minister that the increases were necessitated by the very things which he has stated to-night, namely, the necessity for normal replacements and additions. I should like to know what circumstances have arisen in the last few months to necessitate these large supplementary votes on top of the increased votes in the main estimates. The main estimates for 1935-36 showed an increase over the appropriations of 1934-35 of $117,136 for militia services, an increase of $28,000 for naval services and an increase of $738,000 for aviation. Those increases amounted to something over $883,000, but the estimates were passed in the belief that they would cover all that was necessary for these services. Instead of that being so, we are being asked to-night to vote not an amount equal to the increases in the general estimates but an amount of over $3,000,000. There must be some explanation for this very large increase. The main estimates for these three services total something like $14,250,000 while these supplementary estimates total over $3,000,000, or nearly one-fifth of the main estimates. What has arisen during the last four months to necessitate an increase of one-fifth over the main estimates?

Mr. STIRLING: So far I have been able to give an explanation of only one item, as the discussion has strayed very far afield to the relief camps of British Columbia and the incidents now occurring in Regina. I shall be glad to give an explanation of each of these items as it comes up. The right hon. gentleman asked why I use the same argument to-night to explain these increases as I used before. The reason is that the dilapidations had occurred then and have occurred since. At that time I argued that these buildings, this equipment and these properties of the department should be put in a proper state of repair. When the main estimates were being considered over four months ago the government was not of the opinion that the money should be forthcoming for the degree of restoration which I thought was proper. I continued to press this matter believing that it was penny wise and pound foolish not to keep up the properties as they should be kept up, not to permit the training of the non-permanent active militia and allow it to drop below a certain point, and to allow the ships of the Royal Canadian Navy to get into such a condition that subsequent restoration would cost considerably more than at present. The government has seen fit to advance the amount necessary for what can be roughly termed restoration from beginning to end, whether it be material, property or human personnel.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one item here for the permanent force, further amount required, $265,000. What dilapidation has taken place in the permanent force to require that amount?

Mr. STIRLING: Are we going to jump from item to item, or shall we take them all as one general item?

The CHAIRMAN: Perhaps we had better deal with one item at a time.

Mr. CHURCH: If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) had his way, our defence force would be reduced to the boy scouts and girl guides. I would direct the attention of the hon. member to the fact that away back in 1870 and 1885 Canada and the northwest territories were saved from dislocation by the very volunteers he is criticizing to-night. The city of Toronto furnished the Queen's Own, the Grenadiers and the Bodyguard, the latter commanded by the late Colonel Denison. These men had to march 250 miles through the wilderness and across frozen country, with little else but dog biscuits and hard tack to eat, in order to save the very territory from which the hon. gentleman comes and avenge the death of that great patriot, Thomas Scott. Let me tell the hon. gentleman that Toronto sent 65,000 men to the great war and 6,000 never returned. They went to fight in a great cause, for freedom and for civilization; many of them are buried in France and Flanders and there are hundreds more in Christie street hospital who will never come out of that institution well. They went to the war to fight for the hon. member and others. Since I first came to this house I have seen these estimates reduced from $16,000,000 down to about $8,000,000. These militia units are commanded by business men and patriots and quite often they are forced to put their hands into their own pockets in order to provide the necessities for their regiments. But the officers, non-commissioned officers and men do this gladly for their country. They are just as fond of peace and security and just as opposed to war and militarism as the pacifists in this house and out of it, for whose freedom they fought on land and sea and in the air. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that we do not know where to find the Liberal party on this question of militia estimates. It is a game of ins and outs as far as they are concerned. They do not care a hoot what becomes of the defences of this country. The government has already reduced the militia estimates from fifteen to approximately eight million dollars, and the result has been that the service has been starved. Many of our returned men are suffering to-day; many are dying daily, and thousands are in their graves. Seven men were carried out of Christie street hospital last week-end. The women and children of these seven families are suffering untold privations.

Something has been said in this house about soldier pensions. I have here a return that was brought down to an order of the house, and it shows that the great government presided over by the present Prime Minister has done more for pensions and relief than has been done by any government since the war closed. The figures show that Mr. Justice Taylor of the pension commission has settled more cases, that more pensions have been granted on compassionate grounds, and more clothing has been given. There is a vote in the estimates of $500,000 to take care of those on relief and others not otherwise provided for.

I want to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, whose speeches I often read, that we have had sixteen years now of this peace talk, peace agreements, peace pacts, and pacifist talk; we have had four or five international conferences on disarmament, and the net result has been the absolute failure of the open diplomacy policy of Woodrow Wilson. So far as I am concerned I have never been enthusiastic about the League of Nations. They had similar leagues of nations ever since the days of Hannibal and Scipio in the old Roman empire. It was said in the olden days that Rome, Italy and Greece would never lose their supremacy, that Spain and Carthage would never lose command of the sea, but both happened. Let me say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that England to-day has lost command of the sea. I have here the official figures for Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, United States and Germany, showing the ships of the line, the cruisers, the destroyers, the submarines and aircraft, and without reading all these figures I may summarize them by saying that the net result is that England has lost command of the sea as a result of pacifist talk and doings. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, assisted by some Liberals and Progressives, is very fond of talking pacifism. They look upon anyone in the militia to-day as almost a public enemy. But, Mr. Chairman, the militia is a police force necessary for the protection of this country. I do not know what is going to happen to Canada, with her little navy and small army, now that England has lost her command of the sea.

While I do not wish to criticize the league unnecessarily because in many ways it has done useful work for humanity, I say now, as I said the other day with respect to the deplorable situation of the league, that it depends upon compromise rather than upon justice. The league refuses to face the facts. It insists on the theoretical equality of all nations, and yet whenever it has had to deal with a problem of first importance it has failed. The League of Nations to-day is reduced to the allies who won the war, France, Italy and Great Britain. It was Woodrow Wilson who started the league, but the United States have persistently refused to join it; Japan has quit it; Italy is on the verge of quitting it, and so the league to-day is reduced to those allies which won the war. Neither the United States nor Russia will join the league. Japan will not rejoin it. She demands the application of the Monroe doctrine in the far east. So you can see the absolute failure of the very policies which Woodrow Wilson propounded, and those of the pacifists in this house.

Now what have we got in Canada in the way of defence forces to-day? We have practically no defence forces at all in case of trouble. We have even abolished the little bit of a vote we had for the cadet movement. It never was a military movement, but it taught respect for authority, discipline, courtesy and many other of those manly instincts that go to make a man, but to-day this cadet movement has been abolished even in the city from which I come. That in my opinion is a retrograde step. Hon. gentlemen opposite are opposing such institutions for the good of the children as the girl guides and the boy scouts, and many other praiseworthy movements of that kind. Canada's vote for defence is the lowest per capita in the world.

In conclusion I should like to quote a few paragraphs from an article, Sea Power Surrendered, by Captain B. Acworth, D.S.O., R.N., which gives statistics of the naval strength of the great nations of the world. Where will Canada be now if a foreign foe sails up the St. Lawrence, with our little navy? Our British navy now uses oil from Persia and South America instead of coal, and is dependent on a foreign supply of oil in war, as Captain Acworth says. I quote:

Indeed, this danger is clearly apparent to the government; for has not Mr. Baldwin warned the country that so long as he has any responsibility in the nation's affairs he will not sanction the use of the British navy for blockade without first consulting America? Has not Great Britain taken up the cudgels against our old friend Japan on behalf of the oil combines, though the British Empire contains only two per cent of the oil resources of the world? Has not Mr. Baldwin flatly refused to see a deputation consisting of distinguished admirals, shipowners, and marine engineers who only asked to be allowed to place before him a reasoned case for designing all future ships for alternative coal and oil firing? Has he not expressed the determination of the government, despite all reasoned argument, to retain the British navy on an exclusively oil-fired basis to the exclusion of dual-firing which would place fuel monopolists under the thumb of British sea power instead of the reverse?

So long as British sea power is governed by international influences over which the public, at the present time, has no control, the technicalities of a sound naval policy are therefore irrelevant.

There was a time when British foreign policy rested upon British sea supremacy. In those days there was an atmosphere of peace about the world which we to-day have every reason to envy.

The chief object of British foreign policy is now, seemingly, the defence of this country without the support of sea-power—a policy called "collective security." So great a change in the British attitude to defence must clearly have an argument, and the argument seems to be the rise of air-power. Some appear to think that sea power can no longer provide security. Others believe that air power is a buttress of sea power which we can afford to diminish if air power is increased. Both these views are demonstrably unsound. To-day Great Britain is more dependent for her food and raw material upon sea transport than at any time in her history. Our ability to pursue our civilized activities, and to defend ourselves, whether by means of the navy, the army, or the air force, is absolutely dependent upon sea-borne foreign oil.

Just fancy an enemy fleet sailing up the St. Lawrence, and Canada dependent on Persia and South America for oil.

The mechanization of the army, and a strengthened air force, make increased, not decreased, demands upon sea transport and sea defence. Yet the government, by subsidy, is encouraging a "scrap and build policy" for merchant ships, a cardinal condition of the subsidy being the construction of an "up-to-date" (? Diesel) vessel for every two coal-fired ships destroyed.

We in Canada are dependent on the British fleet for keeping open our trade routes and our commerce and protecting our shores, and we do not pay a cent of taxes for its upkeep, but the British taxpayer is heavily taxed for that purpose; he pays taxes on his tea and sugar and many other commodities to protect our shores while Canada sponges on the British taxpayer for defence and for maritime freedom. Let me say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the volunteers who went to the west in 1870 and again in 1885 tried to get a small vote of $1,000. As a child I saw them going to the Northwest rebellion. And long afterwards an effort was made to have a plaque put up in Queens park to these veterans of 1870 and 1885 and their application was refused. It was not the fault of this government. They were also refused a small grant to send the survivors of that little force from Halifax and Montreal out to Winnipeg where they fought to save this country, and that section of the country represented by the hon. member. I can tell the hon. gentleman that I heard the same speeches away back in 1910, 1911, 1912 and again in 1913 and 1914. I heard the same speeches at the time of the South African war. But facts must be faced, and we cannot sponge on the mother country so far as our defence is concerned.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will any of the work carried out under this item be done by relief labour on the basis of twenty cents a day?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think I could better illustrate what I should like to say in reference to these estimates as a whole than by the observations made by the minister on this particular item. The first item under National Defence is engineer services and works, further amount required, $400,000. This is a supplementary item that has come in since the main estimates were presented four months ago. The total amount asked for in the main estimates in connection with engineer services for 1935-36 was $297,500, which was exactly the amount voted in the previous year. If in 1934-35 $297,500 was enough, and inasmuch as the government in its main estimates asked for the same amount this year, surely it was not treating the house fairly or taking the house into the confidence of the government, as it should have been in respect of supply, not to have told us that when the supplementary estimates were brought down we should be asked to vote an amount twice as large as we were voting in the main estimates. If the minister can give a satisfactory explanation I will not press the matter; but to ask this house to pass, for engineer services and works, $297,500 in the main estimates and get it through on the understanding that the government was not asking for more than was voted the previous year, and now to come in with supplementary estimates and ask for $400,000 as a further amount required, is simply not treating the house as it should be treated in the matter of supply.

Mr. STIRLING: I am sure the right hon. gentleman was in when I gave the explanation. He must have heard that $150,000 was for the arrangements at Rockcliffe of which he knows, and which were entirely new and separate from the main estimate. I have told him the reason why in my opinion it was necessary to lay further figures before the government with regard to dilapidations in buildings, and I have told him why I put forward a request for further money for the citadel of Quebec after my visit of inspection there and seeing the extent of the damage. If these explanations are not sufficient to convince the right hon. gentleman, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are not sufficient, because my hon. friend now says that out of the $400,000, $150,000 is required for Rockcliffe and something for the Quebec walls. Assuming that $50,000 is required for the Quebec walls—

Mr. STIRLING: Seventy thousand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That makes $220,000, and the item is for $400,000. There is an extra $200,000, all but $20,000 unaccounted for by the explanation. It is therefore not satisfactory.

Mr. STIRLING: Let me repeat. The right hon. gentleman was in his place when I read every item of the $400,000 and he asks me now to repeat them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he did not read every item.

Mr. STIRLING: I beg your pardon, I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He read a number of items but he did not give the figures.

Mr. STIRLING: I beg your pardon, I did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the minister read it again?

Mr. STIRLING: Is that reasonable?

An hon. MEMBER: If you can't be polite you won't pass one item.

Mr. STIRLING: The items which go to make up the $400,000 are:

Ordinary repairs to military buildings, $50,957.
Fortifications at Quebec, $69,693.
Further contribution for the arsenal program at Valcartier, $12,500.
Transfer of survey section of building in Rockcliffe, $9,150.
Completion of married quarters, St. John's, Quebec, $24,100.
Travelling and freight, $1,250.
Purchase of property at Rockcliffe, $150,000.
Extension of Charlottetown rifle range, $9,000.
Replacement of worn out heating system at drill hall, Charlottetown, $5,550.
Renovation of gun emplacements at Sandwich battery at Halifax, $8,000.
Rebuilding wooden section of Fredericton armoury, $45,000.
Construction of concrete retaining wall, Truro rifle range, $2,000.
Paving of Cogswell street and North Park street, in front of military properties at Halifax, $3,000.
Installation of mechanical stokers at University avenue armoury, Toronto, $4,000.
Construction of addition to provide for rifle range, Kingston armoury, $4,000.
Installation of water supply and electric current at Cedar Springs, Ontario, $1,800.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I call attention to the fact that the first item mentioned by my hon. friend was $50,000 for ordinary repairs. Now I contend that in submitting the main estimates, ordinary repairs at least would be expected to be included. Why should we have at the present time an item for ordinary repairs of $50,000 over and above any amount required for that purpose in the main estimates? It certainly looks as though the government, at the time the main estimates were before us, had purposely refrained from giving the committee the full amounts it intended to spend during the year. There is another project covered by what the minister has just read. The item is classified as engineer services and works and includes $150,000 for the purchase of property at Rockcliffe. I submit that that item should not be smuggled into this particular estimate. If the government is purchasing property at Rockcliffe that fact ought to have been expressly stated to the house at the time the main estimates were submitted and not delayed until the supplementary estimates were brought down. I do not think the minister's explanation is at all satisfactory.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Will the minister kindly say what the $150,000 with reference to purchasing property at Rockcliffe is for?

Mr. STIRLING: I shall be happy to repeat the explanation I have already given, that it is to consummate an arrangement arrived at between the federal district commission, the Department of Justice on behalf of the mounted police and the Department of National Defence on behalf of the Rockcliffe air field. The district commission has been desirous for some time of improving its entry into Ottawa from the Montreal direction. The Rockcliffe air field is improved in that the high land with the trees on it will pass into the custody of the Department of National Defence and the piece of property at the west end which has been loaned by National Defence to Justice for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police barracks will pass into the custody of the Department of Justice. It appears to be an arrangement which is mutually satisfactory to the three parties making it, and as regards the odd pieces of land, shall I call them, which will remain in the hands of the federal district commission, severances and the strips along the new road which presumably the commission will dispose of from time to time, the money received from those pieces of land will come into the consolidated revenue fund to repay the dominion government this $150,000; that money will be earmarked for that purpose.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Do I understand that this is a new transaction altogether for the purchase of new land?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, it is the purchase of new land.

Mr. CHEVRIER. Will the minister say from whom those lands were purchased or are about to be purchased? Has a sale been consummated or is it just contemplated? In the second place, from whom is it contemplated to purchase the land or, if it has been purchased, who are the vendors?

Mr. STIRLING: I do not understand that the purchases have actually been made. I believe expropriation proceedings have been or are about to be undertaken. I can send across to my hon. friend the plan I hold in my hand if that will interest him. It shows in colours the land now occupied, the land to be purchased and the land which will be retained by the commission.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I appreciate the minister's courtesy in letting me see the plan, but he has not answered my question. From whom were the lands purchased and at what prices? I do not see on this plan the names of the vendors or of those who owned the property and at what amounts the lands have been actually sold. The minister spoke of expropriation proceedings. I have not heard of those proceedings. If they have been sanctioned by order in council, I should like to know.

Mr. STIRLING: I may say for the hon. member's information that the order in council was signed just within the last day or two.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would like the minister to inform the committee who owned those lands, what proportion of them have been purchased and the price in each case.

Mr. BENNETT: They are being expropriated.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If they have been expropriated, when was this done?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The order in council was passed yesterday, and expropriation proceedings will be taken as soon as that order in council reaches the Department of Justice; it had not reached there to-day. Then a plan is filed showing the names of the owners and the land to be purchased, and a tender of what we consider a fair price is always made.

Mr. CHEVRIER: But I am still concerned about the answer as to who are the owners of those lands. There must be some vendors. There must be some agreement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The lands are to be expropriated.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There must be some expropriation proceedings directed against someone.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When the plans are filed, all the owners whose names appear on the plans need to be notified.

Mr. DUFF: Who are they?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We do not need to know until the proceedings are undertaken.

Mr. DUFF: The government is asking us to vote this money. We want to know the names.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am sorry I cannot tell my hon. friend.

Mr. DUFF: Then the vote will not go through.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I cannot help that.

Mr. DUFF: Of course the minister knows the names of the people who own the land.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Mr. DUFF: We want to know the names of the owners of those lands.

Mr. BENNETT: How can we get the names?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not think the item should pass without the information being given by the minister. I think the question put by the hon. member was a fair one, and the item should stand if the answer cannot be given to-night.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not know the names of the owners of the pieces of land. I have before me a plan in which certain names appear. I could read the names and would do so with pleasure, but I do not know whether they are accurate and I might omit some. I shall be willing to find out the names of the owners of the land which it will be necessary to expropriate, but I do not know them now.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Then there is no reason why the item should not stand until the minister does know.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be within the memory of at least some members of the house that expropriation proceedings were taken at the point where the Hudson Bay railway entered Churchill. A description of the land by metes and bounds was made by engineers. The department know nothing about the owners. They file the plan thus prepared by engineers. Then the appropriate searches are made and notices given to all the persons affected. Tenders are made of the money which it is believed will be fair compensation for the land thus taken. The first step is the preparation of the plan by metes and bounds which describes the area; I want to make that clear. When that is done the plan is filed. When the plan is filed no one knows better than does the senior member for Ottawa, that it goes to the registry office. In the registry office search is made by the solicitors in charge of the expropriation proceedings; notice is given to the people concerned and a tender is made. If they decline to accept the sum offered, then proceedings are instituted in the exchequer court. If they get more than was tendered, they receive the costs of the proceedings, and if they get less, the costs are deducted from the tender made. That is the case here. I recall the circumstances in connection with the order in council. It contains merely a description of the land with a plan attached showing the area involved in order that proceedings might be taken promptly so that there might be no speculation worked. The question was litigated whether Mr. Dunning as Minister of Railways had power to file that plan while certain proceedings were pending, and it will be recalled that in Montreal before any action was taken with respect to the tunnel there, the Minister of Railways filed his plan. That plan was for the purpose of vesting the properties in the crown in the right of the railway company, in this case vesting these properties in the crown. My information is that it is expected that from the proceeds of the sale of these lands the moneys paid for them will be fully repaid, because it is to carry a road through connecting with the Montreal highway, and will provide additional building sites which the departmental officials believe will more than compensate the government for the initial payment to be made. And the provision is made that the moneys thus received shall be paid into the consolidated revenue fund, and not to the federal district commission. So that the crown will be reimbursed the money which it now temporarily advances.

Mr. DUFF: I do not know what information the Prime Minister had in regard to the expropriation of lands for the Hudson Bay railway, but I cannot conceive of anything different happening in Manitoba from what would happen in any other province. In other provinces when lands are expropriated for a railway, before the expropriation can take place a plan must be filed by the railway company showing how much land is taken and how much is taken from each owner; the names of the owners must be on the plan, and that plan must be filed with the registrar of deeds in the district. So if my right hon. friend got the information in connection with the Hudson Bay railway that there were no names of owners of land on the plan, presumably the land belonged to the crown; consequently the Prime Minister in making that argument is not fair to the committee. In regard to the expropriation of lands outside of railways I have also had some experience, and I say to the Prime Minister—great lawyer as he is—that before expropriation proceedings take place the plan must be filed, showing the names of owners and acreage of each owner. It is useless for the Prime Minister to try to tell this committee anything else, and we are not going to take such an answer. We want the names of the owners of the land indicated on the plan or else this item will be held up.

Mr. BENNETT: I must correct the hon. gentleman. The Expropriation Act is the act at issue here, not the Railway Act. When I spoke of what took place at Churchill I was pointing out that the Minister of Railways filed a plan as he did in connection with the taking in Montreal. I was not saying what the plan contained; I merely say he filed a plan and the lands were thereupon set apart. So far as this is concerned the lands are vested in the crown by reason of the filing of the plan and the taking possession.

Mr. DUFF: The plan must contain the names of the owners.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it does not follow that has to be done, because they may not be known. That is a matter that arises after the solicitors take charge of the expropriation proceedings. The Railway Act is one thing, the Expropriation Act another. There is no reason for any heat or anger about this matter. I investigated the matter for my own satisfaction as I do matters of this kind generally, and what happened I have explained. The area of land is described by metes and bounds. The plan is filed, the land is vested in the crown, and the crown may then take possession. I remember on that plan there was the name of someone, Eagleson, I think as the suggested owner of the property.

Mr. ELLIOTT: The plan shows the names of Eagleson, James Fox and another Fox—two Foxes, several names; but there is no indication as far as the plan goes of the amounts of land being purchased from each of those owners.

Mr. DUFF: The Prime Minister need not try to insinuate that there is anger on this side; and the only heat, if there is heat, is caused by himself. We had to adjourn this house for five weeks and go home and come back here in the middle of summer, and he ought to appreciate our being willing to do it. Here to-night we are sweating in this hot chamber when this house ought to be prorogued and we all ought to be home. And the quicker we get out of this the better, let me say to the Prime Minister, for his own sake and the sake of everyone else. The only other heat was in New Brunswick to-day, the Prime Minister's own province, which elected forty-three Liberals and only five Conservatives.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DUFF: If the heat has affected the Prime Minister in any way it has not affected us, except that we realize that the people of this country want a federal election at the earliest moment.

As regards expropriation proceedings, I have had something to do with them in connection both with railways and with other lands, and

I say to the Prime Minister that before a government or anyone else can expropriate property they must file a plan with the registrar of deeds and the names of the owners of the land must appear on that plan.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Read the section; there is nothing about the names of owners:

9. Land taken for the use of His Majesty shall be laid off by metes and bounds; and when no proper deed or conveyance thereof to His Majesty is made and executed by the person having the power to make such deed or conveyance, or when a person interested in such land is incapable of making such deed or conveyance, or when, for any other reason, the minister deems it advisable so to do, a plan and description of such land signed by the minister, the deputy of the minister or the secretary of the department, or by the superintendent of the public work, or by an engineer of the department, or by a land surveyor duly licensed and sworn in and for the province in which the land is situate, shall be deposited of record in the office of the registrar of deeds for the county or registration division in which the land is situate, and such land, by such deposit, shall thereupon become and remain vested in His Majesty.

Mr. DUFF: But you cannot file a proper plan without having the names of the owners on it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh yes, you can. I would not like to disagree with my hon. friend about a statute, but if the government desires to purchase Sparks street to-morrow it can file a plan and take possession without the name of anyone being on it.

Mr. DUFF: Because no one owns it except the crown.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Well, the lots on Sparks street.

Mr. DUFF: If the dominion government wanted to take the buildings on the north or the south side of Sparks street, before they could expropriate them they must name the owners of those lands.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. DUFF: I say yes, and I know what I am talking about.

An hon. MEMBER: You may be wrong.

Mr. DUFF: I am not wrong; I am right.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Following what the Minister of Justice has just read there is also the provision that after the plan has been filed notice must be given to the owners.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh, yes.

Mr. CASGRAIN: If the Minister of National Defence does not know who the owners are, the Minister of Justice through his officials must know the names of the persons who are the owners of this area described by metes and bounds.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When I have searched the registry office the parties will all have to be notified.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Has that not been done before this date? The plans have been deposited.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The plans have not yet been deposited. The order in council was passed only the day before yesterday, June 25.

Mr. DUFF: May I ask the Minister of National Defence—the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister are off at a tangent—if the map or plan which I hold in my hand is the one which has been or will be filed for the expropriation proceedings?

Mr. STIRLING: The one attached to the order in council is that one that will be filed. It is similar to that except that it has not on it the course that the road will take; it is a land plan only. Otherwise it is similar to the one the hon. member has.

Mr. DUFF: Thank you very much. I am right and the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister are wrong. I am going to show that they are wrong. The Minister of National Defence says that outside of a few lines on this plan it is a facsimile of what is to be filed with the registrar of deeds. On this plan is the name of James Fox. The Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister say there is no need to file a plan with names on it. Here is a good Scotchman, Kenneth McDonald; other names are P. Thomson, G. Monkford, and E. Robillard.

Mr. STANLEY: He is a Scotchman too.

Mr. DUFF: I will give you some more—C. Eagleson and L. O. Eagleson. Why was it necessary to put these names on if the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister—and of course this plan never would be made unless the Prime Minister supervised it, as he supervises everything—

Mr. BAKER: Because the names are there it does not say it is necessary.

Mr. DUFF: No, they are put there only to make work for someone in the department, to give someone a job.

Mr. BAKER: Just to give you a chance for argument.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Were there no negotiations with the owners of the property, no offers made to purchase the property, before this transaction was completed? I understand that in all the departments the practice is to approach the owners and try to make a bargain with them, and that recourse is taken to expropriation proceedings only when the parties cannot come to an agreement. I should like to ask the minister if there were no negotiations or rapprochements made between the department and these people.

Mr. STIRLING: I am not aware that any rapprochements were made.

Mr. MERCIER (St. Henri): Does the government contemplate purchasing land or immovables in the Montreal district out of this amount?

Mr. STIRLING: I am not aware that the department is even considering buying land in the district of Montreal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the minister who initiated these proceedings?

Mr. RHODES: Perhaps I may be permitted to say a word. This whole scheme was initiated in the first place by the federal district commission. I may not be accurate as to whether it preceded the defence or air service but I know that over a long period of time the federal district commission have been extremely anxious to get an eastern entrance to the city of Ottawa via the driveway. They are making a very beautiful entrance to this city which, apart altogether from the beautification, will have the effect of relieving congestion on the Montreal road in years to come, leaving the road through Eastview for the heavier traffic.

So far as the air force is concerned, I have had occasion to fly from that field a number of times, and in discussing the matter with members of the air force I have found that they always have been very nervous about the high hill on the south side that is covered with tall trees. You must land on a flying field in conformity with the wind that is blowing at the time, and if a landing has to be effected from the south side there is very grave danger because of that high hill and the trees upon it. The air force always have been very nervous with respect to that physical condition and have wanted the shoulder of that hill removed so that the menace might be eliminated. This dovetails into the scheme of the Ottawa Improvement Commission. I speak of these facts because I have had occasion to discuss the matter with the federal district commission several times, and the view I have expressed as to the air force came to me incidentally from the different officers with whom I have had contact.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If that is the case why smuggle the item in under the head of engineering services and works? There are separate items for aviation under which this amount might more properly be placed. Why not put it under the federal district commission?

Mr. RHODES: I shall not quarrel with my right hon. friend, but there was no question of attempting to hide the item. I think it is a most praiseworthy step; I think it is in the public interest, and I believe that in the years to come it will return a much larger sum of money than will be expended on it. It might have been better to put it under a separate item, but it touches three different departments and the engineering branch of the Department of National Defence naturally would do the surveying. I assume that is why it appears in a national defence item, but there was no attempt or intention to disguise the item. I should think my right hon. friend, who always has been an advocate of the beautification of Ottawa—and I say this in his praise—would be the first to say that this undertaking is one designed in a marked degree to enhance the beauty of Ottawa. At the same time it will serve another purpose; it will provide more satisfactory accommodation for the Department of Justice in connection wtih the mounted police and will round out a proper landing field for the capital city of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to my hon. friend that I would be the first to support him and the government in any scheme that would meet the two necessities of which he has spoken and at the same time help in a necessary civic improvement, but the last place I would expect to find it would be in the most unpopular vote that is presented to this house, namely, an increase in the vote for militia services. I wonder very much that the government should have selected this particular service to cover the purchase of this property. So far as the land is concerned, in connection with the purposes mentioned by my hon. friend, I am quite prepared to withdraw my objection to the purchase, but this is a very different explanation from the one given by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. RHODES: If there had been any intention on the part of the government to smuggle this vote into the estimates, certainly the government went about it in a very clumsy fashion. As my right hon. friend has suggested, this amount could have been put in a separate item, and to that extent it would have reduced the militia estimates and lessened the criticism of military expenditures.

Mr. DUFF: Just another mistake by the government.

Mr. RHODES: I may say to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough that the government has made many mistakes. I have not known of a government in the history of Canada that has not made many mistakes, and I never expect to see a government of Canada that will not make mistakes. I suggest to my hon. friend that the government that does not make mistakes does not make anything. We would be the first to admit that we have made mistakes, but certainly if this is a mistake it must be apparent that it was not done with any sinister purpose.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With what the Minister of Finance has said with reference to improving the approach to Ottawa I have no quarrel whatever, because that matter has been mooted for a long time. Undoubtedly there must be a further approach from the east in order to relieve the congestion of traffic on the Montreal road and also to meet the objection to the landing field at Rockcliffe. That is nothing new; that has been talked of for three, four or five years, ever since the inception of that aviation field. We all agree that better landing facilities should be provided and that the congestion on the Montreal road should be relieved; with that I have no quarrel at all, but there have been many alternatives proposed. For a long time the local newspapers have been advocating an entrance from the east, but this is not the only alternative. I must agree with what my right hon. leader has stated; if this vote had been properly put in the estimates those who are primarily interested in following these matters would have had some knowledge of it. It was purely and simply a matter of luck, or perhaps a matter of psychology, that in considering the estimates this matter came up; otherwise no one would have known anything about it until the whole thing had been completed. To that procedure I must register strenuous opposition. It was not fair to the people of Ottawa; it was not fair to the representatives of the people of Ottawa in this parliament that a matter such as this should have been contemplated and practically consummated without anyone having the slightest knowledge that the project was under way. That is why I feel that the matter has not been handled in the fairest way.

Mr. RHODES: My colleague the Minister of National Defence made a very clear explanation when this item was first called, but unfortunately he is suffering with a sore throat and his voice does not carry very far. I must say that I heard him with some difficulty even at this short distance. He made a very clear explanation and I am sure that Hansard, which is not very far from him, will have a record of his remarks. If the hon. member will look over those remarks to-morrow morning I am sure they will disclose a full explanation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is locking the door after the horse has been stolen.

Item agreed to.

General stores—further amount required, $600,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Here is another item of the type to which I referred. When the national defence main estimates were before the committee for consideration four months ago we were asked to vote $837,800 for general stores, an amount similar to the amount voted the year before. I submit that when the committee allowed that item to pass without discussion it did so because hon. members believed they were voting the government the same amount as had been voted the year before. We are now being asked to vote almost a duplicate amount and I should like to know what has happened to the general stores in the last few months to necessitate this additional vote of $600,000.

Mr. STIRLING: The same explanation applies so far as the general stores part of this vote is concerned, that is, these stores have been depleted for relief purposes, purchases have not been as heavy as they should be, and it is desirable that they be brought up again to a general average. Included in this item are two others; I referred to one a moment ago, that covering the dominion arsenal. This vote includes an amount of $287,610 to cover the removal of the arsenal from its present dangerous position outside the city walls of Quebec. The filling station is a menace to life and property and preparations have been made to affect a change. Hitherto these preparations have proceeded rather slowly but the buildings at Valcartier are almost ready to receive the filling station and it is intended to proceed more rapidly with the evacuation of the site at Quebec.

Sir EUGENE FISET: What is the amount of the item referred to by the minister?

Mr. STIRLING: $287,610.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is included in the $600,000?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes. There is another item for $201,095 under the heading of artillery stores. The number of fuses have been allowed to drop below the quantity required for even peace time practice on the ranges. Of that vote, $125,485 is to provide for training and instructional requirements for the permanent force, non-permanent active militia units and central camps and schools. Wheels, et cetera, to the amount of $40,790 are necessary owing to the mechanization of "C" battery and the increased use of motor transport vehicles for gun hauling. Quick firing three inch equipment is necessary to provide one section of modern armament for defence of Halifax and Esquimalt fortresses. The existing equipment is obsolete and is of little value either for training or for defence purposes. There is not one single anti-aircraft gun in Canada and it is impossible to carry on the training of men in the use of these guns.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If what the minister states is correct it offers the strongest reason why he should have told the fact to the committee when the main estimates were under consideration. He states now that this equipment is obsolete making it impossible to give training to the men, but it seems to me he should have brought these facts to the attention of the committee when the main estimates were being considered. I cannot understand why he should leave these items to the last moment and then bring them up in the form of supplementary estimates during the dying days of a parliament.

Mr. STIRLING: I have endeavoured to give this explanation more than once. As minister for the time being I consider it necessary that these things should be done and the government has decided to proceed this far in agreeing to do what I consider was necessary to be done in the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It seems to me that all the minister's explanation amounts to is this: Having charge of the military, naval and aviation services he has been able to persuade the government to come up to a certain mark in making provision for these services, while the ministers of other departments, for example the Department of Labour and the Department of Agriculture, have not been able to persuade the government to come up to what they believed to be the necessary mark in order to serve the needs which they have particularly in charge. I am still in doubt as to the real reason why the minister has been able to obtain this supremacy over his colleagues in the government.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Will the right hon. gentleman tell me the item in agriculture to which he refers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not refer to any particular item.

Mr. ELLIOTT: How would the arsenal at Quebec come under general stores?

Mr. STIRLING: I cannot give any reason why it should or should not. The arsenal turns out a certain quantity of small arms munitions as well as shells and fuses, all of which are stores until they are used.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is this expenditure to be made on the building?

Mr. STIRLING: The expenditure will be in the transfer to Valcartier of the contents of the arsenal, its machinery and stocks from the dangerous position it occupies outside the citadel in Quebec.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I understand that this amount of $287,000 in connection with the arsenal is to cover the transfer of a dangerous plant to Valcartier where new quarters have been erected. Do I understand that the sum of $287,000 is simply for the transfer of the present equipment of these buildings to Valcartier, or is it, as I think it is, an allotment of money to the dominion arsenal, Quebec, for the manufacture of a certain number of rounds of ammunition? I think that is what it is. I cannot understand what the minister means by stores, if he is going to use that money for the transfer of the equipment of the buildings from Quebec to Valcartier. It may mean that he is going to buy new machinery, new equipment. The minister's reply was far from clear; perhaps he would elucidate it.

Mr. STIRLING: The removal of the dominion arsenal from Quebec to its new site at Valcartier is a scheme which has been long considered, which has been started, and which is of considerable magnitude, and it has been proceeded with as money was available. A certain portion of the buildings necessary to receive certain portions of the work done in the arsenal are now just about ready at Valcartier to receive them. That change over, what is known as the filling station, will be made. The most dangerous part of the process will be removed from Quebec to Valcartier. This money will enable the next piece of development work to go on at Valcartier, and as it is completed more of the work done in the arsenal at Quebec can be moved over to Valcartier.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Does the minister mean that the dangerous buildings of our dominion arsenal, which are on the coal fields, are going to be transferred from Quebec to Valcartier?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Then a portion of this $287,000 is to be used to transfer the equipment of these buildings to the new site and also to enable the manufacturing at the new site of a certain amount of ammunition. I suppose that is the proper explanation?

Mr. STIRLING: I think the hon. member has now stated it correctly. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, if I remember well, General McNaughton has been chief of staff with a salary of $10,000 a year. He was appointed to the national research council at a salary of $15,000, and no provision was made for his superannuation from his position as chief of staff. If he is not superannuated within a month or thirty days after he is appointed to a higher salaried position, which appointment has been made, his superannuation will be based, not on the salary of $10,000 which he was receiving as chief of staff, but on the $15,000 which he receives in his present position, which does not carry superannuation. I hope that the minister catches my point. If General McNaughton is superannuated now he will be superannuated on the basis of a salary of $10,000, but if he is not superannuated until next week he will be superannuated on the basis of a salary of $15,000. May I ask the minister if he has taken any steps for the superannuation of General McNaughton right now in order to save several thousand dollars to the public exchequer, or if he is going to wait to give him a fat superannuation later on this week? Was I clear enough? Here is a case where a man is entitled to superannuation based on a salary of $10,000, and it is time right now to save several thousand dollars of public money to the public exchequer, and the minister sits idle in his seat and does not answer my question. I ask him, will he superannuate General McNaughton right now on the basis of a salary of $10,000 in order not to give him the privilege of having a superannuation on $15,000 in a position which does not carry any superannuation, according to the statute. No answer? Sir, this is a scandal.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Here I denounce this case of favouritism with regard to the chief of staff, and all the ministers sit idle and dumb in their seats. I want an answer.

The CHAIRMAN: The question of the salary or superannuation of General McNaughton is not under consideration. It has nothing to do with this item.

Mr. POULIOT: I heard the Prime Minister state that General McNaughton was not now receiving any salary as chief of staff but was practically acting as chief of staff until he was replaced.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That would come under item 330, not 329. When we come to the next item the hon. member may discuss it.

Item agreed to.

Mr. POULIOT: No, Mr. Chairman, the item is not carried, because the chief of staff has to look after all these matters that come under item 329, and if you are not satisfied as to that, we will have the statutes brought into this chamber. What I am saying is absolutely pertinent to the item before us, and it was because the government was unable to answer that you ruled me out of order. It is a scandal in this house, and a scandal against parliamentary tradition. What does the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) say? I have been kind to him because we were college mates. Let me tell him what the electors of the province of Quebec think of him.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. POULIOT: Can we not invoke free speech here, Mr. Chairman? Are we in Russia that we must stand in silence? This is one scandal in which there has been favouritism for the chief of staff who has been instrumental in having the large salaries that are paid to militia men and to himself, and I have a right to denounce it in this House of Commons.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What will be the business for to-morrow?

Mr. BENNETT: Amendments from the Senate. A bill was sent back from this house to the Senate with the statement that we had concurred in all the amendments except one, the consequential one. That appears on the record but not in the report of proceedings in the house. It apparently was overlooked that that was done. We will take the Senate amendments and I think there are two small bills, and then we will continue with supply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But not take the elections act?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps we have had enough of elections for to-day?

Mr. BENNETT: No, we are willing and prepared to face another—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us have it now.

Mr. BENNETT: —just as soon as possible.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 28, 1935

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, June 28, 1935.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Sir Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber this day at 4.30 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

LEAVE OF ABSENCE GRANTED TO DOCTOR ARTHUR BEAUCHESNE, CLERK OF THE HOUSE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The Empire Parliamentary Association, United Kingdom branch, have extended an invitation to representatives of either house of this parliament who are members of the association to visit England during the next month. The invitation has also been extended to the clerk of the house who is honorary secretary of that association, and inasmuch as he is the servant of the house and not of the government, in order that his absence may be regularized, I should like to move, seconded by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe):

That leave of absence be given Arthur Beauchesne, clerk of the house, for the remainder of the session.

Motion agreed to.

EIGHT HOUR DAY

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE WITH RESPECT TO SENATE AMENDMENTS TO BILL NO. 21

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I desire to say a word of explanation with respect to order No. 6 under government orders with regard to Bill No. 21, to provide for limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the principle of the eight hour day or of the forty-eight hour week adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of the 28th June, 1919. In the certificate that went to the Senate accompanying the message, it is indicated that the Commons had agreed to all the Senate amendments except as regards the consequential amendment which I moved, to amendment No. 9. In the motion that is recorded in our house it appeared that we agreed to eight amendments, did not agree to amendments Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14, and moved our consequential amendment with respect to number 9. The Senate, taking the fact from the message and not from the certificate, sent back to this house the bill to have amendments Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 dealt with by the house. I went over those amendments fully at the time they were before the house and said that we concurred in them as they were not matters of importance, but in order that the matter may now be regularized owing to the conflict between the certificate and the motion as recorded, I move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house agrees to the amendments Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13 and 14 made by the Senate to the Bill No. 21, an act to provide for limiting the hours of work in industrial undertakings to eight in the day and forty-eight in the week, in accordance with the convention concerning the application of the principle of the eight hour day or of the forty-eight hour week adopted by the general conference of the international labour organization of the League of Nations, in accordance with the labour part of the treaty of Versailles of the 28th June, 1919, without any amendment.

And that the clerk of the house do carry the said message to the Senate.

We have not dealt, nor does this propose to deal with the consequential amendment which I moved the other day in regard to Senate amendment No. 9, and with which the Senate has indicated it does not agree. That means a conference or further action between the two houses. I am leaving that for the moment and will endeavour to dispose of it at the next sitting when I am further informed in connection with it. But in order that there may be conformity between the motion and the certificate, I am moving the motion aforesaid.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I well remember that when the Prime Minister made that motion the other day he made it clear that we were agreeing with all the amendments made by the Senate except the one in regard to the time when the law would come into force as regards railway employees. With respect to that particular matter, do I understand that the government have not reached any decision as to what stand they will take?

Mr. BENNETT: We shall have to have a conference.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Then my right hon. friend wants to persist in the decision of the house?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not finally settled. I wish to discuss it further with the leader of the Senate, who is not there to-day.

Motion agreed to.

RADIO BROADCASTING

NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): If the house will direct its attention to Bill No. 99, and to the votes and proceedings of this house indicating the action of the Senate I think they will agree that we cannot possibly accept the so-called amendment of that chamber. It will be recalled that Bill No. 99 of this house provided for the extension of the provision of the Canadian Radio Broadcasting Act of 1932, chapter 35, statutes of 1932-33 as amended by chapter 24 of the statutes of the present session, until March 31, 1936. There was an extension until June 30, 1935, but the Senate when it received the bill proceeded to provide that the whole radio set up, the measure known as the radio statute, should only last until next March. Of course that is not an amendment, that is a declaration of policy entirely at variance with that which the government has declared time and again to this house. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Guthrie:

That the house inform their honours that we are unable to agree to their amendments, inasmuch as they have made a declaration of policy not consistent with the avowed policy of the government, and that they insist upon the bill as it left this house being enacted.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Bennett, seconded by Mr. Guthrie.

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours that this house disagrees with their amendments to Bill No. 99, an act respecting radio broadcasting, for the reasons set forth by the Prime Minister, and that the clerk of the House carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT

CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 62, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act.

He said: The Senate made a slight amendment to this measure, providing that instead of it coming into force on the day on which it was assented to, as it would, it should come into force on the first of July. If the house agrees to that proposal, as I ask it now to do, we will endeavour to have the act assented to this afternoon so that it will begin on the first day of the month, thereby making it simpler from the standpoint of superannuation and keeping the books of the country.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DOMINION DAY ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) yesterday asked a question with respect to Monday, and I told the house I would endeavour to ascertain what progress was being made by the committee dealing with the grain board bill, so that we would know just what our position is. The Senate yesterday indicated that it would not sit on Monday. The legislation before that body has not been completely dealt with at this moment. It would therefore seem to be clear that the Senate on Tuesday will be dealing with that legislation. I believe we may be able to finish the evidence in the grain board bill committee to-day, but that will probably be as far as we shall be able to go. It will necessitate a conference taking place between the members of the committee, if possible on Monday. Inasmuch as the business upon the order paper is very light, involving one measure which will probably not take very long, and the estimates—I am entirely in the hands of the house, but I do not know whether it would be desirable not to sit on Monday under those circumstances, because the Senate will not finish its business until Tuesday.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I gather from what the right hon. Prime Minister has just said that the government intends to drop the controversial measure, the elections bill, because he refers to only one other measure, that not being controversial. If that is the case it will materially shorten the session and insure speedier prorogation. Also, if the committee dealing with the grain bill has still to confer and reach a conclusion with regard to its provisions possibly the time of all hon. members would be spent more profitably if that committee continued its work and the rest of us looked on over the period of July first. Once that bill is settled I believe I can say on behalf of the opposition that provided the bill I referred to with respect to the elections act is withdrawn, the rest of the order paper will not take many hours to conclude.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course the bill to amend the elections act will have to be given second reading, because there are sections in it, such as that in regard to the hours during which advance polls are kept open, and the waiver of preparation of fresh lists for by-elections, matters of that sort, which must be dealt with, but those are not controversial. I can say frankly that it is not intended to proceed with the controversial sections, in view of the strong expressions of opinion that came from the other side yesterday with respect to them, although I think possibly most hon. members may have received a small pamphlet from Great Britain in which the whole fate of democracy is regarded as being at stake because the will of minorities represents the life of governments, and pointing out how undesirable that is. But that is a matter with which the minister himself will deal when he moves second reading of the bill.

[Mr. Bennett.]

If it is acceptable to the house I would confer further with members of the committee, and later without notice, if it is possible, move that when the house adjourns it adjourn until Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock. If that meets with the approval of the house I shall be glad to give some further information about it at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to the elections bill may I say that as far as the part referring to the transferable vote is concerned, the attitude of hon. members on this side is and has been that this is not the time to introduce as farreaching a departure from our electoral methods as a transferable vote would be. As I stated at the outset it is the sectional character of the measure introduced to which we take strong exception. The question of the principle involved in the transferable vote is another matter, one that I think could be taken up to much better effect at the beginning of a new parliament, rather than when the days of an old parliament have expired.

The Prime Minister, I think, will find that hon. members on this side will be in agreement with hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to Monday next, provided we can make the arrangement indicated.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Morand in the chair.

Miscellaneous—
To assist in promoting tourist business in Canada—revote, $52,000.

Mr. YOUNG: Explain.

Mr. MANION: This is merely a revote of the money voted last year. The bills came in too late to be paid last year and this is merely to legalize the payment of those bills out of last year's estimates.

Item agreed to.

Aviation—
Civil government air operations — for preventive service and other operations—further amount required, $305,000.

Mr. EULER: I notice that this item includes money for the preventive service, and I should like to ask if that indicates any expansion of the air service for preventive purposes.

Mr. STIRLING: No, there is to be no expansion. This is to carry out the work requested of the Department of National Defence and of civil aviation by these other departments.

Mr. BRADETTE: I should like to ask the minister if the repairs to government aircraft are made by private corporations in Montreal or if they are carried out by the govenment.

Mr. STIRLING: I did not catch the first part of the hon. member's question.

Mr. BRADETTE: If my information is correct a good deal of the repair work on the machines is done by private corporations. I should like to know if that statement is correct.

Mr. STIRLING: Does my hon. friend refer to the machines owned by the government? Those repairs which can be carried out by our own mechanics are so done. Major repairs and reconditioning are done by aircraft firms capable of doing that work.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the minister be good enough to give the names of those firms, if he has that information at hand?

Mr. STIRLING: I have not that information under my hand but I shall be pleased to communicate it to my hon. friend.

Mr. DUPUIS: Mr. Chairman, if you will allow me to do so I should like to revert to items 330 and 331.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DUPUIS: With the permission of the committee I should like to refer to them just to obtain some information. I should like to know how many men are in the non-permanent active militia and how many in the permanent forces.

Mr. STIRLING: In the permanent force the number as of May 31, 1935, was 408 officers and 3,104 other ranks. I have not exact similar figures with regard to the non-permanent active militia, but approximately at that date they numbered 6,939 officers and 44,127 other ranks, making a total of 51,066.

Mr. EULER: Referring again to the preventive service, for some years that service has been under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I should like to know whether the air service in connection with the prevention of smuggling and so on is now under the Department of National Defence or whether it is still controlled by the mounted police.

Mr. STIRLING: The mounted police.

Mr. EULER: They merely call on the Department of National Defence to supply the air service, is that it?

Mr. STIRLING: To supply the planes and the flying officers.

Mr. EULER: But they are entirely under the orders and control of the mounted police?

Mr. STIRLING: Entirely under the mounted police.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I note that the vote for the operation of these planes comes under the Department of National Defence, which carries on the service for other departments. I should like to know from the minister if refunds are made by the other departments to cover these expenditures.

Mr. STIRLING: The actual flying costs are charged against civil aviation and are refunded by the Department of Justice.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does item No. 333 provide for the developing of landing fields?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Item agreed to.

Civil Aviation—
Expenses in connection with the control of civil aviation, airways, government and public airports and grants to aeroplane clubs—further amount required, $497,900.

Mr. GRAY: Mr. Chairman, this vote increases by over $200,000 the vote in the main estimates. At that time we voted the sum of $250,000 and we are now asked to vote this much larger sum of $497,900. I wonder if the minister would explain the increase and give a brief resumé of what has been done by the government in connection with the promotion of civil aviation.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, due to the increased use of aeroplanes there is of necessity additional work in the department. Inspection services and investigations consequent upon accidents which have occurred fall to the inspectors of the department. In consequence it is necessary all the time to keep abreast of the work, which has been increasing with considerable rapidity. Then, work is being undertaken to keep abreast of the times with regard to direction beacons. It is hoped very shortly to have radio control of that section between Ottawa and Montreal, for instance, and gradually it is expected that radio direction beams will be erected across Canada,—although that is a long way ahead. Provision is made in the vote for acquiring land at ten different points scattered across the dominion for the purpose of proceeding with the project of having emergency fields across Canada. In the majority of cases crown lands either in the right of the dominion or in the right of the provinces have been available, and by arrangement they have been set aside for these emergency fields. Hitherto with the exception of cleaning, clearing, levelling, a certain amount of drainage and the building of certain roads and fences little has been done. In various parts of Canada relief camp workers have been used for that purpose. There are ten places, four being in the province of British Columbia, three in Quebec, one in Nova Scotia, one in New Brunswick and one in Ontario, where it is thought desirable to begin work on what eventually will be emergency fields in a chain right across Canada.

Then, in connection with stores and equipment there is a sum for the purchase and installation of the lighting equipment on the two sites to which I have referred, and provision for the purchase of high frequency transmitters and receivers, and other pieces of machinery of that description, to get on with the transmitting of the beams.

Mr. GRAY: Where is the emergency field located in the province of Ontario?

Mr. STIRLING: At Vankleek Hill.

Sir EUGENE FISET: At what points in Quebec?

Mr. STIRLING: At Oka, Windsor Mills and Pontiac.

Mr. REID: And British Columbia?

Mr. STIRLING: At Chilliwack, Cowley, Macleod and Langley Prairie.

Mr. EULER: The item refers to grants to aeroplane clubs. I was under the impression that the department loaned certain aeroplanes to these private aeroplane clubs. Does this imply that cash grants are given, as well, and, if so, how much; and how many aeroplanes are now on loan, if we may so describe it, to these private clubs?

Mr. STIRLING: The agreement arrived at between the department and the aeroplane clubs has been reviewed, and the aeroplanes granted to the existing clubs were granted at the same time. They have had little done to the planes, and they are almost on their last legs.

Mr. EULER: How many are there out on loan?

Mr. STIRLING: I believe there are about sixteen. I cannot lay my hand on the information at the moment, but I should be very glad to get it for the hon. member.

Mr. EULER: Are there any cash grants?

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, there is a cash grant as well as the undertaking to supply a machine for the use of the club, provided the club supplies one, making a total of two machines. I shall send the hon. member the statement which has been prepared in this connection. I had it in my other book of estimates, but it is not before me now.

[Mr. Stirling.]

Mr. BRADETTE: Prior to 1931 there was considerable activity in connection with repair work at Lemieux island. Some of the men who worked there during the winter of 1930-31 were fired, on a plea of economy, and have been out of work. A few moments ago I learned from the minister that much of the repair work is now being done by private firms. Could he explain why the men were fired—I think that is the word for it— and were not taken back to work when as a matter of fact the government has found it possible to spend thousands of dollars on repairs done by private firms in Montreal and Toronto?

Mr. STIRLING: At what field?

Mr. BRADETTE: Lemieux island; a skeleton staff still exists there, but many of the old hands have been out of work since 1931.

Mr. STIRLING: The smaller repairs which can be done by our own mechanics are so done. However if and when reconditioning is necessary, or if as the result of an accident considerable repairs are necessitated which cannot be done by our own mechanics the work is handed out to certain companies who specialize in repairs to these machines.

Mr. BRADETTE: How many men are working at Lemieux island to-day? Are there more there to-day than there were in 1930-31, or are there less?

Mr. STIRLING: I have not that information at the moment, but I shall get it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will any of the work done under this appropriation be done by relief labour?

Mr. STIRLING: No.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Public Buildings—Ontario

Belleville—building for entomological branch, $60,000.
Fort Erie—public building, $50,000.
Kingsville—public building, $25,000.
Kirkland Lake—public building, $92,000.
Powassan—public building, $13,000.
Richmond Hill—public building, $30,500.
Toronto—postal station "K," $194,000.
Watford—public building, $10,000—Total, $474,500.

Mr. GRAY: While the town of Forest is not in my constituency may I say that I have had numerous communications from the citizens of that town with respect to an item for a building of a post office which they understood would appear in the supplementary estimates. I know there is provision for an expenditure in the town of Watford, and I should like to know why provision is not made for an expenditure in Forest?

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Chairman, I recall the request having been made for this building, but it is in the same position as many others. We have had requests for similar buildings from all parts of Canada and they have been so numerous that we have been unable to meet them all. We have made the selection which under the circumstances we believed best. That is the reason this one has been left out.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am pleased to note that a certain amount is to be spent in northern Ontario. Will the minister tell the house what amount will be spent in Kirkland Lake?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): If this item carries, plans will be prepared and public tenders asked for under the provisions of the Public Works Act. This being in the regular estimates it comes under the Public Works Act, and therefore public tenders will be invited and the contractor will be subject to the provisions of the specifications, which require him to employ a reasonable amount of local labour where available and a reasonable number of returned soldiers.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is that a post office?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It will cover all public services there, post office and others.

Item agreed to.

Manitoba

Beausejour—public building, $11,000.
Birtle—purchase of building for postal purposes, $2,000.
Gimli—public building, $12,000.
Melita—public building, $20,000.
Roblin—public building, $20,000 — Total, $65,000.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Some time ago I asked the Minister of Public Works to open his heart and do something for constituencies represented by members who are not supporters of the government. So far as Manitoba is concerned, not one riding represented by a member on this side is included in this item. I do not think the minister will come back to a parliament in which there are many members opposite from Manitoba, so that he might as well treat every constituency equally. When he came into power he cancelled tenders that had been called for by the department for the construction of post offices in certain districts in my riding, and I should have thought, when he was so lavish in building post offices in other districts, he would have put up some of these buildings in my constituency, especially when the money had been voted for the purpose. There is no reason for this discrimination; the needs of all ridings should be taken into consideration. If the minister will consult the files he will find that the town of Morris, Manitoba, which is a very important point, has been asking for a post office for some years. The request has come from boards of trade and others concerned, and I think he might have included it in the supplementaries. I hope it is not too late for the government to do something, because their time is up.

Item agreed to.

Saskatchewan

Kindersley—public building, $20,000.
Watrous—public building, $20,000—Total, $40,000.

Mr. VALLANCE: What is the type of work proposed to be put up in Kindersley and Watrous?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): These buildings are for postal purposes. As regards Watrous, the site was purchased in 1933-34 at the corner of Second avenue and Main street. It is a one and a half storey brick structure, and the estimated cost of the building is $16,000; fittings $2,000; grading of sidewalk $1,000 and contingencies $1,000, making a total of $20,000. The same thing applies to Kindersley.

Item agreed to.

Alberta

Calgary—barracks for permanent force, $400,000.
Cardston—public building, $49,000.
Claresholm—purchase of building for public purposes, $5,000.
Edmonton—building for Department of Pensions and National Health, $62,000.
Innisfail—purchase of building for postal purposes, $4,000.
Lacombe—purchase of building for postal purposes, $7,500.
Okotoks—purchase of building for postal purposes, $4,500.
St. Paul—public building, $15,000—Total, $547,000.

Mr. GRAY: How much has been expended on the barracks at Calgary to date, and what will be the total cost when completed?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am afraid I cannot give that information, because, as my hon. friend will recall, the work was undertaken under the provisions of the Public Works Construction Act, 1934, which provided that the items in the schedules were to be assigned to departments of government. They were not all under the control of the Public Works department, this work having been assigned to the Department of National Defence. The work out there has been carried on by them, and this department is without information as to expenditures. I think the information was pretty well given in connection with the public Works Construction Act. We had a long debate at that time.

Mr. GRAY: Can the minister explain why this vote of $400,000 is not continued under the Public Works Construction Act? Why is it introduced into the supplementaries? It seems strange that when $1,250,000 was voted for the barracks at Calgary and, as the minister has said, it came under the National Defence department in connection with the Public Works Construction Act, 1934, we should now be asked to vote this sum in the supplementary estimates. We have objected time and again to these works being taken from one department and split up into Public Works, National Defence and Interior until one cannot find, except by going through the whole of the record, exactly what the works cost. I should like to have a good deal more information than the Minister of National Defence was able to give us at the time we were discussing this particular item a few weeks ago when we learned, after some inquiry, that they were building an officers' mess at a cost of $125,000 and a stable at a cost of $50,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: $63,000.

Mr. GRAY: I think the minister should be prepared to give us more information now that he is asking us to vote $400,000 in addition to the sum already voted. He should give us the complete details showing what has been expended and how much more these barracks will cost the country by the time the work is completed.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is not the same unit of work that is being undertaken by the National Defence department. If I remember rightly the contention has been made frequently, and it has been strongly advocated on the other side of the house, that items of this kind should appear in the regular estimates; it has been said that we should be able to pass on them in the regular estimates, specifying what the vote is required for. This is now bringing the additional construction under the provisions of the Public Works Act and getting it back where it has been contended all the time it should be.

Mr. GRAY: What is the $400,000 we are now being asked to vote to be used for?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The details are these: one airplane hangar, $135,000; one riding school, $75,000; two four-family terraces, other ranks, married quarters, $74,000; construction of two additional married officer's quarters, $40,000; construction of garages to house twelve motor cars, $6,000; one guard house and service control house, $10,000; surfacing barracks square, $30,000; grading and seeding areas around completed buildings, and contingencies, $20,000; architects' fees, inspection, $10,000: total, $400,000.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will this building be located where the barracks are being built?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This will be a new barracks entirely?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Has the contract been let?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There was one let the other day in Calgary.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No contract that has been let has anything to do with this estimate.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Part of this is being constructed by the Department of National Defence and part by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the Department of the Interior handling any of it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will this complete the unit?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know the plans of the Department of National Defence. This is all they have asked for up to this time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the minister stating that he does not know whether this will complete it?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is all that has been asked for up to the present. I do not know what the plans of the Department of National Defence are.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is the Department of National Defence which is really in control and the Department of Public Works are taking charge of the construction of this particular unit?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It seems to me that a lot of money is being spent. Has the Department of Public Works not let a contract to Bennett and White within the past thirty days?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, not the public works.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This is the first piece of construction undertaken by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You are not doing the grading of the grounds?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Anything that is being carried on now is under the supervision of the Department of Public Works.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the building in Edmonton for the Department of Pensions and National Health a new building?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This vote is to provide for the construction of a building to accommodate the Department of Pensions and National Health in order that the various activities of that department may be correlated. In the interests of economy it is thought advisable to concentrate at the Alberta university where a unit was erected some years ago adjacent to the hospital.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is at what we call the South Side hospital?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is another wing at the same hospital.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is that being built by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All the items in the supplementary estimates will be under the control of the Department of Public Works and subject to the provisions of the Public Works Act.

Mr. ELLIOTT: And all are in addition to what was voted under the Public Works Construction Act?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. BURY: I congratulate the government upon this vote. I have some knowledge of the conditions in Edmonton and for some time additional premises have been required by the Department of Pensions and National Health. Part of the work of this department has been carried on in the post office building and I think it is a splendid thing to have this work carried on in a building close to the hospital.

Mr. GARDINER: How many will occupy this building?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The memorandum which I have does not indicate the accommodation in that sense.

Mr. GARDINER: How many employees are there?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: At present the activities of the Department of Pensions and National Health are carried on at different points in the city. Quite often a doctor or a patient has found it very inconvenient to go to two or three different places and by means of this building the services will be consolidated at one point.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I notice $7,500 is being provided for the purchase of a building for postal purposes at Lacombe; is there not a post office at that point?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The present building is rented and this vote is to provide for the purchase of a building and its fitting up. The building to be purchased was previously occupied by the Royal Bank.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I notice that most of these items are for the purchase of buildings and I suppose that that will relieve unemployment.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): These votes are to provide needed public services.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Does the minister know of any buildings in that district which are not being purchased under this item?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I fancy there are a good many.

Mr. HEAPS: Upon whose recommendations are these buildings being purchased?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): On the recommendation of the officers of this and the Post Office Department. These recommendations are made after full investigation as to the needs for such services in the locality.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia

Armstrong—public building, $12,500.
Lillooet—public building, $10,000.
Salmon Arm—public building, $20,000.
Sidney—public building, $12,000.
Victoria—public building, $300,000—Total, $354,500.

Mr. REID: Could the minister state for what purposes these buildings are being erected?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): With the exception of the one at Victoria which is for postal and other government services, they will be for post office purposes.

Mr. REID: Has the minister had an inspection made of the post office at New Westminster about which I have protested for many years?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Recommendations have been made for the improvement of the building at New Westminster by means of an extension or addition. This can be taken care of under another item.

Mr. REID: I note the minister is calling for tenders for the construction of a building for customs and immigration purposes on the Pacific highway. The estimate of this building is being placed at $30,000 but I have pointed out that such a building will not be adequate to handle the traffic at that point. Has the minister any information as to what amount will be spent upon this building?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have not those particulars before me and I thought I gave very full information on that item when the Public Works Construction Act was under consideration. I believe we have just invited tenders but a contract has not been awarded.

Mr. REID: I know the minister gave full information but I pointed out that the customs building on the American side had cost about $150,000 whereas the department was providing only $30,000 for a building on the Canadian side. I pointed out at that time that $30,000 would not construct or complete a building in keeping with its importance. Does the contract now called for contemplate any further expenditure?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I recall now that my hon. friend made similar representations on another occasion. Of course we are confronted with two conflicting demands: on the one hand to curtail expenditures, balance the budget and effect as much economy as possible; on the other to construct beautiful and expensive buildings. We cannot hope to compete with the United States with a population of 120,000,000, in the character of some of our buildings. We do however endeavour to make the buildings suitable for the services which they are required to give the community, and at the same time we try to pay some attention to architectural appearance and beauty. But I do not think we would be justified in putting up on this site on the border a building that would cost as much as the one on the United States side, simply to make it correspond.

Mr. REID: I may point out that that port of entry is the most important one in the whole of Canada. There is not another port from Halifax to Vancouver that has as many cars or as much traffic through it as has that port.

Mr. EULER: Which one?

Mr. REID: The one on Pacific highway. I quoted the figures the last time I spoke.

Mr. HACKETT: It is the largest port of entry in British Columbia but not in Canada.

Item agreed to.

Generally

Flags for dominion public buildings—further amount required, $1,000.
Ottawa—remodelling switchboards, $4,500.
Post Office equipment, $14,000.
Tractors for postal purposes—further amount required, $3,000—Total, $22,500.

Mr. YOUNG: In this appropriation there is an item of $14,000 for post office equipment and another of $3,000 for tractors for postal purposes. Why are these items in the Public Works estimates and not in those of the Post Office Department?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I do not know for how long, but for a very long period items of this character have appeared in the Public Works estimates and we have purchased these machines for the Post Office Department.

Mr. YOUNG: Is all the equipment for the Post Office Department purchased by the Department of Public Works?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The Post Office Department purchase their mail bags, stationery, locks and small rural mail boxes themselves. These items are for sorting cases and other equipment, desks and so forth.

Mr. YOUNG: Do they pay any rent for the buildings they occupy?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No.

Mr. YOUNG: What about fuel?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): We purchase the fuel for them. No department of government is charged rental for any space occupied by it, and the fuel for public buildings is purchased through the Public Works department.

Mr. YOUNG: Water and light the same?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): All these services are on the same basis.

Mr. YOUNG: Janitor service also?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: And repairs.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes.

Mr. YOUNG: I notice on the next page there is an item of $119,000 for mail subsidies to steamships. Is that also paid by the Public Works department?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, by Trade and Commerce.

Mr. YOUNG: In any case it is not paid by the Post Office Department. Does the minister not think it would be better if every department were made to stand on its own feet, if all the expenditures of each department were charged against it? We are told on every hand that the post office is an outstanding example of efficient government ownership of a public institution. Now we find that it does not stand on its own feet. It pays no rent, no taxes, nothing for janitor service, fuel, light, water, repairs or equipment. Then we are told that it is a self-sustaining department. Would it not be in the public interest if every department were made to stand on its own feet so that we might know whether they were paying?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): That is a big question and one that has often engaged the attention of this house. Since I came here I have listened to debates on this subject on different occasions, and I do not know that the question is any nearer being settled than it was some years ago. It would quite suit the Public Works department if every department were put on its own feet, but I am afraid if that were done, the hon. gentleman would have to pay more than two cents on his letters.

Mr. YOUNG: We are paying more than that now.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I mean three cents.

Mr. HEAPS: I think the contention of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) is quite right that the various departments of the public service should stand on their own feet so that we might know exactly how they come out at the end of the year. The same thing applies to public utilities under the control of the government. It is a most inefficient way of doing business when we have the estimates, say of the Post Office Department, scattered throughout the pages of the estimates that come before us, and it would be a much more efficient way of doing the business of the country if we could have a properly prepared statement in regard to the Post Office Department showing exactly the total income and total expenditure. That would include the value of the buildings, their depreciation, the services which the government are giving to the buildings. If we are losing money on them on the basis of a two-cent or three-cent service, we have a right to know how much we are losing. If we are making money, we have a right to know how much we are making. As matters stand, we do not know whether we are losing or making money.

The minister has said that this question has been debated by the house on many different occasions. Is it not possible that even at this late hour in the session something could be done whereby, in another parliament, whoever happens to occupy the minister's place, might be able to give a clear outline of what these services cost the government. It would not be such a difficult task to bring all these items of income and expenditure under one heading under the Post Office Department instead of under a number of departments.

Harbours and Rivers—Quebec

Anse au Griffon (river)—improvements to jetties—to complete contract—revote, $3,500.
Lévis—wharf, $134,000.
Lorne dry dock—improvements, $40,000.
Rimouski—rebuilding track foundation on wharf, $66,200.
Roberval—breakwater, $40,000.
Sept Iles—wharf, $50,000.
St. Grégoire de Montmorency—protection wall, $10,000—Total, $343,700.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Is it the intention of the department to call for tenders for the works to be undertaken at Rimouski? By the way, I would like to thank the minister in the name of the board of trade and the officials of the Canadian National Railways for having complied with their request. But I should like to direct his attention to the fact that this work should be carried forward at the earliest possible moment, because if it is not done immediately, this will be a great handicap for the wharf and harbour of Rimouski. The wharf is already clogged with manufactured lumber as well as pulpwood, and it would be extremely awkward to carry on that work, especially because at the present time only light engines can go on the wharf. I therefore appeal to the minister to have the work carried forward at the earliest possible date.

Harbours and Rivers—Ontario

Byng Inlet—dredging—to complete payments on contract—further amount required, $1,400.
Collingwood—removal of dock, $43,500.
Fort William — harbour improvements—further amount required, $150,000.
Hamilton—warehouse on wharf, $7,500.
Hudson—wharf—further amount required, $4,500.
Little Castor river and Annable creek—contribution to the municipality of the township of Winchester towards dredging Little Castor river and Annable creek, the provincial government to contribute a like amount—revote, $5,200.
Port Arthur — harbour improvements—further amount required, $100,000.
Port Credit—harbour improvements, $20,000.
Thessalon—breakwater, $8,500.
Windsor—warehouse extension, $60,000—Total, $400,600.

Mr. EULER: There is in this appropriation an item of $60,000 for warehouse extension at Windsor. I was under the impression that a public building for post office and customs purposes was built there two or three years ago. I am curious to know whether business has expanded to such extent that an extension has to be added to that new building?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is for an extension to the warehouse on the wharf.

Mr. EULER: Not in connection with the public building at all?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The public building is some distance away and not at all connected with this.

Mr. EULER: A warehouse for what?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Freight and passengers.

Mr. GRAY: What emergency has arisen that requires an additional $150,000 to the $100,000 we voted in the main estimates at Fort William?

An hon. MEMBER: Ask the Minister of Railways.

Mr. MANION: No emergency at all there.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): It is additional dredging in the harbour.

[Sir Eugene Fiset.]

Mr. GRAY: Could the minister not foresee it when we were voting the main estimates a month ago?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): This is for reconditioning the harbour, and these are days, as my hon. friend will agree, when you cannot see very far into the future.

Mr. ELLIOTT: In regard to item No. 349 I wonder if the minister found any ridings represented by Liberals in Ontario that required any dredging under this item, and if he would point them out.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): There are not many Liberals in Ontario.

Mr. ELLIOTT: There will be plenty after a while.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Just digging holes for the Tories.

Mr. ELLIOTT: This is an example of how my hon. friend thinks public works should be distributed throughout Ontario. He does not seem to be able to find, in all these items, over $400,000, any place where any expenditure should be made in a Liberal constituency. Of course there they do not need it quite as badly, they are probably better represented in this house.

British Columbia

Fraser river—contribution towards protection work at Rosedale, B.C., $3,500.
Fraser river—north arm—dredging, $30,000.
Port Alberni assembly wharf—replacement of crane—further amount required, $2,000—Total, $35,500.

Mr. REID: Is it the intention of the minister to spend the remaining $245,000 appropriated for public works on the Fraser river under the unemployment relief bill? There was an appropriation of $300,000 and I understand the money has been spent only to the extent of some $50,000, that is for improvements in the Fraser river. As to the balance, when the program is outlined certain protection work was included; later, on the recommendation of his engineer here, it was cut out.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): A review of conditions on the Fraser river is now being conducted. As my hon. friend knows they are rather difficult, there is a difference of opinion and we have not decided just where or how this money is to be spent. The freshet is just over.

Mr. REID: It is very true there is a great difference of opinion. I have a copy of a telegram which shows it. I appealed to the minister this year regarding protection work for dyking and I was told that it was not the government's concern and they had no interest in the matter, no responsibility, although the engineer there says that the work that was done did interfere with the channel and throw the water on the dykes. I have here a copy of a telegram sent me not long ago purporting to come from the minister to Mr. Ladner in which the minister tells him that he will help him out regarding some protection work done there, but the minister is afraid the work I was appealing for cannot be done.

Department intends to complete protection work between roads 3 and 4 but upper protection work in the vicinity Rice Mills and road 9 are not dominion government concern. The only way I can se they can be dealt with is on basis of unemployment relief as provincial-municipal project submitting and approved by Labour department here on contributory basis.

I think that requires explanation, because the minister told me when I advocated that protection work should be done on the dyke on No. 9 road that it was not a responsibility of the dominion government.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Possibly some explanation is due my hon. friend. I think we understood each other thoroughly when he was speaking to me because I had received from him two or three days before that time a letter complaining about erosion at Rice Mills. It was in respect of that and that only that I spoke. The opinion of our engineers is that at that point nothing has been done by the Department of Public Works that contributes to that erosion. I was directing my attention entirely to what my hon. friend had in his mind at that time. I did not mean to convey to him that at every point on the Fraser river conditions were the same, because we do recognize that at some places possibly some works done by the dominion may have produced an effect detrimental to the shore, and we have made contributions in the past and will continue to make them wherever these conditions warrant it. But with regard to the particular site that my hon. friend has in mind we disclaim any responsibility whatever. One engineer may have a certain opinion, but the chief engineer of the department, who has studied the whole matter and has prepared the plans, is convinced that there is no responsibility with respect to the erosion at Rice Mills.

Mr. REID: Then am I to take it that the engineer in New Westminster, right on the ground, admitted that it was due to work done by the department, and on that recommendation coming to Ottawa an engineer sitting here said it was not? Is that the situation?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): No, I do not think that is putting the whole case, which I am sure the hon. member desires to do. The chief engineer has been over the river there for years and years, has made an intensive study of it, as my hon. friend knows. The gentleman who made the recommendations has not given the subject that same study, he has only come there recently. I think in fairness to everybody my hon. friend will admit that an engineer who has gone out and studied the river over a period of years should be in a better position to give an accurate and expert opinion than one who has not given it the same study.

Mr. REID: I cannot agree, because the present engineer out there has been on the job for a year, he has been up and down the river, he has seen the works constructed in 1926 and 1928 which diverted the stream, and I doubt if the chief engineer has visited the Fraser river during the past four or five years. The engineer on the job knows the exact situation on the river and the engineer sitting in Ottawa does not. I say after the experience I have had with some of the engineers in Ottawa that they are not just as friendly to the Fraser river as they should be.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Again I say my hon. friend has not a full appreciation of the situation. I have been in the department nearly five years now, and I know that there is no work in the department about which the chief engineer and the staff here are more concerned than about conditions on the Fraser river. Conditions there are difficult. It is a river that carries a great deal of silt and causes a great deal of trouble, has great variations in flow, and freshets. As my hon. friend knows, a great deal of money has been spent there, dredging has to be carried on continuously and the chief engineer and a minister with any sense of responsibility will not lightly undertake a plan of development that involves an expenditure of millions over a period of years without giving the matter careful study. I assure my hon. friend that the Fraser river is one of the problems that has beeen given very intensive and careful study by everyone concerned with it, both in Ottawa and in the district.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Do I understand the minister to say that this government engineer who has made the recommendation referred to has not such experience as would justify the minister in acting on his recommendation?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The district engineer on the ground has expressed an opinion that possibly the erosion at this point, Rice Mills, may have been contributed to by some work which we have done. The chief engineer, however, and those at the head office here do not concur in that opinion. This engineer was at Victoria for a long time and he has been at this point for only a year.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I would suggest that during the short time the minister is in charge from now on he should exercise care in securing engineers in whose judgment he will have some confidence. With respect to the Fraser river I want to say, with great respect to the chief engineer for whose opinions I have the utmost regard, that these questions as to whether or not certain artificial work done in a stream does or does not affect the flow of the water so as to cause damage are almost impossible of definite settlement. I listened with a good deal of attention to what was said by the hon. member for that riding, who has just spoken, and under the circumstances I think consideration should be given to steps that will remedy the difficulty of which he complains.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and Telephone Lines—
Saskatchewan and Alberta—telephone line from Athabaska to Mirror Landing, $9,250.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I wonder if the minister can tell me how many miles of telephone lines the government have now and how many miles they have disposed of in the last five years.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend that information. All I can say is that we have been disposing of lines where other services have been provided and where changed conditions have shown that we were not warranted in continuing them. I shall be glad to send my hon. friend a summary showing exactly what has been accomplished along that line; I think he will find it rather interesting. The annual report of the department would show that, also.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Of course it will be quite a while before that is available in connection with current matters. I wonder if the minister could give me an idea at the same time as to the prices that have been received per mile for the lines.

[Mr. Elliott.]

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Yes, I will give full particulars.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions—
Additional amount required for ocean and coastal subsidies and inspection services, $119,000.

Mr. REID: I should like to have some information as to what steamship companies are going to get this money and what service it is for.

Mr. MANION: I think I can give the information. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is absent, but I have the information here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Where is he?

Mr. MANION: I do not know where he is to-day. This amount is divided into a number of subsidies, but I presume my hon. friend is interested only in those concerning the Pacific coast. The Canada-China and Japan service requires an additional amount of $60,000, which goes to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I think that is the only one on the Pacific coast.

Mr. REID: That is the company that already gets $690,000. I should like to know what further service is being given in return for this increased subsidy.

Mr. MANION: I am informed by the statements before me, which were laid before me just a few moments ago—since I came into the house as a matter of fact—that while as my hon. friend points out the Canadian Pacific receive subsidies, they have been carrying on under very great difficulties in view of the very heavy subsidies of which foreign ships are in receipt. No doubt my hon. friend is aware of the actions that have been taken in the neighbouring republic in the way of increasing their subsidies, and I know we hear many complaints from our steamship companies as to their inability to compete with very heavily subsidized shipping, particularly in the American republic and also in other foreign countries. They claim they simply cannot carry on this service without this additional assistance.

Mr. REID: That is not the information I really require.

Mr. MANION: Then I am afraid I do not understand my hon. friend's question.

Mr. REID: I know this item will go through, so I will cut my remarks short. This company has about 480 orientals on board as employees, and only a small proportion of the crew are white men, so I want to protest against this additional subsidy.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to ask the minister whether these shipping companies do not belong to a combine and do not charge the same rates for the same class of freight and passenger service. If that is the case I do not see how the question of subsidies enters into the argument.

Mr. MANION: I think my hon. friend is entirely wrong in that; I believe he is referring to the North Atlantic combine. This concerns the Pacific, and so far as I am aware there is no such combine there and the same rates are not charged because there is continuous competition in regard to the shipment of Canadian goods to the orient.

Mr. REID: There is a combine in regard to lumber and other commodities and the rates are set in San Francisco.

Mr. MANION: There are conference rates, but these subsidies go largely in mail services; at least they are paid in the name of mail services.

Mr. REID: Is this for mail or is it just a subsidy to enable this company to carry on?

Mr. MANION: Without doubt this is a subsidy to enable them to carry on, but they carry mails as well.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister say there is no combine or understanding with regard to rates in connection with coastal shipping?

Mr. MANION: I was not speaking of coastal services.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This covers coastal services as well.

Mr. MANION: Yes, but the item of which I am speaking, concerning the Canadian Pacific railway, has to do with service to the orient. There are no Pacific coastal services in this item.

Mr. HEAPS: But why should we come to the assistance of these companies that belong to a combine that fixes rates for both freight and passenger services, whether on the Atlantic or on the Pacific? Why should we assist these combines, which are internationally controlled, by way of subsidies?

Mr. MANION: There is this to remember, that if other countries subsidize their shipping to look after the shipment of goods to foreign countries and Canada does not do so, Canadian shipping will be taken entirely out of our hands and placed in the hands of foreign shippers. We are up against that all the time. In connection with another branch of Canadian service, under the Canadian National, I have had brought to my attention very recently the competition of some United States lines which are very heavily subsidized. This affects our Canadian National ships, and though in that case we do not give a direct subsidy we do pay the deficit, so really it comes to the same thing.

Mr. HEAPS: If the rates are the same; if, as the hon. member for New Westminster says, they are fixed in San Francisco and Canadian ships are compelled to abide by the rates set in that way, in other words if a ship sailing from a Canadian port is compelled to abide by rates set in San Francisco, why should we be granting these subsidies? The only question that might come up would be if the revenue was insufficient in that case I could understand that we might give something towards making up the deficit. The thing I object to at the present time is that we have these international rates on the Atlantic and, to my knowledge, on the Pacific, and these rates are increasing each year while other commodity prices are going down. Yet we come along and assist these international combines by giving them subsidies out of public funds.

Mr. MANION: It may be true, as my hon. friend says, that there are conference rates. It is obvious that if powerful American shipping companies receive very heavy subsidies,—as they do—and that if Japanese companies receive subsidies from their country—which they also do—our Canadian shipping without assistance of some kind could not compete with them. It would simply go out of business, and other companies being given assistance would get the trade. We would be forced to the position of allowing our shipping to be handled by foreign ships and probably at a later time we would be forced to accept their rates.

Mr. HEAPS: Do the British shipping companies receive subsidies from the British government?

Mr. MANION: Yes, they are heavily subsidized.

Mr. REID: I realize that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Hanson) is not in his seat, and that the Minister of Railways and Canals is just helping out. I would point out to him however that further details should have been given because this company is receiving $809,000 per year and as a matter of fact it is using slave labour. When the minister states these moneys are required so as to enable them to compete with oriental or American ships I say we should have details as to the costs. Only the officers on these ships are Canadians or white persons, and the other persons employed are orientals. These men are hired in Hong Kong and paid between $5 and $10 per month. Under those circumstances I do not see why we cannot meet Japanese and American competition; yet we vote $809,000 to help them carry on.

Mr. MANION: I have some details before me, but I did not wish to go into them because I did not think it necessary. According to my memorandum however, furnished by the Department of Trade and Commerce, the nine American services received about $5,000,000 in subsidies and the Japanese line received a little more than $770,000. I do not know about the slave labour problem about which the hon. member has been speaking, but I do know that a parliamentary committee of this house considered the matter, I believe on the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. REID: I am sorry the matter did not come finally before the house.

Mr. MANION: It was referred to a parliamentary committee. I believe they made a report and the Department of Trade and Commerce are making an effort to deal with the matter. It is obvious however that if Canadian or British shipping companies pay high wages to white labour and oriental or foreign shipping companies pay very low wages to oriental labour it will be very difficult for Canadian shipping companies to compete. While I do not wish to go into details of the matter it is obvious I believe that competition must to a certain extent govern in matters of this kind.

Mr. REID: We are paying subsidies, and yet this Canadian company does not hire highly paid labour, as do the American and British ships. They hire slaves.

Mr. MANION: But this company has to compete with the Japanese, who are hiring oriental labour. The Japanese pay a subsidy of about $771,000 and use oriental labour. This company has to compete with them.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Which of these shipping companies works in conjunction with the Canadian National Railways? How does a shipment from the Canadian National Railways go to the orient?

Mr. MANION: I presume it probably goes over Canadian Pacific shipping lines. I think so, at any rate. If the Canadian National Railways has not a line of its own—and it has not, on the Pacific to the orient—I sincerely hope it would give the business to the Canadian Pacific line, if the rates were satisfactory.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister states that he sincerely hopes. I am given to understand that very frequently on the Pacific route Canadian National freight goes to the orient by Japanese ships. Here we have an anomaly where we are subsidizing the Canadian Pacific shipping on the one hand, to carry freight, traffic and mail and on the other hand we find our own Canadian National Railways competing with the Canadian Pacific Railway and cooperating with a Japanese line, against which we are supposed to subsidize the Canadian Pacific line. It seems to me that this whole business is a farce. We all know that the Canadian Pacific Railway is to a great extent only Canadian in name, because the shareholders are scattered throughout the world. I understand that 83 per cent of the shares of the company are held outside of Canada. I understand that the officers on the Canadian Pacific ships are to a great extent British, not Canadian, officers. I have no particular quarrel with the employment of British officers, but I point this out to indicate that it is not in any sense a Canadian affair. British officers are used rather than Canadian officers. I believe the hon. member for New Westminster is quite correct when he states that Chinese work on the Canadian Pacific line, and that these men have a much lower standard of living than have the Japanese on the subsidized Japanese line. For this reason I say we are maintaining a lower standard of labour than even the orientally owned and subsidized line. I say the whole thing is farcical and before we grant subsidies to the Canadian Pacific we ought to have details from the minister. Expenses on the Canadian Pacific Railway ships ought to be allocated and laid before the house before we are asked to vote subsidies. The Canadian Pacific Railway has no right to come to this parliament and to say, "We cannot get along without this; please give it to us" and give no information in return. It is not fair to ask us to vote subsidies on that basis. Has the minister any figures to give with regard to the cost?

Mr. MANION: No, I have not. I did not expect to be asked Canadian Pacific shipping costs. Even if I had the information I do not believe I could give it. I am informed.

by the officer in front of me that they have certain private information in the Department of Trade and Commerce, but that it is of a private and confidential nature.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This committee should not be asked to grant subsidies when it does not know the situation existing, and when information regarding it is said to be private and confidential. I protest against that method of disbursing the taxpayers' money.

Mr. HEAPS: How many boats of this steamship company sail from Canada to the orient?

Mr. MANION: I am informed they have four mail boats.

Mr. HEAPS: Four mail vessels. How many sailings do those vessels make?

Mr. MANION: I am told they make twenty-five.

Mr. HEAPS: Therefore for twenty-five sailings per year we subsidize to the extent of about $800,000, which means about $32,000 per sailing.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is pretty fair.

Mr. HEAPS: As a mental calculation I conclude that $32,000 is paid for each sailing.

Mr. MANION: The Japanese payment is a litle more than that. My hon. friend has taken the outside figure. I am informed by the officer in front of me that the Japanese and Canadian ships make about the same number of sailings, and that the Japanese get a little more in the way of subsidy.

Mr. HEAPS: It comes down to a question of a fight in regard to subsidies. When one country raises the subsidy I presume we will have to follow suit to keep our business. Is the minister aware of the fact that the whole question of mail subsidies is now under review in the United States?

Mr. MANION: It is under review, but while under review they are paying the highest subsidies in the world.

Mr. REID: While it is true that the Japanese and American ships are subsidized, the fact remains that they hire their own nationals, and we do not. That is a very important factor.

Mr. MacINNIS: When one knows all the facts it is amazing to hear the Minister of Railways speak about our Canadian shipping, and particularly when he refers to the Canadian Pacific steamships. I remember last year taking up with the Minister of Labour the matter of certain men employed as engineers on the Canadian Pacific steamships who had been dismissed and replaced by engineers brought to Canada from the old country. In view of the fact, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that 83 per cent of the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific Railway live outside of Canada, and that the crews of these ships are almost entirely composed of Chinese, and that when the ships have to be repaired they are taken to China for such repairs, it is strange to hear an expression of concern about losing Canadian shipping. What have we to lose?—merely the name of the Canadian Pacific Railway. About all the meaning that the term Canadian Pacific Railway has to the people of Canada is the permanent employment of Chinese.

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

Miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. ELLIOTT: Is this amount supposed to take care of casualties?

Mr. DURANLEAU: This is supplementary to item 133, which is a small amount of $8,000 voted in the main estimates.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF MARINE

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. MacDonald (Cape Breton South) in the chair.

Miscellaneous and unforeseen expenses—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I was explaining that this item is supplementary to item 133 of the main estimates for $8,000, which is to take care of litigation expenses, and it happens that this year we have a very expensive case in the exchequer court in Vancouver and this sum is necessary to meet the costs of same.

Mr. ELLIOTT: For some years this vote has been $8,000 and now you are asking for an additional $5,000.

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I already told the committee, we have a special case on this year in Vancouver, which entails heavy expenses on account of the distance between Ottawa and the Pacific coast and the importance of the litigation.

Item agreed to.

River St. Lawrence ship channel dredges—(b) to provide for the maintenance and operation of the government ship channel fleet and government shipyard—further amount required, $250,000.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some weeks ago I asked for certain information which would have enabled me to have a better understanding of this item but although this question was allowed to stand as an order for return, the return has not yet been tabled. I should like to know how many dredges were owned by the department in 1928.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am sorry but I have not that information.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How many were owned in 1935?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Offhand I should say about ten or twelve.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When were they acquired?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Some years ago; some were built by the department in the shipyard at Sorel.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What did they cost?

Mr. DURANLEAU: That is the trouble. My hon. friend has been complaining of delays in supplying information he has requested from my department. These details are complicated and my officials have not had enough time to pick up all the information. As I told my hon. friend the other day, they are working at it, and as soon as possible it will be laid on the table of the house.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not sufficient. Surely if the minister's department is properly organized, he knows how many dredges there are at the present time and what those dredges cost. No minister can tell me that such information is not readily available within the department. It is now three weeks since the information was asked for.

Mr. DURANLEAU: For the information of my hon. friend as to this item, we are asking for a further amount of $250,000 in order to complete as soon as possible with our own dredges the cleaning up of the ship channel from the sea to Montreal to a depth of thirty-five feet at the level of 1897 or thirty-two and a half feet at the level of October, 1934. That is the only purpose. The work has become more and more pressing on account of the increase in the tonnage of ships coming to Montreal, and as we are anxious, as all Canadians should be, that this channel be completed during this present season of navigation, that is why we are asking for this further amount.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The purpose of submitting these estimates to the house is that the house may be apprised of the necessity of the works proposed to be undertaken. This is a large item amounting to $250,000, and I should like to know a little more about it. The very fact that the minister finds it so hard to give me the information makes me a little bit more curious. How many scows are there at the present time attending these dredges?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not the information at the present time, and I do not think it has anything to do with the vote in question. As a matter of fact this item is not for the purpose of building or purchasing dredges or scows; it is for the purpose of putting into commission dredges and scows owned by my department and which for reasons of economy have been laid up during these last years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is the very point. I would like to know how many there are altogether in the fleet.

Mr. DURANLEAU: In the last two years we have had on the St. Lawrence only four dredges, two working below Quebec and two above.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How many altogether?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have already told my hon. friend that I think we have ten or twelve dredges belonging to the department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What percentage of the dredging in the St. Lawrence river from Montreal to Quebec has been given to private contractors?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have not that information before me, I am sorry. All I know is that we are carrying out the program which was laid down by our predecessors before 1930, and the work on the portion of the St. Lawrence which was left to be completed by the dredges of the department is a little bit in arrears. That is why I want this further amount to supplement the $1,140,000 voted in the main estimates for our own fleet, in order to complete the cleaning up of the channel between the sea and Montreal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister has a fleet, but he cannot tell how many ships there are in it or what they cost. Is it to be the policy from now on to do all the dredging by the fleet owned by the department?

Mr. DURANLEAU: It is not our policy, because the department does not have powerfull enough dredges to do certain works in the St. Lawrence. Our dredges are not all up to date and we have not powerful enough dredges for that purpose. As regards certain works where there is rock for instance, we have tried to do the job with out own dredges, but it was so costly to the department, five or six times more than it would cost under contract, that we had to abandon it. It is the scheme adopted by our predecessors that we are proceeding with.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What is the cost to the department of supervising the work done by those contractors to whom the minister has just referred?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I have told the committee, I have not the information at hand. I know the department has many engineers surveying the St. Lawrence during the whole navigation season. We have also on contractors' dredges, following the operations and making reports to the department, two or three inspectors, depending on the circumstances. If the dredge is working twenty-four hours a day, we have three inspectors; if it works only during the daytime, we have only two. But as to the amount expended for that purpose, I have not the information before me. I can say to my hon. friend that the supervision is complete and very satisfactory to the department.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have any government dredges been sold to or used by private contractors?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not since I have been in charge, to my knowledge. I may add this, that since my department has acquired from the Department of Railways and Canals the dredge Churchill, this dredge was put at the disposal of the Saint John dry dock for the demolition of berths one, two, three and four which were burned three or four years ago as my hon. friend will remember. That is the only circumstance where a dredge was put under rent or loan to a contractor. When I say "loan," I might explain: The St. John dry dock company had undertaken the demolition at cost plus four per cent or five per cent and that dredge was put at their disposal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have any dredges or scows been sold to the Quebec harbour commission?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Not to my knowledge; I do not think so. The Quebec harbour commission might have sold an old dredge, but I do not think the commission has bought any dredge.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have any floating scows or rock breakers or stone lifters been supplied to the contractors?

Mr. DURANLEAU: As I told my hon. friend a minute ago, I have not the information.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is rather curious that we are being asked to vote a further amount of $250,000 to provide for the maintenance and operation of the government ship channel fleet and government shipyard, and the minister, after having been asked for this information for some weeks, has apparently not been able so far to ascertain facts that ought to be ascertainable within a few hours in any well organized department. I cannot understand the minister taking that attitude. If he wants this $250,000, the least he can do, like other ministers, is to have the information at hand, and I think we are entitled to ask that this item stand until we receive the information. At present we cannot vote intelligently on this item.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not think the fact of lending a scow or other equipment to a private firm or otherwise has anything to do with this item which is to supplement item (b) in vote 139 which concerns our own fleet. It is not for the purpose of purchasing any equipment, dredges, scows, tugs or anything, it is only to put into commission the tugs, scows and dredges we already have belonging to the department, and to pay men to be put on those dredges.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then on that basis the minister can surely tell me how many dredges they have. If he wants $250,000 more to put them into commission can he not tell me how many we have? Several weeks ago I asked how many we had in 1928, how many in 1929, in 1930, in 1931, in 1932, 1933, 1934 and 1935, and apparently he cannot tell me.

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: If the information mentioned by my hon. friend were the only thing asked in his long list of questions he would have had the answer long ago. But there are some details asked which involve a great deal of work by my engineers, and at present the larger number of my engineers are on the St. Lawrence or elsewhere.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This is not a question that pertains to engineering, and the minister knows that well. The information is in the department, it is a matter of bookkeeping, and the minister could get it within three hours if he wanted to give it. I think we ought to have it before proceeding with this item. A quarter of a million dollars is asked to put certain dredges into commission, and the minister refuses to inform us how many they have and their history.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I told my hon. friend that we have about ten or twelve. But it does not matter much if we have twenty or twenty-five so far as this item is concerned, because we have only four in commission at the present time, and with this amount I might put one or perhaps two more into commission. That would make five or six out of ten.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am asking what percentage of work is to be done by these dredges of the department and what percentage is to be done by private contractors.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Offhand I would say the works were divided almost equally in the scheme of my hon. friend which we are proceeding with. But the department, owing to our equipment not being up to date, and the fact that we have not large funds available, is behind with its work. I would like to have this further amount in order to complete the cleaning up of the channel this season. This work is asked for by the province of Quebec and I think should be approved by all citizens of Canada. It is very important for Canada that large ocean shipping should be brought to the heart of Canada. That is why we want to keep our channel in proper shape.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can the minister tell me how many firms tendered for this work?

Mr. DURANLEAU: From memory I cannot say. I know tenders were asked when that contract was let in May, 1930, by the previous administration. My hon. friend knows that the firms equipped to do that sort of work on the St. Lawrence are few.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: How many are there?

Mr. DURANLEAU: There might be two or three firms in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there more than one firm doing the work?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, I can tell my hon. friend that there was a main contract and also subcontracts to two other firms, I think. But there are certain works for the execution of which I do not think more than two firms in Canada have equipment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What are the names of those firms?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think the General Dredging Company Limited had the main contract, and the other firms which had their share of it are, I think, the Canadian Dredging Company and J. P. Porter & Sons, Limited. They are very reliable firms, and the works are done to the great satisfaction of my engineers.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is it proposed that when the dredges are reconditioned the department is to use them itself, or to let them out to one or other of these contractors?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The policy of this government has been to keep for our own department the equipment we had in 1930. Moreover we have purchased from the Department of Railways and Canals the Churchill, a powerful dredge. She is at Saint John at the present time, working at the reconditioning of berths 1, 2, 3 and 4. We do not intend to sell our equipment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not speaking of selling, but does the department itself operate its own dredges and scows, or does it on occasion give the use of them under certain conditions to private contractors?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The dredges and scows which we do not use, on account of the small amounts voted by this house for the last three or four years, have been laid up and kept in a reasonable state of repair.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is not my question. When this $250,000 is expended and our fleet is reconditioned is it the policy of the department to operate the whole of that fleet itself, or are certain parts of the equipment to be given over to be used by private contractors?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The policy of this government is to employ our whole fleet when we have a vote large enough for the purpose. We do not rent or lend our equipment to any private firm.

Mr. ELLIOTT: What is this $250,000 for? Is it for repairs to the existing fleet or to operate the fleet?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The greater part of this amount is to put into commission one or two dredges of the department which are in a fairly good state of repair. It is to employ more men on our fleet. It may be that small repairs will be necessary, because the vote covers also expenses of the plant at Sorel. But the largest part of this amount is to put into commission one or two dredges.

Mr. ELLIOTT: We are pretty well along in the dredging season. Has the department decided whether it is one dredge or two in addition to what they have been operating for the last few years?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I had asked for a larger amount than this, but obtained $250,000 from the treasury board. I am told by my officials that we might be able to put two more dredges into commission. It may be that we shall have to shorten the season when the amount is exhausted, but we intend to put on two more dredges.

Mr. ELLIOTT: I have some knowledge of dredging and I want to say that if you intended to do dredging this year the dredges should have been equipped and at work before this. I see that under item No. 139 of the main estimates $1,140,000 was voted for this same purpose, the same vote the minister had in 1934-35. Now he comes along with an additional $250,000 and he does not know whether one or two additional dredges will be required. The minister does not seem to know anything in particular about what is going to be done with this $250,000. I agree with my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre; I think this item should stand until the minister knows something about the number of dredges it is intended to operate and what will be done with this amount of money.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have given a fairly good explanation.

Mr. ELLIOTT: It may be satisfactory to the minister but it is an awfully poor explanation so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am told by my officials that with two more dredges working in the channel between Quebec and Montreal we may expect the thirty-five foot channel to be completed probably next September. It is our intention to put on these two additional dredges for as long as possible with this amount of money, in addition to the other four dredges that have been in commission since the beginning of the season. I think that explanation should be satisfactory.

Mr. POULIOT: If I am permitted to butt into this highly technical discussion I should like to ask the minister if it is not true that dredging is much cheaper when it is done by private firms than when it is done with the departmental apparatus, and if that is so I should like to know why.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I cannot admit the proposition put forward by my hon. friend. It may be so; it all depends on the equipment and the material. Of course a powerful, up-to-date dredge would do more work than another dredge not so powerful. The trouble is that the department has not the powerful dredges needed in certain parts of the St. Lawrence. It may be also that the dredging done by a private firm may be less costly because of the wages paid. The department is supposed to pay better wages than private firms. I do not affirm that fact, but I think that is the case.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand that what the hon. gentleman has said is just a preface to his answer, and I am waiting for this answer. I asked if there was any reason why it should be cheaper to have dredging done by private firms than by the department. That is my question; it is right to the point, and I should like to have a straight answer.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I want to be frank with my hon. friend; I think dredging done by private firms costs less to the department than the dredging done by the department, but the department must maintain its dredging because we have a great deal of cleaning up to do in the channel, and we need the fleet for that purpose.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister. I am satisfied with his answer.

Mr. GARDINER: I suppose the minister has some information as to the yardage that has to come out of the St. Lawrence that must be handled by these large dredges; I presume the engineers of the department have taken soundings in the channel. Can the minister say what yardage must be handled by the large dredges and the approximate yardage that can be handled by the departmental dredges?

[Mr. Duranleau.]

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think I have the information at the department; I am sorry I do not have it here. I can tell my hon. friend that the dredging in the St. Lawrence, under the 1930 contract, has been going on steadily and is now pretty well advanced.

Mr. HEAPS: Was not the water in the St. Lawrence very low this year?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, at one time, but in the last three weeks the water has come up over a foot and a half, and at the present time the level is very satisfactory.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister tell the committee whether the contract entered into in 1930, which is being continued, calls for the completion of the work which the department dredges cannot handle?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the contract on the same price basis as when it was entered into in 1930?

Mr. DURANLEAU: No, the price has been lowered by two or three dollars a cubic yard. It has been lowered by at least two dollars for the further hard work.

Mr. GARDINER: Was this contract of 1930 let to one company?

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes, and part of the contract was transferred to the other firms I have already mentioned.

Mr. GARDINER: What company got the original contract?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The General Dredging Company, Limited.

Mr. GARDINER: And they sublet some of that contract to other companies?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I think they have transferred part of their contract.

Mr. GARDINER: Just what proportion of the contract has been transferred and what are the companies that secured the sub-contracts from the original company?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I could not give the exact figures but I think the two other companies secured nearly one-half the whole job.

Mr. GARDINER: Of the original contract?

Mr. DURANLEAU: The original contract.

Mr. GARDINER: Can the minister give the committee any information as to the price at which these sub-contracts were let?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I am under the impression that it was a transfer of contract. It may be that the company that secured the original contract, being responsible for the work, might have retained five or ten per cent of the amount, but it was practically a transfer of contract.

Mr. GARDINER: But in view of the fact that the department let this one continuous contract for all this work surely when sub-contracts are made the department must have information not only as to the companies to which the sub-contracts were let but also as to the prices at which they were let, because the minister has stated that the original company must be responsible for the proper completion of the work.

Mr. DURANLEAU: When we came into power in 1930 these sub-contracts had been let and the companies were at work. I have not the contracts or sub-contracts here; I would not like to mislead this committee, but I think it was practically a transfer of part of the contract.

Mr. GARDINER: If it was a transfer of part of the contract—and we will accept that explanation—then the minister's department must have been a party to that part of the transfer. Therefore he must have information in his office as to the terms upon which the transfer was made. That is the information I should like to have.

Mr. DURANLEAU: If the hon. member desires to have the information I should be glad to supply it; no doubt I can supply it, but I have not the information with me.

Mr. GARDINER: Could the minister have it to-night at eight o'clock?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I could write the hon. member and tell him the facts.

Mr. GARDINER: Could you get it to-night?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I do not know; it is five-thirty, and the office will be closed. I could write, however.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to have this information before the committee because in my judgment it is very important to have a little more information about dredging contracts in the St. Lawrence. If the minister could see his way clear to let it stand until such time as he could get the information, I would appreciate it very much.

Mr. MITCHELL: The minister left the impression that the wages paid by private contractors were not as high as those which might be paid by the government. I should like to know whether the fair wages clause is made a part of private contracts.

Mr. DURANLEAU: The fair wages clause is inserted.

Mr. HEAPS: Why is it that they were paying lower wages than the government were paying?

Mr. DURANLEAU: I thought they were.

Mr. GARDINER: The minister is not sure.

Mr. DURANLEAU: For instance, the captain on a dredge of a private concern might receive a little less salary than a captain on a government dredge; I am not quite sure about it. The wages paid to labourers are the same, because they are under a fair wages scale.

Mr. GARDINER: In view of the statement made by the minister to the effect that government dredges could not compete with privately owned dredges because of the fact that they were paying a lower wage scale, I believe we should have further information concerning the vote before we are asked to pass it. Perhaps the minister would accede to the reasonable request that the item stand until the information is received.

Mr. DURANLEAU: I have no objection.

Item stands.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

International boundary commission—expenses connected with the maintenance in a state of effective demarcation of the international boundary—revote, further amount required, $6,819.42.

Mr. REID: May we have information regarding this vote? I ask at this time because two boundary marks were placed on the international boundary at Temiahmoo Bay, and I was wondering whether or not the department would complete those international boundary marks. As is known, the cost is borne by both the United States and Canada.

Hon. T. G. MURPHY (Minister of the Interior): Does the hon. member refer to the marks at Boundary Bay?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: This item is for that expenditure. The Department of Public Works were erecting those marks and were not able to complete them by March 31 this year. This is a revote to enable them to pay for the completion of the work.

Mr. REID: I appreciate the minister's reply, and I know it will be appreciated out there.

Item agreed to.

Mines Branch

For investigations of mineral resources and deposits; of the mining and metallurgical industries, and of mineral technology; wages, and expenses of testing and research laboratories; for publications, English and French; for purchase of books and instruments; for miscellaneous assistants and contingencies; and for investigations by the dominion fuel board, including salaries and all other expenses—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am sorry the Minister of Mines is not in his seat because I had a few questions to ask him. However I shall not delay the committee in the consideration of the estimates, but shall proceed to make only a few observations regarding the mining situation in Canada and how it has been affected by developments in the last few years.

All is not well in the entire mining industry, a fact which is known to many hon. members in the chamber and people throughout the country. That condition has arisen through many contributing factors but chiefly through increased taxation in the last three or four years. I bring this matter to the attention of the government in spite of the fact that any increase in taxation on the mining industry will of course be paid. The Prime Minister has already stated that the men in that industry have been the best taxpayers in the Dominion of Canada. It is a fact however that any increase in taxation will be passed on by way of a lower wage to the labouring men. That condition has existed in the industry during the last four years. In 1930, 89,000 men were employed in the entire industry, drawing $113,000,000 or an average of $1,277 each. In 1933, despite all the prosperity in the gold mining industry only 63,000 men were employed in the entire industry, drawing a total of $70,000,000 or an average of $1,105 each.
